On the arrival of the troops General Brooks ordered the city hall cleared, and announced if the order was not complied with firing would be begun. Many of the crowd jeered, others cheered. On all sides were pale, drawn faces, but the onlookers stood their ground, determined to "see the fun," as many termed it.

Messrs. Orr and Martin, having obtained from the district court an injunction restraining Governor Waite from forcibly removing them, were determined to resist to the uttermost. They accordingly kept the entire police force at the city hall all day, under orders to resist the soldiers if attacked. In addition several hundreds of the toughest citizens, many of whom have records as man-killers, were sworn in as deputies by Sheriff Burchinell and placed in the city hall as a reinforcement of the police department.

Each deputy was armed with two six-shooters, and instructed to use them in case of necessity. The police were armed with shotguns in addition to their clubs and revolvers.

VANCOUVER, B. C., March 15.—Oriental advices which have been received here state that a disastrous collision occurred recently in the strait between Bengalis and Cagal. Two steamers, the Seng Guan and Aing Hoe, collided while going at full speed. Those on board the Seng Guan jumped into the water and were picked up by the crew of the Aing Hoe. Scarcely had they reached deck when both steamers lurched and went down. About fifty people were drowned and as many saved themselves by swimming ashore, among them being two Americans, Captain Miller of the Seng Guan, and Chief Engineer Pirie.

PARIS, March 15.—A dynamite bomb was exploded this afternoon inside the main entrance to the church of La Madeleine. The man who threw the bomb was killed by the explosion and a number of others were seriously hurt.

BOSTON, Mass., March 16.—What its perpetrators call a "miracle play" was presented for the first time in Boston before an American audience. The play proved to be nothing more or less than the alleged representation of the life and suffering of Christ while on earth, and produced by means of hideous wooden marionettes, in fact a burlesque on the passion play.

Not only were the dangling caricatures of the Savior and his contemporaries offensive in themselves, but the offense amounted to almost a horror when the street band that assisted accompanied the bearing of the cross to Calvary with "After the Ball is Over" and the crucifixion with "Washington Post" march.

The innocent and estimable lady who brought out this play is the daughter of a well known Boston clergyman, and an authoress and had in the course of her studies learned of this play which, it was represented to her, was based upon an old religious tradition among the Italians and produced by some of them during Holy Week as a sort of religious duty. Being interested in religion she engaged the Italian players to give the piece in a hall and sold tickets to about 180 Boston people of the most exclusive set and the proceeds went to the poor. The play occupied three hours. All the life of Christ was depicted, although the well meaning managers had been given to understand that it was in no way like the Passion Play, and offensive.

LOS ANGELES, March 16.—General Fry's army of unemployed, organized to march to Washington, is a grotesque failure. The city council, the board of supervisors and officers of the associated charities met this morning and decided to relieve all meritorious cases of destitution, but to recognize no organization of unemployed. Five hundred dollars was subscribed for immediate use. Work will be supplied on the streets, and the vagrant law be enforced. The authorities will disperse any army or like organization.

The army, numbering about 800, on learning the result of the meeting, abandoned their barracks and marched out of the city, apparently beginning its great march. They had no organization and no leadership. Their leaders are said to have looted the treasury and the main body was without funds or rations. A large majority were without blankets. Before they reached Alhambra, five miles distant, many had dropped out and retreated to the railroads, in hopes of catching trains. Deputy sheriffs and constables along the line of march have been notified and will vag the members of the dispersed army as fast as opportunity offers.

LONDON, March 17.—The fifty-first boat race between Oxford and Cambridge took place this morning over the course from Putney bridge to the ship at Mortlake. Oxford won by three and a half lengths, in twenty-one minutes and thirty-nine seconds.

Of the previous contests, Oxford has won twenty-seven, including the races of the last four years. Cambridge has been victorious in twenty-two. The race in 1877 was a dead heat.

WASHINGTON, March 17.—Should the Bland seigniorage bill, which has passed both houses, become a law, the coinage of $55,000,000 of silver bullion will have to be done at the mints of Philadelphia, San Francisco and New Orleans, the only mints in operation. The Philadelphia mint could turn out $1,000,000 per month, the San Francisco mint about the same and the New Orleans mint about $800,000. The San Francisco mint, however, has only $16,000,000 in silver bullion on hand and the New Orleans mint only $750,000, so that after the supply of these mints is exhausted, the remaining $30,000,000 would have to be coined at Philadelphia. The whole time, therefore, necessary to coin the seigniorage is approximately two years and two months.

DENVER, Colorado, March 18.—A fire starting in the offices in the second story of the union depot about 12:30 Saturday morning spread with such rapidity that by the time the fire department arrived the blaze lit up the lower part of the city. It looked at first as if the fire could be confined to the west wing, in which were the baggage and express departments, but an explosion occurred and the fire got beyond control.

The entire structure, extending from Sixteenth to Eighteenth streets, is destroyed. The building was of stone and was owned by the Union Depot company. The loss is about $500,000 fully insured.

The building was 708 feet long by 65 wide. It was completed in June, 1891, and cost in the neighborhood of $500,000.

NEW YORK, March 18.—The sermon tonight of Rev. Madison C. Peters at the Bloomingdale Reform church was devoted to an attack on the Roman Catholic church, particularly on its influence on the government at Washington. The preacher had letters stating that nuns are permitted to go through all the departments on begging missions, and even to stand by when the clerks are receiving their pay and solicit contributions, and that the Catholic influence is potent in all the departments in matters of appointment, promotion and dismissals. Numerous instances were cited in which Protestants were discriminated against in favor of Catholics.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., March 19.—Dr. Helme Marks, superintendent of the city hospital, claims that cholera and typhoid fever can be cured quickly and safely by a surgical operation. An incision is made in the abdomen just above the ilio-cæcal valve, then a tube is inserted in the intestines at the point where the bacilli of these diseases work, and these are flooded with an antiseptic solution, killing the bacilli.

DALLAS, Tex., March 19.—The cyclone and ice storm which devastated Longview on Sunday, struck the little town of Emery, thirty miles south of Greenville Saturday night and demolished the western part of the place. A relief train with doctors sent from Greenville found the people helpless and panic stricken. Over a dozen were dead or dying and many others more or less injured. The identified are George Walker, Miss Esther Alexander, B. Henry, and the four-year-old child of Henry Murray. Three unidentified bodies were found north of Emery. Fifty were wounded, some very seriously. The storm came from the southwest and swept the earth of everything in a track fifty miles long and a hundred yards wide.

HARRISVILLE NEWS.

HARRISVILLE, Utah, March 19, 1894.—A quarterly conference was held in this ward yesterday. At 10 a.m. the meeting house was well filled, scarcely a member of the ward being absent. The stand was occupied by Bishop P. G. Taylor and counselors, with other local brethren. Counselor C. F. Middleton, of the Stake presidency, and Elders Stuart, Doxey and Tolletson, of the Stake High Council, were present. Bishop Taylor was requested to report the ward's condition and did so. He was followed by Elders Stuart, Doxey, Tolletson and Middleton who complimented the ward upon its good condition. They also treated upon various subjects of interest, such as social entertainments, joining secret orders, the order of voting to sustain ecclesiastical officers and the duty of the Priesthood.

The choir, with Herbert D. Brown as leader and Miss Emeline Agran as organist, was a notable acquisition to the two meetings. The afternoon meeting closed at 4:30 o'clock, after we had enjoyed a real feast.

Our brick yard, which took the premium at the World's Fair in Chicago, and for which four medals are to be presented to the four experts who run the concern, is still lying dormant. Occasionally a car of brick is shipped out. P. L.

A BAD FRACTURE.

SCRIPPO, Millard county, Utah, March 12, 1894.—I am sorry to have to report a sad accident which happened to Elder J. P. Olson of this place last Friday.

Brother Olson has been digging a well upon his premises, and in descending, the hoisting rope got disarranged, and he fell to the bottom, a distance of about twenty feet. Striking upon the bucket at the bottom he dislocated his right shoulder, also breaking his left leg just above the ankle, the bones protruding through the flesh.

Dr. West, of Salina, was sent for, but through the heavy roads and deep snow drifts his arrival was much delayed and it was thirty hours before the fractured limbs could be set, the injury being beyond the skill of our local help.

This morning the patient is as well and comfortable as could reasonably be expected. T.

S. R. Hart, a lawyer of Fresno, Cal., has been tried in the superior court on a charge of embezzlement in appropriating $192 belonging to Antone George, his client. He was convicted and will be sentenced this week.

WILL IT PAY?

With the advent of spring and sunshine there are indications everywhere of hilarity and renewed activity; there is a general cleaning up in many places, and men are seen going to and fro with early garden and other tools; and so trade is quickened, business men smile, and the indications are for renewed local good feeling, and in some way a better show for general prosperity.

Men who have a little means will want to do something to make some change. Some improvement, or an addition may be needed—one long thought of perchance, but deferred because hope was moulting and dejected, and none could see very far beyond the mists and fog of hard times, as they were justly called.

There has been a good deal of hard and serious thinking done during the just past winter, and where large families are, the burthen has been felt as never before. In fairly prosperous times probably the weight of responsibility rested upon the head of the house; the boys and girls were at school or doing next to nothing for their own subsistence; but this last year many a man has wished that his labor could be supplemented by the labor of his family, if only as a relief for the moment. In looking around for employment, however, the fact has been forced home, that opportunities were altogether too few to be of any avail, where so many were "catching on" to the same idea. And from this thinking has been evolved many needed, and some old but long dormant, conclusions in regard to providing work for this part of our population, that they may be adding to the general wealth, instead of being a tax upon the health, strength, thought and resources of their parents. What little labor was to be had here, much also of that which was provided, and still more of the sums collected in the name of charity, have been mainly absorbed by strangers, allured here in response to a clamor as unwise as unfortunate. For, leaving out this, there might have been employment and remuneration for the native born and for those coming to Utah with the intent of remaining. The experience will eventually be in good no doubt. We shall cease crying for an invasion of labor, and we shall make some effort to employ our own. And for this no half-way nor half-hearted measures will answer. If only to preserve the morale of our youth, if only to deliver them from the necessity of wandering; if we intend them to marry and shoulder their share of responsibility in Church or State, they must have opportunities of subsistence, chance for work and livelihood, such as they really cannot inaugurate for themselves.

From manufacturing mainly, will this salvation come; for land is limited and that now in cultivation provides a surplus beyond the needs of the home non-producer, unless more diversified crops can be the rule of the farm. If we can extend the sugar business, if beans and peas and roots can be more abundantly raised so that we can cease importing, send out our stock in finer condition, and foster that which will support a family all round. We experimented years ago with hemp. From it rope was made and kindred things. We suddenly stopped short, or all our grain, potato and fruit sacks might long since have been made from this, unless our southern counties had gone in for raising jute which is easily done and would have been better. Then we tried flax which is indigenous to these valleys. Good thread was made, although linseed oil was the first intent; and what was made of this had no adulteration, so was far different from that now imported. This product being from the seed, the fiber still remained, and long ere this had others worked upon the foundation so ardently and persistently laid by the Pioneers, all our ordinary towels, sheeting, and table cloths might have been "the workmanship of our own hands." Many efforts at the same time were made for the production of castor oil, which for medicine, lubricant and other purposes is in steady demand, and these are far more likely to succeed today. We essayed to make white lead, but our unfamiliarity with its chemistry or lack of other thing prevented, as it prevented the making of gunpowder, and as a fact sugar, which failed mainly from the same inability to cope with the elements drawn by the beets from a soil whose constituents were unknown then to the producers or farmers at large.

It is to be regretted also that our efforts at glass-making were not more persistent, that is so far as preserve jars, beer bottles, flasks and prescription vials are concerned. To be sure no such mammoth works were possible as Pittsburgh would demand; but on a small scale there was a little business which requires annually thirty car loads of the first article, and some say near twenty of the other. Then a vast amount of old material could have been used which now has to be buried and wasted. Surely this business could be resurrected and extended if a different management was supplied.

Many a close-by farmer who is advanced in years might make, if he had suitable land, quite a few dollars from rhubarb, asparagus and mushroom cultivation, with wine of the former and ketchup of the latter for surplus, by making a specialty of one or all in the season thereof. Then with small fruits to follow, such as currants, gooseberries, raspberries, blackberries and other varieties, occupation would be sure during a large proportion of the summer. The basket-making industry could be extended much, if some one would put out a good willow patch and prepare intelligently the material, both peeled and otherwise; while the raising of garden seeds, from peas to cabbage, could not only supply the home demand, but careful attention to production would find a market among all the great seedsmen of the East, and probably in many respects this would be a benefit for eastern reproduction.

It was to the writer a very gratifying thing to see in a late Coalville paper that a determined effort was to be made for scouring the wool product of that section prior to shipment. Years ago we had pointed out the absurdity of paying freight on fifty to sixty per cent of waste, besides paying eastern persons to do that for us for which we had both labor and facilities at home.

Attention was also called to the fact that it was possible from the by-products of this scouring, such as grease, to pay all expenses. The latter idea does not appear to enter into the Coalville project, but to scour and cleanse the important product is secondary in value only to manufacturing that wool, and using it at home, or exporting when there is a surplus of the article or goods so produced.

It was a sad loss to the community when the paper mill went up in smoke. Now we have to waste or destroy most of our rage, as it would hardly pay to ship them East. We can only hope that in the not far distant future some enterprising company will resurrect so desirable a manufacture, and extend it into domain not fully explored by the old company. The spirit which originated this industry, with many others, should be a continuous illustration of the far-seeing economy and enterprise of those of our leaders who in early days aimed for independence by the utilization of home resources.

It is curious to observe an essential difference between that spirit and the spirit of today. There was little if any query then as to whether any enterprise would pay. The community wanted sugar—"let us try to make it." Iron was deemed important—labor and means were forthcoming. Woolen machinery was needed—it was soon on hand. A grist mill—before you knew it almost it was built. A tannery would be good—the tannery came. If education was a blessing—the foundations of the University were laid in hopeful poverty; and it was "the tyranny of the Priesthood," as the editor of the Chronicle calls it, which now enables him to hold a position and sneeringly point out to the students and the taxpayers who support him what there is today. When co-operative merchandising was desirable, it was established. When the shoe factory was a necessity, it sprang into being. And when the Temple was as important from a religious standpoint, as those named (with many others) were from a secular and industrial one, they were formed with hardly a thought of "will it pay." "Necessity (so to speak) knew no law." Duty, and faith, and family, and Utah were the inspiration of the master minds, and their spirit was contagious, for every one was at work. If there was a need, whether that need was ink, brooms, wool rolls, hats, shoes, nails, pistols, cotton yarn, soap, furniture, paper, cloth, leather, pottery, whips, gloves, silk, books, straw goods, baskets, oils, plows, with a thousand other things—they were created; to say nothing of fruit, flowers, and improved stock of all kinds that could be of value to the community or their posterity.

So that we need not flatter ourselves because of our energy, our enterprise, or our originality. The fathers, the leaders, have "been there" before us, and their expenditure in unselfish ways, under the spirit of patriotism and love to man, for sugar, iron, cloth, etc., dwarfs all our efforts, when we take into account the poverty, the lack of money, the crude tools, the want of experience, and the distance from supplies or help. It was the grand spirit; sacrifice and toil were the handmaids of endeavor and enterprise, and to need anything, to believe that it was good or desirable, was to make it reachable, to bring it into being; and no man ever allowed to well up from his heart, or fall from his lips, the far too-suggestive query—Will it pay?

A WITNESS FOR CHRIST.

Elder Don Bartholomew sends the following communication from Beyrout, Syria, dated January 31st, 1894:

Thus said the Lord; Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hands of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel, his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in my hand.—(Ezekiel 37: 19.)

Wherefore the fruit of thy loins shall write; and the fruit of the loins of Judah shall write; and that which shall be written by the fruit of thy loins, and also that which shall be written by the fruit of the loins of Judah, shall grow together, unto the confounding of false doctrines, and laying down of contentions, and establishing peace among the fruit of thy loins, and bringing them to a knowledge of their fathers in the latter days; and also to the knowledge of my covenants, saith the Lord.—(Book of Mormon, II Nephi, 3: 12.)

In the days of the Prophet Ezekiel, books, instead of being in what is now known as book form, were rolled up on sticks, and still retain the term "volumes" from the time they obtained their form by the revolving process. Hence by the "stick of Judah" the Prophet refers to the sacred writings of the Jews, represented today by the Bible. "The stick of Joseph in the hands of Ephraim" is the sacred writings of the descendants of Joseph through Ephraim on the American continent, and are what the Latter-day Saints have today in the Book of Mormon.

To a careful observer and true Christian it is easy to be seen, that the time has come when a new witness for the Bible, and for Christ is absolutely necessary to the establishing of peace, the putting down of contentions, and the bringing of men to a knowledge of the covenants of the Most High. A theological student endowed with even the least particle of heaven's light will have no difficulty in understanding the words of the ancient prophets, concerning this witness that should be brought forth in the latter days. But the Latter-day Saints are the only people who can place the prophecies of the two sacred books side by side, and testify in the name of their Redeemer, that the sticks of Judah and Ephraim testify of each other, and are overthrowing false doctrines by bringing the honest in heart to a knowledge of the Son of God. The almost numberless sects of Christianity are groping as the blind for the wall, writing comments and criticisms, while crying lo, here, and lo, there; others, disgusted with the absurdities of the so-called Christian world, rise up and deny God; thousands and thousands of missionaries of many different beliefs respecting salvation, are rushing to the old world bewildering the heathen and amusing with their contentions the Jew and Moslem. While all this confusion is reigning the Latter-day Saints can lift up their heads and rejoice for having had their eyes opened. They are prepared to stand forth and protect the integrity of the Jewish writings when it seems the rest of the world are bent on dragging them down. While learned doctors and professors devote their time in trying to convince the world that the Bible is not what it pretends to be and that certain passages in the sacred books are interpolations, and certain others are misinterpretations, and others have a kind of mystical meaning that cannot be understood, the Latter-day Saints, armed with a new witness, are as firm as the mountains with which they are surrounded, and are, in their quiet way, gathering souls from the four quarters of the earth up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob.

Though oft times accused of not believing in the Bible, they are showing the world the beauties of this most precious book, and teaching the honest in heart how to be saved by rendering obedience to the doctrines contained therein. The Book of Mormon, which through the instrumentality of the Prophet Joseph was brought to light, confirms the teachings of the Bible, and the testimonies of the two books are flowing harmoniously together and are gradually sweeping away false doctrines and winning people over to the side of Christ.

Fair minded Christians ought to acknowledge that divine help is necessary to cause them to come back into the right channel. For over 1,800 years the Christian world has been trying to come to a unity in Christ, but is today farther away than ever. And how is this? Is the Bible at fault? Certainly not, the Bible is all that it claims to be. It is the stick of Judah. The fault lies with the world who, though professing to believe in and be guided by its teachings, and foolishly supposing that revelation—the means through which God communes with His Church—had forever ceased, have taken it upon themselves to interpret and explain the scriptures, each one according to his own fancy, disregarding the fact that while the spirit of man can understand the things of man, the things of God can only be understood by the Spirit of God. But thanks to the great I AM, the time has at last arrived when the "Stick of Joseph" testifies to the truth of the "Stick of Judah." People who lay aside their hasty and ill-formed conclusions and read the two sticks will receive light. Their eyes will be opened and they will behold a new world. The dispensation of the fullness of times has been ushered in, and all things are being gathered in one, and to the prayerful and honest in heart the Book of Mormon is a new and impeachable witness for Christ.

UTAH AT THE FAIR.

UTAH PAVILION, Midwinter Fair, SAN FRANCISCO, March 10, 1894.

The Utah exhibit at the Midwinter Fair is now placed, and open to the public. It is arranged on the east gallery of the Mechanical Arts building. In point of interest it stands collectively superior to any exhibit occupying equal space at the Fair. It is divided into three departments, first, Agriculture; second, Manufacture; third, Mining. Each department is separate from the others, but an entrance from one to another allows visitors to go through the three departments.

The space occupied by our exhibit at the Fair consists of 60x20 feet with 12 feet additional for passageway along the gallery. The booth is built of California redwood. Each department has an arcade front entrance, beautifully lettered and decorated to suit the nature of each exhibit.

In agriculture we have exhibits of the various grasses and grains grown in Utah; also the natural fertilizers, an exhibit of wool, butter, cotton, silk, and a really splendid exhibit of sugar from the Lehi sugar works. This represents the various stages through which it passes from the beet to the finished white product; and also the different classes of confectioner's stock as prepared for their use. The interior is decorated with oats, wheat, barley and rye straw, and the varied rich grasses of Utah.

In the department of manufactures we have excellent exhibits from the Prove woolen mills. These consist of casimeres, tweeds, chevots, swills, broadcloths, flannels, blankets, yarn and woolen thread. In cotton we have a good exhibit of the cotton in the pod and as taken from the field; also cotton batting and chevots, glug-hams, denture, Canton flannel, towels, table cloths and spreads, napkins, bed spreads, and a good variety of cotton yarns. These are from the Washington mills, near St. George, and the entire cotton display was produced from the fields along the Virgin river and on the Santa Clara, in Washington county, Utah.

The silk exhibit which was so attractively placed by Mrs. Margaret Caine is one of the most beautiful silk displays ever made on the Pacific Coast. It consists of silk cocoons, silk as first reeled from the cocoons, then the yarn after spinning, next woven into cloth, and next the various methods of dyeing. There are silk parterres of the most exquisite design, and all the work of Utah women.

The boot and shoe and leather display, made by Z. C. M. I. factory of Salt Lake City is a very creditable showing, and occupies a whole space. As with the other goods exhibited from Utah, this contains excellent material well made.

The soap display from Grant Bros. soap works at Salt Lake City is one of the most wonderful pieces of artistic work at the Midwinter Fair. It consists first of a large lot of the soap as sold in the market, and next two large carved representations, one of the Salt Lake Temple and the other of the City and County building in Salt Lake. When lighted up by electricity these look most beautiful.

Fred J. Kiesel & Co., of Ogden, have a beautiful display of their famous mineral waters.

Dr. Dunn, of Salt Lake, has a fine grouping of his patent medicines, and the Nephi plaster works have done exceedingly well in the nature of their advertisement. It consists of representations of various castings made from their plaster. Then the plaster ground and placed in glass jars, and a large tank filled with the alabaster as taken from the mines.

There is a very neat wine exhibit from John Barker, of Willard, Utah, which stands its own against anything produced in California; and in the department of mining we show the splendid cabinets of Mr.

R. Mackintosh, of Sandy, Utah, and five other large cabinets owned by the state. In these we have the richest display made here, both in color and variety. They far surpass all that has been done by any outside exhibitors at the Fair. In this we have gold, silver, copper, lead, zinc, bismuth, antimony, nickel, cobalt, mercury, aluminum, ores and bullion from most of the same in gems. We have topaz, garnets, onyx, malachite, rock crystal, turquoise, green stone and other gems found over different parts of Utah. In coal we have exhibits from Cedar City, also from Pleasant Valley, and from Coalville and Grass Creek. The asphaltum mines of Thistle and the Gilsontite from Fort Duchesne and the ozokerite from Soldier Summit attract universal attention.

Taken throughout we may be very pleased with the showing Utah has made here. All economy possible was used. It may not have been supreme wisdom to have taken part in this Fair but we feel that what has been done so far has been fairly done, and it now remains for the rest of the work to advertise and advance the interests of Utah. The Utah pamphlet will be here in a few days and then distribution of it will begin.

The persons engaged from Utah on this work are James Cushing, of Sandy, Utah, Alonzo Young, of Salt Lake, Mrs. Margaret Caine, of Salt Lake, and Don Maguire, of Ogden. This force will now be cut down to barely a watching and care-taking force.

As we write the Fair is gaining strength. New hope and new vigor are being produced by increased gate receipts, and present indications point to a most satisfactory ending for the Midwinter Fair.

DON MAGUIRE,

Utah Commissioner Midwinter Fair.

AMONG THE FRUITS.

SALT LAKE CITY, March 14, 1894.—Soon after our arrival in these valleys fruit trees were planted. The apple trees in a few years bore fruit which was large in size, fair and beautiful in appearance, and of most excellent flavor. At an early day a Gardener's Club was organized with E. Sayers, a professional gardener, as president. He often made this remark that whatever did well in this country did extremely well. The apple was among those things which did extremely well and was considered by the members of the club as a fruit of great value to Utah.

While the apple crop in Salt Lake City and other places is now worthless or seriously injured, that does not prove that the growing of the fruit cannot be made a success now in this part of the country. The altitude is the same now as formerly; we have about the same amount of sunlight from year to year, and the same mountain sides to reflect light into the valley. All that nature has done for us in the past she is doing for us at the present.

The peach can be grown here with good success though it may be considered outside of what is called the peach belt, and may fail some years, or partially so. Peaches require warm, dry weather to ripen them to have their best quality, and this we have generally through September and sometimes into October. Generally an abundance of peaches of excellent quality can be raised on land suitable for their production.

Plums have been a success up to the present time.

Prunes also have been a success, being well adapted to the country and climate and can be produced in any quantity desirable for family use or for dried prunes.

The hardy grapes have produced abundantly with me.

The tender grape also produces abundantly but has to have protection (be covered up) in winter. The tender grape can be grown for family use and for drying. The early varieties should be selected. The late varieties would hardly ripen. The seasons are too short to make the growing of tender grapes a success like California or some parts of Arizona. To have success, they want to be put on bench land, where the roots don't run into the water. Grapes and stone fruit are best on bench land.

The apple, peach, grape and other fruits are very liable to overload themselves and when the tree or vine has too much fruit on, it must be taken off or the fruit will be inferior. The thinning of fruit in time and being well done is a very important feature in the growing of fruit in this country.

As the fruit tree pests are being considered I want to mention one more pest with the rest. I think it was in 1848, late in the summer, that I noticed a few grasshoppers. They did not seem to increase for a number of years; but of late they have been on the increase until they are getting quite numerous and are doing a great deal of damage by eating the fruit, eating the bark of the young trees, cutting off the bunches of grapes and the leaves, getting onto cabbages when in head and eating them up. It is very unpleasant to go among them and see their depredations. They have been kept back by premature death; that is the greater portion die before laying their eggs. They hatch late in the season which would be an advantage to the wheat crop should they become very numerous. This local grasshopper does not do like the locust we have had here, when it gets wings rise into the air and fly away, but remains on the ground from year to year. I leave this subject for wiser and more competent men to consider.

As I gave my views on the subject of dealing with insects to the public eleven years ago, and have the same views at present I shall say nothing about remedies but hope that some one will lead out with something that will be for the best good.

THOMAS H. WOODBURY.

HONOR TO A VETERAN.

One of the most enjoyable meetings ever held in the Third ward convened March 14th at 7:30 o'clock in honor of the eighty-sixth anniversary of the birth of the venerable Bishop of the ward, Jacob Weiler, who for fifty-four years has been laboring faithfully in the Lord's vineyard.

Brother Weiler was one of the Utah Pioneers, and arrived in Salt Lake valley on the 22nd of July, 1847. He has had many remarkable experiences during his career here, one of which might be mentioned. During one season of "the grasshopper war," the young crops were completely destroyed. The Bishop replanted his field—which was covered with the pests—and after his task was ended he knelt down in the field and besought the Lord to preserve the corn he had planted and give him something to harvest. The testimony of the veteran Pioneer is that the most abundant crop of corn he ever harvested, either before or since, here or in the East, was given him that season. Food was very scarce among the people, and he was offered a very high price for his corn by a merchant, but he refused to sell to the speculator, preferring to let the people who were in need have the corn the Lord had blessed him with at a much less figure than had been tendered by the merchant. He declares that dividing his corn among the poor that season was the best investment he ever made, the Lord having prospered him ever since.

Bro. Weiler was chosen counselor to Bishop Christopher Williams in the winter of 1847-8, and a few years later he was ordained a Bishop, and has presided over the Third ward nearly forty years. The people of the ward united in showing their good feeling toward him last evening. The plan arranged was to surprise the Bishop by easing his mind of any anxiety he may have felt over raising the allotment for the Stake Academy, which was recently agreed upon. The sisters of the ward made a canvass among the people for this purpose and the money was raised.

Last evening between three and four hundred people assembled in the meeting house to do honor to their Bishop and at the same time to surprise him. A rate of eight per cent per annum in dividends is a remarkably good showing for a mercantile establishment in such dull times as these, yet that is the exhibit made by Z. C. M. I. The annual report of the directors will be prepared and read to the stockholders at the annual meeting on April 5th. The marble quarries which are being opened at Beulah, Cal., are attracting much attention and delighting lovers of the beautiful by the variety and excellence of the specimens obtained, says an exchange. Gus Carlson, who was accidentally thrown against a steam wood saw some four months ago and a gash cut across his breast bone and ribs, exposing his lungs and other internal mechanism, has nearly recovered and will soon be able to go out, says the Portland Oregonian. The doctors were much interested in his case, or rather in viewing what was inside the case, as it is very seldom they get a chance to watch the expansion and contraction of a set of lungs. The most remarkable thing about it was to see how gradually the lungs were filled and how suddenly they collapsed when the breath expired. The doctors would have liked to leave a peep hole open in Carlson's thorax, but were afraid he might contract pneumonia through it.

During the progress of a swell private ball at Tacoma, Wash., the guests were startled in the midst of the festivities by a succession of screams, which came from Ida Ollene, a domestic servant, who was rushing through the hall with flames leaping about her. The girl was carrying a chafing pan into the dining hall, when one of the ladies struck a match and ignited the alcohol. The blaze leaped out and swept about the servant, burning her hands and apron. One of the gentlemen present pushed her into the kitchen, threw her upon the floor and wrapped her in rugs and blankets, smothering the flames. The girl's hair was burned off before the blaze was extinguished, and she was seriously scorched, but will recover.

This is what the Astoria (Or.) has to say: There is a rancher over on Vashon Island, Washington, that has his house painted more expensively than any other house in the state. Last fall he found floating in the sound a box which contained about 200 pounds of what he thought was a fine quality of fireproof paint. The paint was packed in small tin cans and bore a foreign label, and as it had cost him nothing he thought he would paint his house with it. The house is now painted inside and out, and in doing so the greater portion of the paint was consumed. The rancher has now discovered, much to his sorrow, that instead of fireproof paint he has got his house covered with about $3,000 worth of smuggled opium, which was thrown overboard by some smugglers to escape being found in their possession.

Information has been received at the office of the game warden, says the Denver News, that a party of hunters that had been slaughtering buffalo in Yellowstone park were now in Colorado hunting for the two sacred herds protected by the state. The game warden has been ordered to go on the trail of the ruthless sports. It is said that before the guards in the Yellowstone heard of the depredations, the hunters had succeeded in killing over 100 buffalo. The Colorado herds are roaming in the wilds of Park and Grand counties and number about twenty in each herd. The settlers do not disturb them.

The Fort Collins (Colo.) Express gives an interesting sketch of the farm of Frank Murray, where that gentleman is feeding 900 lambs for the Chicago market. There are three apartments where the sheep are kept and which contain eight racks for feeding alfalfa. Running water from a spring near at hand is conveyed through these corrals by a system of troughs. The lambs were purchased about the middle of November and on the 19th they were given their first ration of grain. Until last week chopped feed was the grain ration but now whole corn is being fed at the rate of about one pound per head each day. The flock also consume about one ton of hay per day. They will be marketed about the middle of April and good judges say that they will average eighty pounds in Chicago.

A much employed means of transportation in Lapland with its few roads is the rowboat. The great falls of Harspröng in Lapland are the finest in Europe in point of volume of water and height of plunge combined, and so far as Europe is concerned, hold the same rank as Niagara in North America, the Victoria falls in Africa, Guayara in South America and the great cataracts of the Khon in Asia. Rarely indeed is the great cataract visited, and yet to gaze on its glories for five minutes would repay a true lover of the wonders and forces of nature for all the time and trouble expended in a journey from England.

The greatest depths to which the mines of Sweden have been worked do not reach much beyond 300 meters (1000 feet) for iron mines and 400 meters (1300 feet) for mines of other kinds. Considering that as a rule there are no particular large quantities of either minerals or water to hoist, it is evident that the machines for this work need not in general be of any considerable power, and for that reason the raising arrangements have not a very great capacity. But while formerly the larger machines were at the most of 20 to 30 horse power, they now vary between 80 and 90.

Peat-litter is now made in large quantities in southern and central Sweden, there being about twenty manufactories making it for sale, besides many others simply for their own wants. The Swedish peat-litter in the market is the very best quality, and far superior to that of other countries, since it generally consists of pure sphagnum, or undeveloped peat moss without any mixture of other kinds of moss. Peat-litter is chiefly used to litter down the cattle in stables and cow-sheds and in the sanitation of towns and communities, being moreover valuable for preserving food, fruit, flowers, etc.

In northern rivers the fish first ascend the stream in the month of June, and, as a rule, July is the best fishing time in the Swedish rivers. From the month of September till the ensuing spring is the general close time for salmon; the fish spawn during October and November.

But in many of them there is a religious craving which now cannot be satisfied. They never put their feet inside the door of the church, because they are not religiously edified but religiously scandalized there. But if they could possibly hear preachers holding religious views in common with themselves, that religious life which now is either dormant or entirely crippled would have favorable chances for a healthy development."

OUR STOCKHOLM LETTER.

STOCKHOLM, Feb. 17.—It is said that the physical development of the three sons of the Crown Prince and Crown Princess is very poor on account of the ill health of the mother. The weakness of the chest of the Zaehring dynasty is also traced in their dispositions to sickness. Of the three brothers Prince Erik, the youngest, is the weakest. He is also said to possess an intelligence, which is below the average.

This is the more deplorable as all of King Oscars's sons are of robust health, two of them being regular giants in size and strength.

About Soto Maior, the late Portuguese minister to Stockholm, a paper relates the following story: The vicomte, who descended from a very wealthy family, was at first a lieutenant in a mounted regiment of the Portuguese army. He married a very rich Spanish lady. During several years' stay in Paris he succeeded in spending all what he possessed, and returned to Lisbon without having a sou in his pocket.

For the purpose of earning a livelihood he became a newspaper man, and was some time managing editor of the Tribuna, until he was elected a member of the chamber of deputies, where he made himself known as a very witty opposition speaker. At one time he had, in one of his speeches, styled the secretary of the treasury as a spendthrift. The secretary answered that such a reproach sounded a little peculiar when uttered by a man who had himself spent a whole fortune.

"That is true," Soto Maior answered; "I have even made away with three fortunes, but the difference is, that I have spent only my own money, while your excellency is managing the money of other people too carelessly."

At another occasion the vicomte undoubtedly showed himself still more prepared for emergencies. The president of the chamber had called him to order, and finally commanded him to be silent, whereupon Soto Maior left the hall, reappearing, however, in a few minutes. When he again rose to speak, the president having recognized him, he put two pistols on the table before himself and commenced his speech with the following words: "One pistol is intended for you, Mr. President, if you again dare to call me to order, and the other is for that one of my colleagues, who tries to interrupt me." Seldom, indeed, has a speech been listened to with more reverential silence than this one was.

It goes without saying that the Portuguese government used the first opportunity to get rid of such a dangerous adversary as the little vicomte, and so it happened that Soto Maior was appointed minister to Stockholm, where he soon became the doyen of the diplomatic corps and so popular, that there was not one inhabitant in the city of Stockholm who did not recognize the Lilliputian Portuguese and "knew all about him."

In the interest of the many American tourists, who visit Sweden every summer, it may be mentioned that the most easily accessible point, from which to view the midnight sun, is the Gellivara-Dundret, a mountain connected by a railway with Lulea, whence there is regular communication with Stockholm by steamer, and will soon be by rail. The sun does not sink below the horizon from about the 5th of June to about the 10th of July. The midnight sun may, of course, be seen, generally speaking, from every isolated eminence within the arctic circle; but the Gellivara-Dundret has the advantage of being situated in a populated district, where better provision is made for the traveler's comfort. In order to reach this mountain the visitor has to make a short excursion on the most northerly railway in the world (the only one that crosses the arctic circle), and on his arrival he finds himself in one of the richest iron districts in the world, where untold wealth still slumbers in the bowels of the earth, and where whole mountains of iron ore meet the eye.

The two universities in Sweden, that of Upsala, and that of Lund, where founded respectively in 1477 and 1668. From both the female sex was excluded. It was not till the fourth decade of our century and in consequence of the movement for woman's rights as well as for a higher standard of female education, that a call arose for the abolition of such an antiquated statute.

At the riksdag of 1865 a Swedish yeoman, C. J. Svensen, presented a bill for the admission of women to the universities. This bill caused a lively debate; one side pronounced women to lack both physical and psychical power to carry on learned studies; the other side showed how unreasonable it was to form a decided opinion on that question, when no opportunity had been given woman to try the power of her intellect. Her fitness for the professions of teacher and physician was especially put forth.

Not before the 3rd of June, 1870, however, a writ was issued conferring upon woman a right of passing the examination for the university, and of matriculating at the university, and of following the profession of a physician. Since that time the number of female students has been increasing year by year. The number, however, only comes up to about one per cent of that of the male students, of whom may be said, that they are too numerous in proportion to the population.

The examination for the university is passed either in the classical division, or else in the mathematical division. The first comprises the following compulsory subjects of examination: Swedish composition, theology, Latin, French, German, mathematics and physics, history and geography, zoology and botany, and propædæutics of philosophy. Optional subjects are: Greek, Hebrew and English; one of these languages, however, is obligatory.

In the mathematical division classical languages are not studied, but the claims on knowledge in the three modern languages, German, French and English, in mathematics and in physics are greater than in the classical department, and, besides, chemistry has to be studied.

Most of the women have passed their examination in the classical department. Of the young ladies, who have passed the examination for the university, only about 38 per cent have matriculated at the universities. Some have gone back into private life, while some have found employment as post, railway or bank officials, or else, as teachers.

The theological faculty in the universities is not open to woman. The course of study in the medical faculty extends over seven to nine years from the time of matriculation. Only two ladies have hitherto finished their medical studies, and are practicing as physicians, but a considerable number of women are studying medicine. The studies for the medical degree in Sweden are by some people considered to take too long time. Surely the expensive studies are a drawback to many women in choosing this profession.

The philosophical faculty has as yet only turned out one female "doctor of philosophy," Miss Ellen Fries. She was created Dr. Ph. some years ago under ceremonies which have been in practice for hundreds of years.

DEATH OF DR. J. J. MURPHY.

Dr. J. J. Murphy died at 12:10 p. m. March 17, aged 69 years and 9 months. The doctor was born in Union county, South Carolina, June 22, 1824; and came to Utah in 1869.

He was baptized as a member of the Church about 1847 and died as he had lived, fully believing in the doctrines of the Gospel.

During the war of the Rebellion Dr. Murphy was an earnest Union man and the one thing of which he was always proud was that he never took the oath of allegiance to the Confederate states, though working for the government in one of the ammunition factories. For many years he recognized the wrong of slavery and told his friends and children that the war would end in disaster to the South and in freedom to the slave. He was a prominent member of the Eclectic Medical Society of Utah and also of the National Eclectic Medical association, being a graduate of the Reform Medical College of Georgia. He was a man of splendid physique and in his younger days was almost a giant in strength as well as stature. The doctor was a quiet, unassuming and peaceful man and a good citizen. He was the father of a large family and seven children and upwards of fifty grandchildren survive him. Many friends will mourn Dr. Murphy's demise.

LOWIE RHONER.

OVERTON, Nevada, March 9, 1894.—A shadow was cast over our little town on the morning of March 7, 1894, at 8 o'clock, by the death of Sister Lowie Rhoner, the beloved wife of Jacob Rhoner. She and her husband came here some six weeks before, thus being almost strangers to all here. Sister Rhoner gave birth to a baby girl on Feb. 27, 1894, and was getting along nicely until the day before her death, when she was taken with a chill and grew worse very rapidly until her death, which was caused by heart disease. Her husband being some eighty or ninety miles away from her at the time of her death, having left her four days previous, the news was taken to him as soon as possible, and he lost no time in hastening to her side. Sister Rhoner was 20 years, 3 months and 14 days old, just in the prime of life, but alas, her mission was filled on this earth and she was called away. She leaves a little babe 8 days old, which is in kind hands and is getting along nicely. Brother Rhoner has the sincere and heartfelt sympathy of the public in general in the hour of his sad bereavement. The funeral services took place on the 8th of March and was well attended. This is the second death we have had here for nine years. The health of the people is generally good.

Respectfully, E. E.

CARL CHRISTIAN NICOLAI DORIUS.

The remains of Bishop C. C. N. Dorius of Ephraim were laid to rest on Friday, March 9th, with numerous evidences of the esteem in which the deceased was held by members of the ward over which he presided, as well as by the people in general. On the day preceding the funeral numerous friends from all parts of the county arrived in order to partake in the solemn ceremonies. On Friday the schools were closed, to give the children an opportunity to look, for the last time, on the beloved features, and hundreds of people, young and old, viewed the remains. At 11 o'clock the funeral procession proceeded to the new meeting house, preceded by the band. The coffin, completely hidden in flowers, was placed before the sacramental table and the large hall was soon filled to its utmost capacity. The speakers were Bishop L. S. Anderson, and C. C. A. Christensen, of Ephraim; Elders J. B. Malben and Bishop Hans Jensen, of Mantu; Elder O. J. Anderson, of Salt Lake City; Bishop C. A. Madsen of Gunnison and Elder George Taylor, of Ephraim, first counselor to the deceased. After the services and a last look of farewell from many tear filled eyes the remains were taken to the cemetery followed by eighty-two carriages. Elder Canute Peterson, president of the Stake, consecrated the grave. And, thus was committed to their last resting place the mortal remains of one of the noblest sons of Denmark, led to this country by the proclamation of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Bishop Carl Christian Nicolai Dorius was born in Copenhagen April 5, 1830. He was received into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints by baptism January 2, 1852. The next year he was sent on a mission to Norway in company with Elders E. G. M. Hougan and Canute Peterson. Several Elders were in prison at the time for preaching the Gospel, and these brethren deemed it wise to labor cautiously, pending the final decisions of the courts. In the fall of 1853 Elder Dorius was sent to Drammen. Being short of funds he accepted work of a joiner and carpenter, Erik Johnsen, who soon, with his family, accepted the Gospel. At this time Elder C. C. A. Christensen joined Elder Dorius and soon attracted the attention of the priests of the state church. The aid of the police was invoked and the two brethren, as a result, were incarcerated and fined. They were unable to pay their fines and atoned for their alleged crimes in a Norwegian prison cell, where for a certain number of days they were fed on bread and water. Afterwards Elder Dorius had similar experiences in Stavanger and Trondhjem and has, according to Elder C. C. A. Christensen, spent in all 116 days in prison on such fare. But his zeal for his God and the good of his fellowmen only increased by the persecution he suffered. He spent nearly four years in Norway before he was released, having done much good in that country. Shortly after he emigrated to Utah in company with his brother John F. F. Dorius and C. C. A. Christensen. The three friends were married on the ship Westmoreland, by Elder John Kay, on April 27, 1857, the bride selected by the late bishop being Ellen G. Rolfsen, who now is left among the mourners. From the city of Iowa the journey was made in a handcart company. In 1858 Elder Dorius arrived in Ephraim where he has resided ever since. In 1860 he was again called to go on a mission to Norway in company with his brother. He then presided over Christiania conference which place he filled with much success for about three years, after which he returned to Utah. In 1877 he was appointed Bishop of Ephraim South ward, in which position he proved a faithful servant of the Lord. In 1887 he suffered imprisonment for infraction of the Edmunds law, and since that time, it is said, he has never enjoyed perfect health. He died March 4, 1894, leaving a large family and innumerable friends on this side of the veil to look forward to a happy reunion in the resurrection of the just.

A SENATOR'S SCRAP BOOKS.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1894.—I spent an evening recently in looking over the scrap books of a United States senator. In them I found a large part of the history of the United States for the last thirty-eight years. They covered the whole of the exciting six years before the war. They embraced speeches, interviews and stories gathered at Washington at the time of the great rebellion. They covered the days of reconstruction, and coming on down told the story of one noted man's life as it ran in and out, affecting the leading events of our history from that time to this. They were the books of Senator John Sherman, member of Congress, Senator of the United States, Secretary of the Treasury, presidential candidate and famous financier.

SENATOR SHERMAN'S NEW HOUSE.

It is interesting to study the intellectual life of a public man. It is more interesting when the man has for thirty-eight years been at the head of affairs of a great nation, and it is most interesting when the man has so decided a mental individuality as John Sherman of Ohio. You can get some idea of him by a peep into his workshop. He lives, you know, in his new, white stone mansion facing Franklin Square. His house stands on the site of the old brick which he built when this famous park was little more than a cow pasture, and when he was still a poor member of Congress. His present house is about fifty feet front, and it is massive and beautiful. Its walls are thick enough to outlast the ages. You could drive a wagon load of hay up the wide stone steps which lead to its front door without brushing the railings at the sides, and the hall in which you enter is so wide that the wagon could almost turn around in it. The vestibule, with its tiled floor, is seen through long doors of thick plate glass, the solid panes of which reach, with only a narrow binding of wood, from floor to ceiling, and by pressing an electric button the inner doors open and you find yourself in one of the most handsome and most characteristic of the new houses of Washington. You are struck with the genuineness of everything. All about you is solid, massive, beautiful and real. There is no varnish or veneering. The wood work, selected from the finest of Ohio trees, is beautifully carved, and it has the polish of a piano. The brass fixtures which furnish the light are strong and firm, and great globes of opalescent glass the size of a wash basin filter the electric rays, so that they meet your eyes with a soft, mellow light. At the right side of you is the Senator's library. At the left is a great parlor, and back of these is one of the finest dining rooms in Washington. From the rear of the hall wide stairs wind their way about walls lined with pictures to the second floor, and the effect of the arrangement gives the idea of abundance of room.

SENATOR SHERMAN'S LIBRARY.

The Senator's library, on this first floor, is, I judge, at least twenty-five feet long and about twenty feet in width. It is walled with books, and it represents the accumulation of a lifetime. Senator Sherman has been a book buyer from his boyhood. He once told me that he began to buy books when he was a boy of fourteen, carrying a rod and chain in a surveying party on the Muskingum canal. He has now, all told, about 15,000 volumes, and among these are many fine editions. He likes good type, good paper and good binding, and his books embrace nearly every branch of literature. All of the famous novelists have places on his shelves, and he finds a part of his intellectual rest in novel reading. He has just finished the "Prince of India," Gen. Lew Wallace's last novel, and he describes the story as one of absorbing interest, abounding in beautiful descriptions. He is fond of Dickens and Scott, and he keeps himself thoroughly versed in the magazine literature of the day. He is a scientific student as well, and a large part of his cases are filled with scientific works. He is up in biology and astronomy, and one of the last books he has read is the "New Astronomy," by Prof. Langley, the head of the Smithsonian Institution. He is a reader of French and German as well as English, and among his volumes I noted the Iliad and many of the classics. His library of financial authorities is large, and he has everything worth owning which relates to the history of this country. In the back of the library there is a great vault, where his private papers are kept, and here is now packed away the correspondence of his lifetime. He has been keeping his letters since he was fifteen, and everything of value has been saved. This vault is packed full of unwritten history, and there is scarcely a prominent man in the world today who has not written something that is treasured in its collection. Among others there are about a score of volumes of autographs, each as big as a dictionary, and these contain personal letters from all sorts of distinguished people. The Senator's acquaintance has been very wide, and his friendships embrace the prominent men of nearly every country, and they have extended over more than a generation. The most of these letters will never be published. A number of them are personal and private, and some of the most interesting relate to the Senator and his family. Those between him and his brother have been partially published. They covered, you know, the time from Gen. Sherman's entrance to West Point to that of his death, and they were given by the Senator to the general's family shortly after that. They form a most valuable addition to the history of this country, and have added to the reputation of Sherman the statesman as well as Sherman the general.

A SENATOR'S WORKSHOP.

It is in this library that John Sherman receives his friends. You may find him at home almost any evening, and there is no red tape in getting to him. He is a charming conversationalist, can talk interestingly on almost any subject, and is not backward in saying what he thinks. As you sit with him in this room, surrounded by his books, you would imagine him more of a leisurely student than a hard-working statesman, and for the time you would be right. The real work of his day is not done on this floor. He has a workshop bigger than his library at the head of the stairs, and it is in this that he writes his speeches, dictates his letters and does the really hard labor of his life. He has a similar den at Mansfield, Ohio, and it is in these rooms that the ordinary caller seldom goes. It is here that his scrap books are kept, and here you find many of the books which would be out of place on the ground floor. The workshop of Senator Sherman is hung with the photographs of the famous statesmen with whom he has been associated. President Hayes, Chief Justice Chase and other great Ohioans look down upon you from these walls. Book cases stand under these, and government reports and financial authorities stare at you from every side. One set of shelves is filled with books labeled "Speeches in Congress." There are a score and more of these and each of the books is as large as a family Bible, or the largest ledger you have ever seen. These are scrap books in which are pasted the speeches and addresses which Senator Sherman has delivered during the last thirty-eight years. They are bound in green leather, and are made of heavy manilla paper. The speeches are pasted only on one side of the page, and they include, in all, thousands of pages of closely-printed matter.

JOHN SHERMAN'S FIRST SPEECH.

Here in volume first is John Sherman's first speech in Congress, delivered when Frank Pierce was President, and as I look at it I remember a story which the Senator told me about it. He said: "It was in the Kansas Nebraska debate, and a number of other young Congressmen had just made their first speeches. I sat next to an old Congressman named Day, who rather despised sophomoric oratory. He was slightly deaf, and he would listen to these young men with his hand at his ear, and the moment one of them had finished he would say, with a grunt of satisfaction, 'Another dead cock in the pit.' At last I saw where I thought I could make a good point. I jumped to my feet, got the speaker's eye, and said my say. When I was through I sat down beside the old man and said, 'Here is another dead cock in the pit, Mr. Day.' But Day replied, 'No, my young friend, I don't think it is quite so bad as that with you,' and he gave me to understand I had another chance for my life." From that time to this Senator Sherman has been making speeches, and these volumes contain nearly every word he has uttered in public. He is not as fond of speaking now as in the past, and he said the other day that he thought he must be getting old and lazy. He seldom writes out his speeches, and prefers to rely upon the inspiration of the moment for the work. Of all the speeches which he has delivered, he says that his impromptu and extemporaneous speeches have satisfied him best.

THOUSANDS OF NEWSPAPER SCRAPS.

In another case are the volumes of Senator Sherman's newspaper scraps. These fill several shelves, and they are made up of newspaper comments, stories and interviews about and with Senator Sherman. In them you find hundred of editorials, some praising and many condemning. There are three columns on every page, and the pages number thousands. During the past decade these newspaper clippings have been illustrated; and the pictures which have been published of Sherman might be taken at random for a photograph gallery of freaks. They look just about as much like him. Many of them have been made by chalk artists, and the cartoons of Thomas Nast and of Puck and Judge are numerous. Some of these articles concerning Sherman are in the form of poetry. Here is one which was published at the time that Sherman was a candidate for the presidential nomination. It refers to him as an icicle and it entitled

JOE'S OPINION.

"They call him hard and stolid, and say his face is cold,
And that he only cares to hear the clink of gold.
Oh! little do they know how stout and warm a heart may be,
Which heaven itself counts honest and angels joy to see.

"He, hard and cold! John Sherman! Why, the man is like a child
To those who know and love him best, kind, courteous and mild.
A man whom money cannot buy, nor power nor influence use;
I'd fear no judgment day if I could stand in old John Sherman's shoes.

"At any rate, I want to live 'till eighteen eighty-one.
And trust I'll then throw up my hat and shout for honest John;
And if he's there, though bears may growl and politicians fret, He'll be the bulliest President that's been elected yet."

JOHN SHERMAN'S DUELS.

In one volume I find a number of clippings about Sherman and the bloody shirt, and, in 1880, there was great talk of a duel between Sherman and Wade Hampton. Sherman had charged Hampton with being connected with the ku klux and had given evidence to show that he was correct. Wade Hampton did not try to controvert the evidence, but he satisfied himself by sending the following letter, which he thought would bring Sherman to a duel:

"CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., October 1.

"Hon. John Sherman.

"Sir: As you do not disclaim the language to which I have called your attention, I have only to say that in using it you uttered what you knew to be absolutely false. My address will be Columbia, S. C.

"I am, your obedient servant,
"WADE HAMPTON."

In reply to this Sherman reiterated his statements and published Hampton's letter, and the result was that Hampton was laughed at all over the country.

Sherman came much nearer a duel during his term in the House. He expected to be shot at that time and prepared himself for defense. He was making a speech one day, when a member named Wright, of Tennessee, said that one of his statements was a lie. Sherman did not hear the remark, but it was reported to him that evening and the next day it appeared in the Globe newspaper. Sherman rose to a question of privilege. He said he had not heard the remark and he supposed that the gentleman who made it was in such a condition (drunk) that he didn't know what he was saying. As he said this, Wright looked at him insolently, and Sherman picked up a box of wafers and threw it in Wright's face. Wright then tried to draw a pistol, but the other members of Congress gathered around him and prevented him from so doing. The affair created such a sensation that the House adjourned. Every one expected a duel, and Sherman was called upon by one of the southern members and asked what he expected to do. Sherman replied that he was not a duelist, but that he would repel any physical attack upon him with interest. He is a good shot, and he says that he never felt cooler in his life than he did the next morning, when he walked up to the Capitol with a pistol in his pocket. He had made up his mind that if Wright approached him in such a manner as to justify it that he would shoot him dead. He took a friend with him and went out to the Capitol. He did not see Wright until his return trip. As he walked down the steps to go home, Wright came out and walked down on the opposite side. The two passed around the fountain, which then stood in front of the Capitol. Each man had a colleague with him, and Sherman expected Wright to shoot. He had his hand on his pistol and he looked Wright in the eye, ready to raise the pistol and shoot him if he made any demonstration of attack. Wright, however, saw that Sherman meant business, and he walked on past without doing anything. Senator Sherman charged a man with lying in one of his speeches in the Senate last fall. The man was an author, who had made some charges regarding the Senate and silver, and Sherman publicly charged him with being a liar.

A SENATOR OF NERVE.

It was not generally known that John Sherman wanted to go into the army.

He raised a brigade at Mansfield, Ohio, and he had two regiments of infantry, a battery of artillery and a squadron of cavalry completely officered, manned and equipped there. He had been at the battle of Bull Run, and went to Mansfield to raise these troops, intending to lead them into the war, but on his return to Washington he was persuaded to stay in Congress.

There is no doubt, however, but what Sherman had plenty of nerve. He showed this first in this Kansas-Nebraska investigation. Kansas was at the time filled with ruffians, and the committee of Congress which went out there were again and again threatened with death. The Senator has told me that they would often find a picture of a coffin, over which was a skull and cross bones, on the door of the room when they came in the morning to open their session, and below this picture would be a warning for them to leave the territory. "One day," says Senator Sherman, "a man entered the room and began to swear at the committee. He abused us in the most profane manner, and he was evidently spoiling for a fight. We had a stenographer with us, and as soon as the man began to talk I made a motion to him to take down his words. He did so, and after the ruffian had gone on for about ten minutes I called a halt, and told him that he had made himself liable to arrest. I thereupon asked him if he knew what he had been saying, and called upon the stenographer to read his notes. Short hand was then unknown in the west, and as the man heard his exact words repeated his jaw fell, his face paled and he asked the amanuensis to let him see the paper. It was shown to him. He looked at it for a moment, and then, frantically tearing his hair, he exclaimed, 'Snakes, by God!' and rushed from the room. We did not see him again during the investigation."

HOW TOM EWING TOOK CUMPY.

I once asked Senator Sherman whether it was true that he once came near having Gen. Sherman's place and of going to West Point. He replied, "No, I think not. When my father died he left, you know, a family of eleven children, the oldest of whom was eighteen years and the youngest six weeks. He did not leave a large amount of property, and some of the children were taken by our relatives, and the general was adopted by the Hon. Thomas Ewing, who was a great friend of the family and who lived near us. Mr. Ewing came to my mother and told her that he would like very much to adopt one of her boys if she would permit him, but that he wanted the smartest of the lot. As the story goes, my mother said, 'You had better take Cumpy, he is the smartest. As for John, I think he is too young to leave me,' and so Cumpy was adopted by Mr. Ewing and by him sent to West Point."

BRAVE CONQUERORS, THESE!

SNOWFLAKE, Arizona, March 17, 1894.—Probably none have labored more faithfully to control the elements and establish a colony than those who reside at St. Joseph, on the Little Colorado river. The settlement was first made in 1876, and the people have been laboring for the mastery of the waters of that treacherous river ever since. The results are sufficient to have discouraged less persevering men; and indeed, they have discouraged the greater number of those who first located there. But when such men as J. H. Richards, John Bushman, J. C. Hansen and H. M. Tanner feel that they have a special mission to fill, they do not give up when obstacles begin to appear, but go earnestly to work to surmount them.

This is strikingly true in the present instance. The men whose names appear above, with not more than half a dozen faithful associates, have toiled on dam after dam, only to see their work crumble and disappear under the force of mighty, periodical freshets. No wonder then they rejoice at the completion of what appears to be a substantial one.

All the available help of the town has been employed for five weeks in an effort to complete the dam. Knowing that they would have accomplished this much desired object on the 10th inst., the wives, mothers and sisters of the laborers, together with the few men who were at home, (two besides the writer) concluded to celebrate the occasion by a surprise in the form of a picnic dinner for them. Accordingly all hands responded; and a table of boards, spread out on the hillside near the dam, fairly groaned under the load of good things that covered it. This bounteous repast, together with the appearance of rosy-cheeked, well-clad children, of whom the greater part of the company was composed, showed plainly that the people were by no means destitute, if they had been laboring on ditches and dams so much for the last eighteen years.

Dinner over, the whole company assembled on the dam, where short speeches were made by the leading men, expressing acknowledgments for divine aid and support; after which the structure was dedicated to the Almighty Father. The prayer was characteristic of them: "Oh Lord! we pray that this dam may stand if it be Thy will, if not, let Thy will be done."

The larger part of the dam consists of a huge mountain of earth 98 yards long, 100 feet wide at the base, 22 feet high, and 12 feet wide at the top. It is well protected by brush and rock on each side, and a great crib of large timbers bolted together and filled with rock, serves as a protection to the end where the water passes. Thus the stream is turned out of its quick-sandy channell, and made to run over a bed of solid rock. Here another crib sixty-seven yards long, bolted to its stony foundation, raises the surface of the water a few feet to the level of the canal. A stone, planted on the highest part of the dam, bears this inscription: "Saint Joseph No. 8 Dam, Commenced 1891, Completed 1894." The other seven have gone down the river.

"What is the cost of all these dams?" Well, they have expended over $1200 in labor and material, for repairs and completion this spring. This sum is probably not more than one sixtieth of their total outlay upon such work. With the exception of possibly $1000, this little community has borne the entire expense; and, best of all they have done it uncomplainingly.

Respectfully,
JOSEPH W. SMITH.

The national debt is at present estimated to be about $73,000,000.

AKIBA AND REBECCA.

In the year 120, when the beautiful city of Jerusalem was under the dominion of the Romans, my hero and heroine lived. Their paths in life were widely different, but destiny interwove them until they became one. In the vales near Jerusalem there wandered a youth of fine physical appearance. His eyes were brown, his locks were like the raven's, and his stature was above the average. His brow was noble, and when one looked at him the thought occurred that he was fitted for better things than that of tending flocks. This shepherd lad, instructed chiefly by lessons from nature and so plainly nurtured, was destined to play a very important part in the history of his country.

Those were stirring times; it was an age in which heroes could rise and fall. The Jews chafed under the Roman yoke; they longed for freedom, and this epoch was so variable that men of the lowest rank could rise to be at the head of the nation, if they had any talent. In periods of danger men's energies are more active, and latent genius is apt to become apparent more quickly in perilous days than in days where all is sunshine and prosperity. Our hero had many opportunities for distinguishing himself, so we need not be surprised that he gained all that men strive for.

One summer day, while all was serene and nature seemed at her best, a fair maid came along the path. She had all the loveliness of her race. Her eyes were large and black, she was of graceful form, and her skin was of lily whiteness. She showed by her bearing that her station in life was lofty. She saw Akiba, and to see him was to love him, although he was of lowly birth. The maid cared not for wealth, nor rank, she thought only of the qualities of the man on whom she would bestow her hand and heart. Being noble herself, she was attracted by the fine elements of Akiba's character. Men and maids lived and loved in those days as they do today; sometimes I think that they loved more faithfully than we.

The fair Rebecca lived in luxury. Her father was a great man in his city. She had attendants to minister to every one of her wants. Fine dresses and jewels were hers, but though reared in all this splendor, her heart was free from pride, and her mind equalled her beauty. If wealth makes happiness, she certainly possessed it, for her wishes were granted as soon as they were known.

After seeing Akiba this luxury became distasteful to her, because she knew his life was ordered in a different manner. Her affections were centered upon him. By day and by night she thought of the noble man whom she saw by the brookside.

Often did she seek those green lanes, and soon they became well acquainted. Before many weeks elapsed, in the midst of the grassy plains and beside the murmuring stream, they vowed eternal love, nor was their love but common dress; it was pure and heartfelt, it was not merely a verbal pledge, but it was a love which endureth forever.

When Rebecca's father, Jochanan, heard that she loved a shepherd, he was exceedingly wroth. What, said he, shall my daughter marry a stupid beggar? The daughter who is the pride of my house, the daughter for whom I hoped to obtain a better position than even I can give her, shall not demean herself if I can prevent it.

On Purim, when the whole nation rejoices because Hayman's machinations failed through the intervention of the good Queen Esther, Nurse Sarah told Rebecca that her father wished to speak with her. She went to his study, and as soon as she entered, her father, a man of commanding mien, arose and fixed upon her a stern and unrelenting eye. Foolish maid, dost thou think of wedding a beggar? Thinkest thou that the great house of Jochanan will degrade itself by an alliance with the common herd? Know that our name has been unsullied for centuries, our family has ranked with princes, and now, thou, the daughter on whom I relied for solace in mine age, thinkest of deserting father and home for a beggar. If thou wilt wed that shepherd, my house will be forever closed against thee. Choose between father and riches on the one hand, and beggary and your stupid shepherd on the other hand.

O, father, said the weeping maid, speak not so unkindly of Akiba; even if his fathers did not dwell in palaces, that does not make him of the common herd. Your daughter would not wed a man who was unworthy of her. His character makes him equal to any prince. Gold and rank do not make the man. In my estimation, integrity and purity of thought and action ennoble a man, not birth nor ancestry. Though Akiba is poor, he is nobler than many of our friends whom thou art glad to welcome to our house.

Long they argued. The father was inflexible, and the daughter would not yield. Then Jochanan assembled his household, and solemnly declared unto them, "Henceforth I am childless, my daughter disobeys me, so I declare unto you and before God that she is no daughter of mine, let her go her way, I know her not."

Slowly Rebecca left the home of her childhood. Not one glance did she cast behind, nor did she waver in her purpose. She was willing to exchange pomp for a loving heart, for she knew that wealth cannot buy this great treasure. A love that outlasts beauty, station and riches was worth more to her than gold or finery. Love laughs at threats, and in her heart there was nothing but contentment and pleasure, for now she could wed Akiba. Her lover was an honorable man, and would not seek the wealthy heiress, but he would not hesitate for a moment to wed the poor and homeless stranger.

She came to Akiba's hut and said, "My father has cast me off; I am as poor as thou art." Then said Akiba, "If thou wilt wed me, whatever I have I will willingly share with thee. I cannot offer thee a palace to reign over, but thou canst rule my heart, and as long as I live will I remember that for me thou didst forsake home and kindred." They were married. Their wedding was simple as became shepherd folk. Rebecca exchanged her fine raiment for the coarse gown of a shepherdess. She sighed not for her lost splendor, for she knew that wealth and fame are useless, if one lives unloved. Love sheds a genial glow over a person's life, and without it all is a blank. Rebecca chose wisely when she abandoned her father's riches to share the joys or sorrows of a loving heart.

They lived in a humble cot. Their couch was of straw, and every day they went into the fields to gather it. They were happy as the day was long; their poverty did not trouble them.

As Rebecca became better acquainted with Akiba, she perceived that he was a man of talent although she was happy enough, she wished that her husband should occupy the sphere which he was fitted to adorn. She determined that she would not let him waste his life. She knew that all the sunshine would leave her life if she parted with him, but she resolved that that parting should take place.

One morning when the birds were singing blithely, and the sun was sending its mellow rays over all things, Rebecca broached the subject which lay nearest her heart. Akiba, said she in her musical voice, I left my father's house for love of thee; my life would I as willingly give for that same love. Now listen, thou canst become great. Go to one of the schools and gain admittance there. Study and become a Rabbi. I will not go with thee, lest I should be a drag upon thee. When thou dost become famous, thou canst come back to me, if I am still fair in thy sight; gladly will I welcome thee.

The next day they parted, but Akiba never dreamed what that separation would cost Rebecca. She loved so truly and bravely that her anguish was but second thought to her. He started with his few possessions for the neighboring college, which was a long distance from where they dwelt. After his departure she was indeed lonely. She had no companion to cheer her in her solitude. No friend to encourage her. Her days were filled with toil and sadness. She had to perform tasks which were entirely new to her. But she did not repine at her lot. She trusted firmly in the Lord, and all her troubles and cares were allayed when she recited the beautiful Hebrew prayers. The days lengthened into weeks, the weeks into months, and the months into years, and still she dwelt in the wayside hut. She knew that her beauty was fading. She was getting old. Sometimes a shadow would cross her great faith in her husband, and she would ask herself, when Akiba becomes famous, will he despise the wife of his youth because her charms are gone? But this unworthy thought she would quickly banish before it became clearly defined. Then she would turn to God and ask for courage to sustain with fortitude whatever might happen.

Akiba's days were far different. He gained admission to one of the best known colleges. He studied diligently and the wisdom of the sages chased his sadness away. He came in contact with the brightest men of the times, and he knew that his toil was sure to be rewarded. After much labor he became proficient in the law, and one day he awoke to find that he had been appointed a professor in the college which he had entered as a humble student. His first thought was of Rebecca, and with her he wished to share his happy fortune as of yore his crusts. He knew that he owed everything to her, and into her sympathetic ears he wished to pour the tale of his happy change.

He hastened to his native place, but his fame went before him and when he came to Jerusalem he found a large crowd waiting to welcome him. Learning was much revered by those ancient Jews. Akiba's reputation was great and his fellow townsmen were only too glad to do him honor. He was impatient at this delay, for he wished to go to the hut which had been so happy an abode for him. But courtesy required him to stop, and chafe as he might he had to consider the questions which were put to him. On the outskirts of the crowd was a poor and shabbily dressed woman. Her cheeks were hollow, her eyes were sad, and her forehead bore the lines of care. The crowd pushed her hither and thither, but she did not mind the elbowing. Her very soul seemed to hang upon the vibrating tones of the Rabbi as he gave public answer to the many questions which were propounded to him. She was in the presence of the wise Akiba, the lover of her youth, and she was wondering if he would recognize his Rebecca in this careworn woman. She hung back. For a moment the crowd parted, and the Rabbi beheld the woman who was his guiding star. He was just about to reply to another query, but all at once he paused, and rushed for the spot where he had seen Rebecca, but when he came to it, he only saw a shabby figure. Rebecca trembled, for now was the test. Would the great Akiba proclaim this shepherdess as his wife. He looked at her for a second and then clasped her to his bosom. Rebecca how thou must have suffered to change so sadly. But though differing in aspect to me thou art the same beautiful Rebecca who did cast thy lot with mine years ago. He led Rebecca forward and told the people how she had abandoned home and riches to follow his fortunes, and how by her advice he had attained his present distinction.

In the midst of their rejoicings, a messenger arrived and told Akiba that Jochanan wished to consult him. Akiba went to the rich man's house, and was confronted by an aged and feeble man. Rabbi, said the man, I am in deep trouble. I had a daughter whom I loved, but in an evil hour she became infatuated with a stupid beggar. Do what I could, I could not persuade her to give up this infatuation. I made a vow that if she persisted in her folly I would never look upon her again. Rabbi, I yearn for the presence of this disobedient child; tell me how I can break this cruel vow and yet not commit a sin before God. The Rabbi listened; for a while he was silent, then he said, If that daughter had married a scholar instead of an ignorant man, wouldst thou have forbidden the marriage? No, said Jochanan, learning ennobles any man whether, rich or poor. Had my daughter married a Rabbi, I would have cheerfully consented to the union, and I would have endowed this son with all my worldly possessions, for I have no possessions of mine own.

Then the Rabbi said, I married your daughter. Men call me great; whether it be so or not I know not, but I am a famous Rabbi. I consider the greatest treasure which I possess is the love of Rebecca; although she has changed in outward appearance to me she is still as beautiful as when I first beheld her. Jochanan grasped his son's hand and said, The Lord is better to me than I deserve, for he has given me a son of whom I can be proud, and a daughter whom affliction cannot cast down nor humble. Henceforth dwell with me. The family were reunited, and Rebecca's charms came back in the sunshine of her husband's love. Her father said that she was wiser than other women, for it was wisdom which led her to discover her husband's greatness.

Rebecca and Akiba were true patriots, and when their country called for the aid of its sons and daughters, they were among the first to step promptly forward and offer their services. REVA.

CHANGE IS IMMINENT.

Civilization smiled at the jingle and satire of some years ago on "the Heathen Chinee." Whether that smile was one of incredulity, or whether it was a recognition of apt pupillage under our methods may not always be clear. Certain it is, that "for ways that are dark, and tricks that are vain," if the heathen can out rival the Christian he will have "to rise early and take late rest," as many a man has found to his dismay. Legislation has been evoked to secure righteous uniformity on railroads, but discrimination is yet common; and to prevent the monopoly of trusts, but the government itself (so it is said) has lent its near almighty power in favor of rings and speculation. Now, if the high places of the earth are used for personal aggrandizement, if the lust for office is begotten of the love of gold, none need wonder if men of lower estate, even down to the masses, catch the same infatuation, or that a general scramble marks almost all dealings one with another; and the sharp, shrewd dealer who amasses a fortune is held up to youth as worthy of imitation, and the very beau ideal of success.

Now, there must be a certain profit in all trade transactions as a rule, and there are possibilities of loss in many directions. Nor can it be assumed that trade is devoid of honesty, or that there are none engaged but would take advantage if they could. The very fact that so large a proportion of the world's commerce is done on credit is evidence in favor of general integrity, of a business conscience, of motives and acts which are as far above suspicion as was "Cæsar's wife." But for all this, there are too many engaged who are tricky, who will take advantage, who misrepresent, who are in fact—frauds, and will fatten themselves if their clients starve.

Utah people, those who have been shippers, have been victimized time and again in years gone by. Carloads of potatoes have been exported from here in all good faith to men claiming to sell on commission; and when a report has been rendered, something has been due from the shipper to the receiver; charges for freight handling, hauling, storage, advancing charges and commission, etc., have exhausted the shipment and created an indebtedness. Excuses innumerable have been added to soothe the fleeced consignor, such as broken markets, poor quality, short weights, mixed varieties, defective sacking and frozen goods. But the main secret was an exacting broker, an unworthy dealer, a scheming, selfish, dishonest trader, realizing that distance gave immunity from observation, and from penalty as well. The shipment of butter, grain, seed, dried fruit, wool, hides have each been unsatisfactory in their turn, and an experience has been had which to say the least was anything but encouraging. Our shippers were too confiding, too unsuspecting. They had little idea of the ways of the world or of the ways of trade.

To be sure, this experience might have been years ago, before a familiarity with reliable firms had been acquired, and with whom much business of a highly satisfactory character has been done. But there are shysters yet, and some sorry tales could be told of very late losses from falling markets (?) and "no demand."

On a small scale, in this city, it is not invariably profitable for producers to consign. Men who are strangers may solicit patronage; but the wary man prefers persons or firms of repute, those who have character to sustain and experience to make the most of a consignment, no matter what that may be; for it will not always pay an individual or store to send a representative here to dispose of produce taken in the way of trade.

There are times, and persons also, when from lack of capital, having paid freights, it is desirable to get returns, and however unfavorable the market, forced sales are made, often when holding on for a few days would have brought relief to the owner and profit to the consignee. Whether any method can be devised for protection to shippers, whether capital beyond ordinary personal means could be had, and whether a special store or warehouse could be sustained in this city as a depot for all such goods, is worth consideration; a place where eggs, butter, grain, meats, fruits, seeds, hides, or produce of any kind (raised or manufactured) could be handled economically; shipped out of the Territory when desirable and quantities justified; an organization of business men ambitious of continuing to Salt Lake City its pre-eminence as the central point of the Territory, for import or export, as might be needed; having an office and management in touch with producers, stores, firms, inside or outside; estimating and understanding local production, familiar with all markets; ready to suggest a crop or manufacture from a general survey of the range of trade; and interesting alike to the wholesale and retail business house.

It is evident that unless some such central point is established for trade for the reception of produce, for storage, for advances, desultory shipping from every railroad station will become the rule of the Territory, which means competition, disorder, loss of goods, scant profits, if any. It means trading abroad on the part of every little store, the destruction of our wholesale business, the obliteration of our commercial standing, the paying of more to railroads, more for goods, and the securing of less, and still less, for our produce, until demoralization sets in and we become without reputation for enterprise, economy, unity, patriotism, self-interest or self-protection.

The circumstances of the people have changed radically within a couple of years. There must be an adaptation in our business methods to that change, for it will take long—very long—for home industry to supersede importation. Many things we must have, and if our only resources are production (outside of silver, etc.) many lessons will be forced upon us ere we become facile in the application by new methods to the undeniable change.

In the interval we need not lose sight of the fact that every new man engaged in manufacturing is in a great degree a customer and a consumer of home produce, and that a home market is more stable than any market in the world. But until that equilibrium is reached, there will be always something to export, and how to do this most economically and successfully is the problem now. Combination is the necessity, and to secure this, years ago every county had its board of trade. For obvious reasons they were a lifeless or spasmodic organization—born before their time, perchance. But from this on, something similar is certainly needed to tranquilize the public mind, and to act as intermediate benefactors to the toilers of our Territory. And if these boards representing counties act in consonance with this city through such depot, exchange or warehouse, system would come from chaos, profit from present loss, and progress from the retrogressive or stand-still order of today.

Money being out of the question, and not likely to be very much "in it" at present, some substitute would have to be devised as a medium of exchange, if only for convenience. But this, with all the details of control and management, would have to be left to the supervision of the business men of this city who, having an interest, would from natural and practical business conservatism take as few risks as possible, and never exceed the total capital subscribed, or a restricted portion of the stock on hand. Time was when this locally convenient currency was the life of business. Every one had it and everyone took it, particularly when issued by a reliable firm. We are apt to sneer now at what was called scrip and due bills, but there are hundreds of men and scores of families who would be only too glad could they secure for labor that which would simply bring them bread, meat, potatoes, or the primary necessities of subsistence, in the bestowal of charity doubtless many a dollar of this kind has been a Godsend here and there, and if there was objection it was because of the limited supply.

It might be asked what could not be done if such a firm as Z. C. M. I. was building, if the city, county or Territory was making improvements, or if the general government was issuing its "promises to pay" upon a full understanding of the scientific limit of issue, and its acceptance for all demands! It would take a clear eye to see that government can issue a ten thousand dollar bond or ten millions upon the strength of its stability and resources, and not be equally reliable in its issue of the same amount, ranging from "a ten cent shipmaster" to a ten dollar bill.

To say the least of it, our Territory is waiting—anxiously—for a new depart-ture, or even our legitimate increase will have to look away off for "fresh fields and pastures new."

AURORA, SEVIER COUNTY.

AURORA, Sevier county, Utah,
March 19, 1894.

Plowing and putting in grain has been going on for more than two weeks until last Friday evening when it began with sleet and rain until we had plenty mud, and sowed the mud is white with snow. Many children in this ward have been very sick with pneumonia, and two succumbed to the dread disease. Brother Heber Curtis and family mourn the death of their baby, died March 8th, and with a swelling heart I chronicle the other as our own dear child, which passed away on the 11th inst. Your humble servant was at Pocatello on a mission and was so blessed of the Lord that I had crowded houses for seven nights and many seemed to be investigating our doctrines. The evening of the 8th I was ready to rise and address a large and attentive audience, when a telegram was handed me to come home at once. I spoke to the people for one hour and a half, when friends and Saints crowded around me to give their sympathy and voluntarily put money into my hand. Those not of our people seemed as generous and appreciative as the Saints. I will say of the good people of Pocatello I never was treated better and made more welcome by any people anywhere than by them, both young and old, great and small, Saint and outlander, and the Priesthood in particular.

I arrived home on the 9th. But we do not mourn as those who have no hope. "The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away, and blessed be the name of the Lord." "Children are enthroned in the presence of the Lord where all things for their glory is made manifest." The more we learn of the truths God has revealed through modern revelation the easier is the parting, for we know we will soon meet them again.

HISTORICAL CORRECTIONS.

The NEWS is pleased to give space to the following communication:

SALT LAKE CITY, March 21, 1894.—Mr. Editor: I notice in your issue of the 20th inst. an article headed H. W. Bigler, in which it is stated that Bigler and Azariah Smith, of Mani, are the only ones now alive and residing in Utah, who went to Coloma, forty-five miles distant from Sutter's Fort, and built a sawmill in January, 1848. I write to inform you that Alexander Stephens is now living in Weber county, and he and I were present at the great discovery of gold at that place. William Johnston, of New Mexico, was also present.

H. W. Bigler was, as you stated, the first to make the record of that important event.

Herewith I forward to you my pamphlet on the first discovery of gold in California, a copy of which is now laid away in the archives of the state library of California, and also in the library of the Society of California Pioneers of '49, and accepted as the best record that they have ever found.

Feeling that you will be pleased to correct the mistake, I am, yours truly,
JAMES S. BROWN.

The pamphlet received from Mr. Brown is entitled "California Gold: an Authentic History of the First Find," and contains sixteen pages of interesting reading matter. It has been recently issued from the press at Oakland, California, the date of its authorship being January 24 of this year. The narrative covers from June 1, 1847, to the latter part of June, 1848.

The error which Mr. Brown calls attention to was based on a passage that has been much quoted in local publications, and the substance of which appeared in a widely-read series of articles of a few years ago in the Century Magazine on the Gold Discovery: "Henry W. Bigler, of St. George, Azariah Smith, of Mani, in Utah; and Peter L. Wimmer, of San Diego, California, are today the three survivors of the party of workmen whose picks and shovels first brought to light the auriferous wealth of California." A few months ago Wm. Johnston, of New Mexico, wrote that he was still living, and his letter was published in the NEWS; as he is not residing in Utah, he was not named in our article on the 20th. Now Mr. Brown comes forward with the information that Mr. Stephens is yet residing in Weber county and himself in this city. It is with more than ordinary satisfaction that we announce these additional facts to the public, and for the courtesy of enabling us to do so Mr. Brown has our thanks.

We regard the pamphlet referred to as worthy the importance which the author says has been attached to it by the California Pioneers' society. Its author was on the ground at the time and therefore speaks from personal knowledge. It bears evidence of being a more authentic and accurate account of the discovery of gold in California than is contained in the histories of that state now extant, including that of H. H. Bancroft, and is therefore a correction of their statements. For this reason we give a brief summary of the narrative and some extracts therefrom.

Mr. Brown relates how the Mormon Battalion members decided to stay in California and seek employment for the winter of 1847-8, and recites that a number of them were hired by Sutter and Marshall. Six of the Battalion—Alex. Stephens, H. W. Bigler, James Berger, Azariah Smith, Wm. Johnston and James S. Brown—built a cabin near the saw mill at Coloma, and did their own cooking. Mr. Brown tells now, on the day before the discovery was made, Mr. Marshall communicated to him his views that a bed of rock in the mill race contained gold. They got a pan and washed some of the sand, gravel and bedrock (the latter scaled off with a pick), but their search was unsuccessful. Mr. Marshall was not satisfied, however, and said he would turn in the water to run all night, and would shut it off in the morning to look for the metal. Thus it appears that the discovery was not accidentally made while examining some damage to the tail race, but was the result of deliberate search. When Mr. Marshall shut the water off in the morning Mr. Brown remarked to his companions, "Oh, he is going to find a gold mine this morning." Mr. Brown's narrative then says:

Nothing but a smile of derision stole over the faces of the parties present. We ate our breakfast and went to work. James Berger and myself went to the whipsaw, and the rest of the men some eight or ten rods off from the mill. I was close to the mill and sawpit, but was also close to the tail race, where I could direct the Indians that were there. This was January 24, 1848.

Just when we got partly to work, here came Mr. Marshall with his old wool hat in his hand, and stopped within six or eight yards of the sawpit and exclaimed, "Boys, I have got her now!" I, being the nearest to him, and having more curiosity than the rest of the men, jumped from the pit and stepped to him, and on looking in his hat discovered say ten or twelve scales of what proved to be gold. I picked up the largest piece, worth about fifty cents, and tested it with my teeth, and as it did not give, I held it aloft and exclaimed, "Gold, boys, gold!" At that they all dropped their tools and gathered around Mr. Marshall.

Mr. Brown then details how he tested the metal by hammering it and by beating, and again declared that it was gold. He says:

At this juncture all was excitement, and all repaired to the lower end of the tail race, where we found from three to six inches of water flowing over the bed of the rock, in which there were crevices and little pockets, over which the water rippled in the glare of the sunlight as it shone over the mountain peaks. James Berger was the first man to spy a scale of the metal. He scooped to pick it up, but found some difficulty in getting hold of it, as his fingers would blur the water, but he finally succeeded. The next man to find a piece was H. W. Bigler; he used his jack-knife, getting it on the point of the blade, then getting his forefinger over it, placed it in his left hand. And as we learned how to look for it, as it glittered under the water and in the rays of the sun, we were all rewarded with a few scales. Each put his mite into a small vial that was provided by Marshall, and we made him the custodian. We repeated our visits for three or four mornings to the tail race, each time collecting some more of the precious metal, until we had gathered somewhere between three and four ounces.

The pamphlet goes on to relate how H. W. Bigler found gold in more than a dozen other places, and describes how many other discoveries were made, up to the time of the rush to Mormon Island and the first public announcement of the news by a San Francisco paper edited by Samuel Brannan and owned by a company of Mormons. There is also an interesting statement as to how Alexander Stephens made a trough from a log, and then converted it into a rocker, which led to the renowned gold rocker. Mr. Brown's narrative gives many particulars up to the time he left for Utah, in June, 1848, and states:

To Sutter's capital and enterprise and Marshall's shrewd sagacity has been given the credit of the great gold discovery of California. The facts are that James W. Marshall discovered the first color, and in less than an hour six Mormons found color as well, and in less than six weeks had discovered it in hundreds of places that Mr. Marshall had never seen, the most notable of which was Mormon Island, to where the first rush was made, and from where the news was spread to the uttermost bounds of the everlasting hills and to all the nations of the earth.

As to Sutter's enterprise and capital, he did furnish the graham flour and mutton, wheat and peas; black coffee and brown sugar, teams and tools, while we, the members of the Mormon Battalion, did do the hard labor that discovered the metal; and it is also true that we were in Sutter's employ at that date, and that we did not get paid for our labor. I worked 100 days for the firm, and never received one farthing for it. . . . When we went for a settlement we were told by Captain Sutter that he could not settle with us, for his bookkeeper had gone to the mines and his books were not posted. He cursed Marshall and the mines and declared that he was a ruined man, that the discovery was his ruin, for it had drawn off his laborers and left everything to go to rack, and he was being robbed. I do not wish to be understood that I charge them with being dishonorable, for I do not, but I charge it to the general confusion of the country.

THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

The fact that Christ rose from the tomb after having suffered death by crucifixion has always been proclaimed as a fundamental doctrine of Christianity, the main cornerstone of the Gospel of salvation. The event is recorded by all the inspired biographers of our Lord and forms the starting point of the brief history of the acts of the Apostles. It was one of the first announcements made by the messengers of peace to the pagan world. "He is risen" was the joyful greeting of the angels to the mourning disciples on the first Easter morning. "He is risen" was repeated by them to a wider circle of followers, who again took up the strain and brought the wonderful news to the world. On the truth of the fact, the reliability of Christianity stands or falls. "For," as Paul puts it, "If Christ be not risen, then is our preaching in vain, and your faith is also vain. Yea, and we are found false witnesses of God."

The importance of the question of the resurrection of Christ has not escaped the opponents of Christianity. They have seen that as long as this chief of all miracles remains, it is vain to assail the others. If the Founder of our faith really conquered death and rose from the tomb, His divinity is at once established and His claims must be true. Hence their diversified efforts to render the Biblical accounts incredible, all of which, however, have stranded against the well-established facts.

A brief statement of the evidence of the resurrection miracle is the best refutation of all arguments against it. On the evening of the crucifixion the body was hastily wrapped in linen and conveyed to a tomb near by. This tomb was no doubt similar to those that can still be seen in many places in Palestine, a small chamber cut in the rock, the opening closed with a stone slab and with a small enclosed court before it. The chief priests, remembering that something had been said about a resurrection, persuaded Pilate to take possession of the tomb, whereupon the stone was sealed and the enclosure guarded by soldiers. In the meantime several of the women hurried into the city in order to procure the spices necessary for embalming the body before the Sabbath, all business then being suspended.

The Sabbath being over, Mary of Magdala and two others very early in the morning went out to the tomb. On their arrival they found the stone had fallen down and the first rays of the rising sun revealed to them that the body was not there. Mary at once returned to the city, but her companions entered the enclosure, where they found an angel sitting on the stone. The guard was also near, but panic stricken. The angel explained what had happened and told the women to bear the news to the Apostles. By this time Mary had found Peter and John and informed them that the beloved remains had been taken away, she did not know by whom. The two started at once for the tomb. Peter entered the grave chamber and examined the surroundings. He found the linen clothes neatly folded on the floor, a sufficient refutation of the statement that the body had been stolen, since a desecrator of the grave would not have had time to attend to such a trivial circumstance in the presence of the guard. The idea then dawned upon the two disciples that Jesus had risen, and they returned to the city. Mary now arrived for the second time and stood weeping in the court. She saw two angels, who inquired into the cause of her sorrow, and as she turned, Jesus was there. As soon as she recognized Him, she was told to hasten to the disciples and inform them that He lived. As she departed on the joyful errand she overtook her two companions who had first been with her in the early morning, and Jesus again appeared and repeated His message.

The soldiers, as soon as they had recovered from their fright, went to their headquarters and reported that an earthquake had occurred, rolling the stone from the grave, and that when they recovered from the effects of the shock, the tomb was empty. Being well bribed, they changed their statement so as to convey the idea that the body was stolen while they slept—an absurdity that does little credit to the ingenuity of the priests. Think of the Roman soldiers asleep on duty and yet, although sleeping, cognizant of the fact that the disciples stole the body!

During the time these events took place, a large company of women from Galilee and Jerusalem had assembled and departed for the tomb with spices, in order to perform the last service to their dead Master. But when they arrived and found the little chamber empty they were much perplexed. These two angels appeared and reminded them of the promise Christ had given that He should rise. They then returned and told the assembled Apostles of their experience. Peter again went to the tomb and the Lord appeared to him, but what passed between them is not recorded. Later in the day He was seen by two disciples on the road to Emmaus, to whom He gave a lengthy discourse. In the evening Jesus appeared to the Apostles and showed them His pierced hands and wounded side. The following Sunday He again visited the Apostles, on which occasion the doubts of Thomas were tenderly set at rest. Afterwards He appeared to the Twelve and to a multitude of more than five hundred brethren, gathered in Galilee, according to appointment. Subsequently He came to Peter and six other disciples on the shore of the Galilean sea, when He commissioned Peter to feed His flock, fully reinstating him in his position at the head of the Twelve. On the fortieth day after the resurrection He led His followers out to Bethania and from there He ascended the Mount of Olives and was taken away, "and a cloud received Him out of their sight." Lastly He was seen by Paul, the famous persecutor of the Nazarenes, and that the vision was real, his conversion and subsequent zeal in the cause of Christianity amply prove.

Such is the evidence that Christ rose from the dead. Thus numerous are the witnesses to this miracle. If anything can be established by testimony, this fact is beyond dispute. In this truth we have the guarantee of the divine origin of Christianity and also of Mormonism, which is nothing but Christianity as revealed in this age and founded on the fact that Christ lives. We have also a strong foundation for our faith in a future happy existence, inasmuch as we follow Christ, for as He lives, so His followers shall also live. To them death has no sting; the grave no horror, for the victory belongs to our Lord Jesus Christ.

WHO WASTED OUR VALLEY?

With the purpose of discrediting the reports of the Utah Pioneers and the works done by them and the Mormon people in the Great Basin, an old story is periodically revived to the effect that still earlier explorers found the valley of the Great Salt Lake a fruitful, smiling garden. Now comes a Denver paper, the latest to give publicity to the story, and in a recent issue, says: "The Mormons in Utah have so often claimed that they found Utah a wilderness and a barren waste and made the desert to blossom as the rose that a good many people believe this florid tale. John C. Fremont, the explorer, however, tells differently. In his memoirs he states that on first penetrating to the valley of the Great Salt Lake in 1842 he found it covered with luxuriant vegetation, a regular garden of nature in fact. The whole valley was carpeted with the richest, densest grasses. This magnificent vegetation was largely cleaned off after the Latter-day Saints had been in the country some years and it was done by sheep."

Gen. Fremont is not the only one whose recollections of gorgeous vegetation, of waving grasses reaching to the feet of the mounted horsemen, and all that sort of thing, have ever and anon been flaunted in the face of those who declare they came to a desert country, parched, arid and forbidding, and by industry have made it fruitful and delightful. As to the Denver Journal's notion that "this magnificent vegetation was cleaned off by sheep after the Latter-day Saints had been in the country some years," we suggest the query whether it is not possible that the cleaning off process had been done before the Latter-day Saints came? To be sure, there is difficulty in discovering the sheep to do it at that prior period, but not more so than in accounting for the mysterious and total disappearance of "the luxuriance of the rich, dense grasses" between Gen. Fremont's visit in 1842 and Brigham Young's arrival in 1847. We submit that our Denver cotemporary, in justice to and explanation of Gen. Fremont's veracity, should endeavor to make the coming of the sheep and the going of the grasses, during the years 1842-47, somewhere near simultaneous.

THE GATHERING.

Writing from Brodlington, Alabama, E. B. Dormon makes some inquiries as to the causes for the Latter-day Saints gathering together, and asks advice regarding emigrating to Utah, stating some very good reasons which impel him to consider that step.

The general reply to his inquiry why the Saints are gathering to America is that the Lord has appointed that place for the assembling of His Saints in the last days. Those who receive the Gospel among the nations of the earth are to be gathered to the land of Zion, which is on the Western hemisphere, while the Jews are to be restored to Jerusalem, on the Eastern hemisphere, preparatory to the coming of the Lord in power and glory.

Many reasons may be cited why the Saints can learn more of the ways of the Lord and live nearer to Him in a gathered condition than when they are scattered in various lands. The opportunities for instruction are vastly greater when the people are closely associated in their dwelling place with those whom the Lord has called to minister to them than when they are scattered and difficult to reach. In this feature alone there would be abundant cause for the policy which the Saints are pursuing under the direction of the Lord.

But there is also necessity of gathering for the preservation as well as progress of the people. The principle that union is strength is as applicable to the combination of evil powers as of the powers of good. When the enemies of the Saints are numerous and united they possess great power for carrying out their designs, and if the Saints in the comparative paucity of their numbers were to remain scattered and their interests separate, their strength would be divided and they be weakened. That they might not constantly have this danger to labor under, and be by it subjected to greater liability to be overcome, the Lord has directed them to assemble together upon a land which He has appointed and blessed for that purpose. When they obey this command their strength is solidified by their personal association and unity of temporal and spiritual interests, and the powers of evil receive a check by being kept as it were outside the walls.

The people can also exercise more spiritual power and thus receive more abundantly of the blessings of the Lord in an assembled capacity than otherwise. They are united and give each other encouragement to press on in the cause of truth. Their union enables them to exercise greater faith; this is combined, and the results are consequently more extensive than under less favorable conditions. Their hearts then present a field more suitably prepared than before for the sowing of the good seed—the knowledge of heavenly things.

The reasons for the gathering of the Saints are so numerous that we have not space to mention even a considerable proportion of them. But an important one is pointed out in the record left by John the Revelator. In giving an account of his vision of what should take place on the earth, the Apostle says he saw an angel bring the everlasting Gospel to men; he also says that he "heard a voice from heaven saying, Come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins and that ye receive not of her plagues. For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities." Here the Lord gives a reason for gathering His people from Babylon. They are commanded to come out that they should not be partakers of her sins; for those who voluntarily remain among the peoples classed as Babylon necessarily partake of their sins to a greater or less extent, because they refuse to obey the command of the Lord to be united; consequently they will be made recipients of the plagues that will be poured out on the mother of abominations.

It may be suggested that in all dispensations the Lord has desired His people to unite, for a protection from the attacks of their adversaries; when they have failed to heed His call, destruction has come upon them. He sought to introduce this principle among the Jews, but they would not receive it, and when He was retelling the destruction of Jerusalem He exclaimed, "How often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, but ye would not! Behold, your house is left unto you desolate."

In this dispensation, that of thefulness of times, the voice of the Lord has gone forth to His people, and in this is the chief incentive to the gathering—it is the command of God. He says:

Let them therefore who are among the Gentiles, flee unto Zion. And let them who be of Judah flee unto Jerusalem, unto the mountains of the Lord's house.

Go ye out from among the nations, even from Babylon, from the midst of wickedness, which is spiritual Babylon.

But verily, thus saith the Lord, Let not your flight be in haste, but let all things be prepared before you, and he that goeth, let him not look back, lest sudden destruction come upon him.

This is the Lord's command, and those who fail to heed the divine call, or who take a position antagonistic to it, place themselves in an unenviable situation. A reason is given for the gathering of the Saints, for which the Lord says there should be a work of preparation. A prominent feature in this preparatory work is that the Saints learn to obey the principle of gathering alone for the love of the Gospel and to do the will of God. Some people have gathered with the Saints with the object of improving their worldly affairs. This has been their chief aim, and they have been disappointed. In order to call down the blessings of the Lord, the motive must be of an entirely different nature. It is true that those who have gathered under the proper spirit have been greatly blessed and benefited in their temporal conditions, and in many cases have secured comforts and luxuries which they could not have reached in their native lands; some have not been able to bear prosperity, and have lost their love of the Gospel by grasping after wealth. But the secret of success in their temporal affairs among the gathered Saints is that they have sought first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and the other things have been added to them; where there are any who have sought to change this order, the blessing of the Lord has departed, either in spiritual or temporal things, or in both.

As to advice concerning gathering, it is proper that those who contemplate emigrating should prepare themselves by obtaining correct information. The Lord says:

And let the work of the gathering be not in haste, nor by flight, but let it be done as shall be counseled by the Elders of the Church at the conferences, according to the knowledge which they receive from time to time.

This command is from the same divine source as the other, and affords to Saints a means of obtaining proper counsel which, if followed, will result to their blessing. In giving this counsel, as in all other matters, it is the duty of the Elders to proceed under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. The fact of the gathering place of the people being endeared to them as their home should not lead them to think only of its beauties, and to forget its disadvantages to new comers. When they are inquired of, they should state the whole situation, especially the untoward circumstances that immigrants and strangers have to contend with. It is their responsibility to generally instruct the Saints in the principle of the gathering and to give advice in relation thereto within the limit of directions from their presiding officers. Obedience to the principle is an act that is left wholly to the individual who, if he is in the line of duty and has made the required preparation, will receive the spirit of the gathering at such time and manner as will be for his best good, if observed with an intent to obey the will of the Lord.

TWO OBJECT LESSONS.

The Germans have an expressive way of describing those who are particularly shiftless and destitute of snap and energy and resource, yet not especially lazy: "Such people sit around with their mouths open waiting for roasted pigeons to fly in."

We wonder if there are not a good many of that kind of folks in Salt Lake City at the present time, men who would perhaps like to work, but who, because some one does not come along and hire them, stand in the sun on the street corners and rail at hard times and listlessly inquire of each other and of passing acquaintances when they can expect "something to turn up." The idea of taking off their coats and turning up something, not only their shirt-sleeves but the hundreds of idle opportunities that are lying around us, apparently has never entered their minds.

At the risk of wounding their feelings, we advise them to stroll out northward a few blocks,—say into that section once known as the Nineteenth ward pasture—and take a lesson from the Chinese. The heathen out there are turning things up—the sod and soil. They are also turning things down—weeds and manure; and into the land as thus prepared they are dropping the little dull, hard seeds, that in the warm breast of mother earth are nourished and made to grow and yield fruit and food for man. A month hence those Chinamen will be getting cash for the work they are now doing; for nature never neglects to smile upon those who woo and conquer her. And some of these men who are now and at that time may still be standing on the street corners, will crave the succulent wares the heathen's basket contains; all the while perhaps complaining that this not a Chinamen's country anyhow, and clamoring for the expulsion of the quiet, industrious gardener.

That ought to be one object lesson. There is perhaps another: East and south and west of this city, within its limits and outside of them but within walking distance of it, are broad fertile acres capable of sustaining hundreds of families. Their last year's crop was, and their present year's crop according to every visible prospect will be, a goodly growth of rank weeds and a great assortment of big board signs giving the name of the "addition" and the real estate agent, and the price per piece of 25 feet of "these choice residence lots."

Weeds and board signs do not support anybody. The lands bearing them would support hundreds, and be all the better and the more inviting because of the cultivation received. The owners or agents of the lands would if sensible be ready to let any willing, industrious man have the season's use of an acre or two at a low rate or even free, rather than have the face of nature marred through the neglected growth of unsightly and useless vegetation; nay, they would probably be willing to supply such a man with the necessary seeds, taking their pay for the outlay in the produce itself.

Now, then, are there none among those at present standing around idle waiting for something to turn up, who can be spurred on to go and turn something up, even as the Chinese in the north fields are doing? Are there none upon whom the suggestions of these two object lessons are not wasted? Or, are they going to continue to wait, as the Germans say, with open mouths for roasted pigeons to come fluttering along and drop in?

HERE'S THE FIRST—WHO WILL FOLLOW?

The position of this paper with reference to the union of the higher educational institutions of our Territory is well known. At all times we have urged that success, and credit, and reputation, lay in consolidation, not diffusion, of our efforts. And when at last it appeared that the pioneer establishment or higher learning—the University of Utah—founded in the days of the poverty of the community and nourished from their scanty store during nearly half a century—was in danger of slow death from starvation, we appealed to the patriotism of the people and called upon them to rally to its support; expressing the faith that the call would not be in vain.

It has not been. Today we are gratified to be in a position to announce that the first response—a handsome and most generous one—has been offered and in all probability will be accepted before these lines are read.

The Salt Lake Literary and Scientific Association is an organization of many years' standing. Its objects are clearly expressed in its title, and its rights to property and permanence have been passed upon by the highest court in the land. It is the possessor of the invaluable collection known as the Desert Museum. It was the builder and is the owner of the beautiful structure in the Seventeenth ward of this city called by the Museum's name; in which building, popular scientific and other lectures have been delivered during the winter, and within whose rooms have been collected probably the finest instruments and apparatus for scientific study that the entire West affords.

This is the society which makes the first response to the appeal we have mentioned. By its president, it has made this tender to the chancellor and regents of the University of Utah: The Association, for a merely nominal consideration, will allow the University to use its fine building and its priceless apparatus, with easy access to the Museum and its treasures. It will assume the entire expense of a professor in science; that is, it will pay the salary of such professor, whose labors, while under the absolute direction of the regents and faculty of the University for such branches of instruction as they may see fit to designate, will also act as custodian and have charge of the premises and appliances referred to. This tender is made without condition or reservation of any kind—it is in fact a free gift to the University, for two years or for such time as may be understood, of the services of a skilled instructor and the use of the choicest apparatus and the best appointed building in the mountains—all without any expense whatever to the University. The tender is prompted by a genuine interest in and affection for the parent educational institution of our Territory, and by an earnest and patriotic desire to come to its aid when it is in the direst extremity.

Time and space today will not permit any exhaustive elaboration of the subject, or of the possibilities for the future which the acceptance of the offer indicates. But we cannot omit to note it thus hastily because it is in direct line with the suggestion that the NEWS has already put forth, and because we think we see in it the beginning of a universal manifestation of sympathy for our chief institution of learning, and of that assistance which alone can save and make of it—what we all hope it may be—the best supported and the worthiest of its kind in the mountains.

The Salt Lake Literary and Scientific Association has set a grand example, and is the first in the field. Who now will be the second to follow in the broad and glorious path it has marked out?

A KOSSUTH MEMENTO.

Elder William H. Miles, of this city, was laboring in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, forty-two years ago, when Louis Kossuth, the Hungarian patriot whose death occurred a few days ago, came there to address a meeting in behalf of his great cause. The speech was listened to by a concourse of some 25,000 people, who gathered at the railway station to welcome the distinguished patriot. Before closing, he made a strong appeal for material aid for the undertaking he had in hand, and many responded with money in various sums. Elder Miles advanced to the platform with the rest, and gave a dollar to the cause; whereupon he was grasped by the hand by the noble foreigner, and received what looked like a bank note, being on note paper and engraved in the usual form, but which has never had any other value than as a receipt and a memento.

The NEWS has been permitted to see the interesting bit of paper, which, as may well be imagined, is highly prized by its possessor. A picture of Kossuth adorns one end of the note, and a representation of Minerva, with helmet, shield and spear, the other. The national escutcheon rests in the two upper corners, and near them the figures "1" and "1" in vignette, representing the amount of the note. The line, "Dated at New York 2nd February 1852," surmounts the representation of a youth triumphing over a tyrant, whose crown has been dislodged and whose head is under the heel of the lusty young victor, a scroll upon the ground bearing the motto "sic semper tyrannis." The reading of the note itself is as follows:

HUNGARIAN FUNDS.

On demand one year after the establishment in fact of the INDEPENDENT HUNGARIAN GOVERNMENT, the holder hereof shall be entitled to ONE DOLLAR, payable at the National Treasury or at either of its Agencies at London or New York; or to exchange the same in sums of Fifty Dollars or over, for certificates bearing four per cent interest, payable in ten equal annual installments from one year after said event.

THE DANGER AHEAD.

The industrial army movement which at present occupies public attention to a considerable degree, can hardly be regarded any longer in the light of a huge practical joke. It is true that neither the number of men nor their qualifications so far justify the apprehension of any immediate danger to our institutions; but the whole thing is still in its incipency and who knows what the final outcome may be? From at least four different parts of the Union come reports of endeavors to enlist men in the army and—what is most significant—people of means and influence, who out of self-respect would refuse to join the ranks, are promising provisions and subscribing money or otherwise encouraging the movement. This, of course, gives it a certain degree of prestige, and places its development into gigantic proportions within the limits of possibility, provided there are brains and means enough at hand to keep the rabble together during the first difficulties necessarily connected with the "march."

However, the serious aspect of the Coxey movement is that it must be regarded as a symptom of the condition in which the body politic at present is. It is an expression on the one hand of the discontent lurking among the masses, and on the other hand of the distrust with which the powers that be are regarded by a large class of people; and on this account some anxiety may well be entertained. Can it be that people are beginning to lose faith in the free institutions of this country? Are they beginning to doubt the readiness of its representative men to place the welfare of the nation above their own interests and those of the favored few? If so, there is danger ahead, whether the Coxey movement amounts to anything or nothing. Then the day must be drawing near when the leaders of this Republic will find themselves compelled to call to their banners all who are willing to stand up for the salvation of the country and its glorious Constitution.

It is clear enough that the industrial army leaders hope to force Congress to enact measures otherwise not contemplated by that body, measures not endorsed by the representatives of the nation. They propose by the presence of a vast multitude in Washington to induce the legislators to adopt their own views. That such a course in itself is an encroachment upon a territory that should be kept sacred, and a violation of law, needs no argument. Could it for one moment be supposed that the plan were successful, and that the principle were carried out in reference to matters belonging to state and other local legislative bodies, it is clear that a deathblow had been dealt to all orderly legislative proceedings of this country. Then democracy would have to yield for mobocracy. Fortunately, the institutions of this country have been tested and found strong, and they will yet, when applied in the spirit in which they were founded, prove the best remedy against the evils of modern times.

THE TEMPLE LOT SUIT.

Zion's Ensign, of Saturday, March 24, announces that the "Hedrickites" brethren have completed their arrangements and will appeal the decision of Judge Phillips on the Temple Lot suit to a higher tribunal. The case will now go to the United States court of appeals at St. Louis, Missouri. The suit was brought, as will be remembered, by the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, commonly known as the "Josephites," against the "Hedrickites," to determine the legal ownership of the piece of ground known as the Temple lot at Independence, Mo., and Judge Phillips gave a decision adverse to the "Hedrickites" on grounds seemingly irrelevant to the question at issue. The case having once been taken to the courts, the defendants can hardly be expected to abandon the fight until a final decision shall have been rendered by the highest judicial authority of the country.

ANTI-PATRIOTIC ASSOCIATION.

A recent issue of the NEWS devoted considerable space to a careful and elaborate synopsis of an address given in this city by W. J. H. Traynor, in which he set forth the purposes of the secret society known as the American Protective association. We trust that our readers carefully and thoughtfully perused the gentleman's remarks, and thereby learned precisely what class of organization the A. P. A. is. Mr. Traynor being its "supreme president," his utterances should be thoroughly expressive of the society's design.

So far as the gentleman's animadversions on the Catholic church are concerned, we leave them to the members of that body to deal with. The question that chiefly concerns us is one that arises from the standpoint of American citizenship. It is: Is the society which Mr. Traynor represents, and which is building itself up on the pretense of upholding American citizenship, one wholly antagonistic to and subversive of American institutions than he accuses the Romish church of being? A few brief suggestions may indicate the reply which should be given to this inquiry.

No doubt Mr. Traynor believes he is an ordinarily consistent man, and imagines at least that he would oppose with equal vigor any anti-American combination. He declares that his society exists to "protect the country and its free and noble institutions from the secret, dangerous and intolerant ravages of a church" which he asserts is seeking to control the United States.

Will the gentleman now come forward and urge the people to "protect the country and its free and noble institutions from the secret, dangerous and intolerant ravages" of an oath-bound organization which seeks not only to control the United States, but boasts of the partial success it has met with already in that direction? For Mr. Traynor says the A. P. A. will "elect the next legislature of Oregon," and that he, the chief officer of the society, can "name the next senator from Washington."

Mr. Traynor says his society would perpetuate the principles of "a general, free, non-sectarian school organization," and exclaims, "The church must keep its hands off the public schools!"

As a loyal American citizen it is equally his duty to promote "a general, free, non-secret-society school organization," and to demand that "The secret society shall keep its hands off the public schools!" Will he do it?

He says: "Dead-to-the-world institutions must be wiped from the face of the earth. Monasteries and convents will have to submit to government inspection or close their doors forever."

Very well. The dark proceedings and secret conclaves of the A. P. A., as they seek to manipulate and conduct political affairs in this government by a star-chamber process that is violative of the Constitution, must cease their secret workings and "close their doors forever" to such anti-American deeds, or "must be wiped from the face of the earth." Will Mr. Traynor kindly let the people know when he makes such proclamation?

Says he, "Every man can worship whom and what he pleases, but he must not make his religion an element of the nation's politics."

Won't Mr. Traynor be patriotic enough to add that "Every man can refrain from worship if he pleases, but he must not make his anti-religion an element in the nation's politics?" Or will he insist that "a man must not make his membership and affiliations in a secret order an element in the nation's politics?" He does not do that now, and for the same reason that he says "The Catholic is not hunted out and opposed because he is a Catholic, but because he is a traitor," each member of the A. P. A. should be opposed, because he by the same process of reasoning "is a traitor."

There is one difference between the Catholic and the A. P. A. member. The former does not admit being a traitor; the latter confesses himself one. While he goes about shouting that a member of the Romish church is "a Catholic first and a citizen afterward," he openly boasts of placing his secret society's dictum in advance of the Constitution; he wages political warfare and inflicts disfranchisement on persons not legally convicted of any offense; he pledges himself under oath to give preference to members of his own society not only against members of a certain religious body but against every citizen of this broad land who is not a member of its secret combination. Instead of being an American Protective association, a more appropriate title for the society would be the Anti-Patriotic association. The only protective association needed by Americans is that which operates, unfettered by secret oaths and darkened symbols, through the channels provided by the national Constitution.

TROUBLED COREA.

A few days ago the telegraph brought word of an attempt to blow up the king of Corea and all his ministers, which, fortunately, was frustrated. Details of the affair have come to hand, which show the object of the conspiracy was not only to get rid of the king but to alter Corea's position as an independent power. As a consequence of the discovery of the plot, the people are agitated by it beyond any event which has occurred since the king's eldest son and six of the ministers were killed at dinner during a riot at the palace ten years ago.

The arch-conspirator in the recent recent affair is Ri-Chu Kwaku, a native of Kokal, in Keikido. He and his companions had placed a thousand pounds of gunpowder under the floor of the office in which the king and his ministers were to appear in state, and whence they were to have been hurled into eternity by anarchist methods. But one of the conspirators, Ryu-To-Kon, betrayed his fellows, and the leader and twenty-five of their number were placed under special arrest and in due time will be decapitated and their heads exposed to public view. Several of the conspirators have confessed and have stated that over a thousand persons, some of them in high position, were concerned in the plot.

The events at Seoul indicate that the widespread dissatisfaction which has existed for a long time at the methods of the king of Corea is working toward a radical change in governmental affairs there. It is claimed that the causes for aversion to the ruler of the nation are his tyranny and his repeated efforts to curtail the people in the exercise of rights and privileges they have enjoyed heretofore. If this be the case, and there seems to be no doubt of it, the prediction made by those associated with Corean affairs that a revolution will be one of the early occurrences there appears likely of fulfillment. The trouble with the opponents of the king's policy is that they are divided in their idea of what should be done. There is a strong feeling for a limited monarchy in which the king is to be chosen by the people and the right of heirship to the throne is to be done away, while another element desire to come directly under the Japanese government. In fact, it is said that Japan was behind the recent conspiracy and was to have furnished the conspirators two iron-clads when they began operations. Under such circumstances as these it looks as though the overthrow of the recent plot will not end the troubles which are disturbing the inhabitants of the hermit kingdom.

MORE ABOUT CANAIGRE.

An observant and experienced agriculturist, B. F. Johnson, of Mesa, Arizona, gives the News, in a letter dated March 20, additional interesting information regarding the much talked of canaigre root, whose tannic properties have been the subject of a great deal of discussion in this community during and since the session of the Legislature. For the purpose of comparison with the product of other sections, he has sent by a Mr. Rich a sample of the root as it grows near Mesa, the parcel containing some of the largest as well as some of the smallest roots in the same hill or stool, the whole yield of which he estimates would weigh twelve or more pounds. The root is native in the vicinity of Mesa and can be gathered from the sandy river bottoms in large quantities. Its bulbs or tubers are formed around the stalk like the sweet potato or the toes of the dahlia, and in its habit and appearance, both in stalk, leaf and seed, it is described as strictly a dwarf rhubarb and kindred to all the dock family. Our correspondent says he has seen it in Utah, at Johnson, Kanab, St. George and other places; but it is there of dwarf size and quite miniature compared with the Arizona product; hence he fears that in Utah it may not be so perfect a success as some would expect in its cultivation.

As to experiments with its tanning properties, Mr. Johnson gives an interesting reminiscence: "I found on my arrival at Tempe in 1882 a skillful tanner from California, by the name of Edwards, who had quite a plant for the manufacture of leather through the use of the canaigre, but his experiment was a failure so far as thick leather was concerned. He had many tons of the root gathered, had large boiling vats, etc., and other appliances with which he made experiments; yet while his harness and other leathers were excellent in their appearance, they were brittle and would break too much like bark. But of the astringent or tanning properties of the root there need be no doubt."

On discovering the plant in 1882, Mr. Johnson found that it so much resembled in its appearance the Turkey rhubarb of commerce that he sent a specimen to an eastern laboratory for chemical analysis, and the report received in reply was that it contained "a large per cent of tannic acid."

In view of all that is known and the great deal that is not yet known about the properties of the root, Mr. Johnson endorses the view already expressed by the News: to arrive first at actual facts by experiment, and to go slow until these are demonstrated. This would be at least a safe policy. But we are authorized to say that if the roots are now wanted in Utah, either for cultivation or tanning experiment, any amount on short notice could be shipped from Mesa at $20 per ton or perhaps at a much less figure; and with direct railroad transportation, Utah could depend upon a full supply of the canaigre in exchange for Irish potatoes alone.

THE AGE OF ELECTRICITY.

Another wonder is about to be performed by the king of inventors, Mr. Edison. It is announced that by his kinetograph he is able to take photographic views at a speed of from forty-eight to sixty-five a second, which means that every expression and gesture of an orator, or actor, or a whole company of actors, can be transferred to the instrument as they occur in reality. After this is done the kinetoscope places the pictures before the spectator, who thereby is enabled to see the person or persons photographed, as if they were present before him in person. With the phonograph attached, what they say will also be heard, and thus listening to a concert, or enjoying a theatrical performance, or receiving the benefit of a sermon or a lecture, will be possible without bodily presence at the place where such are given.

It is said that the inventor himself does not feel very enthusiastic over this wonderful contrivance, and probably he is right. Entertainments of this kind derive much of their pleasure from the gatherings of a more or less sociable nature which they occasion. The sympathetic and magnetic influences so essential to the success of those who undertake to entertain and instruct the public would necessarily suffer by a mechanical arrangement of this kind. But even if the new instrument is not destined—as some seem to think—to revolutionize our customs as regards public gatherings, it will, when perfected, be a means of enjoyment to many who by sickness or other causes are prevented from appearing in public, provided they have the means necessary to cover expenses. And as a means of adding happiness to at least one part of mankind, it may claim to be classed among the most important inventions of the age, and its originator will be regarded as a friend.

The possibilities of electricity are by no means exhausted. Still more wonderful things are promised, among which are clothes of electricity. Nikola Tesla says he will some day be able to wrap himself in a sheet of electric flames that would keep him warm at the south pole without injuring him in the least. How this is going to be done is his own secret, but he claims to have discovered that while 2,000 volts will kill a man, currents of 200,000 volts can flow through his body without injuring him, the vibrations being so rapid as to produce no perceptible impression on the nervous system. As the velocity of the vibrations approaches that of the electrical ether, which is everywhere present, they no longer cut and tear the nerves as the artificial undulations do on account of their coarseness.

These discoveries have led to speculations as to the possibility of utilizing the electrical ether itself for industrial purposes, and when a method has been discovered by which that can be done, there will be electric lamps without wire connections; motors without wire lines; telegrams will no longer come "over the wires," and vessels will cross the oceans driven by an invisible power indeed. And most wonderful of all, if Edison has not lost all claim to reliability on such topics, there is a possibility of transmitting thought from brain to brain without the medium of a written or spoken language. Further than that the electrical forecasts do not go as yet.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

The San Francisco papers admit that during the past few weeks nearly 800 of the unemployed who have been fed at the Salvation Army soup houses in that city have been shipped eastward from California, the Southern Pacific railway having given them transportation upon the recommendation of a committee of citizens. This committee asserts that in each instance the men whom it recommended for a free ride to this part of the country claimed that they had a promise of employment and convinced the committee that the claim was true.

There is no doubt that the bulk of the three hundred, and probably others not confessed to, landed in Ogden and Salt Lake. If that could be established, the railroads which gave them transportation in should be made to ship them out again. As to the committee being convinced that the men provided with transportation had a promise of work, that was not a very difficult thing to do, the opportunity of ridding the city of some of its paupers being a clinching argument in that direction. Not only were men given free rides from the coast to this section, but women were also similarly provided, and that, too, in cases where the parties had been residents of San Francisco for years, and had not asked for the change, but accepted the railway tickets when tendered them. The procedure in this line, both on the part of the railway and the parties who gave the recommends for free rides, has been eminently unfair and unfriendly to this part of the country.

Just how many of the arrivals from San Francisco took part in the unemployed parade yesterday afternoon it would be difficult to say; but it was easy to discover that of the hundred or more men in line the majority were comparative strangers here. In fact the bona fide home workingmen avoid such movements. They know that it does their cause no good to engage in demonstrations which either bring them ridicule or are liable to produce excitement, the tendency of which is to defeat the very object sought, besides affording opportunity for developing anarchistic tendencies. The Utah workingman is a foe to anarchy, and he doesn't have anything to do with parades whose only effect can be to intimidate capital and steady people or to bring this section of country into disrepute.

NORTHERN STATES MISSION.

PENNSYLVANIA CONFERENCE.

METZ, W. Va., March 17, 1894.

The Pennsylvania semi-annual conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints convened at Metz, W. Va., March 10th, 11th and 12th.

There were present thirteen Elders from Zion. Elder Charles W. Stayner, president of the Northern States mission, was unable to attend, but sent a letter expressing his regrets. Our meetings were all well attended and the Elders and Saints enjoyed a feast of spiritual food. The weather was remarkably fine for the time of year and the Elders all felt well, both physically and spiritually. The first principles of the Gospel were elucidated in a plain and convincing manner. Our Priesthood meeting was exceptionally interesting, as some of the reports given by the Elders were very thrilling. It may not be out of place to make mention of one or two of the most interesting to give your readers an idea how some of our Elders are treated.

William J. Henderson and Charles Morris, while holding meeting in Gilmer county, were disturbed by the explosion of a bomb. This was the first Mormon meeting ever held in that vicinity, and a few of the "toughs" were determined that it should be the last, and in order to accomplish their desire they constructed an infernal machine out of a stick of hard timber two feet long and ten inches in diameter and, after boring an inch and a quarter hole lengthways of the stick, filled it up with powder and placed an iron band on either end to strengthen it. They placed it under the school house beneath the rostrum. Elder Henderson had been talking about twenty minutes when bang! went the bomb. The shock shook the house from center to circumference and struck an oak sleeper 8x12 inches which prevented it from coming up through the floor. But for this it would probably have resulted in loss of life, as the house was packed to overflowing.

The bomb made a hole in the sleeper large enough to bury a man's fist. After half an hour the congregation got quieted and the Elders proceeded with their meeting unmolested. They preached two more sermons in the house, and on the last night several of the "toughs" fired off their revolvers and shouted, but went no further with their threats.

Elders O. A. Robinson and Emuel Bachman, while holding meeting in an adjoining county, received a warm reception of rotten eggs. A young man in the house went to the window, raised it up, and the mob on the outside threw the eggs through, besmearing the inmates with their nauseating missiles and breaking up their meeting.

Other untoward experiences were narrated but I can say that where these depredations were enacted they were frowned upon by the better class of people, and several persons were subpoenaed before the grand jury.

After all of the reports were given in, the general authorities of the Church and Chas. W. Stayner as president of the Northern States mission and Wm. J. Henderson as president of the Pennsylvania conference and John

Q. Critchlow as clerk of the conference, were presented and sustained. Elder Orson Whitaker, ex-president of conference, and Elders O. A. Robinson and Heber J. Meeks as traveling Elders, were honorably released to return home, having fulfilled faithful missions. The Elders were then assigned their field of labor as follows:

Jno. Q. Critchlow, A. R. Wright—Butler Co. Pa., P. O. Reibold.

Wm. S. Roundy, Heber Balls—Taylor and Tucker counties, W. Va., P. O., Gratton, W. Va.

Brigham Ricks, Geo. B. Matson—Wetzel county, W. Va., P. O., Littleton, W. Va.

Joe. E. Wilkins, Lorenzo Durfee—Marion and Preston counties, W. Va., P. O., Fairmont, W. Va.

Wilford Reeder, Chas. Morris—Alleghany county, Md., P. O., Pratt, Md.

Emanuel Bachman, Albert Perkes—Gilmer county, W. Va., P. O., West Union, W. Va.

Wm. J. Henderson to preside over the conference with P. O., Littleton, Wetzel county, W. Va.

JNO. Q. CRITCHLOW,
Clerk of Conference.

INDIANA CONFERENCE.

TASWELL, Ind., March 20, 1894.—

The past week is one long to be remembered; by the Elders of the Indiana conference, and also the Latter-day Saints who live in the vicinity of Taswell.

The Elders came in from their respective fields of labor, where they had passed the last six months in assiduously promulgating truth and righteousness, and by Thursday evening, March 15th, eleven Elders were here at Taswell. As our conference did not commence till Saturday, March 17th, at 3 p.m., on the morning of March 16th we all repaired to the residence of Bro. Jeremiah Belcher, where, after some pleasant conversation and quiet chatting, we all joined together with whole soul and energy in singing the familiar songs of Zion, with a spirit and feeling known only to those who have passed through this experience in missionary life.

Time for refreshments came and we were ushered to a table spread with the good things of Indiana, which had been carefully prepared by our good hostess, Sister Belcher. After we had all satisfied the inner man, we indulged in sentiments and music. The afternoon was thus passed until about 5 p.m., when the Elders dispersed in pairs among the Saints and friends in the neighborhood, partaking of their hospitality.

Meetings were held Saturday, March 17th, at 3 p.m., Sunday, March 18th, at 10 a.m., 2:30 p.m., and 7:30 p.m., respectively, at which the Elders all spoke under the power and influence of the Holy Ghost, explaining the truths of the Gospel of Christ in plainness and simplicity to those who gathered to hear them. The attendance at the meetings was not large, because the weather was not altogether favorable. The spirit manifested and the teachings received were much appreciated by the Elders and Saints.

One special feature of our conference was the rendition of some beautiful duets by Elders Hyrum Brimhall and David. R. Roberts.

On Monday, March 19th, at 11 a.m., we gathered at Brother Jeremiah Belcher's, where we held our Priesthood meeting. The Elders, in reporting the various fields, said that the prospects for doing good were brighter than for some years past. That prejudice seemed to be dying away and the hearts of the people seemingly were being softened towards the Elders. New fields are being opened and friends gained. Thus the work of God is increasing in the land.

The Spirit and power of God was poured out upon us in rich abundance; upon this occasion strong testimonies were borne by all the Elders and many instructions given in regard to the duties and responsibilities of their high and holy calling. We regretted very much not having the company of our worthy president, C. W. Stayner, who was unavoidably absent.

The Elders were sustained to labor during the next six months respectively as follows:

President Truman H. Barlow and Elder David R. Roberts at Bloomfield, Green county, Ind.

Elders Hyrum Brimhall and Brigham H. Telford at Woodville, Newaygo county, Michigan.

Elders William O. Bentley and Thos. I. Allen at Pulley's Mills, Williamson county, Illinois.

Elders Benj. F. Peel and Nephi N. Rogers at Columbus Grove, Putnam county, Ohio.

Elders William A. Garrett, Ira E. Bradshaw and Christian Munk, at Taswell, Crawford county, Indiana.

All separated feeling well and trusting that another conference will soon come—another happy reunion. All feel like casting their "mites" in the glorious work of the Lord in which we are engaged. Many thanks are due the Saints and friends for their kind treatment of the Elders, because they spared no pains in making everything pleasant and agreeable.

HYRUM BRIMHALL,
Clerk of Conference.

A PIONEER'S VIEWS.

The resources and home industries of our Territory are attracting much attention at this time. These are no new questions by any means, but in the present tight times are brought more forcibly to our attention with renewed importance. As to our resources, it brings to my mind the remarks of President Brigham Young to the Pioneers in 1847, about three days after we had pitched our camp on the site where Salt Lake City now stands. Some of the company were a little disheartened on account of the dismal and forbidding appearance of this desert land as it looked to be at that time. The idea of making homes and a living for their families in a country where there was nothing in sight was very discouraging. President Young was very cheerful and spoke fatherly and kind to us about the prospects. Among other things he told us that all the elements of wealth were here in these valleys and mountains; they were not visible, they only wanted developing. He said there was bread here, meat and vegetables, choice fruit, sugar, honey, silk, wool, gold and silver, iron and everything necessary to sustain a people. These remarks made a deep impression upon my mind, and I have watched with much satisfaction for forty-six years the truth of those statements of that early day, as the resources of the country have been developed, and the work is still going on. If a man at that time had said the time would come when three tons of good hay to the acre would be produced in one year on the dry benches or a ton of sugar, he would have been considered a little off in his mind. But so it is today.

The production of leather has not been achieved sufficiently yet, although many efforts have been made. We have the hides, but have not been able to utilize sufficiently the tannic acid which no doubt exists in abundance; but I think we will yet find it. We could not get hold of the sugar which exists in boundless quantity until we introduced a little root known as the sugar beet. Now, with the use of brain and machinery, we have the finest sugar in the world, drawn from the once sterile desert land. We used to haul our sugar one thousand miles with ox teams and it was worth a dollar a pound. At the same time we were walking on sugar every day and our cattle and horses were trampling it under their feet. But there was a veil over it and it could not be seen, only with prophetic eyes.

I now see an interest taken in a root called canaigre, which perhaps when introduced will be the medium of drawing the necessary element from our soil to make all the leather we need. It is said to have excellent tanning properties, especially in making all kinds of soft leather, but not so good for sole leather.

I have been thinking over this feature of the case, and it occurred to my mind that we have an abundance on hand of the very material necessary to meet this requirement. All that is necessary is the means of collecting it. It is found all over the hills and mountain slopes, in what is called scrub oak. I know it contains the tannin. I have tested it in a small way. Utilize this and we can have oak tanned sole leather all at home, costing nothing but home labor. Now, if some wise head can suggest a successful plan to collect this material he will be something of a benefactor. I have thought of one plan, which I will give as a suggestion for a starter, which will cost but a trifle. Select a spot in the vicinity of the oak brush where there is a little water, put in a portable boiler something like a molasses boiler, only much larger, with a wide flue underneath; fill the boiler with water; cut the green brush fine, which has bark all over it, from the ground to the ends of the twigs, which contains the acid; fill the boiler and boil till all is extracted; throw out the brush; fill up again with fresh brush. The boiled brush when dried will make all the fuel necessary, already cut and on hand to run the furnace. It can be handled with a pitchfork. Repeat the operation till the liquid is as strong as needed for the tanning; barrel it up; the large coal oil casks would answer every purpose. It can then be transported to the tannery in small compass ready for immediate use or be stored. The transportation would be less than on bark from the forest and no grinding required like bark. Boys could do good work in getting and preparing the brush. No great skill required in the whole process. The cash outlay for one plant would not exceed one hundred dollars, boiler plates, axes, bill-hooks and a pitchfork are all that is necessary. When the patch is cleared move to another, and in about ten years a new crop will be ready to harvest without any cultivation or care and no taxes to pay on the land. This work can be done any time of the year. The farmer can take his force when it can be spared from the crop; go and gather his ooze, take it and his hides to the tannery; get his leather or boots and shoes for his family, costing nothing but labor. He can keep his wheat and not be forced to sell it at fifty cents a bushel. I am sanguine in the belief that making the ooze which may be considered tedious, will pay labor better than raising wheat at seventy-five or eighty cents a bushel.

In fact that whole section of country is believed by experienced miners as destined to become as important as the great California discoveries of 1848. Many claims are being staked off.

Assays made show $21 in gold to the ton.

The death of James Donaldson Beebe occurred at the family residence on State street near Eleventh South, between 5 and 6 o'clock March 27th, after a lingering illness of pulmonary consumption, extending over a period of three years. The deceased held the position of secretary to the Chalk Creek Mining company, and was also cashier in the employ of Mason Lumber Co. of this city. He leaves a widow and one child.

Richfield Advocate: The people are waking up to the necessity of running the Sevier Valley canal north to Cedar Ridge this spring, and many from Wallsville and Vermillion are working on the extension for water stock. The only trouble now is in raising cash enough to buy powder to finish up the blasting work, at the point of the mountain south. This should not stand in the way of completing this great enterprise.

Logan Nation: One home industry in this city which is doing much towards keeping money at home for certain lines of goods is the Cache knitting works. Just at present they are manufacturing a line of cotton underwear and cotton hosiery which in style and finish is equal to any imported. The price also is low as the imported articles, so there is not the least occasion for sending outside the county for anything they manufacture.

William Walters and William Poppleton, both of Wallsville, have been arrested under a charge of unlawful cohabitation. They were then taken before U. S. Commissioner Fletcher, and gave bonds in the sum of $1,000 each, to appear for examination when wanted. Anna Mitten, Poppleton's alleged plural wife, and Mary Henry, the alleged plural wife of Walters, were also held in bonds of $250 each. It is claimed that both ladies have infant children.

The Mercur Mercury says that last fall seven young men connected with the electric light works of Salt Lake came out and pitched their tent over in the Glencoe country, and went to work developing some prospects. They have worked steadily all winter, scarcely losing a day, and we are now reliably informed that the nerve and clear grit shown by them has been amply rewarded by the development in the Clear Grit of a fine body of pay ore.

The Union National bank is no longer in existence in that capacity, but is now Walker Brothers' bank, a private institution. The corporation which operated the Union National bank has sold its entire business to the private firm, which has the same corps of officers. Steps are being taken to dissolve the corporation. The Union has notified the secretary of the U. S. treasury of the change, and informs him that it has all the deposits of its customers on hand in cash.

The industrial army fever seems to have struck a few in this part of the country. At least that was the idea conveyed by an "unemployed" procession which paraded the principal streets Tuesday afternoon. There were about 150 men, headed by a band. They carried a number of transparencies, announcing that they must have bread and could wait no longer, and similar sentiments. There was no declaration of intention to take up the line of march with a view of joining the industrial army.

Shortly after midnight March 23 a big fire broke out in the shed on the Siefert stone yard directly west of the Rio Grande Western passenger office. In a brief space of time the machinery in the sheds was enveloped and the West Side department being called out, quickly repaired to the scene and extinguished the flames. The fire is supposed to have been started by tramps who were sleeping in the buildings. The loss is estimated at from $2,000 to $2,500. The insurance amounts to $8,000.

To the Stake officers of the Y. L. M. I. A.—A meeting of the Y. L. M. I. A. Stake officers will be held Friday, April 6, 1894, at 4 p.m., at the residence of Counselor M. Y. Dougall, No. 49 north, West Temple street (opposite west gate of Temple Block), Salt Lake City. It is earnestly desired that every Stake shall be represented. Ward officers coming from a distance will be made welcome.

Secretary.

Arbor Day comes in two weeks on—Saturday, April 7. The statute requests and authorizes the Governor to set apart the first Saturday in April of each year as a legal holiday, to be known as Arbor Day, which the people are invited to observe by the planting out of shade and fruit trees, shrubbery, etc. This season the day bids fair to come at an appropriate time for such observance. In the Salt Lake City schools Monday, April 9th, will be observed as a matter of convenience to teachers and pupils. To Salt Lake county schools and generally throughout the Territory, however, the regular Arbor Day, the first Saturday in April, will be the occasion of suitable ceremonies.

The heads of the police department have had in hand March 27 one of the most sensational robbery cases with which they have had to deal for some time.

It appears that T. Hayes and Thomas Clark, Illinois horsemen, arrived here a few days ago with a considerable amount of money with which to buy a band of horses. This morning the latter called at the police station and stated that Clark, who he claims is a cousin, had suddenly departed from the city taking with him about $1,500 in cash not his own. He therefore wished him arrested and the officers accordingly have telegraphed all over the west with a view of having the alleged robber apprehended.

A reporter of the News March 23rd saw the model of an air ship which is the result of much labor and thought on the part of the man who did the work. The inventor and builder is John Zahler, a German who resides at Bountiful. He has christened his ship the Gray Eagle, and a very pretty, and unique affair it is. The model is simply in miniature, but built on a large scale. Mr. Zahler is positive, he says, that it could be made to travel through space as easily and as swiftly as its most gigantic prototypes now plow the waves of the ocean. It is surmounted by a balloon, the inflation and proper manipulation of which by means of automatic connections and appliances gives it the power said to be necessary for successful operation.

About 8:30 o'clock last Wednesday evening Henry Parker discovered a bundle upon his doorstep, says the Payson Globe. Upon investigation it was found that the coverings enveloped the form of a large boy baby about two weeks of age. Mrs. Parker cared for the little wail and made it as comfortable as possible. No clue as to the identity of the parents could be obtained from the child's clothing or wraps. It is almost certain, however, that they are Payson people, from the fact that they chose to leave the child with Mr. and Mrs. Parker whose kindness of heart is well known. They will keep the infant and care for it as their own until someone can prove a better right to it. This makes the third child adopted by this kind-hearted couple.

A tot two years of age, the son of John Snow, who resides in the western part of Provo City, narrowly escaped burning to death on Saturday afternoon. A number of children had built a fire in the lot and were roasting eggs for Easter. The little fellow ventured too close to the fire, and the flames caught his dress. In a moment he was enveloped in flames, and would have been burned to death had not John and Austin Wilkins, two men who chanced to be nearby, run to his assistance. They instantly tore the clothes from his body. He was slightly burned about the neck and face, but was otherwise uninjured. His head was saved from serious burning by a heavy woolen hood. Austin Wilkins, in seizing the burning clothing had his hand and wrist scorched, but not seriously.

The city of Lehi, Utah county, has got a big thing in the sugar factory and in the prospective development of gold mines at Tickville, nine miles northwest of the town; but there are few if any people who had an idea that right in the city was a vast gold field of wonderful richness. Yet such is actually the case if the news brought to this city last evening be true. J. W. Pitts, of the Eleventh ward, came up on last evening's train from the south, and stated that the people of Lehi were wild with excitement over a discovery made there yesterday, of gold in good paying quantities right in the city. The precious metal was found close alongside the railway track, and people from all around are rushing in. Mr. Pitts has been out to Tickville, from where he went to Lehi. He will soon return to the latter place.

Writing from Afton, Wyo., a correspondent of the Montpellier Post says: "In Star Valley, at the extreme south end, there is enough land for eight or ten families, with excellent range and the best of water rights. In lower Salt River valley there is enough land to settle twenty-five families altogether; the land lies next to the Snake river and is very desirable land, with immense ranges and enough water to water a whole country. Star Valley is forging her way ahead in spite of every obstacle. There is not to my knowledge a family lacking the necessities of life. The hard times have not affected us; hard times have been our heritage; it is second nature to us. We have, however won the fight and now this country is beginning to blossom as the rose. Many indeed are getting well fixed. We welcome all who wish to share our prosperity, and will help them to get a start."

The News received a call March 21 from Elder W. W. Williams, of the Twenty-first ward of this city, who has returned from a mission to Great Britain, on which he left home Jan. 25, 1892. The first fourteen months of his time was spent in Newcastle conference. The Norwich conference was then the scene of his labors for nearly a year, until released. He has enjoyed excellent health, and was kindly treated by the people. While there were many interested in the Gospel in his missionary field, and more received it, the majority do not care much for religious inquiry and are content to remain as they are. While on the way home, sixty miles east of Wyoming, the train on which Elder Williams was traveling was delayed six and a half hours by a broken axle. The train was stopped a mile and a half from a station, and one of the crew walked that distance and telegraphed for help, which came from Evanston.

The favorable decision rendered in the La Plata land case is already having a good effect here. A contract has been let to haul a quantity of ore from the Sunrise dump, that has been awaiting shipment ever since the injunction papers were issued. It is expected that the smelting of this ore will conclusively prove the value of it as rich, free milling copper ore, and thereby lead to the further development of mines already opened, and the discovery of new ones.

Prospects for the development of the Rich Cache mines during the coming summer are also favorable. There is a probability of the property changing hands in the near future for the sum of $50,000. If the deal should be consummated work would be resumed at once and pushed as rapidly as possible. In any event operations will be resumed shortly, but if the sale is not made probably will not be pushed as rapidly.

Suit was brought in the Fourth district court at Ogden March 21 by P. L. Orth vs. Weber county Land and Live Stock company, a corporation and Jesse M. Langsdorf. In the prayer of the plaintiff he asks that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the assets of the corporation and to have an account with the defendant, Jesse M. Langsdorf, of the moneys, accounts, books and property of the company, and that Jesse M. Langsdorf account to the receiver and the court for the moneys, etc., and upon failure so to do that the corporation have judgment against Langsdorf for the sum of $30,420; and also upon failure of the directors to act, the court through its receiver direct the corporation to dissolve, and for such further relief as to the court may seem just in the premless. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that Langsdorf has left the territory and taken with him the franchises and accounts of the corporation and is now in the republic of Mexico.

There is an immense quantity of vinegar brought into this market from the East. It is known as "acid vinegar"—though all vinegar is acid—because of its sharp taste and corrosive effects, which are the results of its process of manufacture. It is neither as good for pickling or for the ordinary uses of vinegar nor as healthful as malt or fruit vinegar; in fact it is injurious to health. Yet it holds a large share of the market as against the home-made and superior article.

The time of the present home industry movement is regarded as opportune for the opening up of another local vinegar works for the production of the article in its best form, and to give the people the full opportunity of obtaining malt vinegar made at home or of continuing to use the inferior acid. The promoters of the movement are James Watson, J. W. Snell, and others of this city. They have secured the buildings formerly used by the Eagle cracker factory, on the west side of Second West street, between Seventh and Eighth South streets, and are arranging to put in the necessary machinery and begin work at once.

Today, March 21st, is the first day of spring. It is the vernal equinox, when the days and nights are of equal length all over the world, and the sun is passing from south to north of the equator. The days in the northern hemisphere are still lengthening, but the old saw, "as the day lengthens the cold strengthens," on this day loses its force and the trend of temperature is in the other direction.

With the commencement of spring all the leading mercantile establishments in the city inaugurated a "grand spring opening." The styles for the coming season in millinery, dry goods, footwear, and all kinds of attire were shown off to advantage, many of the displays being highly artistic. Notwithstanding a chilly wind that was blowing, there were many people who enjoyed the bright sunshine, and who took a keen interest in the spring exhibits. At some of the stores lunch was served, and was partaken of with a hearty relish. In many places, too, the fragrance of spring flowers filled the air. The day probably saw more ladies and children in the main streets of the city than any day since Christmas.

Provo, Utah, March 23.—The Provo Lumber Manufacturing & Building Company assigned today. The firm is the oldest of the kind in the city and was thought to be financially sound. There is a balance of $4,000 due from the Territory on the asylum contract of three years ago. Had this amount been appropriated by the last Legislature, as was expected, the firm, says Supt. W. R. H. Paxman, would have been able to weather the storm by paying off the more pressing demands. The company could not borrow money, as the best of its property was already mortgaged.

The assets are as follows: Real estate, $15,000; machinery, $6,000; merchandise, $15,000; bills receivable, $12,500; book accounts, $18,000. Total, $61,500. The liabilities aggregate $28,983.39. The principal creditors are as follows: Class A: A. O. Smoot, secured by mortgage, $15,000; David Eccles, secured in part by mortgage, $7,200. Class B: King's River Lumber Co., $1,609; North Pacific Lumber Co., $762; Verdi Mill Co., $718; Mrs. Trope, mortgage, $1,200. Josiah W. Cluff is assignee.

As we mentioned in our last issue, says the Coalville Times, the response to a call for charity is a pretty good index to the character of the people, and it is with pride that we refer again to the generous manner in which the call from the destitute at Almy, Wyo., was received in this city and county. On Tuesday last Mr. W. W. Cluff, having succeeded in getting free transportation for the contributions from this city, shipped a carload of provisions, etc., to the needy and destitute of Almy. The car contained 12,268 pounds of flour, 18,562 pounds of potatoes, 110 pounds of other vegetables, 366 pounds of pork, besides a large amount of butter, dry goods, clothing, notions, etc., and this from Summit Stake alone. During the day a request was sent up from Echo and Henefer to have the cars side-tracked at those places so their contributions (by no means small) could be added, but the request of these good people could not be complied with for the reason that the car was already loaded to its full capacity, and the donations from these and other points will have to be sent by local freight. Like contributions from all over the county will follow soon.

The first meeting of the Military Board of Control for Utah was held at the Executive office March 21st, beginning at 11 o'clock. Governor West, as commander-in-chief, presided and all the members of his staff were present, namely, Adjutant-General Geo. M. Ottinger, Inspector-General Erasmus W. Tatlock, Judge Advocate-General A. D. Gash (Provo), Commissary-General Thomas J. Stevens, Quartermaster-General D. C. Adams, Aides Nepht W. Clayton and Alex. Loeb, and Surgeon-General Allen Fowler. The entire time up to the adjournment for luncheon was devoted to a general consideration of the question of the militia with a view to its organization, and an expressed determination to push forward the organization as speedily as possible. Measures tending to that end were freely discussed by the Governor and his staff.

A number of inquiries have been received from different parts of the Territory as to the law on the subject, and showing that a good deal of interest is being taken in the matter. Applications are also at hand from Ogden, Provo, Brigham City and other places.

News from Weiser, Idaho, says that on Thursday afternoon Mrs. Helma J. Spencer received a wound that may prove fatal. Her four-year-old boy was wounded also. The injuries were caused by the accidental discharge of a revolver in the hands of her husband, T. G. Spencer, who was in an adjoining room showing the revolver to a young man named E. P. Parks who was thinking of buying the weapon.

Mrs. Spencer, who was recently confined, and whose baby girl died shortly after birth, was sitting up in bed, her four-year-old son, an only child, standing by her bedside.

The bedroom door was closed and Spencer was showing young Parks how nicely the gun worked, thinking it was not loaded, when the cartridge exploded, the bullet passing through the door, striking the little boy in the right shoulder, making a deep flesh wound, and entering Mrs. Spencer's abdomen. It came out above the right hip near the right kidney. The lady is, in a precarious condition, the doctors giving no hope of recovery. She was 28 years of age; her husband is 48. They formerly resided at Afton, Wyoming.

It will be shocking and sorrowful news to the many friends of Mrs. Dooly, wife of Hon. J. E. Dooly of this city, to learn that she died on a Southern Pacific passenger train west bound, at Carlin, Nevada, at noon Friday, March 28rd.

The deceased has been a constant sufferer from heart disease for the last two or three years and during the whole of that time has been under the care of Dr. Richards. For some time past the family have been prepared for the worst as it was almost certain that the case of the unfortunate woman was a hopeless one. During the progress of the World's Fair she visited Chicago and it appears that the excitement and worry attendant upon the same had a decided effect upon her for the worse and gradually complications and troubles of a very serious character developed, until yesterday she made the request, when every member of the family felt that it would be a most hazardous undertaking, to be taken to California, with a view to obtaining relief, even though the angel of death should call her while on the way.

Not wishing to disregard what appeared to be her dying wish, consent was given and the midnight train from this city bore Mr. Dooly, his stricken wife and daughter Nellie towards the coast.

We must establish home industries for the utilizing of our home resources, says the Manti Messenger. Among those that will be of most benefit to Manti and the surrounding country is a wool scouring plant. According to present freight rates, the cost of shipping our wool product of 2,000,000 pounds to the eastern markets is not less than $80,000 per annum. Of this at least two-thirds of the freight or $40,000 is paid for hauling dirt. The average shrinkage is about 65 per cent, and that is not only a dead loss, but the freight, amounting to $40,000 per year, is an enormous sum thrown away.

A wool scouring plant can be purchased, the building erected and machinery put in for $15,000. We have a fine location for such a plant. We have the wool to scour, and need that difference of $40,000 in freight left at home. Wool can be scoured for not to exceed one and one-half cents per pound.

The cost then of scouring 2,000,000 pounds will be about $35,000, which would be kept at home and only clean wool put upon the market. If we can reduce the freight $40,000 and give employment to our city and county to the extent of $35,000 per year by an investment of $15,000 for a wool scouring plant, is this not a business proposition that should be considered?

On Thursday morning Logan awoke to the fact that a sensational elopement had occurred. The law requiring those matrimonially inclined to obtain a license, would in this instance have proven an effectual bar to the aspirations of the prospective bridegroom, as he is only seventeen years of age, and could not have obtained the consent of his parents; but the adage, "love finds a way," proved true in this instance. The young lady took the morning train to Preston, Idaho, and the precocious youth went up in the evening. All had been prepared. No license was necessary; a functionary and the bride were on hand in the parlor of the Cottage hotel, and just thirteen minutes after his arrival at the Preston depot, the twain were made one. They returned to Logan, where the young man sought the paternal benediction in vain. The stern parent did not relent, and refused positively to receive his son's wife as a member of the family. The boy's name is Roy McAllister, and that of his wife was Miss Eugenia Richards, a handsome young lady of nineteen summers and a teacher in the Methodist school. It is said that her parents also disapprove the match.

It remains to be seen whether the influence of their parents will succeed in separating them until the husband reaches a more mature age and is in receipt of a more ample salary than at present.

C. H. Jackson, of the Orchard Farm reservoir enterprise, says the Boise Salesman of Saturday last, who arrived recently from New York with Clemens Herschel, chief engineer of the great Niagara Water Power company, is considering the advisability of repairing the broken dam temporarily in order to hold sufficient water to irrigate the 50,000 trees planted there last season.

It would not cost a great deal to put in a temporary dam for this purpose, although, with Indian creek running full of water, it would be a somewhat difficult task, and there would be constant danger of anything but a permanent dam washing out during the spring, leaving the matter in exactly the position it now stands.

It is a question with Mr. Jackson whether it would not be better, rather than take these chances, to add to the cost of a temporary affair, sufficient money to build a permanent dam in the fall, leaving the trees to die, for there is little hope of their surviving a summer without water.

This problem will likely be settled when Mr. Herschel prepares his estimates.

Mr. Jackson says when the dam is rebuilt next fall it will contain a solid masonry core. The fact that Mr. Herschel, an acknowledged leader among the hydraulic engineers of the United States, has gone over the ground and will indicate the manner of construction, is sufficient guarantee it will be as perfect as skilled labor and the best of material can make it.

The trial of Mrs. Emma Van Patten, of Salt Lake, for the murder of her uncle, Soren Neilson, was commenced March 26th in Judge Smith's court.

S. R. Thurman is prosecutor, and Judge W. N. Dusenberry and Messrs W. H. King and D. D. Houtz are attorneys for the defense.

The alleged facts in the case are as follows:

In October, 1893, Mrs. Van Patten was visiting her uncle, Soren Neilson, and aged Norwegian residing at Ephraim, Sanpete county. On the 18th of October, shortly after Neilson had partaken of a bowl of mush and milk, prepared for him by Mrs. Van Patten for supper, he was seized with a fit of vomiting, and soon died. It was observed that some chickens which ate the remainder of the mush which had been thrown out doors, also died. These suspicious circumstances led up to a post mortem examination, at which it was shown that Neilson had died from poison, administered by some person or persons unknown. Further investigation revealed the fact that some $4,000, which Neilson had in the house, had disappeared with the exception of about $50. Mrs. Van Patten left rather suddenly for Salt Lake.

The matter was laid before the grand jury, which was in session, and an indictment returned. As a temporary measure, a warrant of arrest was issued from U. S. Commissioner Dudley's court, and Mrs. Van Patten was arrested at Salt Lake.

Mrs. Van Patten is about 45 years of age. Her husband is a miner and has been employed at Bingham. Her parents reside at Spanish Fork. There will be twenty-five or thirty witnesses in the case.

Late on Saturday afternoon the following proclamation was issued by the Governor:

TERRITORY OF UTAH, Executive Office.

To all of whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that, whereas, it appears that the convenience and welfare of the people of Juab, Millard, Sanpete and Sevier counties requires the holding of the First Judicial District Court at the cities of Nephi and Mantli,

Therefore, I, Caleb W. West, Governor of the Territory of Utah, do hereby fix the times and places for holding the First Judicial District Court, as follows:

A term of said court shall be held at Provo, in the county of Utah, and commence on the first Monday in February; a term shall be held at Nephi, in the county of Juab, and commence on the second Monday in May; a term shall be held at Mantli, in the county of Sanpete, and commence on the second Monday in July; a term shall be held at Provo, in the county of Utah, and commence on the second Monday in September. The said court shall open at the hour of 11 a. m. on the days herein designated.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of said Territory to be affixed.

Done at Salt Lake City, this 24th day of March, A. D. 1894, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and eighteenth.

(SEAL) CALEB W. WEST,
By the Governor,

CHARLES C. RICHARDS,
Secretary of the Territory.

A private dispatch from Los Angeles, California, brought the sad and unwelcome though not altogether unexpected information that Colonel H. C. Lett, of the Utah Commission, was dead. His demise occurred at that place Tuesday morning, March 27.

For a considerable time past he has been under the treatment of the most skillful physicians of this and Eastern cities. Originally his illness was caused by a stomach trouble which developed into numerous complications and disorders that would not yield to the science of medicine. When it was thought some time ago that he was about to cross the threshold of death he was to the great gratification and joy of his relatives and friends nursed back to partial health but he was very weak and continued to be so. With a view to regaining his strength, he determined to go to the coast and on Saturday night last left for Los Angeles. The trip, however, had a fatal termination much to the sorrow and regret of a legion of friends in Utah and elsewhere.

Colonel Lett and his son Will went into the real estate business in this city soon after their arrival in 1889, and during the boom days made a good deal of money. The deceased was recognized as a very clever and conservative business man and a superior financier. The deceased was elected president of the Real Estate Exchange and presided over that body with signal ability and success until he retired. He was born near Cleveland, Ohio, in 1834. When but fifteen years of age he removed to Illinois and young as he was at once commenced teaching school. He loved the school room and the work he did therein. He continued in this line of business for several years but finally abandoned it for business of a commercial character.

It is the fifties he left Illinois for Kansas and was engaged in merchandising when the war broke out. The terrible civil strife of those days had barely begun when the young man settled in Nebraska. While a resident of the State of Shallow Water he was elected president of the Midland Pacific and the Brownsville, Kearney & Pacific railroads. These positions he held with credit to himself and the companies he represented.

Subsequently Mr. Lett moved to Lincoln, then to Denver, where he acted as superintendent of the stone department of the Union Pacific for six years. From Denver he came to Salt Lake, where he was soon prominent in political and business circles. He served as member of the board of education and was a useful member of the chamber of commerce.

He was one of the first to identify himself with the division movement on political lines. In national politics he was an ardent and enthusiastic Democrat.

In 1892 he ran for Mayor of Salt Lake on the Democratic ticket, but like Heber M. Wells, the Republican nominee, was defeated by Judge Baskin, the Liberal candidate.

Last year he was a candidate for Governor of Utah, and it was thought at one time that he would be appointed to that position by President Cleveland. As is well known, however, that office went to the Hon. C. W. West, while the former was appointed a member of the Utah Commission. He leaves a son and two daughters.

THE FUTURE FARMS.

V.

NOTE 1.—It is a historic fact that farmers and other producing parts of commonwealths in the past could not protect themselves in their equal rights as citizens, nor extricate themselves from imposed despotism, but were driven to the wall by the consuming class into political disability and degradation, and into poverty and serfdom; reverberating through millenniums in floods of blood and tears, by the fall and ruin of almost all nations hitherto known in history.

The question now is, "Shall this downfall, through Cæsarism, again be repeated in the republic of the United States of America, or shall it lead all mankind in the victory of brotherhood over tyranny?"

Whenever a republic rises up, it is, next to Providence, done by the producing class of the people in order to maintain equal rights for all members of the commonwealth. The consumers never build up republics; in their very instincts they are and represent anti-republicanism. But whenever the consuming class became strong enough to successfully muster its rapacious legions, it would destroy the republic and give way to the rule of despotism.

In a republican commonwealth, where its constitution and laws are yet founded and faithfully executed according to the golden rule of our great Master, despotism and tyranny, with their dark and horrible rule, must give way for the day-dawn of brotherhood. If brotherhood and equal rights shall rule our republic, it will stand; if not, it will fall, like its predecessors.

Therefore, as we have reason to believe, all conspiracies to the contrary notwithstanding, our grand Republic will stand. Division of labor, and its fruits, founded on the equality of the "golden rule," will give shape to "the future farm." The tiller of the soil shall be the owner thereof, making an honest living in the sweat of his brow and by the work of his own hands.

NOTE 2.—The mischief causing our national financial trouble amongst the farmers (as well as other parts of the people) lies in the unequal division of the fruits of labor. The decree in Holy writ, that "the idler shall not eat the bread of the laborer," is trampled under foot; and the penalty is that the idler, after having been fed by the bread of the laborer, turns around and enslaves the latter.

This is one of the main parts of the world's present sad and gloomy history in a nutshell.

The necessary surveillance by the people over the idler should consist in timely training and education of the citizens in making an honest living by the work of their own hands. If this education be neglected, history teaches us that the idler will conspire against the welfare of the state, and establish Cæsarism. The Grecian ostracism was established to guard against this oft-repeated mischief. Cæsarism is diametrically opposed to "the golden rule." Cæsarism is a social, political and ethic religious deformity, spreading ruin in its path wherever it goes. The program of Cæsarism is as it always has been: get possession of the fruits of labor by any means, withdraw advancement and independence from the producer; impoverish, degrade, subdue and disfranchise the laborer, mainly the tillers of the soil; unfit him for citizenship in the republic, and then proclaim the monarchy.

In the above are contained some of the forces which, as shown up in history, have caused untold sufferings and bloodshed, revolution and war, under which nations have groaned and gone to ruin, never to rise any more, because the teachings and discipline of our great Master were overridden and rejected.

General Cincinnatus was taken from the plow and placed as commander in chief over the Roman armies. But he had slaves (prisoners of war), which in his case was an institution to create and accommodate aristocracy, and which, if tolerated in a republic, will prove anti-republican.

The future farmer, in order to maintain necessary political and social power, must rise to a high grade of efficiency in his most noble industry; he must be an apt student and a scholar, a scientific farmer, and know how to take full advantage of the opportunities in nature's productions, as well as his social and political positions. He should be an ideal citizen of the republic, possessing equal aptitude with all branches of society, in the acquirements of advanced citizenship. It should be familiar to him to fill his place in the professor's studio, as well as with the plow, and in all places on his farm, as well as when called to do public duties to the republic.

It must absolutely be the farmer's duty and ambition, as a citizen of this great republic, to see to it, as far as his power and influence may reach, that labor must be honored; if not, he knows it is a charge against the stability of the republic. The traditional and of-long-standing deformity of aristocracy in any shape or form, feudal tenantry, serfdom or otherwise, must be swept away and kept out of the republic. As soon as inequality (political, etc.) takes the upper hand, society will wane into lord and serf, monarchy, despotism and degradation.

Without high social and industrial efficiency the farmer can not sustain himself on equal footing with the citizen in general. He can not educate his children up to this common standard of a republican citizen. His position must be equal with any part of the people, and follow in the footsteps of his fathers of the republic. In fact, a republic can not obtain or be stable without advanced farmers, industrialists and producers. Yes, it is an absolute necessity for the endurance of our Republic.

Therefore, the future farmer must enjoy the fruits of his own labor in order to fully sustain the Republic; and the farmer can not afford to be under any obligation to feed and nourish an aristocracy or a monarchy. If he does he will not alone be enslaved, but the Republic will be obliterated.

NOTE 3.—In analyzing the division of the fruits of labor we find that it is not at present in a state of harmony with the constitution; but "while the fittest (?) are scrambling for the upper hand in the commonwealth's fruit of labor—division, the less fortunate, must subsist on the leavings."

National labor division, and the division of the fruits of that labor, to say the least, are promiscuous. So far the Republic is sinking. The ideal state is yet in the future. The present waste of labor, through unnecessary frictions of many kinds, are enormous and incalculable. And to save this waste—where is the model state to go by, in order to approach the ideal commonwealth? How is the "deal" of labor to be made? All kinds of man's communism have failed. If the statesman was found who could say or know "how," then where is the power, authority or influence that can execute it?

The ideal commonwealth could not be expected to grow out of the present conditions altogether; but through a continued reform after an improved pattern. If aristocracy or despotism at present puts on ever so moderate, conservative and liberal aprons, if its cunning surpasses all that money can buy, and bought intelligence can invent, in order to hide greedy and wicked schemes lurking beneath, it is nevertheless in opposition to "the golden rule," and, if tolerated, will accept, favor and hasten our national ruin.

But, touching the present, how did it come to pass that those monstrous inequalities of labor and division of fruits of labor, which are now prevalent in our Republic, could be tolerated by the people? How did it come to pass that those perpetrators dare do it in the open sight of the nation? How is it that this freebootery has gained such an amazing power within the last thirty years particularly, and that those crimes are committed unpunished?

Is it because the people did not know much about national financeering, and its wide scope for fraud. And because those who did know, had their hands in the spoils? But as the people now are receiving financial education, it may be expected that intrusions of the past on the equal rights of the people will meet with necessary remedial legislation.

Through analyzing the conditions of the people, it is easily found that in the division of labor, and the division of the fruits thereof, we are a long way from an ideal community, or from submission to the golden rule; but that financial distress, poverty and suffering, on the above account, are rampant in our Republic, enough to move the philanthropist to speedy and effective action.

The application of the healing remedy should not be delayed. It should be remembered that when through almost unendurable sufferings an outraged people are moved to madness, retribution may make speedy execution. And when it begins to run over its obstructions, it will spread ruin in its way. Despotism while in power is necessarily and always shortsighted in regard to its own position before the people. It does not appear to see the breakers ahead or the clouds gathering. It blindly confides in a power it has not got, and does not realize the precipice towards which it is steadily hastening.

In this connection is significant the utterance of a certain money-king when some opinions of the people against him were presented to his majesty of gigantic steals; he answered "the people be d—d." This is characteristic of the fictitious heights of imaginary power the treacherous moloch can induce people to ascend to.

NOTE 4.—If economy ruled the division of labor and its fruits, and the talents of the people were applied to the best advantage of the state, it would require a state of advancement to which we as yet have not reached; but it nevertheless is the ideal object of economy. This should be a searching object of ideal government, that every talent were subjected, not alone to the best individual advantage but also to that of the state. In this connection it should be remembered that idlers are not born with this degrading inclination, but the state is responsible for this deformity of mankind.

At the present time, probably the best that can be done is to make every convenient division of the state responsible for it that no member is without the privilege of occupation and opportunity to earn his bread by the work of his own hands. Where individuals are found with inclination to make a living without work, the keen eye of surveillance should watch out for them and put them to work; else mischief will be at work; because no statute of discipline from Holy Writ can be disregarded without serious consequences; and the "idler shall not eat the bread of the laborer." It is especially enjoined on the people that they must labor with their own hands "that there be no idolatry nor wickedness practiced." Doctrine and Covenants; page 208, verse 39.

Whenever the time shall have come that brotherhood and the golden rule shall be accepted by the people in the government of our republic, it will not be a difficult matter to divide the labor and the fruits thereof, according to the principles of both economy and brotherhood.

NOTE 5.—Rated at equal valuation of labor and its fruit, the people of the West produce yearly about 15 per cent more than they consume. Hence in less than seven years they would double the value of their possessions if they made exchanges on equal terms in what they buy. That will say: if the people in their exchanges of values with other parts of the world made those exchanges on equal terms—the fruits for a farmer's day's labor, for the fruits of a day's labor of those the farmer exchanges with—the farmer under such equal commercial conditions would double the value of his possessions in less than seven years.

But instead of this doubling of the value of his property in less than seven years, since the seventies the people have retrograded in property value to the extent of at least one half since, or within, the mentioned time. How is this financial decline accomplished? It has been and is done by an extensive conspiracy, by capital against labor; by (1) demonetization of silver in 1873, thereby (2) contraction of the money circulation over 50 per cent; (3) increasing the value of gold in the hands of the money kings about 50 per cent, thereby (4) the consequent decrease in the price of farms and farming products about 50 per cent; and (5) causing the necessity for farmers to borrow money from the money kings by mortgaging their farms to make ends meet. And thus a financial decline has gone on for the last twenty years.

By this successful conspiracy, concocted by the money-kings, the value of farmer's production was reduced more than 50 per cent, as well as farming property. Besides: neighbor will charge neighbor, in exchange for work, the value of from 100 to 1000 day's work of the laborers, for one day's work rendered to farmers in the precinct, the county, the state and the United States of all grades of office holders, as well as private operators, doctors, lawyers, merchants, bankers, etc., compared with the farmer's average income for his day's work.

NOTE 6. Overproduction? It has been asserted by financial fraternities that it was overproduction of agricultural industries and others that had caused the 50 per cent fall in the price of farming produce, and consequent poverty. If friend Paganini could be raised from the dead, and he could be induced to compose an overture, descriptive and representing the conspiracy of the demons who invented Caesarism and its concomitants for the enslaving of man, he would first be told the facts of the whole concoction of devilry, commencing with overproduction, being the cause of poverty. No doubt that Paganini, when he saw the point, would, through his violin, even make the devils laugh. Most probably the conspirators have at some time heard whisperings about great abundance of gold, and nevertheless and notwithstanding their overproduction of money in their own coffers, they suffered starvation and death, such things may come out true.

The financial axiom is simply that the more fruits the same amount of labor will produce, the greater is its effect toward individual and general prosperity.

The greatest average overproduction of farming in one of ten years, within known history, has not exceeded the providential three per cent, except the seven years overproduction in Egypt under the rule of Joseph the Israelite.

The foolish assertion about overproduction appears to have been fabricated for the purpose of putting an apron on the usurer's capital—contraction, and consequent low prices on productions and labor—and is a cunning and corrupt scheme evolved from a subsidized press under money monopoly auspices.

The poisonous effects of extra privileged classes are nationally as ruinous in the line of money-aristocracy as any other, and will if possible retard and partly destroy our agricultural and manufacturing progress, and if possible our agricultural and technical colleges and experimental stations; all on account of too low-priced labor and productions to make it possible for the producers to acquire advanced education in measures of economy; and low-priced labor will sustain the feudal aristocratic program of Caesarism: that producers shall only acquire education enough to fill the place of well qualified servility.

It has been asserted also by Caesarism in order to throw a shade on republicanism and rule of the people, that advancement in high intelligence could not take place under democratic rule, because it obstructed concentration of capital and favored its division more equally amongst the people; and therefore the financial inability of those who sustain themselves and family by the common manual labor of their own hands could not afford to acquire more than a district school education; and wherefore republics could not produce stars, talents and advanced measures above mediocrity. And, in toto, democracy promotes stagnation. Well-qualified servility, defined according to the program above, is by well developed muscles to be able to do much hard manual labor in favor of the master; and unobstructed by any kind of mental education, other than what will tend to facilitate muscle ability.

But in holy writ, Doctrine & Covenants, page 208, v. 39, it is set as a rule for man: "Let them labor with their own hands, that there be no idolatry nor wickedness practiced." And it is also said in holy writ, Doctrine & Covenants, page 196, v. 20, "It is not given that one man should possess that which is above another; wherefore the world lieth in sin."

Therefore, a qualified citizen of a republic cannot descend to the degrading condition of a tenant or a serf under the rule of Caesarism.

NOTE 7. The conspiracy. If it should be doubted that a broad conspiracy for the overthrow of our republic, and the enslavement of the people, under the rule of Caesarism, is concocted, and so far successfully inwoven in our social, political, financial and commercial fabric, it can be proven satisfactorily nevertheless by incontrovertible evidence, that such a conspiracy has been at work for more than 20 years and is today a very formidable enemy to our republic.

A summing up of the outward signs, and hidden doings growing out to the surface of a conspiracy against our republic and freedom of our people may be timely in an article like this, "on the division of labor and the division of the fruits thereof," with special regard to "the future farm."

a It was openly avowed as a state necessity, about 20 years ago, that this republic be put under six years' dictatorship.

b The secretive financial dexterity by which the demonetization of silver in 1873 was wickedly and underhandedly manipulated through congress showed that there were not a few hands at work, in secret conclaves, to carry out their sweet purpose.

c The well digested planning and disposition of the public domain to large holdings, prove conclusively that aristocratic feudalism were at the bottom, working out an almost ripened plan of Caesarism.

d The exceeding secrecy of their plutocratic councils shows that they well know the necessity of such secrecy to facilitate execution of their anti-republican dark schemes.

e The systematic and stubborn efforts to contract and concentrate capital, to increase the indebtedness of the producer, and induce farmers and producers to engage in obligations financially, in order to subdue, enslave and educate the producer for subjection, disqualify him for citizenship, disfranchise him, and prepare for monarchy.

f And finally (without presenting other points for the same nefarious purpose) the consecutive unity of action in our legislative bodies, mainly congress, by that certain class, to favor legislation on the above presented points.

These points and many others might be enlarged upon; but let us touch only a few more: (1) Contraction of the currency; (2) Consequent increase of its value; (3) Its accumulation in the hands of the creditor-class; (4) Impoverishing the debtor-class; (5) By increasing the purchasing power of the money in the hands of the creditor-class; (6) Lowering the price of labor and producer in the hands of the debtor-class; (7) By enforced indebtedness through usury, bringing the debtor-class down to bankruptcy, and in this way impoverish, humiliate, degrade and enslave the wealth-earners, voters and citizens of the republic; impoverish all grades of wealth-earners and make them pliable under the hand of the oppressor; degrade and demoralize the producing people, enough to humiliate them; then enslave them and put them under serfdom, and by financial jugglery concentrate the property and money power in the hands of a growing aristocracy. Then, when the producers are enslaved, degraded and unfitted for citizenship in our Republic, disfranchise them and proclaim the monarchy. Then repeat the horrible events of the dark ages, and let Cæsarism hold high carnival.

That is approximately and in short the character and outlines of the conspiracy against our Republic.

NOTE 8. Summing up on protection of farming:

1. It is necessary for the endurance of republics that the golden rule must be inwoven in its institutions.

2. High education and practical efficiency in the ranks of the wealth-earners, is indispensable to the stability and success of republics.

3. Republics cannot remain permanent under the pressure of aristocracy and concentration of capital in the hands of that class.

4. Labor, manual and mental, must be practiced and thoroughly honored throughout the whole people of the republic. They must earn their bread by the work of their own hands, and by the sweat of their own brow. If not, the republic cannot endure; and we repeat here from holy writ, Doctrine & Covenants 208, v. 39. it is said: "Let them labor with their own hands, that there be no idolatry nor wickedness practiced." also: Doctrine & Covenants 167, v. 20: "It is not given that one man should possess that which is above another; wherefore the world lieth in sin."

5. "The idler shall not eat the bread of the laborer." If this holy and imperative demand is not thoroughly acquiesced in, and increasing vigilant surveillance keep an open eye to guard against its mischief, it will endanger the republic as now.

6. Citizen-farmers in a republic must labor with their own hands, and not create tenantry, serfdom and degrading dependency. They must acquire education sufficient to enable them to make a good living for themselves and families in order to raise and educate their children to a full standard of efficient citizenship. A farmer of the republic must be able to worthily represent his industry and his country in any position or responsibility the nation may call on him to fill.

It may safely be set down as a maxim that without highly educated farmers and industrialists generally, comprising the whole producing people, "republics will not hold out."

NOTE 9. Conclusion. The golden rule, as here often referred to, demands equality in temporal conditions. But as the varied opportunities and abilities to produce and acquire may continually lead to inequality, an economic equity-regulator is a necessity in republics, in the form of a kind of income tax, on what has been called surplus property under the prospective Mormon Church discipline, in order to guarantee a standing and permanent approximate equality of citizens in the republic, and with an overruling regard to economy. A superior ability to promote public progress shall not be checked in the effort to advance national prosperity; talent and ability must be appreciated, both a public and individual benefaction, else both national and individual welfare will suffer. The cause of equity is in no wise incompatible with the temporal welfare of the republic. Doctrine & Covenants 375-68.

a Competition reveals the comparative qualities of productive ability.

b State-economy should hold the balance-wheel of general interest on the one side and individual ability and necessity on the other.

c Every responsible citizen ethically is under the responsibility to properly hold his part of the stewardship that the state, by necessity, divides out to all its members.

d Citizens proving themselves intellectually incapable to be their own masters, or to hold their own franchise or stewardship, are dangerous invitations to serfdom, and should be special objects of charity.

e Individual economic responsibility to the state is an obvious necessity, as the citizen as such holds a part of its welfare in his own hands.

f What today rules the promiscuous division of labor is, in the main, individual inclination and necessity, without regard to the golden rule.

g The illegitimate hoarding of capital and the circulating medium and immense acquisitions of realities in value, through usury, doubled in the hands of creditors in about seven years, may necessitate a renewal (in principle) of the Mosaic seven years release (Deuteronomy 15), or else revolution and confiscation may become a financial necessity in order to avoid terrible national upheavals.

h What should rule the division of labor, and the fruits thereof (here, to some extent put down in principle) seems too innumerable to mention here in detail. It is many times repeated in history that through a selfish disposition and nature "of almost all men" (Doctrine & Covenants page 424, v. 39) a continued vigilant watchcare is needed to preserve the liberty and equal rights of the people.

NOTE 10. For the benefit of a certain class of statesmen, we will add a few lines in closing this article. They are afraid of anarchy. They think it is increasing under the rule of our republic. They have a more or less faint hope that under the rule of monarchy it might be averted.

These statesmen do not reach to the true philosophy of cause and effect. They see in nature that in the organic creation every kind produces in its own likeness. They are not aware that the genius of our Republic acts on its people like certain very efficient medicines which force the evils in the body out to the surface, where the doctor can effect a cure. And while in the monarchy these statesmen did not see the anarchy at work, nevertheless it was there working at the vitals without a chance of cure, creating the chronic disease inherent in monarchy that is moral consumption.

These statesmen have as yet only to a limited extent discovered the effects of both rule and misrule. Anarchy can be born only of its own kind. It may change its appearance, but it was there and permitted by misrule to grow to its full stature, else it could not have produced of its own likeness. Maybe in the first instance the anarchists were the rulers who incubated anarchism, under the guise of government, and which in the next instance broke out amongst what the rulers would call the mob, revealing that misrule hath borne its fruit.

The destiny of mankind is advancement and progress towards continued betterment, and the destiny of our selected Republic is to endure and progress in all the ideal prospects that ever was hoped for by the true nobility of mankind.

In the ripening evolutions of events, the fittest will avoid the disasters and whirlpools of contending antagonism. The noblest aspirations of patriotism will be brought to bear in order to reach the goal of all true statesmanship, and reform all selfishness adverse to general prosperity.

CHURCH THEOLOGY CLASS.

The class met at the usual time and place, over 1,200 students assembling. Leaflet No. 17 was distributed at the door. Opening prayer was offered by Elder Madsen. After the consideration of several incidental questions Dr. J. E. Talmage proceeded with the study of the tenth article of faith, the first part of which reads: We believe in the literal gathering of Israel, and in the restoration of the Ten Tribes. "Who are Israel?" was the question that first received attention. They are the posterity of Abraham through Isaac and Jacob, with each or whom the Lord covenanted that through their posterity should all nations of the earth be blessed. By divine authority Jacob was named "Israel," which means "a prince of God." His descendants were known as the children of Israel or as Israelites. The doctor traced their history to the time of the division into the kingdom of Judah and that of Israel.

He then took up the dispersion of Israel, which must naturally precede the gathering. Through prophecy it had long been foretold that Israel should be scattered. It was shown how for purposes of trade and commerce the Israelites spread, while multitudes were carried into slavery. About 721 B. C., the kingdom of Israel was taken into captivity by Assyrians. These tribes afterwards made their way to the north. The supposed course of their journey as recorded by the Prophet Ezra, was traced and it was explained that of such a large people, many colonies might have been left behind, through disaffection, weariness and inability to follow. The subject will be concluded at the next session in connection with the gathering. Closing prayer was offered by Elder Winberg.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

WASHINGTON, March 20. — Chief Hase of the secret service treasury department said today that so far as he knew there was nothing in the story telegraphed from Omaha that several secret service agents are working to unearth a bogus mint, which it is alleged has turned half a million silver dollars.

WHARTON, Tenn., March 20.—H. G. Bodin, a wealthy planter, last year purchased several bodies of land in Malagora county. On this land negroes imported from Alabama were colonized. Failing to do their work Bodin reprimanded them. Yesterday a mob of fifty negroes went to his house and shot him to death. There is every indication that the jail will be stormed and the assassins taken out and lynched.

TURIN, March 20.—Louis Kossuth died at 10:55 o'clock this evening. Kossuth's end was extremely painful. He showed signs of consciousness until the last. He expired in the arms of his son and died pressing the hand of the Hungarian Deputy Karolyi. The members of his family and a few intimate friends stood around the bedside of the expiring patriot.

LONDON, March 20.—An appeal has been issued for the purpose of raising a fund of £50,000 in order to celebrate the jubilee of the Salvation Army. In connection with this jubilee, General Booth proposes to inaugurate a four months' Salvation Army campaign in the United States next autumn. The general also proposes an international Salvation Army congress in June and expeditions to Japan, Java and Demerara.

ROSEHILL, Iowa, March 20. — The bodies of John Reed, 20 years, and Etta Shaw, 19, were found last evening hanging to the limb of a tree, the couple having committed suicide. No cause is known for the act. They were both members of respected families.

DENVER, March 20.—Denver society is discussing a scandal similar to the famous Breckinridge-Pollard trial. The principal actor in the local affair, according to the Rocky Mountain News, is H. E. Sims, a member of the ninth general assembly from Arapahoe county. Sims has for some time been engaged to be married to a daughter of a prominent Capitol hill family and the date of the wedding has been set for March 19. After deceiving the girl, Sims induced her to go to Pueblo on a visit and while there he married Miss Harriet London, a teacher in one of the city public schools and a most estimable lady. The couple are now in California on their bridal tour. It is understood the wife is unconscious of her husband's duplicity. The betrayed girl knew nothing of the secret marriage until her return home to prepare for her own wedding. It is feared the shock will be serious in its results.

OMAHA, Neb., March 21.—A message from Buffalo, Wyo., says: The storm here has assumed the proportions of one of the worst blizzards in the history of this section. It is feared that the ranges will be covered with cattle succumbing to the exposure of the blizzard, and the sheep owners are almost in despair. The recent warm weather makes the situation all the worse.

Thousands of cattle are known to be off their usual winter quarters and far from shelter of any kind. It will be impossible to save these from almost total destruction unless the blizzard breaks by noon.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., March 21.—Three thousand representative negroes from every part of Alabama were in attendance here today upon the state convention of negroes recently called to consider the question of emigration to Africa. It was the sense of the meeting that Africa being the natural home of the negro, those in this country should return to that continent as soon as possible, and establish there a great nation, such as the whites had established in America. It was agreed, however, as the white man had brought the negro to America, he ought to pay his fare back to their native land. Resolutions to that effect were passed.

LONDON, March 21.—Rev. Thomas Spurgeon was tonight elected pastor of the Tabernacle. No mention was made of the Rev. Arthur Pierson, the American minister, who was a candidate for the place.

INDIANAPOLIS, March 21.—Dr. J. A. Houser of this city announces that he is about to close negotiations with Ex-Queen Liliuokalani for a lecture tour of the United States. Mr. Houser wrote to the ex-queen six weeks ago offering to manage a tour for her, and he says the reply indicates that she will accept the proposition made.

"I have arranged for the queen to wear a crown on the stage, and she will present precisely the same appearance that she does at Honolulu."

ROME, March 21.—The pope has nominated Cardinal Rampoll, the papal secretary of state, to archdeacon of the Basilica of the Vatican in place of the late Cardinal Ricci Paracciana.

DETROIT, Mich., March 22.—W. J. H. Traynor, supreme president of the American Protective Association and publisher of the Patriotic American, today issued an official address to the order. He states that his travels in the West had convinced him "that the A. P. A. is a mighty force which no power on earth is potent enough to restrain, although the press, a large proportion of the Protestant clergy—to their shame or ignorance, let it be said—corrupt politicians and the priesthood have joined issue to suppress it."

The address exhorts persistent opposition to immigration as a primary source of financial panics and the "main avenue of priestly supremacy" and advocates taxation of all property, "ecclesiastical properties" included, public inspection of convents, and vigilant guarding of the franchise and the public schools against the inroads of foreignism and absolutism.

OMAHA, Neb., March 22.—Now it is a strike. The Union Pacific employees are uneasy and restive and there is an ugly look in the sky. They are not saying many words, but the few they use count for a good deal. Concessions they care for so far they have had none. All the conceding has been done by the men. Not a point has been given in by the company and wherever there was a difference of opinion it still exists, unless the men have receded from their position. This has had a very depressing effect on them.

There was a secret meeting of the men last night, at which Eugene V. Debs and others spoke in favor of discontinuing what they call a farce. Mr. Debs went over the present situation and likened it to the Northern Pacific affair, which ended at last by forcing the men to yield to just what the company's receivers wanted.

DENVER, Colo., March 22.—One of the most destructive and at the same time spectacular conflagrations ever seen in this city broke out at 6:15 p.m. in the recently finished six-story Champa building, on Champa street, between Fifteenth and Sixteenth streets, and threatened for a time to sweep the entire block.

The conflagration started in the rear basement of the Champa building among the furniture stock of Thomas Thompson & Co., from spontaneous combustion, and before the situation was realized the entire building of one hundred feet frontage was a mass of flames.

The St. James Hotel, one of the largest in the city, on Curtis street, back of the Champa building, caught fire, and the rear part was destroyed; also part of the hotel annex. The guests were gotten out without panic.

PITTSBURG, Pa., March 23.—The dynamite works of the Acme Powder company, near Hulton, was swept out of existence by an explosion this morning. Five persons, all in the building at the time, were killed. The buildings in the vicinity were wrecked and a brick block at Logan's ferry, one mile away, was badly damaged. The house was shaken and the windows shattered in all the surrounding town. The bodies of those killed were terribly mangled. Part of them were gathered up in a box. The following are the killed: Samuel, Mollie, Nellie and Sadie Remaley and Wm. L. Arthur. Arthur's house in the vicinity was completely wrecked and Mrs. Arthur badly injured.

There were ten thousand pounds of dynamite in the tulling.

WASHINGTON, March 23.—The Senate committee on public lands will probably soon take up Carey's bill granting the arid land states and territories a million acres each of public lands to be sold to settlers in lots of 160 acres each. The secretary of the interior endorses the bill and the commissioner of the general land office has written a letter in which he takes an advanced ground in favor of improvement of the arid regions by placing the work under the control of the various states. He says: "The building of irrigation works has been found to be very expensive, costing from $5 to $80 an acre. Now that the lands along the latter courses as a rule have been taken, the question arises, how can the lands difficult and expensive to irrigate be made available for settlement? The people of the states in which the arid lands are located would like to see the United States undertake the reclamation. This is certainly impracticable now and it is doubtful whether it will ever be otherwise. That additional legislation to induce the reclamation and settlement of the arid lands is necessary cannot be denied, and the entire acreage to be reserved under the bill, if all the states to which it is applicable should avail themselves of its provisions, would not be as great as each of the several states acquired under the swamp acts. Congress may well try the experiment here proposed. The work is too vast to be undertaken by the general government. The local interest under state control will stimulate results with far greater zeal and success. The principal proposition involving the reclamation and settlement by individuals in small holdings meets my strong approval, and this bill seems to me to present a full opportunity of a practical experiment and under proper safeguards. The United States retains title until the reclamation is accomplished and the land occupied by actual settlers."

The states and territories to which the bill will apply, if it should become law, are: Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

CHICAGO, March 23.—Thomas, alias "Buff" Higgins was hanged in jail here at noon for the murder of Peter McCooey, an old city employe, last September. Higgins and two pals planned to burglarize McCooey's house. Higgins entered while the others kept watch outside. McCooey was awakened by the noise, sat up in bed and was shot by Higgins without a word.

Shortly before the hanging Higgins expressed special gratification that he would not have to suffer death on the same scaffold with the assassin Prendergast, for whom he manifested the utmost aversion and contempt. He exhibited a most wonderful nerve throughout the trial and afterwards, and it did not desert him at the supreme moment. He made no remarks on the scaffold. He claimed to the last that he was the victim of police persecution and being sent to death on perjured testimony.

As the trap fell with a clatter, the prisoners in the adjoining corridors set up a shout, "Hang Prendergast; hang Prendergast!" and the little assassin covered further back into the cell, trembling and muttering imprecations.

ENTERPRISE, Kan., March 23.—A mass meeting of women has nominated a ticket composed entirely of women, and headed by the wife of ex-State Senator Kohler for mayor. They propose to purify the town politics.

NEW YORK, March 23.—In the police dragnet tonight was gathered a large crowd, who have been doing a thriving business in the city. The arrests were made on warrants obtained by the Society for the Enforcement of the Criminal Laws. In nearly every instance the police captured instruments, drugs and all the necessary appliances for carrying on the illegal business, which was conducted chiefly through advertisement. The arrests were made so promptly the prisoners had no chance to get "tipped off" through the usual channels. The charges made by these practitioners vary from $25 to $100, according to circumstances, social position, etc. At the house of one of the practitioners a horrible condition of affairs was revealed. Under the sink was the body of an infant, and in another place was the body of a still-born child. In one of the rooms was a young woman in charge of a servant. She was in a distressed condition, and the police procured for her a trained nurse and a police surgeon.

CHICAGO, March 23.—The decision which granted a new lease on life to Prendergast was made under the statutes in the criminal code, allowing a stay of execution in cases of capital punishment wherein it might be shown that the defendant has become insane after the date of his conviction. This statute, which had long since been forgotten, and which has never been enforced but once before in the history of the state, allowed the empaneling of a jury for the trial of such insane. Having admitted the right of trial, Judge Chetlain then decided that common justice demanded that the time of execution be postponed to a dignified and proper trial might ensue.

ROME, March 23.—The pope's encyclical letter addressed to the bishops of Poland, Russia, Austria and Prussia, was published here today. His holiness says, in brief, that the mission of papacy is not to teach anything against the power of princes or the utility of nations, but to provide for the prosperity of all.

The pope then recalls the agreement with Russia, by which the position of the clergy was immensely improved. This agreement was obtained through requests directly addressed to the czar. The encyclical proceeds to exhort the bishops to avoid any spirit of hostility to the civil authority.

Addressing the Catholics of Austria, the pope enjoins them to feel gratitude for the religious seal of the emperor, and concludes with urging the Poles in Prussia to trust to the emperor and to observe the laws.

LONDON, March 23.—A dispatch from Rome says France and Russia made every endeavor to prevent the publication of the encyclical.

DENVER, March 24.—The supreme court has sent the fire and police board case back to the district court.

The decision is in effect against the governor, as he had referred to it a question as to which board, that now in office or that appointed by him was the legal one. The court unanimously decided that the district court must decide, so the matter is left where it was a week ago when the governor called out the militia to seat his appointees.

The principal point in the decision is to the effect that the governor is greatly in error in supposing he was called on to enforce his removal of the old commissioners. As municipal officers in fact, he was no more called on to seat his appointees than in the seating of a councilman or city clerk. The governor declined to speak of the decision.

CANTON, O., March 25.—A heavy snowstorm set in before the details of the camp had been completed, and the tramps were huddled around roaring camp fires. About two-thirds of the men enlisted made the trip to this city.

The Massillon camp presented an odd sight early this morning. No fire was permitted in the big tent, but there was a heap of blazing logs outside. Every few moments the flaps of the tent were parted by a soldier of the commonweal, who visited the fire to drive away the chills. Soon he would hurry back, to burrow in the straw for another nap, and another would take his place. The hoboes in the party became known just before breakfast. They had no soap. They washed at the river brink, and the others carried water in pans and heated it over the fire. They burned straw and frolicked about like a troop of boys.

A bugle call to breakfast brought them together at the tent with a rush. The bill of fare comprised bread, coffee and raw meat. The latter was affixed to the end of sticks and roasted.

One troop of men ran away in a body after breakfast and boarded a passing freight train. Thirty of the commonwealers spent the night as lodgers at the Massillon police station. They comprised two entire groups, who could not be found when they were needed for picket duty, although they were on hand for breakfast.

At 8 o'clock Marshal Browne, otherwise "the unknown," summoned the men in camp together, and they were found to number eleven groups. They were organized into a commune. Smith drilled them for half an hour. He has aided several formalities of military discipline to the rules of the commonweal.

Two hours before the time for departure the tents were pulled down and preparations made for the trip. A diversion was caused by a bulletin from Coxiana, announcing a steamer had just passed that point laden with recruits from Canton. The steamer made the trip of nine miles in two and a half hours, but only a few men from Canton were enrolled.

The start from Massillon resembled the removal of an old time county circus more than anything else. There was no goddess of peace in the procession, as Coxey intended, his divorced wife refusing to permit her daughter to go with the army in that capacity. Coxey's son, Joseph, a boy of 16, was mounted on a blooded stallion from the stock farm, and he wore a military uniform. Browne and the other officials were similarly mounted, while the "general" rode in a phaeton behind one of his favorite horses. Mrs. Coxey and her 3-year-old son rode in a buggy. The rank and file of the army brought up the rear on foot, following the band wagon, which very much resembled a gypsy traveling conveyance.

NEW YORK, March 25.—The five men and ten women whom the police arrested last night for criminal malpractice were arraigned in the Yorkville police court today. The charge against Mrs. Eliza Schroeder, in whose house the corpses of two infants were found, was changed from malpractice to manslaughter, and her bond fixed at $10,000. Three of the doctors were held in $2,500 each, this being a second offense in each case, and the others put under bonds of $1,500.

NEW YORK, March 25.—Professor Richard L. Garner, whose efforts to learn the language which he avows belongs to the gorilla and chimpanzee, have earned for him the pseudonym of the "monkey man," returned from his investigations in Africa on the Etruria today. The professor said tonight that his journey had been an absolute success.

After having selected a suitable spot for observation he erected a cage consisting of a network of steel rods five-sixteenths of an inch thick.

His effects consisted of household utensils, two revolvers, one magazine rifle, one air-gun and hollow arrows, filled with prussic acid, which he discharged with blow guns.

"The cage stood on a foundation three or four feet from the ground. I had no phonograph, as the one ordered from Edison on May 3, 1893, never reached me. I had the invoice and was very much disappointed at not receiving it, as it would have aided me very materially in my experiments. Unfortunately my photographic apparatus failed to work also.

"My position was such that the gorillas would come very close, and I could sit calmly and study every detail of movement and expression.

"I have learned not more than six or eight words of the chimpanzee language. These I cannot give you, for they are not amenable to any known etymology or orthography. I cannot pronounce them. If I could I would be willing to give them to you. I think there are about forty or fifty words or utterances in their language.

"The gorilla certainly has marital relations, but no ceremony. I learned from the natives that they are polygamists. However, I am quite satisfied they keep the same female as a wife for many years. I have seen groups of three or four, in which are always one male only. It is very clear to me that they have a patriarchal form of government. I was assured by a man whom I believe to be truthful, that he had seen a gorilla sitting on the ground eating plantains, which were brought by other male gorillas to his supposed majesty, after being gathered by females. The only thing which inclines me to doubt the story is the fact that the gorilla rarely eats the plantain itself, but lives on the meat of the plantain tree, which it tears to pieces.

"The gorillas are at full maturity when they reach the age of eight or ten years. They do not build houses, and are not carnivorous but omnivorous. Their vocal organs are almost exactly like those of men. They are not nearly so vicious as described. When they would approach my cage they would take one peep and turn away wholly unconcerned. The natives told me if I blackened my face they might attack me. I had nine attacks of fever. The natives, like myself, are firmly convinced the gorilla and chimpanzee tribes have a language.

"I brought back to London with me two chimpanzees. They died soon after their debut into civilization. I preserved their skins and skulls. I also brought the vocal organs of four chimpanzees and three gorillas and the brain of one gorilla. The brain of the chimpanzee which died in London was sent to Oxford at the request of the university, where it will be examined and an official report rendered."

CANNES, March 25.—An immense crowd gathered here today to witness a balloon ascension by the aeronaut, Wilton, who is well known in America. No car was attached to the balloon and Wilton ascended, hanging to a rope. When 1,500 feet high the balloon was caught in a current of air that carried it rapidly seaward. For some unexplainable reason the aeronaut let go the rope from which he was dangl-ing, and his body shot downward into the sea with frightful velocity. His dead body was recovered shortly afterwards.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 26.—A bill introduced in the House by Delegate Rawlins, of Utah, provides for the allotments of lands to the southern Utes in their present reservations; for the disapproval of the agreement for their removal to Utah, made on November 13, 1888, and for the opening of unallotted lands for settlement.

Mr. Rawlins has also introduced a bill providing for the removal of the Uncompahgre Indians from their reservations in Utah to Colorado and the allotments of lands to the Indians out of the agricultural lands in that state.

WASHINGTON, March 26.—The fatal termination of the illness of United States Senator Alfred Holt Colquitt, Georgia, which has been anticipated any moment for several days, came early this morning. As the end approached the breathing became labored; but he lapsed into unconsciousness and suffered no pain.

LOUISVILLE, O., March 26.—But seventy-two of Coxe's commonwealers had the courage to march away from Canton this evening in the face of the wintry blast that was blowing at the time set for the start. The band deserted at that point also and took much of the spirit out of the soldiers.

The march from Canton to this place, through two inches of snow and in a temperature twenty degrees above zero, was anything but a pleasant experience for the thinly clad wanderers, who had imagined the entire trip to Washington would be a sort of springtime frolic. Fifty tramps were picked up between Canton and this place, and when the army went into camp it numbered 112 men, outside of the officers. They claimed enlistments of 250. Much excitement was caused today by the announcement that three of the tramps had robbed a man of a watch and $10. This was the first attempt at lawlessness, but no arrests were made.

DENVER, Colo., March 26.—General Hamilton's Denver contingent of Coxe's army will have to walk out of town unless they pay their fares. It was announced at last night's meeting that the Santa Fe would be called upon to furnish a train for the pilgrims.

At the Santa Fe office it was said today that the company had refused to furnish a train to the California division of the army and would undoubtedly repeat its refusal should the Denver contingent make its promised demand. The other roads will also decline to give free transportation.

WASHINGTON, March 26.—The House adjourned today after brief session, on account of the death of Senator Colquitt.

On motion of Rawlins, Utah, the bill granting a tract of sixty acres in the Fort Douglas military reservation to the Territory of Utah for university purposes, was passed.

The amount of standard silver dollars shipped from the sub-treasury and the mints during the last week was $379,175. The shipments of fractional silver from the 1st of March to the 24th aggregated $506,073.

There are said to be strong probabilities that a new international monetary conference will be called at the invitation of Mexico. There is a well founded belief that it will take place next autumn.

NEW YORK, March 26.—A large iceberg 600 feet long, about 200 feet wide and over twice as high as the mastsheads of the big French liner La Touraine, which came in yesterday, was what the early watch saw about two miles ahead on the evening of March 20th. Orders were given to change the course of the vessel, so as to avoid a collision. The sudden changing of the steamer's course soon brought many of the passengers on deck. They were enjoying it as only those can who have never seen an iceberg at sea, when suddenly another berg was discovered, not more than a mile away on the steamer's starboard bow. It was about 50 feet high and possibly 200 feet long.

The discovery an hour after of an immense field of ice, covering hundreds of acres, directly in front of the ship almost caused a panic. By this time every passenger on board who was not physically incapacitated was on deck. The sudden stopping of the engines and hastily spoken orders caused many of the more timid ones to be badly frightened. The ship was almost penned in by icebergs. All during the night of March 21st and part of the next day, the big ship remained motionless.

CHICAGO, March 26.—The state's attorneys will tomorrow request a continuance in the Prendergast case for ten days. It will be asked on the ground that the state's attorney is not financially able to go on with the case at once. It is said Mr. Trude, who represented the Harrison family, now believes Prendergast insane and will not appear in the new trial.

NEW YORK, March 26.—A special to the World from Panama says: There is unusual activity in Colon. The canal palace and the residences are being brightened with paint and upholstery and many barges and launches are arriving. M. Bartissol, the French engineer, and other important personages are expected. There is much surmise in the meaning of it all; whether it is preliminary to resumption of work on the canal cannot be ascertained. There is continued activity in preparing the plan.

NEW YORK, March 26.—Andrew Scott Jamieson, the Gravesend constable, convicted last week of perjury, was today sentenced in the court of Oyer and Terminer in Brooklyn to eighteen months in the penitentiary.

LONDON, March 26.—The correspondent at Berlin of the Standard says that confidential communications have recently been exchanged between the leading European powers on the question of united action for the suppression of anarchism. It is believed that the results will be the holding of an international conference to discuss and adopt measures to put down the scourge of anarchy.

LONDON, March 27.—The Brazilian minister has received the following from Rio: There is absolutely no truth in the statement that prisoners have been executed without trial. The recent decree only referred to military tribunals and crimes and outrages connected with the revolution and committed at Rio and certain other points of Brazilian territory.

FROM THE FRIENDLY ISLANDS.

MU'A, TONGATABU, TONGA,
February 12, 1894.

Some time has passed since you have heard from the Friendly Islands, and thinking your many readers who are interested in missionary labors, among whom we have friends that time will not permit us writing personally to, would desire to learn something further, I take this opportunity of writing you and hope you will deem these lines worthy of space in your paper.

For the past few months we have had very hot weather. At Christmas and two or three weeks following, it was almost suffocating. What little wind there was came from the north, and while it was very damp, often bringing with it showers of rain, it was exceedingly warm and oppressive. It was the most sultry weather we have had since landing here in July, 1891. There were also heavy rains, such as we read about in New Zealand, during the latter part of January and the first week of the present month; but at this writing the regular southeast trade wind is again blowing and we hope for some good weather, so that traveling will not be so disagreeable.

Since you last heard from us, there has been considerable change in government officers, the most important of which was the resignation of Hon. J. U. Tukuaho and the appointment of a man from Vava'u to succeed him. This was done by the young king, who became dissatisfied with the management of affairs and thought a change would be for the better; but the people of Tongatabu are not well satisfied with what has been done. The new premier, however, is endeavoring to show himself as being in favor of improvement, by putting in force (in native fashion, which, by the way, is haphazard style) the sanitary clause of the law. This of course makes him unpopular among some classes, and I do not think it brings him much applause from the "whites" living here. I speak from my own way of thinking and not from what I have heard others say. While I am in favor of good laws and a strict enforcement of the same, so the people will receive all the benefits of cleanliness, peace and good order, I do not like to see a mock made of everything in that direction so that instead of it being a benefit to the people it proves a disadvantage. For example, the doorway of every home must be swept and cleaned every month, but the inside of the houses are not cleaned from year to year; and the smell of some of them is very repulsive indeed. The filth remains inside the house, being covered from time to time by a new coconut-leaf carpet. Thus decaying matter is left in the sleeping rooms to breed disease. No wonder the rate of decreasement is very heavy among the Tongans.

Again, if one person tears the clothing of another, whether with evil intent or not, he may be fined fifty dollars and imprisoned three months; but a man can whip his wife because she will not roll his cigarettes for him, and kick her out into the street, and the law does not handle him; the people applaud him.

There are those who think they merit great praise for introducing civilization (so called) and Christianity (false), and framing laws for the natives to be governed by, but from all I can learn the people are in a much worse condition than they were fifty years ago. Sexual sins are not curtailed in the least, and where nature took its course formerly, infamous crimes are practiced now.

Modern alleged Christianity has been among this people for many years, and the result is as described. The Savior said, "Ye shall know them by their fruits," etc. In viewing the situation of the natives the only conclusion we can come to is that the tree which was planted many years ago and which is producing much fruit at present, is not "a good tree," for "the fruit is evil." It is high time the true Gospel was introduced among the natives and the precious truths that were advocated by the Apostles of old taught them, to prevent utter destruction.

Our progress seems to be rather slow, but we are working to the best of our knowledge for the advancement of the work of the Lord. We hold two meetings every Sabbath here in Mu'a, which, by the way, are not always well attended. Then we travel from village to village on this island, holding meetings wherever we can, and testifying to the truth of the Gospel to all with whom we come in contact.

The school which has now been established for some time, is proving to be a success and we have the pleasure of enrolling a few more names occasionally. The members are all males, but we hope to be able to get a class of little girls as soon as the sisters become a little more familiar with the native language, and have them taught sewing, knitting, etc., as well as book learning and Gospel principles.

For some three months Sister Luella R. Adams has been afflicted with some kind of a disease in her feet and she is still unable to walk; her appetite is also very poor, not being able to relish the food we are obliged to eat in this country; but I think she is now on the improve and will be around in a few weeks.

We have been called upon to record the account of a sorrowful event in the Tongan mission. On the 28th of January Sister Margaret R. Durham gave birth to a girl baby, but on account of not being able to procure sufficient aid at the proper time the little one died and the mother was in a critical condition when the nurse arrived. All the assistance in the neighborhood was called in and everything was done that could be done; but it was not until eight hours had passed away that there were any signs of her recovery; and then it was continual prayer and the performance of the ordinance for the healing of the sick that gave her relief. The whole of the night was spent in watching and praying for her, as well as doing everything in our power for her welfare. Next morning we made preparations for the funeral and prepared a place to bury the body of the infant in one corner of our lot, but as it is unlawful to hold a funeral without first making it known to the mayor of the town, we went and informed him of our intention. While he showed his willingness for us to do as we desired, he said he was afraid it would not be satisfactory to the minister of lands to make a new cemetery; so he dispatched a messenger to Nukualofa to get the consent of the governor, which was not obtained. Then a portion of their burying grounds was given us, and at 8 o'clock in the afternoon the funeral was held, there being quite a concourse of natives present. The opportunity was taken advantage of to explain to the natives the true principles of redemption for children.

At present Sister Durham is on a fair way to recovery; but she has indeed had a serious time of it, and nothing but the faith and prayers of the Elders has saved her life. We are all thankful to our Heavenly Father for His blessings.

Trusting the Saints will aid us with their faith and prayers to surmount the many obstacles placed in our way, so that truth may prevail, I subscribe myself as an earnest worker to that end.

LABORS IN TENNESSEE.

MCMINNVILLE, Warren county,
Tennessee, March 17, 1894.

I take liberty of addressing a few lines for publication if considered worthy of such notice. We are getting along nicely, and are enjoying the blessings of God in our labors. We were called to open up a new field of labor in this county, and we find very many that never heard a Mormon, as they term them, preach. Those who have heard them have come here from other parts. There are many queries put to us in regard to our doctrine and a general interest is manifested to hear us. We are successful in getting houses to preach in with some exceptions.

We called recently upon a gentleman by the name of Mr. Cartwright, near here, who has charge of the Christian or Campbellite church. He said he would see his members and give us an answer inside of two days. We waited until the time was fully up, and it being Sunday and we holding services in a school house near the church at 11 a.m., we went to his church at 2 p.m. After its close he called us out to one side and said with all kindness and respect to us he was afraid to let us have the house to preach in, urging that his was a young church and it would cause confusion and perhaps break up the body. He also said he hoped we would not hold or harbor any feeling against him for this. We told him, Oh no, certainly not; this we would not think of doing in any case, especially as he was so frank in giving us to understand that his doctrines would not stand the light of truth—afraid of two poor, weak mortals like us preaching the plain and simple plan of salvation as God dictates it by His Holy Spirit.

There are many good, kind, hospitable people in this part of Tennessee—good church-going people—starving for the eternal truths of salvation. The ministers of the day do not feed them to their satisfaction. There is something wanting by the great majority—something tangible, with foundation and soundness; but many lack courage to face the world in leaving the tutor of their family faith and enlisting in the great and only plan of salvation whereby man can enter into God's Kingdom. They listen to our Elders and say it is all good, the best preaching they ever heard in their life; but it is too much to lift the standard in the good cause, it is too heavy they think.

This is a thriving city of about 8,000 population; much country surrounding it that support the business of the city. The country of Tennessee universally small rolling hills, farms on the side hill and timber everywhere excepting where farms have been cleared; climate mild and much rain. Planting is the order these days. Fruit is raised in abundance here, sold to distillers for 10 cents a bushel; apples are made into brandy—this is the only market for the apples so abundantly produced here. The health of the people is not good—much consumption, dyspepsia and many other diseases are prevalent. Tobacco is raised and is extremely used by both sexes, causing weakness and diseases of different kinds.

Your Brethren in the Gospel;

FROM THE GOLDEN GATE.

CLIFF HOUSE, Golden Gate, Cal., March 18, 1894.—I have no doubt that some of the young readers of the DESERET NEWS would like to hear something about the Cliff House, and the Seal Rocks, where scores of seal lions bask in the warm sun of the Pacific coast. The Cliff House and Seal Rocks are familiar to tourists to San Francisco, for a visit to this place would not be complete unless an hour or two were spent at those cliffs. They are eight or ten miles from the landing or pier at the bay of San Francisco, and are easily reached by cable or electric street cars which run every few minutes, passing out four miles to the fair grounds, at one fare of five cents. Then a dummy carries those who desire to continue their journey (and they are many), for five cents the remaining part of the journey. Here the eye is delighted. On every hand are pleasure gardens. The coast rambles are very interesting.

The seal rocks are about 300 yards out in the splashing waves of the Pacific, which in the time of high or rough sea dash in beautiful spray as they come in contact with those solid rocks which have bid defiance to the raging waters for many centuries. Balm, refreshing and invigorating are the breezes of the salt seas to most of the invalids who seek for rest, health and a relief from care, toil and responsibility.

Our little party seated ourselves within slightly vision of a group of three rocks in close proximity to each other, where 10 or 15 sea lions were lying on the sunny sides of the rocks. A gentleman with opera glasses to hire came along with his glasses, saying, "Take a look at those great horns of the deep. There lies old Ben Butler, who has been a visitor here for the past 35 years." This was too good a sight to let pass, so we took a shot or two at this scene with our kodak. I got two excellent views of the ocean scene, seal rocks, and about a dozen sea lions just as some of them raised their heads while yelping or barking.

After luncheon we returned on another route along the Golden Gate which opens up narrowly studded with lighthouses, hamlets, and here and there small towns. It is indeed a lovely sight to ride along the narrow way with steamers, ships, and smaller craft, passing up several miles into the bay of San Francisco which nearly surrounds the city.

The Utah exhibit at the Midwinter Fair grounds attracts great attention, and well it may. Mrs. Caine has the ladies' department in excellent order. The silk exhibit is not equaled in all the various departments of the entire Fair. While I was looking on, I casually heard favorable remarks concerning the exhibit and about Utah. Although not large, the exhibit shows up with becoming dignity. Dr. Maesser's department stands prominent in the educational line, but he feels grieved because of the non-arrival of some of his important exhibit. Today there will be added to his line some reminiscences of Joseph the Prophet and the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, for free distribution.

Just below our exhibit is the California mining output, which, with the fruit department, in the Horticultural Hall, is grand indeed; $1,248,272,935.00 is represented in two spheres and an obelisk representing solid gold. Some of the rich ore discovered only a few weeks ago is on exhibition, fairly sparkling with gold. It is from the Rawhide mine and is marked $26,000 to $80,000 to the ton.

The weather is delightful most of the time, only the evenings and mornings are cool. We have had but two rain storms for the past eleven days. The rainy season is past and fine growing weather is upon us. Many departments of the Fair are not yet in place, and in some instances day and night work is resorted to. The admission price is to be reduced to twenty-five cents.

In Alameda yesterday a factional war took place between the ladies of the Alameda woman's exchange. There was a battle in which a justice of the peace, an attorney-at-law, two reporters and a miscellaneous assortment of house-movers took leading roles. The woman's society is the aristocratic charitable organization of the town. The trouble is all caused by one faction wishing to remove Mrs. Carpenter as manager and the other wishing to retain her. One of the parties got the house on rollers, and was moving away from the land on which it formerly stood. Mrs. Carpenter indignantly refused all offers made to her and declared that she was in the exchange to stay and that her enemies could not oust her. She remained in the house while it was being moved and took her meals there. Law suits were going on in the meantime, and fighting took place in which the attorney struck the justice in the face with his fist, causing blood to flow. There were several free fights; two local reporters started to pommel each other; and there certainly would have been bloodshed had not friends interfered. The affair created considerable commotion in society circles, as prominent ladies are arrayed on both sides. A sheriff finally arrived on the scene and stopped the work of the house-movers. The house remains in middle of the street several blocks away. The lawyer was arrested as well as twenty-eight others, and the courts are expected to settle the disturbance and restore order.

INSPECTOR OF MEATS.

An act to prevent the exposure for sale of unwholesome or diseased meats in cities having a population of 10,000 inhabitants, or over, within the Territory of Utah:

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah:

Section 1. The office of meat inspector is hereby created for cities having a population of 10,000 inhabitants, or over, within the Territory of Utah; and immediately after the passage of this act such cities shall appoint a meat inspector, or inspectors, whose compensation shall be borne by said cities and shall be such as will secure the services of a competent veterinarian, who shall take an oath of office to faithfully perform the duties of his office and execute an official bond to the said city in the sum of five thousand dollars.

Sec. 2. It shall be the duty of the city councils of cities having the population required by this act to designate some convenient place in, or adjacent to, such cities, where all cattle, sheep or swine intended for immediate slaughter and consumption for food in said cities shall be brought for inspection on the hoof, which inspection shall be made at such time as said city councils may direct.

Sec. 3. 1st.—All cattle, sheep and swine intended for immediate slaughter and consumption for food, in cities having a population of 10,000 inhabitants or over, shall be submitted to the meat inspector for examination on the hoof, the day before being slaughtered and shall be brought to such place, as may be provided in section 2.

2nd: The carcasses of all animals so inspected on the hoof, and slaughtered within a radius of seven miles, from the center of said cities, before being exposed for sale shall be inspected by the meat inspector and such carcasses or carcasses as may pass examination shall be marked with a tag similar to that in use by the government of the United States, in the bureau of animal industry, which tag shall be designated and adopted by the city councils of said cities as the city stamp or certificate for the designation of wholesome and healthy meats; Provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any person from slaughtering, without inspection, any healthy animal the meat of which is intended for his own use or that of his household.

3d: The rules, regulation and method of inspection adopted by the bureau of animal industry, conducted by the United States government, shall be taken as the standard of meat inspection and shall be followed as closely as practical by the meat inspectors, appointed by said cities.

Sec. 4. 1st: It shall be the duty of the meat inspectors appointed by cities having a population of 10,000 inhabitants or over, to inspect on the hoof at such time and place as may be designated by the city councils of said cities as before provided, both as to ownership and health of animals, all cattle, sheep and swine which may be brought to such place and which animals are intended for immediate slaughter and consumption for food in said cities.

2d: As soon as possible after such animals have been slaughtered the said meat inspectors shall inspect the carcasses of the same, and if found healthy, shall attach thereto the city stamps or tags indicating that such carcass is wholesome and a fit article for food.

3d: The meat inspectors appointed by said cities shall perform such other duties in inspecting food as said cities may require. Provided, that such additional duties shall not interfere with the proper discharge of the duties of meat inspector as herein specified.

Sec. 5. 1st: The meat inspectors appointed by said cities shall have the right to condemn any carcass, carcasses, or parts thereof of any cattle, sheep or swine which they may find after examination to be unfit for food and shall order the owner to destroy the same in such manner as may be acceptable to said inspectors.

2: They shall take possession of all animals inspected by them and found to be unlawful in the possession of any person, and shall sell the same at the market price. After such sale the inspector shall by the use of recorded marks and brands and otherwise, use due diligence to find the lawful owner, and if he be found within six months from the date of sale, the proceeds of said sale, after the deduction of all costs therefrom, shall be paid to the said lawful owner; otherwise at the expiration of six months, the proceeds shall be disposed of as provided for in the sale of estrays.

3: The inspectors appointed under this act shall keep a record of all animals thus sold by them, including marks and brands, which record shall be open to the inspection of the public at all reasonable hours.

4th: The said meat inspectors shall have the same power as is now conferred by law on sheriffs, constables or other peace officers, to arrest any person, or persons, whom said meat inspectors may have reason to believe are in possession of stolen stock, or who may be guilty of violating any of the provisions of this act.

Sec. 6. 1st: Any person or persons, company or corporation who may sell or offer for sale, buy or offer to buy, within the limits of said city any carcass or carcasses, or portions thereof of any cattle, sheep or swine, which have not been inspected and tagged as herein required or accepted as hereafter stated, shall on conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars. Provided, that nothing in this act, or in any paragraph thereof, shall be constituted to interfere with the offering for sale of any meats bearing a stamp or tag indicating that the same has been inspected by the United States government or some county or municipality where a proper sanitary meat inspector as required by this act has been complied with.

Second—Any person or persons, who shall forge, counterfeit or knowingly or wrongfully alter, deface, destroy or use any of the marks, stamps or other devices which may be adopted by said cities or counties, as herein required for the purpose of designating wholesome and healthful meats, or who may sell or attempt to sell any meats which have been condemned by the said meat inspectors, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor within the meaning of this act, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding three hundred dollars or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 7. Any city or county of the Territory of Utah shall have the option of adopting the sanitary provisions of this act.

Sec. 8. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Approved March 8, 1894.

ST. GEORGE STAKE CONFERENCE.

An excellent quarterly conference of this Stake closed the afternoon of the 12th of this month. President Daniel D. McArthur presided. None of the general authorities were present. We were favored, however, with the presence of visitors: Elder Joseph M. Tanner, of Salt Lake City; Elder Daniel Seegmiller, of the presidency of Kanab Stake, and Elder Frederick W. Chambers, of Ogden. Each of these Elders took their part in ministering the good Word; the first named addressed the conference twice and also delivered a lecture in his emphatic and forceful style before the combined quarterly conference of the Sunday schools and Mutual Improvement associations. The other speakers to the conference were of the Presidency of the Stake, High Council and Bishops.

Reports of the condition of the work of the Lord in the Stake were encouraging. The establishment and maintenance of home industries were vigorously presented.

The General and Stake authorities of the Church were presented and were sustained without a dissentient vote. The spirit and result of the conference cannot perhaps be more graphically expressed than by quoting the statement of President McArthur at the close: "This has been one of the best conferences I have attended during the past sixty years of my life."

JAMES G. BLEAK, Stake Clerk.

WISELY PLANNING.

One for us very important home industry, as we consider it, we are now incorporating under the laws of the Territory of Utah a "Co-operative Feed and Stock-yard company" for the main purpose of feeding and fattening live stock. We calculate to go right ahead and build a ten-acre yard, to be ready for next fall. We expect to dispose of about 1,500 acres of lucern hay for feeding, to commence with.

This winter there has been fed and fattened here, with lucern hay, over 1,300 steers; and we think we can extend the feeding capacity to double that amount by putting in a few hundred acres more with lucern.

Our 450 acres surface reservoir at Six Mile creek is now full and running over, through two formidable flood-gates. This reservoir can be more than doubled in capacity as soon as we can buy that much more of the surrounding lands. We have another smaller reservoir in the mountains, and we have very favorable locations for two more large reservoirs at Nine and Twelve Mile creeks, only waiting for time, population and means sufficient, to be executed within a few years. By these we expect to be able to farm and irrigate almost all the arable land between here and Salina, about 14,000 acres. The object is to make farms and homes (and not tenancies and tenants) for our much increasing population, without fear of "overproduction."

EVENTS AT EPHRAIM.

EPHRAIM, March 21, 1894.

'Twas mud; it had been mud; it would have been mud, but for the heavy snowfall of Monday and Tuesday; and it will be mud today, if the sun comes out. But the storm is not over, it seems, so the farmer can "rest a little longer," and the plowboy can have at least another week at school.

The farmers look forward to good crops and better times, as the prospects for plenty of water are first class; though some are beginning to think spring is too long in coming this way, and one can frequently hear the remark, "I'm tired of this hanging around."

Wild geese and ducks by thousands can be seen every day anywhere in the fields below town, and the boys who are not at school are making use of the time, for the first of April will soon be here, you know. Sandhill cranes, too, receive their share of attention from the nimrods.

The people of Sanpete appreciate the double train service, since we've been getting our eastern and most of our Salt Lake mail over the S. P. V. R. R.

Among other things the educational interests of our town are not forgotten. Besides the seven departments of our district schools, all in modern working order, and the two mission schools, Methodist and Presbyterian (the latter having a kindergarten department), the Sanpete Stake Academy is here, and to stay we hope, for it is doing a noble work among the young of our city and county.

Quite a number of young men and women are interested in the Danish class, taught by our tried and true friend, C. C. A. Christensen, and many of them are making rapid progress.

Of course you don't care to hear much from these country towns, at least one would think so from the fact that it is seldom we see any items from this the fourth most prominent county of Utah. Perhaps you big newspapers think that the people out this way are of that goody goody kind who will sustain you whether you notice them or not. Or perhaps it's our own fault because none of us seem interested enough to write anything. I believe it's a little of both; but now, to be candid, don't you think it would be wise to have a News bureau out this way?

WILDERNESS.

[Yes, indeed. We're always glad to hear from Sanpete and its thrifty people. Who'll fill the News bureau spoken of; will you, Wilderness?

The strongest flow of natural gas, says the Garrison Tribune, ever found in the San Luis valley was tapped by Spelcer & Uhri, on the Steve Kenny ranch, north of Garrison, a few days ago. At a depth of 700 feet it came with such force as to throw water forty feet in the air. The well is three inches in diameter, and throws a stream normally about fifteen inches high, while at intervals of fifteen or twenty minutes it spurts to the height of forty feet.

A tall, handsome man, with dark eyes, heavy mustache and imperial, and a big black hat that completed the costume of a typical borderer, passed

While employed in his mine some three miles from Folsom, Cal., Saturday afternoon, Frank Perry, a Portuguese miner, was entirely buried by the unexpected caving in of a high bank. The men in his employ, after strenuous efforts, extricated and carried him to his residence. Just as they left the spot another cave occurred in the same place, bringing down tons of dirt and covering the spot where the men had been engaged in the rescue to a depth of over ten feet. Perry is severely bruised and suffering from internal injuries. The physician in charge states that he may possibly recover.

State Veterinarian Gresswell and M. L. West, an enterprising young Englishman, have entered upon a new enterprise that may mean great things for Colorado at no very distant day, says the Denver News. They have leased the old Spottwood ranch near Fort Logan, consisting of 430 acres of excellent farming land, and propose to devote it to the feeding of 600 head of young cattle. Sugar beets and alfalfa will be used, the cattle being brought at the age of a year and six months from Utah, and fed for six months, in which time Dr. Gresswell expects to have them fat and ready for the market. If the enterprise proves a success, an English syndicate will take up the idea and operate on a magnificent scale.

A terrible tragedy occurred at the Mendocino asylum, Cal., on Tuesday. One of the attendants had been left temporarily in charge of the kitchen. During a short absence, in which he had been assisting some of the feeblar inmates from the dining room to their respective wards, Rosini Ricardo, a trusty who had been loitering in the corridor, seized the opportunity to secure a large meat knife, and meeting James B. Murphy, one of the inmates, in the corridor, he plunged the keen steel into his heart. Ricardo was immediately secured and placed in confinement. Both of the patients had been considered harmless and inoffensive. The autopsy developed the fact that the major portion of the knife was buried in the heart and broken off.

What might have been a most serious accident was narrowly averted by the heroism of a boy named Wilbur F. Hart, at Greeley, Colo., on Sunday. The fire department had been turned out by an alarm and the Brush hose turned into Eighth street with the horses on a keen run. The gong frightened a horse attached to a buggy in which were seated three young ladies, the Misses Margaret Wallace, Kate Mitchell and Flora McClure, and three children. The horse shying, snapped the shaft and the horse becoming beyond control, dashed down the street, the buggy swaying in a dangerous manner. Young Hart, who was on horseback, seeing the danger of the young ladies, urged his horse to a run in pursuit. After running about a block, he succeeded in getting hold of the bridle rein. He was in imminent danger of being dragged from his horse, but pluckily held on and finally succeeded in bringing the frightened animal under control.

The victim of a terrible accident in a mine is lying at a Sacramento (Cal.) hospital, where he is to undergo a very trying surgical operation. The man's name is J. W. Willsey. He is about 35 years of age and has a wife and two children. A little over two weeks ago he was engaged prospecting in an old mine 150 miles from Eureka, Nev. His pick struck a dynamite cartridge which had been left there by previous prospectors. There was an explosion and Willsey was terribly injured. The blast blinded both eyes, his scalp was badly lacerated, a piece of flying rock tore a large hole in one arm, one finger was cut open, one thumb cut off and the other was fractured. Nearly all the flesh was torn off his left forearm and his face and body were covered with wounds from the flying pieces of rock. Willsey was hurled to the ground, where he remained twenty-four hours before he was discovered. His friends carried him to his camp. The next day they started to carry him to a place where he could receive medical treatment. It required five days to reach Eureka. There some clothes were wrapped about his wounds. A lodge of Old Fellows to which he belonged decided to send him to Sacramento. The physician in charge of the case has removed the poor fellow's eyes. The sufferer was full of courage until he learned that his eyes were gone; then he broke down.

The government railroads have three classes of passenger cars. The first class is limited to some express trains only and generally very little patronized, giving a reason for the tendency to do away with it entirely on all lines as has been done in the North, and on the greatest number of private roads. The night expresses carry sleeping cars of first and second class, where a berth may be obtained for the small additional sum of $1.35 and 80 cents respectively.

Tool manufacture in Sweden has of old its principal homestead in Eskilstuna, where, in about a hundred workshops with in all about 2000 workmen, great numbers and varieties of tools for working metals and wood are yearly produced. Modern working methods have been largely adopted. The yearly value of production from the Eskilstuna tool shops amounts to nearly $1,000,000. But the large foreign tool making establishments, not the least those in the United States, somehow have succeeded in finding a way for their products to the Swedish market, while, on the other hand, a good quantity of Eskilstuna articles is yearly exported.

The export of tallow from Sweden is on the increase, and in 1893 rose to the value of $110,000. Margarine of good quality is manufactured in Sweden, and the value of the annual output is about $140,000. Vegetable oils are made in Sweden in large quantities. The value of the product of 13 oil mills at work in 1892 was $650,000, the manufacture of pressed oil cakes for fodder alone amounting to $227. During the same year different kinds of vegetable oils were exported to a value of $42,000. Among other vegetable products to be included in this group are rosin, turpentine, wool-oil and lamp-black, these products being made at nine factories.

The manufacture of machinery in Sweden has shown a steady and relatively rapid progress during the last decades, and the engineering shops are at present able to compete successfully in several branches with foreign establishments of high standing, as regards both working methods and the quality of the products, albeit they are, of course, still behind in quantity. This great development appears to be principally due to the extended use in the workshops of modern improved machinery, especially machine tools—a good number of American origin—but is of course also in great measure attributable to the fact, that the works nowadays devote themselves more to specialties than they used to do.

Mr. Johns, one of the most prominent members of the Danish colony at Paris, and his wife, a French lady, while recently paying a visit to Denmark, donated a number of rare and valuable articles to the Copenhagen museum of arts. The most interesting of these objects, perhaps, is the writing machine invented by Prof. Durluo some 30 years ago, for "it has been demonstrated that this is the prototype of all modern writing machines. This work which is of great interest to the history of Danish industry, and which was on the point of passing into foreign hands, will now be in its proper place in the museum."

The recent visit of the czar to Denmark gave the impulse to the publication of a souvenir volume under the title "Czar Alexander III And His Surroundings." It is mainly a translation from a French work written by Nikolai Notovitsch, the translation and adoption being by Mr. Lutken, a Danish-Russian. The aim of the book seems to be to show that the present czar of Russia is almost an ideal ruler and that, in case of a European war, Denmark and France must naturally side with Russia. The author is evidently well informed, but in stating plain facts he often contradicts some of his general eulogies on Russian affairs.

Prof. Buhl was a member of the theological faculty of the university of Copenhagen until a couple of years ago when he left Denmark and accepted a theological professorship at the university of Leipzig, Germany. It was supposed at the time that he did not feel at ease in Denmark on account of his liberal religious views. This supposition has been strengthened by a "History of the Jewish People," which was published in Copenhagen some time ago. In this book he asserts that we are not acquainted with any of the authors of the historical books of the Old Testament. "All attempts," he writes, "to remove the dust covering the authors of the historical books of the Old Testament, or of the sources quoted in them by means of identifying them with this or that person known to us from the Old Testament history—are useless play without any value whatever." We hardly need to add that this does not tally with the commonly accepted theory of the origin of the books of the Old Testament. It is very probable, that this book would have landed the learned professor in a peck of trouble if he had still been a theological professor in the university of Denmark. In the home of Luther he will undoubtedly be let alone—or even praised for his work.

COMING GREATNESS.

GARDEN CITY, Rich county, Utah, March 23, 1894.—We are still in the midst of hard winter. On Wednesday night, March 21st, the thermometer went down to 10 degrees below zero, with the weather clear and bright. This is quite a contrast to what the weather is in other parts of the Territory. The snow here is still about a foot and a half deep on the level and frozen hard. The lake is as solid as ever, one mass of ice with no openings as yet.

Last Friday evening a meeting of the citizens of Garden City was held to take into consideration the best place on the lake shore for a landing place for the steamer which is now in course of construction and which will ply on the beautiful Bear lake this summer. Behold! another prediction made years ago by some of our leaders is on the verge of fulfillment. This is a step in the right direction. We are informed that lauding places and pleasure resorts will be made at Fish Haven, Idaho, and Garden City and Lake Town, Utah. This will bring hundreds of pleasure seekers into our midst and we have every reason to believe that the hard times hitherto so common to us here in some portions of of Bear Lake and Rich counties will vanish away and times of prosperity take the place of what may be termed poverty.

It is also understood that the railway company will build a branch line from Montpelier, Idaho, to the Hot Springs on the northeast corner of the lake in order to connect the steamboat line with the railroad. Thus it will bring pleasure seekers from the north, south, east and west. There will also be stage run from Garden City, over the mountains to Logan, which also will be a good paying business, and bring more money into the country. This should have been done years ago.

Some of the "boys" are over the lake cutting cedar posts.

The mock-trial set for Wednesday night, March 21st, was in every way a decided success. The house was filled with curious spectators to see how the boys succeeded. This mock-trial was inaugurated under the auspices of the Garden City civil government class, and it was very amusing to see with what precision and exactness each one acted his part. As we do not wish to take too much space in your esteemed paper, it will suffice to say the defendant was found guilty of "grand larceny," by the jury as charged in the indictment. The case created much merriment and laughter and was enjoyed by all present. It is gratifying to see how much interest our youth are taking in this class and a few entertainments, such as this mock trial, will have a tendency to bring out the boys.

The measles are still "raising Ned" among us but none have succumbed to the disease as yet.

In addition to this steamboat enterprise, it is expected that our town is to become a mining camp this season. There is any quantity of ore in the mountains west of us, and all we lack is a bit of capital coupled with a bit of energy, and our town would soon become the center of attraction. Who will lead out in this direction?

Some of our farmers are contemplating taking out a new canal from Swan creek, some 90 or 100 feet above the old one, which, when completed, will put much valuable land under irrigation. It only takes a little extra exertion on our part. The company have organized and work will be pushed as soon as possible.

MARICOPA STAKE CONFERENCE.

The quarterly conference of the Maricopa Stake of Zion convened in Mesa, Sunday and Monday, the 18th and 19th. Counselor H. C. Rogan presiding.

The gatherings at the different meetings were large, and good feeling and a desire to fulfil the high calling of the Gospel were manifested. The principles of the Gospel of Jesus Christ were expounded by the Elders of Israel, and the Saints were blessed exceedingly with the outpourings of the Spirit of God.

The reports of the Bishops and other officers showed the people in genuine good health and all striving to fulfil the law of God.

The Saints were in hopes that some of the Apostles or authorities would have met with us, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of our much beloved President, and to give us other instruction. Though we were disappointed, we expect them soon, when another conference will be called, no doubt. GEO. PASSEY, Clerk,

JARMAN AND JARMAN.

Utah people who are familiar with the outrageous proceedings of William Jarman in England and with his former record here will be interested in the following communications. The first is written by an exemplary young man who resided in this city until his departure for England a short time since. His home is still here, the reason of his absence being stated in his letter to Wm. Jarman, his father. He says:

Dear Father—I take great pleasure in writing to you that I am now in London, having been called to England to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ to any and all with whom I may come in contact. I know my message is true and the power of God unto salvation unto all who yield obedience thereunto.

My dear father, I do sincerely hope and pray that you may ere long see the error of telling the people that the Mormons murdered your son. I am now compelled to refute your erroneous and false statement. Think of my position as your son, I having to perform so unthankful a task; but the truth must be told and it is mighty and will prevail.

I hope and earnestly pray to our Father in heaven to open your eyes and see your awful position, and repent and be brought again to the true light of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The Lord is very merciful and will be ready to forgive you of all past sins if you honestly repent and turn from your past ways and worship him with all your heart. Saul of Damascus was a great persecutor of the Saints, but when he repented, God forgave him and he became a great man in rolling His great work on the earth.

My dear father, do think of your future life and the fearful consequence of fighting God's great work. What does it profit a man, though he gains the whole world, if he lose his whole soul? My dear father, do stop and consider your condition. You are now getting along in years, and I feel very much pained when I read and hear people repeat what you have said about the Mormons. You know in your heart that they are the best and most honest and virtuous people on earth. People know your statements are false. I would be pleased to shake a repentant father by the hand and feel proud to own and respect you once more.

I received a letter from Ida while she was in Chicago, and Emma bade me goodbye when I left home. Mother and all at home are well and happy. My health is good and I hope to be successful in the Lord's service.

Believe me to remain very sincerely,
Your affectionate son,
ALBERT EDWARD JARMAN.

Following is the curt reply received by the son:

(Answer)
EXCELSIOR, Mount Pleasant,
Exeter, March 2, 1894.

I send by this mail some printing which will show you that I am so busy with that matter at the present time, that I cannot attend to anything but the (County Council Guardian of the poor ratepayers' association) work. You had better come down; it's but four hours' ride. I shall be pleased to see you at the above address, when we can talk better than we can write.

In haste, MR. WILLIAM JARMAN.

HELPING THEMSELVES.

Will you be so kind as to give space for a few lines in your paper, which I hope may be of interest to some who have no home nor farm?

About forty miles south of St. George on the Virgin river, about a dozen honest, hard-working men went in a week after last New Year; they built a dam across the river and completed a ditch four miles long and five feet wide in six or seven weeks, and now have their ditch full of water on their land. They are now busy getting in posts and in a few days they will stretch their fence wire around 300 acres of rich sandy land, well adapted for grain, lucern and fruit; the seedless grape will also thrive well there. This is all proven by the flourishing town of Bunkerville which is located just five miles below and has the same kind of land and climate.

About 2,000 acres of land the same as the above is right by it; all that is necessary is to enlarge the ditch and extend it as much farther as more land is wanted, and the men will easily be settled with for what they have already done, and will bid more good settlers a hearty welcome.

Respectfully yours,
H. P. IVERSON.

A PLEASANT GATHERING.

MANTI, March 22.—The hospitable home of Elder Isaac Riddle Sen., of Manti City, was the scene of a most enjoyable occasion on Thursday, March 22, 1894, it being the 64th anniversary of his birthday, as well as the 72nd anniversary of the birthday of Sister Minerva W. Snow. Quite a large number of kindred, friends and fellow-workers in the Manti Temple partook of a sumptuous repast and afterwards music and song interspersed with speeches from Presidents J. D. T. McAllister and J. B. Maiben and others, full of the kindest expressions of congratulation and good will that their years might be prolonged to answer their utmost wishes. Quite a large number of the deceased relatives of Brother Riddle and Sister Snow were labored for in the Temple through the day as a loving compliment from their friends. Brother Riddle both at St. George and the Manti Temple has had the necessary work done for thousands of his dead kindred, and contemplates continuing this pleasing labor for thousands more of whom he has the complete printed record, tracing his ancestors as far back as the year of our Lord 800. C. O. M.

As the M. & P. train was nearing Tempe, Ariz., a few days ago, a man named Cliff Hambrick, handcuffed and in the custody of an officer, jumped from the train and has not yet been captured. He is wanted in Midland, Texas, for an assault with intent to commit murder at that place last July. He was formerly the keeper of a dance house at Gila Bend, where he was arrested.

LOOMIS.—In Westfield, Massachusetts, Tuesday, March 27, of general debility and old age, Hazwell Loomis, aged 83 years and 7 months. Deceased was a brother of Mrs. Albert Dewey of this city.

ALLRED.—Silas Hillard, son of James L. and Cynthia J. Williams Allred; born December 4, 1890, died at Fremont, Wayne county, Utah, of bronchitis March 18, 1891.

This makes five children out of six that Brother and Sister Allred have lost, they never having had but two at one time. He was a bright, sweet little fellow, and a year ago had a very close call by croup, and was only saved by fasting and prayer of the ward, and it was hoped he would have been spared to them. They have the heartfelt sympathy of the whole ward in this sad bereavement. —[Com.]

SECRET COMBINATIONS.

*Discourse delivered at the Tabernacle,
Salt Lake City, Sunday, March 11th, 1894, by*

PRESIDENT GEORGE Q. CANNON

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

I will read an extract from the book of Ether, which is one of the books of the Book of Mormon. That which I shall read is found in the 8th chap. of Ether, commencing at the 19th verse:

For the Lord worketh not in secret combinations, neither doth he will that man should shed blood, but in all things hath forbidden it, from the beginning of man.

And now I, Moroni, do not write the manner of their oaths and combinations, for it hath been made known unto me that they are had among all people, and they are had among the Lamanites,

And they have caused the destruction of this people of whom I am now speaking, and also the destruction of the people of Nephi;

And whatsoever nation shall uphold such secret combinations, to get power and gain, until they shall spread over the nation, behold, they shall be destroyed, for the Lord will not suffer that the blood of his saints, which shall be shed by them, shall always cry unto him from the ground for vengeance upon them, and yet he avenge them not;

Wherefore, O ye Gentiles, it is wisdom in God that these things should be shewn unto you, that thereby ye may repent of your sins, and suffer not that these murderous combinations shall get above you, which are built up to get power and gain, and the work, yea, even the work of destruction come upon you, yea, even the sword of the justice of the eternal God shall fall upon you, to your overthrow and destruction, if ye shall suffer these things to be;

Wherefore the Lord commandeth you, when ye shall see these things come among you, that ye shall awake to a sense of your awful situation, because of this secret combination which shall be among you, or wo be unto it, because of the blood of them who have been slain; for they cry from the dust for vengeance upon it, and also upon those who build it up.

For it cometh to pass that whoso buildeth it up seeketh to overthrow the freedom of all lands, nations, and countries; and it bringeth to pass the destruction of all people, for it is built up by the devil, who is the father of all lies; even that same liar who beguiled our first parents; yea, even that same liar who hath caused man to commit murder from the beginning; who hath hardened the hearts of men, that they have murdered the prophets, and stoned them, and cast them out from the beginning.

Wherefore I, Moroni, am commanded to write these things, that evil may be done away, and that the time may come that Satan may have no power upon the hearts of the children of men, but that they may be persuaded to do good continually, that they may come unto the fountain of all righteousness and be saved.

The book from which I have read this was translated, as we testify, by the power of God. We believe the Book of Mormon to be a divine record. We believe it to contain the word of God. We do not substitute it in the place of the Bible; but it is another witness of the truths contained in the Bible. In it there are very frequent references to secret combinations that existed in olden times among the people on this continent. It seems that combinations were formed for such purposes as are alluded to in the words that I have read; and the prophets who made this record were inspired of God to give warning unto us Gentiles (for we are classed as Gentiles in this record), that we in our day might understand the dreadful consequences which follow such secret organizations. This book was published in the year 1829. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was organized in 1830. At that time there were but few indications, especially in our own nation, of the growth of such combinations as are described in that which I have read. To a person who read the book then such a warning as is given by this prophet to us would doubtless seem entirely uncalled for. But in the lapse of sixty years a great change has taken place in the affairs of the nations of the earth; and now those familiar with current events can see the propriety—yea, the necessity—of such a warning as this. Communism, nihilism and anarchism have sprung into existence and gained tremendous influence among certain peoples, until kings and emperors tremble on their thrones, for fear of these secret forces which are at work, threatening the overthrow of their dynasties and the destruction of their forms of government. Even in republican France, where there is no kingly dignity held by any man, and where the people are the rulers, the government is not safe. Its prominent men stand in continual danger, and it is only recently that an attempt was made to destroy the President and others of their Chamber of Deputies. Every day that we take up the newspapers we find notices of the dreadful deeds which anarchists have resorted to in order to accomplish their wicked ends; not only seeking to destroy rulers, but in their recklessness and murderous feelings perfectly willing to destroy those who are not in any way responsible for the condition of things which exists. Well might the prophet speak in tones of warning unto the inhabitants of the earth! Well might he call upon them in this solemn manner to refrain from such organizations, and to do nothing to foster them! On account of these warnings, with which we have been familiar since the organization of our Church, the Latter-day Saints have, as a rule, kept free from all sorts of organizations of a secret character. The servants of God in these days have also felt impressed to caution the Latter-day Saints on this point, that they might not be carried away by that spirit. It has been the continued counsel of the servants of God for the Latter-day Saints to abstain from every association the objects of which are secret. We have known that these combinations would exist, that they would increase in the midst of the people, and that their tendency would be evil, seeking to destroy government, to overturn existing institutions, and to array class against class, community against community. The revealed word of God has shown this to us, and the Spirit of God has impressed the truth and the importance of these matters upon us.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has been built up by the revelations of God, for the purpose of correcting the evils that exist in society, as well as to save the inhabitants of the earth from their sins; not only to prepare them for the life to come, but to qualify them to enjoy the life that now is. Its mission is to save the people spiritually and temporally. In the beginning of our organization we were taught by the Lord a number of things concerning the temporal safety that we should receive by keeping His commandments. It was revealed to us that these were the last days—the days of tribulation and of calamity of which the Savior spoke; and that this work which the Lord had established by the sending of angelic visitors to the earth was preparatory to the second coming of our Lord. And the most remarkable influence attended the preaching of the Gospel by the Elders of this Church. Wherever they went those who received their message became inspired with an almost uncontrollable desire to leave the lands of their nativity, to break off their old associations of kindred and friends, and to emigrate to the place which the Saints settled in. The first place of settlement was Kirtland, Ohio. Almost contemporaneously with that the settlement in Jackson County, Missouri, was formed. Afterwards, through persecution, the people were driven out of Jackson county, and they settled in Clay county, and afterwards in Caldwell county. Finally, under threat of extermination, they left Missouri and moved into Illinois. From Illinois they moved into this country, clinging together as a united body. Every convert, as I have said, was filled with an almost uncontrollable desire to gather with the people with whom he had cast his lot. Hence it is that the Latter-day Saints are found dwelling in these mountain valleys. They have not gathered from the various nations of the earth because man has induced them to do so, but because of the spirit which they themselves received. This is one of the most extraordinary movements that has ever been witnessed. In some respects it is more phenomenal than the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. They were one people, of one family, and the tradition of their family was that they would leave Egypt and go back to Canaan. But there had been no such tradition connected with us. We had no ideas from our fathers that this was necessary on our part; but it has been, so to speak, a spontaneous action. It has been the power of God that has caused this. Today there are people struggling with hardship in our barren wastes, remote from the conveniences, not to say luxuries, of life, seeking to eke out a scanty livelihood for themselves and their children, when all around them, to the west and the east, are lands that are inviting because of their richness, on which they could make themselves comfortable, if not wealthy; yet they remain true to their convictions. They have come here because they believed it to be God's will that they should come. They become wedded to the soil, and are willing to endure all these hardships, because they believe that God has called them to this mission.

The object that the Lord has set forth in the revelations that He has given for his people to gather, is to escape the judgments and calamities which He has told us and all who believe in the Bible are nigh at hand. Afflictions of various kinds and troubles of a most terrible character are about to come upon the inhabitants of the earth; and we already see some of these in the works of anarchy and in these combinations to which I have referred, which seek the overthrow and destruction of government. In our own republic they are making their appearance. We have disturbances of various kinds today, and they are multiplying. I would not class every secret combination as having for its object the destruction of this government; but there are many of them that do have in view the overthrow of existing institutions.

We have been warned against these things as a people. We have been told that we are gathered out from the nations of the earth purposely to escape these. The Lord has given us an organization magnificent in every branch. There is nothing to be compared to it. It has created fear in the minds of some, because they have seen the strength and magnificence of it, and have feared that if it were put to a bad use it would result in terrible evils. But our organization is from God. Its strength consists in its purity. If it were to be devoted to bad purposes, its strength would depart from it. It would cease to be a power in the earth if it were used for anything but righteous ends. Therefore, so far as our nation is concerned, it has nothing to fear from us. But it is a strong organization—strong for good, strong to accomplish grand results, as it already has done. It has borne fruits that ought to commend it to every man, whether he believes that it is divine or not. The fruits that have attended it in these mountains are of such a character as ought to extort the praise of men. Previous to the organization of this Church the Lord revealed that our form of government was of divine origin; that is, He inspired the fathers of our Republic to do the work that they did. He inspired the leaders of the armies of the colonies in their war with the mother country, and He crowned their armies with victory. He had a purpose in this. It was to establish a form of government upon this blest land under which religious freedom could be enjoyed to the fullest possible extent consistent with the rights of humanity. We have been taught this. This sentiment has been imbedded in our very natures. There is no Latter-day Saint who does not believe with all his heart that this Republic has been raised up by the Lord; that on this continent He laid the foundations of liberty, not only for the continent itself, but as an example to other nations. Who could conceive of a more glorious form of government than that which we live under, if carried out in the spirit in which it was founded? Liberty for all! Freedom for all! The utmost room for the exercise of man's highest qualities without check or restraint! Every opportunity for human beings to develop themselves or to be developed, and to attain the greatest possible altitude, it might be said, of grandeur. We cannot conceive a better form of earthly government than ours. This is the feeling that we have. We want this government preserved. We want its liberties maintained. We know that if they are we will have everything that we can ask for. Therefore, as a people we are utterly opposed to all forms of organization that contemplate, even in secret places, anything that will effect unfavorably the government of the United States. We are opposed to all factions that look to disorganization or to the impairing in any manner of the form of government and the liberties that we enjoy under it as citizens of the Republic. Our constant effort is to keep our people from joining these organizations. We are opposed to organizations of capital against labor. We are opposed to organizations of labor against capital. Everything of this character that will interfere with the rights of humanity, that will array class against class, and that will embitter the feelings of one towards another, we are opposed to. We know that such leads to evil, and may result in very serious evil, especially to the Latter-day Saints. As members of the church we can have every right, under this form of government, that any of these societies can give. I have heard it said that there were benevolent societies that did so much good for their members. This whole Church is a benevolent society. Our mission is to perform works of benevolence for our people; and not only for those who are members of our Church, but for the whole world, as fast as we can extend these works of benevolence. Our labor is to save the children of men from every evil with which they are threatened; not only spiritual evils, but evils of a temporal character. It is true, we have not reached all that we desire to do. We are poor human beings, even though we bear the holy name of Saint, and are very fallible and weak. We have all the weaknesses of human nature to contend with. They have come down to us as a legacy, it may be said, from our ancestors. We have been born in the world. The traditions, the influences and the literature of the world have all affected us more or less. Though we belong to the Church of Christ, it is hard to separate ourselves entirely from these influences.

But we are struggling to conform to the standard which God has revealed. We have a long road to travel, apparently, however, before we reach the goal of our desire; but the people generally are pressing forward with what zeal and earnestness they can to accomplish this.

The Lord has revealed to this Church a plan that will comprehend everything that human beings can desire. We read many things about what these different organizations contemplate. All of them in their public announcements seem to have some great end to achieve in connection with the human family. Upwards of sixty years ago the Lord revealed through Joseph Smith a plan by which union could be effected of such a character as would remedy the evils that exist now in society. That plan was revealed with great plainness, and various attempts have been made to carry it out. We had here among us a few years what is called the United Order. The object of that was to correct the evils that exist in society; to stop the necessity for capital being arrayed against labor, or labor against capital. We shall continue at work at this as long as we live. We shall endeavor to get the Latter-day Saints to such a condition of perfection that we shall institute a better order of things on the earth than now exists. God has assigned this mission to us. We are the people that can do it, and no other people; for it requires true religion and the Spirit of God to enable men to do it. One of the great laws that Jesus taught was that we should love our neighbor as we do ourselves. Is that attainable under existing conditions among us? I believe that thousands of the Latter-day Saints strive to do it. They want to love their neighbor as themselves; but affairs are in such a condition that they cannot do it very well. The existing order of things is averse to it. But we believe the day will come when we shall show by practical works that we love our neighbor as we do ourselves. We believe the time will come when Satan will be bound. We are laboring to bind him as fast as we can. It is slow work apparently, and it seems as though it would never be accomplished, because it has been the dream of every good and righteous man from the beginning, but they have died without beholding it. But we are taught that the day is coming—and that we are living in the dawn—when Satan will be bound. He will be bound because of the righteousness of the people, and we are doing our best, in our humble and feeble way, to bring this about. But one of the great troubles with us, as with all people, is that we are each man for himself. Each man among us has to contend for himself. If he does not, he is in danger of going down. There is not so much danger as there is in the world, where they are not bound together by the feelings of love that we have; but it is a danger nevertheless among us. In the world at the present time, if a man goes down, he is trampled upon and forgotten. I have often thought that if I were living in the world, as society is organized, with the prospects before it which to my view are so dark and dreary, my heart, if I were a father, would be sick and faint in thinking of the future of my children. Among the Latter-day Saints, however, this is different, although it is not yet what we would like it to be, nor what the Lord designs it shall be.

The earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof. There is an abundance in the earth to supply all the wants of man. There is no lack of any element that is necessary for man's happiness; there is no lack of food, no lack of materials to make clothing, to build houses, to ornament our dwellings, to beautify our Temples and our public structures. None need go hungry, or naked, or houseless. What is it, then, that produces the misery that we read about, and that we sometimes see? What is it that produces the destitution among the nations of the earth, and, to some extent, among us? It is because there is something lacking in the organization of society. These anarchists feel it; these societies of various kinds feel it; but their methods of reaching the desired end are not from God; therefore they fail. Fourier tried it; so did St. Simon. Owen tried it in England, and afterwards in America. Many other reformers have tried from time to time to correct these existing evils; but up to the present they have failed. The Icarian society, I believe, took possession of Nauvoo after we were driven out from there. They succeeded for a little while in maintaining the organization, but it eventually fell to pieces. So it has been with all these man-made schemes. How shall these things be corrected? If they are not corrected by God raising up a people they never will be corrected. The Lord is not going to come down in person; He is not going to send His angels from heaven to do the work that we can do. He does not do things in that way; but He inspires His children on the earth. This earth is not always going to be the pandemonium it is today, in some respects. It is not always going to be the hell it is today for millions of human beings who are suffering and toiling and going down to the grave in misery, as they are in almost every land. He is not going to allow this to continue; for this fair earth was created for man's abode and happiness. Satan, however, has obtained power over man, and it seems as though he had got possession of this earth, and that it would always remain as it is now. But not so. Men have said, "Why don't the Lord kill the devil?" Well, the devil answers his purpose, in his place. We are here to be tested and tried. There is a war between Satan and God. We are brethren and sisters of Satan as well as of Jesus. It may be startling doctrine to many to say this; but Satan is our brother. Jesus is our brother. We are the children of God. God begot us in the spirit in the eternal worlds. This fight that I speak of arose, as we are told, over the question as to how man should work out his earthly probation in a tabernacle of flesh and bones and obtain redemption. Satan differed from God, and he rebelled. We are told in the scriptures that he drew after him one third of the family of God. They thought his plan better than that of the Savior Jesus Christ. From that time until the present he has been struggling to destroy the plans of Jehovah, and to seduce the children of men—his brothers and sisters—from their allegiance to God. Invisible to mortal eyes, he has exerted tremendous power; and because he has been invisible, men have almost denied his existence. Yet the evidence of his existence and of his power is to be seen on every hand. He is determined, if he can, to destroy the plans of God while we are here in a state of probation. We were faithful to God in our first estate in the presence of God; for we were part of the two thirds who were loyal to our Father. Then the Father said, "You shall have tabernacles, and I will test you again, because I mean to give all who are faithful exaltation;" and He sent us here to be tempted and tried, to see whether in the exercise of our agency we would be faithful to Him in this condition of darkness—in what may be termed our second estate. If we are faithful and true to God, we shall receive glory, as our Lord and Savior, who is our elder brother, has received and will receive, and we shall be with Him. This fight is going on. Satan is waging it. He has killed every prophet and righteous man he could. He has resorted to lies, and filled the earth with them, by means of which the righteous have been slain from time to time. We who are here today have known something of the result of his lies. We have felt them in our lives. He has circulated slanders about us and filled the earth with misrepresentations of everything that was pure and holy, in order to destroy us. He was the means of slaying the Son of God—the most holy and pure Being that ever came in the flesh; and he has slain prophets since then. Prophets and righteous men in our day have been slain in like manner; and some of us who now live might have been slain if the Lord had not preserved us. Satan has been doing everything of this character purposely to destroy the work of God.

Now, the Lord has spoken concerning this work in the last days. He has said it shall triumph. This Church that God has organized is here to remain. It will never be overthrown. It will remain and increase until it fills the whole earth. Wickedness will be abolished, and righteousness will be established. God has spoken it through His servants, and it is embalmed in the records that have come down to us. And we are the people to effect this, my brethren and sisters.

I intended to have shown you some of the plans that the Lord has revealed to accomplish this end, but I see that I have not time. I want to say, however, before I sit down that it is our duty to endeavor as far as we possibly can to bring ourselves into such a condition that this perfect order of which I speak can be put in operation among us. It cannot be done in a minute, in a day, in a week, or in a month; it may require years; but we can prepare ourselves for this. We can divest ourselves of our selfishness. We can teach our children, that they may grow up with stronger faith and more resolute determination than we have, that they will, with God's help, accomplish this change in the earth for the benefit of mankind. We already see, in our gathering together, what God can do. There is no limit to His power. He asks us to do that which He commands us, and He will do the rest. We need not have fear concerning this work. It will roll forth with irresistible power, until it accomplishes all that has been promised. And we shall live, it not in the flesh, to behold it and take part in that great millennial glory, towards which the eyes of all inspired men have been directed from the beginning. God grant that we may live, and our children after us, to take part in all this, is my prayer in our behalf, in the name of Jesus. Amen.

Written for this Paper.
UNCLE SAM'S CLERKS.

Do you want a government job?

The hours are easy.

The work is light.

The pay is good.

Uncle Sam never scales his wages, and you get your money for the asking every fifteen days. These big government factories never shut down. The tariff and the hard times do not affect them, and the man who works for the government can laugh at fate and finances. The thousands who are out of employment throughout the United States ought to look into the matter. Right here in Washington millions upon millions of dollars are paid out every year in salaries, and there are lots of fat, easy places. I have been looking over the report which the committee of Congress have just made on the subject, and I find that the patronage is by no means equally divided. There are more than 17,000 clerks in Washington, but nearly one-third of this number are related to one another. Think of it. There are fifty-six hundred people in the departments whose blood flows, more or less, in the same channels, and there are more than one thousand who have two relatives in Uncle Sam's employ. Most of these government clerks get at least $1000 a year, and at this average $5,000,000 are paid out annually to parties related to each other. Think of the millions of Uncle Sam's nephews and nieces scattered over this land who cannot get near enough the public crib to have a smell for themselves or their families, and look at these figures. There are 279 cases in which clerks have three relatives employed in the departments here, ninety-six in which the number of relatives are four, ten in which they number six and two in which there are nine clerks related to one another in the government service. There are lots of husbands and wives employed in the departments, and there are more than 900 brothers who work for Uncle Sam. The number of sisters is not quite so large, but it runs between six and seven hundred, and there are sons and daughters, fathers and mothers, uncles and nephews and cousins and aunts galore. In the Interior Department alone nearly fifteen hundred of the clerks have relatives in the government service here, and there are almost thirteen hundred treasury clerks who have blood relations in that or other government departments. It is a tradition of the service that no relatives should be employed in the different offices, and that there should be only one of a family, but this one-third of the service has gotten in, and it is here to stay.

I now and then hear the clerks objecting to their hard work. Take a look at the job and see what you think of it! The office hours are, you know, from 9 until 4. No one comes to the department before 9, and from that time until 12 you are supposed to put in three hours of clerical labor. At 12 you have a half hour for lunch, and you are a very good clerk if you get to doing hard work before 1. At 4 you go out with the rest of the army on to the streets and do not bother yourself again about work until 9 o'clock the next morning. One month out of the year you have to yourself and can go where you please and do what you please, and your pay goes on just the same. If you are sick your wages are not docked, and I know of clerks who get from thirty to sixty days now and then as sick leave. As to wages, there is no question about the salary; that is fixed by the government, and as long as you are in Uncle Sam's employ it cannot be raised or lowered by the officials just above you. Every two weeks you go to the pay office of the department in which you are working and your money is handed over to you in crisp new greenbacks, or sometimes in gold. If you are a good man your job is pretty sure to continue, and a great number of these clerks have been in the service for years; some, indeed, have spent a lifetime there, and there is one old clerk here who has been drawing a salary for sixty years from Uncle Sam. There are others who have worked from forty to fifty years, and the number who have been in from one to four years runs well up into the thousands. The number who have been just ten years in the service is more than seven hundred, and there are hundreds more who have been in from twelve to fifteen years. A great many clerks have been twenty years or more in the service, and the tenure of government office is by no means as uncertain as is generally supposed. The surety of holding a position increases every year, and the civil service rules are being so extended that only the chiefs will finally be dismissed at the close of an administration.

As to salaries, in proportion to the amount of work done and its character, they are as high as those of any laborers of the world. Uncle Sam's factories are run on a big salary basis, and the classified service get, as a rule, from $900 to $1,800 a year. The chiefs get $2,000 and upward, and there are fat places in nearly every department which command $3,000, $4,000 and $5,000. The Department of Justice, for instance, has three offices which bring between $4,000 and $5,000, and the assistant attorney generals each receive as much as a Congressman. In the Department of Agriculture there are a number of good $2,000 places, and the government of the District has about twenty offices which run from $2,000 to $5,000 in salary. The officials who govern Washington city are all appointed by the President, and the salaries received are good. The Post Office Department has many high salaried places, and there are a number of soft spots connected with the White House whose possessors have neither crow's feet at their eyes nor wrinkles in their bellies. The best positions, in point of certainty of tenure, are those connected with the State, War and Navy departments. The clerks of the State Department are rather aristocrats than otherwise. They generally speak one or two languages, and when it is necessary to shelve them they are sometimes sent to consulships on the other side of the world. The treasury has numerous changes. It contains over 4,000 employes, and of these 1,600 are women.

And just here I want to say a word about these women clerks of Washington. They are the brightest and ablest people in the service. They do their work continuously, and some of the most efficient of Uncle Sam's employes are females. If I had my way I would give the women the preference as to all classes of work which they can possibly do, reserving only the harder places for the men. As it is, however, there are two men to every woman in the departments, and the number of women all told amounts to less than 7,000. These women are of all ages, from eighteen to eighty, and there is, by the way, one clerk in the Treasury Department who has now reached ninety years. There are many women over sixty and hundreds of sweet young maidens of twenty-five. These women do all sorts of work. Starting in as counters in the treasury about a generation ago, they have extended their work to all sorts of clerkship, and they now pass upon questions of law, examine patents, translate foreign languages, and do everything under the sun. Some of the most expert counters of the government are women, and several of the very best bookkeepers of the treasury wear petticoats. Women are fast making their way as typewriters and stenographers, and the chief trouble to the outside employer of labor here at Washington is that as soon as he trains a woman thoroughly into his work as typewriter or stenographer she makes an application to Uncle Sam and gets a place at a higher salary in one of the departments. I have had this experience happen to me half a dozen times, and I have come to look upon my office here as a kind of a training school for the government service. In the dead letter office the most expert translators of bad writing are women, and it would surprise you to know that the Treasury Department has a woman lawyer who prepares the briefs for internal revenue matters and who could probably make more outside of the department by practicing law than she gets by acting as a law clerk within it. There are a number of women editors in the service here at Washington. The official records of the war of the rebellion are to a certain extent gotten up by women, and in the Navy Department you find women who are making maps and tracing charts for our ships in different parts of the world, and in the government printing office there are women typesetters, stitchers, press feeders and compositors.

Everyone has heard of the pretty girls of the treasury, but you find beautiful maidens in all of these government departments. Hoke Smith directs the handiwork of 1,500 girls, and Dan Lamont has a company of 114 in his department of war. Postmaster General Bissell has hundreds of maidens under him, and in the government printing office there are more than a 1,000 women. Many of these come of the best families of the country. Not a few are the daughters of noted generals, governors of states, Senators and Representatives, and now and then you find a relative of a President or a cabinet minister. The majority of them are women of good education, and with but few exceptions they are educated and refined ladies. They receive salaries ranging from $720 to $1,800 a year, and a large number of them support families. Many of them are widows, not a few are old maids, and thousands are sweet, marriageable young women, who have too much sense to change a sure living under Uncle Sam to a prospective one in company with some good-for-nothing man. The best of them are, open to engagements, and not a few of the most noted marriages of Washington in the past have been in connection with the government clerks. Attorney General Brewster, who has the ugliest face which ever entered a government department at Washington, got his wife, whose features were Venus-like in their beauty, in a government department here. She was the daughter of Robert J. Walker, a former Secretary of the Treasury, and as she sat at her desk one day in the treasury department the future Attorney General walked through the room. She made some remarks about his homeliness. I do not know whether Brewster overheard it or not, but he saw her, and with him it was a case of love at first sight. He sought an introduction and shortly afterward offered her his hand and his wealth, and his name for herself and her children. It is said that he proposed to her in words something like this: "My dear, you are beautiful and I am hideous, but if you will marry me it will not be the first instance of mating the beauty and the beast, and I assure you that you will never regret marrying me." His proposition was accepted, and the next time Mrs. Brewster came to Washington it was as the wife of the Attorney General of the United States. Stephen A. Douglas got his wife in one of the departments at Washington, and you all remember what a talk there was about Secretary Bayard and Miss Markoe during the time that Bayard was at the head of the State department.

It is a wonder to me that there are not more marriages among the clerks. Young men and young women of marriageable age work side by side in the departments. They come in contact with each other hourly and sometimes fall in love with one another, but not often. In the bureau of engraving and printing, where the money is made, there is one man and one woman at every printing press, and there is no separation of the sexes. There are, I believe, more platonic friendships here among young men and young women than you will find anywhere else in the country, and cases have been known where couples have married and kept their marriages a secret for years in order to avoid the rule that a husband and wife shall not be employed at the same time in the civil service at Washington. Many such cases have been found out, and the recent investigation of the congressional committee will probably lead to some changes in this respect. According to its report, there were last fall twenty-four husbands and wives drawing salaries from Uncle Sam, which the husband and wives who are out of work and have no job at all think is decidedly unfair.

Does Uncle Sam really pay good wages?

To hear some of the clerks talk about the matter you would think he does not, and, perhaps, in proportion to the amount of responsibility involved they receive small salaries. One clerk tells me that the big men of the departments have the softest places and most money, while the poorly paid clerks do the work. There is no doubt that many a $1,000 clerk does the same work for which another clerk is paid $1,200 and $1,400, and many a woman at $900 is doing thoroughly work which a $1,400 man is half doing at her side. Still, $1,000 is a pretty good pay, and the chief objection of these government positions that the employes have little chance to rise. They may get up to $1,400, $1,600 and perhaps $1,800 a year, but their chances are small and the limit is fixed. It is seldom that a clerk becomes a cabinet minister, though cases of this kind have been known in the past. Horatio King went into the Post Office Department as a clerk at $1,000 a year and he acted as Postmaster General under Buchanan. There are assistant secretaries in the departments who have been clerks, but the majority of the men who go into the great mills of Uncle Sam are ground between the upper and nether mill stone and soon become, as far as energy, push and ambitious work is concerned, inanimate power.

You have all heard the story of how Salmon P. Chase once came to his uncle, who was then in the United States Senate, and asked for a government job. His uncle told him he would give him a dollar to buy an ax or a spade, but that he would not aid him in digging his own grave in one of Uncle Sam's official cemeteries. Postmaster General Bissell told me not long ago that he did not consider the government departments a good place for young men, and there is no doubt but that an enterprising, energetic young fellow had better keep away from the government service. The hours are short and all the tendencies are to laziness and good-for-nothingness. A man has to have very positive qualities in order not to be turned into a machine, and all the tendencies are to extravagancies in living. Washington is a city of rich young men and a place in which nearly every man lives up to his income. It is a city containing many installment houses, and I know of society women as well as government clerks who buy the dresses which they wear at all fashionable receptions on installments, and who have not always paid for them by the time they are worn out. The business houses of Washington expect people to run bills, and they have their settlements just after the government pay days at the 15th or the last of the month. Comparatively few of the government clerks save money and only the fewest try to make any money out of that which they do save.

Washington is a great place for people to go into debt, and there is a small class of the government clerks who are in the habit of borrowing money at 10 per cent a month. There are about the Capitol and the different departments brokers who lend money at this rate, and they turn up about pay day in order to catch the clerks who owe them. They know their money is good and they lose but little. Instances have been known of clerks who have paid $10 a month for ten years for the use of $100, and the majority of those who borrow at this rate do not appreciate how much interest they are paying. It used to be that such brokers when they could not get the money on time would make complaints to the chiefs of the departments and through them would collect their bills. This has been abolished of late years, and no note shaver has now any control over the salaries of the clerks. Brokers of this kind were in times past connected with Congress, and I know of a past sergeant-at-arms who made a fortune in this way. He would lend money at high rates to Congressmen and deduct the amount when he came to give them their salaries. The employes of the Capitol and Congressmen sometimes anticipate their pay in this way even now, but it is done very quietly and no one hears of it.

A WORTHY EXAMPLE.

PLEASANT GROVE, March 26, 1894.—On the 16th day of April, 1890, the presidency of the Utah Stake, in company with some of the Twelve Apostles, held a meeting at Pleasant Grove, and as the ward had extended on every side it was considered advisable to divide it into three wards. The first ward, being the most central, retained the meeting house (which had just been cleaned up and repainted by the united efforts of the whole ward). It was necessary for the two new wards to each provide a meeting house. On May 1st, 1890, the Bishop and counselors and the other members of the Second ward held a meeting and appointed a committee of five to select a place and build a meeting house. This committee has faithfully labored to this end as fast as the limited resources of the members of the ward would allow them, until March 24, 1894, when they were able to report the house finished and properly furnished with everything necessary for comfort and reverence of worship—a good grove growing, the grounds properly graded and fenced and everything connected with the lot and house and its furniture paid for—the total cost of it all being three thousand two hundred and fifty dollars.

On Sunday, March 25, 1894, Elders Heber J. Grant and Abraham H. Cannon of the Council of the Apostles, with members of the Utah Stake presidency and High Council and other friends from the adjoining wards, met with us and dedicated the building to the Lord. The visitors were met at the entrance to the grounds by about two hundred Sunday School children who greeted them with a song of welcome under the direction of our choir leader, A. W. Harper. The meetings were called to order at 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. by Bishop James Cobbley. Elder Heber J. Grant offered the dedicatory prayer, and wise and timely counsel and words of comfort and encouragement were given by the visitors and others who addressed the meetings. The choir sang some appropriate pieces and a good spirit prevailed. The Saints feel humble and thankful to their Heavenly Father for their place of worship.

JOSEPH W. ASH, Clerk.

P. S.—I may add, in order that Saints in other wards in similar circumstances may be encouraged to try to unite their humble efforts and have a creditable place of worship, that we are all poor people and our prospects when we started to build were very discouraging; our ward consists of about eighty families, ten of them being widows with families and others very poor; but with one grand united effort we started and God has blessed our labors.

PAROWAN STAKE CONFERENCE.

The regular quarterly conference of the Parowan Stake of Zion convened in the Cedar City tabernacle on Sunday, March 18th, 1894, at 10 a.m. There were present, of the Stake Presidency, Uriah T. Jones, Morgan Richards Jr. and Francis Webster, members of the High Council, Bishops of wards and a very good attendance of the Saints.

After the opening exercises the time was occupied in listening to the reports of the Stake superintendency of the Sunday schools and Y. M. M. I. associations, which were reported to be in a flourishing condition. The Bishops reported their several wards, and a marked improvement among the Saints in some of the wards was perceptible.

In the afternoon we were blessed with the presence of Elder David H. Cannon, president of the St. George Temple, whose instructions to the Saints of this Stake were very encouraging, and calculated to greatly benefit all who were willing to profit by them.

In the evening a Priesthood meeting was held, at which the brethren received valuable instructions from Elders Jones, Richards and Cannon.

Conference was called to order on Monday the 19th at 10 a. m. After singing and prayer, the statistical report of the Stake was read, and the general and local authorities and list of home missionaries were presented and sustained by a unanimous vote of the assembly. Elder Edward Dalton addressed the Saints, exhorting them to be diligent in performing the duties required of them. The remainder of the time was profitably occupied by Elder M. Richards Jr.

2 p. m. The speakers Monday afternoon were Elders D. H. Cannon, F. Webster, R. W. Heyborne and Uriah Jones, all of them instructing the Saints to be diligent in the great work of the Lord in these last days. Some of the subjects treated upon during the conference were Temple labor for the living and the dead, the example that should be set before the youth, the financial condition of the people, and the starting and sustaining of home industries.

The singing by the Cedar City tabernacle choir under the able leadership of Professor Joseph Coslett was a marked feature of the conference. The visitors to the conference were very hospitably entertained by the brethren and sisters of the Cedar ward.

JAMES CONNELL,
Asst. Stake Clerk.

The registry lists in these several wards of Central City, Colo., show a total registration of 1,146 voters, of which 806 are male and 340 female. The highest number of female voters registered in one ward is that of the First, where the names of 123 appear, in the Second 80, in the Third 86, in the Fourth 48. The prospects are, says a special to the Denver News, that next Tuesday the largest vote ever polled in the city for years will be attested by the number of votes cast for municipal honors.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

THE GRAND SECRET.

The life and prosperity of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in the face of so-called wounds and troubles that would have been popularly supposed to be fatal to it, forms one of the real marvels of the latter days. One acute observer, a paper that has been none too friendly to the Saints in times past, recently devotes a long article to the subject; and, noting that a great many missionaries of the Church are being sent out, and that the remotest bounds of the earth and the distant isles of the sea are not overlooked by the zealous ambassadors of the Gospel tidings, it calmly concludes that "there is a great revival in Mormonism, and it is one of the most conspicuous religious signs of the times." The renewal of missionary activity in commented upon with many friendly words for the self-sacrificing spirit and the diligence of the Elders, and this it is which, regarded as a sample of the faith of the whole people, explains away, in large measure, the mystery that although seemingly fatally injured at several times in its career, the Church still pursues its successful way. Not every religious organization, to its friendly critic observes, could have withstood in the days of its infancy the murder of its founder and leader; not every sect could have survived the loss of so forceful and indispensable a chieftain as that founder's successor, Brigham Young; not every religious body could have emerged unscathed from the wars against its power, the assaults upon its tenets, and all the enmity of vilification and malice that have been the Mormons' constant portion; not every church made up of "peculiar people" and entertaining peculiar views would have escaped injury through the prosperity of those of its believers who have built up Utah—"It is not every religion that can stand up under the affluence of its adherents."

To the world all this may seem something of a miracle. To the Saints it is nothing but the fulfillment of the grand plan. Some have faltered and fallen under each of the opposing influences above enumerated. But the faithful expect and must be prepared to be tried in all things. And each new ordeal only strengthens their courage, in showing to them, as it should show those not of them, that "if the work be of man it will come to naught; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it."

A NEW SECT.

A new religious movement—and if reports are true, the most peculiar of the many offshoots of the main Christian bodies, has recently been started in St. Louis. A paper published in that place gives an interesting account of the aims of its promoters as well as the means they propose to employ.

The name is the World's Missionary Association and it is formed, for the purpose of offering salvation to every soul in every land. The members preach holiness and social purity, the necessity of recognizing the influence of the Holy Ghost, healing by faith, the tithing system, the equality of the sexes as to ordination for ecclesiastical offices and the duty to preach without salary.

This last point is one which is attracting much attention. The president of the association, Mr. C. S. Hanley, says ministers should live only on what voluntary contributions they can receive. If they are hungry or need clothing, they ought to have faith enough to present the matter to the Almighty in prayer, and they shall obtain what they absolutely need. But in order to be in a position to pray with perfect confidence their needs must be reduced to a minimum. All sorts of ornaments are superfluous and cannot be the subject of prayers. What he calls "Apostolic simplicity" must be the rule in everything. Their separation from the world must include such things as intemperance, the use of tobacco, the wearing of gold, pearls and all sorts of jewelry, as well as clothes made of costly material. Church sociables, theaters, concerts, corsets, bangs, feathers, ruffles, lace, plug hats, mustaches and fancy hair dressing are especially and severely condemned.

The founder of this association was formerly a Free Methodist clergyman, but his aggressive doctrines rendered him distasteful to the church and he parted company with his associates, as General Booth had to do when the Salvation Army was inaugurated. It numbers at present only thirty members in St. Louis, but has branches in a few other places. They are fond of referring to it as the Pentecostal movement, anticipating for it world wide success.

This new religious sect is hardly sufficiently known as yet to allow of an extensive criticism of its tenets and methods. Its advocacy of faith as an all powerful principle is certainly correct as is its condemnation of the prevailing custom to handle the word of life as merchandise to be bought and sold at so much a year. The word of God in all ages sustains this position most emphatically. But the anxiety to avoid all worldly appearance even in clothing seems to be fostered by a misapprehension of the root of the evil against which their efforts are directed as well as ignorance of the proper remedy. Yet the stand taken by them in this respect will be mildly criticized when it is remembered to what almost criminal extravagance many professed Christians have allowed themselves to drift, and how they are drawing others with them in the current that has proved destructive to vast numbers. Extremes are always near; but a step separates one from the other, and the reaction which these, let us hope, honest souls have caused in earnest is as natural as a sensation of chill in a fever.

Nevertheless, it is well to remember that asceticism is not a mark of holiness. The fact is that the Heavenly Father never prohibited His children from cultivating a taste for what is beautiful. Ornaments adorned His Temples of old and the clothes of those who officiated therein. Our Savior, Himself, wore a piece of clothing so precious that even the rude soldiers at the cross perceived that to cut it to pieces would be to spoil it. The absence of jewels and ointments and so on is spoken of by ancient prophets as a calamity to Israel, to overtake them on account of their sins, but when they were in favor with God, these things were never alluded to in depreciating terms. Clearly a people can serve God acceptably and yet bestow such care on their personal appearance as is consistent with good, moral customs.

The evil comes in when enjoyment and luxury are made the aim of life; when such things are sought after in the first place and the Kingdom of God in the second, or what is more frequent, not at all; or when people seek only their own enjoyment forgetting the poor sufferer at the door. What the world needs is not to be jostled from one extremity to another, but it needs a teacher who can point out the true path of salvation and teach it how to serve God in all things, including the right use of such things as God has provided for the use of His children and which are so abundant in the world in which we are placed.

THE SEIGNIORAGE VETO.

The President's veto of the bill to provide for the coinage of the silver seigniorage was not much of a surprise to those who seriously thought of his attitude on the financial question; nor can it be much of a disappointment to the most ardent of those who, forgetful of his past attitude, hoped he might be prevailed upon to approve the bill as a sort of compromise with the free silver element of his party. Indeed, the chief wonder is that a measure so unimportant in its results and so inconsiderable in its benefits, should have aroused such interest and activity on the respective parts of its friends and its enemies. It was at best a half-way measure, satisfactory to neither side in the controversy, and altogether unworthy the gigantic efforts of those who have championed it, as well as the extreme pressure its foes have brought against it. Its enactment would in no sense have warranted the claim that silver's rights were at last about to be fully recognized; its defeat is not to be regarded as an evidence that the gold idea is making headway as against the white metal. The only real benefit its friends might have expected if success had crowned their labors would have been the moral effect and victory—and this would have been largely sentimental; as to any material aid to the cause of free silver or bimetallism, the bill was simply null.

In stating his objections, the President criticizes unsparingly the language as well as the spirit of the bill. His references to the former smack much of the pleading of the advocate, because weak technicalities are dignified as the objects of derision. When he comes, however, to the actual meaning of the proposed provisions, he reasons forcefully and with courage; and from his standpoint makes a really admirable argument. One feature at least of the message is characteristic: there is no manifestation of a spirit of compromise or surrender—the idea being that whatever is wrong must not be winked at or encouraged, although there is the expression of a mysterious hope at the close of the document that some way will present itself in the near future for the adjustment of our monetary affairs in such a comprehensive and conservative manner “as will afford to silver its proper place in our currency.” In view of the fact that Mr. Cleveland called Congress specially together to repeal the Sherman law and approved their labors to that end, and that he has now disapproved of the only other silver legislation that has been attempted, it would be interesting to know just what he regards as silver’s “proper place in our currency” and how he would propose to put it there.

Meanwhile, it is to be expected that the agitation in and out of Congress will go on. The western men will probably cease to spend time and effort upon half-way measures, and the lines between the “goldites” and the “silverites” will be more sharply drawn. We suppose it is necessary that this sort of education should be had and that monetary debates and controversies will be still deemed essential to the interest of legitimate legislative history. And yet we cannot restrain the opinion that the cause of silver and the welfare of the country would be promoted by a more or less complete rest from the agitation for some time to come.

THE THREATENED WAR.

Last season there was considerable trouble between cattlemen and sheep herders on the plateau east of Grand Junction, Colorado, in which there were many threats against life and property, and in which the latter suffered severely, there being a large number of sheep killed. The statement was made that sheep owners who reside in Utah kept their flocks over in Colorado, and the farmers in Mesa and Delta counties, in the Centennial state, objected; it was also asserted that the sheep did great damage—a claim that was denied by the sheep owners.

Now comes the announcement in the Denver papers that there is imminent danger of another “war” on the Utah-Colorado line, and the statement is made that unless some action is taken by the authorities the militia will be needed within thirty days. It is claimed by the sheep farmers of Delta county that by the location of sheep by Utah men in Mesa county the headwaters of the water supply of Delta people are being ruined, and that the Utah sheep are introducing disease into their midst. Mr. Colby, of Montrose, as the representative of the Delta county men, has been making a statement to this effect to the state veterinarian, Dr. Grasswell, who will take steps to prevent diseased sheep from being brought into the state. Mr. Colby and

Mr. King, a Montrose lawyer, intend to proceed to Washington, it is said, to lay before the Federal authorities a petition signed by 2,000 persons, asking that the sheep owned by Utah men be kept out.

There is no doubt bad blood between the parties in the controversy, and it is equally certain that the statements made by the Coloradoans are exaggerated greatly beyond the facts. There is absolutely no danger of the militia being needed if the law officers do their duty in an impartial manner; but some people in Colorado seem to have a craze just now for calling out troops and threatening bloody work. If the sheep owners complained of were disregarding any law, they would be quickly arrested and severely punished. From the fact that there is no prosecution against them it would appear that they have not violated any statute, and if those who oppose them are kept within legal bounds there will be no trouble. It is alleged that the sheep owners are Mormons, and this statement is used in a prejudicial manner toward them. As a matter of fact, some of the largest sheep owners complained of are not Mormons at all, and these are the ones with whom the trouble has been and now is, and who have had hundreds of dollars’ worth of sheep shot down by the Delta farmers. They insist that they are entitled to keep their flocks on the ranges named, and tell a very different story to that related by Mr. Colby and his associates.

As for the trouble on the Utah-Colorado line, it is of the same character as that which exists almost everywhere in the West where the sheep are herded near cultivated districts or close to streams that supply settlements with water, and there are faults on both sides. Sheepmen are sometimes too careless, and the farmers grow angry and want the wool producers wiped out; the sheep complained of in this case occupy ranges which the complainants want for themselves. That is the substance of the whole matter. The difficulties that exist can and should be settled by fair and lawful methods. But to introduce into the controversy threats of war and religious prejudices, as is being done on the present occasion, is a piece of criminality which Coloradoans ought to be heartily ashamed of.

A POLITICAL PROPHET.

Reverend Andrew Jackson Jones, a colored brother of exceptional zeal in the cause of Christianity as he understands it, for some time past and at present still is engaged in the somewhat discouraging task of shaking up certain Ohio cities with dire predictions of impending calamities. He is locally referred to as the “Black Prophet,” and his followers themselves apply the term to him in all affection. As to his claims to the prophetic gift, it is asserted that he foresaw and foretold the Johnstown flood, the assassination of Mayor Harrison of Chicago, the result of the last presidential election, besides various other events in recent Ohio history; and now he comes along with the prediction that the American people have entered upon a most critical period of time, and between this date and 1881 they will be subjected to almost unheard of woes and desolation. “Famines of bread, famines of water, earthquakes and destructive plagues, and storms which shall carry away multitudes,” are among the things in prospect, to be capped by the bloodiest war the country has ever seen. Pittsburg is to be consumed by natural gas, Chicago is to go up in flame and smoke, Philadelphia’s destruction is to be by wind, New York’s by business disaster, riots and the waves of the sea, while Cincinnati and other Ohio towns are promised the widest kind of an assortment of trouble and woe.

There is no portion of this gloomy program that is impossible of fulfillment; but the part that will excite the greatest doubt is the proposed termination and cure of these various difficulties, which in Rev. Mr. Jones’s view will happen in 1881 through the elevation of a colored man to the Presidency and his residence in the White House. The “black prophet’s” peculiar and present mission, therefore, is to proclaim the coming ascendancy of the colored race in America. The Republican party, he maintains, has shirked its duties since the war was over, and “now as a punishment the country has been given over to the devil for a term of years, with Grover Cleveland as a special ambassador to carry out the plans of Satan.”

WHAT IS A CHRISTIAN?

In his religious crusade in California the noted Methodist preacher, Dr. C. H. Yatman, is startling some of the good people in that locality by informing them that they are not Christians in the true sense of the word, whether they are church members or not. He insists upon this declaration, and at a big meeting on Sunday evening explained that there was not one of them who had the witness of the Holy Spirit. He said going to church would not give it to them, for the devil attended religious meetings and found plenty to do; nor would giving money to the church do it, for saloon-keepers and gamblers often did more in that line than the average so-called Christian. Then, to clinch his argument he declared, “There is not a Christian in this tent tonight, not one; I do not except even myself.”

Perhaps the reverend gentleman was right; we know of no reason for doubting his statement. Certainly he must know his own position so far as receiving the witness of the Holy Spirit is concerned, and he probably could fairly describe his audience in that respect, since none questioned his arraignment, and he was acquainted with their general situation in religious matters. And possibly it was his knowledge of his own condition which prompted him to refrain from telling his auditors how to become true Christians; his exhortation to worship the Supreme Being by good deeds as well as words was, however, most commendable.

“What is a Christian?” is a question of sufficient importance to those who look to the good book for guidance to have it answered correctly and understandingly. Webster says that a Christian is “one whose inward and outward life is conformed to the doctrines of Christ"—a terse and comprehensive definition. Then to become a Christian it is essential, first, to ascertain the doctrines taught by the Divine Master; and second, to conform, or render obedience thereto.

To learn of the doctrines of the Lord it is natural to turn to the New Testament—the record of His ministry on earth. It is there recorded that the angel who heralded the birth of the infant Jesus announced that He should "save His people from their sins." This is the burden of the promise throughout the Scriptures to all Christians, whether they lived in the earlier centuries or the later times of the world's history. Through the atonement all men were to be raised from the dead; but the salvation accorded to individuals thus brought forth was a promise to "specially them that believe,"—to those that were numbered as "the people" of the Lord, the true Christians. Except men came within this rule they should "in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven."

The New Testament also relates how that John the Baptist was "sent from God," as "the messenger before his face." This forerunner of the Christ taught faith in the Divine Master, required the people to repent, and to those who received his message by heeding the same he administered the ordinance of the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, and promised that the greater One who followed should baptize them with the Holy Ghost, thus giving them "the witness of the Holy Spirit," and confirming them as members of His Church, or "His people," and constituting them true Christians. To those who were faithful in maintaining the calling thus bestowed, the promise was available that they should be saved from their sins—having repented thereof and received the ordinance for their remission.

When Christ came in His ministry as the promised greater One, His labors and teachings confirmed all that John the Baptist had done as His messenger. There was no variance from and no change of doctrines or ordinances. John had led believers in Christ through the door of baptism to Him to receive the witness of the Spirit; and the Lord declared that those who rejected this baptism, and consequently those principles which led up to it, "rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of him." John the Baptist possessed divine authority to make his acts efficacious to salvation; he was "sent from God," not man. After the crucifixion of the Lord the Apostles followed the rule in which He had instructed them; they dared not vary therefrom in their holy calling. Therefore Peter, the chief Apostle, required those who believed the testimony concerning Christ to repent and be baptized, by those having authority to officiate in that ordinance, for the remission of their sins; and after this baptism of the water they received the Holy Ghost—the witness of the Spirit—"through the laying on of the Apostles' hands." In doing this the Apostles and those who received their testimony performed acts which constituted them true Christians—they conformed to the doctrines of Christ.

A Christian, therefore, is one who believes and obeys the doctrines and ordinances of the Gospel; he is one who not only admits in his mental judgment the correctness of Gospel principles, but by conforming therewith becomes a member of the Church of Christ—one of His people. The Lord says, "He that believeth on me the works that I do shall he do also;" and by the logical force of this rule those who do not the works of Christ are non-believers, notwithstanding any profession they may make. Certain it is that the believers are the workers in a given line.

Jesus did the will of His Father, observing His counsel in all things according to the strength which He possessed. Because He had more power than ordinary mortals He was able to keep the law more perfectly in the eyes of men. Those weaker ones who do their best in following Him are perfect in their sphere as He is in His, for the Lord requires of no man more than he is able by the divine blessing to perform. But efforts at doing must be in harmony with the doctrines of Christ to receive His blessing. The true Christian is the person who renders obedience to the divine law, in its principles, ordinances and authority, to the extent of his ability. It is not a fanciful condition, beyond the reach of men, but is within the scope of those who receive the Gospel message. "He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son," and therefore is a Christian and in the enjoyment of "the witness of the Holy Spirit;" while "whosoever transgresseth and abideth not the doctrine of Christ, hath not God," and is non-Christian because of his failure to obey the divine counsel.

RINSING THE STOMACH.

Since the detailed statement made in the NEWS some time ago of the case of a young man in this city who had a novel but effectual experience in being relieved of dyspepsia, there have been several residents of Salt Lake who have been similarly benefited. One lady in particular, the wife of a prominent citizen, had given up all hope of life. She was naturally delicate, and her health had been failing for years. Temporary relief had been afforded by physicians, but the malady persistently refused to succumb to the treatment applied, and the patient grew weaker and more distressed at each recurring attack, until family and friends prepared to meet the sad event which they regarded as inevitable.

The lady was in this situation when she read in the NEWS the article referred to. It aroused new hopes and she determined on having her stomach washed out in the manner described in the case spoken of. The treatment was pursued under the direction of her physician, and though it was attended with some difficulty at first, it was persisted in, until now the lady is wholly relieved from her stomach trouble. To use her own words: "I am in splendid health. I haven't felt so well for twenty years." She is approaching the age of three score and ten, and though she shows the marks of her former illness, her step has become firm and elastic again as of a woman much younger, and her manner is blythe and cheerful.

In other cases beneficial results have followed the treatment, and in some instances where there have been a complication of troubles the process has enabled the physician to work a cure when without it his medicines have failed to produce the desired effect. Some of the leading physicians of the city now accord "laundering of the stomach," as it is termed in medical slang, the strongest endorsement, and express their firm belief that at last a remedy has been discovered for an exasperatingly progressive affection of the stomach. Not only in this city, but among the medical wisecracks throughout the country and Europe, the stomach siphon, which was used first in Paris, receives warm commendation. Not long since, Dr. Cyrus Edson, of New York, speaking of the new process, said: "If we had known of this two years ago Mr. Blaine would have been alive today. Here we are, puzzling our brains over medicine, when lying about almost at our feet, as it were, was the simplest of remedies, and the only remedy which would have cured him. There are many other prominent men now dead who might be still living had they enjoyed the opportunity of having their stomachs washed." It is also stated that if the stomach were "laundered" every two or three months, dyspepsia would have no chance of gaining a foothold.

The NEWS has been requested to make again a brief statement of the operation, in order that afflicted people may have renewed opportunity of considering it. The apparatus consists of a rubber tube from four to six feet long, a small section at one end being less flexible than the rest of the pipe, and containing two slots for the passage of the liquid; at the other end is a rubber funnel into which to pour water. The small end of the tube is thrust into the throat, or more properly speaking, the œsophagus, and crowded or swallowed down to the stomach. At first there is an unpleasant choking sensation caused by the presence of an unusual article and by the nervousness of the individual, but this is said to pass away after a few trials. When the end of the tube reaches the bottom of the stomach, a quart or more of comfortably warm water is poured in at the funnel, until the stomach is full. The water is allowed to remain a few minutes, during which time nature conducts the rinsing process. Then the person leans forward until the funnel is brought below the level of the stomach, and the water, with the contents of the stomach which it has become mixed with, is siphoned out without any discomfort. The work of inserting the tube is not to be attempted by a novice, lest it be thrust into the windpipe, but at first it is safe to be done by the doctor; afterwards the individual can use it himself. The stomach is rinsed out about four times without removing the tube. When the treatment is over the person feels a trifle weak, and is hungry as well. The latter water supplied the former condition passes away, and the patient feels relief.

Of course it must not be thought that stomach-rinsing is a cure-all, though it may reach the seat of trouble and aid in correcting many disorders of the human body. In some affections it has been tried without avail. Yet the beneficial results that have followed it in some instances show that it possesses a virtue in some cases of illness. There is no patent on warm water and a rubber tube, and when its use effects the cleaning of the fire-box or stomach of the human engine, the ills that come from its being clogged up are consequently removed. We are not especially inclined to recommend the remedy, and cannot speak of it from personal knowledge. We can, however, heartily endorse the suggestion of a medical friend, that every person should endeavor to masticate his food thoroughly and take sufficient exercise to have it all assimilated, and thus—since prevention is ten times better than the best kind of cure—reducing to a minimum the danger of being visited by stomach disorders.

NOT THE "MORMON" WAY.

Not only in statements published in this city, but more frequently in correspondence from here published in outside newspapers, there has been of late a good deal of malicious falsehood and sentimental drivel about the desertion of plural wives and their families by husbands and fathers, who put forth their duty to the laws of the country as a pretext for thus ignobly relieving themselves of the care and responsibility which such relations had imposed upon them. The NEWS has not felt called upon to take up these stories and brand them as they deserve, for the reason that there was at best but the flimsiest foundation for them, and every reasonable person in Utah knew them to be essentially untrue. The frequent quotation and repetition of the scandalous falsehood, however, cannot be permitted to go on indefinitely without protest and denial. And when it happens, as in a correspondence from this city to the Chicago Tribune now before us, that the reportorial fancy has fairly revelled in atrocious mendacity, it is time that lies should be stigmatized as such, so that those who might be innocently misled by them may be able to accord them the treatment that known fabrications are worthy of and usually receive.

It is a singular fact that no matter what the "Mormons" do or try to do, they are invariably the subject of some souls' complaining. To writers for the press especially have this people been a veritable mine of sensation, hypocrisy and cant. We were criticized if we pursued a certain policy, and were criticized when we abandoned it for some other; we have been blamed if we did, and blamed if we didn't; until in sheer disgust at fickle men's shifting views, if such had ever had influence with us at all, we would have been justified in doing as we pleased and sending public opinion whirling to the bowwows.

Now, as to this charge of deserting plural wives and leaving them and their families in destitution, the NEWS has only this much to say: it is a sin neither counseled or permitted by the Priesthood, nor practiced by any Latter-day Saint in good standing in the Church. Every Mormon knows that no law can be enacted to absolve a man from the duties of supporting and caring for those who have these sacred claims upon him. No man with the least spark of honor would seek to evade responsibilities of this kind incurred under other conditions. With the Saints, religious duty as well as human honor constitute a pledge that cannot be ignored. Members of the Church have needed no instruction on the subject, and need none now—least of all from those who, as above stated, scan their conduct with a microscope to discover something to find fault with. That all men having plural wives and families are the soul of honor and the ideal of integrity is a claim we shall not attempt to make; but we cannot be contradicted in the statement that the almost universal rule and practice is that such men do provide for and cherish the wives whom the law may prevent them from living with, and do support the children from whose association changed conditions may have more or less cut them off. The contempt which the entire community would feel for a father who acted otherwise is a penalty which no man would wish to incur. Still more unlikely is it that a man who values his standing in the Church and the good will of his fellow-members and those who preside over him, would care to invite the odium that with "his people attaches to a recanter, a coward, and a sneak. Fortunately, Mormon husbands and fathers are not made of that kind of stuff. If there is one of this sort, we do not happen to know of him. We trust there are none, and are certain there can be but very few. In view of this statement of the case, will not our super-critical contemporaries—whose extreme anxiety that we tread bravely the path of duty and steadfastness is sometimes as ludicrous as it is contradictory—do us the credit to say that the Mormons are not in the habit of deserting anybody?

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS.

A decision of the United States court of private land claims, made at Tucson, Arizona, on Friday afternoon, March 30, is of great interest to those connected with Mexican land grants, and especially to a large number of settlers in southern Arizona who have settled on the lands in question. There was an area of about 73,000 acres in dispute between the settlers and the claimants under grants from the state of Sonora and the Spanish officials of the Mexican republic.

Three of the grants in question were of the first class named. They are the San Rafael del Valle, made in 1833, 18,000 acres; Babacomari, made in 1832, 38,000 acres; and the Nogales de Elias, made in 1844, 10,000 acres. The claimants under these grants relied on the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, which confirmed all previous grants by the government of Mexico, therefore the court dealt with the validity of the claim under Mexican law. In 1854 Santa Ana, who was dictator in Mexico from 1853 to 1855, declared that all grants made by the states or provinces of Mexico and not specially confirmed by the general government were void. The claimants to these lands under the Sonora grants insisted that the treaty referred to was a confirmation and recognized the validity of the grants. The court, however, held otherwise, and decided that, while Santa Ana's decree was eight years subsequent to the treaty, it affected the grants previously made by Sonora, and, in declaring them void, vacated the claim of the grantees.

Another grant is known as the Sonita, made in 1821, for 9,000 acres. It was issued May 15, 1825, by Juan Miguel Riesgo, commissary general of the treasury of public credit and war of the republic of Mexico for the state of the west. The proceedings to secure this grant were instituted May 29, 1821, and completed November 12, 1821, when the purchase money was said to be paid. This latter date would be the time of perfecting the title, if it had been done. The claimants urged that as Mexican independence was not established until 1824, the grant of the Spanish officials, under which the title was issued by Riesgo, was valid. The court, however, held differently. The declaration of independence was adopted March 1, 1821, and under the revolution which followed, the City of Mexico was evacuated and the provisional government, composed of a regency of five and a legislative body, was established in the capital city September 27, 1821. As the Mexican republic succeeded this, and the Spaniards never regained control, the court holds that the Spanish officials were ousted in March, and therefore any title based on their sovereignty in May to November following was void, although the contest was continued and did not result in the ejection of the Spanish officials until a subsequent date.

The settlers on the disputed lands are highly elated over the turn in affairs and at the logic by which the court reaches its conclusions. It is the general opinion that any appeal to the United States Supreme Court must result in favor of the settlers, as in the first three grants the decision of the claims court upholds the general government of Mexico in interpreting its own procedure, and in the other the rule always maintained by the United States in its own history, that the Declaration of Independence, and not the date of success through the revolution, was the inception of the exercise of governmental power by the republic.

BISMARCK'S BIRTHDAY.

The saying that whosoever commences his earthly career on the first day of April—All Fools' Day—must necessarily be himself a fool—that, is, more conspicuously so than other mortals—must have originated before the time of Prince Bismarck, or suffered conspicuous denial since; for that distinguished mortal, born April 1, 1815, is one of the last to whom anybody would think of giving that epithet. His whole life since 1847, when he attained prominence before the public as an opponent of a scheme which he later carried through with most brilliant success—the unification of the German empire—proves him to be one of the most remarkable men of this or any other century. As regards long and unbroken terms of office Bismarck surpasses all other statesmen of modern times, a fact which is all the more remarkable, because at one period he brought his country to the verge of revolution by highhanded contempt for public opinion and disregard for the enactments of the Diet. A man who could tell the representatives of his country that the government intended to do without their aid, if they refused to sanction his measures for creating and maintaining an army, and yet remain the leading spirit of the country for nearly half a century, is no fool, whatever else he may be.

The celebration of the anniversary of Bismarck's birthday yesterday, April 1st, was the occasion of great rejoicing at Friedrichsruhe. The aged statesman received special marks of honor from the emperor, and as his health seems to have improved remarkably since the reconciliation with his royal master took place, there is every prospect that in his retirement he will yet be able to enjoy for several years such attentions and tokens of respect and honor as a nation and an emperor are willing to bestow upon him.

A RIPE FOUR SCORE.

The NEWS, speaking for the people of Utah, and for the Latter-day Saints in all the world, congratulates President Lorenzo Snow on attaining this day, April 8, 1894, the age of eighty years. No man living has been more closely identified than he with the work established in these last days for the redemption of man, and none has rendered greater service than this zealous missionary, and refined, accomplished gentleman. Intimately acquainted with the Prophet Joseph in his life-time, and a participant in the stirring episodes of Church history since the very beginning, President Snow's life is invested with almost the charm of romance—better still, it can be quoted as the life of a righteous man. He has traveled in many lands, and has lifted up his voice among strange peoples as a messenger of salvation; and now in the evening of his days, still busy and earnest in the great cause to which he has given his earlier years, he is continuing within the sacred precincts of the Temple the glorious labors to which he and his associates have consecrated themselves—labors of such profound importance to this sin and death-afflicted world. We feel sure there will be no dissent to the hearty wish that President Snow's health and strength may be maintained and his life prolonged in peace and happiness until in his own heart he can say, it is enough.

The work in the Salt Lake Temple closed on Friday evening, March 30th, to be resumed after Conference. Anticipatory of the birthday anniversary of President Snow, the officers and workers in the House of the Lord resolved to appropriately express their regard and affection for him. Immediately after the termination of the labors of the day, on the date above named, a meeting was held and a message sent to Brother Snow to the effect that a number of his friends had assembled and greatly desired his presence. He soon made his appearance and Bishop John R. Winder delivered the following address:

President Lorenzo Snow:

Your co-laborers—the officers and workers in the Salt Lake Temple—are about to separate for a few days. Before doing so they desire to present you with a token of their esteem and love. They have selected me to make the presentation to you of this cane, in the hope that you will favor them by accepting of it as a memento of the eightieth anniversary of your birthday, which occurs on April 8th, 1894. I assure you that the donors appreciate your many virtues and hope that you may live long to labor in the front rank of the anointed of the Lord for the establishment and extension of the righteousness of His Kingdom.

The cane is the handsomest that could be obtained in Salt Lake City. The staff is ebony and the handle, which is massive and of beautiful design, is gold. On its top is an oval burnished plate, on which is this inscription: "Lorenzo Snow, President Salt Lake Temple, April 8th, 1894," and on front of the handle the following: "Presented by Officers and Workers, Salt Lake Temple, on his 80th Birthday."

Elder Snow made an appropriate responsive address, during the delivery of which he showed that he was deeply moved by the exhibition of good feeling of his co-workers in the Temple toward him, and he assured them that these estimable sentiments were reciprocated toward his brethren and sisters associated with him in the house of the Lord.

THE FARMERS' WORST FOE.

No better evidence could be given of the serious importance of the Russian thistle as an agricultural scourge, than the attempt that has been made, by bills introduced in Congress, to invoke the arm of the national government against the imported pest. Various kinds of thistles, Canadian and others, have flourished in times past without exciting congressional oratory; and even the ever-present and persistent sunflower has not been dignified with so much notice. Indeed, as a general thing weeds of all kinds have been deemed a subject for individual study, toil and warfare, not one which should be manipulated and contested with funds from the government treasury. The gravity of danger that is threatened from this new foe will therefore be appreciated when it is remembered that propositions have been made in all seriousness that the work of battling with, resisting and eradicating the invader be done under the government supervision and at government expense.

We believe the Russian thistle has not yet been able to cross the Rocky Mountains, though it has already reached their eastern base and has been detected near Denver. It is only within the last three years that the weed has been heard of to any extent in the United States, the first complaints having been received by the department of agriculture at Washington in the fall of 1891. The dry season of 1893 gave it unusual development, and farmers became thoroughly alarmed at the situation. It made its appearance in the wheat-raising region of the northwest a few years ago, and its worst ravages are still confined to those sections; but as the damage already done by it is estimated at several millions of dollars, and as the thistle is rapidly spreading over new territory and being more destructive in the region already infested, the subject cannot be without interest to agriculturists of our hitherto exempt region.

For a great deal of valuable information concerning the habits and the proposed remedies for the thistle, we are indebted to a late report prepared by the division of botany of the department of agriculture, and submitted by the assistant secretary to the House of Representatives committee on agriculture. The plant is an annual one, easily killed at any time during the growing season. It produces no seed before the middle of August or first of September, and the seed is short-lived. It would therefore seem to offer exceptionally good opportunity for being checked or even exterminated. Permitted to scatter its seed, however, it spreads with extraordinary rapidity, far exceeding, in this respect, any weed known in America. A single plant of average size, of two to three feet in diameter and weighing two to four pounds when dry, bears about 20,000 to 30,000 seeds. Plants have been found six feet in diameter and estimated to bear 200,000 seeds. The report maintains that the most active mode of distribution of the Russian thistle and the one furnished by nature, is the wind, and flax seed continues to be, in the absence of good fanning mills, the chief artificial agent of distribution. Railroads form a third and most important means of transportation for the seeds over long distances. There is good evidence that the railroads have carried them in the bedding of stock cars. These cars are sent to the stock yards at Indianapolis, Chicago and Sioux City and unloaded, but they are seldom cleaned until they are again sent out and have reached their destination to be reloaded.

The naming of these railway centers for cattle shipment immediately suggests inquiry as to the sections of country most grievously affected, and the report on this part of the subject is significant as it is alarming. At the present time all the counties of South Dakota east of the Missouri river and twenty counties of North Dakota, are infested with the weed, and the plants have crossed to the west side of the Missouri river in at least four places in those states. Two counties in western Minnesota, three in northwestern Iowa and four in northeastern Nebraska are thoroughly impregnated with the weed. Altogether this makes one almost continuous area of about 40,000 square miles which has become more or less covered with the Russian thistle in a comparatively brief period of years. There are besides many isolated localities along the railroads as far east as Madison, Wis., west to Denver, Colo., and south to the southern border of Nebraska where the plants have been introduced.

Coming to the discussion of a remedy, the report points out that while, as above stated, the plant is annual and the seed short-lived, and that the conquest of the enemy should therefore be comparatively easy, it is essential that any measure to be effective must invoke concerted action throughout all the infested area. Sheep are very fond of the Russian thistle until it becomes too coarse and weedy. By pasturing on the young plants they may be kept down and the only known quality of the plant utilized. All the remedies given, the report says, are directed to destroy the plants before they produce seed, and these are the only remedies, so far as known, which are effectual of which there should be any need, except care in cleaning seed. It has been suggested that each farmer whose land is not fenced make a temporary fence by planting a double row of sunflowers about his farm each season. The cost would be light, and the fence thus made would doubtless aid very much in the fight, unless the sunflowers so abundantly produced should become troublesome weeds. The building of wire fences to stop the rolling plants is a remedy strongly advocated by some. Under no condition whatever should the cheaper grade of seeds be sown without recleaning.

There is much more in the report that is worthy of study and remembrance; but experiments and examinations are continually going on, and the importance of the subject gives promise that later information will be imparted in the near future.

CHURCHES IN NEW YORK.

Notwithstanding the fact that great cities harbor much that is bad, offering countless temptations and opportunities for developing all the immoral characteristics of human nature, the religious element is also well represented in such places. There is a light and a dark side to everything and the contrast is perhaps never more marked than in places where human beings congregate to the number of millions and crowd together in a comparatively narrow space.

New York, for instance, with its thousands of saloons and kindred breeding places of iniquity has no less than 600 churches, owned by the various denominations, with a total seating capacity of 325,000, and the average attendance at all religious gatherings is given as 900,000 of a total population of 1,800,000. Of these church goers the Catholics are most numerous. The Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists are not so well represented numerically but form nevertheless considerable bodies of worshippers. The Jews congregate in 46 synagogues in the city.

The cost of the various places of worship aggregate $80,000,000. The assessed value of the marble cathedral, the most important of the Catholic churches in town is $3,000,000. Trinity church is valued at $4,000,000. Grace church is valued at $350,000, the Jewish temple Emanu-El on Fifth avenue and Forty-third street is valued at $400,000. The Jewish temple Beth-El on Fifth avenue and Seventy-sixth street is valued at $400,000. The new Episcopal cathedral of St. John the Divine will cost $1,500,000, it is computed.

There are no less than eighty-seven churches owned by the Catholic population amounting to 500,000 souls. Of these three are held by the Jesuit order; two belong to the Franciscans, two to the Capucins, one to the Carmelites, one to the Paulists and one to the Dominicans. The German Catholics own ten churches, the Italians two; one is Bohemian, one French, one Hungarian, one French Canadian and one Polish. The colored Catholics own one church.

New York City is a fair instance of the gigantic efforts of the church people to "hold the fort" in every great center of population throughout the Christian world. That their success is generally speaking so inadequate when compared to the machinery employed is due partly to the lack of unity among the Christian professors and partly to the suspicion, too well founded perhaps in many cases, that religion is exhibited more for purposes of effect than for any practical purposes, really useful to the tolling masses of the people. Christ was eminently the friend of the poor. His mission was to save that which was "lost" in every sense of the word. Is the same true about His many professed followers in this age who fill the pews of the elegant churches and listen to the well paid orators who occupy the gilded pulpits? When Christianity was first preached it was a power because attended by the manifestations of the Supreme presence and resting on Divine authority. Then at the efforts of one man sometimes thousands were moved to repentance and became new beings. Now the united efforts of thousands often leave no appreciable impression. Why will people persist in refusing to acknowledge the fact and to seek a remedy in the true Gospel of our Redeemer?

GOOD WORD FOR THE INDIAN.

The idea that "the only good Indian is a dead Indian" has been so prevalent throughout the West, with the exception of among the people of these valleys, that the desire to do justice to the red man which is shown by leading spirits in the East when the Indian question is being discussed is characterized by many journals as "a sickly eastern sentimentality." Some of these same journals are manifesting disappointment at the refusal of Congress to remove the Southern Utes from Colorado to Utah, remarking that, as "the Mormons sympathize with the Indians they ought to have them." It isn't only the Mormons in Utah who wish the aborigines to have fair play. That feature characterizes non-Mormons as well. But it is no argument why this Territory should be given more than its share of red men; the white settlers want fair play as well, and are pleased to feel that both parties will get it from Congress in this instance. Regarding the "goodness" of the Indians mentioned, Col. Henry Page, clerk of the Utah Commission, who was agent among the Southern Utes for a number of years, and who negotiated the treaty by which they were located on their present reservation, says: "I wonder that those Indians are as good as they are, considering the way they have been treated. I don't think the white men would take things so quietly. When they were placed on the reservation the government voluntarily pledged itself that they would not be disturbed for twenty-five years; and now before half that time has passed there is bother about another removal."

While instances of breaking faith with the Indian can be freely cited, yet the government has done a great deal with a view to benefiting him, and the good work is still going on. In this Territory Lieutenant Plummer, the Navajos' agent, has made a selection of a place for the government to erect school buildings and conduct a school for the education of the Navajo children. The site chosen is on the south side of the San Juan river, near Bluff, San Juan county. It is intended that the papposes will remain home at nights and spend the day at the schoolhouse, where they will be given their dinner as a special inducement to start in. After they get on a little way in their studies it is expected that they will become so interested that there will be no inclination to keep away. Regarding these Navajos a correspondent of the Millard county Blade who resides at Bluff City has this to say: "That portion of San Juan county south of the San Juan river is included in the Navajo reservation, and as we are living on the north bank of the river we are near neighbors to the Navajos. I think they are without exception the finest class of Indians I ever met. While they are very much addicted to gambling, and some of them occasionally will steal, they are as a rule peaceable, frugal and industrious, and possess many of the characteristics that go to make up good citizens. They do not live by begging, stealing nor hunting, but till the ground and raise a variety of products. They also have large flocks of sheep and an abundance of horses and mules. Their wool and the blankets they manufacture quite extensively find a ready sale, and furnish them with those supplies which they cannot produce, so that they are a very thrifty and prosperous people, and a poor Navajo, like a poor Jew, is an isolated exception to a well established and generally illustrated principle or rule that they are all rich. The Navajo women own the sheep and have a voice in all matters touching the family affairs, and they have a conception of their rights and an inclination to defend them that would be satisfactory to the most ardent advocate of woman's rights or universal suffrage." This statement, like many others of similar character that come from men who are necessarily acquainted with Indian habits and characteristics, affords one reason for the friendliness of the people of Utah towards the red men. They realize that under proper treatment and influence the native race may be developed into good and active citizens in a civilized government.

EXPERIENCES OF A MISSIONARY.

PORIRUA, New Zealand, Feb. 21, 1894.—Elders of Israel have a varied experience while engaged in spreading the revealed truths of the Gospel of Christ amongst the children of men, and probably a few jottings from personal experiences may interest some of the Saints in Zion.

Thousands of missionaries, who have returned to their homes after performing their duties faithfully in the vineyard of the Lord, can testify to the seasons of rejoicing experienced while engaged in leading souls to a knowledge of the true and living God. And yet, 'twas not always sunshine. No pen can fully portray the deep anxiety and anguish of spirit in which many of these zealous ambassadors have sought the throne of grace and pleaded for the divine blessing to sanctify their feeble efforts.

How often the messenger of salvation has reflected upon Paul's exhortation, "I have planted, Apollos watered, but God giveth the increase. So then neither is he that planteth anything, neither he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase." Occasionally members are gathered into the fold here who first heard the truth preached in their native lands.

It is evident that often seeds sown broadcast, a humble testimony perhaps of an earnest Elder who yearned to see the fruits of his labors, fall into good ground and are afterwards quickened by the Spirit of God. A new member recently stated that she had experienced no peace of mind for nearly fifteen years, until she again met an Elder of the Church. She could never forget the truths which she first heard in old England, though more than twenty years had elapsed before she was again privileged to listen to a Mormon sermon.

May not these appropriately be termed

Seeds that live and grow and flourish, when the sower's hand is cold.

Seeds by idle hearts forgotten, flung at random on the air;

Seeds by faithful souls remembered, sown in tears and love and prayer.

The sowers are not always permitted to see the harvest. Many have passed to the "great beyond" to await "the angel's shout of harvest home," while others remain who are now dead to the work of the Lord. The fruits of the testimonies are seen when some of the testators have apparently forgotten them. The heaven of the Gospel, however, undoubtedly remains in the hearts of many who are now outside the fold. Some time ago an evidence of this was observed in one of the most populous cities of New Zealand.

In a singular manner, acquaintance was formed with a family who always extended a cordial welcome to the Mormon Elder. In subsequent conversations, it was learned that the gentleman was baptized and became a member of the Church in 1848. Nearly ten years were spent in the missionary field, and reminiscences of the past were reviewed with mutual pleasure. Time had not obliterated the record of earnest work, carefully journalised over forty years ago. An honorable release, signed by President George Q. Cannon, is still sacredly preserved. The recollections of travels to Zion, associations in the city of the Saints, trials and disappointments were all dwelt upon. Subsequent wanderings in other lands, for twenty-five years, had not erased this eventful page from life's history and many queries made with regard to the condition of Utah: "How is William Jennings, Bishop Sharp, Daniel H. Wells and others? What became of some who fell away and who fought the Saints?"

These and many other questions were asked and answered, and the conversations recently culminated in a testimony to the truth of the Gospel message, and the frank admission "the happiest moments of my life were spent in associating with the Latter-day Saints in Zion." Neither the hand nor the heart of the sower is cold, and earnest prayers are now offered that the wanderer may return and again be privileged to rejoice in Zion with those whom he led into the fold.

A prolonged conversation, on one occasion, caused the Elder to miss the train, and he therefore wandered in the streets of the city, waiting for the midnight train to convey him to his Maori home. It was Saturday evening. A typical English "Saturday neet." Colonists rigidly adhere to the customs observed in the old country. The streets were crowded with visitors from the country suburbs, most of whom strolled listlessly along gazing in shop windows, or standing on the corners listening to quacks and vendors.

The Salvation lasses attracted a large crowd with their tambourines and songs and after a few minutes of exhortation, the rest of the evening was spent in singing and begging, their success evidently being gauged by the "brownies" (pennies) cast into the ring. On various street corners preachers addressed passing crowds, but none would remain to listen and reflect. The sonorous and melancholy tones of an exhorter attracted the visitor's attention to a small company in a side street. They were Plymouth Brethren, one of whom was commenting on the doom of the wicked. He pictured the sectarian hell in vivid colors. The scorching fires of a never-ending eternity were described with almost terrifying effect, and Boston, in his "Fourfold State," feebly describes it when he talks of "God holding up the wicked in one hand and tormenting them with the other." A vendor of summer drinks, etc., near by, apparently sought to soothe the tortured feelings of these believers in imaginative horrors by occasionally shouting "ice cream."

A few weeks ago, during an interview with an intelligent lady member of this sect, the writer was surprised to learn that she was born in Salt Lake City, and was raised to womanhood by faithful Latter-day Saints. Though baptized at eight years of age, and re-baptized subsequently, she had no conception of the Gospel as revealed in the latter days. Claiming to be in a "saved condition through the finished work of Christ," she manifested much anxiety respecting the spiritual welfare of her Mormon parents and relatives. About five hours were spent in rearing the Word of God to ascertain the true plan of life and salvation. The lady's forcible declaration, "I know my parents are not saved, for they never taught me the Word of God," contains a pointed lesson for every father and mother in Zion.

If the statement be true it is sad to reflect that Elders should travel seven thousand miles to teach the children of Latter-day Saints principles that they should have been familiar with from childhood.

After the foregoing interview Zion's representative returned and spent the evening with his Maori brethren and sisters.

During a previous visit to this "pah" an earnest soldier of the Salvation army attended the Sabbath service. His badge (a large brass letter S fastened on his coat) indicated his position, and after Sunday school his Bible was produced and an interesting conversation took place, which continued until late in the evening, interrupted only by the afternoon service. The following Sunday the "attack" was resumed, and the discussion of Gospel principles was earnestly listened to, and both parties manifested a kindly spirit. Several months elapsed before this earnest "army" man was heard of again. Returning from a conference in an adjacent district, the Elder stayed at the house of an intelligent young Maori, who informed him that he had been debating "Mormonism" with an "army man" who was working in the vicinity, and that he stated he had previously met Elder —. Of course, the Maori claimed to have vanquished the "Pakeha."

The next encounter occurred nearly one hundred miles from the first scene. Another Elder had the privilege of continuing the labor with the young man. Again the meeting took place at a Maori "pah." After a long evening's research and discussion, a request was made for another meeting, the subject of conversation to be the Book of Mormon. The request was readily assented to, and it was soon evident that one of the debaters had become a sincere investigator. After examining the prophecies, etc., for several hours, the Elder was surprised and perplexed at his Army friend's query, "Have you got a pocket knife?" Wondering what a knife had to do with such an important scriptural subject, the article was produced. Immediately the young man cut the brass "S" off his coat, and having disposed of his "Salvation" badge, he declared himself ready for baptism. The ordinance was attended to the following day, and soon after the young convert commenced distributing tracts and defending the principles of the Gospel in an adjacent town.

In a previous letter to the News, a brief reference was made to the European meeting, at which a Christadelphian minister endeavored to controvert the doctrines taught

This meeting was held at the house of a very earnest soldier of the Salvation Army. The Elders received a cordial invitation to return at some future time. Recently a second visit was paid to the town, and the servants of God were heartily welcomed and hospitably entertained. In the evening their host informed them of his experiences since the meeting, how the Army officers had condemned his action in opening his house for Mormon services, and how the opposition had incited him to investigate and read carefully and prayerfully the works previously loaned to him. The Gospel theme was resumed, and it was shown very pointedly that God had revealed unto His Prophets in the latter day precious truths for the salvation of His children. A faithful testimony was borne by one of the Elders, and then the listener arose and abruptly left the room. After a short absence he returned and asked how long the visitors would remain. The answer was "As long as there is work to do for the Master." The Elders rejoiced exceedingly to learn that, during his absence, their host had been wrestling with God in prayer, and he felt impressed that he should yield to his convictions of the truth. He was baptized and confirmed a member of the Church the following evening.

Two weeks ago another visit was paid to the South Island, at the urgent request of Europeans there. A beautiful drive of forty miles, thro' the Kaituna and Pylorus valleys, the road being lined with blackberry bushes laden with luscious fruit, quickly dispelled all feelings of seasickness consequent to crossing the Cook's Strait. The towns of Havelock and Canva Town were visited, and a series of public meetings arranged for, the town hall in the first named place being granted free for services.

Large and attentive audiences greeted the speaker, and it is evident that there were many honest-hearted souls in the vicinity. Five good meetings were held during the week, closing with an evening meeting in the town hall, Havelock, on the subject of divine authenticity of the Book of Mormon. After the Sabbath meeting, one member of the congregation introduced himself to the Elders, stating that he was baptized over twenty-five years ago, in the town of Plymouth, England, by Elder Willis, but since then he had not been privileged to associate with the Saints.

Many invitations were received to partake of the hospitality of the people, and a few sociable visits proved that a friendly spirit of investigation is in the hearts of many of the residents.

The Maoris of Canva Town were kindness itself, and rejoiced indeed to see the "Pakehas" flock into their meeting house at the "pah" to hear the Gospel message declared by the servants of God. They gave their visitors a hearty "Haere mai." It is quite embarrassing, however, for Elders, laboring amongst the natives, to divert their attention to European work. They are unable to stay long enough in one vicinity, and are compelled to devote much time to acquiring the Maori language. Special and continuous efforts amongst the English speaking population in the province of Marlborough would undoubtedly accomplish great good. "The harvest truly is plentiful, but the laborers are few. Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers into his harvest."

PHOENIX.

A "BATTALION BOY."

SOPIO, March 29, 1894.—Thinking a short account of my travels with the Latter-day Saints might be welcome to the readers of your interesting paper, I submit the following and hope you will think it worthy of publication.

My father's name was John S. Martin, my mother's, Matilda Bigler, daughter of Mark Bigler, who was the father of Jacob G. Bigler, of Nephi. I was born on the 11th day of April, 1825, in Harrison county, state of Virginia. It is now called West Virginia.

The first Gospel sermon I heard preached by an Elder of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was in May, 1837; the Elder's name was Lorenzo D. Barnes. He was preaching in the woods near the banks of the west fork of the Monongahela river. I received a testimony that day that Joseph was a true Prophet of God, and that testimony has remained with me from that day to this. My father emigrated to Caldwell county, Missouri, in 1838, and arrived near Far West some time in September, I think.

Soon after our arrival in the county David Patten led a company of the Caldwell militia against a mob led by Bogard. Brother Patten fell wounded in that battle and was brought to Stephen Winchester's, where he died about 11 o'clock at night. I was standing by his bed when he died. The last words I remember hearing him say were, "Lord Jesus, receive my soul." I did not see Joseph Smith in Missouri; he was betrayed by Colonel Hinkle into the hands of the mob and carried away before I saw him. I being a boy about 12 years old, my mother kept me hid in the thick brush, to keep me out of the hands of the mob, who were carrying boys off to make them tell where their fathers were hidden. I left the state of Missouri the following March. My father took a poor family to the Mississippi river before he took his own family.

The first time I saw the Prophet Joseph was at a conference near Quincy, Illinois. When he arose to speak there was a halo of light around his head. I knew then that he was the Prophet. After Joseph moved to Nauvoo, I visited him at his house to see the records of Abraham. He took much pains to show me the records. The last time I saw Joseph alive was a short time before he went to Carthage. He reviewed the Legion, riding his favorite horse. The next time I saw him was in his house at Nauvoo after his assassination at Carthage. I left Nauvoo on the 9th of February, 1846, driving one of George A. Smith's teams; went to the camp of the Saints at Sugar Creek. I was traveling during the winter and spring, through snow and mud, with the rest suffering much with cold and wet, at length arriving at the banks of the Missouri river, where I, with five hundred of the camp of Israel, enlisted to fight the Mexicans. The most of us were marched to Lower California and on the 16th of July, 1847, we were mustered out of service at Los Angeles. Then we traveled north to Sutter's Fort. Some forty of us stopped and worked for Sutter and while building a saw mill in the mountains the gold was discovered. We worked in the mines washing gold for a short time. Quite a company came to Salt Lake valley in September, 1848. President Young had a feast prepared for us on the 6th of October (1848); it was a happy time for us after the hardships of our travels from the Missouri river to the Pacific Ocean and back to Salt Lake valley.

FAIR CLARA.

ST. GEORGE, March 28, 1894.

Perhaps you have never heard of the pretty and industrious town Santa Clara. It is situated about five miles a little south of west from the city of St. George, Washington county, Utah. Its residents are naturally proud of their town, and one of them tells me he believes it is one of the prettiest places in Utah. He also gives me the following: Spring has come and makes everything look pleasing and beautiful. Most all the fruit trees, except pear and apple, are in bloom; fall grain is about five or six inches, spring grain two or three inches and lucern about three inches high. All these give the place a very pretty appearance. Leaves are beginning to come forth from our shade trees, such as cottonwood, poplar and mulberry. There is but one weeping willow tree in the place, which John Graf owns.

The people of Clara suffered many hardships from want of food, clothing, etc., when they first came to settle the country. My parents lived in a cellar dug in the ground, with a willow and mud roof, which they thought was very nice at that time. They have suffered from a flood which washed away the whole settlement save one house, standing at present about one mile above the present location.

The population of Clara is small, numbering about 225 souls, yet it has a very good showing. There are five missionaries laboring in the Swiss and German mission, namely, Theodore Graf, Harmon Hafen, William Tobler, Edward Freiland and Henry Gubler. They are all young and inexperienced men, still they are meeting with good success. Clara has a good record in regard to missionaries and tithing. The people fulfil their duties and try to live up to their callings and requirements. We have no drunkards on the Santa Clara and very few users of tobacco. We have an aged brother, Samuel Stucki, who came with the handcart company. He is blind now, of old age.

I have been informed that a very sudden accident occurred to Susetta Hafen—a paralytic stroke striking the left side of her body. She is recovering.

The people are enjoying splendid health at present, though there was considerable sickness two months ago, three members having been called to the other side of the veil.

The people of Clara are talking of building a new meeting house, which they need, because the old one will not hold the people much longer, their increase is so rapid.

DEATH OF JESSE W. FOX.

Jesse W. Fox, one of the Territory's pioneer citizens, passed peacefully from mortality at Bountiful Sunday morning, April 1st at 7:15, while on a brief visit to that place. Elder Fox was 75 years of age on Saturday last and in the afternoon of that day he went to Bountiful, and was at the house of his wife Sarah Elizabeth Foss, and their daughter Charlotte J. Fox. They did all in their power to relieve him of his sufferings, and realizing that he was in a very dangerous condition Sister Fox obtained his consent to send for his daughter Mrs. Georgiana and her husband Hyrum S. Young, and his son, Jesse W. Fox, Jr., who arrived in time for him to recognize and talk with them each. He passed away as if going to sleep, giving his son a farewell clasp of the hand as his spirit took its departure. His illness was very brief and the immediate cause of death was neuralgia of the heart. His body was brought to Salt Lake Sunday.

Jesse Williams Fox, son of Samuel and Lucy Williams Fox, was born on March 31st, 1819, near Adams Centre, Jefferson County, New York. He was a tenth child of a family of ten sons and three daughters. He had an academic education and taught school in Jefferson County, New York, and at other places. He was the companion of James Keep in their boyhood. The latter being bound out, was oppressed, when young Fox's sympathies led him to aid him to go to Canada, which was the stepping stone to the renowned Keep's financial power.

He embraced the Gospel early in the forties and reached Nauvoo, Illinois, only in time to see the remains of the martyred Prophet and Patriarch, Joseph and Hyrum Smith, they having previously closed their eyes in death. From this time on he followed his favorite occupation, school teaching. With his co-religionists of the Church, he left Nauvoo and came to Winter Quarters, remaining there until the spring of 1847, when he was sent by President Young to his old home in New York on a mission in hope that the change of climate and scenes would recruit his health. It is not to be wondered that Brother Fox's health had failed, when we realize the scenes of want and suffering through which the people of the Church passed from the hour of the martyrdom to the spring of '47—when we realize the strong sympathies of Brother Fox. The facts are, although possessed of ample means for his own comfort and support, he shared with the afflicted people every thing he possessed and would have died had not the Lord prompted His servant to send him on a mission to New York. As it was, he did a good work, and baptized a number of his kindred and other prominent people into the Church.

In the spring of 1849 he again joined the Saints, journeying westward, at Council Bluffs, where on the 2nd of June of that year he was married to Eliza J. Gibbs by the late Apostle Geo. A. Smith. He was organized in the company of Captain Gully's hundred and William Miller's fifty. When the train reached the Loup Fork they were attacked by the terrible scourge of cholera, which followed in the wake of the California gold seekers, many of whom died on the boats on the Missouri river and on the Plains. A number of the Saints became victims of the scourge, among the rest Captain Gully, and were buried on the east side of the river. The company was delayed several days at this point on account of high water, and was only delivered from their peril by the hand of a kind Providence. They had no means of ferrying, while the dread disease was decimating their ranks; they accordingly gave themselves to fasting and prayer, when, to use Brother Fox's own language, the power of God was as manifest in their deliverance as was that wherein ancient Israel was led with safety through their perils in the Red Sea, for a roadway was thrown up during the night, formed of the shifting sands, which gave them safe passage on their way. It was remarkable how the cholera was stayed in its ravages in answer to their prayers.

On reaching the valley Brother Fox aided in the surveys of the city and surrounding settlements, and located for one year at Manti, Sanpete county, where he taught school. Returning to this city he resumed his occupation of surveyor and it was he who surveyed the site and set the stakes for the Salt Lake Temple, as well as for others, afterwards built. He enrolled in the Utah militia and became captain of a company of infantry, minute men; being promoted, obtained several commissions, the last being a position on the staff of the late Lieutenant General D. H. Wells. He was elected by the Legislative Assembly Territorial surveyor general of Utah, which office he held for many years until it was discontinued and he distributed the papers to the several counties. He located and surveyed the principal canals of this county and Territory and was appointed chief engineer of the Utah Central and Southern railroads.

He has been an active member in the Church and of late years filled the station of High Councilor of the Salt Lake Stake and possessed the love of his acquaintances. The unfortunate who knew him always found sympathy, and the distressed obtained relief if it was in his power to relieve them. Among those whom he taught in the school room he was looked upon with the most sincere affection. As an illustration, the terrible Black Hawk chief who made war upon our settlements in the southeast part of our Territory in the sixties—Brother Fox, in his travels, had occasion to pass through his camp and was recognized by the chief, who had been a pupil of his when a lad in Manti. Instead of destroying him, (as he was in the habit of killing every white man that ventured within his lines), he ordered that his old teacher be not only permitted to continue his journey unharmed, but gave him escort to a point of safety.

In the death of Elder Jesse Williams Fox our people have sustained a serious loss, and the poor and the afflicted of our community or of any other class will feel the loss in his absence as keenly as his nearest kindred. He is to be congratulated upon his release from a life of continued toil amid scenes of want and suffering—he having been accustomed to searching out and relieving the needy and afflicted—in that he has now been permitted to enter into the paradise of God and rejoin his loved wife Eliza and their children and friends who have gone before, assured, if any one is to be favored on account of a well-spent life, he will be one that will partake of God's eternal favor.

CHURCH THEOLOGY CLASS.

At the usual time and place over 1,300 students assembled to finish the consideration of leaflet 17. Prayer was offered by Elder Willard Done. Dr. Talmage answered all incidental questions submitted to date and then proceeded to review the work of the last session leading on to the subject of The Gathering. Many predictions of old were referred to, and it was stated that no prophecies of the scattering of Israel were recorded, which did not also declare that a gathering should take place.

To the student of the Holy Scripture it was clear that two gathering places were distinctly designated for the last days, Jerusalem on the eastern hemisphere and the New Jerusalem in the west. The work of gathering comprised, (1), the return of the Jews to Jerusalem; (2) the restoration of the Ten Tribes; (3) the bringing together from the nations of the earth all of the blood of Israel. The last named constituted the present great work of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The authority to do this work and the keys of gathering were given to the Prophet Joseph Smith through Moses.

To the surprise of many, Dr. Talmage announced that this was the last session of this class, explaining the circumstances under which it was organized and stating that it was the intention from the first to complete the work by April conference. He thanked the members for the interest and earnestness shown and the Stake authorities for the use of the Assembly Hall. The lectures, that would have been given, he said, will be published, and the whole course of lectures printed in a collective form. A committee appointed to read and correct these lectures was represented by two of its members who would now address the class.

Apostle A. H. Cannon here read a letter from the First Presidency regarding the discontinuance of the class. Nothing that had occurred in this vicinity, he declared, had done so much good as the course of lectures delivered by Elder James E. Talmage before the Church University Theology class. All doubtful points had been submitted to the authorities and the work had met their unqualified approval. He encouraged those who had been members to continue in their private study, laying a still broader and firmer foundation of their faith. He expressed his good wishes for Dr. Talmage and called for a vote of thanks from the assembly, to which all responded most heartily.

Benediction was pronounced by Elder Talmage.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

The people of Parowan, Iron county, are arranging to put in a new roller mill.

The rabbit hunt of last week in Iron county resulted in a total of 2,685 of the rodents being brought in.

All of the appropriations made by the City Council up to date are now ready for payment in warrants. The total passes the $200,000 mark.

Elias S. Kimball has been called to preside over the Southern States mission to succeed his brother, J. G. Kimball. This will cause a vacancy in the Logan city council.

The Ogden Junior Football club has sent out a challenge to the Weber Stake Academy for a match game on April 20th. It probably will be accepted by the academy boys.

Ephraim Enterprise: Manti is now getting three dollar coal. If the reduction had come earlier it would probably have been more appreciated by the residents of the Temple City.

The Mayor has signed the ordinance authorizing the issue of $800,000 bonds. He has also approved the ordinance permitting hackmen to charge fifty cents for conveying a passenger to or from the depot.

The falling of the temperature the last day or two has had a tendency for good in some respects in that it has caused the swelling streams to recede. A few such spells throughout the spring would be of benefit.

Influenza, a disease closely resembling the epizootic is attacking some of the Cache Valley horses. Mr. Chris. Jensen of Hyrum has lost four fine animals from this cause; one of them a Percheron stallion valued at $2,000.

James Kerr, father of G. M. Kerr, depot master, Ogden, died March 29 at the residence of his son, at 11:35 p.m. Mr. Kerr was 87 years of age, and leaves one child and a host of friends to mourn his loss. The cause of death was old age.

Chief Devine, it appears, is evading very successfully the effect of the Montague writ of mandate. When Montague reported for duty he was immediately suspended, as were also Bates and Mowers when they presented themselves at headquarters.

The Bingham Bulletin reports a rich strike of ore in the foothills near Fort Herriman, below the Brooklyn mine. The claims on which the discovery has been made belong to the Heaston brothers and J. H. Barryman. A vein of from four to six feet of 670-ounce silver ore has been found.

The Provo Woolen mills have been closed down temporarily. The move is the result of a meeting held by the board of directors yesterday. The directors will give no cause except that a readjustment is needed. It is to be hoped that this readjustment will be accomplished speedily.

The case of the Farmers' Union mills, of Smithfield, vs James Mack, of the same place, that has been occupying the attention of various courts for about two years, has at last been concluded by mutual consent. Each party claims to have been awarded that for which it contended.

The Morgan hotel on First South street was sold at auction on a trust deed. James H. Bacon, the banker, was named as trustee, and made the sale. The property was bid in by Judge C. F. Loofbourov, for Mr. Anzi Dodd, an eastern capitalist, the price being $82,000.

It is now stated that W. S. Godbe, of this city, has just completed final arrangements for commencing to build a forty mile railroad extending southwest from Bullionville, Nevada. It is further stated that Mr. Godbe will leave for Nevada within a day or two and that operations will begin immediately.

Work has been resumed and is being vigorously conducted on the canal for the proposed large power plant near the mouth of Logan canyon, and it is confidently anticipated that the undertaking will be complete by early autumn. Poor men are the projectors, but a company is to be organized and they are assured of ample capital.

There seems to be a little friction between the Wellsville city council and some of the citizens, because the council proposes to assume control of the waters running through the city, something that the owners of canals and ditches object to. It is said that a mass meeting will be held to protest against the proposed action.

The head gear of the police officers is now adorned with silver number wreaths. The wreaths are of home manufacture and are very creditable both in design and finish and make handsome circles for the numbers placed within them. Chief Pratt says that every man in the department is required to patronize home institutions first, last and all the time.

Charles Stevenson, a young man from Salt Lake, who is attending the Agricultural College, while in the gymnasium having a friendly sparring match with another student, endeavored to make a sudden turn. One foot caught the other and he was thrown violently to the floor. Both bones of the forearm were broken.

A move is on foot among leading citizens of Provo for the building of an annex to the B. Y. academy to be used as a normal training school.

While there is not a superabundance of cash in the Garden City, there is an abundance of rock, sand, brick and lumber, and a considerable amount of bone and muscle. Why should the addition not be built?

On Thursday last a young man named Moser, of the Fifth ward, was badly hurt in Logan canyon. He was dragging some timber down a steep hill when his horse slipped and fell, knocking the young man down. His left ear was partially severed from the head, and he also sustained several severe scalp wounds. He is now rapidly improving.

The Culmer-Jennings Paving company commenced tearing up and relaying asphalt on East Temple street opposite the Templeton hotel. The cause of this work is that certain parts of the paving done last season was not up to the standard that the contract called for, and now that mild weather is here again it is being proceeded with. The expense is being borne by the company.

Tom King, a character well known to the police for his fiery disposition, was arrested March 29th while haranguing a crowd of idle men on Plum alley. It is claimed that his remarks were of a class that would tend to riot, and he was taken into custody and sent to jail while his motley audience was dispersed with the injunction that a further demonstration of that kind would lead to the arrest of all of them.

Governor West has received a numerously signed petition from the residents of Parowan and Red Creek, asking that the next term of the Second Judicial Court be held at Parowan. As Parowan is much nearer the center of the district than Beaver, which is on the extreme northern end, the petitioners think that on the ground of convenience alone there is good ground for the making of the request. The governor has the matter under his consideration.

There is no longer a doubt about Kaysville having a cheese factory, says the Eagle. The creamery company has ordered the necessary machinery, and has engaged Mr. Byron Frank to take charge of that branch of their business. Mr. Frank has had a life's experience in cheese making, and he feels confident that the enterprise will be a success in Kaysville. The machinery will have a capacity for handling three tons of milk a day.

Marshals Low and Fulmer left Milford on the morning of the 27th, having in charge Jake Wickette, the Indian, who is charged with killing his squaw. They caught their man near Frisco. He proved such an ugly customer the officers found it necessary to put both "bracelets" and leg-irons on him. Marshals Tanner and Kuss arrived in town today; the chief goes to Salt Lake while Kuss goes to Frisco.

The president of the Deseret Agricultural and Manufacturing society has made the following committee appointments:

Executive and building—Bamberger, Jennings, Simon, Sears, Empey.

Premiums and exhibits—Peters, Empey, Willey, Bamberger, Melville.

Finance—Jennings, Cragun, Peters, Hatch, Holdaway.

Printing, advertising and transportation—Sears, Holdaway, Simon, Willey, Cragun.

Elder Heber J. Meeks, of Orderville, Kane county, Utah, who departed on a mission on March 29, 1892, has returned home. He arrived in this city on March 28, this year, feeling well in every respect. He has labored in northern West Virginia and Pennsylvania and reports that he has met with success in many places. He was pleased to notice quite a change, favorable to the Elders, in the attitude of some of the papers in those states, and he had found that the opportunities for preaching the Gospel were numerous.

A number of gentlemen met in the county court house Tuesday and organized the Utah County Fruit and Agricultural society. The object of the association is to benefit the producers by obtaining profitable markets for fruit and farm products, and obtaining trees, agricultural supplies, etc., at reduced prices. The following officers were elected: President, W. H. Kelsey; vice-president, Thos. Leonard; secretary and manager, T. Colver; treasurer, J. F. Booth; directors, F. S. Boyer, Thos. Beasley, George Clinger and D. N. Smith.

Tom Sullivan, a down-at-the-heel individual, stole a hand satchel from a store and then went to the police station, confessed his offense and asked to be locked up. His request was granted and this morning he appeared before Justice Smith and stated that he had stolen the article because he was ill and needed a place to rest and keep from starving, and felt that it would be an easy and proper thing for the court to sentence him for petit larceny. This suggestion from the prisoner was quickly acted on and he was sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment in the city jail.

The following advertisement in an English paper, called to the attention of the News by Elder A. H. Lund, president of the European mission, is republished in the hope that it may meet the eye of the parties concerned:

WILLIAM TUCKER, DECEASED.

Notice is hereby given that if Sarah Gover (formerly Sarah Tucker), the wife of Morris Gover, who was residing in the Salt Lake City in the year 1869, or, if she is dead, her children, will communicate with us, the undersigned, she or they will hear of something to their advantage. Dated the 17th day of February, 1894. Bythway & Son, solicitors, Pontypool, England.

It appears from information received in this city last night that there was a lively shooting scrape at the Mercur mining camp yesterday morning, although none was injured. It is claimed that one Hugh McMillen, a prospector and a cook at the Prosser hotel engaged in a quarrel and that McMillen drew a shotgun and commenced firing at his antagonist. That he missed his aim saved the hotel its cook. The latter, who was either armed or quickly provided with a weapon, began shooting at McMillen, but he, too, missed his mark. The officers are looking for McMillen with a view to arresting him on a charge of assault with intent to kill.

ALMY, Wyo., March 28, 1894.—A fire at the No. 7 U. P. Almy mine store was discovered at 2 this morning; cause unknown; damage not as yet ascertained, but the whole of the huge building with nearly all it contained is consumed. Money and books are saved.

We have had four deaths of late in the ward—Sister Bartlett of old age, George Woodhouse and his wife, Sister Woodhouse and her niece, Mrs. Martha Hannah Naisbitt, daughter of Eden Brown.

Sister Woodhouse has been in a deranged state of mind for some time, and died in the Evanston asylum on the 23rd, and was interred at Almy in the Church ground. R. R. H.

A quiet though elegant and pleasant reception was given by the First Presidency last evening at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas W. Jennings, in honor of Mr. B. Nagarkar, of Bombay, India.

The reception was from 5 to 7 o'clock and among those present were of course Mr. Nagarkar and the Rev. Mr. Utter and wife, whose guest the gentleman is during his sojourn in this city. All of the members of the First Presidency Presidents Wilford Woodruff, George Q. Cannon and Joseph Smith, were in attendance, as were also Lorenzo Snow, F. D. Richards, Brigham Young, Heber J. Grant, F. M. Lyman and A. H. Cannon of the Council of the Apostles, Bishop Preston, Captain Willard Young, Elders Orson F. Whitney, B. H. Roberts, Joseph Horne and others. Most of these gentlemen were accompanied by members of their families.

The time was pleasantly spent in social conversation and in listening to choice selections of vocal and instrumental music. Dainty refreshments were served during the reception.

Another deserted babe was brought to the police station March 29th. The infant was a female and apparently had made its advent into the world not more than twenty-four hours before. The little waif had been deposited on the doorstep of the residence of Thomas H. Ash, at 831 First street. It was wrapped in clean linen and a heavy blanket. As the Ash family felt they were not in a situation to rear the foundling it was taken to the City Hall. For the present at least it will find a good home with Mrs. Sheets, wife of the well-known city detective.

Captain Donovan ascertained the identity of the babe's parents and also that the little one was born out of wedlock. The mother is in a precarious state having been in a semi-conscious condition during the day. The unnatural father will be given the alternative of providing for his deserted off-spring or of being required to face a case of prosecution in the courts. It is believed that he will wisely choose the former course and that he will marry the woman who gave birth to the child as soon as she recovers sufficiently from her present sickness.

The Bee Hive House, the former residence of the late President Brigham Young, was the scene of most interesting proceedings last evening. These were under the direction of the society of Sons of Independent Pioneers of Utah. Invitations had been extended to large number of guests, and a big company was brought together. The old-time fashion of many of the costumes worn, the portals of the house, and the illumination of the building by candles such as afforded the light in early days, were unique and pleasing reminders of Pioneer times.

The arrangement of the program was most excellent. It consisted of songs, dances, music, supper, etc., of the old fashioned sort, and was conducted in a highly commendable manner. Elder Brigham Young, eldest son of the great Pioneer, made a felicitous address, in which he referred to many incidents of early times, citing the prediction of President Young regarding the filling up of these valleys with a prosperous people and its fulfillment, named a similar gathering in the Bee Hive thirty-eight years ago, and gave much interesting information. He was followed by Mayor Baskin, who highly eulogized the work of the Pioneers.

The assemblage then engaged in dancing and amusements until a late hour, when all departed happy.

One of the most brilliant meteoric displays ever seen in these parts occurred on Saturday night about ten minutes past 11 o'clock. Persons who were in the open air at that time were startled by the sudden and intense illumination of the sky east and north of the city. The light was fairly dazzling in its splendor, and those who had the good fortune to witness it were for the time being unable to account for the wonderful change from darkness to a condition that caused the stars to temporarily lose their luster and the moon to cease to shine.

A hasty examination of the heavens disclosed the fact that a large meteor-like body was shooting across the sky from southeast to northwest. On its journey vivid scintillations of a bright color were sent off in all directions. The hue that predominated and outshone all others partook of a greenish tint.

The body was clearly and well defined and as it approached Ensign Peak it burst into innumerable fragments which were showered all over that section of country above the Capitol grounds. It was expected that the explosion would have been distinctly heard but up to the present no person so far as could be ascertained by the News heard the bursting of the mysterious messenger. The display was one that was magnificent beyond description and would have gladdened the heart of any scientist or student of meteorology.

The following proclamation was issued by Governor West this morning:

TERRITORY OF UTAH, }
Executive Office. }

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that the business and litigation of the northern portion of the Fourth judicial district is sufficient to justify and require the holding, annually, of two terms of the district court at Logan in the county of Cache.

Therefore, I, Caleb W. West, Governor of the Territory of Utah, do hereby fix the times and places for holding the Fourth judicial district court, after the 5th day of August, 1894, as follows:

A term of said court shall be held at Logan, in the county of Cache, and commence on the first Monday in February; a term shall be held at Ogden, in the county of Weber, and commence on the first Monday in March; a term shall be held at Logan, in the county of Cache, and commence on the first Monday in August; a term shall be held at Ogden, in the county of Weber, and commence on the first Monday in September.

The said court shall open at the hour of 10 o'clock in the forenoon of the days herein designated.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the Great Seal of said Territory to be affixed. Done at Salt Lake City, this second day of April A. D. 1894, and of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and eighteenth.

CALEB W. WEST.

By the Governor:

CHARLES C. RICHARDS,
Secretary of the Territory.

The President of the D. A. and M. Society has issued the following letter to stockmen. It is self-explanatory and is of interest to every resident of the Territory:

Dear Sir:—The board of directors of the Deseret Agricultural and Manufacturing Society have decided to hold a fair this fall, commencing Tuesday, October 2nd, to continue until the following Saturday evening, for the exhibition of agricultural and horticultural products, minerals, home made goods of every description, fine arts, educational displays, and everything else that goes to make a grand industrial exhibition. The directors are undecided as to the propriety of including in this fair a live stock exhibition, as several of the prominent exhibitors at former fairs have stated that they do not intend to exhibit this year. The directors realize that they are public servants and would like to ascertain the minds of all the stock exhibitors on the subject. It moderate premiums are offered for live stock, will you exhibit your animals? If so, please answer the following questions without delay:

How many horses? How many horned stock?

How many sheep? How many hogs?

We would be glad to get your views on this subject, so that we may be able to better judge of the general feeling of the public.

Yours very truly,

JOHN R. WINDER,

President D. A. and M. Society.

Address: George D. Pyper, Secretary, Box 1203, Salt Lake City.

This letter will be sent to all past exhibitors in the live stock department. Colonel Winder, however, would be glad to receive the opinions of all who are interested in stock.

The fruit growers of Salt Lake county held a prolonged session on Saturday evening in the south wing of the Exposition building, and organized a permanent organization, to be known as the Horticultural Society of Salt Lake county. The object of the society is stated to be "the extermination and prevention of all insects, worms and pests that destroy fruit, and for the upbuilding of the fruit industry in this Territory."

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, M. E. Callahan; first vice president at large, Heber Bennion; secretary and treasurer, F. S. Green.

Salt Lake county was then divided into twelve districts. There being but ten of the twelve represented at the organization, ten vice presidents were elected to represent those districts, leaving two more vice presidents to be elected at the next meeting, provided the districts send representatives at that meeting, which will be at the same place on the last Saturday in April, at 2 p. m.

Mr. W. W. Cole received the endorsement of those present for the appointment of fruit inspector.

Professor Brown, the etymologist, then made some very good suggestions in regard to fruit pests. He will give further information to the vice presidents of the districts, who meet as per agreement at No. 5 Morgan's Row, in the rear of the Board of Trade building, at 2 p. m. on Thursday, April 5th.

The meeting Saturday is expected to be the means of doing a great amount of good, towards encouraging one of the most valuable industries in the Territory. The members of the society earnestly desire the presence of all those interested in fruit culture at the next meeting of the organization on the last Saturday in April.

March 28th a number of tests were made of the new waterworks system in Forest Dale, south of the city, which proved in every way satisfactory. In case of fire a two-story building can be easily covered by a stream of water from the hydrants in the upper part of the town, and in the central and lower portions three-story buildings can be thrown over, as the water will go to a height of sixty feet. This is by the pressure on the mains alone. When the proposition which has been made to put in a fire engine is carried out buildings of any size will have full protection.

In early days the water was developed from springs above Forest Dale, and was used on what was the well known Forest Farm, then owned by President Young, so that the land owners there also became the owners of the water. For this there have been constructed two substantial reservoirs to protect the springs from being fouled by storms or other means. These springs now furnish 1,442,067 gallons of water per day of 24 hours—nearly one-fifth as much as City creek, and half as much as Emigration creek; so the supply is abundant for all purposes. An analysis of the water showed it to be of excellent quality.

Ten fire hydrants have been placed in position, arranged in such manner that every house in Forest Dale, or that can be built within its limits, is within a block of a fire hydrant. The value of this arrangement can be easily understood as all the houses in the interior of the district are within reach of two hydrants. The water was turned into the system last January and has been running ever since, and quite a number of the residents have had it in their houses for some time, while others are connecting their dwellings with the mains.

A discovery was made by a policeman March 28th that has caused a good deal of uneasiness in official circles during the day and one that will cause a profound sensation throughout the community when the particulars are fully known.

Shortly after the break of day Officer Busby's attention was attracted by a peculiar looking device lying near the foundation of the Commercial block in Wagner's alley leading to Second South street. On picking it up he was startled, when on examination he found it was a cleverly manufactured bomb with a kerosene saturated fuse attached. He reported the matter to Sergeant Eslingier carefully conveyed the dreaded instrument of supposed destruction to the City Hall where later it was minutely examined by Chief Pratt and Captain Donovan.

Inspection disclosed the fact that it had been made from a piece of ordinary gas pipe and was about three inches and a half in length. At either end it was covered with a closely fitting threaded iron cap. Through one of these the fuse protruded. The question of the safety or danger of opening it was discussed for some time. Finally one of the caps was removed. The interior of the tube contained only a spike wire nail and a small quantity of powder-like material. There was so little of this though that even had it been of an explosive character it could have done but little or no damage.

Had the shell been charged, says Chief Pratt, as it was at first feared, and exploded, it could have done almost unlimited damage. How the bomb came to be where it was found and why it was placed there and by whom are the mysteries that Chief Pratt will endeavor to unfold, and that as quickly and effectually as possible. That official is certain of one thing, and that is that there are a good many men here who are exceedingly desperate and who will not hesitate to do the worst should they feel inclined to resort to such means.

When the NEWS announced a few evenings ago that Wendell Benson was lying seriously ill at his residence and that his condition was such as to cause the gravest fears on the part of his family and friends, the community was sensibly shocked and surprised, as it was a comparatively short time before that he was seen about the haunts of business attend to his affairs, apparently in the best of health. When, on March 30, the intelligence was given out that he had passed away from mortality, sorrow took possession of the hearts of those who heard the tidings.

His demise occurred shortly before 6 o'clock and was caused by an attack of typhoid fever in its most virulent form. He was stricken down with the disease less than two weeks ago but as he had a magnificent physique, splendid constitution and a most cheerful and sunny disposition it was confidently believed that he would pass successfully through the feverish furnace. From the first he had the best medical attention and most skillful nursing.

There was a very sad incident in connection with the passing away of the deceased and one that came near causing the death of his wife almost simultaneously with his own. Mrs. Benson, in seeing her husband sink into unconsciousness after he had arisen from his sick bed, immediately seized a glass vessel containing alcohol and saturating her hands with it was about to apply it to his body in the hope of keeping up his respiration until the doctor could be summoned. Unfortunately she was near the stove and the liquid was ignited and enveloped the upper part of her person in flames. But for the presence of Mrs. Joshua Grant who wrapped her in a blanket she would soon have been burned to death. As it was her hands were frightfully injured and her mental and physical suffering throughout the night and during the day has been intense. She is completely prostrated and refuses to be consoled. The case is one that elicits the sympathy of the community and her friends hope for her speedy recovery though it is believed that the usefulness of her hands will be permanently impaired if indeed she does not lose some of her fingers.

THE ZUNI INDIANS.

ZUNI (Indian Village), Valenta Co.,
N. M., March 9, 1894.

In company with President Wm. H. Gibbons and young David Oveson (our teamster), I left St. Johns on the 6th inst. to visit the distant settlement of Ramah, about eighty miles northeast of St. Johns, and twenty-five miles south of Wingate, on the Atlantic & Pacific Ry. After traveling two days and camping in a fine cedar grove over night, we arrived at Ramah in the evening of the 7th.

The village of Ramah is beautifully situated in the extreme northeast end of a fertile valley which extends in a south-westerly direction from the settlement about five miles; its average width is one mile, and it is surrounded by low cedar and pine covered mountains. The foot of the higher mountains, known as the Zuni range, is about six miles north of Ramah. Small grain and corn are raised; also potatoes, but as the altitude is nearly 7000 feet, only the hardier kinds of fruit are produced. The present strength of the ward is ninety-six souls, or eleven families. James R. McNell is the Bishop.

The first settlers in that part of the country where Ramah is situated were Indian missionaries, among whom were Lorenzo H. Hatch, Ernest A. Tietjen, John Hunt, Luther C. Burnham, Wm. H. Gibbons and others, who located in a little valley (lying immediately north of the present Ramah) called Cebollo (pronounced Savoia), and at another place lying eastward known as Savoietta. The first of these missionaries arrived in 1877, and from that time till 1880 Cebollo was, like Moan Coppy in Arizona, an important missionary station. The present Ramah was founded in 1882, and it bids fair to become a flourishing settlement, if more Latter-day Saints can be induced to locate there. The natural advantages for quite a large settlement are excellent; all that is needed is proper development of the resources of the country; but the present strength of the settlement is inadequate to make improvements as fast as could be desired. The lower part of the Cebollo valley is already utilized as a reservoir, and by raising the dam (which is only  $\frac{1}{2}$  mile from the townsite) ten feet or so, a very large body of water could be stored and used in the season thereof for irrigation purposes. There is plenty of land. The present inhabitants of Ramah extend a hearty invitation to such of their co-religionists as are in search of homes to come and cast their lot with them.

Yesterday we left our friends at Ramah, and traveled twenty-two and a half miles (on our return trip) to Zuni, the famous Indian village, which in past years has been visited by quite a number of our Indian missionaries and other Elders, among whom was Ammon M. Tenney, who baptized quite a number of the villagers. By means of the Spanish language, which is spoken by quite a number of the Indians and which is also spoken fluently by Prest. Gibbons, we have conversed considerably with our dusky friends, several of whom, after being told that we were Mormons, replied that they also were Mormons; and while they went through the gestures which were intended to illustrate the ordinance of baptism and the laying on of hands, they would exclaim: "Yes, Ammon Tenney did so and so to us." Their knowledge of the Gospel and the nature of its ordinances beyond this seemed to be extremely limited.

Among the chiefs to whom we were introduced was the noted Reman Luna, the present governor of the village, who treated us very kindly. He was among those baptized by Elder Tenney, and because of his friendship to the Mormon missionaries, he was, through certain influences brought to bear upon the majority of his people by Mormon-haters, deposed from his governorship, and stood thus for several years. But the reaction came; and when he was chosen governor again it was also owing to the fact that he had been a friend to the Mormons, whose constant course toward their Indian friends had finally gained their utmost confidence; and today these Zuni villagers look upon our people as their best and truest friends. Be it said to the honor of our Indian missionaries that they have made a good record among the natives. While other white men who have associated themselves with the Indians have become notorious for their immoral conduct and betrayal of confidence, our brethren have invariably acted like men and Saints; and the fruits of their example and precepts are now quite apparent among the natives.

The Zuni village is situated on the north bank of the so-called Zuni wash, which in times of high water represents a large stream, but which in the dry season is very small so far as its running water is concerned. The village covers about five acres of ground; some of the largest buildings are five stories high; but most of them only one and two stories. Instead of using inside stairways, the upper stories are reached by means of ladders, which are placed on the outside of the buildings; the inhabitants thus pass from roof to roof, all the roofs being flat. From the top of the tallest buildings a fine view is obtained of the surrounding country.

There are a number of white Indians in the village; we were introduced to two men, one woman and one half-grown girl; all of these were fully as fair as the average white man, and their hair was also quite light. Their features and general physiognomy are, however, pure Indian. Elder Baker, formerly editor of the Logan Nation, who is at present teaching school at Ramah, has spent considerable time at this Indian village. He believes that these white Indians are literal descendants of the ancient Nephites; the philosophy of this is certainly no more incredible than the theory that nearly all of those who embrace the fulness of the Gospel in these the last days are literal descendants of the house of Israel, though mixed up with the Gentiles to such an extent that it would perhaps be impossible through the ordinary method of tracing genealogy to prove this. So also with these white Zunis, whose parents in all instances were Indians of the ordinary hue, and whose children again are like the other Indian children in the village as to the tint of their skins. But this does not destroy the theory advanced by Elder Baker and other Elders in the Church, nor those advocated by many scientific men of the age to the effect that the color of another race, though hid for generations through repeated intermarriage, may occasionally assert itself in a perfect type, when its existence was barely known.

While staying in the village last night we were invited by the governor to attend a dance of the young people; there were in fact three dances; but the governor assured us that the one he took us to represented the "better blood" or the "aristocracy" of the village. After waiting till our patience was almost exhausted a young Indian with a drum at length appeared; and after waiting another half hour or more, he commenced to beat his drum, very gently at first, but as he proceeded he hit it harder and harder; then the older Indians began to sing, keeping time with the drum. At first they sang in an undertone; then in a more audible manner, and at length they introduced their full volume of voice. Next the young men began to dress—or undress—for the ball; I shall not attempt to describe their attire; but suffice it to say that they at last placed themselves to the number of twenty-eight on the flag stone floor in two rows assuming a position somewhat similar to that of our more civilized white dancers when they are preparing to dance Scotch Reel or kindred figures. But as yet there were no women on the floor; the men stood there alone a long time waiting for the other half of the participants of the intended dance to get ready. Nothing is done in a hurry by these Indians. In the mean time the young women were preparing their toilet in the same room and at length marched up in single file and took their position between the men without saying a word. Whether they chose their partners right there and then or whether it was understood beforehand as to who the respective women were going to dance side by side of, our Indian interpreter was unable to tell, or at least we could not make him understand sufficient to give us the desired explanation. It was perhaps fully three hours after the young man first began to beat his drum that the dancing proper commenced; apparently it took them that long to get up sufficient steam or ambition to step forth. And then the whole movement amounted simply to what we would call a plain "balance all" or stepping to music, while turning to the right and then to the left; now facing partners (if such they could be called; for it was impossible to tell who were partners), and then facing the ladies on the other side. But there was no swinging of partners, nor did the men touch the women throughout the whole performance, save for an accidental touch of the elbows in turning around or in moving slowly from one end of the hall to the other which was done several times during the exercises. The men danced in their moccasins, while the women were barefooted. The men danced holding a gourd in the right hand and a feather in the left; the women, while dancing, held a feather in each hand. Though the music consisted of nothing more than the beating of a single drum and the singing of a number of men, and though the tune was painfully monotonous, and partook of a sameness throughout, there was time and tact in it; which the respective dancers seemed to understand almost to perfection; for every dancer seemed to step accurately to the music; all turned and moved with one accord, and apparently made no mistakes.

There were, according to the U. S. census of 1890, 1,463 Indians at Zuni; but though they all spent part of the time at the main village, a large number go off in the summer season to farm at neighboring villages; of these there are three or four in the vicinity; considerable grain is raised, and sufficient is saved or stored away to keep the inhabitants in bread for three or four years. Fine peach orchards are planted in the sands half way up the slope of a mountain standing four miles to the southeast of the village. On the top of this mountain, which is upwards of 500 feet higher than the country below, are the ruins of the old Zuni village, where the forefathers of the present population a long time ago sought refuge from their enemies; they are supposed to have lived there for several generations.

Though there is an unpleasant smell about the Zuni village, I found the inhabitants more cleanly in their habits to all appearances than I had expected, judging from such reports as I had previously heard concerning them. Most of their rooms are large and airy; and the walls and floors are kept quite clean in most places; earthen floors abound; but there are some laid with flat stones. The largest dwelling room we entered measured no less than 75 feet in length by 25 feet in width; and was about 12 feet high from floor to ceiling. Some other dwellings which we visited contained rooms varying in size from 15x20 to 20x40 feet. In some rooms there were crude paintings on the walls; but the furniture was very scant. No tables or chairs are seen as a rule; small wooden blocks are used to sit upon; and meals are served upon the floor, where also the beds are spread.

There are in New Mexico nineteen Indian pueblos altogether, containing a total population of 7,681. The smallest of these pueblos or villages (Pojoaque) has only fifteen inhabitants, while the largest is the Zuni village, which we are visiting. The Pueblo Indians (so-called by the Spaniards because they dwell in "fixed habitations" or permanent villages) are the original inhabitants of New Mexico. They are noted for that docility and gentleness of character that demarks civilization from barbarism and have always been distinguished from the nomadic Indians by their fixed homes, their permanent cultivation of the fields adjacent to their villages, and the civility that comes from an organized system of government. The Pueblo Indians have from times immemorial been the bitter enemies of the Apaches, the Utes and the Navajos. War between the wandering tribes and the Pueblos were constant in times past. Now the warlike Apaches and Navajos are confined to their respective reservations, and the semi-civilized Pueblos are left to pursue their labors in peace. The Zunis, unlike most other Indians in the United States, receive no annuity from the government, as they are self-sustaining. We may add that we saw in the village quite a number of good wagons and some farming implements of modern manufacture; still a great deal of their farming is yet done in the old, rude way; a forked stick answering for a plow, etc.

The Catholics seems to have lost their "grip" upon the Zunis long ago; the old church, probably built centuries ago, is in ruins; but they are now repairing the walls with a view to roofing it in again, after which it is intended to hold Catholic services in the village once more.

A young intelligent Indian, in conversation with Elder Gibbons, conveyed the idea that there exists a tradition among the Zuni Indians to the effect that some records are hid in a stone box up on the top of the mountain where the old village once stood, but that an old Catholic priest carried off the paper or document which described the place of concealment; consequently, the present generation of Indians are unable to find these records, which they believe contain some account of their forefathers. Perhaps, after all, Moroni was not the only one of the ancient inhabitants of this land who hid up historical records in a stone box. What tales would not the hundreds of Indian pueblo ruins that abound in this part of the country unfold if they could speak; or, if records, giving account of their inhabitants, could be found.

HISTORICAL FACTS.

The first paper ever manufactured in Salt Lake City, Utah, was on June 27, 1864, by Thomas Hollis and Thomas Howard. Some time previous to this the necessity of saving paper rags had been publicly advocated, and some 800 pounds had been taken to the Titling office, and from these about forty pounds of paper was made by hand, suitable for hardbills, etc., on the above date. One sheet of this lot has been preserved and may now be seen at the Deseret Museum. History records this fact that paper made in Salt Lake City in 1864 was the first paper ever made west of the Missouri river. As soon as this was noted abroad, and that paste-boards could be had in exchange for rags, there was no lack of material to supply the slow method of making paste-boards and paper from such a crude process then at command.

President Young had granted the above-named men the free use of the old nail factory situated on City Creek, afterwards used as a molasses factory, which contained a boiler and other machinery, additions to which made by Nathan Davis constituted their paper-making establishment. They had the privilege of using the water power after it was needed by the public works during the day, so that their card boards and paper-making had to be done during the night or until 7 o'clock in the morning. From June until November they furnished the DESERET NEWS office with many hundred dollars' worth of paper, upon which was printed the NEWS, edited by then by Hon. Elias Smith. There was a demand for all the paste boards they could make, because of many uses they could be utilized for, such as sun bonnet, bonnet boxes, etc.

About this time a change in the firm occurred. Mr. Thomas Howard retired to his farm in Mill Creek and Thomas Hollis entered into partnership with Wm. Jeppson. They removed the machinery to Centerville, and through mismanagement or otherwise, little or no paper or cardboards were afterwards manufactured; the machinery was disposed of in fragments and the parties left for California.

Nothing further was done until 1860, when machinery for the manufacture of paper was brought from the East. In January, 1861, President Young called on Thos. Howard to aid in the conversion of a building known as the sugar works into a paper factory, suitable for the imported machinery. He was ably assisted by Z. Derrick Sr., machinist. The factory was all fitted up in time for the first lot of paper to be manufactured by machinery on the 24th of July, 1861. When all was ready for a start, President Young, with a number of invited guests, including Heber C. Kimball, Daniel H. Wells, Joseph A. Young, Elias Smith, Wm. H. Hooper, besides others, with their ladies, went down in a body to see the first lot of rags put into the mill, and were delighted to witness all the machinery work like a charm. The first lot made was 10 reams of wrapping paper and some brown paper, total 680 lbs. Second lot, made August 9, was 6 reams of job paper, 261 lbs. Third, on Sept. 4, was 19 reams of news paper, 562 lbs., being the first ever made in Utah by machinery.

Thomas Howard not only put up the mill but made all the paper from July 24, 1861, to January 16, 1863, which amounted to 28,997 lbs. He is now in his 80th year, hale and hearty, and living in this city.

Here we have in 1861 a paper factory, costing several thousand dollars, with a capacity for making 2,000 lbs. of paper daily, and no material on hand (viz., rags) to run it with, the above figures showing the comparatively trifling quantities made at one time, and then only occasionally. Hence the necessity of some bold effort being made to wake up a more universal attention to the husbanding of paper rags throughout the country.

To meet the emergency, President Young asked me if I would accept as a mission for the good of the community the gathering of paper-rags from house to house, and advocate the necessity of fostering this home enterprise. I consented, and for about three years my field of labor extended from Franklin, Idaho, in the north, to Sanpete in the south, including all intermediate settlements. To say that after being one of the leading merchants of Salt Lake City at one time, and the only auctioneer at another, the gathering of paper-rags did not seem somewhat humiliating would be an injustice to human nature. But duty before pleasure being the mainspring of my past life, I conferred not with flesh and blood, but as an Elder in the Church of Jesus Christ I gladly assumed the comparatively menial employment and became almost universally known as the rag-gatherer.

I have the satisfaction to know that by my labors a foundation was laid for a large and thriving business being done in rags as an article of commerce, and an immense amount of paper manufactured since the year 1861. As an evidence of my earnestness in the prosecution of my labors, my public discourses were of a very ragged character; and my hands and my head during the week being full of rage, I could not well divest myself of them on the Sabbath day.

I will here remark for the benefit of the young men in this community: "You know not what lies before you; but whatever labor you may be called upon to do by the servants of the Lord, do it with your whole might, with a cheerful heart, and the Spirit of God will be with you to make the yoke easy and the burthen light." Such was my experience. GEORGE GODDARD.

FORESTRY ASSOCIATION.

So many inquiries are made both personally and by letter as to the objects of the Utah Forestry Association, that a plain statement of its objects seems highly proper.

In a general way it may be said that its objects are to study the forestry problem in relation to the conservation of the water supply, and in relation to the agricultural and horticultural interests of Utah. One of the most pressing needs, so far as the water supply is concerned, is to secure timber reservations around the headwaters of our principal streams. To secure these reservations it is necessary for the people, who will be benefited, to present petitions to the secretary of the interior asking for them. In these petitions the area of the proposed reservations, the names of the streams which head in them, the character of the land, whether rocky, mountainous, heavily or sparsely timbered, and whether or not the soil is fit for agriculture when stripped of its timber, must all be clearly stated. It would probably be wise to state the facts in reference to the irrigation ditches already drawing water from the streams heading in the proposed reserves, and wherever possible statements should be made that the timber on the proposed reservation is not immediately necessary for the use of the resident population.

It is not the purpose of the government in creating these reservations to withdraw them permanently from the use of the public, but only to reserve the title in the government for all time. When there is a demand for the timber and when it can be cut under proper supervision, without injury to the purpose of the reservation, the government sells the standing timber (stumpage as it is called) to local buyers.

Another purpose of the association is to collect and disseminate such knowledge as will be of use to people who wish to plant groves or ornamental shade trees. Much of the tree planting which has been done in the past has been most unfortunate. Large areas of land are now planted to Lombardy poplar trees. These trees are of little use. The timber from them is of slight value except for fuel, and for that purpose it is vastly inferior to many other species of trees. If tree planters had known of the valueless character of these trees they would undoubtedly have planted other kinds.

There are perhaps but few persons in Utah who know the best kind of tree to plant on any given kind of land or for any given purpose. Those who have this knowledge should be willing to disseminate it for the benefit of others in the Territory; and to facilitate the spread of such useful information, is among the chief objects of the Forestry association. Those who have rare information pertaining to trees in their relation to health, to economy and to the industries of the commonwealth ought to communicate such information to the society through its president or secretary, when steps will be taken to give it wide circulation and to file it under classified heads, for future use; as it is the purpose of the society to become a bureau of information on matters relating to tree and timber interests.

Should we not begin at once to collect just this kind of information?

In a previous paper I referred to the relations between forests, birds, injurious insects and fruit growing, and from the reports of dealers in fruit I showed that Utah is losing thousands of dollars every year from fruit injured by insects. And as was stated in the article referred to, birds are the natural enemies of insects. This is not true, however, of all birds. It is almost certain that the sparrows which are so plentiful in all of our cities, do far more harm than good, and the sooner systematic efforts are made to rid ourselves of them the sooner can we hope for the increase of the insect-eating song birds. Careful observations should be made to determine positively which birds are our friends and which ones are our enemies.

A great task which is before the people of Utah is the foresting and the re-foresting of the mountain sides. This is a task of such magnitude that full information regarding the best means should be collected, before the work is undertaken; but when it is once accomplished, the land which is now useless, and which in many places is rapidly losing all of its soil, leaving only the bare rock exposed, will yield a yearly revenue which will go far towards the support of our state institutions.

If we knew a farmer who complained of "hard times" while he permitted large tracts of his land to remain unused, we would wonder at his stupidity. Is it not as unwise for a state to allow its lands to be unemployed as for an individual?

The Forestry Association is anxious to get some definite information as to the extent of the present timber area of Utah, and also of the character of the timber. To secure this information an accurate observer is needed in every neighborhood, one who will give the subject a little time and careful thought, and who will write a careful report, answering the questions which will be sent him on application. All who are willing to take part in this work are requested to communicate with either the president or secretary of the Utah Forestry Association.

The address of the president is, Dr. John R. Park, 166 north, State street, Salt Lake City. The secretary may be addressed at the University of Utah, Salt Lake City.

C. A. WHITING, Sec'y.

Arbor Day is at hand and a few practical suggestions as to how to plant trees may not be inopportune. The first question which presents itself is, "what kind of a tree, or trees shall I plant?" The answer to this question depends upon the character of the soil, and upon the purpose for which the tree is planted.

There are at least five trees which are fine street trees, and also suitable for most yards which seem to grow well in Utah. These five are the hard maple, the white elm, the linden or basswood, the black locust and the black walnut. It is highly probable that there are other trees nearly or quite as good as these, which will do well in our climate. All of these trees require a moderately dry soil, that is they are not suited to wet or swampy ground. For such ground the silver maple, the gray willow and the box elder are suitable. All of these trees furnish fairly good fuel and they will grow on land that would otherwise be useless. Of course native trees are more likely to live than trees which are imported. It is generally better to procure trees from a nursery than from the forest, for in a well managed nursery especial attention is given to the formation of roots, which will permit the trees to be transplanted with little danger to its life.

It is usually better to transplant small trees; as a general thing it is better to select trees not more than two inches in diameter and not more than ten feet high.

The roots which are essential to the life of a tree are microscopic in size and they are invariably killed by drying. These essential roots, or root hairs, are borne on the sides of the smaller roots, hence the necessity of securing an abundance of fibrous roots.

Before the tree is dug up, a large hole should be dug to receive it. The hole should be so large that when the tree is placed in it and the roots properly spread out, the sides of the hole will be a foot from the ends of the roots. The hole should not be too deep. The tree should be planted at about the same depth at which it was growing. Before the tree is placed in the hole, if the ground is dry, one or more pails of water should be poured in. In digging the tree up for transplanting care should be taken not to shake the earth from the roots. By shaking the roots, while they are covered with earth, the root hairs are broken off, and as before stated these are essential to the life of the tree. Whenever it is possible it is a good plan to retain a bulb of earth around the roots, and place this unbroken in the hole prepared for the tree.

Care should be taken to have fine mellow soil, not too wet, to pack around the roots of trees. In filling the hole care should be taken to press the soil closely around the roots.

After the tree is planted it will need careful and regular watering. A good way, if one has only a few trees to attend to, is to put straw around the trees and pour the water on the straw. In this way it soaks slowly into the ground and is less likely to wash the soil away from the roots than when it is poured directly on the ground. The ground around the trees should be kept free from grass and weeds for at least two or three years after the trees are planted.

Would it not be well for teachers who celebrate Arbor Day to make it the occasion of a lesson in forestry for their pupils? I would also suggest that an accurate record be kept at each school house of the growth of all the trees in the yard. In this way valuable statistics of timber culture may be preserved.

The Dillon, Mont., Enterprise makes the startling announcement that many of the miners and prospectors of Summit county are making money selling gold and specimens to parties that are trying to start gold camps in other parts of the state.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 27.—Assistant Secretary of the Interior Reynolds rendered a decision today which will greatly enlarge the pensions rolls. It will admit to pensions a large number of insane, idiotic and permanently helpless minor children of deceased soldiers, where the pensions of the former had ceased by the children attaining the age of sixteen years prior to the act of June 27th, 1890, the decision holding that the act of 1890 has the effect of restoring these dependent persons to the rolls during life, or the continuance of the disability.

EL RENO, O. T., March 27.—A peculiarly horrible murder was committed in Cheyenne county, Saturday. A Mrs. Williams, it appears, had left her baby in the care of its two brothers, Gibson, aged 6, and another boy still younger. During the mother's absence Gibson slipped up to the bed upon which the child lay and beat it to death with a club.

After having killed the baby, the two boys dragged the body to the rear of the house and were preparing to bury it when discovered. Gibson, though seemingly aware of the enormity of his deed, refuses to give his reasons for committing it.

SAN JOSE, Costa Rica, March 27.—E. E. Thompson, who is walking from the United States to South America on a wager, passed through this city. He looked the "worse for wear," and people stared at him in wonder.

NEW YORK, March 27.—The route usually taken by the western-bound steamships at this season is literally blocked with ice and the commanders of several vessels, which left the other side before the bergs began drifting down on the Labrador current, have doubtless been surprised to find themselves nipped in immense fields.

SOUTH BEND, Ind., March 27.—Mysterious mail robberies, detectives who cannot find the thieves, and hundreds of angry correspondents whose money has gone astray have lately been making life miserable for certain venders of patent medicines and cosmetics at South Bend.

More than $10,000 is said to have disappeared in some mysterious way from the letters sent to South Bend, and notwithstanding the efforts of the post-office inspectors the leak has not been discovered. Most of the money has been taken from letters addressed to a patent medicine concern.

WASHINGTON, March 27.—A distinguished company gathered in the Senate chamber this morning and participated in the funeral services over the remains of Senator Colquitt. The President was absent, but all the members of the cabinet, except Lemont, were there, together with the members of the Supreme Court and the diplomatic corps. The family of the senator and immediate friends occupied seats to the left of the vice president and Speaker Crisp, and the honorary pall bearers, consisting of members of the two houses, formed a semi-circle back of them.

HONESDALE, Pa., March 28.—Charlie Young, an eleven-year-old boy whose parents live in Carbondale, was brought to this city and lodged in jail upon the charge of train wrecking. It is alleged that he and a youthful companion named Arthur Taylor threw a switch at Plane Eleven and derailed a train of Delaware & Hudson coal cars. A passenger train following the coal train narrowly escaped disaster from the same cause. The boys say they did it for fun.

NEW YORK, March 28.—Dr. Emery, health commissioner for Brooklyn, issued an address last evening declaring smallpox to be an epidemic in Brooklyn as well as in New York. Dr. Emery calls upon all classes of people to submit to vaccination and declares that unless his advice be followed the ravages of the disease will be something to be dreaded.

ALLIANCE, Ohio, March 28.—Cokey's army broke camp after a good night's rest on clean straw and a plentiful breakfast of fried ham and pork, bread and coffee at 9 o'clock this morning, with 193 men in line by actual count. The next camp will be at Salem, thirteen miles distant. It is scheduled to reach there by 2 p. m., but the thaw of yesterday, followed by a freeze last night, rendered the roads rough, and the end of the journey will probably not be reached on time.

LOCKPORT, N. Y., March 28.—The citizens of Newfane village and vicinity are much excited over alleged spirit communications from deceased residents of the village. Business has been practically suspended and everybody attends the seances. The epidemic is spreading and the leading church members are investigating the subject. The orthodox worshippers at first pronounced it a delusion of the devil.

GALESBURG, Ill., March 28.—The First Church was packed last night, the occasion being the annual oratorical contest by students of Knox College. The orations were all of unusual merit. The first prize was awarded to Otto A. Hauerbach of Salt Lake City, Utah, whose subject was "The Hero of Compromise."

Hauerbach will represent Knox at the inter-collegiate contest next fall.

WASHINGTON, March 28.—The proposed amendment to the preamble of the Constitution, "acknowledging the supreme authority and just government of the Almighty God in all the affairs of men and nations," has been finally disposed of by the House committee on judiciary, when it was decided to lay on the table.

WASHINGTON, March 28.—The following is the letter of Vice President Stevenson transmitting the condolence of the United States Senate to the family of Louis Kossuth:

"In the Senate of the United States, March 28.

"To the family of Louis Kossuth: I have the honor to send you a copy of a resolution adopted by the Senate of the United States, March 25, 1894:

"In obedience to the decree of the Senate I hereby tender you respectful condolence for the loss you, in common with the whole world, have sustained in the death of this illustrious patriot and lover of liberty. The people of the United States still remember his visit in 1851. The profound affection and respect with which he inspired them still abide in their hearts. Though a citizen of a foreign and distant land, he spoke our language as if it were his native tongue. His consummate eloquence made a great and permanent addition to the treasures of our literature. We are glad to bear witness that to the cause of constitutional liberty—his cause and our cause—he remained faithful to the end."

"I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant, A. E. Stevenson, Vice President of the United States."

NEW YORK, March 28.—George Tichnor Curtis, the lawyer and writer of political economy, died today of pneumonia, aged 82.

NEW YORK, March 28.—The statement that Howard Gould, a third son of the late Jay Gould, and Miss Odette Tyler, the young actress, were engaged to be married, was confirmed today by Mr. Gould and Miss Tyler herself.

GARFIELD, O., March 28.—The weary commonweal straggled into Beloit at noon, five miles out of Alliance and seventy-two from Pittsburg. The march was broken at Niles Junction, where Marshal Brown called a halt for half an hour. Horn blowing and chaffing from the villagers greeted the woe-begone army. Some of the boys had several bushels of snowballs prepared for the army, but the appearance of the men was so forlorn that they were allowed to pass through unmolested. Several have deserted, and there is much grumbling. The army, sixty-seven strong, passed through Damascus at 1:30 p. m., and was jeered by the people of the village. Owing to the rough roads the marchers have not been able to make schedule time today.

EL PASO, Texas, March 28.—"General" Fry, who is still at Sierra Blanca, ninety miles east of here, with 470 men, wired A. L. Whiteside, of this city: "We need provisions and boxcar transportation to San Antonio. Can anything be done for us?"

This afternoon $200 worth of provisions for the hungry men was forwarded by express.

HUDSON, Wis., March 29.—United States Marshal Oakley, of Madison, brought William Sauntry, the prominent Stillwater, Minn., lumberman here last night. He is charged with unlawfully cutting 684,000 feet of government timber in Doudlass county. Sauntry was given a hearing before United States Commissioner Helms and bound over in $1,000 bonds to appear at the April term of the district court at Madison. Sauntry is the fourth lumberman who has been arrested on a like charge.

OTTUMWA, Iowa, March 29.—A bicycle last night saved from capture Bill Cramer, the Albia desperado, who held the Albia officers at bay last week and escaped. The officers got wind of his presence here and started to make his capture. When they first caught sight of Cramer he was on foot and had a good start, being just beyond pistol range. Seeing that his pursuers were gaining on him, the desperate man seized a bicycle which was standing in front of a store and mounting it was soon off like the wind. Before the officers could get a vehicle it is supposed he succeeded in getting many miles away. They have not caught him yet.

PARIS, March 29.—Advices from Grand Bassam, Western Africa, are to the effect that Pullo, the administrator of that district, has been killed in an engagement with natives. It is reported that Dosmev, the administrator of Casamanza, Senegambia, has been murdered by natives.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., March 25.—The state board of health is informed that there are more cases of smallpox in Chicago than ever before known. There were 221 cases reported from March 1 to March 25 in that city, 18 new cases being reported yesterday. The pest houses are full, over 600 patients being in them. One case is reported in Alton and the disease is reported as having appeared at Hoopston, Vermillion county.

LONDON, March 29.—Baron Hennen, lord of appeal in ordinary, is dead. He was president of the commission which tried the charges against Parnell in 1888.

ABBAZIA, March 29.—Emperor Francis Joseph was met at the railway station this morning by Emperor William. Triumphant arches spanned the streets through which the two emperors passed and an enormous crowd cheered them as they rode by. After being conducted to the residence prepared for him, the emperor of Austria paid a visit to the empress of Germany and partook of luncheon. The emperors will take sail on the German emperor's yacht later, followed by a brilliant reception on board the German warship Moltke.

TERRE HAUTE, Ind., March 29.—A dispatch from Danville, Ill., says: W. H. Owens, city marshal of Paris, shot and killed James Gaines, a colored coal miner, at Grape creek, near that city, last evening. Gaines was under arrest for stealing an overcoat and some jewelry from Wallace Blackburn, of Paris. Gaines attempted to get his revolver away from Owens and the officer shot him to protect himself. Owens surrendered and is now in jail.

WASHINGTON, March 29.—The President has sent the House a lengthy message, vetoing the Bland silver coinage bill.

DALLAS, Tex., March 29.—A telegram to the Times-Herald from Sierra Blanca, Texas, says: A special train of five coaches and two baggage cars left here at 1 o'clock this morning, with General Fry's first regiment of the industrial army on board. Company K, of the regiment under Captain Cunningham, will join the regiment at Valentine, which place they reached day before yesterday. The train is expected to reach San Antonio tonight.

COLUMBIA, O., March 29.—Coxey has rejoined his army. The Commonwealth is enjoying a big boom. The Farmers' alliance provided three wagon loads of provisions and two of wood. In a speech during one of the army's stops today, Carl Brown said he was being misrepresented by forty argus-eyed demons of hell who followed him around. He meant the reporters, and has issued orders to put newspaper men out of camp. The citizens of this place provided a camp, straw beds being provided. Thirty-six recruits from East Liverpool joined. This town has a Coxey club, with fifty-three members.

DES MOINES, Ia., March 29.—The house this afternoon passed the woman suffrage bill, giving women the right to vote for city and school officers and on the question of issuing bonds.

SEATTLE, Wash., March 30.—Tidings of the British ship Somali, long overdue at San Francisco and thought to be lost were received here this afternoon.

The Somali was spoken by the Kennebec on March 27, a little north of San Francisco, and only a short distance from the coast.

She was entirely out of provisions, the crew having lived since Christmas on rice and tea taken from the cargo.

The Somali sailed from Hong Kong November last. She battled with northwesterly winds in an attempt to pass Formosa, but the captain finally gave it up. She ran down China sea and went clear round Australia.

Officer Morgan, of the Somali, was taken on board the Kennebec and told of the Somali's terrible voyage. He wanted provisions, he said, as those aboard his vessel were starving. With the exception of rice and tea, which composed the cargo, the Somali's crew had had nothing to eat for many days.

CONSTANTINOPLE, March 30.—The fact has just come to light that on Sunday last a young man fired two shots at the Armenian patriarch, the head of the Armenian church. Being arrested he admitted that a plot existed, in which several were concerned, to kill the distinguished prelate, and declared that they would eventually carry out the object, because he is not capable of managing the Armenian affairs. Several others are arrested.

OMAHA, Neb., March 30.—E. F. Cook, an aged and wealthy pioneer of Omaha, is lying at the point of death at his rooms and his physicians hold out little hope for his recovery. As nearly as can be ascertained from the neighbors and attending physicians Mr. Cook's present serious condition is in a large measure due to the importunities of an elderly spinster whose anxiety to become Mrs. Cook led her to harass the patient in season and out of season. She availed herself of all the opportunities afforded a nurse in Mr. Cook's sick room, until finally, in sheer desperation, the patient jumped from his bed, smashed the window and fled out into the street. On another occasion he rushed up into the attic and threw himself out of the window, falling thirty feet to the walk below. This experience was the one that brought on the present aggravated phase of his illness, as he sustained four broken ribs and was also injured about the head. Since that time there have been indications of mental failing and the doctors say the patient is now suffering from softening of the brain. The woman in the case has been removed and the dying man is in the hands of his relatives.

WALLACE, Ida., March 30.—Between Gem and Burke, the heart of the Coeur d'Alene mining district, yesterday, not less than six destructive snowslides rushed down into Canyon creek. As far as is known five lives were lost, and these were all killed by one avalanche, but reports are current that two men were caught in another slide, which is quite probable.

At 9:30 a. m. a slide started 2,000 feet above the creek at the head of the draw in which the Black Bear mine is situated. At the foot of the draw, four board shanties were smashed to pieces and buried under forty feet of snow, and one was carried bodily forward across the creek, with but little damage.

In one of the buildings was an Italian family, comprising Stefans Delro, aged 29, his wife, aged 25, their daughter Victoria, aged 14. These were all killed, and the bodies of Mrs. Delro and daughter have been recovered. The body of Mrs. Nellie Rowe was also found.

Immediately after the slide occurred the entire shifts of the Gem, Frisco and Standard mines, about 200 men, were put to work to search for the missing persons, and these were recruited by several hundred volunteers from Wallace, Gem and Burke. Arthur Swayne, an inmate of one of the cabins, was found at the surface, but was so terribly injured that his recovery is uncertain. Two other men were partially covered with snow, but were not seriously hurt.

PHILADELPHIA, March 30.—Judge Dallas has filed an opinion in the United States circuit court holding that Chinamen can not be naturalized.

AUCLAND, New Zealand, March 30.—The steamship Alameda, from Samoa, brings intelligence of a serious uprising there. It appears that Henry Ide, the American chief justice under the joint protectorate exercised over the islands by the United States, Great Britain and Germany, fined and imprisoned the chiefs of the rival factions and compelled them to work on the roads like ordinary convicts. This angered the natives, who finally broke out in armed rebellion. King Malletoa sided with the chief justice and sent troops to put down the insurrection. Several sharp encounters followed in which thirty were killed and fifty wounded, the rebels being driven into the interior. It is claimed that Malletoa's troops indulged in all sorts of barbarities and atrocities, such as mutilating prisoners, beheading the dead and outraging the women. This so incensed the natives that a general uprising was threatened at the time the Alameda left. The foreign population is greatly alarmed, looking anxiously for the appearance of the warship of one of the nations forming the protectorate.

LOGANSFORD, Ind., March 31.—H. Purcell, of this city, who is now in his eighty-second year, has issued a challenge to any octogenarian in the country to run him a half mile foot race for a purse of $400, winner to make two best of three heats. He is remarkably active for one of his advanced years, and has always been noted for his sprinting abilities and powers of endurance.

LONDON, March 31.—A dispatch from Berlin to the Daily News says that private intelligence has reached that city from Samoa to the effect that fresh fighting is threatened. The dispatch states that the Schettische Zeitung learns that the Aana and Atua tribes who have hitherto been faithful to the government threaten to revolt. In order to prevent complications as long as possible the chief justices have invited seventeen of the discontented chiefs to attend a conference at which their grievances may be discussed.

CHARLESTON, S. C., March 31.—The war in Darlington is not over. The citizens are still hunting the constabulary. The fugitives have been located and a posse started in pursuit. The adjutant general here is trying, without success, to get the soldiers to go to the scene. The mayor of Darlington has telegraphed for bloodhounds to track the constables. Last night's account stating that the first fire came from the constables are confirmed. A few citizens were seated round the depot and a number of spies were collected in a group a short distance off. F. E. Norment expostulated at the language being used by the dispensary agents. Constable McLendon drew a pistol and shot Norment dead. Instant firing became general, the constables using winchesters and the citizens revolvers. Pepper was shot through the heart. Redmond fell with three wounds. McLennon was shot through the abdomen. Chief of Police Darigan was dangerously wounded in the body. Louis Norment was shot in the breast and arm. D. K. Lucas was wounded in five places. Then the spies fled in all directions. Four of them are known to be wounded. The citizens at once armed and started in pursuit. The military companies of Charleston, Sumter, Manning, Winsboro, all refused to respond to the governor's call.

TUCSON, Arizona, March 31.—The United States court of private land claims has adjourned after handing down a decision in the Sonita San Rafael del Valle, Babacomari and Nogales de Elias grant cases favoring the settlers. The grants were declared void.

PIERRE, S. D., March 31.—The United States grand jury has returned three indictments against Whiteface Horse, the Sioux Indian, for the murder of white men. The murders were committed on Pine Ridge reservation in February, 1898. He pleaded not guilty to all charges and the cases were carried over to the next term of court.

BUDA PESTH, March 31.—The remains of Kossuth's wife and daughter were reinterred today in the presence of many distinguished people. A continuous stream of people passed the remains of Kossuth which lie in state in the national museum.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 31.—President McCoy, ruler of the little community on Pitcairn Island, has arrived here on the missionary brig Pitcairn. McCoy is a descendant of Boatswain McCoy, one of the mutineers of the Bounty, who settled on Pitcairn Island many years ago.

The community now comprise 128 people. McCoy's errand is to engage two school teachers to educate the children on the island. He says the community is in a prosperous condition and has recently adopted a new form of government, over which he presides as president. He is advised by a council of six men.

CHARLESTON, S. C., April 1.—Early this morning Governor Tillman established a telegram censorship, placing several militiamen, the most intelligent that could be secured, in charge of both offices to supervise all messages offered.

The governor then summoned the Governor's Guards to the executive mansion. Drawing them up in a line, he addressed them, saying he was informed their disbandment was not their fault, but that they had been overawed by a mob at their doors. He told them they stood before the people of the state as a disgrace, and that he wished to give them the opportunity to wipe the stain from their brow and to restore them to honor. He asked for some indications as to whether they would obey his orders, in which event their arms would be given back to them. They threw down their bayonets and disbanded.

At 5 o'clock marching orders were given to the troops stationed at the penitentiary. Governor Tillman addressed them, saying: "As chief executive of South Carolina, I wish to say a few words to you before your departure. I thank you for your promptness and zeal displayed by you in responding to the call for duty. Many of you have doubts as to the justice of the cause for which you go.

"You go as an arm of the law, and you must treat the Darlington people with consideration, but if you are ordered to shoot you must do it, or anarchy will prevail in the state. I hope to restore you to your homes as early as possible; but the law must be upheld or the state will become the laughing stock of the world."

General Reichberg, who is commander, would not say anything about his orders. The troops went on a special train over the Atlantic Coast Line road. Immense crowds of people were at the crossing at which the soldiers boarded the train. Three companies were left in the city. Three hundred volunteer citizens, armed to the teeth, left shortly after the departure of the troops and are ready to obey the orders of the governor. More volunteers are to come. Nothing can be heard here from Darlington, as the telegraph company will not receive or send except to and from the governor.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., April 1.—Coxey's industrial army is beginning to assume serious proportions in the southwest and awakening serious thought in the people of this state. Two hundred more of the army arrived today on a stock train and joined their comrades who were camped at Little Rock. Nine hundred more are at San Antonio, awaiting transportation.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 1.—The steamer China, arriving today from China and Japan, brings the interesting rumor that a son had been born to their imperial majesties, the emperor and empress of China.

BEAVER FALLS, Pa., April 1.—Several thousand people met the commonwealth army this evening. A delegation of mounted citizens met Coxey and escorted him and his followers in a parade through the town. Camp was then pitched near the Beaver river, on College hill. Meetings were held on the grounds at once, and $38 was collected by Marshal Smith. In the evening the usual meeting was held in the opera house, and, after the audience left, the army, 270 strong, were marched there and put to bed in the theater.

By 9 o'clock 125 recruits had joined, necessitating the formation of a new commune, called the Oyclones. Eighteen of the recruits were potters from East Liverpool.

THE TANNERY IS GOING.

The Rowe-Morris-Summerhays company's tannery, on Fourth North street, between First and Second West, which has been shut down for several weeks, has resumed operations again, and this week starts in full-handed for the season's work. The business carried on is that of tanning sheepskins. The raw product is paid for in cash, and after being tanned is sold to home users. Some of the skins that are not needed here are shipped east, but they go in a partially prepared state, as, owing to the high freight on tanning materials, the local company cannot tan the skins and compete in the eastern market.

In the local market, however, the home product has the entire trade, the eastern article having no chance, either as to price or quality. The tanned sheepskins are used for linings, trimmings, etc., for shoes, and for years Z. C. M. I. and Solomon Brothers, who are the chief users, have taken their entire stock in this line from the Rowe-Morris-Summerhays company, which has the only tannery for this material in the Territory.

The company, a short time since, made an experiment with canaigre root. They took the roots and tanned two calfskins, producing a splendid quality of leather.

Incidentally it is interesting to note the growth of this tannery. Some 16 or 17 years ago, when Z. C. M. I. had a hide and wool warehouse on South Temple street, near the corner of East Temple, Mr. Robert Morris, of the Eleventh ward, bought half a dozen sheepskins from that place. Cash was scarce with him, and it took all he could raise to pay for his purchase. He took the pelts home, cleaned and tanned them, and offered them for sale at Z. C. M. I. They were of such good quality that that institution took them and gave an order for two dozen more. This was great encouragement for Mr. Morris at that time, and he continued in the work.

His business steadily grew larger, and after a while the late Bishop Hunter offered to form partnership with him for a year, and to furnish money for launching out more broadly into the business. The tender was accepted, and at the end of the year the result proved most satisfactory. Mr. Morris continued under a lease of buildings and grounds from Bishop Hunter, and subsequently Messrs. Rowe and Summerhays joined with him, formed the present company and enlarged the plant.

From the small start made by Robert Morris, the tannery has worked up till its purchases of sheep skins now amount to $75,000 per annum. Notwithstanding the present dullness in business, the company anticipates reaching that figure this year. It now supplies all of the local demand, and expects to be able to meet the additional requirements which will come from the increased sale of home made boots and shoes.

THE COMING CHANGE.

How easily and imperceptibly men become accustomed to a change of surroundings! Nay, it is even possible for a person to chafe if unable to become as others in a similar situation. This thought was renewed after reflecting on prison life as experienced by quite a few of this community. They accepted the inevitable with its control and restraint, its discipline and deprivation, as if nothing more had ever been known. There was an unresisting adaptation to association, labor and demand, which surprised each man for himself. Even in the matter of clothing, to be without the prison garb was an annoyance, because its absence rendered a man conspicuous, mayhap as much so as one in stripes would be in the everyday haunts of men.

One raised under depressing circumstances, of poverty, ignorance or crime, when lifted up from his surroundings may become refined, intelligent, honest or reliable. But somehow human nature seems to go down more easily than it goes upward. Men fall easily, almost insensibly, into bad habits. Depravity seems to be more potent; and a low level of morals and manners is acquired without that effort which seems requisite in the better direction.

"Evil communication corrupts good manners," said an old authority, and theologians have always asserted an innate drift toward evil in the very constitution of man. Without accepting this in its full professional presentation, enough is known of human nature to assert that the down-hill of travel is easier apparently, and when some men—some women—fall and glide, it can easily be assumed that all "the ways" of life seem specially greased for the occasion.

John Bunyan, of immortal memory, claimed that the time would come when it would be "easier to go up hill than to go down." But his prophetic eye must have pierced beyond the mists and storms of present human experience. He must have discerned afar off, either a revolution in human nature or the removal of ten thousand barriers, allurements and temptations in inner and outer forms—which is the main many cannot at present resist. The seers of all time have detected through the haze of ages this advanced possibility; prophets have said a mighty change would assuredly be brought to pass. "The word of the Lord" has been given, and a condition of rule, government and society has been foreshadowed, which embodies all the elements of order, beauty, poetry and right. Nay, an inspiration has rested upon the hearts of multitudes who spiritually discovered "the bow of promise" as it bent over a sin-sick world. Yet they and their generations have "died without the sight," and their dreams with them are as the dust which is blown away.

Not a few even now who have had the same ideal, whose souls have been touched by "the live coal" from the same altar, silently acquiesce in the wondrous question, "Where is now the promise of His coming, for since the fathers fell asleep, have not all things continued even as they were?" Can it not be asserted that the majority of this community, gathered as they are from all the nations of the earth, are in many respects discouraged, partly with circumstances, partly with their associates, and partly with themselves? Is it not realized that these circumstances, and combinations thereof, make men selfish and avaricious, that every thing and every body is secondary to themselves? That they are prone to forget the requirements and covenants of their faith? That opportunity and speculation are nearly as potent among the Saints as among those who "know not God and are not familiar with His way?" Are we not tintured with the spirit of the fathers? Is it not realized that tradition, custom, training, education, have left, upon the older members of the Church at least, their almost ineffaceable brand or fingermarks? That the will is flinful, that the spirit of self-restraint is weak, that in trade and traffic and deal, "the old Adam" drops out involuntarily as it were? And that hundreds have "made shipwreck of their faith," given up their grand ideals, become insensible to the spirit of brotherhood, and lost reverence for the tone and glory of undying Truth?

Samson shorn of his locks and "weak as other men," was a significant illustration which has been repeated a myriad times, all of which shows the grand philosophy of the gathering, the erection of a better environment, the multiplication of a seed with weakened drift toward tradition and the customs of an ancient civilization. It is to the youth that prophecy will look. It is through them that the unseen forces of the universe will work; by them that "Zion will be established," and in their posterity that "the universal reign of righteousness and peace shall be ushered in!"

"My people shall be willing in the day of my power;" "new wine will not be put into old bottles," the garments worn for centuries will not be patched with the "new cloth" woven in our Father's loom. This experiment was tried of early Christianity, when worldly wisdom presided at its nuptials with paganism, for that marriage, although consecrated by diplomacy, was but an alliance of the virgin with the roue, and their posterity were tainted in the blood, until all the features of the bride have become near obliterated, and "the mark of the beast" prevails in Christendom at least. "Come out of her, Oh my people, that ye receive not of her sins, nor partake of her plagues!" "How far?" the world inquires; and the query is repeated among those who have been obedient to the call! Quite a few though, yet want the customs of Babylon, its style and fashion, its amusements and entertainments, its goodwill and association, its methods of life and ways of trade. They love its dash, its gaiety, its gold. They prefer its rule, its assistance, and its appropriation; its education, its art and literature, its schools and culture, its spirit and its inspiration. It is not seen that these are all to be supplanted; that they cannot accomplish the design; that "every plant which my Father hath not planted shall be rooted up," and that "Ichabod" is yet to be written on the civilizations of this day, as it has been written on the historic tablets of nations, whose proud prominence was in their estimation as much beyond the purview of Omnipotence as impregnable to the corroding force of Time.

Reconstruction from the old material is not the intent of the Architect or the builders. "Untempered mortar" will not bind together the superstructure of our God, nor will the works of men endure if they essay to build thereon any element unsuitable, or of man's device. Supervision will be more keen and critical even than was the vision of President Young; yet he, deeming the foundation of the present Temple unworthy of its character, had that torn up and replaced beyond the possibility of query or suspicion. Nevertheless that edifice and its authoritative supervision is but a symbol of that grander edifice of human society which is to be erected through the Latter-day Saints. Yet the Temple required a variety of labor, every grade of faculty and accomplishment—each workman certainly contributed to it, according to his own special gift or appointed duty; from the man who by sheer force of muscle toiled in the excavation, to the one who blasted the rock and drove the half-mired team on the State road in 1855-6-7; from the carving of the tablets of the earth, to the gilding of the angel; from the one who labored on the brazen font, to the decoration of the grandest room—everyone in his sphere was a worker on that Temple of our God; and none could say to another "I have no need of thee." So in the grander work of which this is but a symbol; while "some men labored and others entered therein," all were in the main animated in that labor by the Divine Spirit; and whatsoever of cultured intellect, of mental grasp, of spiritual power, of breadth of knowledge, and fullest application to the demands of complete and perfect salvation may be needed in the exacting future, that education, training, qualification will come from use of faculty in plastic soul impervious to tradition and human schools; for it shall come to pass that "every man shall be taught of God." Then it will be known that art, science, literature, trade, social life, religious worship, and all human interest, effort and success will depend upon the transfusion of that spirit and power which cometh only from above!

BUSY SANPETE.

The new county road from Ephraim to Castle Dale, Emery county, is to be pushed to a finish as soon as workmen can get into the canyon. The live citizens of this county are anxious to see it completed, for it will greatly benefit both counties, and will make of Ephraim more than ever a junction city.

The recent action of the Governor giving Mantu one term of the First district court meets with general satisfaction through the county, for the people are tired of having to travel all the way to Provo every time there is any little dispute to be settled.

Can any other of the cities of Utah boast of a guitar factory? True, its works are not extensive, but such as they are, they are deserving of praise. Adolph T. Ulin, a musician-mechanic, having wearied of being idle and hearing people talk of "hard times," went quietly to work making musical instruments, and thus far he has turned out quite a number of very fine guitars. Mr. Ulin has long had a local reputation of his fine toned violins, but the public didn't know he could make other instruments equally as fine.

Sanpete county teachers held their monthly institute at Mt. Pleasant last Saturday. The next one will be held at Fairview the last Saturday in April.

The educational interests of this and surrounding counties will be greatly enhanced by the summer school to be held at Mantli during vacation. Dr. Tanner, of Salt Lake City, is working hard to make it a success. Already a number of the counties, among them Juab and Sevier, have expressed their desire to join with the Sanpete teachers in holding their official summer institute at Mantli.

People of Sanpete, when you have any items for the NEWS, and you are too modest to have them printed above your own signature, send them to box 5, Ephraim, and "Wilderness" will help you.

WILDERNESS.

SCHOOLS AT OGDEN.

A representative of the NEWS paid a visit March 29 to the Weber Stake Academy and found the teachers busy in conducting the closing examinations of the winter term.

The academy was founded in 1888, by the following gentlemen who still constitute the educational board: President, L. W. Shurtliff; secretary, Joseph Stanford; treasurer, Robert McQuarrie; other trustees, C. F. Middleton, T. J. Stevens, David McKay, N. C. Flygare, L. F. Moench.

Its first principal was L. F. Moench, who assumed charge in 1888, continuing in that relation until 1892, when he was succeeded by E. B. Isgreen, who accepted the principalship for the year 1892-93. In 1893, Dr. Geo. F. Phillips, of the University of Glasgow, was elected principal. He appears to be a gentleman well equipped for the position.

Primarily the aim of the institution is to acquaint the students with principles of the Gospel of Christ. Its other object is to develop the highest degree of academic culture. The present building was erected in 1889. The design at first was to only prepare students for academic work, but in 1893 its scope was extended by the organization of a normal department.

The entire personnel of the teaching force is as follows:

Dr. Phillips, Greek, Latin, French, algebra, geometry, botany, chemistry, and physics. W. H. Jones, grammar, penmanship, physiology, book-keeping, political economy, English literature. A. F. O. Neilson, fourth and fifth grades; also teacher of phonography, typewriting and general history. Miss Marion Burton, sixth and seventh grades. Miss Mercy Burton, fifth grade. Miss Clara Chambers, first and second grades. Squire Coop, of the New England Conservatory of Music, vocal and instrumental music. Carl Anderson, drawing and painting. Miss Mamie Gates, physical culture. The theological department is in charge of Bishop T. J. Stevens.

The Athenaeum, a literary society, has been established by Dr. Phillips, and meets every Friday evening. Among the educators who have delivered addresses before this society may be mentioned Prof. C. A. Whiting, Salt Lake; Prof. J. H. Paul, Logan; Prof. Joseph Whiteley, Provo. Among those expected to deliver lectures are Dr. J. E. Talmage, Salt Lake, and Prof. Benjamin Cluff, Provo.

The academic department contemplates the preparation of students for both the Church University and the Utah University. The courses of study parallel those of the Latter-day Saints' College, Salt Lake, a statement of which has already appeared in the NEWS.

The attendance in each department is as follows: Normal, 19; academic, 66; intermediate, 85; preparatory, 73; primary, 40; total, 283.

With the return of prosperous times, it is expected under the new regime to have a period of increased usefulness.

NEW WEST ACADEMY.

A visit was also made to the New West Academy. The institution is under the auspices of the Congregational church and was founded in 1883.

As stated in its articles of organization, it contemplates "affording the youth of Ogden the means of acquiring a Christian education. The New West Commission and its teachers recognize that a proper development of character is more necessary than a merely intellectual education."

Pupils are accepted at the lawful age at which a child may commence attending the public schools, and a course of study provided to fit them for college or university.

The academy was opened under the principalship of Prof. H. W. Ring, who was succeeded in 1879 by the present principal, Prof. D. A. Curry, of Indiana University.

The present attendance is as follows: Academic department, 38; intermediate, 22; primary, 50; total, 110. The teaching force is: Principal, D. A. Curry; associate teachers, Miss Fannie Day, Mrs. H. H. Smith, Miss V. N. Liden, Miss Amelia A. Binler.

It is learned that this academy has made a good record for efficiency, and that under the present policy it is doing well. Following are the courses of study offered:

First year.—First term: Arithmetic, physiology, English, civil government. Second and third terms: Arithmetic, physical geography, English, zoology.

Second year.—Three terms: English—scientific—Algebra, rhetoric, general history. Preparatory or classical—Algebra, Latin, general history.

Third year.—First and second terms: Greek or physics, French or Latin, geometry. Third term: Greek or astronomy, French or Latin, botany.

Fourth year.—First term: Greek or chemistry, French or Latin, botany. Second term: Greek or chemistry, French or Latin, geology. Third term: Greek or literature, French or Latin, geology.

A class in bookkeeping will be conducted each year and full credit given in either course. Studies in American and English literature will be required throughout the last three years of either course.

HOME INDUSTRY FAIR.

The Home Industry Fair makes a grand showing, and a genuine surprise is in store for the crowd of people who will throng to the opening ceremonies March 31st. Most of the exhibits are in place now, and present a picture that is highly complimentary to Utah industries. The section of the Continental market facing on First South street is a scene of beauty and life that cannot fail to bring cheer to visitors, as they gaze at the tastefully arranged display.

March 31st at 7 o'clock the doors to the Fair will be thrown open to the public, and while the people are obtaining their first glance at the grand display, Held's Band will discourse sweet music. At 7:30 o'clock the regular opening program will be entered upon, when Governor West and other leading citizens will address the assemblage. ### THE HINDOO PEOPLE.

Mr. Nagarkar's lecture at the Congregational church March 30 was one of the most interesting addresses heard in this city for a long time, and merited a much larger audience than was present. The subject was, The Social and Domestic Manners and Customs of the Hindoo People.

In beginning his lecture, which lasted nearly two hours, Mr. Nagarkar said that India was about 18,000 miles from where he then stood and that it covered an area of about one-third of the United States and contained a population of 285,000,000 souls and 100 races of mankind. These varied in color from the coal-black negro to the ruddy-complexioned Indian with all the intermediate shades and degrees.

In fact India was a vast museum of nations associated with all the vagaries and fantastic dreamland notions of "Arabian Night" fiction. But it had its own history, antecedents and civilization and all were highly interesting. The people of America, he said, were separated from them by geographical boundaries, religion, caste, creed and all that was kindred between man and man. Ninety-nine per cent of the Hindoo people were of Aryan ancestry but today they were subdivided into innumerable classes, clans and communities entirely dissimilar from each other. That diversified condition has developed different sentiments, emotions and modes of living.

Hindoo social exclusion was one of the most striking peculiarities to the foreigner. One Hindoo may know another during his natural life but no matter how good a friend he might be would never ask him to dine or accept an invitation to do so if there was any difference in their caste. The speaker wanted it understood that he did not belong to that class which never exchanged social amenities. Natives of India, on account of political tribulations and religious caste had become decidedly suspicious of foreigners who almost invariably misinterpreted their motives and conduct. Travelers generally passed through India at a whirlwind speed learning little or nothing of the people and then stigmatized them as exclusive.

The second distinct peculiarity was that of female seclusion. In the greater part of that country a woman must stay continually within the four walls of her own home. It is not possible for women to go into the open streets. In Bombay where the speaker lived they were not so strict yet there was no such freedom possible as in this and European countries. In the temples, theaters and churches the sexes are entirely separated and are never allowed to intermingle. The condition of caste today was due to Mohammedan influence and tyranny which engrafted the cruel and fatal institutions of caste on Indian social life.

A third peculiarity was the united or composite family system where the sons, married or single remained in the same household until the death of the parents or themselves. Oftentimes there were as many as fifty members in one family. Thus the true patriarchal system had been perpetuated and preserved. There was the greatest reverence and respect among the younger members of the family for the older ones and no child unless in an extremely rare case would do anything to bring sorrow or trouble to old age. The undutiful child is regarded as an outcast and receives the keenest criticism and obloquy from those who were once his or her friends. In the united family system there were to be sure domestic disturbances at times but they were not nearly so frequent as many people supposed. It had its advantages which were many and its disadvantages were few.

It was with a feeling of extreme sadness that the lecturer observed an utter and consurable want of reverence and respect for old age among the youth of this country and Europe. The shameful treatment of aged persons that he had seen in his recent travels could never be witnessed in his native land.

The fourth distinctive feature was that of caste, which was a great puzzle to the average western mind. Caste was a social classification based on birth, and breeding and sanctioned by religion. It was thus divided: (1), the priest; (2), the soldier; (3), the merchant, and (4), the servant. There is no intermarriage possible between these elements of society. Caste was a delicate though powerful institution in Indian social life. It is not created nor can it be, but comes into existence of its own accord in the course of social evolution.

Mr. Nagarkar then took his hearers on an imaginative trip to his native land and gave them a "peep into the Hindoo home." This part of his remarks were extremely interesting but space will not permit their reproduction.

A MISSING PARCEL.

Isabella Willson, or Elliot, writes from Richfield, and makes inquiries for a parcel that would be of little use to anyone else, but is of special value to her. It was placed in care of Elder A. H. Lund, at Liverpool, last September, and was given by him to some one coming to Salt Lake. It was to be left with Joseph Horne, of this city, for the owner, but the person who carried it failed to deliver it as instructed. The inquirer says she has learned that it was left in Salt Lake City, but she cannot discover where, and requests that the party who has it, or who brought it over, leave it at Mr. Horne's or at this office, where some one who is attending Conference may call and get it for her. The lady is 77 years of age, and the person having the parcel would confer a favor by not delaying its delivery to the owner any longer.

The apples and pears grown in Potlatch, Palouse, Craig Mountain and Camas Prairie districts have qualities that make them very desirable, remarks the Lewiston (Idaho) Teller. Under present conditions such apples could be marketed either in California or in the East with a nice profit to the grower.

The child of Fred Haines was drowned in the ditch at Golden, Colo., late on Saturday night. The child was missed about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. A diligent search was begun by the parents and friends. At 10 o'clock no trace having been discovered, a general alarm was rung from both the fire stations, which brought out the whole town. A systematic search was begun that continued throughout the night, six different parties scouring the entire surrounding country. The water in the ditch was shut off, as it was thought the child might be along the course of the ditch. This was realized next morning by the finding of the body below the town in the ditch bottom.

Word has reached Laramie (Wyo.), says the Boomerang, of one of the most peculiar pugilistic encounters ever heard of. They began at noon and fought for a long time pounding each other about with the gloves. After fighting nearly an hour, four rounds of ten minutes each, the fight was stopped and the contest declared a draw. It has been decided to refer the question to Corbett and Jackson.

The Steamboat Springs (Colo.) county seat agitation, says an exchange, is flourishing at blood heat. Already prominent business firms are recognizing Hayden as the county seat, and two attorneys from Steamboat have moved to that place. It is claimed that the facts of the first legislature establishing Routt county were never carried out. No election was ever held removing the county seat to Hahn's peak from Hayden, at which latter place it was first established. The question involves the legality of the existence of Routt county and should the claim of Hahn's Peak for the county seat be knocked out, it will invalidate every official act transacted in the county since 1877.

The supreme court of Colorado, says the Denver News, has refused to issue the injunction asked for by Orr and Martin against Mullins, Barnes et al to restrain the latter from interfering with the former in discharging the duties of the fire and police board. The court held that it had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding on a writ of error because the matter is still pending in the district court without final determination, and also that it cannot entertain original jurisdiction during the pendency of the suit in the court below. The supreme court was also careful to say that it does not in any way pass upon the merits of the case and that it has grave doubt if any constitutional question is involved sufficient to give it jurisdiction in any court.

An old man accompanied by his wife walked slowly from the palace hotel, San Francisco, on Wednesday afternoon, to the Southern Pacific ticket office and purchased tickets for Monterey. As they walked out to take a car for the ferry the man was seen to stagger, and would have fallen but for prompt assistance. In a moment he recovered himself, but stretching out his hands exclaimed, "I'm blind! I'm blind!" A physician was sent for and from a hasty examination gave it as his opinion that the man had suffered a stroke of paralysis and the blindness was permanent. The sufferer is J. J. Morton, of Grand Rapids, Mich., who with his wife had been touring for several weeks in California, and had about concluded to buy a home near Monterey, where friends of theirs are living. Morton is still blind, but has gone to Monterey, where he can have the care and attention of friends. Oculists say that only time can tell the extent of injury to the optic nerve.

While iron bars may prevent Murderer Fredericks from plucking flowers this spring, remarks the San Francisco Chronicle, present prospects indicate that he will not be deprived of inhaling the perfume of roses and lilies of the valley. The hands of fair and fashionable women are even now outstretched to grasp the opening bud and carry it wet with their tears to the cell of Cashier Herrick's slayer. Charmed by the description of his calm blue eyes and musical voice, a certain class of women, who make a practice of frowning over each red-handed murderer, have begun the expression of their maudlin sympathy for Fredericks. From hither and yon fair ones come to see him. Now it happens that Fredericks, who is thrice a murderer, is regarded by the police as so desperate a man that nobody is allowed to visit him without an order from the office of the chief of police. Women who never heard of Fredericks before his arrest last Friday go to the trouble of visiting the new city hall and obtaining a permit for the sake of seeing him. As a consequence, every day is reception day with the murderer. In other words, he is always "at home." Fredericks is elated over the furore he is causing among those who visit him and frequently boasts of his own importance. He has told so many times that he is "no ordinary criminal" that he is beginning to believe he is entitled to more consideration than the average murderer.

Fire-proof paint has of late years been manufactured in Sweden, and seems to obtain more and more favor with the public. As a general rule it contains certain ingredients which do not fuse readily and which hinder the access of the air to the heated mass, and thus delay the breaking out of the flames. In consequence of the great number of wooden buildings here, this paint will doubtless be extensively used in times to come.

OUR STOCKHOLM LETTER.

STOCKHOLM, March 5, 1894.—No tourist to Sweden ought to neglect to visit the mountain district. These mountain regions are situated in the western part of northern Sweden, or, as most of this country is commonly entitled Lapland. The characters which differentiate this country from the other mountain regions of Europe, are the numberless lakes and streams, the flora, and the inhabitants.

The alps of southern Europe are in general almost destitute of water during the summer months. Not so Lapland. Picturesque mountain lakes, rushing torrents, mighty waterfalls meet the eye on all sides and greatly contribute to diversify the scenery. Peculiar to the mountain flora of Lapland is the prominent place occupied by the birch. The birch region extends much higher than the pine forests; the light green foliage and white trunks give the landscape an unexpected idyllic charm. This beauty is still further heightened by the varied hues of the flowers springing up in rich luxuriance among the snowdrifts, to live their brief summer life in the beams lavished by a sun that does not set for several weeks.

Not least remarkable, however, is the singular population of the country, the nomad Lapps. With their great herds of reindeer, their bright colored dress, their strange language and appearance, and their tent-like dwellings, this people lend the Swedish mountain district an interest unique of its kind.

A visit to a Lapp encampment either in summer or winter is almost invariably rewarded with sights novel to European eyes. One may watch the milking of the reindeer. The wild cattle are captured with the lasso, and often enough Lapp and reindeer roll over and over on the grass in desperate conflict, until at last the animal gives in, is tethered to a tree and handed over to the milkmaid. On another occasion we may see a herd of reindeer, perhaps a thousand in number, turned out to pasture. The dappled herd rushes in mad career up the mountain side, and the branching horns toss like the waves of an angry sea beneath the light green foliage of the birches. In winter the adventurous sportsman may make the somewhat risky experiment of driving out with a reindeer in the traces. The passenger takes his seat in the singular, boat shaped "pulka," the reindeer is harnessed to the vehicle, and off they go at a headlong pace, the snowflakes whirling in clouds under the reindeer's hoofs. To avoid an upset, and to guide the untractable reindeer in the right direction, no little skill is necessary. The Laplanders are also masters in the use of snow-shoes (skies). At a wolf-hunt they can follow the quarry with such unflagging speed that it finally drops from exhaustion.

The Swedish post-office, which, as early as 1636, was made a government department, annually transmits more than thirty million letters and parcels. The post offices number more than 2000.

Sweden has more than 5,500 miles of telegraph lines, those of the railways not being included, the length of wires being altogether about 15,000 miles.

The telegraph has not reached a very high state of development in Sweden (the number of telegrams not being fully two millions a year, for close upon five million inhabitants), but so much more progress has the telephone made. This novel means of communication has been eagerly embraced by Sweden to an extent which, relatively speaking, far surpasses that of any other country in Europe. The total length of the connections is about 40,000, and the number of apparatuses 27,000. An enormous amount of telephoning goes on, especially in Stockholm, where there are more than 8,500 apparatuses in use for a population of 257,000. Even in the United States, the birth place of the telephone, there is not found a companion picture to this fact. Stockholm is the greatest telephone city, and Sweden the greatest telephone country in the world.

In all large communities in Sweden swimming-baths of different sizes exist, generally spacious and well equipped—mostly at the expense of the communes—where workmen, children attending schools, and the poor may obtain a refreshing bath, either at greatly reduced rates or entirely gratis. The art of swimming is encouraged by competitions, usually in connection with the conferring of the so-called "master of nation" degree. The city of Stockholm has erected magnificent baths with numerous large and small floating swimming-baths, where 300,000 to 400,000 dips are annually enjoyed; 150,000 of those being taken by scholars, who at the same time receive instruction in navigation, so that each child can obtain about forty baths gratis. The poor pay but 1½ cent for each bath taken at this establishment.

("brännvin") in Sweden has been gradually restricted by the enacting of new laws, at the same time that the tax has been raised, and the right to sell has been limited and separated from other branches of trade.

The change in country places was immediately for the better, but in the cities a new condition of things was first brought about by the so-called "Gothenburg System," employed first in Gothenburg, but afterwards into 93 per cent of the towns of Sweden and also into many country villages. The object of the "Gothenburg System" is to make the sale of intoxicating drinks independent of profits to the seller, to diminish the abuse of such drinks and to increase the difficulty of obtaining them. The latter is accomplished by setting the price high, limiting the times of sale, and by degrees decreasing the number of selling places.

Influenced by the change in the public opinion and an energetic temperance propaganda, the object of which is to ensure total abstinence, legislation on the subject is becoming by degrees still more restrictive, and is, perhaps, one of the most palpable results of the temperance struggle, a result, in the accomplishment of which it must be acknowledged that the Swedish women, both in private and as members of the large temperance unions, have been most actively engaged.

The most considerable donation ever given by a Swedish woman is that which was bequeathed by Mrs. Wilhelmina Hierta, widow of Lars Hierta, a well-known politician. Besides 100,000 crowns given for the establishing of a professorship in national economy at the university of Stockholm, she left 400,000 crowns to a fund for an institution called "In Memoriam of Lars Hierta," which has to work for the progress of humanity, by promoting and advancing such scientific inventions and discoveries, social improvements and liberal reforms as are to benefit mankind generally and the people of Sweden especially.

OBITUARY NOTES

ANOTHER PIONEER PASSED AWAY.

LEEDS, Wash., Co., Utah, March 22, 1894.—Died in St. George, March 21, 1894, Daniel M. Thomas, born in Richmond county, N. C., 25th Dec., 1809, aged 84 years, 2 months and 24 days.

Bro. Thomas had been a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints near fifty years, and was known to have been faithful to the end. He received the Gospel in February, 1844, and was ordained an Elder during the same year, being called to preach the Gospel in his native land soon after. During the first year of his ministry 150 of his own converts were baptized by him. He gathered with the Saints at Winter Quarters in the spring of 1847. At Laramie he joined President John Taylor's company of incoming Saints and was appointed captain of ten in said company. Soon after reaching the valley he was ordained a Seventy and belonged to the Eighth quorum. In 1851 he was called on a mission to San Bernardino under Charles C. Rich and Amasa Lyman. While in California, he was highly respected by the people, both ecclesiastically and politically; and while there was ordained a High Priest, and acted as first Counselor to the President of the Stake. He was elected to the office of justice, and served about seven years; was also postmaster under the government of the United States.

About the year 1857 the Saints on that mission were called to return to Utah and he came with them. He was next called on a mission to assist the Saints in settling Beaver county, U. T., and made his home at Beaver City. He there served as probate judge and postmaster. From there he was called to assist the Saints in making settlements on the Muddy, state of Nevada, and after the settlements there were broken up, he moved to St. George, U. T., the place of his death. While living in St. George he was known to be a faithful Latter-day Saint, and has done a great work in the Temple, officiating for relatives and friends to the number of 400.

ELIZA C. BINDER.

The funeral services over the remains of the late Eliza C. Binder were held in the Fifteenth ward meeting house Friday afternoon at 2 o'clock. The room had been appropriately draped for the occasion, and at the appointed time a large congregation, some from outside points, had assembled to pay their last respects to the deceased lady. Bishop Elias Morris presided, and spoke in a feeling manner of the departed sister, and bore his testimony to her excellent labors in his ward, as a member of the different Church organizations. The other speakers were Elders Angus M. Cannon and C. W. Penrose, of the Stake Presidency; Bishop R. T. Burton, Bishop John Watkins, of Midway, Elders William Spicer, George Goddard, C. R. Savage and H. G. Park; and Sisters Sarah M. Kimball and Zina D. Young, with whom Sister Binder had been associated in the Relief Society. All the speakers dwelt with great feeling upon the many virtues of the deceased, of her uniform kindness and desire to relieve distress or administer to those who required assistance, either of mind or body, and of her earnest devotion to and advocacy of the principles of the Gospel. The balm of sympathy and love was poured upon the hearts of those who mourned by the many consoling sentiments that were uttered, and by the evidences of the universal esteem in which Sister Binder was held.

Eliza C. Binder was the daughter of James and Sarah Camp, and was born in Hertford, Hert, England, Jan. 11, 1833.

She was baptized a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in September, 1849, and married to William L. S. Binder Dec. 25, 1853. In 1856, she left her native land, and in company with her husband journeyed to Utah. She joined the hand-cart company of Edward Martiu, and participated in its memorable march of that year, arriving in Salt Lake Nov. 30. Under circumstances so dreadful as drawing a hand-cart through deep snow in severely cold weather, and in the many and varied difficulties and dangers which the little band encountered, Sister Binder again and again proved the great courage and integrity of which she was possessed, and remained with her until her death. She resided in Provo until 1859, when the family moved to the Fifteenth ward, Salt Lake, where she has since made her home. She had been a member of the Relief Society of the ward for thirty-four years, having been first counselor to President Kimball for several years prior to her death. She was a member of the Old Folks' committee, whose labors in providing entertainment for the aged are so well and favorably known, and she was one of the most earnest workers in that noble cause. Though subject to frequent illness, she devoted her life to acts of loving kindness towards her fellow beings, and many persons who have been benefited by her ministrations will bless her memory. The poor, the sick, the aged and the little ones, were ever the recipients of her thoughtful care.

About twelve years ago the deceased underwent an operation for the removal of cancer, and though she was benefited thereby she never fully regained her health. The immediate cause of death, which occurred March 26, was malignant hemorrhoids. The only surviving relatives are her husband and a niece in Salt Lake, and a nephew in California. Sister Binder had raised from early childhood one adopted son, an adopted daughter, and had, about three years ago, adopted a third child, now a boy five years of age. These children over received a mother's care at her hands.

A long cortege followed the remains to the cemetery, and prior to interment a beautiful duet was rendered at the grave's side by Mrs. Maggie Hull and Mrs. Sarah Langford. A dedicatory prayer was offered by Elder William Eddington.

ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The Sixty-Fourth General Anniversary of the Church.

The Sixty-fourth Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints convened in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, at 10 a. m. on Friday, April 6th, 1894. The following were on the stand: Of the First Presidency—Wilford Woodruff, George Q. Cannon, Joseph F. Smith; of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles—Lorenzo Snow, Franklin D. Richards, Brigham Young, Francis M. Lyman, John Henry Smith, George Teasdale, Heber J. Grant, John W. Taylor, Marriner W. Merrill, Abraham H. Cannon; Patriarch John Smith; of the Presidency of the Seventies—Seymour B. Young, C. D. Fjelsted, John Morgan, B. H. Roberts, George Reynolds and Jonathan G. Kimball; of the Presiding Bishopric—William B. Preston, Robert T. Burton and John R. Winder. There were also a number of Presidents of Stakes and other prominent Elders from different parts of Utah and surrounding territories and states.

Conference was called to order by President George Q. Cannon.

The choir and congregation sang:

Redeemer of Israel,
Our only delight,
On whom for a blessing we call;
Our shadow by day,
And our pillar by night,
Our King, our Deliverer, our all.

Opening prayer by President Joseph F. Smith.

Singing by the choir:

Praise ye the Lord! my heart shall join
In work so pleasant, so divine,
Now while the flesh is my abode,
And when my soul ascends to God.

PRESIDENT WILFORD WOODRUFF

delivered a brief opening address. He expressed his gratitude to God for the privilege the Saints enjoyed in assembling in the Sixty-fourth Annual Conference of the Church, and that there were present the entire First Presidency, ten of the Twelve Apostles, and other members of organizations and authorities. It was a matter of congratulation that the work of the Lord was progressing at home and in the nations. The Lord was with us and would continue to be so long as we sought the salvation of our fellowmen and performed our duties. The President spoke of the testimonies which had been borne and left on record by all the holy prophets, from Adam down, concerning the raising up of a Prophet in the latter days to establish the Church of Christ in fulness and prepare a people to meet the Savior when he should come to reign during the millennium as King of Israel. He concluded by expressing a fervent desire that the spirit of inspiration and revelation might rest upon speakers and hearers during the present Conference.

ELDER A. H. CANNON

said he rejoiced in the testimony of the Gospel which the Lord had given him, and though he felt his own imperfections and weaknesses and saw them every day he lived, yet he hoped, through the faith and power which God would give him, to bring himself in due time under complete subjection to His mind and will. He was greatly pleased in traveling among this people to find how richly God was blessing them, especially in spiritual matters. It was said in some quarters that the Saints are gradually drifting away from the old love which inspired their hearts formerly and brought them into such close communion with the Lord our God. There were doubtless many cases of this kind—too many considering the day in which we live and the momentous events which lie before the people. But he was thankful to know, and to bear his testimony, that the vast majority of the Latter-day Saints were striving to live their religion and in possession of the Holy Spirit. But he realized also that there was still much room for improvement, and never before had there been so great an effort made by the adversary of our souls to lead away the children of God, to deceive the people and lead them into darkness, as at the present day. The speaker warned his hearers to beware of the false doctrines and lying statements of those who were going abroad among mankind. We might be sure by the testimony within us, if we lived faithful to the covenants made with God, that when Christ came again we should know Him; there would be no need then for men to tell us that He had again come to the earth. Elder Cannon offered some good counsel to the young in this regard, and referred to the signs which had and would accompany those who believed. It was fashionable nowadays for some men to ridicule those who prayed to God. Infidels made light of the supplications which were offered to the Throne of Grace; but we might rest assured that God always gave to those who sought Him in prayer the things which would be for our good. The subject of faith was touched upon, and illustrations were given to show how the Lord, to teach us some divine lesson, sometimes tested us to the uttermost by sending afflictions which we seemed hardly able to endure. The speaker testified that the Lord was near unto us; He heard and answered our prayers and gave to His children who served Him faithfully and sought Him continually those blessings which would be for their temporal as well as their eternal happiness. He admonished the young to seek Him while he was near, for there were troubles coming upon the earth which would try the souls of all men; and those who leaned upon the testimonies of others instead of depending upon their own faith and works leaned upon a broken reed. In conclusion Elder Cannon prayed that the peace and blessings of God might rest upon all present during this Conference.

ELDER MARRINER W. MERRILL

was the next speaker. He said it was a matter of congratulation that we had with us the First Presidency, and that we had heard the voice of Brother Woodruff, who was so much beloved by the Saints. We were fortunate in having a part in this glorious work in the Lord. It was not necessary that any member of the Church should be in the dark. Each could have a testimony concerning the divine mission of Joseph Smith for himself. We had seen some persons occasionally who presumed to have revelation to direct others. We had seen men arise up in the ranks of the Saints with a feeling in their hearts that they were of more than usual importance and had the right, in certain instances, to direct the affairs of the Church. But sensible and thinking people looked upon that class with pity. The Lord had His work organized, His servants appointed to labor in the various callings of the Church and each had his allotted place. The training of the young in the work of the Gospel was dwelt upon, and examples cited for their guidance. We wanted, he said, to see our young men valiant in the cause of God, willing when called upon to go forth and proclaim the Gospel tidings without excuse or hindrance. We should teach our children the principles of the Gospel as fast as they were capable of comprehending them; here a little and there a little as the opportunity presented itself. He knew there was a feeling in the midst of the Latter-day Saints in some directions, on the part of parents—how extensive he did not pretend to say—that in regard to baptism their children should be left alone until they arrived at maturer years, and that they might then judge of the matter and what they wished to do for themselves.

The Lord had said this was wrong. Our children were given and entrusted to us to bring up in the ways of the Lord; and we should see that they were not neglected in any religious duty. The speaker deprecated the too common practice of card playing among young men, even for purposes of amusement; he believed it led to evil and should therefore be condemned. There was no harm in dancing if conducted aright; it was proper to have social amusements and gatherings of that kind; but the great danger lay in the excess of these things, and he warned the young to be careful as to how far they went in these directions. There was, he feared, too much indifference at this time in reference to the spreading of the Gospel and the welfare of Zion. Let us resolve, therefore, henceforward to labor with all our might and put forth our hand whenever the opportunity offered for the carrying of God's message throughout the earth. Then the Lord would reward us as we deserved, and His blessing would continue to rest upon this great latter-day work.

ELDER JOHN W. TAYLOR was the next speaker. He was thankful for the privilege of meeting in Conference with the Saints, where temporal affairs could be put aside for a season and the spiritual things of the Kingdom of God could be solely considered. He read a portion of the first chapter of Paul's epistle to the Corinthians, including the following verse: "If we or an angel from heaven preach any other Gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you let him be accursed." He also read that part of the epistle of the same Apostle to the Romans which treats upon baptism as being typical of a burial and resurrection. This language, he contended, meant that the mode of administering that ordinance was by immersion in water. This was a part of the Gospel which was taught by Paul. The speaker next referred to the incident in point related in the 19th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, when certain persons were baptized by Paul and received the Holy Ghost by the laying on of his hands. The administration of the same ordinances—baptism in water and the laying on of hands for the imparting of the Holy Ghost—were sustained by reference to the 8th chapter of the Acts, which speaks of certain ministrations to believers in Samaria. Other passages were cited for the same purpose, Elder Taylor at the same time dwelling upon the fact that these doctrines, which formed a part of the system of religion taught by Paul, were not taught by the churches of the day, aside from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The Lord had established His Church and Kingdom upon the earth. He himself knew that the community of Latter-day Saints were today but in their infancy, and that they would grow stronger and stronger until the Gospel had been carried unto all the nations of the earth.

The choir sang:
From afar, gracious Lord, Thou hast gathered Thy flock.

Conference adjourned until 2 o'clock
p. m.

Benediction by Patriarch John Smith.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

2 p. m.

The choir sang:

Great God, attend while Zion sings
The joy that from Thy presence springs;
To spend one day with Thee on earth
Exceeds a thousand years of mirth.

Prayer by Elder George Reynolds.
Singing:

Glorious Things of thee are spoken,
Zion, city of our God!
He whose word cannot be broken
Chose thee for His own abode.

ELDER HEBER J. GRANT

was called upon to address the congregation. He said it was always a pleasure to him to have the opportunity of meeting with the Latter-day Saints, and especially was this the case at the annual Conference. He rejoiced exceedingly in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, in the plan of life and salvation that had been revealed in this our day, and he prayed that he might never break any of the covenants into which he had entered with God. His great desire was to know the mind and will of God and to act in accordance therewith. In proportion to our diligence, faithfulness and humility in keeping His commandments would He bless and assist us in the labors of life. A man who possessed the testimony that we were engaged in the work of God valued that testimony more than life itself, and the most earnest desire of every true Latter-day Saint, male or female, was that their children may grow up in the nurture and admonition of the Gospel; and so keep the commands of God that they may be saved in His Kingdom. We received a testimony of the Gospel by obeying its laws and ordinances; we received a knowledge of the divinity of the work in which we are engaged by keeping the commands of God; and our children would receive that knowledge exactly as their parents had before them. The Lord had commanded that we shall teach our children the principles of the Gospel, and that they shall be baptized when they are eight years of age. If we failed to keep that commandment the blessings which He had promised us would be revoked and we would have mourning and sorrow in seeing our offspring grow up without a desire to serve God. In after years, when we endeavored to instill into their minds the principles of the Gospel, failure would come, because the seeds of error and distrust would have been already sown, and we would be unable to control them; whereas had we done our duty the opposite of this would have been the result. In conclusion Elder Grant invoked the blessing of God upon this people.

ELDER GEORGE TEASDALE was the next speaker. He said that he appreciated the privilege of associating with the Saints in Conference. He spoke briefly of his recent labors, in connection with Apostles Brigham Young and John Henry Smith, in the Mexican mission. He remarked that the Saints were there located in a beautiful country, and they had passed the most laborious part of opening up of that region for prosperous homes. The mission was in good condition, which, so far as related to settlements, was about seven years old. There was a tannery, a flouring mill, a good deal of fruit-raising, and the progress made was surprising.

The speaker referred to the words of Paul, who said he was "an apostle not of man." He was an apostle raised up by Christ that the Gospel might be preached by him. The words of Christ in reference to the necessity of being "born of water and of the spirit" in order to see or enter the Kingdom of God were dwelt upon. The preaching of the Gospel and the administration of the ordinances thereof could only be done acceptably by those holding divine authority, being "called of God, as was Aaron." Even as Paul was called to be "an Apostle not of man" but of Christ. He who administered baptism must say to the candidate for entrance into the Kingdom of God—"Having been commissioned of Jesus Christ I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." To reject the Gospel was a serious matter. That authority and plan were withdrawn after the days of the ancient Apostles because the people rejected the message. The same Gospel as they preached has been restored and a Prophet (Joseph Smith) had been raised up in this age to establish the true Church of the Savior. This was the testimony of the Latter-day Saints to the world. But the great bulk of the people had no faith, and without faith it was impossible to please God. He wished to bear his testimony that we were living in the hour of God's judgment, and the Gospel was being preached to all nations for a witness; and the Latter-day Saints were the witnesses. He knew that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God, and had seen the signs follow the true believer continually; and he also knew to his great satisfaction that this organization known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was the Church of the living God. The speaker stated that since the year 1852, up to which time he was a member of the Episcopal church, he had been engaged more less in the work of the ministry in this organization; during that period he had had a variety of experiences, preached a good deal, and traveled very many miles for the Gospel cause. Will we, he asked, be faithful and true, or be satisfied with the mere theory of the Gospel? Let us teach our children the principles of righteousness by practice as well as by precept; and example had greater force and more influence upon the people than precept. Elder Teasdale dwelt upon the importance of family prayer and the training of our children in this regard. He concluded by exhorting the Saints to be meek, humble and faithful.

ELDER JOHN HENRY SMITH

was the succeeding speaker and his opening remarks were directed to the subject of revelation. There had been one continuous stream of light and knowledge, he said, coming to the Latter-day Saints, through the various channels which our Heavenly Father had selected, ever since this Church was first organized. We were too apt, however, to become forgetful of the great responsibilities which rested upon us as a people. Men and women were too unmindful of the obligations which they took upon themselves when they entered into their covenant with God. Let us henceforward resolve to be more faithful, and more earnest in our efforts to advance the onward progress of this great latter-day work. He dwelt for some time upon the authorities and regulations existing in the Church for the maintenance of peace and union, and urged the strictest conformity thereto. Much depended upon due regard being paid to this matter. The judgments of the ecclesiastical tribunals should be respected, as they were based upon the evidence presented and a clear understanding obtained therefrom as to the rights of the principals interested.

The system was so organized as to give the fullest protection to those who had differences with their brethren. A spirit which had appeared in some localities to foment dissension should be rebuked wherever it was exhibited. Instances had occurred where people whose cases had been adjusted by the Church tribunals had shown dissatisfaction with the result, because it had not been favorable to them. Others had sympathized with them instead of directing them to appeal to a higher court than that which had investigated the dispute. Thus a spirit of disunion had been encouraged by those who ought to have counseled wisely in the interests of peace.

The speaker turned his attention to the world, and the threatening and unsatisfactory condition existing in its affairs. It had been taught the Latter-day Saints to place their affairs in such a condition as would enable them to rise above such disastrous situations and furnish an object lesson to all people. The question of the necessity for their doing this was becoming more and more apparent. If we failed in conforming to the commandments of God in this respect we would not deserve His full confidence and approval. He urged the people to patronize and encourage home manufactures.

The choir sang the anthem,

Jerusalem, my glorious home.

Benediction by Elder C. D. Fjelsted.

SECOND DAY.

Saturday, April 7, 10 a. m.

The choir and congregation sang:

Now let us rejoice in the day of salvation;
No longer as strangers on earth need we roam,
Good tidings are sounding to us and each nation,
And shortly the hour of redemption will come.

Prayer by Elder John D. T. MoAllister.

Singing by the choir:

Glory to God on high;
Let heaven and earth reply.

ELDER F. M. LYMAN

was the first speaker. He said he believed he felt the importance of the present gathering and the business transacted more than ever he did in his life before. In the month of January last he was called to go on a mission to Southern California, and it fell to the lot of Elder B. H. Roberts to be his traveling companion and spokesman. They spent nearly two months there, visiting the principal cities of the state, and gave the people the privilege of hearing the Gospel as the Latter-day Saints had received it. But they found there were other people who claimed to be Latter-day Saints, professed followers of the Prophet Joseph Smith; and some of their hearers were somewhat doubtful as to whether they should listen to them or to others who claimed to be the legitimate followers of the Prophet and the Church which he established.

This was about the 101st Conference that had been held since the death of the Prophet Joseph, and from that time until now the Latter-day Saints had gathered together twice every year and by their unanimous vote had sustained those men who were designated by the voice of the Lord to bear the keys of the kingdom. The Latter-day Saints should keep a little account of the line of the Priesthood that had come down to us, in order that every man might know that he had received his ordination from those who stand in fellowship with the Church. The Josephites claimed that we had been cast out; that when the Saints left Nauvoo and went out into the wilderness they went away from Zion; that Nauvoo is Zion, and no other part of the country. But fortunately the Prophet Joseph, during the very last Conference of the Church that he attended, in April, 1844, announced that the continent of America was the land of Zion, both north and south. And on the following day the Prophet Hyrum Smith stated the same fact. This Church was as much the work of God now as it was in the days of the Prophet Joseph Smith and Brigham Young, and there had never been a moment when there was a chance for any reorganized church, or any other, to come in and break the thread of authority and succession of the Church that we had here today. When, therefore, he saw this body of men gathered together in this place, bearing the Priesthood, he knew that God was still with this great latter-day work and would never desert it. The people must guard the authority of the Priesthood, then, as steadfastly as they would their lives. The Twelve never would be disorganized, from this day forth; and God had so ordained it that this Church would remain and endure, and its greatness would increase from this time forward until the final winding-up of the scene.

ELDER BRIGHAM YOUNG

next addressed the assemblage. He was specially glad to be once more among the Saints in General Conference, as he had been absent from Salt Lake City for several months, visiting members of the more southern stakes of the Church, including Mexico. He had been much interested in witnessing the improvements that had been made in those remote settlements, especially in Juarez, which was already a beautiful little city. He had never witnessed so much of the power of God manifested in the Church as recently. The Saints had been forgiven their sins at the dedication of the Salt Lake Temple, and it was evident they had not returned to the practices that then required the special exercise of the clemency of the Almighty. Experience had taught the speaker that although the Saints did not fully obey the commandments embodied in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, if they strove to reach as high a degree of perfection as practicable the Lord would forgive them their trespasses. They knew that the revelations contained in that book were true. All these things were for the perfecting of the people of the Lord, and for the building up of the Kingdom of God. The day would come when the law of God must be kept upon this and every other land, when the fiat would go forth, "Thus saith the Lord God," and it would affect not only this people, but every other nation under the whole heavens; it would be obeyed and Christ would come whose right it is to reign. The times were near at hand when the commandments of God would be given to us in things which never had been before. In conclusion the speaker prayed that His heavenly blessing would rest down abundantly upon this people.

ELDER FRANKLIN D. RICHARDS.

rejoiced in the opportunity which had been given to the Latter-day Saints of again meeting together in General Conference, and in the testimonies which had been borne by preceding speakers. A variety of subjects had been touched upon. When this Gospel first reached us and we were permitted to investigate it, we found therein that which would amply satisfy the human soul in its longing and searching after the truth. And what blessings it gave to the repentant sinner, to know that by going down into the waters of baptism, under the hand of one authorized to officiate in that ordinance, his sins were all forgiven. The power of the Latter-day Saints had been increasing and extending ever since the organization of this Church, not merely upon earth but with the heavens. The Lord had watched over this people and would never desert them nor suffer their prayers to go unanswered. We were on the road to exaltation, in fellowship with angels, with the just made perfect, to be made hereafter partakers of God's kingdom. Elder Richards spoke on the subject of the building of temples and the sacred work for the dead performed therein; he also touched eloquently upon the beauty and importance of the labors of the Saints in that direction. If we were living correctly before the Lord our testimonies would increase, our light would shine brighter and brighter, and we would be still further strengthened in the ways of righteousness and truth. He counseled the Latter-day Saints to be diligent in keeping God's commandments and to remain steadfast to their covenants with Him. Let them depend not on falling Babylon. The speaker touched briefly upon the question of home industries and advocated the supporting of these as far as possible by the people. Utah had obtained a good reputation in the East for the firm stand which she had made during the late trying crisis, and there was no reason why we should not continue to maintain it. If the Latter-day Saints only kept their lamps trimmed and sought to do the will of God, the Holy Spirit would give them understanding and guide them onward unto the perfect day.

ELDER LORENZO SNOW

was the next speaker. He read from the Book of Doc. and Cov., section 84. The question refers to the blessings predicated upon the reception and magnifying of the two Priesthoods, and also the results of turning away from the Priesthood after having received it. The speaker also read from the 8th section of the same book. He had sometimes asked himself the question, where did he come from, why was he here and what was his destiny? We had a first estate and had obeyed its laws and conditions, otherwise we would not be here. We were here because we were worthy to come, having kept our first estate. It was his view that before our advent to mortality we made certain covenants with those who were in control—that we would seek to discover the will of God as it should be revealed. We had forgotten these things, but God was bringing them to our recollection. What we wanted to know was how to be worthy of securing the positions we formerly occupied in the previous life, together with the additions resulting from experience gained in mortality. No man nor woman could afford to do anything in this life except it be what was in accord with what God revealed. As a general thing there would be no failure associated with the work of the Lord. It might seem as if we were moving backward, because we had sacrificed what was dear to us. We had come along through these conditions and there had been no failure, because the majority of the people had sought to be guided by the Spirit of the Lord. There was a course that could be taken which would obviate failure. It was implied in the verses which had been read, "If your eye be single your whole body will be filled with light." There was the key. The Lord had said "I can of my own self do nothing, as I hear I judge, and My judgment is just because I seek not to do my own will but the will of my Father who sent me." According to this saying we should forget ourselves and try to discover how to spend our energy and our means to the honor and glory of God. If we did this there could be no failure. When our Elders were sent into the world, who sent them? It was the Lord who sent them, and none were so much interested in them as He. A man's mind should be single to the glory of God in everything he undertook. Here was the grand secret. We were too apt to forget that we were working for God. The work in which we were engaged was that of the Almighty, and His watchful eye was constantly upon us. God bless the Latter-day Saints, and he prayed we might so live as to be worthy to receive the blessings which had been promised upon the faithful.

The choir sang the anthem:

Praise ye the Father.

Benediction by Elder Seymour B. Young; after which Conference adjourned till 2 p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

2 p. m. The choir and congregation sang the hymn beginning:

Our God, we raise to Thee,

Light and truth the world are waking.

87,595; total, 74,222. Grand total 83,657.

PRESIDENT JOSEPH F. SMITH addressed the Conference. His introductory remarks were directed to the concert to be given in the Tabernacle this evening and its worthy object. He invited the whole audience to attend it.

He then turned his attention to Sabbath schools and the necessity of men and women qualifying themselves to be efficient workers in those institutions, and spoke commendably of the normal class which had been established at Provo to enable the brethren and sisters to graduate for this work. Similar remarks were made in reference to the Young Men's Mutual Improvement normal class in the Brigham Young Academy. He announced that, to meet the expense connected with this important department, it was expected that the members of the Church would contribute 50 cents a year.

The speaker next alluded to card playing, the tendency of which was in the direction of evil.

In relating to round dancing, he said he did not believe that any good came from it and it ought not to be encouraged. He understood this to be the sentiment of the First Presidency who regretted that the young people were disposed to go to extremes in this matter.

The discourse then turned in the direction of Latter-day Saints becoming connected with secret societies. This theme was elaborately and instructively dwelt upon, the position of the Church in reference to it being clearly defined.

The closing remarks of Brother Smith were mostly devoted to the correction of certain fallacious ideas in reference to the Godhead, in which the three were represented as one person. The speaker read from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants and the Bible, passages showing clearly the erroneous character of the views to which he referred.

PRESIDENT WOODRUFF

expressed the hope that if mothers brought small children here tomorrow that they would take seats near the doors, so that they could leave the building, if the little ones should begin to cry. It was desirable that all should hear what would be said, as matters of great importance would be presented.

The choir sang:

Let the mountains shout for joy,
after which the congregation joined in singing the Doxology.

Benediction by Elder Moses Thatcher.

THIRD DAY.

Sunday, April 8th.

The choir and congregation sang:

The Spirit of God like a fire is burning!
The latter-day glory begins to come forth,
The visions and blessings of old are returning,
And angels are coming to visit the earth.

Prayer by Elder John Nicholson.

Singing by the choir:

Earth, with her ten thousand flowers,
Air, with all its beams and showers
Heaven's infinite expanse,
Sea's resplendent countenance,
All around and all above
Bear this record, God is love.

PRESIDENT WILFORD WOODRUFF addressed the Conference. After he had made a few preliminary remarks upon the necessity of the servants of God being influenced by the power of His Spirit in their ministrations, he announced that President George Q. Cannon would read from the 128th section of the book of Doctrine and Covenants. This revelation treats upon the power of the Priesthood to bind on earth and it is bound in heaven; also of the means of salvation or redemption of the living and the dead. After the reading President Woodruff resumed his remarks and delivered an important and instructive discourse, throwing additional light upon the process, under the law of adoption, by which the children and the fathers are to be united and bound together by indissoluble ties. The method of procedure for the accomplishment of this great purpose had been manifested by the Lord to the President and his counselors in the First Presidency, and also the Twelve Apostles had received a witness on the same subject. The presidents of the Temples and their associates were to be henceforward governed by the principles of adoption enunciated by President Woodruff in their labors in that department. The subject is too important to admit of the presentation of a mere synopsis of the discourse in which it was embodied.

PRESIDENT GEORGE Q. CANNON

followed on the same theme, and showed the beauty, power and efficacy of the Gospel, by which, through the authority of the Priesthood, all the endearing relations of life were made eternal, because they were by that means cemented under the law and the direction of the Almighty.

The choir sang the anthem,

Daughter of Zion.

President Cannon here stated that it had been deemed proper to discontinue from this time forward the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper at the regular services held in the Tabernacle on the Sabbath day. He cited the 18th chapter of third Nephi, Book of Mormon, which embodies reasons for the taking of this step. In future this ordinance would be administered under the direction of the Bishops of the wards, in their Sunday meetings, where they could carry out the requirement which forbids that the unworthy shall partake of the sacred emblems.

Benediction by Elder Jonathan G. Kimball.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Overflow Meeting at the Assembly Hall.

At 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon an overflow meeting was held in the Assembly Hall. Apostle Franklin D. Richards presided.

The services were commenced by singing the hymn:

We thank thee, O God, for a prophet,
To guide us in these latter days;
We thank thee for sending the Gospel
To lighten our minds with its rays.

Prayer was offered by Elder Lyman Martineau, and the congregation sang the hymn beginning:

Come, come ye saints, no toil nor labor fear,
But with joy wend your way.

ELDER H. J. GRANT

was the first speaker. He was very pleased, he said, to meet with the Saints, and rejoiced in the fact that the Tabernacle was full to overflowing; that so large an attendance was present and that there were as many people outside as would fill over again the building in which they had met. He rejoiced to see so great a manifestation on the part of the Saints of the spirit that brought them together to hear the Gospel, and hoped that they would be strengthened and built up in their most holy faith. The sooner the people awoke to the truth of the fact that it is in proportion to their faithfulness that the Lord will pour out His blessings upon them, the greater would be their progress. He rejoiced exceedingly to have had the privilege of listening to the remarks made in the forenoon by Presidents Woodruff and Cannon, for the doubts that have hitherto been in the minds of the Saints concerning the ordinance of sealing and the principle of adoption had been cleared away. The speaker urged the necessity of a general work of purification among the Saints, and asserted that there was no question but that sacrifice brought forth the blessings of heaven. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is so broad and magnificent in its proportions that there is sufficient for all to do, and there was no necessity to infringe on the prerogatives of others. If the commandments of God are kept, the Gospel is the power of life and salvation unto all who believe. Not only will it secure exaltation in the eternal world but it would promote prosperity in material things in the present life. He thought that some of the Saints had been too narrow and contracted in their opinion of the plan of life and salvation, and was glad to hear the servants of God say that, though it was written but few in this probation walk the narrow path that leads to eternal life, in the spirit world the great majority of souls would accept the Gospel and be redeemed through the vicarious work of the Saints on earth. Reflection on the boundlessness and magnificence of the plan of redemption was fraught with thoughts of the great love and mercy of the Heavenly Father; and in further elucidation of the Gospel of Christ the speaker read the 76th section of the Doctrine and Covenants, from which he said he derived more joy and pleasure than all besides. In conclusion he hoped that as the Saints grew in years they would also continue to grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth, which he asked in the name of Jesus Christ.

ELDER A. H. CANNON

knew of no doctrine or principle, he said, that gave him more joy and pleasure than that which he had heard that morning. It was one of the advanced doctrines of the Gospel. It opened up to view the great depth and breadth of the plan of salvation more than had been hitherto accepted, and answered many questions that had come up in the minds of the Saints for many years. As soon as the first principles of the Gospel had been preached to the nations of the earth, the people had naturally concerned themselves as to the condition of their ancestors; for if faith, repentance and baptism were essential to salvation now, they had always been and always would be. Hence, when the Gospel came to them and they were told of the plan of the redemption of the dead, it filled them with great joy and satisfaction. It was a pleasure to know that before the bar of God no man would be judged without having had an opportunity of accepting or rejecting the Gospel, and that it would be preached to them in the spirit world. The family organization existing on the earth was symbolical of that which will exist throughout eternity, and through the medium of the plan of salvation all would be united in the world to come. The speaker treated upon the principle of sealing husbands and wives and stated that though in years gone by there were but few instances where wives had been sealed to husbands who had died without the faith, yet good men withal, the opportunities now were greater because of increased knowledge having been received. To think that the family organization is to extend back link by link to the very beginning; that those who are dead would not be robbed of their children whose progress, integrity and faithfulness their hearts are yearning for, and who by such would yet stand at the head of their kindred as saviors upon Mount Zion, was replete with comfort and joy. But those who at that day do not stand as saviors upon Mount Zion will not receive the highest glory in the Kingdom of God. There are none so feeble now who can not perform some work, and though they have but few kindred that they know, they can perform the work for others and obtain a blessing. To those who are faithful and anxious to do this, God will reveal to them the names and lineage of their kindred as He has done to many in the temples before. The Lord does not wait till the millennial day for such work to be done. Link by link must be completed now and henceforward, and during the millennial reign the chain of ancestry will be revealed back to the beginning of the race. This is a principle new to this people, but old as eternity, and the increased light shed upon it by the servants of God had come in fulfillment of a desire on the part of the people. They had longed for this with which to satisfy their souls. They had gone as far as they could and it was necessary for God to reveal His mind and will. This shows that God must needs be sought, that He desires His people to draw near to Him. "Coming events cast their shadows before," and in like manner the necessity for further light had foreshadowed itself through the general anxiety in the hearts of the people and was known to God. If the people are discontented and feel that the Lord has withdrawn His face from them, the way to overcome the difficulty is to draw near to Him that the soul may be satisfied. The speaker rejoiced that God had filled the hearts of the Saints with love and charity to all mankind, both living and dead; for God Himself was full of mercy and was loving and kind. He was not one to condemn by outward appearances nor to condemn to all eternity any who sinned against Him, unless they placed themselves beyond the pale of pardon. Though their sins were as scarlet they might be made as white as wool if they would but repent.

ELDER MOSES THATCHER

was the next speaker. He had not ufficiently recovered his strength of body, he said, to be able to speak with perfect ease to so large an audience, and he desired the aid of their faith and prayers and careful attention. He had not the good fortune to be present with his brethren during the discussions they may have had in connection with the subject just mentioned, but this much he would say: The Almighty, in order to turn aside a curse that should come upon the world, ordained or fore-ordained that one of His servants should come and turn the hearts of the children to the fathers and the hearts of the fathers to the children, and how this could be brought about more fully than by the plan outlined by the brethren in the Tabernacle during the morning services could not be conceived. He was glad to have had none of other kindred sealed to any of his family nor any of his family to others, for a doubt had always remained with him as to the accuracy of such a proceeding. But the principle as now revealed, and which has turned away the curse that must have come upon the world, was such that all should fully appreciate it.

In a recent visit to California there was one thing, the speaker said, that had been deeply impressed upon his mind, and it was this: Thirty-eight years ago the Elders of the Church had been sent out to buy a tract of land which was known as the San Bernardino ranch. It was purchased and payments made upon it. The best location was selected upon which to build a city—that upon which the town of San Bernardino now stands. Not far away is the city of Riverside, a perfect Garden of Eden in many respects, where there is everything to gladden the heart of man. Everywhere around a picture of surpassing loveliness enchants the eye, and beauty reigns in a wealth of tree and flower. San Bernardino had a quarter of a century the start of Riverside and thirty years of Redlander, but what is its condition today? It is almost a picture of desolation; fences are down, weeds and decaying vegetation cover the ground, and insects blight the growth of tree and shrub. All around the alkali flats in the sun as if the land were sown with salt. Has a blight fallen upon San Bernardino, because it has also fallen upon her people? Shall the inhabitants of this glorious mountain valley permit that same spirit of inertia to fall upon them? Shall they cease to beautify their homes, trim their lawns, and plant trees and flowers to gladden the hearts of wives and children? The speaker made a comparison between the condition of this city and Riverside, and urged that the spirit of sloth and carelessness be abandoned. He hoped that by next October the many thousands of acres of untilled land would be made to produce something more than weeds.

The evils of ambition were then taken up. The priests of India, Elder Thatcher said, held that all disease was the result of unsatisfied ambition, and that man being the highest creation of God, his mind should have control over all matter. The latter part of the proposition is a true doctrine, and it is a part of Mormonism. These priests also held that to do this there must be concentration of thought; it was necessary in its application, such as in healing the sick and such like.

"When I hear the word 'great' mentioned in reference to the servants of God," said the speaker, "it makes me shudder. I think of Alexander, Napoleon, Grant and Lee and others. History has been so written that these men have been marked out as great; but in the life of Jesus Christ every word and act breathes of love and power. One word from Him would have called down the hosts of heaven, but it was not to be. His whole life was one of sacrifice. It is, therefore, goodness we want, not greatness, the crucifying of ambition. The very foundation on which we rest is the principle of vicarious sacrifice. Why do we try to love our neighbors as ourselves? Because in its practice alone is peace and power. There is no greater mistake than to suppose that peace or power will come to us if we become imbued with the spirit of the world."

Continuing, he said that gold was the god of this world, and because money was recognized as a power men tampered with legislatures and governments with it. The world was bowing down to the golden calf, but the Saints should look to the power of love. A people could not be controlled with out love and confidence, even as a father could not control a son without them. Confucius has said that three things essential to the perpetuation of a stable government were an army, a well-led people and confidence in their rulers; that the first could be dispensed with if necessary, the second also, since it was ordained that all had to die, but that if a nation lost confidence in its rulers that nation would perish. Confidence was being lost in the government of this country, as was evidenced by the growth of anarchism, nihilism and other societies, and this was something that the Church should forever prevent as far as lay in its power. He had done business in Cache valley for ten years and never asked a bond nor a mortgage, but trusted to honor and had never lost a cent. He hoped that a change for the better would be instituted in our dealings one with the other, and that the Saints would follow their file leaders as they followed Christ.

ELDER SEYMOUR B. YOUNG

spoke on the subject of the redemption of the dead on the same lines as those followed by Elder A. H. Cannon, and he rejoiced exceedingly that the Saints had a Prophet and revelator who gave them the word of God. He bore testimony to the truth of the work and the purity of the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

ELDER F. D. RICHARDS

aided his testimony to the truth of the words already spoken and said that this was the beginning of the restoration of that which was lost by ancient Israel. He urged the people to be more diligent in tracing their genealogy and performing the duties devolving upon them in behalf of the dead. If they only could see through the veil, a world of anxiety would appear because of the desire the spirits in prison had for the hour of their release to come, and the Saints ought not to shut their eyes to the importance of this great work. Though there were many difficulties in the way at times, everything pertaining to the work of the Lord opens up continuously as the ear of corn does until it is filled with ripeness. In conclusion he called upon the Saints to cherish every virtue that attaches to the family, the Church and the State, that all may be steadfast in the principles of government and prepared to act in time of need.

Oh, say what is truth, 'tis the fairest gem
That the riches of worlds can produce, was sung by the congregation, and benediction was pronounced by Elder B. H. Roberts.

AT THE TABERNACLE.

2 p. m. The anthem, "Let all Israel sing," was sung by the choir.

Prayer by Elder William W. Cluff. The choir sang the hymn beginning:

O, my Father, Thou that dwellest
In the high and glorious place.

PRESIDENT GEORGE Q. CANNON

took up the thread of the remarks made by him at the morning session and further elaborated the subject of the organizing and binding character of the Gospel, by the power and efficacy of which the whole human family would be placed in perfect order clear up to Father Adam. In this great scheme of redemption no individual, no matter how insignificant he or she might appear to be, would be overlooked. Only those who committed the unpardonable sin would be omitted from the benefits of the divine plan. This great labor devolved upon the Church of Christ, with whose Priesthood there would always be sufficient light from the Lord to conduct it.

The speaker then treated upon the subject of secret organizations, and showed with great clearness that the Church possessed all the organization, power and principles to correct every evil existing in society and was destined to accomplish this mighty reformatory triumph. It was unnecessary for any person claiming to be a Latter-day Saint to seek relief elsewhere. President Cannon also spoke of the system (the United Order) concerning which God had already given revelation, and which would some time, when conditions were propitious, be established, and all the children in mortality would finally enjoy its beneficent effects.

PRESIDENT WILFORD WOODRUFF

made a few closing remarks relating to the importance of the subject treated in his morning discourse—the binding of the children and the fathers together back through the generations according to lineal descent.

The choir sang the anthem,
"Hosanna."

Benediction by President Wilford Woodruff.

Conference adjourned until October 6, 1894.

JOHN NICHOLSON,
Clerk of Conference.

Written for this Paper.

THEN AND NOW.

With every recurring Conference there is more or less of a mental review of the changes that have come over this Territory and its people within what memory we possess. How in the days gone by we enjoyed, in anticipation, the visits of our friends, who came up, as it were to "the great feast at Jerusalem," along miry and dusty roads, with an ox team, spending days in transit, and camping with friends in settlement after settlement, bringing their bedding along, then finding room in our dooryard for the team wherever it might be procured! Just think of the hearty greetings we had, the warm welcome we gave, the all-round visiting, the modest fare, the rush to meeting, this or that; maybe a dance, or the Theater allured us all, old folks, married folks and the babe! What a jolly time, to be sure!

Our country cousins used to think we in town had all the news although mail facilities (which meant letters, newspapers, magazines or books,) were indefinite, and looked for only when they arrived. But the isolation of this city was as nothing to that known of our visitors in the settlements, who had probably come one or two hundred miles, and were more hungry for converse, reading and news than we in the center, who had what little was available. Who cannot recall the talks so long drawn out, of things at home, things in our adopted country, and things in Utah whose destiny ran parallel with our own! How often "beyant the wee sma' hours" we talked, and talked and talked; of our own efforts and progress, the projects of the authorities, the plots of our enemies; all about our city lots, our houses, our fruit trees, our farm, our trade or business, our friends "way back," how to help them out; the news of their start, on the way, going to meet them, their arrival; our pride in all this, in their appreciation of a water melon, a ripe peach, a grand potato; how with bounding pulses we led them to the Tabernacle, pointed out the Prophet, the authorities, our city of magnificent distances, the pure air, good water and fertile soil; with what fondness we talked of Zion, its mighty bulwarks, its rare resources, its phenomenal growth, its predicted glory! We were younger then, our work was play; our eyes knew no tears save those of joy, and every thought and dream was of the marvelous work which had drawn us from home and kindred, from native land and old associations, to redeem the desert, and make it vastly more attractive and resplendent than it is as yet!

How we look back lingeringly and lovingly to those old parties which memory has surrounded with a halo of unfading glory! The gatherings with our leaders whose presence sanctified the Social Hall; their dignified abandon, the way they revelled in the peace, security and association of their friends after the dark and stormy days of fanatical persecution and prospective death; the calm of rest, the undisturbed serenity, the rejuvenation of body and spirit consequent on this; how it made their travel and responsibility of settling a great people, of founding a nation, seem insignificant by contrast, for it was indeed an undisturbed labor of Godlike love!

Our friends sometimes journeyed many a mile to attend such gatherings as is here alluded to, and many a little episode occurred which had its amusing side. One such is remembered, where a friend and wife from south came up to a party in the selfsame hall,

It was some twenty miles or more to travel by ox team, with a grist to leave at a midway mill, which seemed quite a diplomatic stroke. The party was crowded and kept up late of necessity, but when the morning of return dawned, they "bright and early" were on the way. The grist was got and still the jog kept up. The wife had taken her nap ere this and before the noonday hour. But as the heat increased the weary husband invited the wakeful wife to drive awhile; the silence, heat and dust speedily affected the ready driver until she too fell asleep; and it was only with the setting sun that they awoke, to find the undriven team laid down as yoked in the middle of the road, and quietly chewing the cud, yet many miles from home.

Such things gave a pleasant tinge to the more exacting duties of this primitive life, for it is hardly possible to realize now how fully and heartily men's souls went out then in the varied lines of salvation and necessity, to colonization, to the creation of suggestive industries, to gathering the poor, to missionary duty, and calls innumerable besides; how they struggled and toiled, were worn out and died, though their works remain, until from Idaho to Arizona, from Nevada to Colorado, from Canada to Mexico, the imprint of the Pioneers and their associates is like the everlasting hills which can never—no never—be removed or swept away.

When it came to business, this city was the undisputed center for supplies. Conference time (April and October) was looked forward to by all visitors. Winter goods and spring goods had each their appropriate season, and to wait for these opportunities of seeing and buying was a general rule. Merchants "had a high oil time" of it—weighing, cutting, packing, ran into late hours; meals were irregular, customers were crowding, goods became piled up, for straightening was out of the question until the doors were closed; and for two or three weeks after Conference adjourned, recuperation seemed impossible, particularly as in the fall goods were rolling in from the East, until approaching winter and Christmas holidays were halt supplied. Then in the later fifties California had to be the market, and the Southern deserts became familiar as they never could be in the drouth and heat of summer.

Then to think of the prices! How did the buyer pay for a handle and axe (which everybody needed) three to five dollar; spade or shovel, five dollar; a plough, seventy-five dollars; to secure which many a man and his wife lay awake at night, wondering what a little butter, a few eggs, some fruit, dried hops or corn, half a dozen sacks of oats or barley would do towards it; probably a little money had by hook or crook, (i. e. by truck or trade) was hoarded for the same great opportunity!

Children needed shoes; the wife a dress; the man a pair of boots, some nails or 8x10 glass for the little cabi; a scythe, cradle or hoe for use in the garden or farm! What a struggle it was, what a fight; but how earnestly and bravely and perseveringly man toiled and woman endured! Then what an infinitude of blessing followed, how after a while the log cabin gave way to the brick, the old bake-skillet to the stove, the calico dress to one for Sundays of a higher grade! How the trees grew and the flowers began to bloom, and the stock to increase! How a growing family added to the labor and to the resources of the family! How while the outer was improved, the inner of the home kept pace, and wall paper, then curtains and carpet (rag may-be) made a cozy room or two! Until by and by the railroad whistle echoed among the mountains from five hundred miles away, and Z. C. M. I. became a possibility and a success! The people needed it, understood it, gave it patronage! It dominated the market, saved millions to the people, found an opening for their surplus, and pioneered the way to increased home manufacture in obedience to the spirit which prompted its organization and constituted its essential life.

Today the thousands of Israel gather to Conference as of old, but the ox team has vanished from our thoroughfares. They spend but little time with friends. This great social feature of the past is dying out. Visitors come one day and return quickly, or arriving in the morning they go home at night. Even the authorities of Stakes and towns afar off, hurry back to duty and responsibility, not being amenable so fully to President Young's counsel as in days gone by: "Stay and enjoy yourselves, brethren, we want to talk, to hear how you feel?" "You farmers, don't get excited, the Lord will take care of your crops; keep cool, don't get in a hurry. Conference will last a week, and there will be many a meeting 'after that!'" Those were palmy days. The authorities rejoiced, the people were made glad, the merchants had a harvest, salvation—social, religious, mental and financial—joined hands as would hardly be deemed compatible with this era of rush and speculation, these times of divided interest and unrest! The masses may come here to be spiritually fed; they need not come to trade. Every town, every village has its store and supply of goods. The Capitol may have magnitude, larger stock, grander buildings, more of the evidence of wealth and stability, and there may be considerable dependence after all. It is the same spiritually; the presiding authorities travel, the local brethren have had a long and rare experience, they have learned to bear "the burthen of the word of the Lord," and even our General Conference may yet shrivel as the mercantile interests have done by becoming more decidedly local. For Stake conferences, settlement conferences may yet supply the desired mental and spiritual pabulum, as the home store ministers to the needs of the great majority.

The people are growing. The signs of the times are increasing. Change is in the air, and in the nature of things. Utah and her populace—the Latter-day Saints—can discern in the heavens and on the earth their increasing influence and power; for truth must triumph, and all who are devoted to it will share in that "coming consummation so devoutly to be wished!"

PARIS, April 2.—Prof. Brown Sequard, the inventor of the supposed elixir of life, died here today.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

REV. SIDNEY ALLEN, STAND UP!

A little more than four months ago, a gentleman in South Carolina, desiring some information about the Mormon people, wrote a letter, of which the following is a copy, to Rev. Sidney Allen, at Franklin, Idaho, who poses as a Presbyterian preacher, and an exponent and exemplar of the Christian religion:

Rev. Dr. Allen, Franklin, Idaho.

Dear Bro. Allen—I take the liberty to write you concerning a people you, no doubt, are familiar with. I have been informed by a friend and a brother too, where you are and that you are among the Mormons; and as there is two of their ministers in our county preaching their doctrine and causing much disturbance in our churches, my desire is to know who and what they are. As the people here say they do not give correct statements of their people, neither of their country, and as you are among them, you know what they are, and would do me great honor and service by answering the following questions:

Are they law-abiding? How are they in education? How are they in morals? Do they practice polygamy? Do they preach from the Bible or Book of Mormon? Do they worship Joe Smith? What respect do they have for the female sex? Are their ministers paid salaries?

Please give me a general outline of this sect and oblige

Yours fraternally,

In due course of mail the following answer from the saintly Dr. Allen was received by his correspondent in South Carolina:

FRANKLIN, Idaho,
December 5th, 1893.

Dear Brother—Yours of the 29th just received. In reply I will say, first, that you can form no idea of what Mormonism really is from the statements of their missionaries. I will answer your queries seriatim:

First—They are law abiding so far as a people can be who are under the iron rule of a despotic and irresponsible priesthood.

Second—They have schools in which they are taught first of all to obey the Priesthood. Since the different churches have established mission schools they have in self-defense built up schools of better grade.

Third—As to morals, profane, obscene, Sabbath breaking and falsehood are the rule. A leader in our town in a sermon said lately, as they could no longer keep Gentiles out, they must deceive them to the eye and the ear. Many ignorant people among them were raised under Christian influence, yet have some regard for decency and morality, but the more intelligent ones are Mormons from love of power, lust and gain. These hold the others under a grinding tyranny.

Fourth—The "Manifesto" only "suspended" the taking of plural wives for the "present distress," that is, till Utah can secure statehood. They do not take more wives openly, but continue to live secretly with those they had before. We live two miles from the Utah line. There are many polygamous wives living here whose men are prominent Saints in "Zion" and who visit them regularly. And what they call "underground kids" abound. Polygamy is a matter of revelation, a "glorious principle of their religion," and cannot be abandoned.

Fifth—Their missionaries have a little book of New Testament subjects, which with catches, quirks and perversions constitute their stock in trade. At home they make very little use of the Bible, more of the Book of Mormon and more still of the Doctrine and Covenants. They say the Bible is reliable so far as correctly translated, but in error when it condemns their tenets and practices.

Sixth—Joe Smith is the greatest of the Prophets but Adam is God with the body passions of man—and in natural human form—by ordinary procreation became the father of Jesus, who in turn was a polygamist. Those women who followed him from Gallilee with Martha and Mary of Bethany comprised his harem.

Seventh—Woman is only the slave of man's lust and convenience here and to be raised from the dead only on the call of her husband, and with her children to form a part of his retinue—every "Saint" is to be a "God;" and the more wives and children he has the higher his rank. A Bishop here said a woman was like a hen, valuable only so long as she can raise progeny.

Eighth—As to salaries, the people pay a tenth of income—butter, chickens, eggs, sheep, cattle, horses and money to the local Bishop, who accounts to the First Presidency at Salt Lake. The leaders become rich from this fund. To support the missionaries each ward (Bishop's jurisdiction) holds a dance in the tabernacle, open with prayer, sell tickets and pay the proceeds to missionaries. The officials are paid out of the tithing fund by the Presidency and the people do not know how much the priests receive.

This is in some respects a good country, but a hard country to make a living in, and many of our people are very poor, and those who are deluded by missionaries into coming here will find themselves in abject slavery.

To go back a little—the Mormons of low grade are kind and friendly and restive under the galling yoke, but cannot escape.

I have tried to answer your questions and will only add that I run a risk in writing and would request you not to publish my name as I could not live here if it were known I had written this. But I felt it a duty to do all in my power to expose this monstrous fraud.

To sum up then, these men yield to law when they must, but hate intensely the government and people of the United States. They are ignorant, morally debased, polygamists, caricature the Bible, honor Joe Smith more than Christ, and enslave their women. God save the people of your grand old state from this fearful delusion. I have been laboring among this people four years. Most of our converts are boycotted in business and ostracised socially until they leave.

Yours for God and truth,
SIDNEY ALLEN.

P. S.—A president's counselor preaching here said, "The Bible was all right for the time it was written but now we have 'the everlasting gospel.'" President George Q. Cannon also said: "Be faithful, pay your tithes and sustain the Priesthood, and the people of the states will soon come bowing down to you for favors."

Naturally the receipt of this letter stirred up things in South Carolina in the vicinity where its addressee lived, and the two Mormon Elders, whose labors had been the cause of the beginning of the correspondence, were promptly confronted with the clerical reply. But the gentleman who wrote the first letter was fair-minded enough to say he did not believe all of Allen's statements, and he suggested, inasmuch as one of the Elders—G. L. Braley of Franklin—knew Mr. Allen personally, that copies of both letters be taken and the veracity of the answers which had been given him be inquired into; he himself being very anxious to know the result. A copy of the first letter was accordingly taken, the original of the second was kindly loaned for the purposes of the investigation, and the two, with the necessary explanations, were sent by Elder Braley and his traveling companion, Elder Cowley, of Utah, to the proper authorities in Franklin.

There it was at first decided to take the statements of a number of non-Mormons in refutation of Allen's slanders, and at least one such affidavit, by a prominent and thoroughly responsible non-Mormon resident, was freely given. With this, and others like it, it was determined to face Mr. Allen, and give him an opportunity either to repudiate his own statements, or to place himself on record at home as he had already done abroad, through refusing to sign a similar declaration. Finally it was decided to ask him for a statement on his own part, without intimation that his previous falsehoods were known, or reference to the statements from other non-Mormons; and after some little hesitation—until he could consult with his wife about it—he consented to do whatever he could in this way to remove prejudice against the Mormons. On the evening of the 7th of January, he accordingly called at the residence of Mr. George C. Parkinson, a notary public, and there voluntarily subscribed to the following.

To Whom it May Concern:

Being solicited by a friend to give a statement of my experience while among the Mormon people, I cheerfully do so.

I located in Franklin, Idaho, in the year 1890, and have been constantly engaged in the ministry as a missionary of the Presbyterian church in this settlement and surrounding neighborhood ever since, and I here take pleasure in certifying that I have found the Mormon people to be honest, frugal and industrious.

They are strictly temperate and moral and stand abreast intellectually with most progressive class of citizens of the Union, manifesting every evidence of patriotism and loyalty to the institutions of our great government.

They regard the marriage covenant as an eternal compact and show the highest regard and tenderest feelings for their wives and children.

As a rule they own their own homes and seem to be free, prosperous and independent.

They have great regard for the sacredness of the Bible and make constant use of it as a text book from which their Elders preach.

Personally, I have been treated with the greatest courtesy and hospitality while among the Mormon people and have experienced no undue opposition or influence against my efforts to promulgate the tenets of my faith.

SIDNEY ALLEN.

Subscribed to before me, George C. Parkinson, a notary public in and for Oneida County, State of Idaho, this 7th day of January, 1894.

[SEAL.] GEO. C. PARKINSON,
Notary Public.

My commission expires Feb. 5, 1896.

For the completion of the chain of circumstances connected with the incident, it only remains to be said that Elders Braley and Cowley, writing from Camden, Kershaw county, South Carolina, under date of Feb. 17, acknowledge the return of the letters and the receipt of the testimony, affidavit, etc., which they took to a local newspaper editor for publication. He refused to use the matter at all in his columns, saying he had "made no contract to defend Mormonism" through his paper. Mr. Allen's previous statements had been made generally known, however; and being denied the opportunity of publicly meeting them in that section, the Elders and their friends have desired the News to print the story in full. We have complied, omitting only the accompanying affidavit of a non-Mormon of Franklin, because hundreds and doubtless thousands of the same kind could be had for the asking, and would therefore be no novelty.

As to the Rev. Mr. Allen, the light thus thrown upon his character and methods will be sufficient, we think, to answer every needed purpose. For those in other parts of these valleys who do not enjoy the pleasure of an acquaintance with him, we may say that he is in the habit of making great pretensions to friendliness toward the Mormons, and is and has been often invited by the people of Franklin to attend gatherings of a public character held in their meeting house and to speak from their pulpit. It is from letters such as his that seek us enemies of the Latter-day Saints derive much of their so-called information; and the writing of such falsehoods as he sent to South Carolina is perhaps deemed by him an appropriate part of his missionary work, and the doing of real God-service. It was precisely just such a letter sent from Ogden that, according to Elder Braley's letter, "caused my companion and two more Elders to be driven out of a neighborhood at the muzzle of shotguns." Yet we would not judge Mr. Allen, or any of his ilk. It suffices for us to lay bare his proceedings and leave him to the judgment of the Chief of that court whose livery, as he understands it, he has put on and wears for a livelihood.

B. F. GROUARD'S DEATH.

The Los Angeles Times of March 19 contains a telegram announcing the death, in Santa Ana, California, of Benjamin F. Grouard. He was stricken down with paralysis as he was standing in his dooryard, talking to his daughter, Mrs. Harry Stafford, who was visiting at his home. The Times says of him:

Mr. Grouard was a man of varied experience in life, having left his home when but fourteen years of age and going to sea. Later he visited the South Sea Islands, where, with the assistance of the natives, he built a vessel which he commanded for several years in the southern waters. He has traveled around the world several times and has often spoken of having helped construct the boiler that was placed in the first ironclad vessel ever turned out by the United States. Mr. Grouard was born in Portsmouth, N. H., January 3, 1819. He came to California in 1852 and settled in the gold fields of northern California. Yet in the '50's he moved to Los Angeles, where he resided until he moved to the Santa Ana valley fifteen years ago. He died at the ripe old age of 75 years, leaving one son and four daughters.

The memory of B. F. Grouard will be recalled by many Utah people, though he has made his home in California for more than forty years. He was once an energetic member of the Church. He was one of the missionaries called by the Prophet Joseph to go to the Society Islands and open the Gospel doors to the people there. On June 1, 1848, Elders Addison Pratt, B. F. Grouard, K. F. Hanks and Noah Rogers left Nauvoo on their mission. They were nearly a year making the trip, as it was May 4, 1844, when Elders Rogers and Grouard landed at Tahiti. In July following the first branch was organized by Elder Pratt, and a good work was done by the missionaries.

Later, Elder Grouard made his home in San Bernardino, where at that time there was a considerable body of the Saints. It was there that he drifted from the Church. He made a visit to Utah a year ago, and was present in this city at the time of the dedication of the Salt Lake Temple. Regarding his missionary labor among the Society Islanders, he expressed himself as not desirous of undoing any part of it, and stated that he had taken great interest and pleasure in the work there.

AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.

A. M. Blanchard, of North Ogden, favors the News with the copy of a poem, heretofore unpublished, which he treasures as a choice memento of Zion's poetess, Eliza R. Snow Smith. Shortly after her return from Palestine, in 1874, the authoress was at the home of Brother Blanchard, who then resided in Springville, and presented him with a copy of the poem, which she requested be not given for publication during her lifetime. Now that the gifted authoress has passed from mortality, the News is pleased to give space to the poetic gem:

Man's tide of existence is fearfully changed—
From God and from Nature, how widely estranged!

Vice, dandied by fashion, mocks Nature's designs,
And existence is lessened as virtue declines.

We wake into being—how hopeless at birth!
How short, at the longest, our stay on the earth!

Too short to develop (we merely begin)
The germ of the Deity, planted within.

As a father transmits from the father to son,
So God, our Creator, our Father, has done;
No attribute God in His glorified form
Possesses, but man, too, inherits the germ.

Though frail and imperfect, unlearned and unwise,
He's endowed with capacities needful to rise!
From an embryo state onward, upward—at length
To a fulness of knowledge, of wisdom and strength.

He's his own acting agent with freedom to choose—
With power to accept, and with power to refuse—

With a future before him, the sequel of life,
To which this is a preface, with consequence—rife.

He should learn how to strengthen this life's feeble chain
And bring back the longevity rightful to gain;
Develop ability, greatness and worth,
By improving himself and improving the earth.

He should squander no talent, no health and no time,
All, all are important—age, manhood and prime;
As we sow we shall reap—what we earn we'll receive—
We'll be judged by our work—not by what we believe.

We're renow laying foundations for what we shall be,
For life's current extends to Eternity's sea;
And whatever debases, ennobles, refines,
By our acts, we imprint in indelible lines.

We're the offspring of God: We should never degrade
The form which at first in His image was made;
If we honor our beings and callings while here,
We'll secure an admission to life's higher sphere.

In the likeness of Deity gracefully formed—
With His own noble attributes richly adorned;
For a grand immortality, man is designed—
Perfected in body and perfection in mind.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

One great feature, and one of the more important, of the work in which the Latter-day Saints are engaged is their Sunday schools. The magnitude which the cause has attained was well illustrated by the interest manifested in the Sunday school conference held on Sunday, April 8, in the great Tabernacle in this city, and by the encouraging reports presented to the vast audience. It was found on roll call that thirty-four out of thirty-six Stakes were represented at that conference, and statistics proved that more than 83,600 people are actually engaged in the Sunday school work of the Church, or about one third of the entire number of Latter-day Saints. Probably no other religious denomination on earth can make a similar showing, or even approximate it. The work is as yet only in the first stage of its development. Under the efficient leadership of the general superintendent and his assistants, and the blessings of the Almighty, it will continue to grow until it shall have become a mighty power for good among the Saints and for all mankind.

The wisdom of the suggestions offered at the conference to those engaged in the work is obvious. One was for the convening of annual Sunday school conferences in each Stake for the purpose of furthering the interests of the cause in every settlement in Zion, and another, equally important, for the establishment of training classes for teachers on the same plan as that held in Provo with highly gratifying results. The necessity of employing well-trained teachers for the pupils in the Sabbath schools is evident, when it is considered that the duty of those teachers is to lay the foundation for the religious thought and sentiment of the young minds under their care and guidance, and to develop this further in the right direction. For that work the best intellectual qualities and careful preparation are equally necessary for success. And as the possibilities of enlisting these in the service of the great cause are placed within the reach of every school, the work will in the course of time, by the aid of the Divine Spirit, accomplish its great object.

The hope of any people is centered in the growing generation. If moral principles, regard for truth and justice, loyalty to God and to the country are to be perpetuated, these things must be instilled into the minds of the young at the earliest possible date and by such means as are suited to their undeveloped minds and faculties. The work of Sunday school teachers is eminently the work of a sower. Some of the good seed may fall by the wayside or upon stony places or among thorns, but most of it will fall in good soil, for the mind of the child, pessimists to the contrary notwithstanding, is essentially good. The results of the work may not be visible at once, but a time will come when the faithful labor of the teachers will be amply rewarded by an abundant harvest, for some of it will bring forth a hundredfold, and future generations will be blessed as a result of the labors of a humble Sunday school teacher. This is a work which can never be in vain.

It is a notable fact that every one who has taken a more prominent part in the affairs of the Kingdom of God on earth has been led in this direction in his early youth. We might refer to Moses, to Samuel, to David, to Nephi, to John the Baptist, to Luther, to Joseph Smith and a host of others, all of whom were trained in the fear of the Lord as children and afterwards accomplished great things for the cause of the Lord. The fact is well worth consideration, for it shows the vast importance of the work in which our brethren and sisters are engaged when they give their services as Sunday school teachers to the children of the Saints.

UNIVERSITY CHANGES.

The generosity of the Salt Lake Literary and Scientific association of this city in coming to the aid of the University of Utah at this particular crisis, will be gratifying to every friend of education in the Territory. By the terms of the agreement now formally entered into between the officers of the association and the regents of the University, the former turn over to the latter the splendid apparatus now in the association's handsome building, as part of the endowment of a permanent chair or professorship in the University. The latter institution, it is further understood, shall have the use, during two years, of the laboratories, class-rooms, etc., in the new building referred to. The chair or professorship which the association thus elects to endow is that of geology and mineralogy, and for the first incumbent of this chair, it names Dr. James E. Talmage, who at yesterday's meeting of the board of regents of the University was not only confirmed in the position, but was elected president of the University.

In all of this, the News sees nothing but mutual advantage and profit to the two parties to the compact, and a long stride forward in the amalgamation of our higher educational interests. It cannot fail to result in good; and though the parsimony of the Legislature seemed in the outset calculated to deal the University a killing blow, and even now has made necessary the reduction of expenses and the dropping of professors whose services under other circumstances it might have been desirable to retain, yet it has evoked a patriotism and a union in support of the one pioneer institution of learning that prosperity would perhaps have been much slower to arouse.

As to the personnel of the faculty as at present constituted, the News takes this occasion sincerely to congratulate Dr. Talmage on the honor conferred through his elevation to the presidency, and the University on securing so valuable and accomplished an educator to stand at its head. But we cannot refrain from expressing in this connection a high regard for the motives and conduct of Professor Kingsbury, who with rare magnanimity and unselfishness put away his chances of preferment by laboring to effect the other changes in and benefits to the University above mentioned. All the way through he has thought of the institution first and himself last; and the honor conferred upon him in naming him vice-president by acclamation was as graceful as it was deserved.

That which now seems to us to give promise of the brightest and greatest success for the University is the admirable harmony and union that prevail. In all the negotiations leading to the result above outlined, there has been neither jealousy nor impugnement of motives. Everything has been frank, candid, honorable and patriotic. We believe the University has seen the last of its dark days, and will now enter upon a career of unbroken prosperity.

SHARP, THE MOBOCRAT, DEAD.

A telegram from Carthage, Illinois, brings the news that on the night of Monday, April 9, Thomas Coke Sharp, editor and proprietor of the Carthage Gazette, died at his home at that place, from paralysis, from which he had suffered the past three years. The deceased was the son of a noted Methodist minister, Rev. Solomon Sharp, of Philadelphia, and was in the 76th year of his age at the time of his demise. He was a native of New York, having been born at Mt. Holly, September 25, 1818. He came west and settled in Quincy, Illinois, and engaged in the practice of law. Shortly afterward, in the summer of 1849, he moved to Warsaw, Hancock county. He became associated in business with James Gamble, and together they purchased from Daniel N. White the Western World, of which Sharp became editor. A year later the name of the paper was changed to the Warsaw Signal, and for a number of years it was the only paper published in Hancock county outside of Nauvoo. In later years Mr. Sharp became the editor of the Carthage Gazette.

The chief interest of the people of Utah in Thomas C. Sharp arises from the fact that they and others have had to regard him as one of the murderers of the Prophet Joseph and the Patriarch Hyrum Smith, at Carthage jail, June 27th, 1844. Perhaps the last Utah man to visit and converse with him was Sheriff Gilbert Belnap, of Ogden, who returned from the East a week ago. He stated at the time that Sharp was an invalid, and his mind impaired. He was non-communicative on the subject of the assassination, particularly the part he played in it, but Sheriff Belnap believes that at the time of his visit Sharp would have told all he remembered if his wife would have allowed it, but this she would not do.

When Sharp came into Hancock county there was some anti-Mormon agitation and he entered into it with ardor. He was ambitious for political preferment and was wholly unscrupulous in measures to gain his ends. He published in his paper the most infamous falsehoods against the Latter-day Saints. All through those troublous times the columns of the Signal were replete with vicious articles inciting and urging violence toward the Mormon people. Thomas C. Sharp had murder in his heart then and later availed himself of the opportunity to imbrue his hands in the blood of innocence. He was denounced by the sheriff of the county as "a villain of the worst dye."

In connection with his associates he was instrumental in inflaming public prejudice to the extent that meetings were held, the first of them at Warsaw, in which resolutions were passed declaring that in the opinion of those participating the time had arrived when the Mormons, "as a body, should be driven from the surrounding settlements into Nauvoo; that the Prophet and his miscreant adherents should then be demanded at their hands, and if not surrendered a war of extermination should be waged to their entire destruction." Sharp was an ardent advocate of the murderous policy.

This situation was known at the time, as may be seen by the following from the diary of the Prophet Joseph, though the people did not realize the full import of the ominous proceedings. The Prophet says, under date of June, 18, 1844:

About 2 p. m. the Legion was drawn up in the street close by the mansion. I stood in full uniform on the top of the frame of a building. Judge Phelps read the Warsaw Signal extra of the 17th, wherein the "old citizens" were called upon to assist the mob in exterminating the leaders of the Saints and driving away the people.

Thomas C. Sharp was one of the attorneys engaged as prosecuting counsel when the Prophet Joseph and his brother Hyrum were placed under arrest. Knowing that they were innocent of any crime, and that if the case proceeded to trial acquittal must follow, he joined with others in carrying out the mobocratic design. He was a leader in the murderous conspiracy, and conducted the negotiations by which it was arranged that the mob should get possession of the jail unopposed. When the assault took place he was one of the participants. The readers of the News will remember that a few weeks ago there was present in this city Col. M. B. Darnell, of Iowa, who was an eye witness to the shooting at Carthage. A relative of his, a young man who was with the mob, names Sharp as one of the persons who engaged in the actual shooting. He was indicted with others, but all were acquitted by a jury selected, as was well understood by the people then, and as testified to by Col. Darnell from personal knowledge, from among the mobocrats themselves.

No language can make the crime in which Thomas Oake Sharp was a leading participant appear more heinous than it is. He has gone to his final account, where he will receive from a just Judge that reward which his works merit. The people of Utah are satisfied to let the matter rest there. The News refers on this occasion to the awful tragedy of June 27, 1844, because it feels it to be a solemn duty to make the record in connection with the passing from mortality of one of the men chiefly responsible for the assassination of the Prophet and Patriarch.

THE ANNUAL CONFERENCE.

The adjournment of the General Conference Sunday afternoon brought to a close one of the most interesting gatherings of the kind in which the Saints have participated. It was truly a time of refreshing, of peace, of encouragement and rejoicing to the members of the Church, and in this respect has never been excelled in the history of latter times. The spirit of instruction and revelation rested upon speakers to a marked extent. The remarks were forceful and addressed to living topics in the experience of the Saints, being accompanied by the power and under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.

One feature which was made prominent in the spirit of the Conference is a matter of comfort and encouragement to those engaged in the work of the Lord. This is the development of unity and spiritual growth that is manifest among the people. The increase of humility, brotherly love, charity, earnestness in the cause of truth, intelligence, union, and of every element to the furtherance of the work of righteousness, was clearly manifest, bearing witness of growth in the knowledge of truth and in grace and good works throughout the body of the Church, among the youthful as well as those of more mature years. Never at any time have the Saints presented themselves so compactly in this regard as at the present, thus giving evidence of the power and blessing of God that attend their progress.

The instructions at all of the meetings were indeed plain and precious. Counsel and admonition in the temporal affairs of the people were presented with a clearness and precision that brought them within the comprehension of all. In a spirit of gentleness and persuasion, faults were pointed out, a means of remedying them shown, and methods indicated for avoiding temptation and danger in the future. The principles which should guide the Saints in their daily life were placed before the assemblages in a simple, powerful manner, and attention directed to the blessings that follow obedience to the laws of God.

An instance of special importance and interest to the Saints was at the Sunday morning meeting, when President Woodruff gave to them information relating to the work for those who have passed beyond the veil. This revelation through the Prophet of God of the Divine will was attended by the manifestation of the Holy Spirit among the people, giving to them a comprehension and testimony of the truth of the glorious principle enunciated, and which was hailed with joy by the Saints.

The instructions regarding the sacrament, the united order, and other principles of vital importance, will also call forth a harmonious response from each member of the Church who is walking in the path of duty. Altogether the counsel, the exhortation, and the exposition of heavenly principles that have been witnessed during the Conference just closed, are of a nature to cause great rejoicing among the Saints and to lead them to an increase of diligence in serving the Lord.

REMEMBER THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC!

The events of the past few days are surely enough to justify the people of Utah in entertaining unfriendly feeling for the Southern Pacific, which in its treatment of the industrial army and of this Territory has shown a heartlessness that is almost without a parallel in railway history. And if out of this unfriendliness there should grow a determination on the part of Utah people to cease all save the most compulsory relations with the S. P., the latter company would receive just such treatment as its own course has invited and most thoroughly deserves.

We suppose the local courts have it in mind to inquire into the railroad's action in this grave matter; and we trust they will be able to deal with it effectively. We would not therefore try to prejudice the issue by any premature or one-sided comments. Yet there are certain features of the S. P.'s conduct that are so monstrous as to admit of no palliation. The treatment of the pauper passengers in transit was, in the first place, undeniably barbarous and inhuman. The wrong to these passengers in dumping them upon a community which cannot give them employment and is under no obligations to give them anything else, was despicable. The crime against the Territory, in throwing this chaotic and troublesome element into our community, with supreme indifference as to what the results might be in the way of rapine or starvation, to say nothing of the enforced expense in the endeavor to maintain order, was as outrageous and high-handed as any act of a tyrant against the peace and property of a subject people. If all these facts do not constitute an arraignment from which the S. P. railroad will find it difficult to escape, there is less human nature in the heart of the community than we have looked for.

For the poor, starving, shivering army, we have the utmost pity and sympathy. But those attributes, however helpful at times, will not satisfy their present needs. The main body are less to be blamed than are the leaders, and so far as Utah's present grievances concerned, none of them is held so much at fault as is the railway corporation that has so shamefully ill-treated them. But there is nothing in this Territory for them, and to hope the community can feed and warm them indefinitely is too unreasonable to be thought of. Every effort to induce them to move on or go back and to assist them peaceably so to do, ought to be encouraged, apart from carping political criticism or unwise local outbreak. As human beings and American citizens they have rights and liberty of action. What they may not be forced into doing they may be perfectly willing to do of their own accord. Persuasion is at any rate better than compulsion, and we trust none but the coolest and wisest advice will be listened to. In the meantime, let the Southern Pacific railway be remembered for the service it has done us; and since we shall want to continue to do legitimate business with the golden Pacific coast, let us not lose too much time in getting another railroad through that will have a little regard for the people at its Utah end.

THE PASSING OF MR. COOK.

For the information of those who take an interest in antiques, the News notes the presence in the city of Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston. He addressed an audience in one of the churches in this city on Sunday night, and a small number of curiosity-seekers in another church last night. As a pecuniary venture the reverend speaker's coming cannot be deemed a success, and if he depends on the silver-quarters of the Salt Lake public to help him out of the country, he would better join the "army" at Ogden at once and take his chances on free food, fuel and transportation. The time has long since passed when a heart and tongue like those enclosed within the mortal frame of Mr. Cook would be able to draw any sympathy from a Western audience. In sheer pity for his old-time popularity a considerable houseful turned out Sunday night to hear him discuss the Mormons. But in common self-respect, a number of his non-Mormon auditors got up and left the building in disgust during the course of his fanatical drivel. His coming and his lectures have proven a sorry fiasco; firstly, because his already tottering reputation is now completely shattered, and secondly, because in his dotage he has to be sternly informed that no one on earth cares a copper cent what he thinks, says or does about the "great Utah problem." It is a terrible fall for one who esteems himself so highly—a fall for which his senility will be less harshly blamed than will the stupid judgment of those who brought him here or permitted him when once here to discharge his mouth.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CONFERENCE.

The annual Sunday school conference of the Church was held in the large Tabernacle, Sunday evening, April 8, 1894, at 7 p. m. Present: Gen. Supt. George Q. Cannon, Assistants George Goddard and John Morgan; all the members of the Sunday School Union board; President Joseph F. Smith, Elders Brigham Young and George Teasdale, and the largest gathering of Sunday school workers ever assembled in these valleys.

The secretary and presented the general Sunday school authorities as follows, who were unanimously sustained by the vote of the conference:

George Q. Cannon, general superintendent of Sunday schools in all the world.

George Goddard, first assistant general superintendent of Sunday schools in all the world.

John Morgan, second assistant general superintendent of Sunday schools in all the world.

As members of the Deseret Sunday School Union Board: George Q. Cannon, George Goddard, John Morgan, George Reynolds, Abraham H. Cannon, Thomas C. Griggs, Joseph W. Summerhays, Levi W. Richards, Francis M. Lyman, Heber J. Grant and John C. Cutler.

As general secretary, John M. Whitaker.

As general treasurer, George Reynolds.

Elder George Goddard was grateful to his Heavenly Father to live to see the Sunday school cause grow to be of such magnitude—representing nearly one-third of the entire population of the Church, nearly 84,000 engaged therein. And with the growth in numbers each year there has also been a corresponding growth intellectually and systematically in the presentation of the truths of the Gospel.

Grading has marked a new era in this work, and will be followed by results which time alone can measure. The "nickel day" on the first Sunday in September of each year, with one or two exceptions has been nobly responded to and has enabled the general board to publish works for the free distribution of the schools.

Elder Goddard paid a high tribute to the faithful workers in this great cause and closed by invoking the blessings of heaven upon them and the Sunday school work.

Elder George Reynolds said that in view of the rapid growth of the Sunday school cause the First Presidency of the Church have felt impressed to announce annual Sunday school conferences in each Stake of Zion, having for their purpose the better understanding and closer relations and general advancement of the Sunday school cause.

Elder Reynolds read following portions of the circular:

The instructions given by the First Presidency that in future an annual Sunday School conference shall be held in each stake of Zion, impels us to offer a few suggestions for your consideration.

Saturday and Sunday should be used, as those days will not interfere with the attendance of the children at their day schools, which would be the case if the conferences were held on the Sunday and Monday. But where Sunday and Monday are used the program arranged for Saturday should be rendered Monday. The following suggested programs outline our ideas of their general conduct and the work that should be done thereat:

SUGGESTED PROGRAM FOR TWO DAYS CONFERENCE:

First day, 10 a. m.—Officers' and teachers' meeting.

2 p. m.—Review of their classes by prominent teachers of the stake and their methods of teaching them. Reports.

Second day, 10 a. m.—General meeting of members, with instructions from visiting brethren. Reports.

2 p. m.—General instructions and reports. Presentation of General and Stake Sunday school authorities. Administration of the sacrament.

7 p. m.—(Services to be arranged during the preceding meetings.)

The addresses decided upon for the convening of these conferences will be published, for general information, in the same manner as are those of the quarterly Stake conference; and we suggest that the superintendent of each Sunday school call a meeting of its teachers and officers about two weeks before the time appointed for the conference of its Stake and at that meeting:

First—Decide which of the officers and teachers shall attend the conference. As many as possible should go.

Second—Arrange for the conduct of the school with those officers and teachers that remain so that as little change as possible is made from the regular program, and as little interference occur in the regular studies. Where the usual order of studies is impracticable, a miscellaneous program is suggested.

Third—Prepare report of the condition of the school so that the superintendent may be able to answer the questions of the members of the general board of the Union who may be present at the conference. Among the questions that every superintendent should be prepared to answer are:

How many children of Latter-day Saint parentage are there in your ward or district, under the age of eighteen?

How many of these are enrolled in your Sunday school?

What is their average attendance?

What is the average attendance of officers and teachers?

Have you any attendants at the Sunday school normal course, held in connection with the B. Y. Academy?

Do you use the Sunday school visiting book?

Stake secretaries should be prepared to take minutes of the meetings of these conferences.

Every Sunday school should continue its sessions, as usual, on the date of the Annual Sunday School Conference, except those situated in the town or settlement where the conference is held. But the children should be encouraged to attend from those outside places where the distance or other causes do not render it impracticable or undesirable.

A program of singing exercises should be prepared of songs, etc., well known in the various schools of the Stake, and a leader be chosen by the Stake superintendency for the entire congregation. If the Stake is fortunate enough to have several leaders of ability, one may lead at the first meeting, another at the second, and so on, so that each school may feel that it is remembered and duly honored. In all cases a thorough understanding should be had of what is to be sung (which should invariably be from the Church publications) and the various schools be given time to practice.

Your brethren in the Gospel,
GEORGE Q. CANNON,
GEORGE GODDARD,
JOHN MORGAN.

At the meeting of Stake officers, the desirability of the organization of a Normal training course in the Stake, on the same plan as that at Provo Academy, will be decided upon. The dates of these conferences are as follows:

As general treasurer Elder Reynolds stated he had received $1,085.25 as the 80 per cent on "Nickel donation"—the other 20 per cent being retained by Stake officers for Stake Sunday school purposes.

The choir sang, "Jesus once of humble birth."

Elder George H. Brimhall gave a brief report of the two Normal Sunday school training classes for 1893-4—stating that the first class numbered forty-five, the second one hundred and six, and consisted of the most interested students and hardest workers he ever taught. It was a veritable pleasure to teach them.

The course consisted of instructions in three great points for the preparation of the teacher:

First—That he shall know the child.
 Second—That he shall know the subject he is going to teach.

Third—That he shall know the best methods of imparting instructions.

Those who attend not only take a thorough course in psychology and the regular Sunday school course in discipline and Sunday school methods, but have the privilege of taking any two studies of the academy course not interfering with the Sunday school course. Music is also made a prominent feature. Elder Brimhall thought if those who sent the normals to Provo knew the magnitude of their work, no means would be spared to aid and keep them at Provo until the entire course was completed and the graduates received a certificate.

Elder F. M. Lyman thought the Sunday school movement now but in its infancy. The importance that we should attach to its sacred work cannot be overestimated. There is no labor of any Elder or sister that will secure to them a greater portion of the Holy Spirit than working in the Sunday schools of Zion training the precious youth of whom we expect such great results. He deplored the fact that the statistical report showed an average attendance of only a little over 50 per cent whereas it should be 75 to 80 per cent at least; and he trusted the superintendents, teachers and workers would make a great effort to have the average attendance increased greatly another year.

Among the new features introduced during the last year, the first Sunday in the month among theological classes was set apart as fast-day where all members come together and bear their testimony to one another; and it is resulting in much good. In the theological classes more system is being followed, which results in greater interest. Among the most important text books he felt like recommending to the theological classes was Outlines of Ecclesiastical History, one of the most thorough and useful works ever published for a text book. Also the Juvenile Instructor should be in every home of the Saints as it contains reading of an excellent character for old and young.

Elder Lyman was pleased to see the many improvements being inaugurated for the bettering of the Sunday schools and closed by invoking the blessings of heaven upon both Sunday schools and workers therein.

Elder Heber J. Grant in contrasting the great number of children among the Latter-day Saints and those of eastern states, could not help but notice the tendency of "modern civilization" to live without raising children. He related an instance of a gentleman going back to his native town in Massachusetts, attending a Sabbath school and found but two children of American born parents; while all the rest were children of foreign parentage. He would be pleased in one year to listen to the reading of the statistical report, as he believed by all taking an interest to increase the attendance, the number instead of being eighty-three thousand as now enrolled could be increased to an even one hundred thousand.

The Sunday schools are a great factor in the instructions of the young—one of the most important institutions in Zion, and he was pleased to see the manifest interest and faithful labor of the workers therein.

Assistant Superintendent John Morgan said that the importance and great labor attached to the formulating of a proper course of instructions for the guidance of Sunday school officers and teachers has prevented the completion of a course which was intended to have been finished and ready for distribution at this conference. The committee who have the important task in hand will work until the course is completed and ready for publication. In the meantime superintendents and teachers should be exceedingly careful what they permit in their schools. No literature or songs should be permitted in the schools that have not been passed upon by the proper authorities; as the inculcating of instruction should contain nothing but pure principles of the Gospel. And if thus taught we need have no fear of them departing from the truth, but there will arise in the mountains a host of men and women mighty in good works, whose influence will be felt throughout the earth for good and exert a power on the salvation of the human family.

Elder Morgan drew special attention to the necessity of carefully and correctly compiled statistical and financial reports, few of which, this year, were correct. It thus involves an immense amount of labor at the general office, which could be avoided if due vigilance were shown during the year of every secretary keeping correct records and at the end of the year compiling a careful report. He trusted a reference to this important part of our Sunday school work would be all that is necessary to insure a careful and correct report from each Stake and school hereafter.

General Superintendent George Q. Cannon felt to extend to the ushers the thanks of the general officers for the excellent order they maintained; and to the choir for the sweet music furnished to enliven the interest in the meeting.

Referring to a recent visit to the Sunday School Normal class at Provo, he was very much gratified to see the interest and ambition everywhere exhibited both by the Sunday school missionaries from various Stakes receiving instructions to become teachers in the Sunday schools of Zion and by the instructors themselves. He felt that the excellent course being given would result in much good for the Sabbath school work. The great advantage the teachers and children have today of all the intellectual attainments of this country and Europe ought to make our schools the best and leading institutions in the art of teaching and in the advancement of the pupils of any in the world. The speaker referred to the great work being accomplished by the Sunday schools, paid a high tribute to the energetic and faithful labors of the general and local Sunday school officers and teachers, and closed by invoking divine benediction upon the Sunday school cause.

The choir sang:

Jerusalem, my glorious home.

Benediction by President Joseph F. Smith. JOHN M. WHITAKER, General Secretary.

MURCUR GOLD FIELD.

MERCUR MINING DISTRICT, Utah, April 9, 1894. — Your special correspondent made, through the courtesy of the U. P. R. R., a flying trip from Weber to Mercur, the thriving little city in the Mercur mining district. I can hardly express my surprise at the peculiar methods of both mining and milling the ore of this camp, neither can I feel justified in my own mind as to the forces of nature in bringing about these large deposits of gold-bearing ore.

A good newspaper man should and does have the "gall" to enter the presence of kings in his thirst for news, and I presume, if the truth was known, many, now gone, have entered the presence of Satan, out of mere curiosity, of course. But the mining man must have both "gall" and nerve if he desires to obtain mining knowledge.

The old story of mining in this district years ago for silver need not be gone over. That story is without doubt true from the evidence of the "pot holes," caverns, caves and excavations in many places on both "Mercur" and "Marion" ground as well as in other portions of the camp.

Many theories have been advanced as to the cause of the formation. Some think it a deposit; others say this can hardly be the case from the fact that the gold bearing deposit seems to follow the silver ledge—is in fact the hanging wall of the silver ore. The latter I can hardly feel is the true theory, from the fact I could not see any reason to justify a statement of any silver ledge.

The silver ore, judging from the holes from which the ore was taken, was "found here and there occasionally," where the miner happened to run onto it, while the gold bearing portion has a well defined course and dip between two walls of different character of rock and can be mined systematically, after the prospecting has been done and the miner chooses to combine system with work. I took the liberty to crawl down and into many of these abandoned silver pot holes and found here and there pieces of silver bearing rock, and occasionally found a cinnabar stain, as it were, something like the same as found in the gold bearing deposit now being so profitably worked. This silver bearing ore seems to possess much antimony, in fact I found several pieces which seems to be all antimony and doubt if there is any silver in it.

From the facts I have stated in regard to the condition of the gold bearing rock, which seems to be a conglomerate mass of quartz, spar, crystallized lime, shale and black lime, verging onto dolomite and also talc, it has two perfect walls. The floor or foot wall of the ledge is black, hard lime, while the roof or hanging wall is composed of lime shale. On the Mercur and Marion grounds the ledge or deposit lies almost flat, and only has a dip where the mountain slope is quite abrupt. The trend or strike of this gold-bearing ledge or deposit is northerly and southerly, and my opinion is that the miner or prospector who finds this ore zone either north or south of the above mentioned locality will find it more nearly averse and more perpendicular, and perhaps a higher grade of ore. This very easily worked ore cannot possibly be confined to the small territory which has been prospected near the town of Mercur the past fall and winter months.

Near the valley on the Glencoe side, I understand, very fine prospects have been opened up and large boules of ore of a better grade have been found. This part of the camp I have not yet visited. On the Rush Valley side Messrs. Dicks and Jones seem to be opening up an immense deposit of this ore, which they claim will assay on the average of some $12. Mr. Jas. McNeece has several claims in this same vicinity that also look fine with what work has been done. These claims are almost in the valley. Some day some enterprising miner is liable to go farther down in the valley, get a solid formation that has not been interfered with by a stray volcanic eruption, and get a bonanza for his pains. This may prove a false theory, but the chances are greatly in its favor. In my opinion the Mercur mining district will be to Salt Lake City what Leadville was to Denver.

The fact that the Colorado party did not take the Mercur mines need not deter those interested from working their claims, nor keep Utonians or any other legitimate mining men from faithfully prosecuting work in the camp in the belief that a legitimate profit will crown their efforts with success.

of the Gospel. He was followed by Elders H. J. Nielson, J. M. Jepson and Francis Webster, who bore testimony to the truth of the work we are engaged in and reported their various districts.

Elder S. A. Bunker reported his labors in Decatur, Nebraska, where the Elders had been the means of allaying a great deal of prejudice, and a much better feeling prevailed. Elder P. J. Garn spoke on the principles of the Gospel and expressed his pleasure for being called to go forth as an Elder.

Elder Wm. J. Butterworth reported his labors in the Council Bluffs district, where he held two meetings during the winter. The Josephites were not as prejudiced as they have been, and they treated us well.

The Elders at the Conference were President Wm. J. Butterworth and P. J. Garn, Council Bluffs, Iowa, headquarters, 191 Graham avenue;

George A. Beal and Francis Webster, headquarters in Nebraska, Coyard, Dawson county;

Joseph M. Jepson and Hans J. Nielson, headquarters in Boone, Boone county, Iowa;

Stephen A. Bunker and Joshua Cook, headquarters at Decatur, Burt county, Nebraska.

Elders not present—Miles F. Weaver and J. J. Jensen, headquarters at Warrens, Monroe county, Wisconsin;

James Cluff, headquarters at St. Johns, Stafford county, Kansas.

P. J. GARN, Clerk.

PRIESTHOOD MEETING

held March 26, 1894, in the Huntington hall, Elder Wm. J. Butterworth presiding.

Elder Butterworth presented the general authorities of the Church and those of the conference, all of whom were sustained.

Elder J. Jepson reported the St. Johns branch in good shape, and that a good work could be done there with the right kind of effort. He also bore his testimony to the work.

Elder George A. Beal reported the Boone branch in fair shape; that some were investigating the Gospel; also that a great deal of good could be done there by canvassing the county, that there are some that are converted but not baptized yet; that they are asking a great many questions in regard to the Gospel.

Elder S. A. Bunker reported his labors in Nebraska: two baptized, one re-baptized; also some investigating. He had met with some opposition, but believed a good work can be done there.

Elder William J. Butterworth reported the Council Bluffs branch; that an impression for good has been made with some of the people. He also spoke encouraging words to the Elders.

Elders J. Cook, H. J. Nielson, F. Webster and P. J. Garn spoke on missionary labor, bore strong testimonies, and expressed their desire to do their full duty as Elders and messengers of salvation.

P. J. GARN, Clerk.

RETURNED ELDERS.

The NEWS had a pleasant call April 5 from Elder James Vance Jr., who returned yesterday from a mission to the Southern States. He left his home in Salt River valley, Arizona, on March 3, 1892, and was assigned to labor in the Virginia conference. His field was the central portion of the state, where he was well treated by the people. He speaks highly of their hospitality. His health was good and he enjoyed his missionary labors. He will leave for Arizona after Conference.

Elder L. D. Cranney, of Logan, who returned with Elder Vance, also called in April 5. He left home April 4, 1892, and performed missionary duties in the West Virginia conference, meeting with good success. There was quite an interest manifested by the people, among whom he was hospitably treated. His health was good.

Elders John P. Cardon, of Logan, and John S. Curtie, of Orangeville, Emery county, also returned, each having filled a two years mission in Virginia.

Elder John L. Howells, of the Fifteenth ward of this city, called on the NEWS Thursday afternoon. He arrived home on Tuesday from a mission to Great Britain, on which he left April 9, 1892. The first few months of his missionary labors were in the Manchester conference, where he met with many friends. In the fall of 1892 he was transferred to the Welsh conference, and remained there until his release, laboring most of the time in Monmouthshire, where he met with gratifying success. There was considerable interest shown by the people in the testimony of the Elders.

Elder Howells left Liverpool on the Teutonic on March 21, and passed through the stormy experience met with by that vessel, as related in the dispatches.

Elder George H. Hall, of Huntville, Weber county, made a pleasant call at the NEWS April 6th. He returned on Tuesday from a mission to Great Britain, and is in excellent health and spirits. He left this city April 9, 1892, and for the first year labored in the Leeds conference of the British mission as traveling Elder, receiving good treatment among the people and meeting with satisfactory success in his missionary work. In the latter part of April, 1893, he was appointed to preside over the London conference, and remained in that position till his release to return home. He reports the conference as being in a very prosperous condition, the labors of the Elders there being blessed with much fruit in the way of bringing people to a knowledge of Gospel truths. Elder Hall made the homeward voyage in the Teutonic, which sailed from Liverpool March 21st.

Brother George D. White, of Beaver City, Utah, paid the NEWS a pleasant call Tuesday morning. He has just returned from a mission to the Southern States, his field of labor having been in the northern Alabama and Mississippi conferences. Elder White left home on March 15, 1892, and his time has been equally divided in the states named. He reports having thoroughly enjoyed his labors and had received good treatment as a general thing. The mission is in a prosperous condition, he says, and he had been successful in finding out many of the honest in heart, and had assisted in baptizing eleven.

Elder Martin Henderson, of Idaho, returned home with him, having been released on account of sickness after an absence in the South of six months.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

PROVO, Utah, April 7.—The jury in the murder case was out four hours, and came in at 7:30 p. m. The verdict was: Smith, guilty of voluntary manslaughter, with a recommendation to mercy. Hallett was acquitted.

It is now thought and strongly whispered among some of the railway officials that the Union Pacific receivers will not move in the matter of broad-gauging the Utah Nevada from this city to Garfield this season as reported some time ago.

Scott Jensen, the 12-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Jensen, of Brigham City, is recovering from the effects of poisoning. Last week he was out on Plymouth flat, and ate some wild onions, which proved to be poisonous. He suffered intensely, and for a time it was thought he would die, but with proper care he was brought through.

The cold hand of death has again visited our midst and taken away one of our respected citizens, Robert Simpson having passed from the scenes of this life to the land beyond. He had been a sufferer of Bright's disease and dropsy for some time. Deceased was born in Montreal, Canada, in 1884 and came to this city 23 years ago. He leaves a wife, four sons and two daughters.—Payson Globe.

The mail from Scotland brings news of the sudden death, at Catrine, Ayrshire, on March 9, of Mrs. Sarah Anderson Forrest, wife of Mr. James Forrest of Culbert house. The deceased was 61 years of age, and a most estimable lady. She gave a hospitable welcome to the missionaries and others from Utah who called there. A number of her relatives reside in Utah. She leaves a husband and three daughters.

Don Maguire was at the Fair April 5. He reached Salt Lake that morning, fresh from the Midwinter Fair at San Francisco, where he has been connected with the Utah exhibit. He states that the Territory's display there is perfectly satisfactory, and attracts great attention. When he came into the Home Industry Fair today he took a good look around, and remarked: "There is nothing like this in San Francisco, not even in the Mechanics' Institute. Utah is showing up splendidly."

A couple of police officers were called to the Morgan Hotel last midnight to take charge of a guest of the house who was reported as being very anxious to take his own life. It appeared that the man had been drinking and was very much discouraged and downhearted. He had in his possession a bottle of chloroform which he wanted to swallow and when that act was prevented he threatened to stab himself with a dagger. His identity was not disclosed and on the intercession of his physician he was not taken to the city jail.

An accident occurred on the west side of the Hot Spring lake, Sunday morning, by which Brigham Langton, a young man seventeen years of age, may lose a limb. He was out on a shooting trip in company with a friend, and while near the copper plant Langton drew his gun toward him by the muzzle end, and it went off. It was a careless act, and resulted in a great hole in his leg. The young man was taken to his home in the northwestern part of the city and is being attended by Dr. Beer. It is doubtful if the leg can be saved.

At the regular meeting of the Fifteenth quorum of Elders of the Salt Lake Stake of Zion, held at Draperville last Sunday, April 1st, the presidency of the quorum was reorganized with the following named brethren as officers: Thomas H. Lloyd, president, and Charles B. Stewart and Soren Rasmussen, counselors. The members of this quorum comprise the Elders residing at Draper and Sandy.

Elders Angus M. Cannon and Charles W. Penrose, of the Stake presidency, met with the quorum and attended to the reorganization, after which they made remarks appropriate to the occasion.

Governor West is in receipt of the following self-explanatory communication:

Special Order No. 77.
Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant General's Office, Washington, March 31, 1894.

By direction of the acting secretary of war, First Lieutenant William Lassiter, of the Sixteenth infantry, will proceed to Salt Lake City, Utah Territory, and report in person to the Governor of the Territory of Utah for temporary duty pertaining to the militia of the Territory. The travel enjoined is necessary for the public service.

By command of Major General Schofield.

By GEORGE D. RUGGLES, Adjutant General.

C. CORBIN, Assistant Adjutant General.

Word comes from Frisco, Utah, that the splendid concentrating plant and hoisting works at that place were completely destroyed by fire on Wednesday night. It is supposed that the fire was the work of an incendiary. The loss is estimated at $90,000 and no insurance was carried. During the progress of the conflagration the timbering of the main shaft was ignited and burned down to a depth at present unknown. The mine is filled with smoke and a interior investigation is well nigh impossible at this time. Two miners narrowly escaped with their lives. All of the men were hoisted from the mine but six, and they were obliged to scale the ladders from the 700 feet level through the air shaft. About 180 men are thrown out of employment by the fire.

During the heavy windstorm last Saturday Mr. Louis Anderson, of Union, this county, met with a serious loss. About 2 p. m. Mr. Anderson, who was near the barn discovered smoke issuing from the roof of his house, hastened back and told his wife what had happened. She seemed seized for the moment. Then grasped their child in her arms and made for the door, when the roof—which by this time was all ablaze—fell in. The fire must have been burning under the tim of the roof for some time, as when Mr. Anderson got up to it with some water it was all on fire. There was only one person near at hand to render any assistance, and when help finally arrived, the dwelling which was a frame, was burned to the ground. A sewing machine, bedstead and bedding was all that was saved. The loss is between $400 and $500. No insurance.

Ed Underwood, a young man of Salem who is herding sheep for John Dixon, was very much surprised last Friday evening when he approached his camp, to see his dog emerge from the tent with a huge mountain lioness after him. The lioness soon gave up chasing the dog and leisurely walked up the mountain side, while young Underwood hastened over to the camp of Eugene Winn, a young man of this city, who seized his rifle and hastened over to Underwood's camp. The lioness was soon discovered sitting on a rock a short distance up the side of the mountain. Young Winn fired a shot at the animal, severely wounding it. He approached within a few feet of the wounded beast and fired two shots into her which laid the intruder out. It was killed over by Goehen gap, near the R. G. W. railway, only a few miles from this city.—Globe.

Tuesday the NEWS received a call from Elders Theodore D. Alder, of Preston, and Heber C. Loveland, of Chesterfield, Idaho. They left here March 9, 1892, and returned yesterday, April 9. Both labored in the South Alabama conference. Brother Alder's field was mostly in south Alabama, though a portion of the time was spent in Florida. He was generally well treated by the people, and only on one or two occasions was serious violence threatened, and then no injury was done. On one occasion armed men escorted him out of the town of Pine Level, Montgomery county, Alabama. Elder Alder speaks highly of the hospitality of the people as a rule, as does also Elder Loveland. The latter labored in Florida—his field being in one of the hottest sections of the United States. He succeeded very well in his missionary work, and is thankful for the experience he has gained in proclaiming the Gospel. Both Elders enjoyed fair health during their missions.

PAHREAH, March 29, 1894.—A sad and fatal accident occurred here on the 27th of this month to Cyrus Mangum Jr., in the following manner: Deceased was working on a water ditch with his father and others when a portion of the bank and a large rock fell on and killed him instantly. He left home after noon and was brought home about 5 p. m. a corpse.

Deceased was a son of Cyrus Mangum and Unity Alexander Mangum. His age was 14 years, 10 months and 17 days. He was a bright, intelligent boy and a great help and comfort to his parents. He will be sadly missed by his grief-stricken parents, sisters, brothers, relatives and schoolmates and by every person in our little settlement. At his burial the children formed in procession, under the guidance of our school teacher, and marched to the cemetery. Deceased has many relatives in Utah and Arizona who will be griefstricken to learn of his sudden death.

A News representative Saturday afternoon was shown a piece of copper capping that had just been removed from the right eye of Mr. Charles Simpkins, of Wells, Nevada, a young man about 19 years of age who met with a serious accident at that place about two weeks ago and who for a time suffered intensely.

Being unable to secure proper treatment at home he came to Salt Lake for that purpose and was operated upon by Doctors M. A. Hughes and Theodore Meyer, who found it necessary to remove the injured organ, the sight of which was completely destroyed and which was beginning to have a bad effect on the left eye.

The operation was entirely successful and the patient was resting as comfortably this afternoon as could be expected under the circumstances.

It appears that Simpkins, when the accident occurred, was testing a dynamite cap over a lighted candle, when an explosion followed. A fragment of the cartridge struck the inner angle of the eye and deeply imbedded itself. As a result enucleation had to be resorted to.

There was a serious accident in the southwestern part of the city Thursday afternoon. The victim was the daughter of E. Smithin, an employe of the Union Pacific machine shops, who resides near the corner of Sixth South and Eighth West streets. The child, who was eight years old, was playing in the street with a number of youthful companions about a bonfire some distance from home. It appears that she stepped too close to the flames and her clothes were ignited. The flames shot upward and were fanned into a big blaze as the unfortunate little girl started for home. On her arrival there an older sister seized hold of her and immersed her in a tub of water which was conveniently located. Dr. Bascom was summoned and he now has charge of the case. The child was very badly burned about the hips, and next day died from her injuries at the family residence at No. 150 Post street. The case is a very sad one and great sympathy is extended to the grief stricken family who it seems have been subjected to a long strain of trying circumstances.

The first Territorial convention of Populists ever held in this Territory ended its labors at Clift's hall on Market street in this city April 6. A considerable amount of business was transacted and letters from Governor Walte, of Colorado, Governor Llewelling, of Kansas, Lafe Pence and Thomas Patterson were read expressing regrets that they were unable to attend.

The following resolutions were unanimously passed:

Resolved; That this convention adopt and ratify the Omaha platform of the People's party.

Resolved, That the People's party of Utah favor the admission of all Territories into the union of statehood.

Resolved, That we favor the right of suffrage regardless of sex.

Resolved, That we proceed at once to effect a permanent central Territorial organization of the People's party in this Territory.

Resolved, That the Populists of the various counties are urgently invited to at once organize clubs and affiliate with the central organization of the Territory.

Resolved, That all Populists of the Territory pledge themselves as a committee on propaganda and prepare immediately for active campaign work and for organized participation in the coming Territorial election.

ALMY, Wyoming, April 5, 1894.—In looking over the columns of the last issue of the News-Register we saw an article on the fire at Almy, about the U. P. company's store being burned down. In said article it was stated that the general belief was that the fire was of incendiary origin. The above statement we positively deny. We have talked to two-thirds of the men of Almy, and without any exception they claim that the statement is misleading and has a tendency to prejudice the minds of the public against the people of Almy; and we further believe that the company should make a thorough investigation of the cause of the fire and if possible have the guilty parties if any brought to justice, and not have the shadow of such charges hanging over the head of a community of law-abiding citizens.

When No. 7 mine caught fire it was saddled on to the citizens of Almy and the company utterly failed to make an investigation or to substantiate their charges.

We now earnestly request that the company or its officials make a thorough investigation of the case to the end that the community may be vindicated and to further said investigation we will render all the assistance we possibly can.

The following special to the NEWS, from Jacob's Pool, in Arizona, just over the Utah line, was forwarded by messenger to Kanab, and from there to this city:

JACOB'S POOL, March 27, 1894.

We arrived here this morning at 10 o'clock. While watering our horses at the tanks, William Rothwell who stays here, called to us and said, "Come up to the house," but before we had time he came down to our wagons and we saw a wound in his face that he said he would like us to examine immediately. He then returned to the cabin. After watering our horses, we went up and on examining found that his right cheek, from eye to ear, was literally torn away as if done by a gunshot. Then just below the eye, entering the right side of the nose, and apparently penetrating into the center of his head and ranging down to the back of his neck, was another hole, as if made by a small pistol shot.

The old man said it happened last night when he was asleep, and that he heard nothing or knew nothing of what had happened till he awoke and found himself bleeding.

The sight is a ghastly one. We can see into the hole nearly two inches. The temple bone and cheek are entirely cut in two and lap down towards the neck.

We will send a message to Kanab and have something done to have the old man taken and doctored.

The funeral services over the remains of the late Elder Jesse W. Fox were held in the Salt Lake Assembly Hall Wednesday afternoon, commencing at 1 o'clock. There was a large attendance. The stands were draped in white and appropriately decorated with flowers. The opening prayer was offered by Elder John W. Hess, president of Davis Stake, Elders F. Kesler, Theodore McKean, Geo. H. Taylor, Francis M. Lyman, John R. Winder, Lorenz Snow, Angus M. Cannon, Brigham Young and Franklin D. Richards made brief remarks relative to the integrity of the deceased and his steadfastness in the cause of right through a long and useful life.

President George Q. Cannon spoke on the hopes of the saints for the future, the knowledge they had of the life to come, and the condition in the paradise of God of men of such faithfulness as Elder Fox. He also bore testimony to the atonement of Christ and the resurrection of the body.

President Woodruff followed with remarks of consolation and comfort, and testifying to the virtues of the deceased.

The services were closed by prayer by Elder Joseph Horne, and the assemblage were permitted to view the remains.

The procession, which began to move at 8:30 o'clock, was headed by two large carriages containing the High Council who acted as pall-bearers, followed by the hearse containing the casket, and this being followed by carriages containing the family and friends of the deceased veteran. The cortege comprised in all thirty-four vehicles.

The recent farmers' institute at Bozeman, Mont., has given quite an impetus to the discussion of agricultural topics in that state.

The farmers along the San Pedro river in Cochise county, Ariz., have purchased a boring outfit and will commence to sink for artesian water.

David Franks, of San Luis Obispo, Cal., is suffering from glanders. He contracted the malady from a horse afflicted with the disease. He will die.

A 17½ pound trout, said to have been the largest fish ever caught in the Truckee river, was hauled out of that stream by a lucky angler near Reno, Nev., the other day.

John Phippe, of Flounce Rock, Or., was drowned in Rogue river, Saturday. He had started in a canoe to cross the river. It was overturned and he was swept away by the rapid current.

The number of business houses now completed and under course of construction in Victor, Colo., it is said, will not reach less than 100. At the present rate of building, there will be double the number within the next sixty days.

ON A LOCOMOTIVE.

TWO thousand miles through the snow! A ride through vast white plains which glitter under the sun like the ice fields of Lieutenant Peary's Greenland tour! Hauled by the iron horse through hundreds of miles of silvery hills and rolling plains! Dragged up and down the ragged passes of gorgeous white mountain ranges, the heads of some of which are capped with vast blue glaciers, and the faces of which are rough with a beard of frosty pines! During the past four days I have traveled from Minneapolis to Vancouver over the new line, known as the Soo-Pacific, the last great arm to reach out from the Mississippi to grasp the riches of the great northwest. It has now been in operation only a few weeks and it opens up some new and interesting country. Leaving Minneapolis, it cuts across Minnesota, ploughs its way through some of the richest of the undeveloped lands of North Dakota, and enters the Canadian boundary in the province of Assiniboia, joining the Canadian Pacific at Portal about 500 miles west of Winnipeg, and thence onward without a change of cars to Vancouver. It runs through a new country, and it will throw open to settlement, I am told, millions of acres of good government land. The biggest town in the United States on the western part of the road is Minot, which has about 2,000 population. Tributary to this there are about 2,000,000 acres of government land already surveyed, and in the Moose River valley and the De Lae valley the road runs for 100 miles through some of the richest farming lands of the country, none of which have as yet been touched by the plough. The British provinces have vast areas of good farming and grazing lands, and there is here in this northwest a great world which awaits the advent of muscle and brains to make it produce enough to feed the nations.

We people of the United States have but little idea of the vast extent of Canada and her provinces. Did she belong to the United States we would have long before this have built an empire upon her territory, and her property would be worth billions where it is now worth thousands of dollars. Look at her agricultural area. From north to south for a distance of 1,600 miles the cereals can be cultivated, a distance about as far apart as Rome is from St. Petersburg. The Province of Ontario is as wide, taking its northernmost and southernmost points, as Cleveland, Ohio, is distant from Mobile, Ala., and Canada can grow anything that we can, with the exception of rice, cotton and tobacco. Ontario grows more corn to the acre than any of our states, except Missouri, and the wheat fields of the dominion are among the best of the world. The Manitoba wheat is noted in the markets of Europe, and it is said good wheat can be grown as far north as the Mackenzie river basin. Along the Canadian Pacific road I passed a number of big farms, and there is one great agricultural stock company which runs its farms on a big scale and has about a dozen farms of ten thousand acres each. This company engages in wheat raising, as well as stock and sheep farming, and aims to keep about 4,000 acres under cultivation at each of its ranches. It manages everything on scientific principles and is, I am told, doing well.

This is not the case, however, with many Canadian farmers. There is a disaffected class here, as there is in the United States, and the cry of hard times is often heard. Many young fellows have come out from England to pick the dollars out of the soil with kid gloves, who are now going about bare-handed and red-nosed, with patches on the seats of their pantaloons. Some of them are the good for nothing second sons of old families, who came here and bought land, thinking it would farm itself, and others were sent out by their rich fathers to learn farming. A few years ago a number of sharp Canadians made a business of going to England and bringing back young Englishmen for agricultural tuition. They would get from $500 to $1,000 per year for bringing the young men here and having them work on their ranches learning practical farming. The young men when they arrived were allowed to do much as they pleased, and between doing a little work at long intervals and smoking and hunting and drinking, they passed the time till they could persuade their fathers to buy ranches for them. A number of such men, and younger sons, are in the dominion today. They are facetiously termed remittance men, because they depend on remittances from home to keep them going. Numbers of good stories are told here of how they keep up appearances and of their excuses and arguments which they send home to extract more money. The latest is regarding a British Columbia good-for-nothing, who had bled his father until the old gentleman had written from England positively declining to send any more money. This state continued up until six weeks ago, when the boy wrote home an enthusiastic letter about his ranch and his prospects. Among other things he told his father that he had now a stock of seven hundred blooded gophers on his place, and if he had $500 to keep them in good condition he would come out all right. The name of gopher, ground squirrel, was a new one to the old man and he sent the money. He evidently thinks his boy's stock a fine variety of sheep or cattle.

Speaking of sheep, I find that the profits are fast being knocked out of sheep farming. Australia mutton is being frozen and sent by the shiploads to the London markets and several cargoes have been shipped to Vancouver and sold at less than the cost of the handling in order to introduce the meat. In the stores here I see canned Australian mutton for sale at seven pounds for a dollar, and the sheep growers of Montana, North Dakota and Canada are losing money. I traveled here with a Manitoba stock man, who told me that he had 3,800 sheep last year, but that he had sold all but 1,100, and he said he intended to sell them in the spring and get out of the business. "There is no money in it now," he said. "I refused $3.50 a head for sheep a year ago, which I would now be glad to sell for $1.25. I have gotten numerous letters from sheep men in Montana wanting to sell out to me, and there are great numbers of Montana sheep growers who want to come to Canada for work. I got seven such letters in my yesterday's mail. Sheep are worth practically nothing in Montana. I know of one firm there who owned two years ago about 15,000 sheep. They feared that they would be crowded out and they wanted to buy some land. They borrowed $40,000 on their sheep and bought a large tract of land, giving a mortgage on the sheep and the land. The hard times of last fall came. Their sheep fell in value and they could not see their way out. They went to the bank and offered to give up their sheep and the land if they could be cleared of the debt. The bankers would not accept their offer. They tried to sell out. They could not get a buyer. The result was they left and the sheep brought only $1.35 a head and they still owe more than $20,000."

Some of the grandest scenery of this world is seen at its best under a covering of snow. The Canadian Pacific railway runs for about a thousand miles through some of the most beautiful parts of the Rocky mountains and the Selkirk range. During the summer the sides of these mountains are covered with a dense growth of green, though the tops are capped with snow and ice. There is no vast desert of cactus and sage brush, such as you find on the other trans-Pacific roads, and the picturesqueness and grandeur of the Rockies are seen at their softest and best. I have seen them, however, under different aspects, and one of the remarkable experiences of my life was a ride which I took this week on one of the engines of the Canadian Pacific railroad down the wildest and roughest parts of the Rocky mountains. Seated in the cab of the engine near the grimy fireman, who was shoveling bushels of coal into the furnaces, and on the other side of the boiler from the stern-faced engineer, I rode for miles and miles—it seemed almost an eternity to me—through vast snow-walled gorges, under massive overhanging rocks, in an out of tunnels and snow sheds, now hanging above a raging river and now shooting about curves into other cañons equally as grand. The cab of the engine was walled with glass, and I could see as well as though I had been riding on the iron snowplow fastened to its front in place of a cowcatcher. The great iron horse throbbed like a thing of life. It puffed out vast quantities of smoke in two spiral columns, and as we neared one of the little mountain stations it cut the cold air with a steam shriek which made me think that all the souls in hades were loose in the Rockies and the pent-up agony of the damned was concentrated in the escaping steam of that engine. After riding a while, however, one's nervousness goes off. You see the care of the engineer, the parties of watchmen stationed at almost every mile of track, the frequent snow sheds' where the danger is the greatest, and you can then note the wonders of nature about you. The scene changes at every turn of the great wheels of the locomotive. Now the mountains on both sides of the track rise almost straight upward in a snowy wall for hundreds upon hundreds—it seemed to me for thousands—of feet, shutting out the sun, and their tops kissing the pure sky. Now you shoot out into the open, and there is a long vista of ragged hills, which rise one above the other till they fade away into the glacier peaks of the horizon. Here a great river of blue ice runs for miles along the track, and you know you are almost at the head-waters of the Columbia, which goes on its course down through Washington and Oregon and empties into the Pacific. Further back you saw the Saskatchewan river flowing toward Winnipeg and Hudson bay, and a few miles further you will find the rocky, blue Frazer plowing its way through great gorges and over the golden sands which so excited the gold hunters in the days of early California, and which, by the use of modern dredging machinery, I am told, bid fair to excite them again. On through these waters into scenery which almost takes away your breath. You think of the Texas cowboy who made his pile and awoke one morning amid the finest of the mountains of Switzerland. His life had been spent on the plains, and the grandeur filled his soul till he could contain himself no longer, and he threw up his hat and yelled, not irreverently, but honestly, these words, "Hurrah for God!"

Now you see Mount Stephen rising 8,000 feet above you, and holding on its top, just over your head, a glacier of green ice 500 feet in thickness. Now you pass Sir Donald, another vast mountain, whose naked, rocky peak, as I went by it, had cast a great shadow on the sky, a thing I have never seen before in any mountain range or anywhere. Then on under more glaciers, through mighty hills which have beards of gray, thin pines, each containing enough Christmas trees to supply the world, on into ravines the rocky walls of which you could almost touch from the engine window, and out into other gorges, the walls of rock, which are made of stone piled one upon the other by nature's giant hands, till the height of the tower of Babel is surpassed and they seem to reach to heaven itself.

The scene changes at every turn, and the wonders of engineering in building a great road over the Rockies amaze you. This road was completed in about five years. It made something like eight million dollars of profit, I am told, two years ago, and it is one of the few railroads in America which are paying to-day. Its service is good, and the intention is to double the number of trains on the mountain division next year. You note the difference between it and one of our roads the moment you enter the cars. The accent of the employes is English, and every official is either a Canadian or an Englishman. Even the negro porter of the sleeper was of Canadian birth, and the dining car conductor, who wore brass buttons and looked like Henry Irving, the actor, said "don't you know," and really paid some attention to seeing that the passengers were served.

Speaking of Frazer river and its gold deposits, this was, you remember, one of the riches placer rivers of the world along late in the fifties, and something like fifty million dollars' worth of gold has been washed out of the sands of British Columbia. The stream is very rough and rocky, however, and much of it has been inaccessible to the placer miners. It is known, however, to contain great quantities of gold, and four different American companies are now at work here trying to get this gold out. They have had dredge-like pumps made, which are to suck up the gold-bearing sand and throw it into a sluice box, which will extract the gold. The experiment is a new one, but it was tested only a day or so ago in the shallow water at the edge of the river, and some gold was the result. I talked last night with the president of one of these companies—a Mr. Young—who comes, I think, from Minneapolis. Said he: "There is no doubt but there are millions upon millions of dollars of gold in these rivers, and I think there is no doubt but that we are going to get out a large part of it. We lease certain strips of the river from the government at so much per mile per year. We now have under lease fifty-seven miles, and we have men prospecting and locating other tracts. Our machines cost us from four to seven thousand dollars apiece, and I expect to see some of them earning a thousand dollars a day. In a month from now I can tell just what they will do. Each machine ought to wash and reduce one hundred cubic yards of gravel a day, and we can get out stuff from the very center of the river, where the most gold is supposed to be. In the old days of placer mining a man did well to wash out three cubic yards a day, and here he had to rely upon the banks only."

"What will be the result if you succeed as you expect?"

"It will make this whole country boom. I don't think there is a doubt of our success, and I expect to see a great deal of placer mining done in this way in the future. It is only applying to mining the machinery that has been used for years in dredging. If we succeed it will bring millions of capital to Vancouver, and will make times good again."

"How are the times here now?"

"They are hard here, and all over the world. The only place I know where they are at all good is in South Africa, and you would be surprised to know what an emigration is taking place to that country. Within the past few months at least 100 have sailed from here alone, and others are going. They expect to make fortunes in the new gold mines there. As for me, I would rather stay here."

Referring to the hard times, I met with a curious evidence of them on my way over the Canadian Pacific. At several of the stations I noted great piles of buffalo bones which had been gathered upon the plains and had been brought to the station for sale. For some time there has been a great demand for these bones from parts of the United States. They are exported and are bought at so much per car load, the usual price being $100 per car of seven tons. Since the panic, however, the Americans have had no money to pay for them, and the skeletons and odd bones lie bleaching in the snow waiting for the financial skies to brighten.

There are about 3000 Chinamen in this town of 20,000 people. Victoria, which is about as large as Vancouver, has a like number, and it is from here that many Chinese are smuggled into the United States. There are numerous trails over the border, and many are taken in by sea. We have no good protection of our northern boundaries, and I am told that quantities of opium as well as numbers of Chinamen are taken in every month. The opium is prepared at Victoria, it is said, and smuggled in. It takes only a small package to hold a pound, and each pound thus brought in escapes a duty of $12. Ten pounds can easily be hidden, and a hundred or so pounds can be carried in a canoe. The hundred pounds would bring a profit of $1200, so you see there is money in the business. I doubt not that Uncle Sam loses hundreds of thousands of dollars in this way every year, and the only prevention would seem to be for him to swallow up Canada or to establish a more efficient line of custom detectives along the frontier. As it is the Canadians protect their border better than we do. At every station I saw their mounted police, and they have a very fine organization to watch over their interests and to keep order along the border.

THE INDUSTRIAL ARMY.

The "General" Kelly contingent of the Cuxey commonwealth army, 1250 strong are in the city of Ogden and are now subjects of Territorial charity.

In anticipation of their arrival Commander-in-Chief West, General Ottinger and Surgeon General Fowler, with two companies of the National Guard of Utah, (the Norden and Military companies) went up to Ogden on the 7 o'clock train Sunday morning taking with them a gatling gun and the necessary paraphernalia and equipment for a regular siege. Arriving at Ogden they were augmented by the first cavalry company stationed at that place and also by a large number of special police in addition to the regular force.

Something had to be done that was clearly evident and the Governor and Mayors Baskin and Brough decided to appeal to the court to issue an injunction prohibiting the Southern Pacific from allowing the army to cross the state line or to make Ogden the dumping ground.

The case was heard by Judge Miner who issued the order prayed for and in a very short time and early in the afternoon the papers were served, but Division Superintendent Knapp stated that the men were coming and that he was powerless to stop them.

When it was ascertained that the army was coming despite the efforts to prevent their arrival a strip of country adjoining the S. P. tracks near the stock yards, about three quarters of a mile from the central part of the city was set apart for them and here it was decided to keep them under guard until a fur her settlement was arrived at.

The train pulled in at the depot at 6:30 in the presence of probably three or four thousand people. The north, south and east sides were surrounded by the Utah National Guards and Salt Lake and Ogden policemen, and escape was made impossible on the west by the Weber river. The train consisted of twenty-six cars, and on board huddled together like sheep were 1,250 men of at least a dozen different nationalities. They were very much dismayed on seeing the troops drawn up in impregnable lines though they said but little as they had been cautioned by their leaders to maintain order and this they did fairly well. A little later they were permitted to partake of a car load of provisions that had been sent out to them by the Ogden authorities.

Many of the men were well nigh frozen as they were as a rule very thinly clad, and had had, they claimed, but very little to eat for the last two or three days. Superintendents Bancroft and Welby sent down a car load of coal and a couple of car loads of ties and in a short time there were great fires blazing on either side of the train around which hundreds of shivering forms soon sought warmth and comfort.

There was a sad and fatal accident to one of the members of the army about 5 o'clock Sunday afternoon at the Balfour switch, 26 miles out of Ogden. The name of the hapless victim was J. Holmquist. He was about 35 years of age and said to be a waiter by occupation. It is claimed that he was raised somewhere in the East and that he was making his way back after a visit to the Midwinter Fair. His comrades state that he had a wife and two children.

OGDEN, April 10th, 8 a.m.—The hearing before Chief Justice Merritt and Associate Justice Miner, on the Southern Pacific to show cause why the injunction prohibiting the company from unloading or allowing the industrial army to remain in Ogden or Utah Territory, came up at 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon. The courtroom was packed with Salt Lake and Ogden attorneys, officials and citizens interested in the outcome of the case. It was the main topic of conversation for the time being, and was discussed vigorously on every hand.

"Colonel" Baker, who has command of the army, was the first witness, and told practically the same story as he related to Governor West and Mayor Brough on Sunday night and chronicled in last evening's News concerning the march and purposes of his men.

Chief of Police Pratt of Salt Lake, Governor West, Superintendents Bancroft and Welby of the Union Pacific and Rio Grand Western respectively, were put on the stand and examined in the order named.

G. M. Kimball, an ex-clerk of the Ogden city attorney, testified that he recognized among the army men who had been convicted of vagrancy and petty offenses in the Junction city and that they had served terms of imprisonment.

Superintendent Knapp, of the Southern Pacific, was the next and last witness, who, with a few supplemental statements, related the story he gave to the News yesterday morning and published last evening.

The court then adjourned until 7 o'clock, at which time elaborate and vigorous arguments were made by Attorney James N. Kimball for the plaintiffs and Thomas Marshall for the defense. Mayor Baskin, of Salt Lake, closed the arguments and shortly before 10 o'clock last night the following order was made by the court:

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the said defendants, their agents, servants or employees and each of them, are hereby enjoined and restrained from keeping or allowing that certain body of men recently brought by said defendants unlawfully into said Territory and commonly known as the industrial army, or any of them from being in any place except in the twenty-seven box cars belonging to said defendant company, and in which said men were brought to said Territory; and also from keeping any of said men or said army, in said box cars any longer than is absolutely necessary to take said men and said cars out of said Territory.

The order being made, a writ of injunction was signed and sixty deputy marshals immediately sworn in, who were placed on guard at 12 o'clock midnight and relieved by Sheriff Belnap with forty deputies at 6 a. m.

Several of the men yesterday succeeded in passing the picket line unobserved along the banks, willows and underbrush of the Weber, and making their way beyond the city limits. A farmer met a squad of them headed for Salt Lake. The matter was reported to Captain Gilbert, who immediately sent a detachment of cavalry after them and conveyed them back. They were unwilling to be captured and yielded in an ugly mood.

Last midnight Governor West, Secretary Richards, Hon. F. S. Richards, Chief Pratt and a representative of the News went down to the campground, which was illuminated with blazing bon fires until it could be seen a great distance away. The men were scattered over a large area and were found in almost every conceivable condition, huddled about on the ground, some asleep, others washing their clothes, the parts of the bodies from which they were taken being entirely exposed to the cold night air, others were smoking and conversing in a low tone while not a few were reading the Salt Lake and Ogden evening papers, either quietly or aloud to their friends.

OGDEN, Utah, April 10, 11 a.m.—All was anxious expectation among the great army of unemployed at Ogden this morning. Long before daylight scores of the industrials were busy preparing breakfast. The arrival of "General" Kelly, the patron saint, presiding genius and general director, had patiently been awaited the last twenty-four hours and when that gentleman came in on the 5:40 train, he was greeted with a burst of applause and enthusiasm, as though he were a veritable Napoleon.

In a short time Kelly was in private consultation with "Colonel" Baker and staff. Just exactly what they did beyond considering the condition in which the army was now placed and discussing the ways and means calculated to extricate them and bring about a satisfactory solution of the problem, was not known. The men, who were dejected, gloomy and despondent, brightened up immensely after "General" Kelly's arrival and were sanguine as to the result, believing confidently that their leader would baffle the authorities and come off triumphant. Kelly is anything but prepossessing or powerful in appearance, though he is said to be very deceiving in this respect. He is spare in form, of dark complexion, with a brown mustache and does not appear to be more than 33 years of age.

At 10:30 this morning General Kelly had an interview with Governor West at Mayor Brough's office. Kelly insisted on the exclusion of newspaper men and carried his point.

Kelly on his arrival at the depot this morning, made the positive and unqualified statement to Superintendents Knapp and Welby that Governor Walte had sent him an official communication, announcing that the army would be gladly received and provided for at Denver, and that arrangements for transportation east of that point to Washington would be made in short order. It was at first believed that this statement was simply made as an inducement for the Rio Grande Western or the Union Pacific, but General Kelly disclaimed all such intentions and said that he was truthful and serious in his assertion.

OGDEN, U. T., April 10, 12:30. p. m.—During his interview with the Governor, Kelly reiterated his statement that Governor Walte, of Colorado, had extended an invitation and promised a warm welcome to the army on its arrival there.

Kelly was informed by Governor West that he must take his men back. The former begged to be allowed to continue the journey, but he was informed that the railways would not transport them; that the people of Wyoming were aroused and did not want them, and finally that all appeals to go east would be without avail.

Kelly then asked for time to present the situation to his men, saying he was only their executive and would submit to their wishes, but he was certain they would not retrace their steps.

Next came an interview between Governor West and Superintendent Knapp.

The colloquy was a very stormy and warm one, and during which Knapp said "I cannot take the men back unless their full fare of $35 each is paid."

Governor West replied in stentorian tones: "I serve notice on you now that you must provide for the support of these unfortunate people whom you have foisted on this Territory; some of them are now dying and it is inhuman to allow them to freeze to death. The people want none of your kind of magnanimity, the quality of which is exhibited by your dumping paupers upon us for the insignificant sum of $600, made more shameful by the exorbitant demand of $40,000 to take them away."

To this Knapp replied, as he showed pronounced signs of weakening: "The men don't want to go back, and we cannot put them on the cars; besides, should we be successful in this, they would destroy our property."

"Leave that to me," quickly rejoined the Governor. "We are fully prepared to put every man into the cars under lock and key and will guard your property and interests."

This was at 11:35, and Knapp asked for an hour's time to communicate with General Fillmore at San Francisco. The request was granted, and thirty minutes later preparations began to send the men out this afternoon, and at 12 o'clock it appeared to be simply a question as to who would operate the train, the employees of the Southern Pacific or the Territorial officers.

OGDEN, 12:40 p. m.—The death knell was sounded again in the camp of the industrials last night. The soldier who answered the final bugle call this time was D. Abbott, a member of company M, first regiment. He was a man of large stature and immense strength, and was about 50 years of age. Last night he went to sleep in the best of health, apparently, and was in a very cheerful mood and chatted pleasantly with his comrades. This morning his dead body was found on the ground. It was placed in a car where the dead man was later identified by U. S. Marshal Brigham as a convict at the Utah penitentiary up to three months ago, and who after his release went to the Milwaukee Fair, and joined the army at San Francisco on April 4.

Abbott was arrested for grand larceny committed at Spanish Fork last year. He had a son-in-law captured with him in Utah county. The latter escaped from Provo City jail, but Abbott was sent to the penitentiary. The coroner took charge of the remains, and will hold an inquest this afternoon.

12:55 p. m.—Shortly after noon, Mayor Brough ordered additional provisions, amounting to nearly another car load, which would go the army until considerably after passing the Utah and Nevada state line. He said he believed the men would not seriously resist going back should an attempt be made to put them on board the cars this afternoon. Others think differently and are of the opinion that a clash will occur and there is a good deal of excitement.

Another member of the army, in the person of Thomas Henderson, a recruit from Sacramento, was taken to the city hospital this afternoon with apparently a short lease on his present life. He is 30 years of age and single. Many other men in the army are very sick, and there is a good deal of suffering from exposure and lack of proper clothing and medical attendance.

OGDEN, Utah, April 10, 2:33 p. m.—General Kelly consulted with his men as he promised. A meeting was held and the crowd harangued by himself, Colonel Baker and others, after which the executive committee went into executive session and resolved that it should be the sense of the army that it should not submit to being returned to the coast. Later that matter was laid before the members and they decided to go east, ride if they could, walk if they must.

A deputation waited on Governor West and reported this decision, also showed him a copy of the following telegram received this afternoon from Governor Waite, Colorado:

"DENVER, April 10.

To General C. T. Kelly, Ogden: Any and all citizens of the United States have the right of passage through Colorado.

(Signed) DAVID H. WAITE."

Governor West cautioned them against their course; he said it was unwise. Baskin declared it meant going into the jaws of death.

The reply from the member of the deputation was that he would walk all the way to Washington on one meal a day.

West said they must go back on the S. P., and the message was borne to the camp of the army.

A response is being awaited.

The people are very apprehensive that something desperate might be done. They deplore the evil and expense of keeping the army, and almost resent the decision to send them back by force when their condition is fully considered. There is some delay in taking final action, though it is said the authorities show no signs of weakening.

Everything now seems suspended and the army is more hopeful of victory than ever.

CHEYENNE, Wyo., April 10.—If the western wing of the Cockey army comes here it will be taken to the stock yard where food will be provided by the city. An effort will be made to have the army move on within an hour after the arrival. Under no consideration will the city authorities allow the army to enter the city except while passing in the cars. Special policemen have been employed.

2:50 p. m.—It is now certain the army will not be removed tonight, as the Southern Pacific officials positively refuse all assistance, and up to a late hour this afternoon it was found impossible to secure railway men to run the army train. It is openly said that the S. P. is doing all it can to defeat the action of Gov. West. The governor, though temporarily handicapped, declares he will not yield an inch of ground and that the delay will be brief.

Mayor Baskin goes down to Salt Lake on the evening train.

Many persons here regret the postponement of action, but prefer delay to bloodshed.

4 p. m.—At 4 o'clock this afternoon all sorts of rumors are afloat regarding the intended movement of the army tonight. It is now stated that many will desert the ranks after nightfall, considering that another canvass of the men made today shows that 350, or more than one-third of the army, have left since its arrival in Ogden. At that rate the problem is fast solving itself. Many of those who have broken file have quietly slipped out to the east on Union Pacific freight trains, and many of them are now doubtless being whirled across the plains of Wyoming.

In the meantime matters in Ogden are in statu quo.

BEE CONVENTION.

The Utah beekeepers' association held its semi-annual meeting on Wednesday, President Huntington in the chair. The following officers for the ensuing year were elected: E. L. Lovesy, president; H. Tauffer, vice president at large; J. C. Swanner, secretary and treasurer.

With a view to enlarge the usefulness of the association, the following vice presidents were elected:

Weber county—R. T. Rhee, of View.

Cache County—J. J. Bell, Logan. Davis County—Wm. Blood, Kayaville.

Tooele County—George Cramer, Tooele.

Salt Lake County—Daniel Jensen, Mill Creek, and Joshua Terry, Draper.

Utah County—O. B. Huntington, Springville, and H. L. Brooks, Lake Shore.

Juab County—H. C. L. Jorgenson, Levan.

Sanpete County—P. M. McArthur, Mt. Pleasant.

Sevier County—J. D. Whipple, Aurora.

Some very interesting remarks for the general benefit of the association were presented by the retiring president.

At the evening session the wintering question was discussed. The gist of opinions was that upward ventilation was absolutely necessary in successful wintering. A vast amount of valuable information was given as to the best method of wintering, and was greatly appreciated by those present.

Discussion was had on the effect of the new fruit law and resolutions were passed regarding spraying trees while in bloom.

Messrs. Lovesy, Swanner and J. S. Scott were appointed a committee to draft suggestions to the county courts not to allow trees to be sprayed, while in bloom, with any poisonous substance, as it is sure death to the bees and does the fruit no good, the proper time to spray being when the blossoms have fallen or when the fruit has set.

It is desired wherever practicable to have the vice president organize local associations, thereby creating more general interest in the bee industry.

After some interesting remarks by the members on ants, yellow jackets, the best and easiest hive to handle, etc., the meeting adjourned for six months.

INDUSTRIES, COMMERCE AND MINES.

Monday evening's home industry meeting in the Assembly Hall attracted a good audience, though the attendance was not so large as desirable, doubtless owing to the many meetings that have been held of late and the fact that numbers of the country people hastened home after the close of Conference to attend to getting in their crops. The meeting, however, was a representative one, and those in attendance were highly pleased. The program was well arranged, and the proceedings were of a most gratifying nature. The excellent music furnished by the Tabernacle choir was thoroughly enjoyed.

John Henry Smith called the meeting to order, and on his motion B. F. Grant was selected as chairman. Mr. Smith explained that owing to the complications which had arisen at Ogden, Governor West could not be present at the meeting, his duty requiring him in the field in the emergency which existed at the Junction city. President George Q. Cannon also was unable to attend the meeting, owing to pressure of business and ill-health, and sent a note of regret. C. E. Wantland was chosen secretary of the meeting.

Chairman Grant opened the ball by a ringing speech in which he indicated the intention of the manufacturers' bureau to continue its good work, and gave interesting figures relating to Utah industries. He was followed by A. W. Ivins, who had not much acquaintance with local manufacturers, but was in sympathy therewith. G. F. Culmer came next, and urged the establishment of additional industries. Joseph Birch, a pioneer in home manufactures in southern Utah, then gave some of his experiences, imparting valuable lessons of energy and perseverance to his auditors.

Heber J. Grant, George L. Farrell, George Goodard and John Henry Smith addressed the meeting in the order named, giving instructive figures and facts relating to home production and importations. When these gentlemen concluded, the choir sang the Soldiers' Chorus and were given a vote of thanks for their services, and the meeting adjourned with the audience in the best of humor.

Judge F. A. Hammond, of San Juan county, is in town to attend Conference. He is in good spirits and full of praise for the San Juan country, which he thinks has a great future before it as a farming, fruit, growing, grazing and mining section. As to the mining interests, though some prospectors were disappointed in not finding gold at every point where they thought it should exist, the precious metal is being found there in considerable quantities. The product is expected to increase largely as the country is developed. The placer grounds below Bluff City give indisputable proof of their richness in the gold dust that is brought in by the miners to the Bluff stores to pay for their supplies.

A great many sheep are being driven into San Juan county and are occupying the ranges there to the exclusion of the herds of cattle which formerly roamed in that section. Judge Hammond says the cattle interests are being pressed so closely by the wool producers that the people are seriously contemplating going out of the cattle business and engaging in the sheep industry to keep even.

In regard to the Indian situation, the judge says the people of the county are highly elated over the information that their section is not to be made the dumping ground of the Colorado Utes, and are grateful to those whose energetic efforts brought about the result which has been attained. The settlers now feel safer in going on and making improvements.

The health of the people, says the judge, is good. The people are busy with the usual spring work, and in fruit raising and farming are doing their share of building up that country.

Reports have reached Sanpete of the usual wholesale slaughter of salmon, silver and mountain trout at Fish Lake, that most beautiful of Utah's natural pleasure resorts. It is a shame that such a practice is not stopped, and a wonder that the stock of fish has not been exhausted long ago. To those who have never visited the place, the stories of how easily the speckled jewels are caught, and how hundreds of dollars' worth are wasted every year seem almost incredible. It is a fact, nevertheless, that during the last fifteen years, hundreds of tons have been caught during the spawning season, and thousands of pounds been allowed to lie in heaps on the ground to rot. It is also true that the Indians have destroyed the most, for it used to be (and perhaps is yet) a practice with them to trap all they could, whether they had use for them or not, and pile them in heaps along the creeks, awaiting buyers. The writer remembers coming to the lake at one time, when no buyers had been there for two weeks, and seeing as many as five or six tons piled up along the Jorgensen and Outlet creeks, to say nothing of the waste around Twin creek, the chief fishing ground this time of the year. The impracticability of seining in Fish Lake has discouraged the few who have tried it. Explosives have not been used to any extent, for wherever they would be effective, simpler means can do as well, so the popular ways of fishing have been to trap in willow baskets, or club with the first handy pine or willow.

The small attendance at the Dairy men's convention held April 7 in the Wasatch building, at which all save one of the Utah creameries were represented, duly attested the infancy of this important industry and the necessity of vigorous steps being taken to increase the output, and advance the consumption, of home manufactured cheese and butter.

The fact, as stated, that 26,000 lbs of oleumargarine is sold monthly in this city alone is one that seems to incite the creamery men to earnest action; and as this is two or three times more than the whole production of butter manufactured by all of Utah's creameries combined, the field for more extended operations is prolific of great possibilities.

The afternoon session was devoted to listening to the report of the committee on constitution and by-laws, which, after being amended, was adopted. A permanent organization was also effected and the following officers elected: Seth C. Jones, president; H. J. Faust Jr. secretary, and J. M. Christensen, treasurer. The name of the association was decided upon as the Utah Dairymen's association. The convention adjourned sine die.

The board of regents of the University of Utah held a meeting Monday and Professor James E. Talmage was named for the honorable office of president of the University. The following committees were appointed: Chancellor, Robert Harkness; executive, Harkness, Thatcher, Hills, Donnellan and Cannon; building, Donnellan, Wilson and Daly; finance, Hills, Donnellan and Daly; advisory, Cannon, Pierce and Van Cott; deaf mutes, Harkness, Van Cott and Pierce; land commission, Harkness, Daly and Hills.

The Salt Lake Literary and Scientific association offered to establish a chair of geology and mineralogy at the University, and to loan the association library apparatus. The generous offer was accepted with thanks.

The changes made in the faculty are as follows: Dr. Talmage, in addition to his duties as president, has been elected to the chair of geology and mineralogy, vice Prof. Montgomery, who has tendered his resignation. Prof. Kingsbury was elected to his former position, that of professor of chemistry and physics. In view of the value of his past and present services to the University, the board created the office of vice president, and elected Prof. Kingsbury to the new position. Prof. Byron Cummings was elected to the chair of assistant professor in ancient languages, and will have charge of that department. The only other changes are the resignations of Prof. W. M. Aber, of the department of Latin and Greek, and Prof. J. P. White, instructor in physics and mathematics.

The Territorial board of medical examiners held a meeting at their rooms April 9th. There were present Dr. Allan P. Fowler, president; Dr. Dart, secretary; Drs. Richards, Carnahan, Graves and Allen. Licenses were issued to the following graduates: Drs. W. W. Betts and John J. Silver. Licenses were issued to non-graduates as follows: Dr. J. B. Cooper, of American Fork; Samuel Rudd, of Goshute; Mary A. Martin, Provo, and Fred A. Klay, Hooper.

The following women were allowed to practice obstetrics: Jane S. Redood, of Bountiful, and Isabella West, Salt Lake City. An application was received from a party licensed to practice obstetrics for a license as a non-graduate practitioner of medicine. The application was refused by the board on the ground that the party had never been known as a general practitioner of medicine.

The board adjourned subject to the call of the president.

D. H. Cannon, Esq., is up from St. George for conference, and reports affairs as prosperous down his way.

There is a greater breadth of crops being planted than ever before. In the field which is brought under water by the canal, about 1,700 acres of land will be cultivated this season additional to that of former years, and there will be a better supply of water for the whole. Some fifty miles of lateral ditches will be necessary for irrigating this tract.

The almond and apricot blossoms have dropped; peaches, pears, etc., are in full bloom, and field and garden crops are advancing. The season there opens early, so that if there was railway transportation, early vegetables could be supplied to this market from there instead of California.

A force of men began breaking ground April 10th for the macadamizing of State street for a mile and a half below Eighth South street, and the work is to be pushed with all the speed possible in order that the grading may be completed as soon as the broken rock to be used is delivered. Operations were begun yesterday in the quarries in Parley's canyon, and the rock will be supplied according to agreement. Another improvement, that will be appreciated by the country people, is the construction of a stone and brick culvert across Big Cottonwood creek on State street. The road will also be placed in proper condition for macadamizing should experiments about to be made prove successful.

Messrs. Bagley, George Swan and N. W. Lowman, of this city, left April 9 for the Salmon river country. The first named gentlemen own some good tree milling gold claims near Leesburg in Lemhi county. On one of the claims which they are developing the shaft is down ten feet and the vein is eleven feet wide. The ore run on an average $11 to the ton. This property is near the Golden Star, locally known as the Dago mine, which was sold for $17,000. The owners will continue the work of development rigorously. This part of the country has been more devoted to placer mining than to quartz, but the indications are that there is plenty of good rock in the neighborhood.

An important change in the business affairs of the Salt Lake Herald is to be made within the next few days. The transformation of the management has been in contemplation for some time but it was not until today that negotiations were closed.

In the change that takes place Richard W. Young, who has control of or rather who has secured an option on the purchase of a large block of stock, becomes general manager of the business and editorial departments with full and complete supervision of both. Mr. H. C. Brownlee, who has been the manager of the paper since the retirement of George E. Blair, will of course step down and out.

The course of study to be formulated for the public schools of the Territory is now in the hands of a committee appointed at a meeting of county superintendents held in this city April 9th. The committee is as follows: D. R. Allen, Salt Lake county; S. Oldham, Cache county; D. H. Christensen, Utah county; Moshah Hall, Weber county; Angus Vance, Box Elder county; D. O. Willey, Davis county; P. P. Christensen, Tooele county; John Foote and Peter Graves. The permanent organization resulted in the election of D. R. Allen as president and P. P. Christensen secretary. The committee will meet April 24 and report the results of its deliberations.

At the annual meeting of Z. C. M. I. stockholders Thursday afternoon, the report of the President—the twenty-fifth in the history of the institution—was read. It reviewed the past year's business and gave interesting information to the stockholders.

The sales of the institution for 1893 amounted to $2,343,089.97. The cash and merchandise on hand aggregate $933,197.64, or $464,000 more than the sum total of liabilities, exclusive of capital stock in reserve. There is owing to the institution $683,178.99.

The old wooden bridge which spanned Big Cottonwood creek for so many years on the State Road at Gordon's, is being torn down and the debris hauled away. A great amount of slag from the smelters is being conveyed to the banks of the stream and placed in position on either side in order that the new bridge erected there may have safe, solid and substantial footings.

Logan has a medium in the person of Bernard Holton, of San Jose, Cal. It is alleged that he can unerringly indicate the presence of mineral veins, tell their exact proportions and the value of the ore. He has located numerous claims in this vicinity for a company who have great faith in his occult divinations. Should their fond hopes be realized, we will have a big mining boom this summer, and millionaires will be quite common.

At a meeting of the stockholders of the Park City Heat and Power company last week there were represented 3,856 shares out of the 4,000 of stock. Everything was reported to be in good shape and working satisfactory. Henry Hewell, Barney Riley, J. H. Deming, Walter Scott and W. V. Rice were elected as directors for the ensuing year.—Park City Record.

E. H. Rollins & Co. purchased $3,000 bonds of school district No. 4 and $4,000 bonds of school district No. 25, both located in Brigham City, Box Elder county. The bonds are for twenty years and bear interest at the rate of six per cent per annum. They were purchased at par.

Deputy Marshal Roman Cannon arrived in the city Monday morning from Lewiston, Idaho, having in custody C. H. Cummings, wanted here on a charge of embezzling $1,700 at Beaver. Mr. Cannon's trip occupied nearly eight days, and he has been traveling day and night.

The directors of the Utah Sugar company held their meeting last evening and re-elected the old officers, as follows: Elias Morris, president; George Q. Cannon, vice president; H. G. Whitney, secretary and treasurer, and Thomas R. Cutler, general manager.

The question of purchasing the Horseshoe canal Sanpete is being seriously considered by water owners of Cottonwood creek. There is some talk, also, of Ephraim buying it, but it hasn't been brought up as official business in the council yet.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

UNIONTOWN, Pa., April 2.—The storm has broken and the scenes of 1891 are being repeated throughout the coke region tonight. The big coke strike, with all its attendant rioting and destruction of property, is now in full force. This morning the call of the Scottsdale convention was obeyed by more than half the works in the coke fields and it took 5,000 men from their work. The situation is now one of great peril.

The ranks of the strikers have been so reinforced that tonight the lowest estimates gives them 10,000 men. From the outset the strike has been turbulent, with a tendency to open defiance of the law. There was rioting in several quarters last night. It has grown steadily worse and today there were more serious outbreaks in this end of the field.

KANSAS CITY, April 3.—The American Protective Association and the Catholics came together in a bloody conflict at the polls today. More than 200 shots were exchanged between the combatants in less than that many seconds.

The riot which resulted so seriously was the climax of a series of smaller riots that took place at other points earlier in the day between the same opposing factions. This riot took place on the southwest boulevard, very close to police station No. 8, and those who took part in it had been heated to a fighting temper by reports that had been hourly arriving at the station of brawls at other polling places.

DENVER, Colo., April 3.—This was ladies' day at the town elections throughout the state, and flowers and smiles abounded. Pretty young women could be seen pinning violets or carnations on the coat lapels of big bearded men, with winning smiles that said, "You will vote my ticket, won't you?"

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M., April 3.—The hottest city election ever held here resulted in the election of the whole Republican ticket. Mismanagement of city affairs for two years by the Democrats caused their defeat.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 3.—A cablegram was addressed today by Acting-Secretary McAdoo to Admiral Benham, on board the San Francisco at San Lucia, West Indies, relieving him of further duty and permitting him to return to the United States, either from San Lucia direct or from Colon. He has seen his last naval service, for he will retire probably next Tuesday.

DENVER, April 2.—A special to the Times from Washington says the House committee on Indian affairs has decided not to move the Utes from the Colorado reservation. The substitute bill which is a compromise will be reported to the House but will not become law until the Utes agree to the provisions. It will provide for keeping them on the west end of the reservation, and giving them one township in New Mexico. They will be given a quarter of the present reservation.

ATLANTA, Ga., April 2.—Governor Northern this morning appointed Patrick Walsh, editor of the Augusta Chronicle, senator, to succeed Colquitt.

WASHINGTON, April 3.—The annual distribution of seeds from the agricultural department is practically completed. The amount distributed is 80 per cent greater than last year. Each Congressman received 3,000 more bags of seeds than in any previous year. The appropriation for the present fiscal year was $185,400.

NAUVOO, Ill., April 3.—The Nauvoo Fruit company has been compelled to destroy over 400,000 fruit trees that have been injured by the weather and insects. Fruit growers say, however, that the late blizzard did not kill all the buds and that a fair crop is expected.

PITTSBURG, Pa., April 4.—It is ascertained that Coxey and a large number of followers have decided on a trip through the Southern states as soon as the mission to Washington is fulfilled. This completed, the task of the reformers will be fulfilled and the army will disband.

DENVER, April 4.—The local contingent of Coxey's army is broken up. They had neither shoes, money nor food. Gen. Hamilton is thought to have deserted.

LONDON, April 4.—Nothing but the vigilance of the engineer prevented a fatal accident to the prince of Wales at Marseilles station. The prince stayed too long at the buffet and as the train started he clung to the railing of the saloon carriage. The station master saw the danger and signalled the engineer, who stopped the train. The prince arrived safely in Paris.

PARIS, April 4.—Another bomb explosion occurred here this evening near the Senate chamber about 9:20 o'clock. The bomb was placed in a flower-box on the window sill of a restaurant opposite the Senate chamber. It exploded with tremendous report and shattered all the windows of the restaurant, besides breaking the windows in a number of other buildings. M. Taillade, an artist, and a companion, were injured by the explosion.

OMAHA, April 5.—Judge Caldwell's decision in the U. P. wage schedule was rendered this morning. It is a complete victory for the employees.

After the decision was rendered the engineers adopted a resolution thanking Judge Caldwell for his firmness.

TORONTO, Ontario, April 5.—The Queen's Own, Toronto's pet regiment, held its first spring parade last night. Over a thousand toughs gathered at the doors of the new armory, near the Queen's park, and endeavored to block the entrances. A detachment of the regiment was ordered to clear a passage and a sharp but decisive fight followed in which several of the military and a good many more of the mob were wounded. The toughs threw bricks and stones and the soldiers whacked the toughs right and left with the butts of their rifles. A strong police force shortly appeared on the scene and the mob fled in disorder.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 5.—For a while last night it looked as if ex-priest Slattery and his wife would be the central figures of a battle of religious factions. Slattery was billed to lecture in Odd Fellows Hall on "Why priests do not wed." The hall was crowded and on the outside fully two thousand people gathered. Cries of "lynch him," "hang him," "kill him," went up. During the lecture Slattery received a note stating that a mob was waiting for him outside, but he said he was not afraid. When the lecture was over members of the A. P. A. formed a guard about the ex-priest's carriage. When the lecturer and his wife appeared they were hooted and jeered at. Guarded by the A. P. A. men they entered the carriage and were driven at a gallop through the crowd. The mob attempted to follow but were distanced.

WASHINGTON, April 5.—The President has granted pardon to Willie Lunn, sentenced in Nevada to ten years' imprisonment. The reason assigned is the failing health of the prisoner.

ROME, April 6.—One hundred and fifteen thousand Spanish pilgrims are in Rome, and the pope has decided that the services in connection with the beatifying of Juan de Avilla, Diego of Cadiz, and Diaz, are to be held in St. Peter's which has not been the scene of a similar ceremony since 1870. The pope on April 18th will give an audience to the pilgrims in the Basilica. A consistory for the recognizing of bishops for the creation of cardinals will be held June 18th. The public consistory at which the new cardinals will receive their hats will be held June 21st.

LONDON, April 5.—Private advices have been received from Samoa to the effect that seventeen chiefs have been summoned before Chief Justice Ide and were obliged to withdraw their complaints against the government. The chiefs, however, stuck to the protest against disarming the natives, which is strongly resented. The trial of Alipia and other chiefs of the Aana tribe ended February 2nd, the court pronouncing a sentence of two years' imprisonment at hard labor against Alipia and $50 to $100 fine against the other chiefs.

CHICAGO, April 6.—In a lecture tonight, Theodore Westmark, a young Swede, who made two explorations of the Kongo country in Central Africa under the auspices of King Leopold II, of Belgium, accused Henry M. Stanley of having lunched on human flesh to satisfy a morbid curiosity. He said that at Stanley Pool, in 1884, Stanley, curious to know how human flesh would taste, sent his servant Duala to procure a chunk of native material, but it proved tainted and Duala received a sound drubbing. A second trip after the flesh proved successful. It was fried in butter and served with pickles, but, despite these accompaniments, Stanley pronounced the flesh tasteless.

OAKLAND, Cal., April 6.—The city of Oakland has had many exciting events in its history, but never has anything occurred here to compare with the turmoil caused early this morning by a regiment of unemployed men which left San Francisco Wednesday to join Coxey's army in its march to Washington.

All night long every man, woman and child in Oakland was on the streets, the riot alarm was sounded, the governor was asked to call out the national guard, extra police and deputy sheriffs were sworn in and armed with rifles, and preparations made for fighting of the bloodiest kind, because 640 unemployed, desperate men refused to leave the city. Only a rash word, or an unlucky shot was required to precipitate a conflict which would have resulted in the extinction of this branch of the industrial army, for the men composing it were mostly unarmed, and could have made but feeble resistance to the officers and citizens. But the word was not uttered, nor the shot fired, for the army, overawed by force, consented to move on when it was seen that further resistance to the will of the citizens of Oakland was useless.

At 2 o'clock a general alarm was sounded by the fire bells and the citizens hastened to the city hall, where about one hundred of them were sworn in as deputy sheriffs and were armed. The fire department also responded and were armed with axe handles. Then the city's forces marched to the tabernacle where the industrialists were peacefully slumbering. They were rudely awakened and ordered to move out. The men refused and things looked ominous. Consultations were held on both sides.

Finally the police arrested leader Kelly and several of his men, and penned the rest of them up in a corner of the tabernacle. They still refused to move until their leader was returned to them and the police held another consultation. It was proposed to handle the army by force. Acting under Kelly's advice, however, the industrialists agreed to submit peacefully, and at 3:20 a.m. formed a line and, escorted by 200 armed police and citizens, marched to Sixteenth street station, where they entered the box cars, and shortly after 4 o'clock the train pulled out for Sacramento.

DENVER, April 6.—The sheep situation looks critical in Delta and Mesa counties. The Utah sheepmen continue to move that way, and Colorado cattle and ranchmen are arming to resist the invasion. Settlers say the militia need not be called out, as they are equal to the occasion. Over 125,000 sheep are at Thompson Springs, Utah, en route east.

Later reports are much less warlike. It is claimed most of the Utah sheepmen will obey Governor Waite's proclamation, though a few will have to be driven out.

NEW YORK, April 6.—The Herald's Montevideo dispatch says: The correspondent in Rio Grande do Sul sends word that Admiral Mello's fleet, which sailed from Desterro yesterday to meet President Peixoto's squadron, forced the bar of Rio Grande this afternoon. As soon as the fleet was in front of the city, the big guns of the Aquidaban and Republica were brought into action. The city of Rio Grande was bombarded and was still under fire when the Herald correspondent sent his dispatch. The forces which had been landed from the transports were sent ahead, and will attack Porto Allegro.

LONDON, April 7.—It is reported that LeCaron, the British spy, is not dead as stated, but en route to one of the most distant colonies under the protection of officers. The announcement of his death and removal was made because of a Fenian plot to kill him.

ST. LOUIS, April 9.—Dr. John Howe Jenks, professor of physiology and modern languages at Washington university, died today of blood poisoning. While dissecting a corpse last Tuesday, Dr. Jenks cut himself on the hand and was inoculated with poison.

WASHINGTON, April 9.—Mr. Dunphy of New York, thinks a boulevard across the continent is one of the necessities of the age. He has just introduced a bill in the House providing for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the matter. This commission is to determine, in the first place, whether a transcontinental boulevard is desirable, and in the second place whether it is feasible. The commission is to consist of four members, one to be selected from the war department, one from the department of agriculture, one from the postoffice department and one from the interior department. The boulevard is to extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific and, of course, the eastern terminus, in Mr. Dunphy's opinion, ought to be at New York City. The western terminus to be in San Francisco.

TOPEKA, Kan., April 8.—During the past three days the prairies in western Kansas have been swept by destructive prairie fires, and many stacks of straw have been consumed. A big fire broke out in Clark county, and before a strong south wind burned north over a wide range of country, many fences, hay and straw stacks and outbuildings were consumed. In front of this wind storm the flames leaped ten to fifteen feet high. Several farmers barely saved their homes. They sent a courier to Ashland for help. Wagons were procured, loaded with men and barrels of water and sent to the relief of the people.

A strip of prairie two miles long by sixty feet wide was thoroughly saturated by people who had come to the rescue with the water, and the fire was finally hemmed in.

In Wabunze more than 10,000 acres of range grass have been burned over during the past three days.

OMAHA, April 9.—Today the trial of Bishop Bonacum of Nebraska opens in Omaha. It promises to be a remarkable case in Catholic circles. One hundred priests and nuns are present to testify concerning the charges which include tyranny, oppression, insubordination, inciting strife, slander and libel, violation of diocesan statutes, misappropriation, falsehood, peculation, undue influence, unjust favoritism, scandal, gambling and incitation to perjury. These are supplemented with 115 specifications.

Heretofore bishops accused of grave offenses have been called to Rome and quietly suppressed by removal to some distant diocese or placed on the retired list. The sending of a papal delegate to the United States reversed this policy to some extent by creating a local court for the determination of questions of church management arising in this country. For certain reasons proceedings in the case of Bishop Bonacum will be heard before Archbishop Hennessey instead of the papal delegate. Appeal from the findings may be had to the papal delegate and finally to Rome. The progress of the case, the proceeding heretofore had, and the prospect of an early determination excites great interest among church men.

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo., April 9.—The greatest gold strike of the year at Cripple Creek is reported in the Caledonia. The mine is located with the vein which is eighty feet wide. The lowest assay shows $90 to the ton; a half ton assayed $400 to the ton; several feet will run half that amount. Quartz streaks three to four inches wide will give as high as $1,000 to $1,500. The mine has been opened for two years, but attention has been called away from it and its richness was not dreamed of.

MILWAUKEE, Wis., April 9.—The Davidson Theater, the finest in Milwaukee and one of the handsomest and costliest building in the country, was destroyed by fire which broke out between 4 and 5 o'clock this morning. The valuable scenery carried by the "Lilliputians," worth $25,000, is all gone. The theater roof, on which a score or more firemen stood, went down and the men were carried with it. Some were rescued from the flames by comrades who risked their lives to drag out the forms of the dead and injured. Seven or eight men were soon brought out and those able to speak said there must be ten more in the ruins. The burning roof had fallen on them and they were roasted to death if not killed in plunged from the roof. Several men working in the theater were caught by the falling timbers and other portions of the roof, making the rescue of the imprisoned men impossible. The police report sixteen lives lost and estimate the property loss at $500,000.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 9.—The second division of the San Francisco industrial army was organized here today. It expects to leave San Francisco Thursday morning for Washington with 500 men, and to recruit 250 more at Oakland.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 9.—The first California conference of the Latter-day Saints was held here yesterday. The attendance was good, though mostly of women. The conference by an unanimous vote sustained the action of the General Conference in the election of officers from President Woodruff down.

The membership of the San Francisco branch now consists of two Seventies, one High Priest, four Elders, one Priest, one Teacher, twenty-one members and sixteen children under eight years of age. Ten persons have been baptized and six children blessed since the foundation of the mission.

CHICAGO, April 8.—A case of black smallpox caused the liveliest kind of commotion in the Harris street police station this afternoon. A man suffering with the plague died in a cell there and from twenty to thirty officers and forty-five prisoners were exposed to the disease.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 7.—The Utah Commission will be reorganized in the early part of next week. The resignation of three of the members have been tendered to Secretary Smith, and a fourth will probably be tendered Monday. There is a vacancy on the board, owing to the death of Henry C. Lett, a recent appointee.

THE ST. JOHNS STAKE.

LUNA VALLEY, Socorro Co., New Mexico, March 16, 1894.

After attending the quarterly Stake conference held at St. Johns on the 4th and 5th inst., I started out in company with Elder Wm. H. Gibbons, counselor in the Stake Presidency, to visit all the settlements of the Saints in the St. Johns Stake except Erastus, which was visited on the journey from Snowflake to St. Johns. Part of the time I was also accompanied by President David K. Udall, Patriarch Henry J. Platt and Sisters Udall, Patterson and Pace, the Stake Presidency of the Relief Societies; also Elder Amencus V. Greer, Brother Marble and others. We held one or more meetings in each of the settlements and had an enjoyable time with the Saints, who appreciated our visits and instructions; this was made manifest by the way in which they turned out to the meetings. I was also successful in obtaining such historical data and information which is needed for Church history; and I found the Stake records in first-class condition, while many of the ward and society records are very imperfectly kept.

The St. Johns Stake of Zion consists of the Saints residing in the eastern part of Apache county, Arizona, and those residing in Valentia and Socorro Counties, New Mexico. There are seven organized wards in the Stake, namely St. Johns, Union, Erastus, Nutrioso and Alpine, in Apache County, Arizona, and Ramah, in Valentia County and Luna Valley or Heber Ward, in Socorro County, New Mexico. The numerical strength of the Stake is 237 families, or 1,467 souls, namely 2 Patriarchs (Henry J. Platt and Jens N. Skousen), 69 High Priests, 60 Seventies (members of the 104th quorum), 86 Elders, 4 Priests, 14 Teachers, 110 Deacons, 619 lay members, and 503 children under eight years old. Elder David K. Udall, a man of much experience in life, and who has passed through very trying ordeals in the interest of God's cause and for his brethren, has presided over the Stake since its first organization in July, 1887. He was formerly Bishop of the St. Johns Ward. Elder John H. Freeman, who performed a mission to Europe several years ago, is first Counselor in the Stake Presidency, and Wm. H. Gibbons, who labored as an Indian missionary for eight years in Arizona and New Mexico, is second Counselor. He now fills the responsible position of treasurer for Apache County, to which office he has been elected repeatedly; the last time his nomination was made by acclamation. President Udall resides in Union Ward (Round Valley), while his Counselors both live at St. Johns.

St. Johns, the county seat of Apache County, is pleasantly situated on the left bank of the Little Colorado river, in the midst of an open, fertile country, which would be capable of sustaining a large population if there was sufficient water wherewith to irrigate the lands. A great deal is being done now to reservoir the water, the facilities for this being very good with the expenditure of considerable labor on dams and ditches, which indeed is being done as fast as possible.

St. Johns was first settled by Mexicans and a few white adventurers about 1873, and the Saints purchased the place in 1879 of Sol. Barth and others, who claimed to own everything in the neighborhood, including water right and all. But after a while complications arose, and the brethren found a number of law suits on their hands, besides having to face a conspiracy on the part of the anti-Mormons, who were determined to drive the Saints away from the county in regular old time Missouri fashion. But the brethren stood their ground nobly, though at a great sacrifice. They were mobbed, robbed, shot at, deprived of their political rights, taxed beyond reason by the unscrupulous demagogues who had been elected to office by the anti-Mormon ring; and one man (Brother Nathan C. Tenney) was shot and killed outright, while acting as a peace maker between his friends and the mob. But the victory at last appeared on the side of the Saints, who, after humbling themselves in fasting and prayer, laid their case before the Almighty. Soon after that the strength of the enemy was broken; the wickedness of some of the anti-Mormon ringleaders came to light. One man was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in the Yuma penitentiary for forgery, or for raising county warrants; another one was killed by his own kind; some fled the country to escape justice, and others, who had expended their means in fighting the Saints, were reduced to poverty, and are now void of influence. The prospects for the Saints in St. Johns are now better than ever before since they settled the place. The anti-Mormons are confined to a small portion of the town bordering on the river, while the Saints occupy a regularly surveyed townsite, adjoining the original Mexican village, with narrow and crooked streets; and the co-operative store, owned by our brethren, does more business than all the rest of the stores in St. Johns put together. Our people also own the only flouring mill in the town, control three-fifths of the water used for irrigation purposes, and constitute the majority of the population, though the non-Mormons, including of course the Mexicans, still outvote our people at the polls. This, however, does not cut much of a figure now, as the people have divided on national party lines; at the last county election, however, the non-Mormons, or at least many of them, acted treacherously to the Saints; for while our brethren voted their respective party tickets honestly and straight, the non-Mormons scratched off the names of all the Mormon candidates and voted for the Gentile opponents, which resulted in every one of our brethren being ousted at the polls; and consequently the county is still run by political tricksters, most of whom own no property to speak of, and as a matter of course pay no taxes, and are only hanging around the county seat to feed from the public crib. Of course there are a few exceptions to that rule.

In the face of all the abuse, lying, and violence to which our brethren have been subjected in St. Johns during past years, they have acted very wisely and prudently; in fact, an all-wise Providence and the spirit of meekness and forbearance have guided them in the midst of all their difficulties. Instead of retaliating in the shape of punishing their oppressors, which they could, perhaps, have done very successfully on different occasions, they refrained from all overt acts; not one of their persecutors was killed or even severely punished by any of the brethren, though the provocation to do so was often so great that I doubt very much whether any people except the Saints could have stood the test without rising up in righteous anger to take vengeance upon the evil-doer. But the brethren held the fort, and it is generally understood throughout this Stake of Zion that had not the Saints of St. Johns stood their ground as they did, all the other settlements which now constitute the St. Johns Stake of Zion would have been an impossibility. The present strength of the St. Johns Ward is seventy-five families, or 460 souls, belonging to the Church. A comfortable meeting house (though a log building) and a fine two story tithing office, occupying one of the most conspicuous places on the townsite, and a Relief Society hall constitute the public buildings of that part of St. Johns which is controlled by the Saints. Charles P. Anderson, a young man of promise, is the Bishop of the ward.

Erastus, also known as Concho, is situated in a snug little valley, about 16 miles southwest of St. Johns, and 34 miles southeast of Snowflake. The old Mexican town called Concho is situated in the lower end, while most of our people live on the townsite called Erastus, which is in the upper end of the valley. A fine reservoir has been constructed which so far has proven very successful and beneficial to the settlement. At Erastus the finest peaches produced in Apache County, and other fruits are claimed to be raised, and the prospect for a flourishing settlement is promising, though the present Mormon population only consists of eighteen families, or 138 souls. Christopher J. Kempe, extensively known among the Scandinavian Saints from his missionary labors in Norway, presides as Bishop at Erastus. The place was named thus in honor of the late Apostle Erastus Snow. It was first settled by the Saints in 1879.

Union Ward embraces all the Saints residing in Round Valley, which is situated near the so-called white mountains about 35 miles south of St. Johns. The post-office name of the place is Springerville. Formerly there were two wards in this valley, namely Omer and Amity, but in 1886 they were amalgamated and the new organization called Union, and of late years the headquarters of the ward have been built up at a place called Eager about a mile and a half southwest of the valley of Springerville and near the east end of the valley. The townsite of Eager is a most beautiful one, and when more families shall have located upon it, it will present a better appearance than at present, when the houses are somewhat scattered. The altitude of this place is about 6,500 feet, or nearly 800 feet higher than St. Johns. George H. Crosby, formerly Bishop of Hebron and Leed's in Southern Utah, presides over the Union Ward, which at present contains sixty families, or 350 souls, belonging to the Church.

Nutrioso is a fine village situated on Nutrioso Creek, a tributary of the Little Colorado river, in the south end of a beautiful and fertile little valley near the summit of the mountains which form the watershed between the Little Colorado and the Gila rivers. Nutrioso attracts the attention of the visitor at once by its fine frame dwellings, its large and commodious school house and its Relief Society Hall, etc., all built of good native lumber. This place is surrounded by pine forests which cover the mountain slopes as far as the eye can reach in all directions. Consequently, timber and fire wood are very plentiful. The farming land is also good, and though the altitude (about 7000 feet) is so high, good grain has been raised here in past years. Leonard J. Brown, a son of Lorenzo Brown, of St. George fame, is the Bishop of the Nutrioso Ward, the membership of which is represented in twenty-nine families, or 172 souls. Nutrioso was first settled by the Saints in 1880. It is fifteen miles southeast of Union, or fifty miles from St. Johns.

Across the mountains in a southeasterly direction, about eleven miles from Nutrioso, is Bush Valley, on the headwaters of the San Francisco river, a tributary of the Gila. The first Latter day Saints entered this valley in 1879 and purchased the improvements previously made by a Mr. Bush and sons (in whose honor the valley was named) and others; and there is now a ward called Alpine containing eighteen families, or 138 souls, presided over by Joseph N. Heywood, a son of Patrioach Joseph L. Heywood of Panguitch Garfield Co., Utah, who was also the first Bishop of the Seventeenth Ward, Salt Lake City. Bush Valley is about six and a half miles long from west to east, and has an average width of nearly two miles. Here the people have been quite successful during past years in raising grain without irrigation, though the lands which are watered yield by far the most. The township is somewhat broken, but is rendered picturesque by the presence of beautiful groves of tall pines which grow in the valley and on the mountain slopes surrounding it. The land is good and productive, and the people entertain good hopes for future prosperity. But here, as well as in every other settlement throughout the St. Johns Stake, progress is somewhat impeded through lack of element; now settlers are wanted to build up the place and to make the ward prosperous.

Luna Valley, which contains twenty-three families of the Saints, or 150 souls, organized into the Heber Ward, thus named in honor of Apostle Heber J. Grant, is situated about twelve miles southeast of Alpine, on the same stream (the San Francisco river.) The valley is very irregular, but may be said to extend from west to east for a distance of about four and a half miles, with an average width of two miles. The valley was named after the Luna Brothers, Mexicans, who located here before our people came in; it also means the valley of the moon. The first Latter-day Saint settlers rolled their wagons into this valley February 28, 1883. This place is about 120 miles west of Magdalena, a town situated on a branch of the A. F. & S. F. Ry. eastward, and about the same distance from Silver City lying southward. From St. Johns it is sixty-three miles. The boundary line between New Mexico and Arizona is about midway between Luna Valley and Bush Valley. George D. Green is Bishop of the Heber Ward. The Luna Valley reservoir is situated in the lower end of Bush Valley, in Arizona, about eight miles northwest of the settlement. Pine and cedar forests abound in Luna Valley and vicinity. There are also plenty of oak, juniper, cotton-wood and other kinds of wood in the vicinity. In order to make farms the heavy growth of timber must in many instances be cut down in regular lower canopy style. More Latter-day Saints are wanted in Luna Valley. I am now bound for the "Mormon" colonies in Old Mexico.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

ST. GEORGE, Utah,
March 30, 1894.

As you have given the short account of myself a place in the NEWS, I venture to continue my history, though it may be written in a broken way. After the Saints had been driven from Missouri, one day while standing near the wharf at Quincy a steamboat on her way up the Mississippi stopped at the wharf. The mate wanted to hire a hand, offering twenty-five dollars per month. I told him if he would liberate me from yawl duty I would accept his offer. This he said he would do and told me I would be night watchman and the work I might be called to do in the day he would pay me for extra. Agreeing to his terms I went aboard. Privilege was given me to go into the cook room whenever I pleased, night or day, and help myself. I always found plenty of victuals left from the cabin table, such as cooked fowl of various kinds, fish, veal, mutton and baked beef, all of which I did ample justice to, except veal and goose.

The mate and deck hands seemed to take to me but, whether it was because I was a Mormon I could not say. My name was never asked for, but they gave me one; they called me "Picayune"—the name of a little silver coin worth six and one quarter cents. I remained with the Alpha—for that was the name of the steamer—about one month, when I was taken sick and told the captain and mate I wanted to go home. The captain told me to go to the clerk and get my pay, all of which I got except ten dollars; this the clerk said they did not have, and the sum is due me today. I returned to Illinois, where I found my father living on rented land near Payson, Adams county, and with a little nursing I was soon all right and went to work on a farm for $12 a month.

In August of this year, 1839, the Prophet having escaped from Missouri, a conference was called and held in Quincy. There I was set apart to go on a mission, having been previously ordained an Elder and then a Seventy in Far West, under the hands of Elders Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball. At the same conference a young man by the name of Amos Lysons was ordained a Priest and set apart to take a mission; he was my traveling companion.

The very first time we announced ourselves messengers of salvation and offered to preach, we were told that we deserved a severe flogging for going about to preach Joe Smithism and that we should be ashamed of ourselves, etc. At another place we were invited to preach, and after having done so in our weak way (for this was our first attempt to speak in public), at the close of our meeting we were told that we were more fit to drive oxen and should let preaching alone and go home. The next morning, as we were about to depart, an old lady fixed her eyes on us and the tears came from her eyes and ran down her cheeks. She took from her pocket a couple of quarters and gave us—perhaps all the money she had. Although no invitation was given us to preach, yet we felt the good Lord was with us. We went to Virginia, our native state. There Brother Lyons concluded to marry a wife. I went into Jackson county, where I baptized a few and organized a branch of seven members, one of whom Brother Lyons had baptized previously. By the consent of the members I ordained Brother John D. Vandal an Elder to preside.

Returning home I went to work helping to get out rock for the Nauvoo Temple. If my memory serves me it was in the month of August, 1842, the Prophet called a special conference, where Elders were called to go on missions and to rebut John C. Bennett's lies. Among the number I was called, and about the first of the following September I started, in company with three other Elders; but wisdom dictated that all three should not travel together. About this time I met with Elder Alpheus Harmon, and he having no companion but wishing for one, we traveled together. As cold weather approached, and we met with poor encouragement, Elder Harmon concluded to return home to Nauvoo. On leaving him I felt lonesome, for he was good company and I believe a good man. Since then I heard that he froze to death while crossing a prairie just before reaching home. This brings to my mind Brother Lyons, my former companion; whatever became of him I could not learn. It was said by some that he was drowned and by others that he went out of the country with drover, and it was surmised by a few that he met with foul play and was murdered.

I remember one cold winter day, in January, 1843. The snow was on the ground about a foot deep. My road lay through the woods for several miles before reaching the first settlement. Late in the afternoon, tired, hungry and cold, I came up to a fine looking house that seemed to say, "Call in, friend." I did so, and found the man of the house in the kitchen sitting at his shoe bench. I asked if he would please keep a servant of the Lord over night. He inquired where I was from and to what order I belonged. "From Nauvoo, and I belong to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints," was my reply. He scratched his head with the awl and said he had not heard of that order. I told him we were known as Mormons but that was not our true name. "Oh, yes," said he, "I have heard of the Mormons, and shall not keep you." He had a family of grown up children, mostly girls. They and their mother stood gazing at though I was some frightful being.

I left to seek quarters elsewhere, and had not gone over 150 yards when I was called back. They told me I could stay all night. The man said he wanted to talk with me, and taking my valise invited me in his house and told me to make myself as comfortable as I could. Pretty soon a steaming supper was on the table. Whenever a question was asked me there was an anxiety on the part of the wife and daughters to listen to what the Mormon had to say in answer to his questions.

While at supper a peddler drove up and asked to stay all night. We were introduced to each other by our host. The peddler was one of those knowing men, and what he did not know was not worth learning. He acted as though he had the world by the wrist, and could use up Mormonism in less than no time and prove myself a false teacher. He did all the talking. I had not a word to say—could not slip in a word edgewise. At last his power ran out, when it was my turn to talk. Mr. MecMelon, our host, turned to him and said, "It is no use for you to talk and argue with him, for he has the Scriptures all on his side."

It happened to be Saturday night, and the next morning after breakfast Mr. MecMelon invited me to go to meeting with him, and said I might give out an appointment to preach that evening at his house. This surprised and also pleased me. I was introduced to the minister, a Lutheran preacher. He was a fine looking man who treated me very courteously, and at the end of his discourse he invited me to speak, which I did, and gave out my appointment. The minister told the people to turn out and hear me for he believed I was a good man. That evening I had a full attendance and after meeting several remained awhile to talk with me and to ask questions. Doors were opened for me and Mr. MecMelon told me to make his house my home while I remained in the neighborhood.

There was a Campbellite preacher, I think his name was Moses Bonom. He would meet me at my meetings and fight the truth and do all he could to prejudice the people against me and the doctrines I advocated. At one of my evening meetings a party came intending to tar, feather and ride me on a rail. The man of the house told the mob to come in and behave themselves and hear what I had to say. "For if you don't," he added, "I will use my rifle on the first man that attempts to disturb him while under my roof."

One evening I was pelted with snow balls. I had just held meeting in a school house. As the snowballing was going on, two horsemen rode up and inquired for the Mormon preacher. Being pointed out they invited me to get up behind one of them and go with them. I confess that I felt dubious, not knowing what was ahead. However, I did as they bade me and had not gone far when they told me they were brethren with families on their way to Nauvoo, but that cold weather and deep snow had prevented them from traveling and they had stopped for the winter at a neighboring town, Lima. At a late hour that evening they heard of my meeting and had come in haste, hoping to arrive before its close. They lived six miles distant. They were Ira Oviatt and a Brother Cole. Through these brethren I had the Lima courthouse to preach in, and although there was considerable prejudice I had friends and homes during the cold winter months. I simply mention these incidents to show how easy it is for the Lord to provide for His servants and open the way that the people may be warned. The Book of Mormon and Voice of Warning were read by many, but strange to say not a soul offered themselves for baptism. One young man by the name of Jonathan Church at one time gave me $3. He professed to be an infidel, but said if there was any truth in the Bible the Mormons were right. H. W. BIGLER.

IN NEW ZEALAND.

OAKURA, Whangaruru, New Zealand, Feb. 12, 1894.—The semi-annual conference of the Whangarei district of the Australasian mission was held at this place, beginning Friday at 10 a. m. There were present five Elders from Utah, Wm. Gardner, president of mission; B. H. Hollingworth, president of district; Charles B. Bartlett, president of Bay of Isles district; J. H. W. Goff and Thos. J. Morgan, traveling Elders; ten native Elders, ten Priests, four Teachers, two Deacons, 140 native members and some non-members, one local European Elder, one Priest, one Deacon and one member.

Conference was called to order by Elder Hollingworth, and the people sang heartily "Ha, kaputa mai a Ihu." Elder Bartlett offered the opening prayer. Elder Gardner made the address of welcome, and spoke upon the object of these gatherings. A verbal report of the district was then given, also of the Whangaruru branch. Elder Hoani Pita then spoke briefly on the apostasy and the restoration. Rev. Wiremu P. Te Waha, a Maori minister of the Church of England, asked the privilege of speaking to the people. He said he was glad to meet the Elders, considered them his friends. He came to get knowledge concerning the Church to which so many Maoris of his circuit belonged, and he was pleased to see the people met together in conference.

After singing, Elder Pita Kino, of the Big Barrier Island, offered the closing prayer.

At 4:30 the Big Barrier Saints led the singing and the prayer was made by Hone Heta, of Puaruku. Elder Mita Wepiha, president of the Waikaro branch, addressed the Saints with power; illustrated the parable of the sower; touched on baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; said this earth was baptized in Noah's day to cleanse it from pollution; referred to the Savior as our pattern and guide; dwelt upon the gathering of Israel in former and the gathering of Israel in latter days; knew this to be the work of God, and was very happy in it. Hopa Peka reported the Waikaro branch. Elder Bartlett addressed the conference and gave a short account of the Bay of Islands district; said the conference would produce good results, because the people had come together to hear the word of life under the influence of the Holy Ghost; dwelt on miracles, faith and works. He was appointed to act as interpreter for the local Europeans who were afterwards called to address the assembly.

We began our testimony meeting at 9:30 p. m. and twenty-five Maori brethren and sisters spoke, and four non-members expressed their pleasure (by permission) at being present. After midnight the congregation stood up sang "Ete kahui iti nei;" prayer by Haluta of Big Barrier.

Second Day—Meeting opened at 10:40. Prayer by Elder Henere Wiki (Tekahiwal). Elder Goff spoke a short time in Maori on the Gospel. Elder Paora Pene, of Matauri branch, gave some good counsel, and was followed by Elder Hamuera Toka, of Te Horo, whose remarks were listened to with great attention; referred to the coming of the angel Moroni to Joseph Smith, and the restoration of the Gospel of Christ in these last days; had a testimony and was glad to be able to tell the people about it. Local Elder Thos. Finlayson, Opuawhanga branch, addressed the conference on baptism by immersion, related his reception of the Gospel, knew Joseph Smith was a prophet of God. Benediction by Nupere Ngawaka.

At 4:15 p.m. Henere Kepa opened by prayer, and Maki Tepiriki and Percy Going (Priest) bore testimony. Elder Gardner followed in power on the first principles, giving counsel and instruction to all for over an hour. Wiremu Te Tairua dismissed the meeting.

We had another testimony meeting at 9:20. Five brethren spoke, and the Big Barrier branch was reported by Elder Pita Kino.

The third day, opened beautifully fine and everybody was in their best clothes, the native sisters mostly preferring bright colors. The native reverend left after breakfast to fill one of his appointments, having been well treated by everyone and then six Maoris were baptized by Elder Goff. At 11 a. m. Hone Auarua (teacher) offered the opening prayer and Elder Gardner spoke of baptism, the conferring of the Holy Ghost and the blessing of infants. After confirming the newly baptized, three children were blessed by the Elders. Elder Morgan addressed the conference in the native tongue for a short time. President Hollingworth read the conference report showing 804 members, and spoke to the people encouragingly; dwelt upon the separation of the sheep and goats at the last great day, exhorted all to be true and faithful. The general authorities of the Church and the Priesthood in Zion were unanimously sustained, also Elder William Gardner as president of this mission; Elders Hollingworth and Bartlett as presidents of the Whangarei and Bay of Islands conferences, and Elders Goff and Morgan as their fellow laborers. Benediction by Haroe Mokaraka.

At 1:30 Priesthood meeting began, Elder Gardner presiding. For two hours he stood on his feet answering the many questions propounded in reference to habits of life, requirements made by the Lord of His Priesthood, and other matters peculiar to the social condition of the people and things pertaining to the Maori mission in general and the districts in particular.

The afternoon services began at 4:30. Prayer by Bro. Going. Bro. Gardner touched on the Sacrament and was followed by Elder Bartlett, who gave counsel and instruction to the people. Benediction by Rapato Ngatiwal.

In the evening meeting twelve bore testimony, and at 10:30 the conference closed with prayer by Elder Hollingworth.

Thus closed a happy gathering, in which both members and non-members vied with each other in laboring for the general good. "BEDFORD."

On Saturday night a stranger walked into W. J. Stevenson's law office at Bozeman, Mont., and ordered the lawyer to write an affidavit, the substance of which was that the stranger, who gave the name of Robert Dutton, was guilty of the murder of an old farmer and his wife at Brampton, near Toronto, Canada, last fall. Such a murder was committed at the time mentioned and a man named McWhirrel is under sentence of death for the crime. Dutton explained that he made the affidavit to keep an innocent man from being hanged. After signing the paper he backed out of the lawyer's office, ordered him to keep his mouth shut for a time and disappeared. Stevenson turned the paper over to the officers and gave a description of Dutton, but he cannot be found. Stevenson is a man of good standing and the officers are convinced that he had such a visitor as he reported, but do not know what to make of the case. It is suggested that it may be a trick to save McWhirrel, or the fellow may have told the truth.

WEATHER AND CROPS.

The following initial crop bulletin for the year 1894 has been issued by Observer Salisbury and will be of interest to farmers throughout Utah:

Newton, Cache County, March 26.—15 inches of snow to the north of town; to the south it is less. It is considered that winter wheat is doing well under the snow.

Box Elder (Brigham City), Box

Elder County, March 24.—The snow, with the exception of a few drifts, is gone. The grain has wintered well under the snow, and the prospect is good.

March 31.—The ground is yet wet and cold, and the grain has made but little growth, but looks well.

Meadowville, Rich County, March 24.—It is too early to state how winter wheat is going to look, or how it has fared, for the snow has been covered with snow on an average, outside of drifts, of about 18 inches. Have an extra amount of snow for this time of year; on that account expect good crops of winter grain.

Corinne, Box Elder County, March 24.—It is too early to begin to show signs of life. Too early yet to tell how much or how little it has suffered during the winter.

Logan, Cache County, March 23.—Condition of winter wheat favorable. It is now covered with snow, and has been so all winter.

Harrieville, Weber County, March 26.—Owing to the very dry condition of the ground last fall little fall wheat or winter grain was sown. That which was put in was full protected by snow till the middle of March, and has the appearance of not suffering much from the hurricane winds of the 20th and 21st. The ground at this date is in fine condition, and farming operations will now begin in earnest.

April 2.—Week began with seed planting in full operation, but was retarded by a heavy rain on the 29th, with violent winds. Fall grain is apparently in a healthy condition.

Taylorville, Salt Lake County, March 24.—Winter wheat has done very well in this locality. The acreage is more than usual, and notwithstanding the large amount of snow which fell it did not stay long at a time. The spring is backward, but during the fine spell of weather last week considerable wheat was put in the ground.

Levan, Juab County, March 31.—The average snow covering the winter wheat has been twelve to eighteen inches. Winter wheat never looked better this time of year, but a less amount than usual was sown last fall as fall wheat has partly been a failure the last couple of years. The ground did not freeze before snow fell last fall, hence all snow water sunk into the ground when thawing this spring, giving it a good soaking. The prospect for a good season was never better.

Leamington, Millard County, March 31.—Past week good sowing weather. Spring wheat about all in. Cloudy and warm each day, but good growing weather.

Santaquin, Utah County, April 1.—The past week has been one of good weather for fall wheat and grass, and beneficial to the orchards, provided the frosts later on do not kill the buds.

Moroni, Sanpete County, March 31.—No winter grain under cultivation. Farmers hereabouts have commenced to put in their spring grain.

Kanosh, Millard County.—Snow two feet deep on the 19th and 22nd, which was very good for the grain; the snow is now going fast.

Six prisoners escaped at an early hour on Friday morning from the county jail at Green river, Wyo.

It has been discovered, that Bank Director Hirth, of Kolding, who died recently, has embezzled about 140,000 kroner.

George C. Gron, the enterprising manager of the Reitzel Pub. House, of Copenhagen, has announced that he will award an annual prize of 1000 kroner for the best Danish or Norwegian literary work published by him. The judges will be Henrik Jæger, P. Hansen, Erik Skram and O. Borchsenius, who will act entirely independently of the publishing house. The above sum will, as a rule, be given to one person, but under certain circumstances may be divided equally between two.

A young man, who for the time being was in a hilarious state of mind, took a trip on his bicycle from Slagelse to Nykøping. He soon met a lady and gentleman, whom he supposed to be on friendly terms. The wheelman stopped and exclaimed enthusiastically: "Oh, what a nice time you must have!" The gentleman said they might exchange their roles. Said—done. The cyclist left his wheel to the gentleman, and introduced himself to the lady. The new cyclist seemed to be the greenest sort of an amateur, running into the ditch several times. But as soon as he was out of reach he suddenly sped away like a crack wheelman, and disappeared never to return.

THE EUPOREAN MISSION.

[Millennial Star, March 26.]

ARRIVALS.—The following missionaries arrived in Liverpool from Utah per Cunard steamer Lucaula, Friday afternoon, March 16, for the British Mission: Wm. H. Darley, R. J. Kerr and C. E. Lloyd, of Wellsville, Cache county; Victor P. Wells, Salt Lake City.

RELEASES AND APPOINTMENTS.—Elder John F. Howell has been honorably released from his labors as traveling Elder in the Welsh conference, to return home, March 21, 1894.

Elders C. E. Lloyd and Wm. H. Darley have been appointed to labor as traveling Elders in the Norwich conference.

Elder R. J. Kerr has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Irish conference.

Victor P. Wells has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the London conference.

The practice of law across the bay, says the San Francisco Chronicle, is not a very pleasant profession when lawyers take up the quarrel of their clients and try to settle their differences with blood. Lawyer Fry came very near having the top of his head blown off on Monday afternoon by Attorney Hamilton, who interposed an objection to a question by poking a bulldog pistol into the face of opposing counsel. Mr. Hamilton forgot to pull the trigger, however, and in consequence Lawyer Fry got away with his life and a bruised cheek. The row occurred during the taking of the deposition of the defendant in a divorce case. Hamilton and his client left the room, and were followed to the door by Fry. The former suddenly turned and gave his opponent a blow on the jaw which staggered him. Fry was about to return the blow, when Hamilton drew a big revolver and then there was a scattering of lawyers. The pistol was taken from him and he was arrested on a charge of battery and exhibiting a deadly weapon. He gave bonds and was released from custody. The taking of the depositions will be continued some other day.

OBITUARY NOTES.

PATIENCE DELILA PIERCE PALMER.

AURORA, Sevier county, Utah, April 1, 1894.—I am called upon to chronicle another death in my family, this time that of my honored and aged mother, who peacefully passed away at 1:45 a. m., March 25th, after an illness of eight months.

Her name was Patience Delila Pierce, born February 15, 1809, in the township of Oswegatchie, St. Lawrence county, New York. At the age of 17 years she married my father, Abraham Palmer, who died nineteen years ago. She was the mother of twelve children, all of whom are dead excepting three. She has thirty-two grandchildren living, forty great-grandchildren living, six great-great-grandchildren living.

Deceased was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in December, 1835, and with her husband emigrated to Missouri and passed through the persecutions in common with the Saints in that state. Was camped four miles below Haun's mill at the time of the massacre, and with her children fled to the woods for fear the mob would kill them all; was in the exodus from that state; lived three weeks on parched corn, as the settlers would not sell them food; had to chew it and feed the little ones who had no teeth. They stopped a little while in Springfield, Ill., then moved to Nauvoo, where the husband served for years as a policeman, being one of the first forty. Mother was at the organization of the Relief Society, and was set apart under the hands of the Prophet Joseph Smith as one of a committee to attend and administer to the sick sisters, etc. She received all blessings, endowments, etc., in the Temple at Nauvoo. She worked and supported her family a great deal for her husband to go on missions, and was among those driven out of Nauvoo. She emigrated to Utah in 1852, settled in Ogden city, and went through the hard times incidental to settling that county; was president for years of the first Relief society in Weber county; went south at the time of the Move, and back to Ogden, where she continued her labors in the Relief society until 1865, when she moved to Chicken Creek, Juab county, where she taught school most of the time. In the year 1870 she moved to Fayette, Sanpete county, where she continued school teaching. In 1875 she buried her faithful husband, and since that time has made her home principally with my family at Glenwood and this place, and was a constant worker in the Relief societies, and a great expounder of the truths God has revealed through His servant Joseph. No one ever heard her complain at her lot, but on the contrary she always rejoiced in the Gospel and in bearing testimony of its truths to the last. Everybody loved her who knew her.

She received a blessing under the hands of the Prophet Joseph's father in which it is stated that she should live until she was 85 years old. She was 85 years old the 15th of last February. She was sick eight months. She went to sleep on Friday evening and slept until Sunday morning when she passed away without a struggle. She lived a Saint and died in the assurance of a glorious resurrection.

A large congregation attended the funeral services here on the 28th, and on the 27th we took her noble remains to Fayette and laid them by the side of her husband. The Saints turned out and had services at the grave.

WM. M. PALMER.

SAMUEL A. P. KELSEY.

Died at Smithfield, Cache county, U. T., on March 21, 1894, of old age, Samuel A. P. Kelsey. He was born April 27, 1805, in Chester county, South Carolina; was baptized in the year 1835, in Hamilton county, Illinois, and in 1837 moved with the Saints to Caldwell county, Mo., and resided there until driven out in the winter of 1838 and 1839. He moved into Adams county, and in 1842 moved to Nauvoo. In the fall of 1838 he was in Far West, Missouri, in company with the brethren who had their arms and ammunition taken from them by the mob. He was driven from Nauvoo in 1846, at which time himself and family were driven from Nauvoo into Iowa. In 1852 he left the Bluffs and started for Utah, arriving in Salt Lake City on the 11th of September of the same year. He moved to Cottonwood and resided there seven years, then went back to Illinois for part of his family in 1860; stayed there through the winter, came out in the spring of 1861, and settled in Smithfield, Cache county, where he resided until his demise. He died a true and faithful High Priest, leaving a family of 10 children, 25 grand children, 78 great grand children and 5 great great grand children, and a host of friends to mourn his loss.

THE LAW OF ADOPTION.

Discourses delivered at the General Conference of the Church, in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Sunday morning, April 8, 1894, by

PRESIDENTS WILFORD WOODRUFF and GEORGE Q. CANNON

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

PRESIDENT WILFORD WOODRUFF.

I feel thankful for the privilege of meeting with so many of the Latter-day Saints this morning. In order to present my position before the Saints I wish to say that I have been a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints over sixty years, a member of the Quorum of the Apostles fifty-five years, and the President of the Church for a short time. During all these years, and in all my travels, I have never seen a moment when I have had the power to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ or to administer in any of the ordinances of the House of the Lord, acceptably to God or to myself, only by the assistance of the Holy Ghost; and I do not know of any other man that could ever do this. Even the Son of God, in referring to His work, said: "I do nothing of myself; but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things." So it has been with all the prophets and patriarchs in every age of the world; they have had to be assisted by the power of God. I occupy that position today before this assembly. Therefore, as the Lord commanded us not to speak only as we are moved upon by the Holy Ghost, I desire that, and in order to obtain it I want the prayers and faith of the Latter-day Saints.

I have some things resting upon me that I wish to present before the Latter-day Saints, and in order to do this I will call upon President George Q. Cannon to read from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants concerning the subject which I wish to speak upon.

[President Cannon read from sec. 128, as follows:

It may seem to some to be a very bold doctrine that we talk of—a power which records or binds on earth, and binds in heaven. Nevertheless in all ages of the world, whenever the Lord has given a dispensation of the Priesthood to any man by actual revelation, or any set of men, this power has always been given. Hence, whatsoever those men did in authority, in the name of the Lord, and did it truly and faithfully, and kept a proper and faithful record of the same, it became a law on earth and in heaven, and could not be annulled, according to the decrees of the great Jehovah. This is a faithful saying! Who can hear it?

And again, for the precedent, Matthew xvi. 18, 19. "And I also say unto thee, that thou art Peter; and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; and I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven."

Now the great and grand secret of the whole matter, and the summum bonum of the whole subject that is lying before us, consists in obtaining the powers of the Holy Priesthood. For him to whom these keys are given, there is no difficulty in obtaining a knowledge of facts in relation to the salvation of the children of men, both as well for the dead as for the living.

Herein is glory and honor, and immortality and eternal life. The ordinance of baptism by water, to be immersed therein in order to answer to the likeness of the dead, that one principle might accord with the other. To be immersed in the water and come forth out of the water is in the likeness of the resurrection of the dead in coming forth out of their graves; hence this ordinance was instituted to form a relationship with the ordinance of baptism for the dead, being in likeness of the dead.

Consequently the baptismal font was instituted as a simile of the grave, and was commanded to be in a place underneath where the living are wont to assemble, to show forth the living and the dead; and that all things may have their likeness, and that they may accord one with another; that which is earthly conforming to that which is heavenly, as Paul hath declared, 1 Corinthians xv. 46, 47 and 48.

"Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterwards that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy; the second man is the Lord, from heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly." And as are the records on the earth in relation to your dead, which are truly made out, so also are the records in heaven. This, therefore, is the sealing and binding power, and, in one sense of the word, the keys of the kingdom which consist in the key of knowledge.

And now, my dearly beloved brethren and sisters, let me assure you that these are principles in relation to the dead, and the living, that cannot be lightly passed over, as pertaining to our salvation. For their salvation is necessary, and essential to our salvation, as Paul says concerning the fathers "that they without us cannot be made perfect;" neither can we without our dead be made perfect.

And now, in relation to the baptism for the dead, I will give you another quotation of Paul, 1 Corinthians xv. 29, "Else what shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all; why are they then baptized for the dead?"

And again, in connection with this quotation, I will give you a quotation from one of the prophets, who had his eye fixed on the restoration of the Priesthood, the glories to be revealed in the last days, and in an especial manner this most glorious of all subjects belonging to the everlasting gospel, viz., the baptism for the dead; for Malachi says, last chapter, verses 5th and 6th, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse."

I might have rendered a plainer translation to this, but it is sufficiently plain to suit my purpose as it stands. It is sufficient to know, in this case, that the earth will be smitten with a curse, unless there is a welding link of some kind or other, between the fathers and the children, upon some subject or other, and behold what is that subject? It is the baptism for the dead. For we without them cannot be made perfect; neither can they without us be made perfect. Neither can they nor we, be made perfect, without those who have died in the gospel also; for it is necessary in the ushering in of the dispensation of the fulness of times; which dispensation is now beginning to usher in, that a whole and complete and perfect union, and welding together of dispensations, and keys, and powers, and glories should take place, and be revealed from the days of Adam even to the present time; and not only this, but those things which never have been revealed from the foundation of the world, but have been kept hid from the wise and prudent, shall be revealed unto babes and sucklings in this dispensation of the fulness of times.

Now, what do we hear in the gospel which we have received? "A voice of gladness! A voice of mercy from heaven; and a voice of truth out of the earth; glad tidings for the dead; a voice of gladness for the living and the dead; glad tidings of great joy; how beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of those that bring glad tidings of good things; and that say unto Zion, behold! thy God reigneth. As the dews of Carmel, so shall the knowledge of God descend upon them."

And again, what do we hear? Glad tidings from Cumorah! Moroni, an angel from heaven, declaring the fulfillment of the prophets—the book to be revealed. A voice of the Lord in the wilderness of Fayette, Seneca county, declaring the three witnesses to bear record of the book. The voice of Michael on the banks of the Susquehanna, detecting the devil when he appeared as an angel of light. The voice of Peter, James and John in the wilderness between Harmony, Susquehanna county, and Colesville, Broome county, on the Susquehanna river, declaring themselves as possessing the keys of the kingdom, and of the dispensation of the fulness of times.

And again, the voice of God in the chamber of old father Whitmer, in Fayette, Seneca county, and at sundry times, and in divers places through all the travels and tribulations of this Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. And the voice of Michael, the archangel; the voice of Gabriel, and of Raphael, and of divers angels, from Michael or Adam, down to the present time, all declaring their dispensation, their rights, their keys, their honors, their majesty and glory, and the power of their Priesthood; giving line upon line, precept upon precept; here a little, and there a little—giving us consolation by holding forth that which is to come, confirming our hope.

Resuming, President Woodruff said:

Thus you have before you the subject which is resting upon us, and which we wish to present to the Latter-day Saints. Let me say that age has very little to do with revelation. In the early age of the world, old father Adam, three years previous to his death—he being nearly one thousand years of age—called together his posterity in the valley of Adam-ondi-Ahman, and he stood upon his feet for hours, clothed with the power of God and the revelations of heaven, and blessed his posterity, some seven of whom, each representing a generation, were High Priests. Among them were Enoch and Methusaleh, both great men of their day and generation. He prophesied upon them what should transpire with their posterity unto the end of time. His old age did not have any effect whatever upon the revelations of God to him. Joseph Smith, when fourteen years of age, while calling upon God in the wilderness, had the heavens opened unto him. Both the Father and the Son presented themselves unto him in the clouds of heaven, and the Father said, "This is my beloved Son; hear him." The age of man is very short indeed in this day to what it was in ancient days. Men anciently lived to a very great age. When four or five hundred years old they took wives, begat children, and raised up posterity. Today our age is limited to something like three score years and ten.

I wish to say to the Latter-day Saints that we live in a very important generation. We are blessed with power and authority, holding the Holy Priesthood by the commandment of God, to stand upon the earth and redeem both the living and the dead. If we did not do it, we should be damned and cut off from the earth, and the God of Israel would raise up a people who would do it. The Lord would not permit me to occupy this position one day of my life, unless I was susceptible to the Holy Spirit and to the revelations of God. It is too late in the day for this Church to stand without revelation. Not only the President of the Church should possess this gift and give it unto the people, but his counselors and the Apostles and all men that bear the Holy Priesthood, if they magnify their calling, should possess that gift for themselves and to assist them in their duties, although they may not be called to give revelations to lead and direct the Church. The spirit of revelation belongs to the Priesthood.

But to come to the subject before us. Perhaps it may be said by the inquiring or the objecting mind, What have you to say about redeeming the dead, or about baptism for the dead, or the work of the Temples of our God, that is not already revealed? I will say this: When the Prophet Joseph had this revelation from heaven, what did he do? There are witnesses here of what he did. He never stopped till he got the fulness of the word of God to him concerning the baptism for the dead. But before doing so he went into the Mississippi river, and so did I, as well as others, and we each baptized a hundred for the dead, without a man to record a single act that we performed. Why did we do it? Because of the feeling of joy that we had, to think that we in the flesh could stand and redeem our dead. We did not wait to know what the result of this would be, or what the whole of it should be. Finally the Lord told the Prophet: "When any of you are baptized for your dead, let there be a recorder, and let him be eye witness of your baptisms; let him hear with his ears, that he may testify of a truth, saith the Lord; that in all your recordings it may be recorded in heaven; whatsoever you bind on earth may be bound in heaven; whatsoever you loose on earth, may be loosed in heaven." That was the beginning of this work.

Joseph Smith, instead of living to be nearly a thousand years of age as Adam did, lived to be about thirty-eight years of age. He brought forth the record of the stick of Joseph in the hands of Ephraim—the history of the ancient inhabitants of this continent. By the power of God he translated that, and it has been published in many languages. Besides this, he organized the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus being the chief corner stone. Men were ordained to the Priesthood and sent forth, from the various occupations of life, to carry this Gospel to the world. God informed Joseph Smith that he was called to prune the vineyard once more for the last time before the coming of the Son of Man. Since that, thousands of Elders of Israel have been sent into the world to preach the Gospel. Joseph Smith did all this during the fifteen years he held the Priesthood. Let any man read the revelations in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, which were given through him during the little time he spent here in the flesh. It is one of the greatest records that any man ever gave to the human family. Not only this, but he organized the endowments and did a great deal of other work. Who could expect him, during the short time he lived in the flesh, to do more than he did? I received my endowments from under his hands. He brought forth all these ordinances that have been given unto the Latter-day Saints. In fact, it is a marvel and a wonder that he performed as much as he did.

I want to say, as the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, that we should now go on and progress. We have not got through revelation. We have not got through the work of God. But at this period we want to go on and fulfill this commandment of God given through Malachi—that the Lord should send Elijah the prophet, "and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." Ye sons of men, I say unto you, in the name of Israel's God, those very principles that God has revealed are what have stayed the judgments of the Almighty on the earth. Were it not for these principles, you and I would not be here today. We have had prophets and apostles. President Young, who followed President Joseph Smith, led us here. He organized these Temples and carried out the purposes of his calling and office. He laid the foundation of this great Temple on this block, as well as others in the mountains of Israel. What for? That we might carry out these principles of redemption for the dead. He accomplished all that God required at his hands. But he did not receive all the revelations that belong to this work; neither did President Taylor, nor has Wilford Woodruff. There will be no end to this work until it is perfected.

I want to lay before you what there is for us to do at the present time; and in doing this I desire particularly the attention of President Lorenzo Snow, of the Salt Lake Temple; President M. W. Merrill, of the Logan Temple; President J. D. T. McAllister, of the Manti Temple, and President D. H. Cannon, of the St. George Temple, and those associated with them. You have acted up to all the light and knowledge that you have had; but you have now something more to do than what you have done. We have not fully carried out those principles in fulfillment of the revelations of God to us, in sealing the hearts of the fathers to the children and the children to the fathers. I have not felt satisfied, neither did President Taylor, neither has any man since the Prophet Joseph who has attended to the ordinance of adoption in the temples of our God. We have felt that there was more to be revealed upon this subject than we had received. Revelations were given to us in the St. George Temple, which President Young presented to the Church of God. Changes were made there, and we still have more changes to make, in order to satisfy our Heavenly Father, satisfy our dead and ourselves. I will tell you what some of them are. I have prayed over this matter, and my brethren have. We have felt as President Taylor said, that we have got to have more revelation concerning sealing under the law of adoption. Well, what are these changes? One of them is the principle of adoption. In the commencement of adopting men and women in the Temple at Nauvoo, a great many persons were adopted to different men who were not of the lineage of their fathers, and there was a spirit manifested by some in that work there that was not of God. Men would go out and electioneer and labor with all their power to get men adopted to them. One instance I will name here: A man went around Nauvoo asking every man he could, saying, "You come and be adopted to me, and I shall stand at the head of the kingdom, and you will be there with me." Now, what is the truth about this? Those who were adopted to that man, if they go with him, will have to go where he is. He was a participator in that horrible scene—the Mountain Meadow massacre. Men have tried to lay that to President Young. I was with President Young when the massacre was first reported to him. President Young was perfectly horrified at the recital of it, and wept over it. He asked: "Was there any white man had anything to do with that?" The reply was, No; and by the representations then made to him he was misinformed concerning the whole transaction. I will say here, and call heaven and earth to witness, that President Young, during his whole life, never was the author of the shedding of the blood of any of the human family; and when the books are opened in the day of judgment these things will be proven to heaven and earth. Perhaps I had not ought to enter into these things, but it came to me. Men are in dangers sometimes in being adopted to others, until they know who they are and what they will be. Now, what are the feelings of Israel? They have felt that they wanted to be adopted to somebody. President Young was not satisfied in his mind with regard to the extent of this matter; President Taylor was not. When I went before the Lord to know who I should be adopted to (we were then being adopted to prophets and apostles,) the Spirit of God said to me, "Have you not a father, who beget you?" "Yes, I have." "Then why not honor him? Why not be adopted to him?" "Yes," says I, "that is right." I was adopted to my father, and should have had my father sealed to his father, and so on back; and the duty that I want every man who presides over a Temple to see performed from this day henceforth and forever, unless the Lord Almighty commands otherwise, is, let every man be adopted to his father. When a man receives the endowments, adopt him to his father; not to Wilford Woodruff, nor to any other man outside the lineage of his fathers. That is the will of God to this people. I want all men who preside over these temples in these mountains of Israel to bear this in mind. What business have I to take away the rights of the lineage of any man? What right has any man to do this? No; I say let every man be adopted to his father; and then you will do exactly what God said when he declared He would send Elijah the prophet in the last days. Elijah the prophet appeared unto Joseph Smith and told him that the day had come when this principle must be carried out. Joseph Smith did not live long enough to enter any further upon these things. His soul was wound up with this work before he was martyred for the word of God and testimony of Jesus Christ. He told us that there must be a welding link of all dispensations and of the work of God from one generation to another. This was upon his mind more than most any other subject that was given to him. In my prayers the Lord revealed to me, that it was my duty to say to all Israel to carry this principle out, and in fulfillment of that revelation I lay it before this people. I say to all men who are laboring in these temples, carry out this principle, and then we will make one step in advance of what we have had before. Myself and counselors conversed upon this and were agreed upon it, and afterwards we laid it before all the Apostles who were here (two were absent—Brothers Thatcher and Lund, the latter being in England,) and the Lord revealed to every one of these men—and they would bear testimony to it if they were to speak—that that was the word of the Lord to them. I never met with anything in my life in this Church that there was more unity upon than there was upon that principle. They all feel right about it, and that it is our duty. That is one principle that should be carried out from this time henceforth. "But," says one, "suppose we come along to a man who perhaps is a murderer." Well, if he is a murderer, drop him out and connect with the next man beyond him. But the Spirit of God will be with us in this matter. We want the Latter-day Saints from this time to trace their genealogies as far as they can, and to be sealed to their fathers and mothers. Have children sealed to their parents, and run this chain through as far as you can get it. When you get to the end, let the last man be adopted to Joseph Smith, who stands at the head of the dispensation. This is the will of the Lord to this people, and I think when you come to reflect upon it you will find it to be true.

Another principle connected with this subject I want to talk about. A man has married a woman, and they have a family of children. The man lays down in death without ever hearing the Gospel. His wife afterwards hears the Gospel and embraces it. She comes to the temple and she wants to be sealed to her husband, who was a good man. The feeling has been to deny this and to say, "No, he was not in the Church, and you cannot be sealed to your husband." Many a woman's heart has ached because of this, and as a servant of God I have broken that chain a good while ago. I have laid before every woman this principle and let her have her choice. Why deprive a woman of being sealed to her husband because he never heard the Gospel? What do any of us know with regard to him? Will he not hear the Gospel and embrace it in the spirit world? Look at Joseph Smith. Not one of Joseph Smith's fathers or brothers or sisters were in the covenant when he received the keys of the kingdom of God and translated the Book of Mormon. They afterwards received it. Every brother and sister that he had, and his father and his father's brothers, except Uncle Jesse Smith, embraced the Gospel. Now, suppose that any of these had died before they had the opportunity of entering into the covenant with the Lord through the Gospel, as his brother Alvin did; they would have been in the same position as Alvin, concerning whom the Lord, when Joseph saw him in the celestial kingdom, said:

All who have died without a knowledge of this Gospel, who would have received it if they had been permitted to tarry, shall be heirs of the celestial kingdom of God; also all that shall die henceforth without a knowledge of it, who would have received it with all their hearts, shall be heirs of that kingdom, for I, the Lord, will judge all men according to their works, according to the desire of their hearts.

So it will be with your fathers. There will be very few, if any, who will not accept the Gospel. Jesus, while His body lay in the tomb, went and preached to the spirits in prison, who were destroyed in the days of Noah. After so long an imprisonment, in torment, they doubtless gladly embraced the Gospel, and if so they will be saved in the kingdom of God. The fathers of this people will embrace the Gospel. It is my duty to honor my father who begot me in the flesh. It is your duty to do the same. When you do this, the Spirit of God will be with you. And we shall continue this work, the Lord adding light to that which we have already received. I have had friends adopted to me. We all have, more or less. But I have had peculiar feelings about it, especially lately. There are men in this congregation who wish to be adopted to me. I say to them today, if they can hear me, Go and be adopted to your fathers, and save your fathers, and stand at the head of your father's house, as saviors upon Mount Zion, and God will bless you in this. This is what I want to say, and what I want carried out in our temples.

The Almighty is with this people. We shall have all the revelations that we will need, if we will do our duty and obey the commandments of God. When any of us get so that we cannot receive these revelations, the Lord will take us out of the way and put someone in our places who can. I am here today, on borrowed time, I may say. I would have been in the spirit world today, mingling with the spirits in the presence of God, had it not been for the cry of this people for my life when I lay at the gates of death a year ago. I have been preserved by the power of God. How long I shall live I do not know. It does not make any difference to me. But while I do live I want to do my duty. I want the Latter-day Saints to do their duty. Here is the Holy Priesthood in these mountains. Their responsibility is great and mighty. The eyes of God, and all the holy prophets are watching over us. This is the great dispensation that has been spoken of ever since the world began. We are gathered together in these mountains of Israel by the power and commandment of God. We are doing the work of God. This is not our home, as far as mortality is concerned. We shall soon pass away. But while here let us fill our mission. I want to say to Brother L. Snow, Brother M. W. Merrill, Brother J. D. T. McAllister and Brother D. H. Cannon, and all associated with you, carry these things before the Lord and see for yourselves. If you are not satisfied with this order of things, go and ask the Lord about it, and the Holy Ghost will reveal to you the truth of these principles.

This is all I ought to say at this time perhaps upon this subject. I am glad to meet with you. I have had a great anxiety over this matter. I have had a great desire that I might live to deliver these principles to the Latter-day Saints, for they are true. They are one step forward in the work of the ministry and in the work of the endowments in these temples of our God. When you get to the last man in the lineage, as I said before, we will adopt that man to the Prophet Joseph, and then the Prophet Joseph will take care of himself with regard to where he goes. A man may say, "I am an Apostle, or I am a High Priest, or I am an Elder in Israel, and if I am adopted to my father, will it take any honor from me?" I would say not. If Joseph Smith was sealed to his father, with whom many of you were acquainted, what effect will that have upon his exaltation and glory? None at all. Joseph Smith will hold the keys of this dispensation to the endless ages of eternity. It is the greatest dispensation God ever gave to man, and he was ordained before the world was to stand in the flesh and organize this work. He was martyred for the word of God and testimony of Jesus, and when he comes in the clouds of heaven he will wear a martyr's crown. Those of you who stand here—I do not care whether you are Apostles or what you are—by honoring your fathers you will not take any honor from your heads; you will hold the keys of the salvation of your father's house, as Joseph Smith does. You will lose nothing by honoring your fathers and redeeming your dead. It is a glorious work. When I returned from England in 1841 and heard Joseph Smith give this revelation, that we had power to redeem our dead, one of the first things I thought was, "I have a mother in the spirit world." My father was in the flesh. I baptized and ordained him and brought him up to Zion, where he is buried. But I never saw my mother to know her. She died when I was an infant. I had power to seal my mother to my father. Was not that a satisfaction? It was to me. I have gone to work with the assistance of my friends and redeemed my father's and my mother's house. When I went to inquire of the Lord how I could redeem my dead, while I was in St. George, not having any of my family there, the Lord told me to call upon the Saints in St. George and let them officiate for me in that temple, and it should be acceptable unto Him. Brother McAllister and the brethren and sisters there have assisted me in this work, and I felt to bless them with every feeling of my heart. This is a revelation to us. We can help one another in these matters, if we have not relatives sufficient to carry this on, and it will be acceptable unto the Lord.

Brethren and sisters, lay these things to heart. Let us go on with our records, fill them up righteously before the Lord, and carry out this principle, and the blessings of God will attend us, and those who are redeemed will bless us in days to come. I pray God that as a people our eyes may be opened to see, our ears to hear, and our hearts to understand the great and mighty work that rests upon our shoulders, and that the God of heaven requires at our hands. Great and glorious are these principles which God has revealed to us concerning the redemption of our dead. I tell you when the prophets and apostles go to preach to those who are shut up in prison, and who have not received the Gospel, thousands of them will there embrace the Gospel. They know more in that world than they do here. I pray God that as a people we may have power to magnify our callings in this great and mighty dispensation while we dwell in the flesh, that when our work is done we may be satisfied with this life and this work. This is my prayer and the desire of my heart, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT GEORGE Q. CANNON.

I am sure that every Latter-day Saint who has heard the announcement made by President Woodruff, will feel thankful in his heart for that which the Lord has made manifest through him. This subject of adoption is one that has engaged the attention of the Saints, to a greater or less extent, for some time. It was revealed by the Prophet Joseph that there is a principle of adoption by which one generation will be sealed to and connected with another, and in his words which have been read he fore-shadows the welding together, by this principle of adoption, of the various dispensations. In a revelation that the Lord gave through him, He said:

And again, verily I say unto you, if a man marry a wife, and make a covenant with her for time and for all eternity, if that covenant is not by me, or by my word, which is my law, and is not sealed by the Holy Spirit of promise, through him whom I have anointed and appointed unto this power—then it is not valid, neither of force when they are out of the world, because they are not joined by me, saith the Lord, neither by my word; when they are out of the world, it cannot be received there, because the angels and the Gods are appointed there, by whom they cannot pass; they cannot therefore, inherit my glory, for my house is a house of order, saith the Lord God.

On this account, marriages of the children of men are only binding as between themselves while the covenant lasts. Our fathers made their covenants with our mothers for time, and when time ended of course the covenant and the union ended also. Now, the Holy Spirit revealed that this being the case, every man and woman, and every child born as the offspring of these unions, would stand separately, unless a new bond were formed. Without this should be done, there would be no binding link to unite woman to man and children to parents; for all the obligations and all the covenants had terminated; and, therefore, members of families would each stand separately, without any connection of a binding character between themselves. Of course, there was what we call the bond of blood existing; (there is no blood, however, in resurrected beings) or, in other words, there was the bond that arose through kindred. That would remain. The Lord has taught us, however, that this is not all that is required; that there must be an authority exercised by which parents should be bound together, and then their children bound to them. We have been taught also that through the revelation of the Priesthood and its bestowal upon men, and the exercise of that Priesthood in sealing wives to husbands, the children begotten in these marriages are born, as we phrase it, in the covenant, that is, they are recognized by the Lord as legitimate children of the covenant. He having recognized the marriage of their parents, having given the authority to man on the earth to bind on earth, and that bond should be sealed in heaven. In this way the Latter-day Saints are being bound together in the new and everlasting covenant, wives being sealed to their husbands, and children, the offspring of these marriages, being born in the covenant, under the blessing and the recognition by the Almighty of the bond that exists between their parents. Thus you see that there is a new order of things growing up among us. It is not necessary, where parents are thus sealed together by the authority of the Holy Priesthood for time and for eternity, that their children should be adopted or be sealed to them. They are legitimate heirs of the Priesthood and of the blessings of the new and everlasting covenant. But not so with those who have been born outside of this covenant. There has to be some ordinance performed in order to make them legitimate; and that ordinance, the Prophet Joseph revealed, was the ordinance of adoption; that is, that word covers the ordinance or law, although we do not use the word adoption when we seal children to parents; we call that sealing. But to illustrate the principle and explain the law, the word "adoption" is used. You will find it frequently in the scriptures, and it has become a subject among us that has been very much thought about; and every man and woman, who has wished to do all that is required of them in order to obtain all the blessings that can be had through obedience to the commands of God, has desired to understand something about this principle of adoption.

We are told in the words that were read in our hearing that one dispensation must be linked to another, or, in other words, that the dispensations given to the children of men must be united; that we must all be united to our father Adam; that there must be a bond of union between us and our great parent; and that that will be done through the ordinance of adoption where children are not born in the covenant.

Hence it is that it falls to our duty to trace up our lineage; and, as has been beautifully explained this morning by President Woodruff, it is our duty to be sealed to our parents, that our lineage may be preserved; that we may preserve our families in direct descent, and trace them back, ascending lineally until we reach, if it be possible, our ancestors who held the everlasting Priesthood, and who were either born in the covenant or who were sealed to their parents under the law of adoption when the Priesthood was upon the earth. This has to be done by this generation and their successors. It is the labor devolving upon us as a people to perform this. The Prophet Joseph revealed this, but he died before it was fully explained.

When President Young died, the St. George temple was the only one finished, and it had barely been dedicated when he passed away. There is not a doubt in my mind that, had he lived, his mind would have been directed to this great subject and he would have inquired of the Lord to know that which was right; for in the minds of many there has been a feeling of doubt in regard to this principle of adoption as it was being practiced among us. I well remember myself in my boyhood days that which President Woodruff has referred to—the spirit that was manifested by many at the dedication of the temple in Nauvoo when the ordinances were administered there. Some men thought to build up kingdoms to themselves; they appeared to think that by inducing men and women to be adopted into their families they were adding to their own glory. From that day until the present, I have never thought of this subject of adoption without having a certain amount of fear concerning it.

There is nothing in the Gospel of Jesus Christ that leads to disunion. There is no true principle of the Gospel that will produce division. There is no true principle of the Gospel that will separate this people and divide them. And this revelation that God has given to His servant, the President of our Church, removes all the danger which seemed to threaten us through an imperfect understanding of the manner in which the law of adoption should be carried out.

To illustrate this point, let me suppose that the First Presidency of this Church were to seek to build up families for themselves from among this people, each one seeking to have men and women sealed to him in order that he might have a large following; and suppose each of the Twelve Apostles was to do the same; and suppose the High Priests and the brethren officiating in the temples were to do the same, what would be the result? You can see at once that in a little time we would be divided into tribes and clans, each man having his own following, and each following looking to the man to whom they had been adopted for counsel and for guidance, and in this way the governing authority of the Holy Priesthood in our midst would be divided and lessened. Who can not understand the danger there would be under such a condition of affairs? But how to obviate it, how to remove it so that it should no longer exist! God has removed it by making it plain that it is the duty of every man to be sealed to his father, where his father is not a man that has proved entirely unworthy. And when such a case arises—which will be very seldom—we have the man in our midst who has the keys of the Priesthood and unto whom this question can be submitted for him to decide what should be done.

My brethren and sisters, I have this belief concerning us: that it was arranged before we came here how we should come, and through what lineage we should come. We were not born of the seed of Ham; we were not born of some questionable race; but, as the Lord has taught us in the eighty-sixth section of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, our Priesthood has been hid with God. That section says:

Therefore, thus saith the Lord unto you, with whom the Priesthood hath continued through the lineage of your fathers,

For ye are lawful heirs, according to the flesh, and have been hid from the world with Christ in God;

Therefore your life and the Priesthood hath remained and must needs remain through you and your lineage, until the restoration of all things spoken by the mouths of all the holy prophets since the world began.

I am as convinced that it was predestined before I was born that I should come through my father as I am that I stand here. And if God chose to give to Wilford Woodruff's father the honor of begetting him, and it was so arranged before they were born, who shall step in and deprive him of the honor which God gave to him, and give it to somebody else? Reflect upon it and you will see that it would lead to endless confusion if this were done. We would be broken up in families and in our lineage, and there would be no distinction, consequently it would result in great confusion. Paul says, "that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him; in whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestined according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." I believe we were predestined to come here. I believe that it was arranged that we should come here as we have done. No doubt when we trace our ancestors back, we will find that they trod in muddy places. We shall find that there was wickedness among them. There can be little doubt about this, because they were human beings; they were exposed to temptation and to sin. Nevertheless, that was the arrangement; and when we meet with cases about which there will be question, we can then inquire of the Lord concerning them, and whether it would be right to continue the sealing of the children to them, and through them to somebody else or whether there shall be a break in the link; for we shall all be linked together as a chain. One generation will be linked to another by the power and authority of the Holy Priesthood until we get back to the time when the Priesthood was upon the earth, and when the authority to administer these ordinances was among men in former times.

Another thing that what we have heard today will effect. There has been a disposition manifested among our people, to some extent, for some men and women to gather up all the names of families they could find, whether they were related or not, and perform ordinances for them. I am a believer in this when it does not interfere with the rights of heirship. We should do all we can for those for whom we have friendship, or to whom we are attached in any way, and who have no living representatives that we know of in the Church. But you can see the advantage of pursuing now the course that is pointed out by the word of God to us. It will make everyone careful to obtain the connection, and to get the names properly of the sons and of the daughters of men, to have them sealed to their parents. It will draw the line fairly. It will define the lineage clearly. "But," says one, "that may take a long time." Well, we have got a thousand years to do it in. We need not be in such a hurry as to create confusion. The Lord will give us time enough to do it all; and when we have gone as far as appears possible, He will give to us opportunities that, at the present time, we are ignorant of; and we will find that everything will be made plain, and each man will trace his genealogy clear back, and we will know our connection, and what to do in relation to these matters, for the Lord will reveal it to us.

My brethren and sisters, suppose that each of us should seek some great man in the Church to be sealed to. For instance, we would like to be sealed to the President of the Church, because it would be a great honor to be adopted to him, and we think, "well, that man is much better than my father. I would rather be adopted to him than to be sealed to my father. I do not think very much of my father or my mother." Now, I think, when we feel that way, that we are, to a certain extent, despising the arrangement which the Lord has made. We should not despise our origin. On the contrary, we should seek to preserve it, and honor those who have given us birth.

It always has seemed to me, in reflecting upon this, that the Prophet Joseph honored his father who begot him; yet Joseph was the man chosen by the Almighty to stand at the head of the entire people of this dispensation. We all have to look to him. Every Apostle, and every great man in the Church, must of necessity turn his eyes towards the Prophet of God, whom He chose to lay the foundation of this work. You don't find anything in Joseph's life nor in his history, as it is recorded, that would give the least idea that he thought himself of so superior a nature that he could not honor his father and mother. In fact, I remember well the Prophet, in speaking about the sepulchre that he had prepared near the temple block, describing the joy that he would have in rising from the dead and striking hands with his father and with his kindred, and how delighted he would be to come up in the resurrection and grasp them by the hand. That spirit attended him in all his allusions to his kindred, to his father and mother especially. There is no doubt in my mind that the Prophet Joseph would be sealed to his father. He will honor his father and his mother. He will be sealed to them, and they and their lineage will doubtless be connected with him by the sealing ordinance as the head of this dispensation. They will have to be connected with him by some link or bond that will be created, if it does not already exist, as we all will be connected with him because he is the head of the dispensation. But as a son he will be connected with his parents; he will honor his parents; and in his turn he will be honored by his ancestry and all who come within the range and under the jurisdiction of this dispensation. All such will necessarily be sealed by some bond to the Prophet Joseph. In this way we shall all be united; and there can be no question on our part as to the propriety of being all connected with Joseph, carrying up every lineage directly as far as we can, and then linking them on to the head of the dispensation. There need be no jealousy, then. There need be none to say, "Well, I am sealed or adopted to a greater man than you. I am adopted to Joseph, or to Brigham, or to John Taylor, or to Wilford Woodruff, or to this man or the other man." There will be no need to pride and plume ourselves on the fact that we are adopted to these various men, and thus divide the people asunder in their feelings, creating to a certain extent a feeling of rivalry which does not belong to the Gospel of the Son of God. Every man that reflects upon it can see that this revelation which God has given through His servant Wilford Woodruff removes that danger out of our pathway and prepares us to go forward and honor our kindred and do everything we can for their salvation, concentrating our feeling upon our ancestors, and not upon somebody else's ancestors. In thus honoring our parents we also observe that ancient law which was given by God to the children of Israel, and which has such a great blessing attached to it:

Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

Why should a man come to one of the Apostles and be sealed to him and then trace his genealogy through him and his ancestors, and neglect his own? There have been some cases of adoption, I suppose, where the parties have not felt clear in their minds concerning this. This light, however, that we now have clears it all up and makes it plain; and we can see and understand it.

God bless you, in the name of Jesus, Amen.

The Bank of California has been annoyed and several traders have been victimized by a clever petty swindler. The man, says the Chronicle, whose name is unknown, was successful in getting about $200 from a score of storekeepers, about four months ago. This time he has cleaned up at least $100. The man selects Saturday afternoons and nights and Sundays for his work and then flies to parts unknown. His plan is to enter a store, make a purchase amounting to $2 or so, and give a check on the Bank of California for $40 as security. He then asks for a few dollars to make up the difference between the $2 purchase and $10 so as to have money to last him until Monday. He promises to call on Monday to redeem the check. The check in nearly every instance is made out to Werner or Weiner and endorsed by Smidt or Schmitt.

A WARNING AND A LESSON.

The Denver News of Tuesday, April 10th, offers a few words of severe criticism of the stand Governor West has taken in the matter of the industrial army at Ogden. That paper characterizes his conduct as shameful and un-Christian. At the same time it insists that the marchers can accomplish nothing for their own good or the good of the country by their journey into Washington and their demonstration upon Congress. "There is a strain of fanaticism bordering upon frenzy in this unusual undertaking," says the News, and it is inspired by a hope doomed to disappointment.

It is not quite clear how it can be "shameful" and "un-Christian" not to assist a body of men in an undertaking admittedly bordering upon frenzy and having for its object a demonstration utterly useless and hopeless. On the contrary, it seems to us to be highly magnanimous to endeavor, under such circumstances, to dissuade the participants from their proposed folly; as chief executive of Utah it surely could not be asked that Governor West should aid them in going to Washington to coerce Congress. Furthermore, it was clearly his duty to the community to take such precautions as seemed necessary to protect life and property from possible destruction; and to permit the men to remain within the Territory for an indefinite period, a public charge, was out of the question, if there was any legal means of preventing it. What course would the News have recommended?

We are not arguing that the threat to send the men forcibly back where they came from was altogether proper. That would have perhaps served the railroad company and the people of California right; neither of whom seemed to care a rap what became of the poor army or the people of Utah, upon whom they were heartlessly dumped, so long as they themselves were rid of them. But the industrials are human beings, with the rights of American citizens, and could not lawfully be forced and driven about like cattle. Our people have had none but the kindest of feelings for the unfortunate, and the treatment they received here is sufficient evidence of it. Once within our borders they had to be provided for or they would provide for themselves, and pending some solution of the problem as to how they could be gotten out of the Territory, it would have been an egregious blunder to leave them wholly to their own resources and to such measures of relief as they might have chosen to employ. It was necessary to do something, and that quickly. Perhaps too much was attempted; but it is better to try too much than to try nothing at all. The effort to compel the offending railroad to take care of its passengers was, in our opinion, as appropriate as the sustenance freely given them by Utah was generous. There may have been errors in some of the proceedings—such as the restraint and the threats of force while all were peaceable; but with the general result we think little fault will be found. Without exception the people of Utah will rejoice that the army has gone. We feel pleased that it has gone east—that is the direction it ought to go. No one begrudges the members the food they received while here, because starving men have never had to appeal unsuccessfully to the people of this Territory. No one would begrudge them the rights and privileges that belong to free men, for the people of Utah have known what it is to be denied those rights, and would never connive at or approve unconstitutional repression as against others. No one would intelligently question their right of petition, whether by word of mouth and in person or by memorial in writing; for though the people of this Territory have many a time and oft presented grievances in both the forms named and have been ignored, they still recognize the value of that method of procedure and would not seek to restrain its exercise by others. We may regard their full program as unwise and their expectation as chimerical; but in gratitude for the fact that they have gone without causing any local outbreak or lawlessness, we can well afford to wish them good luck and a pleasant journey.

As to the merits of the whole movement, it will readily be admitted that many of the weary travelers are homeless and moneyless unfortunates who are unable to obtain the means of subsistence under the present financial condition of the country. They are driven forward by an impulse, seeking to obtain something from the representatives of the country—they probably do not know what. They certainly appeal strongly to the sympathy and philanthropic sentiments of every-body. This is one side of the case. Looking at it from another point of view, it cannot be concealed that the marching of these hordes, insignificant as the movement as yet may be, is a symptom of a condition favorable to disturbances of a serious nature. What shape these may assume, should at least the various elements of discontent be united for a giant demonstration directed against the government, can at present only be a subject for conjecture. But the disaster that would result could not be confined to a party. It would affect the whole country. Looking at this serious aspect of the phenomenal undertaking, sentimentality must be put aside for the question of an effective remedy. The demands of the laboring classes are to a great extent just, and there must be legitimate means of meeting them. Even the downfall of the Roman republic might have been prevented had those in authority heeded the warning voice of their best citizens. Concessions to the toiling classes of this country are demanded. To accede to them as far as justice and the interests of all permit will be the best policy and the only means conceivable of preventing dire disaster. If men in trusted positions continue to wallow in moral filth, exposed to the gaze of the public, while nepotism, selfishness and arrogance are rampant and the poor are treated as the canaille whose interests are unworthy of consideration, then it is high time to prepare for a catastrophe. The marching army should be a warning and a timely lesson to the American people.

A HISTORIC BUILDING.

A few days ago Baranoff Castle, around which there are more historical associations than any other building in Alaska, was destroyed by fire. The place was the property of the United States, and for several years has been the headquarters of the government officials. At the time of the fire R. C. Rogers, U. S. commissioner, was the only person in the castle. He was in the second story, and when he discovered the flames his escape by the stairway was cut off. He was about to jump from the window to the ground, forty feet below, when assistance arrived and a rope was thrown to him by which he was able to descend. He had passed barely out of the window when the floor upon which he had been standing fell into the fire beneath. A large number of valuable books and papers were destroyed.

The castle, which is on the island of Sitka, was built upon an eminence commanding an excellent view of the town and harbor. In appearance it resembled more a country hotel than a castle. It derived its name from the Russian governor, Baranoff, who lived there in the early part of the century and ruled the people with an iron hand. At that time the governorship of Russian America was considered by Muscovite nobles a desirable position, and many notable men in the czar's domains made the castle their stopping place at different times.

A leading historical feature connected with Baranoff castle is the fact that it was from its roof that the Stars and Stripes was flung to the breeze on October 9, 1867, taking the place of the eagles of the czar, and signaling the transfer of 580,000 square miles of territory from Russian to American dominion. Many noted personages stood upon the balcony of the old edifice and witnessed the ceremonies. At a later date Lady Franklin, then eighty years of age, visited the place in search of some trace of her missing husband, Sir John Franklin, and made the castle her home during her stay. Wm. H. Seward, through whose efforts, aided by Charles Sumner and others, the vast territory was secured for this country by peaceable means, also stopped there some time on his travels after his retirement from office. From these historical associations there clustered around the castle an interest that causes regret among Americans at its destruction.

UNITING CHRISTENDOM.

Among the congresses to be held at the Midwinter Fair at San Francisco is one of representatives of the various religious denominations. This religious congress is to be in session for eight days, commencing on April 16. An elaborate program has been prepared for discussion, and learned professors of religion will discourse on Judaism, Theism, Buddhism, Christianity, Points of Agreement in All Religions, and kindred topics. A leading feature is to be a development, so far as practicable in such gatherings, toward what is designated as a Reunion of Christendom, the advocates of which are growing very numerous and are finding but little antagonism to their scheme.

That a proposition for the suggested union should rapidly gain favor among sectarians is not to be wondered at. True, there was a time, and that but a few years ago, when leading lights of the various Protestant denominations justified a disruption of Christianity into sects on the ground of necessity in the constitution of a body for the church—that it was as essential as hands, feet and other members were for the body of man. But it is now realized that the disruption theory does not mean a classification into one body of different parts, as members of one organization, but tearing piecemeal the body. As it is clear that such a line of procedure must ultimately bring destruction, the idea of division is not now advocated to any extent, but another plan of action is sought to be worked out.

None will question the claim that a union of Christendom upon principles that would meet the approbation of the Almighty would be a glorious consummation of a great plan. It would be a long stride in the way of bringing men to a unity of the faith and a perfect knowledge of the truth of the Gospel of Christ. Such a magnificent work would be nothing short of a miraculous exhibition of the power of God, therefore to be a complete success it would have to be in strict accord with His laws, and under His inspiration and guidance. But the scheme proposed is being operated upon different lines. There is no claim that it is in response to a revelation or command of God. In fact the persons who are engineering it repudiate the idea that the Almighty communicates His will in these days by His own voice to men or through the medium of heavenly messengers. The suggested plan of union is of human conception.

The final outcome of the movement, which may develop many changing features, it is not difficult to foretell. All of the sectarian churches sprang from one source; they were at one time within the fold of that power which succeeded the primitive Church, and which persecuted and put to death the disciples of Christ—"made war with the Saints and overcame them"—till the Gospel was driven from among the nations. No matter what particular claim of succession, direct or otherwise, any of them may present, the power named was once the universal head. By reformation or apostasy, or other means, schism, arose, and the formation of new religious orders followed. Yet notwithstanding the difference of views held by these, they all were daughters of the same mother church.

At one time, in this century, it might have seemed impossible to get any two of the sects in combination, so vital were the differences between them. Take for instance the chief representatives of the two conceptions of spiritual law, the Romish and the Presbyterian churches. The former is the determined advocate of one conception, and the latter of the other. The Papists hold that the basis of spiritual law is a divine authority vested in the church and a divine power and grace communicated to the church's officers. The Presbyterians hold that the spiritual law is revealed in the books of the Bible, and that this revelation is not only literal, but unique and complete. All other sectarian organizations are founded on a modification of one or the other of these two ideas; as the Episcopal church has modified the Romish idea, so the Baptists and Methodists and Congregationalists have modified the other idea.

With the situation left at this point any effort to unite all factions in one must result in failure. The two ideas referred to are essentially contradictory. They cannot be made to amalgamate; one or the other must be given up, for the presence of both is division. Beyond this, the Presbyterian idea, with its distortion of the doctrines of predestination and election, and Romanism with its ritualism and priestcraft, are so repulsive to those who take a comprehensive view of the justice of God and brotherhood of man that they reveal another element that is antagonistic to both as they are to each other.

But in the light of recent events it is quite probable that these radical conceptions and their outgrowth may be so varied in form as to admit of a coalition. For instance, the Presbyterian idea has undergone a great change through the elimination of the infant damnation part of the creed and its modification regarding the irrevocable condition of man after death. At the same time, the pope assumes an attitude of leniency in dealing with the United States that was never before known toward other governments. There is a lessening of the rigidity which existed to the extent that there is good prospect for combination. The mother church, however, retains intact her position of authority. It was a general feeling of disaffection and irritation which caused the breaking off and scattering in the first place; a general desire to settle differences and combine in a fraternal feeling can again unite the offspring into a family bond. But the mother would exercise supervision; that is a point which must be conceded before she will consent to union. Yet this claim is likely to be so modified that the supremacy of the one religious body may be recognized by the others in such a way as to constitute it the head of a federation of churches. They could then make common cause against all outside of the combination, and in that respect practically be one church, as all the members rest on the same foundation. They would retain their conflicting doctrinal views, yet be united on a general policy.

It is not improbable that the present agitation for a union of Christendom may result in the adoption of some such plan as this, which would be an embodiment of the "part of iron and part of miry clay" idea, having a measure of strength through the union, yet being partly broken by their dissensions. Such a coalition of churches would not be opposed by ruling powers, and instead of interfering with the political autonomy of the nations whose people gave allegiance to it, its aim would be to maintain existing governments, for its own purposes. The ancient Prophets beheld some such arrangement. They saw in vision the Church of the Lamb organized on earth in latter days. They also beheld that the power which made war with the Saints of the early Christian Church and overcame them, and to which the sects of Christendom owe their birth and development, again arrayed itself against the true Church—the "mother of abominations" did gather together multitudes upon all the face of the earth, among all the nations of the Gentiles," to fight against the Saints of the Church of the Lamb. The trend of the present movement is to make possible the gathering referred to. The Prophets, however, saw also that the Saints were "armed with righteousness and with the power of God in great glory," therefore the abominable church was made desolate. The combination of men, inspired by an unholy motive, will fail, while the Church of the Lamb will be established forever.

WHAT THEY'VE DONE.

The Illustrated American is a paper that cannot be accused of any undue friendship for the Mormons, yet in a recent issue it gives prominent position to the following: "Prussian missionaries; and yet she allows pagans to set up false gods, and atheists to deny God. Is this because the wise men of Prussia still believe the Mormons practice polygamy? The Mormons have made the western prairies blossom with the rose, smile with fields of grain, and rich by their well directed labors. Their towns are prosperous, their cities thriving, their industries remunerative. Their rulers declare polygamy is a dead letter. If polygamy be no more, the Mormon religion is not offensive. Nay, if it make a million of men and women subservient to the laws of God and man, it has merit in it."

As to the statement that the Elders have been expelled from Prussia, it is probable that our cotemporary is slightly in error. There is no information at hand that such action has been taken, nor is the report at all likely. Recent news from Lorraine, however, one of the provinces acquired by the Germans from the French in the late war, is to the effect that two Elders had been ordered to leave—no particulars as to the cause of the edict or the names of the missionaries being as yet given. We presume the American's strictures will be deemed to apply as well to Lorraine as to Prussia.

THE NEXT SENATE.

The present Senate of the United States consists of 44 Democrats, 37 Republicans and 4 Populists; there being three seats vacant through the failure of the state legislatures of Montana, Wyoming and Washington to elect incumbents. On the 4th of March, 1895, there will be 30 more senatorial vacancies—through the expiration of the terms of 12 Democrats, 17 Republicans and 1 Populist. In view of the great Republican gains in almost every election held within the past twelvemonth, and the almost certain prospect that the Republicans will control the next House of Representatives—a condition which leading Democratic papers are not now willing to dispute—it becomes of interest to glance at the prospects as to the upper House. The view will not be completely reassuring to those who belong to the party of the present majority; yet it is certainly more hopeful than if the party's continuance in power and its influence on legislation depended solely upon its strength in the popular branch of the national Congress.

The twelve Democratic vacancies above referred to will occur in seats now occupied by senators from Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and West Virginia—southern states all but one, where the Democratic success ordinarily expected will probably only be imperilled by the Farmers' Alliance or Populist movement, which has of late taken such a prominent part in southern politics.

The seventeen Republican seats that will be vacated are occupied at present by "favorite sons" from Colorado, California, Delaware, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Dakota and Wyoming. The one lone Populist to retire on the date named is Martin, of Kansas. Some of these states will assuredly re-elect their present senators, and under ordinary conditions they all might probably be counted upon to choose Republicans. But the aforementioned Populist movement has made sad havoc with many old-time political aspirations and precedents in some of these very states, and may be expected to continue its work of iconoclasm for at least a time longer.

The News is not in the business of prognosticating political results, but it feels that the foregoing showing will not be without interest. In some quarters it will be regarded with comfort, in others with doubt, in still others with hope. We should rather think the ones who can find in it basis for the latter feeling are the Populists. They can hardly fail not only to hold their own in the Senate, but to make a gain. In the latter contingency the question is of vital interest, at whose expense will the gain be made?

DANGER AHEAD.

The meeting of alleged workingmen in this city Thursday evening should cause serious reflections on the part of the people of Utah regarding the situation locally and the aspect of affairs generally in the nation. We use the term alleged workingmen advisedly in this connection. It is characteristic of genuine workingmen to exhibit a fair measure of common sense and respect for the rights of others in airing any grievances they may feel to have. Their practical experience in the realm of honest toil causes them to do this. The principal part of their work is not done with an unclean mouth and a nasty tongue. Those who labor in the latter fashion are the element that dominated the meeting last night. They do not have the sympathy nor do they voice the sentiments of the workingmen of this community.

So far as the calling out of the militia is concerned, there is no honest man who is acquainted with the circumstances but will state that the Governor was inspired by a sincere desire to preserve the peace and protect the rights of the people of this Territory. Whatever difference of opinion there may be as to the necessity for the action taken, there can be fairly no question as to the motive. There was danger of a horde of hungry and destitute, and in some degree at least, lawless, men being dumped in this Territory to prey upon the people until the latter should provide them with means to get farther east. The Governor took those steps which in his judgment were the best for preventing this dumping proceeding. It was not his business as to where the "army" was going outside of the confines of the Territory; but it was his business as to whether a railway should land and leave them here, and to this he directed his attention.

As to the allegation that there was no danger connected with permitting such a horde going at will under existing circumstances, so far as last night's meeting is concerned it is sufficient to say that if the alleged industrial army is of the same element as that which denounced the executive and judicial officers of this Territory, the participants in the meeting gave ample proof of serious danger. The violent expressions and the efforts to excite antagonism to the properly constituted officials were strongly anarchistic in their tendency, and a menace to the peace and welfare of the country. The demands for and threats of revolution were treasonable in their nature.

There has been a great deal said about the officials seeking to restrict the rights of American citizens. Unfortunately for the claim, there has not been a single instance of the kind on the part of the officers complained of. The latter have done all in their power to relieve the wants of those who were in need, not only among the men who came in from the West and stopped at Ogden, but the very persons who are engaging in this denunciatory business and who style themselves working-men. The latter, while loudly declaiming against others, are themselves seeking to restrict the rights of American citizens. They demand that the officials shall take no action when danger threatens; they insist upon certain changes in the governmental policy, and call for particular legislation which they assert will benefit them. But when others venture to raise a voice in protest, they are met by a storm of vituperation and threats of revolution, and are told as were the Governor and others last evening that they are not fit to live in a civilized country.

This agitation against the officials and the peaceable portion of the people cannot but result in trouble if it is permitted to go on. If it were kept within constitutional limits, there would be no occasion for alarm. But when it partakes of the nature of threats against the government, generally or locally, it is time the mass of the people were aroused to a sense of the seriousness of the situation. The danger can be averted only by correcting evils which exist. One of these in this country is that by which corruption is maintained and boasted of in high places, while those of lower estate are made to bear the heavy burdens. Another is the inclination to right every wrong by violent means. These and the class distinctions caused by various combinations which have grown up in the country, are endangering the very life of the nation. How the situation can be improved is a very important question to the people. One thing, however, is certain, and that is that it will not be by any such proceedings as those which occurred last evening in the Galena block. These only aggravate matters, and it is the duty of the people of Utah, as American citizens to show their loyalty to the Constitution by setting their faces firmly against such ill-advised and un-American expressions as were there given voice to, both in the speeches and the resolutions. There is a danger ahead, and it requires all the conservatism and caution of the people of Utah to do their share in averting it and standing by our national institutions.

WHERE IS IT AT?

The NEWS has been asked to give some information concerning the Utah statehood bill, which, at last reports, was seen to enter the room of the Senate committee on territories.

Our correspondent proves by the terms of his query that he already possesses about as much information on the subject as anybody else in these parts. Of course all that one hears is not information. One day the word comes bristling over the wires that the Democrats of the committee and of the Senate are going to put the statehood bill through. Another day the word comes that the Republicans want to hasten its passage and will all favor it, but the Democrats are disposed to hesitate. Another day, the busy telegraph line announces that both Democrats and Republicans want the bill passed, and are eager to vote for it but, the President objects and they defer to his objections. One paper tells one story, another paper tells another story; one makes this explanation of the delay, another presents quite a different excuse; until, out of complete disgust with the promises broken and the programs departed from, the conservative reader has ceased to believe any of them, and, as in the case of the correspondent above referred to, comes to the NEWS—which doesn't worry about the matter at all and doesn't gulp down every idle rumor that partisan tongues can start in circulation—to know what we think about it.

What we think about it is briefly this: there is more politics in the game and more rather awkward maneuvering for position than appears on the surface; this is the more readily resorted to because much confidence is felt in the patience and the forgiving spirit of the people of Utah. Remembering that the bill passed the popular branch of Congress by almost unanimous vote, the observer only needs to be able to distinguish a hawk from a handsaw in order to see into the present delay as clearly for himself as we can see into it for him.

WHERE THE MONEY IS.

There is much that is interesting in the consideration of an array of figures that has lately been giving the English publicists a great many texts for criticism. Not without a degree of sarcasm have they been pointing out that American comments on the wealthy aristocracy of England are now singularly fitting for home use. The calculations of an American statistician a year ago contain the kernel of all this mass of rejoinder. The Liver, published at Liverpool, in its issue for February 24, under the heading "American Millionaires," presents this summary:

J. D. Rockefeller and 7 others.....	$ 625,000,000
Fred W. Vanderbilt and 3 others.....	140,000,000
C. P. Huntington and 11 others.....	36,000,000
Eugene Kelly and 16 others.....	435,000,000
H. O. Havemeyer and 13 others.....	380,000,000
60 persons.....	1,930,000,000
23 " @ $10,000,000.....	230,000,000
37 " @ 5,000,000.....	185,000,000
57 " @ 3,000,000.....	171,000,000

Total, 231 persons.....$4,896,000,000

Concluding with the grim remark that the entire circulation of the United States is only $1,400,000,000.

Chambers' Journal, London, alluding to the same subject, thinks the brain must reel before the figures given, expressing, as they do, measures of wealth which the ordinary mortal is powerless to grasp. Then it goes on: Seventy citizens of the United States possess among them an aggregate wealth of $2,700,000,000, which gives an average of about $37,500,000 apiece. There was one estate returned as worth no less than $150,000,000. There were five individuals valued at $100,000,000; one valued at $70,000,000; two valued at $60,000,000; six valued at $50,000,000; six valued at $40,000,000; four valued at $35,000,000; thirteen valued at $30,000,000; ten valued at $25,000,000; four valued at $22,500,000, and fifteen at $20,000,000. Besides these seventy colossal fortunes, there are fifty other persons in the Northern States alone valued at over $10,000,000 each, thirty of them being valued in all at $450,000,000. There were some little time ago published lists of sixty-three millionaires in Pennsylvania possessing in the aggregate $800,000,000, and of sixty persons in three villages near New York whose wealth aggregated 500,000,000. In Boston, fifty families pay taxes on annual incomes of about a million each.

Our London cotemporary thinks there is nothing to compare with such individual cases of wealth in Great Britain. Baron Rothschild and Lord Overstone each left about £3,500,000; the late Lord Dudley left £4,000,000; the late Duke of Buccleuch, estimated to be the richest Scotchman, left estates valued at £3,000,000. One living English duke is valued at £10,000,000, and another at £8,000,000; but not many names could be added to these to place against the above list of American fortunes. In 1884 there were only 104 persons in the United Kingdom whose incomes from business profits were returned as over £50,000 a year. In 1888 there were only seventeen estates which paid probate duty on about £250,000 each.

The perusal of these figures, at this particular time, will suggest startling lines of thought, including doubtless theories as to the cause of the prevailing distress and plans for its removal. One thing is certain, there is wealth enough in the nation and in the world. Its distribution might perhaps be improved—but so might many other things that have contributed to bring about the present conditions. It is a long story and has more sides and aspects than any one observer has yet been able satisfactorily to point out.

THE NEW SCHOOL LAW.

Inquiry has been made regarding the provisions of the amendments to the school law, passed at the last Legislature. As the amendatory act is exceedingly long, we will note for the benefit of our readers the essential changes which have been made, which in some instances are radical departures from some of the provisions formerly in force.

The first division of the amending act relates specially to the duties of the commissioner of schools. That officer is required to make a distribution of the school funds in the treasury twice each year, in January and April, to the city and county schools. He is also directed to use an official seal, to visit all counties during the school year, and meet with the principal schools and school boards. His decisions, in reply to questions by school officers, are to be final until set aside by the courts or subsequent legislation. In his biennial report he is to make a statement of the city as well as the county schools.

In the duties of county superintenddent, that officer is required to make his statement to the county court monthly instead of quarterly.

Teachers' certificates are to be based on "ability," as well as experience, and university normals receive a first instead of a third grade certificate.

Except in cities of the first and second classes, which constitute single school districts, trustees are made elective on the second Monday in July instead of on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November, one election on the latter date evidently having been sufficient to cause the legislators to change this part of the procedure inaugurated two years ago. The first election of trustees under the new law will be in January, 1896, when three trustees will be elected, one each for one, two and three years respectively. In July, 1897, and annually thereafter, a trustee is to be elected for a three years term. Trustees are to organize within twenty days of the election.

The district board may close schools when the attendance for twenty consecutive days is less than eight pupils. It must also send its annual report to the county superintendent between the first and second Mondays of July, and must report to the voters on the second Monday in July of the present year, 1894, and annually thereafter. The county superintendent may close a school when the average attendance for twenty weeks is below eight pupils, except in certain cases. Provision is also made for suing the county treasurer when he refuses to pay a school warrant. In case of an election on bonding any county school district, twenty days' notice, instead of ten, is to be given of the meeting. The school boards are required to inquire into any case of misdemeanor under the act, in the district, and report the same to the city or county attorney, who is to take up the prosecution thereof.

Provision is made for the punishment of incorrigible children of school age in the following section: "All children in the district between the ages of eight and sixteen years who, in defiance of earnest and persistent efforts on the part of their parents or teachers, are habitual truants from school, or while in attendance at school are vicious, immoral, or ungovernable in conduct, shall be deemed incorrigible; and it is the duty of the president of the board of education or the chairman of the board of trustees of each school district to inquire into all such cases within his district and report them to the county attorney, acting for such district, whose duty it shall be to prosecute such cases as incorrigibles and fit candidates for the Territorial reform school."

These are all the provisions applying to the county districts, as such, and to cities of the third class and towns. The remainder of the act relates wholly to cities of the first and second classes. This division of the statute opens with a provision which affects school districts outside of incorporated cities. It provides that, with the consent of the county court, the board of education in cities of the second class may attach portions of territory contiguous to any municipal ward, and the territory thus attached becomes subject to the levy of tax and issuance of bonds the same as that territory to which it is attached; parts of such cities may be detached also.

The board of education in cities of the first and second classes is authorized to pay for services of its members not to exceed $25 per month each, except in cases of special services, when additional compensation may be made. Back salaries may be given also to members serving since March 13, 1890, to the limit stated. The clerk of the board is required to make annual financial and statistical reports to the commissioner of schools and to make his financial statement to the board of education for the year ending June 30, instead of December 31.

In certificates of teachers there are to be three grades, primary, grammar and high school. Instead of being good for one, two and three years, they are good to June 30 after issuance only, though a reissue may be made without the teacher submitting to a re-examination. Instead of third grade certificates being given to normal graduates of the University of Utah, those holding normal diplomas receive a high school certificate for three years.

The board of education is authorized to submit to the electors the question of levying a special tax, for one or more years, to buy sites, construct buildings, and improve school property. In advertising for proposals for the construction of buildings, if this be done twice in the case of schoolhouses to cost more than $5,000, and the bids on both occasions are unsatisfactory, the board of education may proceed to erect the building under its own direction; and if the structure is to cost less than $5,000, one advertising alone is sufficient.

Outside of the amendments herein noted, the entire amending statute is a re-enactment of the law previously in force.

THE CONDITION AND ITS CURE.

What causes the depression among the laboring classes of the most advanced nations of the earth? The question is one of overwhelming interest at present. But among those who have given the subject a critical examination, much difference of opinion is maintained. This fact partly accounts for the slow progress made towards a desirable solution. It is a case of the patient lingering while the doctors quarrel on the origin and symptoms of the disease.

On the one hand, it is held that the labor-saving machinery applied to almost every branch of industry has thrown the laboring multitudes out of employment, and forced them into other fields of activity, thus overcrowding the several industries. It is admitted that the application of mechanical devices for production is beneficent up to a certain point, but those who are willing to go this far argue that when that is passed, grave disturbances are the natural consequences, since the power of consumption cannot be increased on an equal scale with the power of production through the means of mechanical inventions; hence, to save labor by machinery, is really to force one portion of the laborers to remain idle and consequently destitute.

It cannot be denied that there is much to be said in favor of this view. To give only one illustration. If a man owns a hundred acres of land and will cultivate it all, he will employ a certain number of laborers, all of whom with their families are supported by the production. But when the owner is supplied with labor-saving implements, and applies them to the work, he is in a position to produce the same amount or more with the assistance of only a portion of the hands formerly employed. The rest are forced to idleness, unless there are other means open to them whereby to obtain a living. Nor is this all. The owner of the land finds himself in possession of more produce than he can consume himself, and as a large portion of the laborers in his vicinity are idle and unable to exchange their labor for his produce, this has become practically worthless, until a new channel can be found in which to turn it and convert it into other commodities of life. A moment's reflection is sufficient to show that the multiplication of mechanical contrivances for which our age is distinguished is one of the greatest blessings to mankind, as long as there are new resources within the reach of the laboring men crowded out by those inventions, and as long as new markets can be found for the products not needed by the producer. But when all such avenues for various reasons become closed, then depression is the result. This, it is said, is the condition at present. The industrial world is suffering from an excess of all forms of productive power. The laborers have been driven out of employment. The application of machinery to labor has caused a condition of destitution and all the evils resulting therefrom.

On the other hand, it is maintained that it is absurd to say that the production of the necessities of life in an abundance never before known to the world has increased the poverty of anybody. If the world, taken as a whole, is made wealthier, no one class of it can thereby have been made poorer. Those who take this view argue that the real evil is to seek in the mode of distribution of the wealth. It is pointed out that although labor is a principal factor in the production of wealth, less and less of it falls to the share of the laborers, while the employers constantly accumulate. The problem then would be to find a way whereby to equalize the distribution and thus to relieve the situation.

It seems that the current of public opinion is drifting in this direction. The socialists of the various schools are at hand proposing to solve the problem by the state taking possession of all the resources of the people and superintending both the production and the distribution. That is, they propose to transfer the struggle for existence from the individual to the state. With the supporters of the existing conditions the question is how to find a remedy for the evil consistent with the present system of individualism, which so many have already been led to consider inadequate to the needs of mankind.

In this connection it is well to remember that no scheme devised by man will ever be a sufficient remedy for the evils under which mankind suffers. There is, however, a plan designed by the Supreme Ruler of the universe and partly revealed to man, and when that shall have been adopted, there will be no more cause for complaints. It requires every man to acknowledge his fellow-men as his brothers, all accountable to their Father in heaven for the way in which they use the means they have. When this condition is brought about, no one need to suffer; "for the earth is full, and there is enough and to spare." Of course men of the world look upon the hope of the inauguration of a universal brotherhood in the bonds of religion as chimerical. But it will nevertheless come. The Gospel as preached in the first age slowly revolutionized society, until a proud Roman master did not hesitate to partake of the emblems of the Lord's Supper together with his humblest slave; the same Gospel as preached in this age will as surely bring about the condition desired when all social problems shall be solved in a glorious state of unity and harmony.

CRUELTY IN THE CAMEROONS.

Once in a while the civilized world is shocked on account of barbarities perpetrated by savages on white explorers endeavoring to penetrate unknown regions for commercial or scientific purposes. On such occasions a loud demand for punishment is generally raised, causing retaliation whereby the savages are unmercifully massacred and their native soil confiscated. This has been the policy of the European powers in their race for the extension of their territory. The rule is so general as to almost exclude exceptions.

At present a variation is supplied by the reports from the Cameroons in Africa where atrocities are said to have been committed by Europeans, the details of which are partly withheld from the public, because "too horrible for publication." But enough is made known about the deeds of the standard-bearers of civilization in that region to give an idea of what those "too horrible" outrages must have been. It appears, according to a dispatch from Berlin, that German soldiers, including some of the officers, under the influence of drink, amused themselves by torturing the natives. Some of the "hostile" Africans were captured and given up to the tender mercies of the intoxicated and uniformed mob. The soldiers scalped a few of them and this operation was performed by the inhuman butchers making an incision at the neck and then seizing the loose skin with the teeth and pulling the scalp off. Judging from the report of Assessor Wehlan, who says it gave the soldiers a splendid experience, it must have been a kind of competition to show the relative strength of the participants in the sanguinary sport—something similar to the amusement of two young princes in the last century, who used to experiment on live cattle to see who could make the deepest incision in the quivering boules with their swords. Some of the soldiers, however, were not content with a scalp. They skinned the captives alive, and when tired of this sport, women were brought from the prison and made to dance for the amusement of the slayers of their husbands or brothers or fathers. This report is official and may be depended upon as conveying no exaggerated details. The news has sent a shudder through the German empire.

When savages commit atrocities upon colonists there is this excuse for it, that they generally do so to resist invasion by the only means known to them—extermination of their enemies. They fight, in their savage way, for their lives and their country. But when such ghastly crimes are committed by representatives of a civilized race and one that boasts of being the followers of Christ, the cradle of religious advancement in the world and the leader of the great kulturkampf, no word is strong enough to express their true character. It seems as if the only adequate punishment would be to turn those wretches, one and all, over to the natives and let the latter inflict such retaliation as their genius might suggest. No one could reasonably question the justness of such a course, while much might be said in vindication thereof. Even savages have their rights as human beings, and these must be respected if the idea is to advance civilization among them, rather than to kill them off like wild beasts. Travelers like Mungo Park and Livingston have sufficiently demonstrated that even the Africans in the interior of the dark continent have many admirable qualities. It is not impossible to elevate the race and give it the blessings of civilization. To do so without unnecessary barbarity is certainly incumbent upon the countries that seize the soil and undertake the responsibility of native educators.

REVIVAL OF NAPOLEONISM.

In the year 1871, so fraught with disaster to France, that country rose in its might and with a supreme effort tore away every tie that united it to the house of Bonaparte. In the dark hour of immeasurable distress when French soil was drenched with the blood of its conquered defenders, when the political body was quivering under the Prussian dissecting knife in the hands of the stern iron chancellor, when the coffers were being emptied by the successful invaders, and when, worse still, a band of adventurers and vagabonds took control of affairs in the beautiful capital—then it was that the people experienced a radical convulsion of feeling against Napoleon. His inglorious surrender and the unexampled defeat of his generals resulted in the discovery of the rottenness of the imperial administration, and for the time being everything else was forgotten. The glory of the past was obscured by the dense clouds of the present. Imperialism was demolished to the foundations and on the ruins the republic was established.

But since then a great many things have happened. The country has enjoyed much prosperity. The wounds have been healed and the clouds have dispersed. Revelations in connection with the Panama canal brought to light a condition of affairs hardly surpassed during the days of the empire. It has been found, too, that internal peace and order are not secured to any greater extent under the present rule. The recent extraordinary virulent outbreaks of anarchism have created in many minds a fear that the country is drifting towards a condition similar to that which preceded the reign of terror, and which finally enabled the first Napoleon to assume the role of a savior of the nation and lead it on the march of glory. All these things have resulted in a noticeable change of public opinion favorable to a new revolution whenever the right moment shall have arrived.

A correspondent of a New York paper in a recent letter from Paris says the reaction commenced two years ago with the publication of the Memoirs of Count Marbot, which was followed by numerous pamphlets and newspaper articles on the events of the first empire. This tide of Napoleon literature has been increasing steadily and is now inundating the theaters and other places of amusement, giving full evidence of the genuineness of the change that has occurred. What the result will be is difficult to say, unless it is safe to reason from the past on the principle that history always repeats itself.

The question has already risen as to the person who would be likely to assume the leading role in a possible revolution in favor of a revival of the empire. The correspondent referred to calls attention to Prince Louis Napoleon, a descendant of Jerome Bonaparte, the first emperor's youngest brother. It was this young prince, we believe, who a few years ago created a storm of sensation and captured the hearts of the Frenchmen by entering the country, notwithstanding the edict of banishment issued against the whole family, and demanded to take his place as a conscript among the common ranks of the soldiers of France. He insisted that it was his right as a French subject to serve the country in this capacity. The government, however, had him arrested and sent out of the country, but his act of bravery and apparent patriotism has not been forgotten by the people. Since then he has been serving in the Russian army where he has already risen to the rank of colonel.

Possibly he is the coming man in the history of France. He has recently obtained leave of absence for an indefinite period and his doings during this time will certainly be closely watched by those to whose care the French republic has been entrusted.

The sheepmen of Bingham and Fremont counties will meet at Idaho Falls on May 1st to devise means for the sale of their wool to the best advantage of all concerned.

"THE GOOSE that laid the golden egg" was not a more desirable fowl than would be the great auk, the largest of the auk family, and extinct since 1844. Only two of its eggs are known to be in the United States, and only sixty-eight are known to be in existence anywhere—of these only ten being perfect specimens. The last one that was put up for sale fetched $1,550 at auction in London three weeks ago, and it wasn't a very good egg, or a very good day for auk's eggs, either.

FROM NEW MEXICO.

DEMING, Grant County, N. M.,
March 22, 1894.

On Friday morning, the 16th inst., in company with Elder William F. Brown, who was called on a special mission to take me to Silver City, I left Luna Valley, traveling in a heavy lumber wagon, bound for Mexico. For about 8 miles our road led up a steep rocky canyon until the summit of the San Francisco mountains was reached. Thence we traveled down grade over narrow, rocky dugways, steep hills and through rocky gorges, where the road was as near no road at all as anything I have ever seen. Finally, after traveling during the day 25 miles, we found ourselves encamped for the night at the head of a canyon, which Bro. Brown called Geleece. The next morning we climbed a hill which was as near perpendicular as any part of the earth could possibly be and be climbed by a team, and on reaching the top we had the satisfaction to know that, although climbing only a distance of something like half a mile, we were advanced on our journey about six miles, besides escaping about fifty crossings of the San Francisco river; for we had taken a so-called "cut-off." About 20 miles from our camping ground of the previous night we reached the little mining town of Alma, situated at the point where Mineral Creek puts into the San Francisco river; and ten miles further down the last named stream we reached the so-called Williams Valley, where the Mormon settlement known as Pleasanton stood from 1882 to about 1885, when it was broken up, partly because of the prosecutions which at that time were inaugurated against our people who had married beyond what the Edmunds law allowed, and partly because a Mr. Wheeler, who had entered the townsite in behalf of the people, proved untrue to his trust and disposed of the site, on which a number of good and substantial buildings had already been erected, to a non-Mormon, which made vacation preferable. At one time there were about twenty families of the Saints residing here, and a complete ward organization with Wm. C. McClellan as Bishop was effected in October, 1882. It was also here that Jacob Hamblin, the famous Indian missionary, died on August 31, 1886, after nearly all the Saints had vacated the place. His remains were exhumed three years later and re-interred at Alpine, Arizona, in July, 1889. Williams Valley was named in honor of Geo. C. Williams, also known as "Parson Williams," who embraced the fulness of the Gospel at this place, and afterwards presided as Bishop of the Heber Ward, in Luna Valley. He is now engaged in founding a colony of Saints in Sonora, Mexico. This is a very desirable locality. The valley, which is penetrated by the San Francisco river, is about 3 miles long with an average width of 1 mile. It is about 60 miles from Luna Valley, about the same distance from Silver City and nearly 90 miles from the nearest settlements of the Saints on the Gila, in the St. Joseph Stake of Zion. Williams

Valley is now occupied by six families, of which only one claims any interest in the Church. There has been no Church organization here since 1885, when the Bishop and others of the leading men took their departure into old Mexico.

On Sunday morning the 18th inst. we were again on our way and made a Sabbath journey of 30 miles to the Gila river, where we encamped for the night. This river, after the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, Feb. 2, 1848, became the boundary between the United States and Mexico, but through the Gadsden purchase in 1854 the present boundary was established. On Monday we traveled 30 miles, crossing the continental divide from the head waters of the Mancos, a tributary of the Gila into what is known as the Mimbres basin, from which the streams have no outlet into the ocean, but sink into the ground or disappear in lakes like those rising in the basin of the Great Salt Lake. Arriving at Silver City in the evening, we found ourselves in one of the principal mining camps of New Mexico.

Silver City is situated in a narrow valley or canyon south of the Pinos Altos mountains; it is the county seat of Grant County, New Mexico, and contains several thousand inhabitants. By special invitation Elders Jesse N. Smith, Ira Hatch and Geo. C. Williams visited this city early in 1884 and delivered four lectures on the principles of the Gospel, which were listened to with marked attention and seemed to give general satisfaction, though it was at first anticipated that violence would be used against the Elders if they attempted to preach. It is hoped that the seed sown on this occasion will bear fruit at some future day.

From Silver City to Deming, a distance of 48 miles, I came yesterday by rail. Deming is situated in an open flat country on the Southern Pacific and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railways. It is sometimes called the "city of wind mills," owing to the great number of wind mills which of late have been introduced and built in order to raise the vast underflow of water 60 feet under ground to the surface, then to be used for culinary purposes; and for watering gardens for there is no living surface stream where the town is built.

It is from Deming that the railroad projected by the Hon. John W. Young is to start southward into Mexico. After encountering almost insurmountable difficulties, the projectors of this road, which is known in New Mexico as the "great Mormon Railway," are now confident that the enterprise will materialize, and that work will be resumed in a little while. J. Fawson Smith, Esq., Mr. Young's agent, is stationed here at Deming attending to the business of the projected road, and doing preparatory work, looking to the time when work shall be commenced anew.

Apostles Brigham Young, John Henry Smith and George Teasdale arrived yesterday afternoon at this place (Deming) from Mexico, accompanied by Elder Robert S. Watson and others. These brethren have just completed a tour through the Mexican colonies, occupied by the Saints, and on Sunday, the 11th inst, they organized a new ward in Sonora, which they named the Oaxaca Ward. It embraces the Saints residing on the Bavispe river. Franklin Scott was set apart as bishop of the new ward, and George C. Williams was set apart as his first Counselor; James H. Langford, though not present at the meeting, was set apart as second Counselor. A Sunday School, a Relief Society, a Y. M. M. I. A., a Y. L. M. I. A. and a Primary Association were also organized, and the whole ward machinery set in good working order. The brethren speak highly of the location on the Bavispe river, and commend Elder Williams highly for his energy and enterprise as the mainfounder of what now promises to be a prosperous community.

CALIFORNIA MISSION CONFERENCE.

The first annual conference of the California mission was held in the Latter-day Saints meeting house, Mission street, San Francisco, on Sunday, April 8th at 10:30 a.m. and 2 and 7:30 p.m. At the forenoon meeting there were on the stand Elder Karl G. Maeser, presiding; Bishop George Romney of Salt Lake, and Elders E. Stevenson, Salt Lake; E. T. Clark, Farmington; William Wright, Ogden; E. Blodgett and A. L. Kellar, of the California mission; and Elder Mortensen, president of the San Francisco branch. The audience, consisting of members of the San Francisco branch, brethren and sisters from Utah, and many strangers, nearly filled the hall.

After the usual opening exercises, Elder K. G. Maeser and Bishop Romney addressed the congregation. One of the strangers present arose and indulged in strong language against the work of God. Being requested by the president of the meeting to either keep quiet or leave the room, he withdrew, uttering violent imprecations.

The meetings in the afternoon and evening were attended by the largest congregations the Saints have ever had in San Francisco. Elders Maeser, Clark, Wright, Stevenson, Blodgett and Kellar bore their testimonies to the mission of Joseph Smith, the Book of Mormon and the Latter-day work. The general authorities of the Church were presented and sustained, and the sacrament administered. The clerk also read a short statement of the statistical and financial condition of the San Francisco branch, no complete returns from the other parts of the mission having as yet been made.

We have been favored from time to time of late by visits from Apostles Thatcher and Lyman, and Elder B. H. Roberts, as well as other brethren from Zion, and hope to be blessed in a similar manner in the future, as by these visits the Saints are encouraged, strengthened in their faith, and instructed in the things pertaining to their eternal welfare. The interest thus awakened begins to attract the attention of many honest in heart, so that our meetings are constantly increasing in attendance. Our Sunday school meets every Sunday at 10:30 a.m. and we are endeavoring to come as near the pattern set us by our sister institutions in Zion as circumstances will permit. Even a relief society is in process of organization.

The efforts of the president of the mission, Brother K. G. Mæser to make this branch of the Church a nucleus for extended missionary labors in California are ably and faithfully seconded by his fellow missionaries, Elders J. D. Cummings, E. Blodgett, H. B. Williams, Geo. H. Maycock and S. A. Kellar, and the president of the branch, Brother Mortensen.

California is not a very propitious field for missionaries. Religion here seems to consist mainly in contentions between the various religious denominations who are struggling and scrambling for power and influence, while the rest of the people appear to know only three things worth living for, which are, money, pleasure and politics, each of these being made subservient to the other two. The labors of the servants of God are thus like a "voice in the wilderness."

W. B. PHILLIPS,
Clerk of Conference.

SAMOAN MISSION NEWS.

FAGALII, SAMOA,
March 27, 1894.

Since my last letter to you the Samoan mission home has been the scene of another very sad occurrence which caused a gloom to come over us that is not yet entirely dispelled.

Little Harold Hilton passed from this life on the 17th inst. His demise was very sudden, he having been ill but a few days. On Sunday the 11th he was not feeling very well and was administered to during the night. For two days following he appeared to be improving, but on the morning of the 14th his mother again became concerned about his welfare. From then until his death, which occurred at 11 a.m. on the date before mentioned, everything that loving hands could do was done for his recovery, but he grew rapidly worse, and at the time stated, amid anointings and prayers and supplications to the Lord, the little spirit took its flight to Him who rules on high.

Oh, how loth we all were to believe that it was so! How sad to see our dear sister again bereft, and her so far from dear parents and friends, whom she has left for the Gospel's sake! We felt to say, "Thy will, O Lord, and not ours be done! Thou gavest and Thou hast the right to take away; we humbly bow to Thy decree, who doeth all things well."

Thomas Harold Hilton was about one and a half years old, a beautiful little boy and very dearly beloved by all the missionaries, as well as the natives who knew him. Much sympathy is felt for the bereaved parents, and the blessings of the Lord are invoked upon them.

THE WAR.

The Samoan civil war, which has been raging for some few weeks past, is now reported as being about at an end; but doubts are entertained about peace being permanently restored for some time to come. The present trouble seems to have mostly originated over a petty quarrel between natives living on two separate islands—Upolu and Savaii—and is not considered, by all at least, as a rebellion like the war of '93.

There are no warships here, or things would take on a different aspect, as the Samoans are very much afraid of the big guns (cannon), which they call "fana-fanna." According to the best account obtainable, there have been but fifteen killed and twenty-five or thirty wounded.

The three consuls are laboring energetically for the suppression of any rebellious spirit which may manifest itself. They are doing a good work in the interest of peace, for which much credit is due to the representatives of the "Three Great Powers."

MISSIONARY LABOR.

Our labors here are being very much retarded by the present troubles, as the people, especially the natives, seem to think more about the destroying of their fellowmen than they do about the principles of the Gospel. Our conference, which was to be held next month, will now have to be postponed till peace is restored so that the people can be brought together without fear of being molested.

At our meetings on Sunday last the "faisa" was better filled than I have ever known before. The writer enjoyed the privilege of speaking to over seventy of these South Pacific Lamanites on the subject of the "Restoration of the Gospel," bearing testimony to them that the angel of the Lord which John saw has brought the "everlasting Gospel" to the earth for the salvation of all those who yield humble obedience to the requirements of the same. Thus we rejoice in the work of the Lord and pray for its continued progress in the midst of this degraded branch of the house of Israel.

The News is always read by us all with much interest and profit.

Ever praying for the prosperity of Zion and the welfare of the servants of the Lord in every land and clime,

I remain,
your brother in the Gospel,
STEFANO.

PLYMOUTH NEWS.

PLYMOUTH, Box Elder Co., April 12, 1894.—Spring has come at last and the farmers are busy putting in their crops. There has been considerable sickness here among the children the last few months, and on Friday last, April 6th, Brother Henry Clark, of this place, lost a little son, Charles Edward, aged 3 years, 5 months and 23 days, of croup; and on the next day, the 7th inst., a daughter, Sarah Annie, aged 12 years, 9 months and 20 days, of diphtheria croup; and on the 10th inst. another son, John George, aged 7 years, 3 months and 6 days, of croup.

Brother George Smith, of this place, also lost a little son on the 9th inst., James Samuel, of pneumonia or diphtheria croup, aged 7 years and 9 months.

The bereaved parents have the sympathy of the whole community in their great loss. Yours,

JAMES BURNETT JR.

Our people are very busy putting in crops; the outlook for fall grain is very bad again this spring, the cause being that a crust forms before the grain gets up. We are putting in much land to lucern, which pays better than any crop grown on dry land. A great many of us have bought land under the great canal, and it is very productive; with water, fifty bushels of wheat per acre was raised last year; vegetables also do well. We are going to try fruit trees this spring. If we can make a success of fruit growing we will be happy, as this is a fine country and large enough for hundreds of families more. The canal company has located a town site for us. They gave a number of lots away and $500 towards building a meeting house. The town is booming.

We are very sorry to record the deaths of three children of Harry Clark and one of George Smith, cause, diphtheria. It has cast quite a gloom over our place; our sympathy goes out to them and we ask the Lord to comfort them in their loss.

JAS. H. HESS.

SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

Owing to the very bad weather, there was but a small attendance at the Sunday School Union meeting Monday evening, April 16th. Superintendent Thomas O. Griggs presided.

The excellent musical exercises were rendered by the juvenile choir of the Fifth ward, directed by their instructor, Brother Daniel Smith. Opening prayer was offered by Elder James M. Barlow.

Elder Wm. Bradford was the first speaker, and delivered a very instructive address on the subject of "Attention, how to maintain and retain it."

In order to teach at all successfully, he said, attention must be obtained. The first essential is to arouse interest in the class of pupils; this may be obtained by illustrations on the blackboard of parts of the lessons, by the use of objects, etc., and the judicious use of apt and pointed stories that illustrate the principles the teacher wishes to impress upon the minds of the children.

The use of a chart, if handled carefully, is a great help in keeping up interest in Bible and Book of Mormon subjects. A chart should be shown only in one lesson at a time so that the interest may be kept up to the last lesson on the chart. The teacher should be well and abundantly prepared, that is, have much more prepared than he expects to present to the class, and he should always know what he is going to do next and never hesitate.

The work done in the class should be always adapted to the capacity of the pupils. No matter how good the lesson may be, nor how well presented, if the subject or matter, or the language of the teacher, is beyond the understanding of the pupils, the lesson will prove a failure, children cannot attend long to that which they do not understand, or that they are not interested in.

Variety should be studied by the instructor; the same old routine becomes very tiresome to children and should be avoided, and the lessons should be often presented in a new form, with new objects, and illustrated with new stories.

Lessons that cannot be presented in an indirect way, as in a parable or story, in which the children may be able to see the application themselves, are very effective in arousing interest, and in impressing truth upon the mind. Attention is a habit, and should be cultivated as such. If the teacher can obtain the close attention of his pupils today, it will be much easier to get their attention the next time they meet, and the teacher cannot do better than continue to retain the attention of his pupils by every possible means, so that the habit may become fixed and permanent.

To be most effective in teaching a class, too much dependence upon and reference to the text book must be avoided. The teacher should become so familiar with the lesson that little or no reference need be made by him to the book. This will inspire confidence, and the instructor will have much better command of himself and of the class and attention will be given much more readily by the pupils.

Frequent questioning of the pupils, particularly of the backward ones, and recapitulation of the lessons, linking one lesson upon another in logical order, are great aids in fixing the attention and in aiding the memory to retain the lessons as presented by the teacher. Lessons should be frequently reviewed also, so that the teacher can see the progress made by the pupils, that he may not get beyond their capacity in the progress of the lesson. Thoroughness cannot be attained in any other manner. If the lesson is too much the children cannot grasp it, and they leave the school with wrong impressions and often much harm is done where good was intended, whereas, if the lesson had been thoroughly learned by the pupils progress would have been made, and unless the children feel that they are progressing in knowledge, there is little incentive to attention.

A very important qualification to successful teaching was earnest enthusiasm on the part of the instructor. If he be not interested in his lesson he need not expect his pupils to be, and without interest there would be no attention.

The earnest teacher should not only be vigilant in his class work, but always should be on the alert for new material for his work, as stories, anecdotes, incidents, objects, and the like, and weave them into his lesson as opportunity offered. In this manner the successful teacher always had something fresh for his class, and continued interest would be the result.

To the objection that it was difficult for most teachers to relate a story or incident, or use objects successfully before children, the speaker suggested the old maxim that "practice makes perfect," and related the incident of the man who had what was to him a very difficult subject to lecture upon. After preparing himself on the subject, in order to learn how to present it in a pleasing and attractive style, he would stop a friend on the street and tell him all about it, or as long as he could get him to listen, and then met another and talked to him in the same way, and kept at it until he attained his object.

"Have courage, my boy, to say No," solo and chorus, was well rendered by Master Manassa Smith and juvenile choir.

Elder J. H. Parry was the next speaker. His subject was "Sunday School Statistics." Referring to the annual report of the Sunday Schools of this state for 1898, which showed a total enrollment of 11,828 pupils, the average attendance was but 6860, scarcely 60 percent of the enrollment. The enrollment did not include more than 75 per cent. of the Latter-day Saint children in the State. An average attendance of 60 per cent. on an enrollment of 75 per cent. showed that less than one-half (45 per cent.) of the Latter-day Saint children were in regular attendance at Sabbath School. The speaker urged that efforts be made to increase both the enrollment and the average attendance. The most effectual method he thought was to increase the efficiency of the schools themselves, and make them more interesting and attractive, as suggested in the timely remarks of the previous speaker. Unless this was done all efforts in other directions would end in failure. If these schools were made more attractive; in all the departments, very little other efforts need be made to increase the average attendance and enrollment. In support of this position, the speaker related a recent change made in a school where a new teacher was installed in the theological class. He was earnest, energetic, prepared interesting lessons, and put life and spirit into his work. From an average attendance of eight or ten pupils the class numbered in less than six weeks nearly eighty regular attendants.

Superintendent Griggs followed and urged the importance of making the schools more effective for good and bringing within their fold all the children, that all might be benefited and instructed in the principles of the Gospel.

The Fifth ward juvenile choir will furnish music at the next meeting again, as the inclement weather prevented many of the members from attending tonight.

Benediction was pronounced by Superintendent Clark, of the Fifth ward, and the meeting adjourned for one month. JOS. H. PARRY,

Secretary.

A FEARFUL ACCIDENT.

A dreadful catastrophe was averted Monday morning through the passenger train due at Ogden from the East at 1:30 a.m. being a few minutes late. Many frightful accidents have occurred from the same cause that prevented this one. It appears that an eastbound freight train with a helper engine was making its way up Weber canyon about 1 o'clock in the morning, and the engineers had received orders to run from the first switch, which is about eight or ten miles from Ogden, to the second, and there allowing the incoming passenger train to pass. This is what saved the passenger train, loaded down with an unusually heavy burden of humanity, from being dashed down the steep embankment at the worst turn of the Weber river.

Unknown to the men, a landslide had blocked the track in the neighborhood of Devil's Gate, and the freight train, on its way to the second switch, dashed into the debris. The first locomotive jumped the track, and broke loose from the second, while the next instant it was precipitated down into the raging stream below. The engineer jumped from the engine and broke his leg.

Consternation reigned among the passengers on the train from the east when they learned how near they had been to destruction. They were then in the very jaws of death, and many ladies were thoroughly prostrated with the fright. The passenger train runs at a very high rate of speed after passing the second switch east of Ogden, and had it been on time that morning, it would have dashed into the landslide and been hurled into the rocks and river below. Few would have lived to tell the tale.

The passenger ran into an open switch and was delayed seven hours by the accident to the freight. The train is known as No. 1, is the fast mail and is due in Salt Lake at 3 a. m. On Saturday night the fast mail ran into a rock car near Hilliard, Wyo., and the engine and two mail cars were ditched. The engineer and fireman were both killed and the mail clerk injured. The names of the deceased are William Lethbridge, engineer, and O. H. George, fireman. No other damage was done so far as can be learned.

A News reporter succeeded in finding Superintendent Bancroft of the Union Pacific Monday afternoon and interviewed him in regard to the reported disaster in Weber canyon in the morning. He stated that a huge mass of rock fell from the cliff four hundred feet above the railroad track and demolished the roadbed for a distance of ninety feet. The rock rested on the track and weighed about twenty tons. A watchman was cognizant of the obstruction, which was located about one mile this side of Uintah, and went forward to flag the passenger train. The watchman, however, was not aware of there being a special freight going east, and went up the line on a lookout for the fast mail. The engineer and firemen on the leading locomotive of the freight jumped from the engine just as it was about to crash into the mass of rock, and the fireman, whose name is J. W. Beckerton, broke his right leg. The engineer escaped without serious injury. The locomotive is badly wrecked at the foot of the embankment.

The Fifteenth ward meeting house, situated on First South street west, was the scene of a fire at ten o'clock yesterday (Sunday) morning that would certainly have proven disastrous had it not been discovered in its incipency. The children of the ward were assembling for Sunday school at the time. One of the little ones noticed that the roof near the smoke flue was on fire and gave the alarm to older persons present. There is a fire alarm box nearby, and to this a messenger ran as quickly as possible. On arriving there, however, he found no key with which to turn in the alarm, nor was there any information as to where the key was. Several houses in the neighborhood were visited before it could be found. Finally it was secured and the west side department was called out, but before it reached the meeting house the fire had been extinguished by means of the hose kept on the ground. The loss will not exceed $15.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

A strike of rich ore has been made on the 800 foot level of the Bullion-Beck.

On Saturday, May 5th, the Utah Y. M. M. I. A. Stake conference convenes. In connection with the conference will be a grand competitive concert.

BULLIONVILLE, Nev., April 13.—Bishop Milton L. Lee, of Panacea, Nevada, died today at 10:40, of inflammation of the bowels. His family are left in very comfortable circumstances.

Wells, Fargo & Co. have filed an action in the Third district court against the Ogden Gas Light & Fuel company, whereby they seek to collect $14,750 on a promissory note.

Four members of Coxey's army, in view of the cold treatment accorded them at Ogden, travelled further north, and were run in at Logan on Monday evening. They were released on Tuesday morning and resumed their journey toward the eastern coast.

Joseph W. Thatcher has returned from the East, where he recently graduated as D. D. S. He refused a flattering offer made him from Virginia, preferring to return home. He is undecided as to whether he will commence his practice in Logan or go to Salt Lake.

Mining locations continue to be made in the west mountains and north of the Manti. Some fine specimens are being taken from these claims. They carry gold in good quantities and assays prove that there is some foundation for the gold boom that will soon strike this city.

Elders George Goddard and George Reynolds, of the Deseret Sunday School Union authorities, left Friday evening by way of San Francisco, in order to attend the annual Sunday school conferences of the St. Joseph, Maricopa and Mexican stakes. They will probably be absent a month.

Logan has been infested with more tramps during the past week than have been ever seen here in the same length of time, unless it is when a circus comes to town. The police are attending to business, though, and the unwelcome visitors are compelled to either seek safety in immediate flight or go to the city bastille.

The central Utah sheep owners have decided to pay but three cents for shearing this season. Undoubtedly they know their own business, but judging from the expression of the sixty odd experienced shearers in Ephraim, one would believe that they must go begging to get good work done for that.

The Bishops of the wards of the city should arrange to administer the sacrament in their respective wards hereafter on Sabbath evenings, inasmuch as the Presidency, at the late General Conference, advised that we discontinue its administration in the Tabernacle.

ANGUS M. CANNON,
President of Stake.

Amos Packer and John Wight, says

the Brigham Bugler, two young men of this city, who recently went out to Oregon to seek their fortunes, are doing even better than they expected. The boys are now engaged in placer mining in that state. They have already earned a snug sum, which has been invested in other paying properties in the same vicinity.

The home industry movement will affect Cache valley during the coming summer. The Franklin woolen mills will be run to their capacity; it is nearly certain that the Logan broom factory will be reopened; new dairies will be added to the number already in successful operation, and the establishment of other industries is being seriously considered.

Suits for the recovery of the following amounts due on notes have been instituted: Provo Commercial and Savings Bank vs. Provo Milling & Manufacturing Co., $1,000; First National Bank of Sterling vs. Richard Johnson et al, $528.20; Nephi Savings Bank vs. Wm. Probert et al, $5,000; Zion's Savings Bank & Trust Co. vs. John Morrison et al, $500.

John Larson, formerly of Spanish Fork, but recently of Smithfield and Clifton, in Cache county, was arrested, together with Sarah Gay, also of Spanish Fork, for adultery. The evidence was conclusive; both parties pleaded guilty, and were bound over to await the action of the grand jury. The woman succeeded in securing bonds, in default of which Larson was consigned to jail.

The Oneida Stake quarterly conference, which was to be held at Franklin, Idaho, on Sunday and Monday, April 22nd and 23rd, will be postponed one week, or until Sunday and Monday, April 29th and 30th, on account of the meeting house undergoing some repairs, which will not be completed in time to hold conference on the dates first named.

Tidings would be thankfully received of James Wood, plasterer, son of William E. and Esther Wood, who left Manchester about forty years ago. He was last heard of from Troy, U. S. A., and is supposed to be in Salt Lake as he joined the Mormon body before leaving England. The inquirer is his sister, Mrs. Hannah Lennard No. 5 Bigland street, Ordsall lane, Salford, Manchester.

At a meeting of Sunday school superintendents of Utah Stake of Zion held Sunday, it was decided to hold three Sunday school conferences, one of each in the northern and southern districts respectively, and a general Stake S. S. conference to be held in Provo on September 8th and 9th. There are now 8,097 officers and teachers and pupils engaged in the Utah Stake Sabbath school work.

W. G. Young, the eldest son of Lorenzo D. Young, died in this city Sunday night of diabetes. He was aged 87 years. In early days he was Bishop of South Cottonwood ward, Salt Lake county. Subsequently he removed to Grantsville, Tooele county, and became Bishop of that ward. Later he changed his residence to this city, and engaged in the mercantile business. He was a highly respected citizen.

On Friday little Percy McKay, of Huntsville, while leading a horse to water, was dragged to death. As the horse was drinking the boy had tied the rope about his body and the animal becoming frightened at a dog dashed up the street at full speed, kicking the boy at nearly every jump. Finally the rope broke and left the lad in the street. All that was possible was done for his relief, but in vain. The child died in a few minutes.

B. F. Grant, of the local Midwinter Fair committee, made the announcement that a "Utah Day" would soon be set apart at the Midwinter Fair now on at San Francisco. The date has not yet been determined upon and therefore cannot now be stated. The committee are patriotically and rightly anxious that all Utahians should defer their visit to the Fair until Utah day has been decided upon. The railroads have promised to make a very low rate for that occasion.

Pat Markey, section foreman, at Price, Utah, says the Telegraph, left home one week ago today to make a visit with friends in town. Sunday evening his wife received a telegram from Salt Lake stating that Mr. Markey was dying. It appears that he was found at the foot of the Rio Grande hotel stairway unconscious and with his pockets turned inside out. The presumption is that he had been sand-bagged and robbed. When last heard from he was still unconscious.

Residents in this city and surrounding neighborhood will do well to see that their outbuildings are securely locked up before nightfall. Within the last week or ten days several cows and horses have been stolen while the owners were peacefully slumbering in their beds, and, in addition, two or three sets of harness are reported missing. In one instance a man deplores the loss of his entire team. The thieves have got clear away with their plunder in every case.

The Presbyterians held their conference in Logan Sunday, with representatives from all parts of Utah. Among other business attended to was the passage of a set of resolutions condemning the course pursued while here of Rev. E. W. Greene, a popular Presbyterian minister who served one term as superintendent of district schools for Cache county, and who is now engaged in the work of the ministry in Kansas. The gentleman left this part of the country heavily indebted to many people, but as he has promised to pay his debts no further steps were taken against him.

A queer case came up before Commissioner Camp this week, says the Vernal Express. Ferry Young, a sheepman, had moved his camp wagon on Joseph Burton's ranch, and the sheep were watered in Brush creek, above Burton's residence, befouling the water that the family used for household purposes. Burton requested the man in charge of the sheep to move them, and offered a team to move the wagon, but the man refused to do so. Burton then took the matter in his own hands, took three witnesses along and moved the whole lot away.

They were brought before R. C. Camp, and found guilty of misdemeanor, and fines and costs amounted to over $100.

OGDEN, Utah, April 16.—Bishop Wallace of North Ogden died very suddenly at the residence of Apostle Franklin D. Richards last night at 9:15 o'clock. Elder Wallace attended the quarterly conference in the afternoon and while there remarked that he believed he was coming down with pneumonia. After the close of the meeting he accompanied Elder Richards to his home and sat there chatting until 9:15, when suddenly he fell to the floor, gasped and was dead.

Dr. Carnahan was summoned and stated that death was caused by neuralgia of the heart. Bishop Wallace leaves hosts of friends to mourn his death.

At a meeting of the joint city and county building committee held late Friday afternoon it was decided that the stairways throughout the building would be constructed of iron and marble. The architect was instructed to make the necessary changes in the plans, the original designs being that all stairways above the third floor should be of wood. The offer of the Stewart Iron works to do the stairway work for $7,325 was accepted if they would put in private stairways to the fifth floor without additional cost. Mill work was also awarded to the Sierra Nevada Lumber company, Taylor, Romney & Armstrong company and the S. L. Building and Manufacturing company for the sum of $14,600. Some minor business was also attended to and the board adjourned.

EPHRAIM, April 15, 1894.—At an early hour this morning the report spread like wild fire that Magnus Erickson, our city marshal, and Mrs. J. P. Hansen Jr., wife of one of our most beloved and respected citizens, had been locked up during the night, charged with the crime of adultery. Mr. Erickson held the keys to the town jail, and it was there they were caught. Your correspondent called at the city hall and found the report to be only too true. Nothing for years has happened here that has caused such general sorrow, for both are of the best families of town, and both had families of young children at home. They have not yet had a hearing, but the city hall is surrounded with people as the mail leaves, awaiting the result of the examination.

A correspondent, writing from Sevier county, says there are men going through that part of the country selling plain steel ranges with four holes for $76, and taking interest-bearing notes payable next fall. It is stated: "They are telling the people that there are no such stoves to be bought anywhere else in Utah—that they cannot break them with a sledge hammer. They are selling them by dozens. What is the price in Salt Lake of four-hole ranges with small pipe shelves?" The NEWS is also asked to warn the people against being swindled.

The price of a good four-hole range in this city is $56 retail. It costs about $3 more at the place the correspondent writes from. Good six-hole steel ranges cost $65 here. As to warning people, if they are so gullible as to pay an exorbitant price for an article the value of which is easily ascertained, they would not heed warnings.

Mr. David Chidester has returned from a trip to Osceola and vicinity, says the Richfield Advocate. He says the placer mines will be started up there in the near future and a few solid men might get work there. Mr. Chidester says that the Washington Woolen mills have been running all winter to their full capacity, but could not supply near all the demand for goods. There is some misunderstanding between the stockholders and the lessees and the mills will be shut down for a time. He reports the Beaver mills ready to start up. Mr. Chidester says Cedar City is the busiest place in the mountains, and the people there talk of running a railroad direct to Milford, besides the building of a road to the coal beds, and are full of business. The copper plant also in Dixie will soon start up.

A case of woodwork, and the tools used for manufacture, was Monday shipped from the B. Y. Academy to San Francisco, for exhibit at the Midwinter Fair. The work consists of a wreath, a carved lion, brackets, frames, toy tables, etc., and is intended to show what can be done by pupils of the district schools with a few pieces of steel and wood for material and the following tools: Pocket knife, plyers, tack hammer, three-cornered file and a sheet of sandpaper. With these the pupil is taught to manufacture other tools for himself, such as a small plane, scroll saws, etc., and such work as above enumerated is turned out. The work at the B. Y. Academy was done by the students of the school under the direction of Professor Townsend, who has charge of the mechanical art department.

Another version of the old, old story, in which man's perfidy and woman's trusting love are leading themes, has just been brought to light. The ruin of a life and a succeeding period of illicit love have earned the wages of sin and closed in death.

In an evil hour, during the month of June of last year, Harry T. Brehmer met the girl whose life-spark went out early Friday morning in fearful agony, and the grave responsibility is laid upon him. Her name is Jane Robinson, and her age 18 years five months. It appears that Brehmer wooed and won the fair young girl, and immediately set about to accomplish her ruin. He was employed as chief engineer at the Hotel Templeton, and she, as well, was an employee there. Environment as well as the girl's faith in him were such that he readily succeeded in his purpose.

On Wednesday night a little girl, was born, with Doctors King and Jones at hand. The youthful mother's agony, it is said, was frightful to behold, and from one convulsion she went into another, until death released her. She died at 3 a. m. Friday, and her remains were taken to Joseph E. Taylor's undertaking establishment.

The American Asphalt company has about completed plans for manufacturing various articles out of the Utah elaterite, or mineral rubber, in competition with vulcanite productions of the East, says the Denver News. Premises on Wewatta street have about been leased, and by July, when the snow goes off the western range, the company will be ready to supply elaterite in any quantity. Elaterite is without elasticity, but is flexible enough to displace rubber combs, brush backs, telephone receivers, electric buttons and other devices that enter into the commercial and domestic life of the nation. The company will employ about twenty hands at the inception of its enterprise, and will increase the number as business develops. Elaterite can be delivered in New York for $80 a ton in competition with caoutchouc at 80 cents a pound. The American Asphalt company controls 800,000 acres formerly owned by the Uintah Indians. A road seventeen miles in length will be built this spring, and then the company will begin shipping its raw material from Kyune station on the Rio Grande Western. The headquarters of the company are situated in Denver and the business is directed by William A. Perry.

Henry W. Hawley, sheriff of Millard county, brought an action in the First district court at Provo against J. S. Giler, county clerk of Millard county, claiming $10,000 damages. The complaint alleges that plaintiff, as sheriff, was authorized by the county court to collect amounts due for licenses throughout said Millard county; that he collected the sum of $30 from W. A. Ray and Alonzo Hinckley on the 15th day of July, 1893, and afterwards turned this amount over to defendant in the presence of Daniel Stevens, county treasurer of Millard county, and defendant thereupon issued to said Ray and Hinckley their license. "Defendant well knowing these facts and maliciously intending and desiring to injure the said plaintiff in his reputation, did falsely state on February 4, 1894, at Fillmore city, in the presence of a large number of persons, the following slanderous words: 'That said plaintiff had procured licenses for said Ray and Hinckley by fraudulently pretending that he would turn over the money for said licenses, and then having thus fraudulently obtained the licenses, kept the money which the said plaintiff had collected therefor.'" Plaintiff claims that these words were uttered to injure his reputation.

The New Mexican (Deming) Headlight contains the following, dated at Casas Grandes, Chihuahua, Mexico, March 15: Wesley Norton, a Mormon boy, residing at Colonia Diaz, was murdered on the 5th inst. near this place.

Norton had been traveling through the Sabinal mining district collecting money for a sewing machine agent of Diaz. It is supposed that he went to a fire built by Mexicans, at Barancas, in a vacated adobe building, to warm himself.

When his back was turned, two Mexicans sprang upon him from ambush and after overpowering the unfortunate boy, pounded his head to jelly and then robbed him of his money, revolver and gun.

The murder was not discovered for several days, but the murderers are known and will be arrested.

The killing occurred about fifteen miles north of Casas Grandes.

The crime was discovered by Joseph

Jackson, of Colonia Diaz, who found the murdered Norton's team wandering about the prairie attached to a light spring wagon.

The dastardly crime has caused much indignation among the Mormons.

The secretary of the Chamber of Commerce has received a letter from the firm of John G. Tait & Co., Newark, N. J., large manufacturers of roofing and deadening felts, building paper and paving material, etc., in which they state they had been led to believe that there was a deposit of ozokerite or mineral wax in this Territory. They ask for further information regarding it, such as the owners of it and the names of the people working it. They desire also to learn about asbestos deposits, the grade of the material and such like, adding that they are large consumers of these products and would be glad to do business with us in these lines.

The deposit of mineral wax, known as ozokerite, elatelite, utaherite, etc., are most extensive in Uintah county, and the display of the Utah product at the World's Fair created considerable interest, the comparison between the old world product being much in favor of the Utah article, considering the great extent of the deposits in this Territory. Asbestos is also found in prolific quantities in Piute and Wayne counties, and in Box Elder county as well. Elias Morris handles the latter article, while Culmer Bros. are extensive shippers of the mineral wax, both having headquarters in this city.

The extreme southeastern part of the city was the scene of a somewhat sensational shooting affair April 12th, and as a result James Fairclough was arrested by Sergeant Eslinger on a charge of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill. The victim of the attack was William J. Powell, a near neighbor of Fairclough's, but fortunately the wound received is not considered dangerous. The trouble between the two men was a matter of trespass on a small lucerne patch located between their respective residences. Powell had rented the ground and informed Fairclough of the fact, warning him to keep his stock off the grass. The latter wanted to know what he could do about it if he paid no attention to the warning, and words soon came to blows. Each claims that the other began fistie operations, but Fairclough became so excited that he determined to send his assailant to grass. To this end he drew a gun and pointed it at Powell's breast, pulling the trigger as he did so. The bullet glanced off of the breast bone and came out at the left side under his arm. Great excitement was caused in the neighborhood as the man was believed to have been killed. Fairclough claims that the attack was provoked by the most shameful and brutal treatment of himself and wife by Powell and his companion.

The Territorial insane asylum board met Saturday at the asylum and transacted business as follows:

Appropriations were made as follows: Current expenses, $1,041.32; salaries, $1,344.65; claims, $395.93.

The contract price for excavating canal in the rear of the asylum was reported to be $1,108.11, and the work to be completed April 20th.

The movement of patients for the past month was reported as follows:

	Males.	Females.	Total.
In asylum March 12....	113	87	199
Added.....	5	3	8
Discharged.....	1	1	2
Died.....	1	1	2
Remaining April 13....	116	88	204

The board, all of whom were present except Farnsworth, adjourned sine die and the new board convened at 8 p.m. A. B. Emery was the only absentee. The following organization was effected: President, L. W. Shurtliff; vice president, Wm. Greer; secretary, A. O. Smoot Jr.; treasurer, W. H. Dusenberry; executive committee, J. B. Milner, Geo. C. Whitmore and William Greer; auditing committee, George C. Whitmore, Reed Smoot and W. W. Woodring; committee on grounds, W. W. Woodring, A. B. Emery and L. M. Shurtliff. The bond of the secretary, after considerable discussion, was fixed at $5,000; of the treasurer, $25,000.

On the estimate of the medical superintendent of current expenses for the ensuing three months, the treasurer was instructed to draw on the Territorial auditor for nine $1,000 warrants.

The medical superintendent was authorized to advertise for bids for supplies for the ensuing six months.

The board adjourned.

Sunday Captain Gorman in command of a company of "industrial army" men numbering eighty-two, arrived in Ogden over the S. P. railway, and took possession of the round house. The men were supplied with food by the city for the day and ate their dinner on the old camp grounds.

Gorman, in conversation with a News representative, said: "We will march this afternoon with at least 100 men and proceed to Uintah. At that station we will do as we have done all along the road—hold the train and force our way east. We expected to overtake Kelly at this point and should have done so had it not been for the delay we have had in travel. We ride whenever we get a chance, even for only a few miles. Our last ride, however, was 850 miles. We will not overtake Kelly new until we arrive at Washington. We have been treated very well along the road, and have not a sick man among us."

As these men were not guarded many of them deserted, and Gorman, although he expected 100 men to march with him to Uintah, moved down Washington avenue at 4 o'clock p. m. with forty-six men under his command. Of the balance of the men who came in about twenty of them were seen making their way toward Salt Lake and the rest are left in Ogden. Gorman's contingent was well supplied at Ogden with food and articles of wearing apparel; viz., sixteen pairs of shoes, two dozen pairs of socks, one suit of clothes, one hat, two dozen towels and two pairs of overalls, bought and paid for by money donated to and left here in the bank by Kelly to assist them. This company, unlike that commanded by Kelly, was of a slow and lazy disposition, each man waiting for the other to make a move.

Gorman says there is a company of about one hundred men camped at Terrace who are heading this way.

There was a most lamentable and fatal accident in Sugar House ward

Sunday afternoon. The victim was Henry McEwan, an old and highly respected resident of this city.

He went out to his farm in the early part of the day and was returning at 5 o'clock in the afternoon by the way of Sugar House ward. With him was his wife and two grandchildren, all seated in a single horse buggy. As they were crossing the railroad tracks at the intersection of Twelfth South and Eleventh East street, near the round-house about which a number of cars were standing, the horse took fright and started into a run. The animal had got but a short distance when the whole party was thrown from the buggy.

Mr. McEwan struck on his head and fractured his skull. He was picked up unconscious and carried into a house near by where he was soon after attended by Dr. Richards, who immediately said that recovery was an impossibility and his diagnosis of the case proved to be correct, for at 5 o'clock Monday morning the unfortunate man died without regaining sensibility, at his residence in the Twenty-second ward, being brought into the city on the Utah Central train at 6:30 Sunday night. Mrs. McEwan was not injured seriously though she sustained bruises both about the upper and lower limbs. The children escaped unhurt. Mr. McEwan came to Utah in the early fifties. He was a practical printer and was for a number of years foreman of the DESERET NEWS composing room. He was also for a long time assistant stage manager of the Salt Lake Theater. During his residence in Utah he has been identified in various ways with different country newspaper enterprises, the last with which he was connected being the Tooele Times. He had a jovial disposition and was ever cheerful and light hearted, and his sudden and shocking death will bring sorrow to the hearts of many friends. He was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, on the 4th of July, 1830. He leaves a wife and four sons, one of whom is now on a mission. Three years ago he visited his native land and other European countries in company with Phil Margetts.

AUSTRALIAN NOTES.

CAVE DISCOVERIES IN NEW SOUTH WALES.—Two fresh caves, filled with beautiful stalactites, have been discovered at Jenolan. New chambers have also been found at the Abercrombie caves. The first of these is said to be 120 feet in length, and from 60 to 70 feet in height. Another chamber was found but not bottomed, on account of insufficiency of rope; but, to try the air, a lighted candle was lowered 35 feet, which burnt clearly.

POPULATION OF AUSTRALASIA.—New South Wales has the largest population of any of the Australasian colonies, the estimated figures at the end of 1893 being: New South Wales, 1,223,370; Victoria, 1,174,022; Queensland, 432,298; South Australia, 346,574; Western Australia, 65,064; Tasmania, 154,424; New Zealand, 672,265; total, 4,063,317. From those figures it will be seen that considerably more than one-fourth of the whole Australasian population is found in New South Wales.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Written for this Paper.
ACROSS THE PACIFIC.

UNDER the shadow of the snow-clad mountain, Fujiyama! In the heart of flowery Japan when the snow is on the ground! In the land of the rising sun with the sun left out! Surrounded by a bare-necked, bare-chested and almost bare-legged nation on stilts, I shiver in my overcoat as I write for the homes of the base burner and the furnace. Within the past three weeks I have traveled 8,000 miles and have now nearly reached the other side of the globe. I am on my way to interior China, and a month later I will be in the very center of the great Chinese empire. I have come to the far east to tell you of the wonderful changes that are taking place on the other side of the world. Asia is now one of the great news centers of the globe. It is making history faster than either America or Europe, and a wonderful change is going on among the nations of slant-eyed humanity, which is bound to effect every man, woman and child in Christendom. This land of Japan made the start and it has now on its feet the seven league boots of modern progress. It is jumping ahead faster than any people have ever jumped in the past and within twenty years it has grown more in civilization than the European nations have advanced in centuries. I see from a Japanese newspaper of this morning that Japan made last year one hundred and twenty million postal cards at a cost of 50 cents per thousand. I can hardly realize it, and think there must be a mistake in the figures. But there is no doubt that the postal service here is as good and as cheap as that of the United States and these people run their postal arrangements, paying for everything in silver, more cheaply than we do paying in gold. The banking systems, railroads, telegraphs and schools of Japan are managed almost as carefully and as intelligently as those of the United States. There are one hundred periodicals published in the city of Tokyo alone, and the newspapers are read by the millions. In business and manufacturing on a large scale there is a movement all over the land, and reports of the elections, which are now taking place in the different provinces, show as many quarrels and as much bribery as though the Japs had taken lessons of our ring politicians.

A slower but as sure a revolution is going on in China. The four hundred odd millions of pig-tailed celestials are pulling the slits of their button hole eye-lids apart, and it is only a question of time how soon they will be putting their wonderful muscles, their sharp business brains and their five cents a day habits of living into competition with our eight hour, two-dollar-a-day laborers as to the manufactured products of the world. They have coal and iron in every one of their eighteen provinces. They can do as good work as we can, and they will work twelve hours for one-twentieth the sum that our people get. When they enter the modern manufacturing race the question will not be one of competition. It will be one of existence, and we will have to build a protective tariff barrier about the country as high as the Washington monument, or cut down our living expenses to the size of the aluminum tip on the top of it. At the present time, big cotton factories have been established in almost the center of the Chinese empire. They are, I am told, making cannon and guns as good as those turned out by our government works, and the question of railroads is being agitated by some of the most progressive men of the empire. It may take generations to bring the country to the state that Japan has already reached or the revolution precipitated by a war may come with a rush. Just now both Japan and China are torn with dissensions on the subject. There are strong anti-foreign elements and an American buyer for a big New York silk firm told me this morning that he did not think it safe for him to travel over the country while the elections are taking place. The bulk of the people of China are against the foreigners and anti-foreign sentiment increases daily. The literati of the empire see the possibility of a revolution and they are disseminating all sorts of reports as to the wickedness of the missionaries and of the other "Red-headed, blue-eyed foreign devils," as they call us. Out in the country districts about this place I have often heard the words of Japanese which my interpreter tells me mean "hairy barbarian" hurled at me, and in the streets of the Chinese cities I shall probably have to pocket many an insult to avoid trouble. In Japan, where the progressive element is in the ascendancy, and I have special letters from the government, it is comparatively safe, and I shall return here and make an extended tour in the most out-of-the-way parts of the country.

The most dangerous part of my journey I find will probably be among the Chinese. I shall skip the coast ports and push my way into the interior. I will visit many large cities, some of which are hardly known to the average reader, and will travel one thousand miles or more up the great Yang-tse-kiang river. I expect to visit the old capital of the empire, known as Nanking, where the famous "Porcelain tower" was, and which is now one of the centers of the Chinese literati of the land. It has been called the Athens of China and it is one of the centers of anti-foreign influence. I will take a trip along the Grand canal, if possible, and will tell you how this wonderful artery of Chinese trade is managed. About seven hundred miles from the coast there is a viceroy, who is famous all over the celestial world for his progressive ideas. I shall spend some time at his capital, the city of Hankow, which with its suburbs, contains more than a million people, and from thence will push my way further into the interior to Ichang, where is some of the most wonderful scenery in the world. The gorges of the Yang-tse-kiang near this point are thousands of feet deep, and they are said to have no superior in their picturesque grandeur. I will have my photographer with me both in the cities and in the country. Leaving this part of China, I will next go to the north and again visit the capital. Peking has a million inhabitants, and of these I doubt whether a thousand think that we Americans are anything else than barbarians. When I was there before, now five years ago, I was told that the street on which all of the foreign legations are located was called the "Street of the Subject Nations," and today 900,000 of the people of Peking actually believe that the American minister to China and the ministers from Russia, France and England are at the capital to pay their respects to their emperor and to give tribute to him. I will take some trips through this part of China and will describe the Chinese of the north, who are as different in their appearance, manners and customs from the Cantorese Chinese, who come to America, as the inhabitants of North Germany are different from the Lazzaroni of Naples. Our Chinese are short and small boned. The Tartars and the Chinese of the north have many men six feet in height and they are as strong in intellect and physique as any people in the world. At Peking are the great universities of the empire and in some of these they are now teaching our sciences, and the big Chinese examinations of the future will probably embrace geology and astronomy as well as the essays of Confucius. The hatred of foreigners is great and the majority of the people would like to see the Americans and Europeans excluded.

After leaving North China, I shall sail for Korea, where there is another live news center. The king is in favor of foreign methods, and these people, who have a civilization about 400 years behind that of the China of today, may yet outstrip them in civilization. The king and his queen, and the thousand odd eunuchs of the palace, now conduct all the business under the rays of the electric light, and I understand there is an American employed to build an electric railroad at the capital. The anti-foreign influence exists here as well as in China, but the people are more kindly, and I hope that such arrangements can be made as to enable me to go right across the kingdom from one side to the other. It will take several mule loads of money to pay my expenses on this trip, for the only coin in circulation is the copper cash, and twenty-five of our dollars in this would weigh at least 300 pounds.

From Korea I may go to Siberia and give a letter on the trans-Siberian railroad from its terminus, Vladivostok, or I may sail direct for Japan and visit the Alaska of that country, where are the hairy Ainos, who worship bears, and keep themselves, as far as possible, drunk from one years end to the other.

My tour will be an out-of-way one from beginning to end, and I hope I shall find much that is new and unwritten.

The trip from Vancouver to Japan was more like a voyage to the north pole than a summer journey across the placid Pacific. I took the Canadian steamship line, which is the best and fastest that goes from America to the far east, and had it been summer their could have been no voyage more pleasant. The three empress steamers are each as big as the best ships that sail the Atlantic, and they are fitted up with all the modern conveniences of ocean travel. The cabins are lighted by electricity and they are twice the size of those of the Atlantic lines. The officers are all English, and the ships from a part of the British naval reserve. They carry the British mails and receive a subsidy from the English government. The servants are Chinese, and you are waited on in your room and at the table by yellow-skinned bogs in pig tails and gowns, and you find their service far better than that of the greedy eyed, fee-soliciting stewards who wait upon you when you go to Europe. The ship on which I crossed was the Empress of Japan. Let me give you an idea of her. Take the street in front of your house. If the Empress of Japan could be dragged up it, her sides would scrape the walls of your houses and she could look over the roofs of any of your business blocks of less than seven stories.

Her length is such that she would fill the roadway from one end of the block to the other, and if you examined her you would find her to be a great steel shell filled with a little world, and run by some of the most wonderful machinery that the modern mind can invent. You would find in her a butcher shop, a bakery, a carpenter shop, Chinese and European kitchens, and a whole summer hotel of rooms for sleeping, eating, smoking and reading. If permitted, you would go from story to story, as I did, down into the very bottom of her, where a plate of steel as thick as your finger is all that keeps out the water, and inspects her great engines, which almost noiselessly but irresistibly screw her on across the Pacific, on the longest ocean route of the world. You might begin to figure on the force that moved her, and if your calculations were correct you would see that 10,000 horses all pulling at once would represent it. You would find that she carried enough weight to load down 6,000 two-horse wagons, and it would probably surprise you to know that of this vast amount one-third has to be made up of coal. It requires 2,000 tons of coal to start out on such a voyage, and the steamer burns from 100 to 200 tons every day. It is a big dwelling house that requires ten tons of coal a year. This steamer uses on a single voyage enough to supply a town of 1,000 people or 200 families with fuel for the year round, and it would take as much coal to light her fires as you use in a whole year. Thirty-two Chinamen are kept busy shoveling coal into her furnaces, and the shoveling goes on day and night from the time she starts till the end of the voyage.

During our journey the engines were pushed to their fullest. We had a head wind the most of the way, and for twelve out of the thirteen days which it took to cross it was stormy in the extreme. As we neared the Aleutian Islands it became bitterly cold, and the ship was covered with snow and ice. The sailor in the "crow's nest," among the rigging, nearly froze to death and he was so cold that he had to be carried down to the main deck. I shall never forget how beautiful the ship looked on the morning after this cold snap. The sun rose and painted the ice-clad ship with diamonds. Every rope sparkled with a thousand prismatic hues and the masts were great poles of precious stones. There was a fierce wind blowing and as the sun came up the ice melted and the sailors chopped it from the hurricane deck and swept it away into the sea. I took a snap shot of them as we rose and fell in the waters and it almost freezes me in the remembrance as I look at it.

We came into the harbor here, however, with the sun shining. We got a splendid view of Fugiyama, whose snow-clad beauty rose 12,000 feet out of the sea through opalescent clouds, and rode in sampans to the shore, to find ourselves surrounded by the queer sights of Japan in winter. We saw the rich Yum Yum rushing along the streets on her wooden clogs, with only her bright eyes showing out of the well-wrapped face, for all the world like the veiled maidens of Egypt, and we saw her poorer sister caught by the wind at a corner, and her paper umbrella torn from her hands by the storm, while she bent over and tried to keep her kimona from blowing up above her bare knees. We Americans would freeze in Japanese dress. The common people of both sexes wear neither drawers nor under-clothing, and the long warm stockings which our maidens affect are unknown in Japan. Both men and women wear shoes of white cotton, which just clasp the ankles, one which are kept off the ground by sandals of straw or of wood. Above these to the waist there is no leg covering, except the loose silk or cotton gown known as the kimona. This is fastened in the front, and is sometimes wadded. It is worn by both sexes, and as they push their way along the streets the raw wind of winter drags the folds apart at the front, and you can see the amorous snow flying about the rosy bare calves of the maidens.

Among the poorer classes there are many who are entirely barelegged, and I have been pulled about through the city today by jinrikisha men whose legs were nude from their thighs to their feet, and whose only protection from the snow on the ground was a sole of woven straw, not much thicker than a fat buckwheat cake. These soles or straw sandals are held on by straw straps, which run from the back to a point a toe's length from the front. Here they meet between the two largest toes of the foot, and are held on by the toes. They are used rather as a protection from slipping than as a means of keeping the feet warm, and they soon wear into pieces. The man I had today had used up his sandals long before we got to the end of our ride, and he went for some miles entirely barefooted. When we stopped I noticed him take some straw rope, almost as thick as a clothes line, and ties a piece of it to each of his big red toes behind the knuckles. I asked why he did so, and was told that he found it made him less liable to slip.

The rubbers of Japan are wooden stilts about three inches high, which are used like sandals, and the common people wear mackintoshes or rain coats made of straw, which makes them look for all the world like gigantic yellow birds with human faces. They have immense hats, sometimes shaped like butter bowls and again like parasols, and a group of country people would make the fortune of a Barnum if he could bring them to the United States. With the new movement all sorts of foreign costumes have come in, and I saw hundreds of the ugliest of our blankets and carriage robes used as shawls by both men and women. They are the only colors in Japan which swear at the rest of their surroundings and are a blot on the picturesqueness of the people. I note that most of the people walk about with their mouths open, and in the colder days many of them cover their mouths with a sort of a pad and breathe behind this. They seem to care nothing for exposure of the chest, and the gowns of both sexes are decidedly décolleté.

And still clothes are practically all that keep the Japanese warm. They don't know what a good fire is, and the supply of heat which is annually required in an American house is more than the average Japanese family use in a lifetime. Their houses are of thin wooden boards made in frames, so that the walls slide in and out of one another, leaving draughts at every corner. There is no plaster nor lath to add to their warmth, and the inner walls and partitions are made of paper so thin that they let in the light and take the place of windows. There is not a chimney or fireplace in any of these Japanese homes, and the people rely on the warmth of their blood and a little box of charcoal to keep them from freezing. They hover over this warming their hands and sit on their feet. They believe if they can keep the extremities warm the rest of the body will take care of itself. They look, nevertheless, healthy and happy, and it may be that they are right.

THE NEW LIEN LAW.

An act to secure liens to mechanics and others, and to repeal all other acts and laws in relation thereto.

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah:

SECTION 1. Mechanics, material men, contractors, sub-contractors, builders and all persons of every class performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the construction, alteration, addition to or repair, either in whole or in part, of any building, bridge, ditch, flume, aqueduct, tunnel, fence, railroad, wagon road or other structure or improvement upon land, and also architects, engineers and artisans who have furnished designs, plats, plans, maps, specifications, drawings, estimates of cost, surveys or superintendence, or who have rendered other like professional service or bestowed labor in whole or in part, in describing, illustrating or superintending such structure or work done or to be done or in any part connected therewith, shall have a lien upon the property upon which they have rendered service or performed labor or furnished materials, for the value of such service rendered, labor done or materials furnished, whether at the instance of the owner or of any other person acting by his authority or under him, as agent, contractor, or otherwise, for the work or labor done or service rendered or materials furnished by each respectively, whether done or furnished or rendered at the instance of the owner of the building or other improvement, or his agent. Provided a lien or liens shall attach only to such interest as the owner or lessee may have in the real estate. In case of a contract for the work between an owner and a contractor, the lien shall extend to the entire contract price, and such contract shall operate as a lien in favor of all persons except the contractor to the extent of the whole contract price; and after all such liens are satisfied, then as a lien for any balance of the contract price in favor of the contractor. Provided, that if at the time of the commencement to do work or furnish material the owner has paid upon the contract, and in accordance with the terms thereof, any portion of the contract price, the liens hereby created shall extend only to the unpaid balances of such contract price, and of which such laborers and material men shall have had notice. No part of the contract price shall, by the terms of any contract, be made payable, nor shall the same or any part thereof be paid in advance of the commencement of the work for the purpose of evading or defeating the provisions of this section. No payment made prior to the time when the same is due, under the terms and conditions of the contract, shall be valid for the purpose of defeating, diminishing or discharging any lien in favor of any person except the contractor; but as to such liens such payment shall be deemed as if not made, as shall be applicable to such liens, notwithstanding that the contractor to whom it was paid may thereafter abandon his contract or be or become indebted to the owner in any amount for damages or otherwise, for non-performance of his contract or otherwise. As to all liens except that of the contractor, the whole contract price shall be payable in money, except as herein provided, and shall not be diminished by any prior or subsequent indebtedness, off set or counter-claim in favor of the owner and against the contractor, except when the owner has contracted to pay otherwise than by cash, in which case the owner shall post in a conspicuous place on the premises a statement of the terms and conditions of the contract before materials are furnished or labor is performed, which notice must be kept posted, and when so posted shall give notice to all parties interested of the terms and conditions of the contract. Any person willfully tearing down or defacing said notice shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. No alteration of any contract shall affect any lien acquired under the provisions of this act. In case of corporations, the lien shall attach to all franchises and privileges that may in any manner pertain to the property against which the lien is claimed. When any person entitled to a lien under the provisions of this section, other than the original contractor, shall have actually commenced to perform labor upon or to furnish materials for any building, improvement or structure herein mentioned, the property shall be charged with the liens by this act provided, and no payment made to the original contractor shall in anywise defeat or impair the claims for such liens.

Sec. 2. The liens granted by this act shall extend to and cover so much of the land whereon such building, structure or improvement shall be made, as may be necessary for the convenient use and occupation of such building, structure or improvement, and the same shall be subject to such liens, and in case any such building shall occupy two or more lots or other subdivision of land, such lots or other subdivision shall be deemed one lot for the purposes of this act, and the same rule shall hold in cases of any other such improvements that shall be practically indivisible, and shall attach to all machinery and other fixtures used in connection with any such lands, buildings or structures. No attachment, garnishment or levy under an execution upon any money due to an original contractor from the owner of any property subject to lien under this act shall be valid as against any lien of a sub-contractor or material man, and no such attachment, garnishment or levy upon money due to a sub-contractor or material man, as herein provided, from the contractor, shall be valid as against any lien of a laborer employed by the day or piece.

Sec. 3. The provisions of this act shall apply to all persons who shall do work or furnish materials for the working, preservation or development of any mine, lode, mining claim or deposit yielding metals or minerals of any kind, or for the working, preservation or development of any such mine, lode or deposit in search of such metals or minerals, and to all persons who shall do work or furnish materials upon any shaft, tunnel, incline, adit, drift, drain or other excavation of any such mine, lode or deposit. Provided, that when two or more such lodes or deposits, owned or claimed by the same person or persons, or where the owners are different persons the same with the consent of all, shall be worked through a common shaft, tunnel, incline, adit, drift or other excavation, then all the mines, lodes or deposits so worked shall, for the purpose of this act, be deemed one mine. Provided, further, that this section shall not be deemed to apply to the owner or owners of any mine, lode, deposit, shaft, tunnel, incline, adit, drift or other excavation, when the same shall be worked by a lessee, under bond or otherwise; but, in such case, the person entitled to a lien under this act shall have a lien on the leasehold interest and on the ores and mineral-bearing rock or dirt mined and excavated by the lessees.

Sec. 4. Whoever shall do work or furnish materials by contract, express or implied, with the owner, as in this act provided, shall be deemed an original contractor, and all other persons doing work or furnishing materials shall be deemed subcontractors.

Sec. 5. The liens provided for herein are preferred to any lien, mortgage or other incumbrance which may have attached subsequent to the time when the building, improvement or structure was commenced, work done or materials were commenced to be furnished; also to any lien, mortgage or other incumbrance of which the lien holder had no notice and which was unrecorded at the time the building, improvements or structure was commenced, work done, or the materials were commenced to be furnished. The liens herein provided shall relate back to and take effect as of the time of commencement to do work upon and furnish materials on the ground for the structure or improvement, and shall have priority over any lien or incumbrance subsequently intervening, except a lien herein provided for of the same class, or which may have been created prior thereto, which was not then recorded and of which the lienor under this act did have actual notice.

Sec. 6. Every original contractor, within sixty days after the completion of his contract, and every person save the original contractor claiming the benefit of this act, must, within forty days after furnishing the last material or performing the last labor for any building, improvement or structure, or for any alteration or addition to or repair thereof, or performance of any labor in or furnishing any materials for any mining claim, file for record with the County Recorder of the county in which the property or some part thereof is situated, a claim in writing, containing a notice of intention to hold and claim a lien, and a statement of his demand, after deducting all just credits and offsets, with the name of the owner, if known, and also the name of the person by whom he was employed, or to whom he furnished the material, with a statement of the terms, time given and conditions of his contract, specifying the time when the first and last labor was performed or the first and last materials furnished, and also a description of the property charged with the lien sufficient for identification, which claim must be verified by the oath of himself or of some other person. Liens against two or more buildings, mining claims or other improvements owned by the same person or persons may be included in one claim; but in such case the person filing the claim must designate therein the amount claimed to be due to him on each of such buildings, mining claims or other improvements. Any sub-contractor before commencing to furnish materials or to perform work, or at any time thereafter and before the completion of his contract, may file a statement of claim with the Recorder as herein provided, containing a notice of intention to hold and claim a lien, a description of the property to be charged, and the probable value of the work to be done, or the probable value of the materials to be furnished, as near as may be. From the time such statement shall have been filed, he shall have a lien for the work thereafter done or materials furnished by him, not exceeding the sum stated as the probable value thereof, and in the event of such sub-contractor claiming to have done work or furnished materials before the filing of such statement, he may include therein a statement of the value of the work already done or material furnished as near as may be, for which, to the extent of the sums mentioned, his lien shall likewise attach.

Sec. 7. The recorder must record the claims in a book kept by him for that purpose, and from the time of the filing thereof for record, all persons shall be deemed to have notice.

Sec. 8. The liens herein provided for may be enforced by a action in any court of competent jurisdiction, at any time within twelve months after the completion of the original contract or the suspension of the work thereunder for a period of thirty days, or setting out in the complaint the particulars of the demand with a description of the premises to be charged with the lien; and at the time of filing the complaint and issuing the summons, the plaintiff shall cause a notice to be published at least once a week for three successive weeks in one newspaper of general circulation published in the judicial district, notifying all persons holding or claiming liens under the provisions of this act, on said premises, to be and appear before said court on a day specified therein and during a regular term thereof, and to exhibit then and there the proof of said liens. On the day appointed, all persons claiming liens against the premises shall appear before said court and exhibit the same, whereupon the court shall proceed to hear and determine the claims in a summary way or may refer the same to a referee to ascertain and report thereon, and shall enter judgment according to the rights of the parties, and all liens not so exhibited shall be deemed to be waived against the property. In every case in which different liens are claimed against the same property, the rank of each lien or class of liens, as between the contractor and sub-contractor, shall be declared and ordered to be satisfied in the decree, in the following order, viz.:

First. Sub-contractors who were laborers or mechanics working by the day or piece, but without furnishing material therefor.

Second. All other sub-contractors and all material men.

Third. The original contractors. And the proceeds of the sale in all actions for the satisfaction of liens against the same, improvements or structures, shall be paid in the order above designated, and pro rata to the persons claiming in each class where the sum realized is insufficient to pay the persons of one class in full.

Sec. 9. The court shall cause the property to be sold in satisfaction of the liens and costs as in the case of foreclosure of mortgages, subject to the right of redemption of the owner and creditors as provided by law; and if the proceeds of sale, after the payment of costs, shall not be sufficient to satisfy the whole amount of liens included in the decree, then said proceeds shall be apportioned according to the rights of the several parties, and to the several classes in the order as hereinbefore specified. In case of any excess of proceeds of sale, the remainder shall be paid over to the owner; and every person whose claim is not satisfied as herein provided may have judgment docketed for the balance unpaid, and execution therefor against the party personally liable. As between the owner and the contractor, the court shall apportion the costs according to the right of the case, but in all instances sub-contractors shall have their costs, including the costs of preparing and recording statement of claim, awarded to them, for each claimant exhibiting a lien.

Sec. 10. Whenever material has been furnished for use in the construction, alteration or repair of any building, work or other improvement mentioned in the first section of the act, such material shall not be subject to attachment, execution or other legal process to enforce any debt due by the purchaser of such materials, other than a debt due for the purchase money thereof, so long as in good faith the same are about to be applied to the construction, alteration or repair of such building or improvement. Nothing contained herein shall be construed to impair or effect the right of any person to whom a debt may be due for work done or material furnished to maintain a personal action to recover the same.

Sec. 11. All liens under this act shall be assignable as other choses in action and the assignee may commence and prosecute actions thereon in his own name, in the manner herein provided.

Sec. 12. All foundrymen and boiler-makers, and all persons performing labor or furnishing machinery or boilers, or castings, or other material for the construction or repairing or carrying on any mill, manufactory or hoisting works, shall have a lien on such mill, manufactory or hoisting works for such work or labor done on such machinery, or boiler or castings or other material furnished by such respectively. And all the provisions of this act respecting the mode of filing, recording, securing and enforcing the liens of contractors and others, and the word superstructure, wherever it occurs in this act, shall be applicable to the provisions of this section.

Sec. 13. The claimant of any lien filed as provided herein, on payment of the amount thereof, together with the costs incurred and the fees for cancellation shall, at the request of any person interested in the property charged therewith, enter or cause said lien to be canceled within ten days from the request, and upon failure to so cancel said lien within the time aforesaid, shall forfeit and pay to the person making the request the sum of $20 per day until the same shall be canceled, to be recovered in the same manner as other debts.

Sec. 14. Any person who shall knowingly caused to be filed for record a claim for lien against any property whatever, which shall contain a greater demand than the sum that is due him, with the intent to cloud the title or to exact from the owner or person liable, by means of such excessive claim of lien, more than is due him, or to procure any advantage or benefit whatever, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sec. 15. The provisions of the act shall not apply to any public structure or improvement.

Sec. 16. An act entitled "An act to secure liens to mechanics and others, and repeal all other acts and laws in relation thereto," approved March 12, 1890, is hereby repealed. Provided, That the repeal of said act shall not affect any right or remedy, nor abate any suit or action or proceedings existing, instituted or pending under the law hereby repealed.

This act shall take effect upon its approval. [Approved March 8, 1894.]

[The foregoing law has been published in pamphlet form by Morrison, Merrill & Co., 241 north, Third West street, who will furnish a copy free to anyone who will apply.]

DR. BREDEMAYER.

The funeral of Dr. Wm. Bredemeyer, who for several years and up to about three years ago was a well known resident of Salt Lake, took place Friday afternoon under the direction of the Knights of Pythias, from J. W. Taylor's undertaking establishment. Dr. Bredemeyer died at Tacoma, Washington, April 4, of heart failure. He was a man of peculiar and excitable temperament, an instance of which was shown in almost the last proceedings which brought his name prominently before the Salt Lake public. In circumstances associated with divorce proceedings on the part of his wife, who was granted a decree of separation, Dr. Bredemeyer was consigned to prison. While there he remained for eighteen days from partaking of food, in a vain attempt to bring Mrs. Bredemeyer to his terms. While he lived here he was often visited by German notables.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

NEW ERA, Mich., April 9.—On the floor of Staples & Covell's logging mill, three miles east of here, lie seven charred and scalded bodies, the result of the most terrible railroad accident that happened in this section.

The logging crew on Staples & Covell's road were returning from White River to camp shortly before noon, and when within eight of the camp the engine struck a fallen tree and was knocked over a sixteen-foot embankment, carrying the men down with it. Seven men are dead, several seriously injured and others slightly.

NEW CASTLE, Colo., April 10.—Mrs. C. A. Hahn is candidate against three men for the appointment as city marshal. The council took forty ballots without a choice.

NEW YORK, April 10.—Advices received from Shanghai, China, under date of March 5, state that an attack by a fanatical mob of Chinese was made upon the premises of the American Baptist mission at Huchow, a large and wealthy city in the center of the silk district, south of the Tayhu lake, between Soochow and Hangchow. The riot occurred during the spring festival when the city was in an unusually disturbed state of mind over the "Joss Piggin" its people were celebrating. Until a few years back Huchow resisted all attempts of foreign missionaries to settle there, but the Revs. Mason and Fletcher, of the American Baptist mission, with their wives and families, have been settled there for some time. Fortunately no serious damage was done beyond wrecking the houses of missionaries and terrifying the women and children. The women and children were badly scared and the officials have since had the damage made good and punished the ringleaders of the rioters.

NEW LONDON, April 10.—Captain Thomas Davison, the last survivor of the battle of Stonington, when the British fleet bombarded that town in 1814, died at his home here today, aged 93 years.

GATESVILLE, Tex., April 10.—Ed Cash, who lived ten miles southwest of Gatesville, was called from his wife's sick bed by a mob last Sunday. When next seen the body was hanging from a tree and riddled with bullets. The cause of the crime is a mystery.

ASPEN, Colo., April 10.—The Aspen National bank has gone into liquidation and the First National acts as its agent.

PORT TOWNSEND, April 10.—The steamer City of Topeka, which has arrived from Alaskan ports, brings news of impending trouble over a recently ordered enforcement of the Edmunds act relating to illicit cohabitation. Many hard characters are living with squaws and every arrest precipitates a quarrel. In each case the prisoner demands a jury trial, which always results in acquittal. The squaw men who have been tried and acquitted once, state they will not submit to arrest again, and serious altercations are expected.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., April 10.—Captain A. A. Woodson, who is in charge of the Indian agency at Darlington, was in the city today. Speaking of the recent Indian trouble near the agency, he told the real cause of the uprising.

It appears that T. S. Carter and W. S. Breeding, white men, went to the camp of a Cheyenne, known as Chief Hill, about 100 miles west of El Reno, and claimed a pony which the Indian had. Chief Hill finally gave up the pony, when Breeding, without the least provocation, drew his revolver and shot him twice, inflicting what have since proved fatal wounds. The two white men then drove rapidly off.

Hill, raising his gun, shot at the fleeing horseman and his second shot struck Breeding, and his third broke Carter's arm. Carter hurried on, telling everyone whom he met that Breeding had been murdered. The news soon spread and the whites took to arms. Great excitement reigned everywhere, the whites fearing an attack while the Indians, on the other hand, were themselves scared. The whites' demonstration became so fierce that the Indians fled to the camp of Whirlwind, their chief, for protection, not remaining to fight, as has been reported.

CHICAGO, April 10.—Prendergast assaulted his guard again today and the latter smashed the prisoner on the nose, making him see stars, and he was then transferred to the dungeon until he agrees to behave himself.

BERLIN, April 11.—(Special Berlin dispatch.)—Experts in military affairs throughout Europe are discussing the recent experiments made with the bullet proof coat invented by Herr Dowe, the Mannheim tailor. There seems to be no longer any room for doubt that the armor is all its inventor claimed for it and that he was justified in refusing the princely offers made to him by army contractors and others who are desirous of purchasing his secret.

At the Russian embassy Count Schouvaloff fired two shots at the tailor while the latter was encased in his bullet proof coat and as Dowe sustained absolutely no injuries the Russian ambassador pronounced himself satisfied.

The experiments before Schouvaloff began with a thorough test of the new rifle in use in the German army. From a box of cartridges one was selected at random, the rifle was loaded and was then fired at a block of solid oak which was pierced by the small, steel-like bullet. This showed that the rifle and cartridges were of the regulation pattern and well calculated to test the value of the most efficient steel cuirasses ever made.

VANCOUVER, B. C., April 11.—The latest files of Australian papers received by the steamer Arawa contain little else than sensational accounts of burglaries and labor troubles. In all the colonies the police had organized themselves into a standing army and in Sydney and Melbourne they have been making night sorties. In New South Wales, South Australia and Victoria last month 337 burglars were captured red-handed and brought to justice. John McKay, 80 years old, of Melbourne, shot and killed a burglar who broke into his store. Twenty-three burglars were reported shot by householders.

The unemployed in South Australia and Victoria are becoming desperate. They have appealed to Premier Patterson and Sir George Dibbs in deputations of over a thousand. Dibbs replied: "Don't come bothering me, I have kept you long enough. You will not break stone for a living, then starve." The deputation returned to the city and camped in the park. They were ordered off and on refusing to move, over a hundred were put in prison.

WASHINGTON, April 11.—The President today sent the following nominations to the Senate for members of the board of registration and election in the Territory of Utah: Hoyt Sherman Jr., Albert G. Norrell, Jerrold R. Letcher, George W. Thatcher, Erasmus W. Tatlock, all of Utah.

Sherman and Tatlock are Republicans and the other three Democrats.

DENVER, Colo., April 11.—Captain W. L. Grayson, who started out with Bert Hamilton's "Silver Legion" and deserted in disgust, is organizing an army here to join the California crowd. The captain, who served in the British army, is convinced that the Coxey movement, if backed by honest workmen, will be productive of good. He says a wealthy Populist has offered to give $1,000 to the travelers as soon as Kelly's army arrives from Utah.

OAKLAND, Cal., April 11.—A female brigade of the industrial army is being organized here. Two hundred names are now on the list. Arrangements are being made for their transportation east. Frank Cartier was this morning elected colonel. This afternoon the first drill was had.

LONDON, April 11.—The steamer Faraday left here today with a portion of the new cable of the Commercial Cable company, which is to be laid from Waterville, on Balling Skeds bay, coast of Ireland, to Nova Scotia.

LONDON, April 11.—A dispatch to the Daily News from Vienna announces the failure of David Weiner & Sons, merchants, with liabilities amounting to $2,500,000.

PORT TOWNSEND, April 12.—Fire has destroyed the U.S. Marine hospital here. There were no fatalities. The loss is $6,000. The fire originated in an outhouse used as an oil room, and it is supposed it was the work of an incendiary. The hospital was built in 1852.

CHALK HILL, Pa., April 12.—Coxey's army started reluctantly on its walk of twelve miles through the snow. At noon the men stopped at Somersfield and will camp at Petersburg tonight. The army will cross the line into Maryland on Friday.

ST. PAUL, April 12.—N. N. Erickson, business partner of United States Senator Powers, died today at the Merchants' hotel of typhoid pneumonia.

WASHINGTON, April 12.—Senator Wolcott today introduced a bill providing for the allotment in severalty of lands in the Uncompahgre Indian reservation in Utah and the opening of the remainder of the lands to settlement.

WASHINGTON, April 13.—The report on the production of coal, compiled by E. W. Parker, of the United States geological survey, shows a production for the year of 179,825,000 short tons, at the valuation of $205,207,000. California produced 78,600 tons, value $167,500; Montana, 914,000 tons, value $1,816,000; Oregon, 41,700, value $164,500; Utah, 418,200, value $811,000; Washington, 1,255,000, value $2,209,800, and Wyoming, 2,439,800, value $3,291,000.

FRANKFORT, Ky., April 12.—In a personal letter to a friend of this city Breckinridge states that he will make the congressional race at all hazards. The letter says: "I see from statements going around through the papers, that in the event of an adverse verdict here I would withdraw from the race for Congress. I am in this congressional race to the bitter end. I am not going to be on the defense but am going to make an aggressive fight."

NEW YORK, York April 13.—David Dudley Field died today.

Field arrived from Italy last Wednesday. His only child is the widow of Sir Anthony Musgrove, who was governor of Queenstown, Australia, when he died.

BUFFALO, April 13.—The burning of the gluecoke works has probably caused fatalities. The following are missing: George Trube, John Trube, Michael Matroki, Henry Stimpson.

About forty workmen were on the sixth floor and half must have perished. There were many vacant places at breakfast. The work of excavating cannot begin for twenty-four hours. The loss is now estimated at $600,000.

ST. LOUIS, April 13.—John T. Davis, dry goods dealer, the richest man in Missouri, died today. He leaves $25,000,000.

SIOUX CITY, Iowa, April 13.—The city officials have been notified informally that a law firm in the city proposes to sue the city to force it to pay over to the county school fund the amount of the fines that have been collected from the saloons of the city for several years past. Under the Iowa statute the county can undoubtedly recover in this way. The fines collected by and for which the suit is brought amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars. The suit has been threatened on former occasions and it is said that the firm that now proposes bringing it is backed by a disgruntled contractor whom the city has been trying to compel to give up a street sweeping contract.

PITTSBURG, April 13.—The officers of every labor organization here have received a secret circular calling a conference in Philadelphia, April 28, to consider the consolidation of the labor organizations throughout the country, in order to present a solid front to employers and legislators.

BOSTON, April 13.—In an interview today Grand Master Workman Sovereign said that the Coxey movement was the foreboding of an insurrection. Thousands of toilers were watching, ready to resent any abuse the army may receive from municipal, state or national officials. The army was to workmen today what John Brown's party was to the slaves before the war.

LAMONT, Iowa, April 14.—The leading features of last evening's session of the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints culminated in the discourse of Elder Gordon Devel, the eccentric preacher of the church, in which he assigned Brigham Young and his followers in severe terms for apostasy from "the true faith."

The business session entertained for a considerable time the consideration of the divorce question. The marriage ceremony contains the words, "You mutually agree to be to each other companions, husband and wife, observing the legal rights of that condition, that is, keeping yourselves wholly for each other and from all other things during your lives." There is no question as to the import of the word "legal" as referring to the recognition of contracts confirmed by secular officials, or other lawfully recognized person whom soever; and while this now is endorsed as to the uniting the right for divorce by that same power, it is not so readily endorsed and the reserve to and for each other during the life of both is held as denying the right of a divorced party to marry during the life time of the former companion as being contrary to scriptural edict. The motion was referred to the first presidency and the bishop to prepare a statement thereon.

WOODLAND, Cal., April 14.—A dispatch from Winters says: The white people of this town have notified the ranchers who have been employing Chinese and Japanese laborers that they must discharge them. This the ranchers refuse to do and trouble is anticipated. A white man named Ferry, who is agent for a Chinese doctor, was mobbed and pelted with rotten eggs. A Japanese was also assaulted. Figures of Chinese and Japanese were hung in effigy and burned.

NEW YORK, April 14.—General Henry W. Slocum died at 12:05 o'clock this morning. He had been ill only a few days and his death was not expected. Just before 6 o'clock last night he suddenly began to sink, and Dr. Bellewas, his family physician, who had charge of the case, was summoned. Dr. Bellewas saw at once the serious condition of the patient. He called Dr. Fuhs and Dr. Benjamin, of the Westbrook, in consultation. They succeeded in arresting Mr. Slocum's relapse, and at 8 o'clock it was thought he was better. He suddenly grew worse and his family was summoned to his bedside to await the end. At 11 o'clock General Slocum fell into a sleep, which continued three-quarters of an hour. A few minutes before midnight he awoke and spoke to his family. At 12:05, perfectly conscious of his approaching end he died a painless death. Immediately after the house was closed, the telephone bell muffled and no information given out of the general's death until after 2 o'clock this morning.

HELENA, Mont., April 13.—The strike on the Great Northern and Montana Central system was peacefully inaugurated today at noon. At the stroke of 12 the men all left their posts or duty and gathered at the station, to await the appearance of the east bound passenger train at 12:25. As soon as the train stopped, two men delegated for that purpose, uncoupled the mail car from the coaches. The baggage and express were all taken from the car and then the engine and mail car were ready to proceed eastward.

Some time since the officials of the Great Northern issued a new schedule to govern various employees. This was to go into effect the 1st of April, and it made sweeping reductions in the wages of all the employees. The men would not accept it and it was hung up awaiting the return of President Hill from Europe. Since his return he has ordered that the schedule be enforced, and rather than accede to the demand, which they consider unjust, the men left work at noon today.

The strike extends from Larimore, N. D., to Spokane, and 1,500 men are now out, 200 of that number being in this city. The only trains that have left Helena today are two freights, one eastbound and the other westbound, which left this morning. They will be allowed to proceed to their destinations.

CHEYENNE, Wyo., April 13.—The industrial army arrived at 3 p. m., with banners flying and men cheering. The train was not permitted to stop within the city limits, but the engines were changed at Corlett station, five miles west of the city, and the train of twenty-six cars was afterwards run through to East Cheyenne, where but a brief stop was made to take on a supply of provisions, including 1,800 loaves of bread and five beeves, furnished by the city—enough to feed the men until North Platte, Neb., is reached to-morrow morning.

APIA, Samoa, March 28.—Samoa blood has again been shed. Since early in March, there has been a bloody contention between the rival native tribes, and already over thirty natives have been killed and fifty cruelly maimed.

It had been hoped that there might be a peaceful settlement of the inter-tribal differences and it was with that end in view that the warring factions submitted their chiefs to a trial before the chief justice. This peaceful method, however, came all to naught. On the 10th inst. the two factions came together in actual warfare. On that day a detachment from the Aana, or rebel party, ambushed a number of natives of Faasaleaga, Salvaia, who are understood to be supporters of the government. Several were killed. News of the outbreak was received here during the progress of a consultation between the president, chief justice and consular representatives.

This opening battle showed conclusively that neither the rebels nor the government natives will heed in the least the ordinance recently enacted by the Samoan government prohibiting head-cutting barbarities. In fact, the taking of the head of Chief Taffaga was of more than usual atrocity. When brought a captive into the government camp, he was but slightly wounded, but it is asserted that his arms were first taken off and afterward his head. That Chief Taffaga's head was actually brought to Apia to be presented to King Malieto, is certainly significant.

Following this outbreak, there was a cessation of hostilities for a few days, but there was great excitement here, caused by news that the people of Atua, who sympathized with those of Aana, intended to join the rebels in an attack on Apia.

The united consuls issued a proclamation warning armed parties of Samoans against coming within the Apia municipal district. The proclamation prevented the town from being overrun by armed natives.

On Monday, March 19, a particularly sanguinary battle was fought. For Samoan warfare, it was a heavy engagement. The battle ended in a complete rout of the rebels, but their defeat was not accomplished until houses had been burned, cows and horses butchered, women and children maltreated and the most horrible of barbarities committed. The rebels lost ten or twelve men and had a large number wounded.

The consuls are trying to arrange a peace and avert further bloodshed. That they will succeed is, however, doubtful.

LARAMIE, Wyo., April 14.—A. R. Gracie, a Union Pacific conductor, is down with a case of the smallpox. He has been quarantined and everything possible will be done to prevent the disease spreading. Mr. Gracie is supposed to have contracted the disease from Conductor Woods, of Ellis, Kansas, while attending the conference with Union Pacific receivers at Omaha.

LONDON, April 14.—At the festival dinner given at the Middlesex hospital last night the Prince of Wales offered a toast to the defense of the empire and said he rejoiced to think that the government had decided to increase the navy.

He added: "God forbid it should imply any threat to other countries. It is just the reverse; for in order to be at peace we must be strong. Therefore it is the best policy to strengthen the first line of defense—the navy, I hope the motto of which our volunteers are proud—that of defense not defiance, may ever be retained by the navy."

INDIANOLA, Iowa, April 14.—Wm. A. Ash found George Ashworth hiding in his haymow last night. Ashworth is the man who shot Mrs. Mason March 26th, ten miles north of here. He had been in hiding ever since. Seeing escape was impossible now he drew a revolver and shot himself in the temple dying within two hours. Mrs. Mason still lingers at death's door.

DENVER, Colo., April 14.—A special to the Times says the House Indian affairs committee today refused to ratify the Ute Indian treaty.

ST. PAUL, Minn., April 15.—The strike on the Great Northern railroad is gradually working east, having taken in Grand Forks, N. D., last midnight, and if not soon settled will probably reach this end of the line in about two or three days. It is developing a peculiar state of affairs.

SEATTLE, Wash., April 15.—The Great Northern Railroad strike is extended today over the Cascade division and the coast line, and the whole system is laid up from Minot to Seattle and from Seattle to New Westminster. Hardly a wheel is turning, nor a telegraph wire ticking over 2,000 miles of line.

The strike was ordered with such secrecy and suddenness that an hour before it was to begin the officials had not a suspicion that it was to happen.

ST. LOUIS, April 14.—Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, who is here, announces himself a candidate for the presidency of the United States.

WASHINGTON, April 15.—Miss

Madeline Pollard is the most talked-of person in Washington today.

Foreman Charles R. Cole of the civil court announced a verdict for the plaintiff, Madeline Pollard, for $15,000 damages from Congressman W. C. P. Breckinridge, thus ending the long and exciting Breckinridge-Pollard breach of promise trial.

WASHINGTON, April 14.—The Senate has made the following confirmations: Samuel Francis, of Utah, to be judge of probate in the county of Morgan; E. G. De Freis, of Utah, to be judge of probate in the county of Uintah, vice Isaac Burton; Joshua Greenwood, of Utah, to be judge of probate in the county of Millard; Henry L. Steed, of Utah, to be judge of probate in the county of Box Elder.

Postmasters—Oregon: John D. Black, Marshfield. New Mexico: L. J. McCaffrey, at Russell. Wyoming: Thomas J. Dayton, at Laramie. South Dakota: Samuel Totten, at Vermillion; Gustave Suasse, at Rapid City. Utah: Richard C. Cordell, Park City.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 14.—Senator Vance, of North Carolina, died at his home, 1726 Massachusetts avenue, this city, at 10:40 o'clock tonight. He had a stroke of apoplexy this morning. He had been suffering for some time past with a complication of diseases, but the end was sudden and unexpected. He was regaining his health and was thought to be on the road to recovery. He was compelled during the winter to leave the Senate and go to Florida. Here he grew somewhat better, and in view of the struggle over the tariff he returned to Washington. He was a member of the committee on finance, but took little or no part in framing the tariff bill.

SANTA CRUZ, Cal., April 15.—The great conflagration of last night and this morning reduced to ashes twenty-four buildings in the heart of the city, and caused a loss of over $265,000, with less than $100,000 insurance. One block reduced to ashes is bounded by Pacific avenue, Copper and Grant streets, and contained some of the finest buildings in the city. They were occupied by lawyers, bankers and merchants. The business district is across the street from the Pacific Ocean house.

The fire was of incendiary origin and was first discovered at 10:40 o'clock Saturday night, when an alarm of fire was run in, but the firemen could not obtain a supply of water from the hydrants, as the city's main had broken Saturday afternoon and the water had been shut off at the reservoir, three miles from town.

OMAHA, April 15.—General Kelly and his 1,200 troops spent a beautiful Sabbath, in the enjoyment of more luxury than they have known since they left home two weeks ago. The army reached the confines of Omaha shortly after 6 o'clock. The train halted on a side track just inside the city limits. Chief Seavey was there with two platoons of police, under Captains Cormack and Mastyn. It had been the intention to disembark the army there in the woods and have breakfast. The authorities had provided 2,500 loaves of bread and 2,000 pounds of cooked beef, while a business firm had given 1,000 pies. All this provender was in two box cars, which was quickly attached to Kelly's train, and then the procession moved on. Chief Seavey had asked General Kelly to keep his men on the cars, and they have been kept there.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., April 15.—A special to the Journal from Guthrie, Okla., says: The Oklahoma contingent of Coxey's army, 800 strong, completed arrangements tonight with the railroad company to carry them to Washington in box cars.

SAN BERNARDINO, Cal., April 14.—After leaving this city about 9 o'clock last evening, the army marched to Colton, and during the night took possession of a Southern Pacific freight train. The engineer side-tracked his train and refused to haul the men.

Upon the arrival of Sheriff Booth and posse the army was ordered to get off the cars, which command they refused to obey. The town hose cart was then drawn out and water from the city waterworks was turned on the men, drenching them to the skin. They stood their ground, however, and did not move until the whole army was placed under arrest. Captain Vinette and several of his lieutenants were then placed on a motor, preparatory to taking them to the county jail.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y., April 16.—George Griffith, the Englishman who left London, England, a month ago to go round the world in sixty-six days by ordinary means of transportation, expects to pass through in about two weeks. He will go to New York and then sail for England. He will in consequence travel 21,295 miles and lower Nelly Bly's record by eight days.

CHICAGO, April 16.—The famous viking ship, now lying in port at New Orleans, has been purchased by an association in Chicago of which ex-Sheriff Mattson, Editor Anderson of the Scandinavian and Captain Magnus Anderson are prominent members. The ship will be kept in this city.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., April 16.—There has just ended at South Pittsburg, Tennessee, one of the most remarkable political conventions ever held in the South. It was a convention to nominate a candidate for attorney general. Messrs. Moore, of Chattanooga, and Estill, of South Pittsburg, were in the race. Delegates were almost equally divided. The convention began Tuesday and it held a most continuous session from the time of meeting until Saturday night, convening at 9 a. m., and adjourning after midnight. Bitter feeling prevailed and bloodshed was narrowly averted; pistols were twice drawn in the convention hall. At last the deadlock was broken by the nomination of J. E. Donaldson, of Marion county, a dark horse, on the 1,256th ballot. Heretofore the greatest number of ballots ever cast in such a convention was 1,004.

DENVER, April 16.—A special to the News from Cheyenne gives the details of the exposure of a theft of mineral lands in Wyoming. Of the land donated to an asylum for the blind, dead and dumb over 15,500 acres were declared to be mineral lands in the heart of the Silver Crown mining district, Laramie county, in violation of the law. It is asserted that the discovery will defeat the Wyoming Republicans at the next election.

THE ARMY OF DISCONTENT.

Men everywhere are reaching out after the unattained, for this is the secret of effort, the key to enterprise, the riddle of universal man! "What we have we prize not," is the almost unequivocal voice of general experience. Men want more, something different to what they have, often that which is unattainable. To this they give toil, sacrifice, life itself! That which is sought varies with the condition or mentality of the seeker. To the hungry it is bread; to the man of self-endeavor it is work; to the miser gold; to the politician, place; to the man of business, success. The old proverb expressed true observation of human nature when it said, "Man never is, but always to be, blest;" and possession, when secured, as a rule needs a new stimulus, or satiety becomes a chronic feature as to the object sought.

One of the old topics of unfledged experience in debate, was the query, "Is there most happiness in pursuit or possession?" No permanent answer has yet been found! Some are altogether spasmodic in their pursuit of good. "Ye did run well, what doth hinder you?" is as pertinent to this class now as in the historic period. Weak in motive, evanescent in zeal, underfired in effort, easily discouraged, they become wrecked, stranded hulks on the shores of endeavor, or they founder in the deep waters, whether of calm or storm. Quite a few, though, are persistent, stern, perceptive; with compressed lip they go into the battle; nothing daunts them, for they are in to win; obstacles vanish at their approach, difficulties melt away like wax before the fire. Perseverance in pursuit, undismayed by opposition, sanguine even when darkness is round about their feet, and storms gather round their head, they dare much, they "attempt great things," and they oft succeed. Then again, the reformer appears to fall by the wayside, but his cause triumphs when he sleeps with the saluted dead! The Prophet inaugurates a richer, grander dispensation; he becomes a martyr, but "the blood of such is the seed of the church." The man of affairs toils in philanthropic lines, for the extirpation of crime or poverty, ignorance or injustice; he sows the seed, others gather the harvest; for these all melt away before continuous stroke. The man of business struggles with hard times, financial problems, and strange combinations; unwillingly he goes to the wall, his name is gazetted, his hopes and dreams all blasted; but his son perchance, begotten in the stress of calamity, goes forth and matures as a Jay Gould; with every faculty strung to the highest tension, material things seem to bend to the crook of his finger or the magnetism of his presence. And so in all directions, through blighted prospects, apparently useless endeavor and that which is stigmatized as failure, the world moves up to higher planes; all its interests are pushed to such success as we find visible everywhere around us.

School discipline is not always pleasant to the pupil; its restraint, the drudgery of study and continuity of lessons mock at the effervescence and instability of youth. Yet there are scholars, for out of faculty controlled and directed, the crucible gives out finally its wealth of education's precious ore.

Trade discipline breaks the enthusiasm of the new beginner. He becomes cautious, economical and prudent; he weighs contingencies, studies markets, familiarizes himself with goods; he becomes an adept in the science of human nature, until he can tell a man at a glance; knows how to approach him, how far to give him credit; and the mistakes of inexperience become the text book in which he reads success. His cash book, day-book and ledger are as the revelations of trade. Through them he gauges, judges his clientage and makes the whole subserve his education, until from the status of a simple trader he climbs to that of the developed merchant, and controller of immense interests and righteously acquired wealth. When some are panic-stricken he remains cool and collected; he looks the situation squarely in the face, and tries to adapt himself, his business affairs, to the changes which confront him; he may be embarrassed, but you cannot detect this; his eye is ever bright; his step is calm and steady, for hope "throws out her banners on the outer wall;" "the little spot of blue" is detected in the financial heavens, although no "larger than a man's hand," and soon the oppressive atmosphere yields to the radiance of renewed prosperity. This is true bravery. It evinces soul. There is genuine manhood behind; and a few such men in a community are its life, its salvation, for they are an antidote to despondency and a tonic all the time.

When the fretful farmer is telling of the low price of wheat, the disconsolate sheep man of the depreciation of wool, the stock raiser that there is no market for beef, the factory owner that there is no demand for his manufactures, the newspaper man and book-maker that luxuries (?) are being dispensed with, the merchant that "there is no man to buy his goods," and the laborer that "no man hath hired him;" and this is reiterated from mouth to mouth, from ear to ear, until the disease—which it is—becomes chronic, that community or nation will stand still—nay, it will go down in effort, in enterprise, in progress, and in full restoration to commercial and industrial health and lusty vigor. Grumbling is contagious; but so is hope. Idleness catches like a fever; labor does the same. A fully employed community is made up of individuals; and if a man is otherwise disposed, such a society throws out its glittering flag upon which is written, "if a man will not work, neither shall he eat."

It is this creative power which links a man to Deity, which redeems the desert, which supplies earth's teeming myriads. It makes society possible; it blends human interests; it produces wealth. It makes families, forms communities, founds states, and builds nations. But the lesson is as yet not well learned. Were it so, the clamors of anarchy and destruction would be exorcised instantly; every soul would share in the plethora of production; men out of work would be phenomenal; "industrial armies" would have no place save as they moved en masse to the creation of great and grand national works, such as statesmanlike patriotism would inaugurate and complete.

Human nature averages pretty much the same everywhere. Most men want to honorably sustain themselves and provide for a family. Those who are radically criminal are few and far between, like the one man (among the twelve hundred invaders of Ogden) who had been an inmate of our penitentiary. "The exception (it is claimed) always proves the rule." And far too often men who exhibit an almost unredeeming viciousness, are the product of circumstances for which society is responsible; and it should take care of this abnormal element, and so far remedy its own remissness in the interests of the fairly good.

That human nature sympathizes spontaneously with suffering had a new exemplification in our sister city the other day. A generally hopeful section of our humanity had pressed its way from the congested circles of eastern labor to the shores of the Pacific. Gradually they created the conditions they fancied had been left behind; but they could go no further, and many no doubt longed for their eastern homes. Had the globe been belted with land, or but divided by rivers, probably they would have continued to follow the sun. But they turned again, hopeful if suffering, and winning sympathy by good behavior and resolute purpose to see once more their families, kindred and homes. Outside of the natural timidity of the families of Ogden, and the bluster of hasty officials, the people of the north only knew suffering—to relieve it. Two thousand dollars a day it cost a sympathetic community. And when the orders were given to move on east, it was declared by an ubiquitous observer that there was hardly a dry eye among the thousands who lined the streets of the liberal city. Many a precious quarter or half dollar; many a piece of tobacco; many an article of clothing, went to comfort and show good feeling to the wanderers, when the givers hardly knew how or where their offering would be replaced. And from the already depleted purses of the betterable several hundred dollars and loads of supplies went into the treasury of the army for emergencies on the route.

Ever reaching out, the world is one great army of discontent. Nine out of every ten want to better their condition. The one-tenth want something they do not possess. Longing is an omnipotent ingredient of human character; and in the Divine economy, the inner voice which comes to all alike, while differing in degree, is ever urging the eradication of the transient, of love for sensual and material things; and this by the unfolding of that vista which, divested of all shadows, is radiant with supernal luster—and is the legitimate prophecy and product of the infinite but half-revealed in personal experience, and yet observable everywhere if you but study humanity at large!

The old government buildings at Fort Craig, Colo., will be sold at public auction by the government May 1. No sale will be effected unless $1,000 is received, or the amount each building was appraised at.

THE INDUSTRIAL ARMY.

The following telegrams, as completing the story of the "Industrial" invasion begun in the last issue, will doubtless be read with interest:

OGDEN, April 11, 9 a. m.—Superintendent Knapp clearly outwitted the courts and the Governor of the Territory by making it impossible for them to secure the necessary engine and train hands yesterday afternoon to return the industrial army to the coast. The army is still here and all attention is directed to its removal. After that has been done Mr. Knapp's case will receive consideration.

There was a noisy demonstration on the streets of Ogden last night, participated in by sixty or seventy men and boys, some of them half-drunken. The affair was permitted to go on without interruption and those who took part were not arrested.

Later a meeting was held by the marchers over the Favorite saloon and speeches of sympathy for the army were made by the leading spirits, who at times became exceedingly denunciatory in their remarks.

Another attempt to take the industrial army bull by the horns was to have been made last night, but a technical question as to the legality of the method arose and it was decided to get a supplemental ruling from the court. The former order was that the Southern Pacific should remove the men from the Territory and a midnight session of the court was held and Judge Miner asked to allow the plaintiffs to amend their decree so as to give the United States marshal authority to eject the Western host. The court room was filled with many anxious persons and the case stated in full and in long arguments by Messrs. F. S. Richards and Van Cott of Salt Lake. The amendment to the decree was asked forthwith and a number of attorneys who have worked unceasingly day and night imagined they read the signs of final and permanent defeat when the court stated that it was a question as to whether it could make such an order and adjourned until nine o'clock this morning.

Knapp was placed on the stand during the hearing and stated that in obeying orders he should give those of his company the preference. He was pretty roughly handled by the attorneys, who denounced the action of himself and company as infamous and without parallel. But he only smiled and said the army must be cared for.

OGDEN, Utah, April 11, 11:30 a. m.—Nine o'clock this morning was the hour set by Judge Miner last midnight for deciding the question of modifying the decree so as to permit the United States marshal to remove the army from the Territory of Utah. His honor was not at the courtroom at that hour, however, and after a brief wait it was announced that a decision would be rendered at the Reed Hotel parlors and thither the attorneys repaired, but were later obliged to go to Judge Miner's room in the building, where his honor was found with his feet encased in bandages on account of an attack of inflammatory rheumatism. Instead of the promised prompt decision, Judges Marshall and Royle, the S. P. attorneys, obtained permission to make arguments, which they did at length against making the supplemental order and asked for a continuation of the case to present authorities.

The opening of the case to further discussion was strongly opposed by Richards, Van Cott, Henderson and Evans, who said the delay was very expensive to the citizens of Utah and preferred rather to have the original decree annulled and wiped from the records than to have an order to stand in a form that made the Governor and the United States marshal powerless to apply the force necessary to expel the Coxey troops from the Territory.

After consideration the court granted the S. P. attorneys further time and adjourned court for one hour to listen to their citation of precedent cases. As a result still hangs in the balance of doubt and uncertainty.

11:40 a. m.—The members of the Norden and Denhalter companies of the Utah National Guard are well nigh exhausted and the effects of the service are visible upon the faces and movements of all. The Nordens were on duty until 12 o'clock last midnight, when they came up town and turned in at the city hall at 1 a. m. At 4 o'clock they were compelled to go on duty again on account of the failure of the Junction city deputies to appear at that hour. Private Colbath of the Denhalters had a narrow escape from drowning last night. Like his comrades he had done picket duty until it was well nigh impossible to keep awake. While tramping his beat between the railroad tracks and Weber river he walked over the bank of the stream and went completely under in the waters below. His struggle to get out was a difficult one, as the river was deep at the point where he fell in. As he clambered out on to the bank he was assisted by comrades and taken up town where he was provided with a dry suit of clothes. He is resting today and thankful that the experience did not cost him his life.

1:20 p. m.—At 11 o'clock the final arguments of the Southern Pacific attorneys began before Judge Miner in his private parlor. Vigorous opposition arguments were again made by counsel for the plaintiff and closed with the following words uttered by Hon. F. S. Richards: "We appeal to you to allow the court to enforce its own decree even though it shall be against the wishes and interests of the almighty Southern Pacific."

At 1:05 the final hearing was over, and Judge Miner again adjourned court, this time until 3 o'clock this afternoon. At that time it is hoped his decision will be forthcoming.

3 p. m.—About two o'clock this afternoon preparations were made to abandon the camping grounds on the S. P. property near the Weber river. There was but little to do in the way of packing, but that little apparently was done in anticipation of the court deciding that the U. S. marshal had power to remove them.

A large number of blankets, quilts, old clothing and provisions were donated by the citizens today, and Kelly stated that they would be distributed among the most needy members of the army between 4 and 5 o'clock and that the pilgrimage towards Washington would be resumed this evening or certainly not later than tomorrow morning. The men will carry white flags indicative of peace.

The commissary contains food enough to last for several days.

Two more army men were taken to the city hospital this afternoon. They gave their names as J. F. King, of Illinois, and T. Mullen, of New York. Both have pneumonia and their condition is considered serious.

OGDEN, April 11, 8:30 p. m.—Judge Miner made the following verbal ruling this afternoon: "Well, gentlemen, I have given considerable thought to this case. Of course, I have listened to the arguments of the several counsel who have very ably discussed the very important question in all its phases. I have listened with interest and profit to all of it; I think with profit to myself; and I find this is one of the most difficult questions that I have ever been called upon to meet. There is but little authority directly in point, if any. It is governed by the general principles that may be said to be applicable to this class of cases. There are no precedents. The court is obliged to travel over a road which has never been traveled before to my knowledge. At the former hearing, Judge Merritt and myself sitting together, made this order which is sought to be amended. We made it, as we thought, sufficiently strong to cover the necessities of the case. It now appears that that order was not complied with, and that application is made to amend it by giving the sheriff or marshal authority to execute and enforce the order of the court, provided it is not complied with in a reasonable time. I will say that since this motion was made I have consulted with Chief Justice Merritt; thinking it proper to do so inasmuch as he sat with the court at the former hearing, and the doubt I have had concerning what order should be made, has been in part dispelled by consultation with him. He takes the view, and so advises me on it, that this order should be granted and that the sheriff or marshal or both should be authorized to execute it. He put it in the shape of an order, but not intended, of course, as an order. I received it simply as advice from him, as he was with me in the former hearing.

So the conclusion I have reached, although it is shrouded in some doubt, is that the motion should be granted and that the marshal and sheriff should be called upon to enforce the order of the court as made, provided it is not complied with by tomorrow at 10 o'clock.

I would gladly have left this matter for some other court, but the position I hold is such that when called upon, the court is bound to act. Had I consulted my own individual private feelings concerning it and influenced by those views of law that seemed to be applicable and necessary, it might have made a little difference; but doubtful as this question has been, I can solve it, in the light of the advice I have had, only in the way I have indicated.

I trust in the execution of the order that all parties will endeavor to keep the peace in every way possible, so that no injury may result to any one on account of it, that is, if the order is not complied with before. I trust the marshal in the execution of the order will use extraordinary caution and care that no injury is done. Now, the order being made, the effect of it may be considered hereafter."

OGDEN, Utah, April 11, 4 p. m.—The ruling of Judge Miner, which follows, is accepted as defining the power and the authority of the Territory. It was supposed and declared by many that it was a case for which no remedy could be found, but it is now demonstrated that the court can step in and protect the lives and property of the citizens of the Territory. It is believed here by the most conservative men of all classes that there was but one course for the court to pursue, and that was the one clearly marked out by the ruling this afternoon.

The S. P. officials state they will now bow to the decision of the court. In case any of the Kelley army are found here tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock they will be promptly placed on board of S. P. trains and deported from the Territory.

The Salt Lake police left Ogden on the 8:20 train this afternoon over the U. P. for home and are due there at 4:30.

EVANSTON, Wyo., April 12.—The Kelly army is no longer on Utah soil, it having crossed the Wyoming state line shortly before 7 o'clock this morning. So far as that contingent is concerned, it is gone from the West forever and the East will have a taste of what has been experienced here the last few days. When the army marched from Ogden last night, it was under the guard of two companies of infantry and of the cavalry. It camped temporarily about three and a half miles from the Junction City, but later fell in line and tramped to Uintah, four miles further, near the mouth of Weber canyon, where the men halted at midnight, built fires and waited to take possession of a U. P. freight train, which, it was surmised, had been arranged for them to capture that no blame, responsibility or odium might attach to the company for transporting paupers from one state to another.

This arrangement was freely discussed by the army leaders as having emanated from the Southern Pacific as a quasi-repentance for folowing the helpless unfortunate men on Utah, and a bid for the forgiveness of the people of that Territory.

The hold-up of the train was a remarkable proceeding, as the engineer, conductor, brakemen, and even assistant superintendent O'Neill of the Wyoming division, who were in charge, were perfectly submissive and became as clay in the hands of General Kelly and Colonel Baker, who proved to be most skilful plotters.

The train was an immense one, consisting of thirty-five cars, twenty-five of which were close box, seven open and one caboose. There were two engines. The NEWS correspondent witnessed the capture, boarded the train, and start with the army accompanying it as far as Evanston.

One company of the Utah militia, under command of Colonel Tatlock, followed to Wasatch, near the line, but did not cross, it being against the law for a body of armed men to go from one state to another or for the militiamen to go out of the Territory while in service. That part of the militia camped in a special car at Wasatch during the day. It will be attached to the westbound passenger at 12:30, and is due in Salt Lake at 4:30 this afternoon.

Colonel Tatlock is feeling pretty well today considering the severe shaking up and bruising he received last night by a fall from his horse while galloping along at the side of Captain Gilbert, of cavalry company A, at 10 o'clock last night.

The army has plenty of good provisions for four days. It will reach Cheyenne at noon tomorrow, where arrangements for more food and a brief rest will be made. It breakfasted hastily at Evanston today, from the commissary provided by Utah, and will make a stop at Green River for supper tonight.

A dozen or fifteen men deserted here to hunt work at the Almy coal mines. Others will leave at Rock Springs, and as army life will become irksome to scores of others, they will drop out before the Missouri river is reached.

General Kelly said this morning, however, that he expected to carry at least four-fifths of the present enlistment to Washington, and that accessions innumerable greater than the desertions are being made.

OGDEN, April 12, 1894, 3 p. m.—The 3 o'clock passenger from the East over the Union Pacific arrived promptly on time, carrying within on a special car Col. Tatlock and the Denhalter Rifles and Utah Militia and representatives of the Salt Lake daily papers.

A train was met at the depot by Governor West and Secretary Richards. Drawn up on the north end of the building on the depot grounds were the Norden military company of Salt Lake and an Ogden company. Governor West spoke to the Utah National Guard, thanked them for their efficient service and complimented them highly on the work they had done.

The Governor and the Salt Lake companies of the Utah National Guard leave Ogden for Salt Lake City on the 8:20 train, which will arrive in Salt Lake at 4:30 p. m.

The Workingmen's association of Ogden are circulating a petition to abolish the chain gang. It will be presented to the city council. They give as a reason that it is a work of bad behavior and an expense to the city.

Everything is quiet in Ogden this afternoon.

CHEYENNE, Wyo., April 12, 8:20 p. m.—The California contingent of Coxey's industrial army, which was held at Ogden for two days pending the controversy between Governor West and the Southern Pacific railroad, has finally resumed its journey eastward and the motley crowd is now making its way across Wyoming. There were a number of accessions to the army at Ogden and it numbers sixteen hundred now.

The army captured a train of Union Pacific coal cars at Uintah station, near the Utah line, last night. It was useless for the trainmen to offer resistance, so they agreed to haul the men to Evanston, the end of the division. The men filled the twenty cars, five of which are open coal cars, and were brought into Evanston this morning. Mayor Winslow presented them with six beeves and they were hurried on to Piedmont, a small station a few miles this side, where a stop of two hours was made in order to allow the men to eat their breakfast.

The Union Pacific company has decided to hurry the men through to the Missouri river as rapidly as possible, permitting the train to stop only at small stations. The citizens of Rawlins will furnish food for the men's supper and a stop will be made for them to eat at the first station east of that place. The train is expected to arrive in Cheyenne at about 3 o'clock tomorrow morning. Mayor Stahl and City Marshal Carr have made preparations to supply the men with food, which will be sent out to the Colorado junction five miles west of the city. Governor Osborne at first contemplated calling out the militia to accompany the army across the state, but when the train arrived at that place the men were so orderly that he decided it would be entirely unnecessary to do so.

Assistant Superintendent Garrett O'Neill of the Wyoming division is accompanying the army from Evanston. He telegraphed this morning that no trouble had been experienced anywhere along the line. The men are orderly and promptly obey the orders of General Kelley, their commander.

The train reached Laramie at 9 o'clock this morning and a stop of a few minutes was made to take on two beeves and 900 loaves of bread furnished by the city council for the men's breakfast. Judge Blake had ordered out company A of the Wyoming National Guards to see that none of the men left the cars, but the militia was not needed. The train was then run to Red Buttes, thirteen miles south of Laramie, where a stop of two hours was made to enable the men to cook and eat their breakfast. The citizens of Rawlins furnished provisions for their supper and they were permitted to eat just outside the city limits.

Mayor Stahl, of this city, has secured three beeves and 1,200 loaves of bread which will be given to the men when the train arrives here, but they will not be permitted to eat until they have proceeded several miles beyond the city.

The Union Pacific officials here are endeavoring to keep the route of the army from this point a secret, but it is almost certain that the train will be sent south from here to Denver. The Union Pacific will then have hauled their unwelcome guests more than 600 miles, and the officials no doubt figure that if the men are unloaded in Denver, where there are several competing railroads, another company will have the privilege of transporting the army to the Missouri river. Another thing that has probably influenced the railroad officials to take this action is the determination expressed by Governor Jackson not to permit the army to enter Iowa. Governor Waite does not appear to object to their coming into Colorado, consequently the Union Pacific officials do not apprehend any difficulty in landing the army in that state.

Mr. J. S. McClelland, of Fort Collins, Col., had the misfortune to lose 1,000 fruit trees by fire last week. The Anaconda, Mont., Standard is authority for the statement that the losses to the sheepowners of Montana as a result of the recent remarkable storm will be enormous. Later statements in the northern Wyoming press are to the effect that both sheep and cattle losses were overestimated in that section.

Two young men named Hillberry and Tompkins, of Prairie Dog, says the Sheridan, Wyo., Post, were camped in a tent over near the head of Lone Tree gulch, where the late storm caught them. Herman Roda, who shot and killed his wife in Fremont county, Colo., in 1881, has been pardoned by Governor Waite on the recommendation of the prosecuting attorney and several jurors in the case. The case was rather a sensational one, but Roda always claimed that it was a pure accident. tiary. In prison Roda had made a good record, and he is now 52 years of age.

Frank Kauffman, a Sonoma, Cal., farmer who lay in a stupor for three days, died on Saturday. He had been practically dead since Wednesday, but though the extremities were cold the body in the region of the heart was still warm. At the inquest it was brought out that Kauffman had the first attack of his trance-like trouble eight years ago, and the affliction returned when he became despondent. The feeling began to come over him early last week, and he went to Stockton from Sebastopol to be treated by the physician who had helped him before. He was melancholly and apparently out of his head when he got there. The jury brought in a verdict of death from congestion of the lungs.

City Marshal A. E. Cook, of Como, Colo., was shot in the head and instantly killed on Friday night by a shoemaker named Levi J. Streeter. The only reason given by Streeter for the shooting is that Cook entered the shop and ordered him to throw up his hands and give him his money. This is not believed as Cook had always been an honorable and upright citizen of the country for the past ten years. He was foreman of the car shops for the Union Pacific at that point for the past eight years and was very prominent among railroad men as well as throughout the country. He was re-elected last Tuesday as marshal of the place. Streeter is well known in this vicinity, having resided here about six years. He has always been given to eccentric notions, but never considered dangerous.

The death of M. C. Sullivan, the well-known detective, was announced in a dispatch received from Tacoma last night says the Portland Oregonian. The dispatch stated that Mr. Sullivan had an altercation with Sheriff Matthews of Pierce county, about 8 o'clock in the evening. Both men became very angry and the sheriff slapped the detective across the mouth. Sullivan retired to his room in the Tacoma hotel in a high state of excitement and died shortly before ten o'clock. Heart disease, superinduced by the excitement, was the cause of his death.

The deceased was a noted hunter of criminals. He took part in every strike and labor trouble which happened in the Northwest, and particularly in the Chinese agitation in Portland in 1885; in the Chinese agitation in Washington; in the introduction of negroes into the Northern Pacific mines at Roalyn, and in the mining troubles in Idaho in 1892.

James H. Wallis left on Sunday for Montana, observes the Montpelier (Idaho) Post, where he goes to secure the property interests of Henry Todd, his wife's brother, who was drowned in the Illinois river at Kerby, Or., in February. A telegram received from Oregon by Mr. Wallis just before leaving stated that there was suspicion of foul play connected with the disappearance of Mr. Todd, and as he had $800 on him at the time, there may be room for this suspicion. The body of Mr. Todd has not yet been found, although the boat in which he was supposed to have started across the river at the time, was picked up several miles below. Mr. Todd has valuable mining property in Montana and spent the winter in Oregon to avoid the severity of the Montana climate. After Mr. Wallis has attended to the securing of his brother-in-law's interests in Montana, he will proceed to Oregon and investigate into the mysterious disappearance of Mr. Todd, and endeavor with the aid of the authorities there to find the body.

Officer John W. Flynn, one of the oldest and bravest officers on the police force at Helena, Mont., was murdered by burglars between 4 and 5 o'clock on Wednesday morning in the Northern Pacific depot. The crime was not discovered for an hour or more, and the assassins left no trace as to their identity. The indications are that they had almost completed their work preparatory to blowing open the office safe when Flynn came in, suspecting no danger. One of the cracksmen felled him with a blow on the head with a heavy chisel, and then in rapid succession four shots were fired into his body from a 44-caliber revolver. One of them went straight through the top of his head and must have caused instant death. Two other shots took effect in his body, while the fourth went through his clothing. The burglars left their tools, which had all been stolen from an adjoining blacksmith shop, with one or two exceptions. They got no money, as they did not complete their work after the murder of the officer.

A romantic and somewhat peculiar marriage has taken place at Fresno, Cal. A young man named Cupid Stephen Fresh, who is on his deathbed with consumption, was married to Miss Zoa Daniels, daughter of Rev. E. P. Daniels. Mr. Fresh has but a few more weeks to live says a special dispatch to the San Francisco Chronicle, and the marriage was the fulfillment of troth plighted each other in happier hours. The bride is not unknown to the people of the state through notoriety gained nearly three years ago in a suit for slander against Moses J. Church, who was deacon in her father's church and one of the wealthiest men in Fresno. The suit was tried in Stockton and she obtained a judgment against Church for $25,000 but never received any money, for the grand jury of Fresno county indicted her father and another member of the church for conspiracy, and they were both found guilty and that seemed to end the suit. From that time until the present Miss Daniels has not been much heard of.

When Cora Belle Fellows was wedded to Chaska and came with her dusky liege lord to Nebraska, says the Nebraska State Journal, the skies seemed bedecked with a constant aurora and the little log hut seemed a palace to Cora. Months passed and a cloud grew above the horizon in the form of a squaw, and those women are "pisen." Her eyes were as dark as the dismal hereafter, and her hair was as straight as a 2x6 rafter. The stout heart of Chaska succumbed to her graces, for an Indian knows what an elegant face is, and they met when the moon the calm atmosphere mellowed, nor cared for the heartache of Cora Belle Fellows. One night when the storm king the coal scuttle looted this Chaska put on his red blanket and scooted away to the north with this maiden, nor tarried till he and fair Minnekadinctum were married. And Cora she waited and bore his abuses and hoped he'd return to his wife and papposes, but weeks rolled by till the looks of her cupboard reminded her sorely of Old Mother Hubbard. Then Cora, disheartened, disgusted and gaunted, deserted the home that her Chaska once haunted, and mingled once more with her friends, broken-hearted, and Cora and Chaska forever are apart.

T. E. Prouty was arrested by Deputy Sheriff Greenwell yesterday morning, on a charge of stealing two bicycles in Salt Lake City, says the Idaho Falls Times of the 13th inst. It appears as though the young man and his accomplice, who signs his name as Richard Dowe, stole two bicycles in Salt Lake City and packed them together with some other things in a large box, took them to the Union Pacific depot, paid the freight on them to Idaho Falls, and young Prouty came here on the first passenger. Before the box was shipped, however, the theft was discovered, the owners proved the property, took the bicycles out, and allowed the box to be shipped through as a trap to catch the thieves, and it worked admirably. In the meantime Agent Changnon, and Deputy Sheriff Greenwell had received communication from Salt Lake City, and were in readiness for their man when he should demand the box. Prouty had arrived and rented a shanty in the north end of town, hired a drayman to haul his gold machine, as he called it, thereto. When he appeared at the depot and had signed the express bill, Greenwell arrested him. He was completely paralyzed, and afterwards said he was acting as agent for someone else.

A dastardly attempt to burn the residence of James Lyttle at Meeker, Col., has been discovered. The house, which is one of the finest in town, had been occupied by Byron McKeown and family up to a few months ago, when they went East, but leaving all their effects in the house. Friday evening near midnight, a light was seen by a neighbor in one of the rooms, but nothing was said about it until later developments disclosed a most diabolical plot. Last week Lyttle received word from his tenant that he would stay in the East indefinitely and wanted his effects sent to him. Mr. McKeown's furnishings consisted mostly of gold and silverware, mainly wedding presents, and their value was very great, as McKeown has a million or more in his own right. On Monday morning Mr. Lyttle intended to comply with the request, and upon his going into the house found everything in disorder. He immediately sought Marshal Tooley, and together they made a tour of inspection. Ingress had been made by breaking in the rear door, and everything of value and little bulk was missing. In one room the air was filled with kerosene smell, and a lamp without a chimney was found in the bottom of a closed cupboard still burning, but nearly burned out. The shelf over it was badly scorched, but fortunately did not catch fire. Robbery was the object, and attempted incendiarism was resorted to to cover up the deed. No one is suspected.

IN THE MISSIONARY FIELD.

ARMORY, Monroe Co., Miss.,

April 5, 1894.

I take this opportunity of penning a few items to the News, believing a short account of this part of the missionary field will not come amiss. I left Salt Lake City April 15, 1893, for the Southern States mission, arrived at Chattanooga, Tenn., the 18th, and was assigned to labor in the state of Mississippi, in the North Alabama conference. I labored a short time in La Fayette county, was then transferred to Monroe county, where I have labored ever since.

I have been wonderfully blessed in my labors, taking all things into consideration. I have had excellent health most of the time and good treatment. I find the Southerners to be a kind-hearted, hospitable, generous people with very very few exceptions.

When we come to take into consideration the fact that the country is flooded with false stories and libelous literature concerning the doctrine that we teach and our people, it is truly wonderful to me that they treat us as well as they do.

The Lord has wrought a great change in the minds of the people of this part of the world since the dedication of the Salt Lake Temple. We are becoming better known and prejudiced is being alloyed. Another thing in our favor is that the people are becoming tired of the old song of their minister, "only believe on Jesus and you shall be saved," for they generally sing it to the popular tune of five hundred dollars a year—no money, no preaching, and in these hard times it is about all the people can do to keep from starving let alone purchasing the Gospel.

It is marvelous how the Lord has opened up the way for the accomplishment of His purposes. I wish to mention an incident here which I believe to be worthy of record. There is a young man by the name of James Walker, one of the firm of Slaughter & Walker, picture enlargers, who is a resident of Salt Lake City. He deserves credit for the honorable and truthful manner in which he represented our people to his father, who resides about five miles from the city of Aberdeen, the capitol of Monroe county. This gentleman (the father of James Walker) is a doctor and an intelligent man. He has considerable influence among the people, consequently has aided us very materially in our labors. His house has been open for us to stay with him whenever we desired to, and he has been the means of allaying prejudice and getting us a place to preach in.

Within five miles of Amory, a little railroad town, there are four families of Saints residing. Soon after conference last fall Elder Alonso Brinkerhoff (my present companion) and myself established a Sabbath school, which is doing considerable good. Since then we have baptized thirteen persons, which now makes a membership of eighteen. There are fair prospects of others coming into the fold in the near future. A number of non-Mormons are attending the school and seem to be very much interested in the principles taught.

I have labored in this county very nearly a year. Some seasons it is quite sickly on account of the Tombigbee river overflowing and then receding, leaving swampy marshes which generate malaria and thus causes chills and fever. Having passed through one sickly season, the presidency of the Southern States mission has thought it advisable to transfer me to the state of Kentucky to a higher and more healthful climate, so I thought a short account of my labors up to this time would be interesting to my friends and the friends of truth generally.

Your valuable paper comes duly to hand, and is read with interest. No one can appreciate the DESERET NEWS more highly than a missionary. Anything that comes from our mountain home is hailed with delight except false stories and scandalous reports and they are repudiated.

Before closing I would say to returned missionaries, don't lay off your armor entirely when you get home, but write occasionally to friends you left in your fields of labor and whom you made promises to. You will thus aid materially the Elders left in the field.

CANADA'S COMFORTS.

CARDSTON, Alberta,
March 28, 1894.

As we seldom see any communication from this far-off land, I thought a little news would be read with interest by some of our readers of the NEWS.

There has been more sickness than usual this winter, but there has only one death occurred, a small child of Brother James May.

The winter has been about an average of the winters here, no snow to stay only a few days at a time; two-thirds of the winter the country has been free from snow, with the exception of drifts in the cooleys. The weather has been warm and pleasant for winter, with the exception of two cold snaps, which lasted two or three days. Cattle have done well on the range. A year ago this winter was the hardest ever known here. The people in Cardston and vicinity lost heavily in stock during the severe cold weather and a north wind drifted them south into Montana. Very few have been found that drifted off.

The people here are getting woke up in regard to taking care of their stock. They have been in the habit of milking their cows all summer, and turning them on the range to winter.

They did well for four or five winters, and the people began to think it was useless to put up hay (which grows in abundance here) or to build sheds and stables, although they were told repeatedly by the leading men to provide for their stock. But last winter taught them a lesson. Cattle suffer more for want of water than anything else. The rivers and creeks freeze up and there is no snow only what is in the cooleys, and it is so hard one can drive a four-horse team over it and not leave a mark. But where people live a few miles from town and have sheds for their stock and keep a good watering place, the stock come home every night and keep fat all winter.

The country is building up very fast, but there is room for more people than there are in Utah and all have a quarter section of land each. There are three wards organized already, and some are wanting more because, they say, it is too far to go to meeting.

Farmers are busy putting in their crops, although spring is rather late for this country. There is no doubt whatever in the minds of the people here as to this country being a good farming country, and a very easy country to make a living. Last season was a very dry one, but the grain averaged twenty-five bushels to the acre. Water can be taken out of the rivers for irrigation as easy as in any country, but if the farmers would only farm right they would not need water only for vegetables and trees. This has been fully demonstrated. They never think of summer fallowing their land here; some often raise two or three crops with one plowing.

It seems strange to us to hear of such hard times in Utah and so many men idle. We have plenty to do here. Teams and men have been working all winter hauling timber. If the working class had sand enough in them to come to this country and stay with it and be industrious, in a short time they would be independent. The people here as a general thing are well satisfied, but there are always a few drones everywhere, those who expect farms and houses already built for them.

CANAIGRE IN DIXIE.

ST. GEORGE, April 6, 1894.

Having seen in your SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS letters from different parts of the country on home industry and home produce, and a good deal of the much-talked-of canaigre root, I thought I would write and say something for Dixie, or St. George. It is a plant that was here when the first settlers came, and is a native of the country, or climate. It is found on a sandy soil where the roots can grow and expand in the loam or soil, and will grow without water. It has now grown to a height of eighteen inches, and by May will be to seed. It does not grow from the seed but from the roots, which are like carrots in shape, with one seed end. The roots will grow to be eighteen inches long and three or four in diameter, and one hill or stool will cover about three square feet. I dug a hill or stool and from the one hill I got forty-five pounds of roots that were green, and there were a good many that were dead and I do not know whether they have lost their tanning property or not. They are in some parts so thick that the plants will almost cover the ground for acres and grow year after year.

I tell you that you need not go out of Utah to get the roots. Mr. Johnson says that it will produce twelve pounds to the hill or stool in Arizona, but Dixie can beat that, and has got plenty of it. It will grow among the grain if the land is sandy.

We had a tannery here once, but we had to haul bark twenty-one miles and it was hard to get at that and the company died out; but there is talk of starting one again because we have got the canaigre and plenty of hides. The here.

I am glad to see the way things are working and the moves that are on foot to build up home industries; and it is with pleasure that I read the letters of those men that are working to build up the same. I am also pleased to see the stand the NEWS has taken in these matters and hope it will always be first and foremost in helping to build up Utah, the Queen of the West.

WHO WANTS A HOME?

IDAHO IN THE NORTH.

RUDY, Fremont county, Idaho,
April 4, 1894.

We are having a fine Spring here. Most of the people are busy putting in their crops, and some have got through. We have a large country, plenty of water, and a very good opportunity for men to get them homes. But, like all new countries, it takes labor to make homes. I would like to encourage the young men of the Latter-day Saints to leave the thickly populated cities and lead out to the country, get them homes and help to build the country and roll on the work of God. We as a people feel that the Lord has His hand over us in Idaho. We have every right as American citizens.

The people in the Rudy ward seem to be striving to serve the Lord. We have a good Sunday school, Mutual Improvement association and Relief society and Primary. We had a good time last Saturday and Sunday a Lewisville where Presidents George Q. Cannon and Joseph F. Smith gave some good fatherly counsel and advice to the Latter-day Saints.

Yours, Wm. F. SMITH.

NEVADA IN THE SOUTHWEST.

MOAPA, Nevada, April 4, 1894.—Will you be so kind as to give space in your paper for a few lines? I hope it may be of interest to some who have no homes.

We have a fine country here, plenty of good land and water and a good climate; it is situated in the southern part of Lincoln county, Nevada, and is known as the Muddy valley. It is a fine farming country. We can raise almost anything in the shape of vegetables, fruit of all kinds, hay and grain in abundance—in fact almost everything we plant yields well.

The valley is not very thickly settled, but the people are all united in their labors as well as in their enjoyments. There is room yet for at least fifteen hundred families to make them a good and comfortable home. We have a fine range for loose stock; the country is covered with grass and with cows and all kinds of stock keep fat the year around. There is some vacant land yet, and plenty of it to be bought at a very reasonable figure. The people as a majority are living up to their religion and all try to enjoy themselves.

Yours respectfully,

J. E. STOKES.

UTAH STAKE CONFERENCE.

The quarterly conference of the Utah Stake of Zion was held in Provo on Saturday and Sunday. Of the general authorities of the Church there were present Elders F. M. Lyman, John Henry Smith and Abraham H. Cannon of the quorum of Twelve Apostles. During the Sunday services the Stake tabernacle was well filled.

On Saturday a number of encouraging reports were made by ward Bishops. Elders Hatch and Layton, presidents of the Wasatch and St. Joseph Stakes of Zion respectively, spoke briefly, the home industry theme taking precedence in their remarks. Elder David John, of the Utah Stake presidency, reflected the spirit of the general Conference of the Church in regard to secret societies.

Elder F. M. Lyman was the last speaker of the day. He urged upon the Saints the necessity of making greater efforts in the line of establishing and maintaining home industries. The financial situation was also touched upon; the credit system being condemned; creditors were urged to be lenient with their brethren.

On Sunday morning the general and stake authorities of the Church were sustained. Elder V. L. Hailday was sustained as a member of the Stake High Council, vice William D. Robinson, who has been appointed to labor as Bishop of the American Fork ward.

Elder John Henry Smith spoke to the Saints on the great plan of salvation of mankind, and encouraged the Saints to labor diligently for the upbuilding of Zion.

Elder Edward Partridge, of the Stake presidency, spoke briefly on the duties devolving on Latter-day Saints.

Elder F. M. Lyman supplemented his remarks of the day previous on home industries, and referred to the teachings of President Young in connection therewith. In the Gospel of Christ was a solution to the social and labor problems before the world today, and they would yet have to be solved by this people.

Elder Abraham H. Cannon addressed the Saints on Sunday afternoon. Reference was made to the recent object lesson to the Territory, i. e., the commonweal or industrial army. Had the Latter-day observed the instructions of God, there would not now be poor and unemployed in our midst. The leaders of Zion, the speaker urged, had not been alive to their duties. It was not only the duty of those in authority in Zion to attend meetings and look after the spiritual welfare of the people, but also to see that their temporal wants were complied with; men and women who were cold and hungry could not worship God as they should do. Industrial and financial mistakes were pointed out in the uncultivated fields and orchards, unused and rusting machinery, and the non-support of home manufactures. Education was also referred to. The support of the B. Y. academy and other Church schools was also urged, that eventually, instead of our boys and girls going East to school, those from the East would come here. Practical education—education of hand as well as brain—was advocated. As a means of progress, a healthy discontent, a desire to be something better and greater—was advocated. In conclusion the speaker added a few words on the rapidly growing divorce evil. Husbands and wives were urged to be forgiving with each other, not allow differences to arise between them, and remember the marriage vows they had made.

The closing remarks of the conference were made by Elder A. O. Smoot, of the Stake presidency. He endorsed the remarks made, especially those in relation to home industry. He encouraged the towns of Payson and American Fork to build boweries, that the two next Stake conferences might be held there. The resumption of the payment of 50 cents per month by each of the brethren, and 25 cents by each of the sisters, for the liquidating of the Stake Tabernacle indebtedness, was urged.

PLEASANT GROVE ITEMS.

PLEASANT GROVE, April 15, 1894.—Artemus Holman made an assault upon Watermaster David F. West yesterday with a shovel, striking him upon the head, and cutting an ugly gash. Dr. Allen, of Provo, was telephoned for, and upon his arrival sewed up the wound and the patient is progressing favorably. West was in the act of turning the stream from Holman's land when the assault was made. West claims that Holman made the first attack, while Holman says West pulled a gun on him. Prosecuting Attorney Gash has made out papers for Holman's arrest. The case will doubtless come up tomorrow; the charge reads "with intent to kill."

George Aldridge had one of his large toes amputated here last week; the member had troubled him for some time.

James T. Thorne, of Thorne Bros. &

Co., has gone to Kansas city for the purpose of hunting up a market for Utah produce.

"Suckers" have begun to make for the mountains and many are catching the brain food. Prove river is alive with the finny tribe.

D. H. Robinson, principal of district schools, is continuing his grade without compensation, while other departments have closed. This act on the part of the principal is a generous one and will surely meet the approval of his patrons.

The grangers are becoming worried over their field crops—too dry.

Wadley & Co. are forging ahead with their onyx mine, getting out rock for an eastern order.

The Union Pacific station was burglarized a few nights ago. A few tickets were extracted, which would be of no use to the thief.

Many attending the quarterly conference being held at Provo have gone by the primitive mode, viz: horse teams and vehicles.

Don C. Driggs, who has been here visiting relatives, left for his home in Teton basin, Idaho, Friday. Mrs. Leond M. Driggs accompanied him. She will join her husband in the north, where they will make their future home.

MR. NEELS' DEATH.

The death, in New York, on Thursday night, of Mr. John N. Neels, removes from this stage of existence one of the staunch friends of Utah's people. Mr. Neels has been ill for some months, and it was found necessary a short time ago for him to undergo a surgical operation for abdominal abscess. He rallied, and seemed to be on the way to recovery, as was stated in the NEWS at the time. The information of his death, conveyed in a brief telegram to Mr. S. P. Teasdel, of this city, was therefore unexpected. No particulars are given.

Mr. Neel has made frequent business visits to this city during the past thirty years, and has made many warm friends who regret his departure. He was a man of superior qualities, and his loss a great bereavement to his wife and associates.

THROUGH OLD MEXICO.

COLONIA DIAZ, State of Chihuahua,
Mexico, March 28, 1894.

On Thursday, March 22nd, after seeing Apostles Young, Smith and Teasdale and Elder Robert S. Watson leave Deming, New Mexico, by train for Salt Lake City, I started for the "Mormon" colonies in Mexico, traveling from Deming in a lumber wagon, with Elder Charles Matthews, of Colonia Diaz, as teamster. After advancing ten miles in a southern direction we encamped for the night on a mesquit flat.

The next day, March 23rd, we continued our journey, and after traveling twenty-six miles, following the grade of the "future Mormon" railroad most of the way, and passing the Florita mountains on the left and what is known as the "Three Sisters" (the three mountain peaks) on the right, we arrived at the prospective town of Columbia, which is situated on the boundary line between the United States and the Republic of Mexico. This particular locality was boomed a few years ago, when the prospects were promising of pushing the new railway into Mexico at once; but owing to the repeated delays in building said road the town has been almost deserted, and there are only two or three families living there at present. Immediately south of the townsite is the boundary line between the two Republics. In the winter of 1892-93, through a co-operation on the part of both governments, large iron pillars were placed, one mile apart, along the line. Each of these pillars, or posts, is a foot square and seven feet high, weighs 800 pounds, is painted white so that it can be seen a long distance off, and rests in a square rock socket buried in the ground. On the north side of each of these pillars is the following inscription in large, raised letters: "Boundary of the United States. Treaty of 1853. Reestablished by treaties of 1882-1889." On the south side we read: "Limite de la Republica Mexicana. Tratado de 1853. Restablecido por Tratados de 1882-1889."

Four miles south of the boundary line is situated the little Mexican town of Palomas, where a custom house until quite recently was situated, but where there is now only a guard stationed to watch the boundary line and prevent goods from being smuggled into the country. All dutiable goods which formerly passed in from Deming have now to be shipped in by way of El Paso, Texas, which is quite a detriment to our Mexican colonies; and petitions have recently been presented to the Mexican government praying for the re-establishment of the custom house at Palomas.

The main cause of closing the custom house was a recent robbery committed at Palomas by the Temochics, the modern rebels of Mexico, who also killed a number of the line guards a short time ago.

Having passed a satisfactory examination, and no dutiable goods being found in our wagon, we were permitted to travel on, and after going three miles beyond Palomas, which is 40 miles south of Deming, we encamped for the night about a mile west of the south end of Palomas lake, a fine sheet of water fed by springs which rise and form a beautiful stream at the point where the custom house town stands.

Continuing our journey on the 24th, we reached the Casas Grandes river (here also known as the Boca Grande, which means "big mouth," thus named after a wide opening in a chain of mountains through which the river passes). We found no running water in the river bed, this being the dry part of the year; but during the rainy part of the season it sometimes overflows its banks and covers the flat country through which it flows for miles on both sides of the channel. This river rises in the mountains about 200 miles inland, takes a serpentine course through the large valleys of northern Chihuahua with only a very little fall, and disappears in lakes situated southeast of Palomas. In times of very high water these lakes are said to overflow their banks and some of the Casas Grandes waters then escape into Rio Grande del Norte. All the Mormon settlements in Chihuahua, Mexico, are situated on the Casas Grandes and its tributaries. It runs through a succession of very extensive valleys which are very fertile and productive; but the river water is inadequate to water more than a small portion of the lands. The facilities for raising cattle here are most excellent; I never saw a finer grazing country in all my travels, nor did I ever see fatter cattle than those I have beheld grazing in the great valleys of the Casas Grandes, since I came into Mexico. Were it not for the heavy duties proscribed on horned stock by our U. S. legislators, these cattle could be exported with great profit to their owners into the United States. The Mexicans don't like the McKinley bill one bit. Having crossed a part of one of the lower valleys of the Casas Grandes somewhat diagonally, and crossed a low mountain chain, we encamped for the night in a grassy little valley 13 miles east of Colonia Diaz.

On Sunday morning the 25th we traveled 7 miles and crossed the dry bed of the Casas Grandes a second time; thence passed on 6 miles further to Colonia Diaz, the most northern Mormon settlement in Mexico, where I spent the remainder of the Sabbath day, speaking to the Saints twice.

Colonia Diaz, thus named in honor of Porfirio Diaz, the president of the Mexican republic, is situated in a fine open country; it can scarcely be called a valley, as there are no mountains within a radius of 12 or 15 miles from the settlement. The great Sierra Madre chain, the summits of which form the boundary line between the States of Chihuahua and Sonora, are distant westward about 50 miles. If this immense district of flat, fertile country in which Colonia Diaz is located is to be termed a valley, it is about 70 miles long from north to south, with an average width of nearly twenty-five miles. The Casas Grandes enters the valley from the southwest and after passing through it, in a southeasterly direction, leaves the same at Boca Grande.

Colonia Diaz is situated 90 miles south west of Deming, New Mexico, 40 miles in an air line due south of the boundary line between the United States and Mexico, but only 18 miles from the nearest point of said boundary, where the line makes a square angle. From that point westward the United States takes in a strip of country nearly twenty five miles wide of what was once Mexican territory more than from that point eastward. Colonia Diaz is only four miles north of the Mexican town of La Ascension; it is about 200 miles southwest of El Paso, Texas, nearly 250 miles north northwest of the city of Chihuahua, the State capital, and 70 miles north of Juarez, the present headquarters of the Mexican Mission. There are at present 80 families of Latter-day Saints at Colonia Diaz, or 660 souls, Wm. D. Johnson, junior, is Bishop, and Joseph Henry James and Charles Richens are his counselors. The townsite consists of 144 blocks, each of which is 27 rods square, sub-divided into four lots. The streets are six rods wide. Only a small portion of the townsite is occupied as yet, the other lots waiting to make homes for more settlers. So far, nearly all the houses in the colony are built of Mexican adobes, common size of which is 18x12x6 inches, making a clump of clay of considerable weight. Most of the houses have no rock foundation to stand upon, but in regular Mexican fashion the adobe walls rest upon mother earth itself. The meeting house, which has been enlarged a number of times, is built of the same material as the dwelling houses; a number of the fences enclosing the lots are also built of adobes. Elevated far above the tops of the houses of the settlement there are nearly twenty windmills which are busily engaged on windy days pumping up water from a depth of from 10 to 15 feet to the surface, where it is utilized not only for culinary purposes, but also for watering trees and garden spots. There is plenty of underground water all over the country at the depths stated; but a more economical and practical way of raising it to the surface than by the aid of windmills is about to be introduced in Diaz. The limited water for irrigation purposes brought into the colony lands so far is obtained from the Casas Grandes river through a canal about five miles long, and from the Palotado stream through a ditch originally made by Mexicans, from whom our people have purchased water shares. This little ditch is about 25 miles long. The original land purchase made in Colonia Diaz in 1886 consisted of about 7000 acres; subsequently 27,000 acres additional were purchased; hence the present colony covers an area of 33,000 acres.

The settlement was first founded in 1886, and though the people have met with many disappointments, and have passed through many hardships and some privations, they have stood their ground nobly, and the prospects for the future now seems to be bright and promising. Hereafter the people expect to raise sufficient breadstuff to do the colony; hitherto they have not done this, but have had to buy grain from the Mexicans at Casas Grandes and other places. There are a number of fine young orchards in the settlement, notable among which is one owned by the Bishop and another recently set out by his father, Wm. D. Johnson, who formerly resided at and was the original founder of Johnson, Kane Co., Utah. Colonia Diaz can also boast of a candy factory, and a broom factory on a small scale; a small store, stocked with general merchandis is kept by Elder George M. Brown, late of Provo, Utah. A good understanding exists between the Mexicans and their "Mormon" neighbors. A great change for the better has taken place among the Mexicans at La Ascencion and other places since Colonia Diaz was founded; they have adopted many of the ways and modes of living of white people, not only in their farming operations, but in their domestic life. Better farming implements have been introduced among them; they begin to use stoves, tables, chairs, etc., in their houses, and have even become more cleanly and neat in their habits during the past few years. La Ascencion is a sample Mexican town of about 3000 inhabitants; it is the seat of government of the "municipal" in which Colonia Diaz is situated; and this is a part of Districti Bravos, which constitute the northern part of the State of Chihuahura, which is one of the 27 States composing the Republic of Mexico.

A MAORI CONFERENCE.

KOHUNUI WAIRARAPA, New Zealand, March 20th, 1894.

The quarterly conference of the Wairarapa district, of the Australasian Mission, having been appointed to be held at Kohunui, on March 17th and 18th. Elder George Bowles and I left Carterton on the 14th for the conference place, to see that preparations were made so as not to delay our meetings. After a pleasant ride of thirty-five miles by horse, we arrived at Kohunui, but to our surprise all the natives had gone off some fifteen miles distant, to a "tangi" (crying over the dead). However, word was left with a European, that if we came we were to go to the next "pa," five miles further on. We continued on, our horses being very tired. Shortly after dark we came in sight of Turanganui, a branch of the Saints of the Wairarapa district. The lights were burning brightly; and when we arrived at the house of Retine Tamihana, we called out "tena ra koutou e te hunga tapu O te Atua," (there you are the Saints of God). They had been expecting us, so when we called them "Saints" they knew who had arrived. Our horses were taken care of, and we were shown to the best room in the house, a room fitted up "manga kaumatua," (for the Elders.) The kettles were soon on the fire to prepare some supper for us; and within an hour, we were sitting on the floor, Maori style, eating heartily of the luxuries for the inner-man, which consisted of potatoes, eels, meat and cabbage stewed up together, bread, and "Mormon tea" (hot water and sugar.) We were also afforded the privilege of using our fingers to convey the food to our mouths. We were somewhat used to this mode of eating, however, and it did not take us long to make a start. But it is very amusing to watch a new Elder, who has come direct from Zion, the first time he uses his fingers. Yet if we could learn to use the language as quick as we learn to use our fingers instead of knives and forks, it would be a great help to us in spreading the Gospel.

We were up early next morning; and after having "Karakia," and "Kai," (prayer meeting, and breakfast,) the natives made ready to go to the lake near the sea coast, to catch eels. They desired us to accompany them, which we did.

A pleasant ride of two miles brought us to where the eel baskets were set in a narrow channel. After spending five or six hours in boat riding, talking to natives, and watching them fish, we all made preparations to return home. After returning to Turanganui, we had supper, and held prayer meetings as usual. As soon as the prayer was over a messenger stepped inside and announced that Sister Keriana Patai Jury was dead. It was a great surprise to us, as she was so well and hearty, and was down here fishing only this week. On hearing the news, the Saints commenced a "tangi," a Maori custom of crying when a person dies. So we retired to our room so as not to disturb them in their heart-rending wailings.

Sister K. Patai Jury, was the eldest daughter of Brother Henare Potai, (of Gisborne, or Turanga) who is well known by all the Elders who have labored in that part of New Zealand. Her husband, John A. Jury, familiarly known as Tewhatahoro amongst the natives, was one of the natives who assisted the Elders in the translation of the Book of Mormon into the Maori tongue. He is one of the finest orators in New Zealand.

On Friday, the 14th, Elder Bowles and I returned to Kohunui. Shortly after our arrival there, some of the Saints began to arrive, and after supper a number of the Te Oreore branch Saints arrived, and all had a real old Maori "tangi."

We were up early next morning, as it was the day for our conference to com mence. The ringing of the church bell at 10 a. m., announced it was time for the opening of the first meeting. The meeting house, a neat new place nicely fitted up, was soon filled with men, women and children, who had looked forward with fond anticipations to this "Kui." Opened by singing, "kua kake atu koe ki runga noho ai," Piripi Te Maori, lead in prayer. Continued by singing, "Tama ngakau marie." Elder L. G. Hoagland, President of the Wairarapa Conference, made the opening remarks; speaking of the restoration of the Gospel by an Angel, thus fulfilling Rev., 14:6; greeted the Saints, and asked God's blessings on them, and hoped the Conference would be an enjoyable one. Paratene Tui, followed by bearing testimony to the truth of the remarks of the previous speaker, also of the truth of the Gospel as restored in these latter days. He felt to thank God for His blessings, and for sending the Elders so many thousands of miles to preach the true Gospel of Jesus, to his people. He then quoted "for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive," commenting on the same.

Piripi Te Maori, then spoke, testifying that the Gospel was now being preached among the natives by the Elders, and they (the natives) could not have an excuse that they did not hear the true Gospel, even if they do not embrace it. In making his closing remarks he spoke on the gathering of the house of Israel. His remarks were spirited, and very interesting, as they were delivered with true Maori oratorical effect and eloquence.

Closed after singing, "No hea teneiope nui." Benediction by Aperahama Tui.

Afternoon meeting was commenced by singing, "Ki ana mai to Ihu reo," Prayer by Toi te Huatahi.

Singing "E koutou e tiaho nei."

Elder George Bowles was the first speaker. He expressed his sorrow to hear of the sudden death of our dear Sister Keriana Potai Jury, read from the 11th chapter of Rev., and delivered a very interesting sermon on the same. He hoped we all would be true servants of God, so as to inherit the great blessings that will be given to those who take part in the first resurrection: Toi Te Huatahi spoke, giving a brief account of his Branch, (Te Oreore.) He told the Saints to listen to the teaching of the Elders, and then they would not go astray.

Aperahama Tui spoke briefly on the joy of his soul to listen to the servants of God, speak on the Gospel. The Natives then chanted a "Rongo pai," or verses bearing on the second coming of Christ. Benediction by Hami.

In the evening a Priesthood meeting was held, in which much valuable instruction was given to the native members. The sisters also held a meeting in a large hall adjacent to the Church; in which most of them spoke on their experiences in the Gospel.

On Sunday morning we all assembled in the Church house at the usual hour. Commenced by singing "Me mau koe i tou ripeka." Prayer by Paratene Tui. After singing, "E Ihu, toku oranga." Matine Ruta spoke for a short time. He quoted from Luke 11:9, 10, and commented on it.

Arapata Te Maari followed, bearing an earnest testimony to the truth of the Gospel, as it had been restored to the Prophet Joseph.

Reteni Tamihana gave an interesting and eloquent sermon, on the great faith of the people of Nizeveh, of Job, and the three Hebrew children. He also bore testimony, as did the great Apostle Paul, when giving his Epistle to the Romans, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

Meeting closed after singing, and benediction by Elder Bowles.

At 2:30 p. m. we again assembled in the usual place. After singing and prayer, one child was blessed, and the Sacrament was administered by Paratene Tui, and Toi Te Huatahi, (two native Elders.)

Elder Hoagland then spoke; taking up the most of the time, in speaking on the 1st Chapter of Galatians. He also dwelt on the returning of the Hebrews to the Holy Land; there now being 80,000 there, 40,000 of which live in Jerusalem, and they are now returning to that Land at the rate of 10,000 a year. He then explained to the natives, the nature of the dedicatory prayer offered by Brother Orson Hyde, on the Mount of Olives in the early part of the history of our Church, telling them that the return of the rain, etc., to that land was in direct answer to prayer offered by Brother Hyde, a servant of God.

Piripi made a few closing remarks bearing testimony to the truth of all that had been said in the Conference. He hoped all would prove true to the cause that they had espoused, so as to be able to meet the Lord, when he comes to reign as King of kings, and Lord of lords.

Meeting closed after singing, and Benediction by Apehama.

In the evening meeting, Elder George Bowles made the opening remarks, speaking on the fleshy and spiritual body, and then compared the spirit of man to the spirit of God, or (Holy Ghost) showing the difference between the two. In his closing remarks he showed how the Holy Ghost was conferred now, and also in the days of the primitive Church. His remarks were well defined, and calculated to benefit all who would adhere to them.

The meeting was then given into the hands of the Saints, for the bearing of testimony. They soon took advantage of it, and before the one speaking would get seated another would be up ready to speak next. It would do the hearts of the Saints in Zion good to have heard the earnest testimonies that were borne by our dusky-skinned Brothers and Sisters. It lasted until all had spoken but two or three.

Closed after singing, "E koutou e te ngenge e nga tangata katoa," (come all you that are weary,) an English hymn which has been rendered into Maori by Elder J. M. Hendry of Salt Lake. Benediction was then pronounced by Hani.

Thus ended one of the most enjoyable Conferences that has been held in New Zealand; and all felt amply repaid for the long distances they had come to hear and participate in the latter-day work of our Heavenly Father.

On the following day (Monday) most of the Saints went to the "tangi" of our late sister Keriana P. Jury. Tomorrow Elder Bowles and I intend starting for the Mahia, 300 miles north of here, where our "Aperira Hui tau" ("April Annual Conference") is to be held. We expect to meet our native Saints from all parts of New Zealand, at that Conference, and also some twenty-four of Zion's Elders. We shall go by horse, and will visit the Saints en-route, in company with the Manawatu and Hawkes Bay, districts Elders.

Winter is now approaching this land of ferns, in the antipodes, while summer is drawing nigh to the fair vales of our dear mountain home. The News comes to hand regularly and is read with much interest by the Elders and Saints. May God bless all of the Saints in Zion, is the earnest prayer of your Brother in the eternal bond of Brotherhood.

L. G. HOAGLAND.

THE FUTURE FARM.

VI.

EDUCATION OF THE FARMER.

NOTE 1.—Our republic is built on freedom and equality, under the golden rule. It could not be built on anything less, in order that its structure may prevail. This is self-evident. Therefore, we can have only one general system of education, and must be, under the protection of the republic, free and open to all its members. The farmer, the artisan, the industrialist, architect, student in the liberal arts, and in fact any kind of legitimate producer and wage-earner, has an equal claim upon the republic for a full education in all legitimate pursuits of life and happiness. The republic owes it equally to every one of its sons and daughters, from the kindergarten pupil to the highest university graduate.

In our republic, every citizen should aspire to the highest efficiency of citizenship. The traditionated decaying, un-republican tendencies and inclinations for unequal privileges in education, is contrary to the genius of our republic and an outgrowth of Caesarism.

History has abundantly proven that equal privileges of education must be guaranteed and upheld by the republic. If not, as yet, the equal privilege will wane before the varied financial ability of citizens to bestow education on their children, and under which the republic would be weakened. The republic must be responsible for the extension of equal privileges to a full education to all its members; which will be a most powerful guarantee against any return to intrusion or invasion of Caesarism. But without this absorbing educational system it is not governed by pure republican principle.

It should not be a question with any true citizen of our republic but what the teachings of the Great Nazarene contains the most advanced and sublime principles of ideal government that we know of, and should be taught as the fundamental doctrines in all classes of ethic-religious learning. Those principles, in a oneness, form themselves into the only true and faithful balance-wheel in all the affairs of state. Those master-teachings cover all conditions, and will always remain a perfect guide, and will also demand equal secular education to all members of the realm, besides the teachings of sacred principles, as an equal inheritance to all.

NOTE 2.—Religious Education.—The very foundation upon which the structure of our republic rests is contained in the principles of the Gospel; and its Constitution is in all respects in harmony with the Gospel of the Great Master of Nazareth.

When ancient Israel rejected the Gospel, a law code (the ten Commandments) was given them; but the ethics of the same did not preserve them against Caesarism. Under the guidance of great statesmen and men of God, who had the interest of the people at heart, they prospered under republican rule. But under the rule of the ethic code of laws the people did not achieve an education in statesmanship sufficient to preserve them against the "moloch of greed" (which in those days generally were characterized as idolatry); they fell—a fall greater than any known on our globe. And likewise have all nations fallen, before or later, which were ruled by anything less than the discipline of the Great Master of Nazareth. When, therefore, these teachings are withheld from our schools, it at once divulges that Caesarism is lurking at the bottom.

There is nothing of the teachings of Christ presented in the Bible that should be withheld from being taught in our Christian schools. If it is withheld, the institutions of our republic are indirectly assailed. But what should be guarded against is that sectarianism is sought to be brought into our public schools.

Providence has in time brought forward a more sound and unimpaired comprehension of the true difference between the Gospel and run out sectarianism. There should be no trouble in introducing at once the teachings of the Great Nazarene in our public schools. We must be more and more truly Christianized in order to keep up steady advancement.

NOTE 3.—Farmers' Education as American Citizens of our Republic.—Farmer—Citizen's education, at the university, agricultural college, experiment station, technical and mining schools and in veterinary, state-economy etc., extends over a broad and almost unlimited scope, making it necessary for farmers, more or less, to adopt science as precepts for application in order to take full advantage of accepted economic scientific progress, and which farmers, at present, could not acquire themselves, on first hand, but harvest as fruitage from the solutions of the laboratory and in the experimental field of the scientist.

When that time shall have come when advanced education, more than now, shall be the property of all, and be braided in with the habit and life of farmers, then we may expect, perhaps, to advance in economic well-being faster than we do now. But at present we will have to do the best we can, under our encumbered empiricism; and now, as always, trust master minds to lead the van in the application of advanced science, as a kind Providence will lead them in their progressive efforts.

Agricultural colleges have already done an immense amount of good, and in connection with the university and the other mentioned departments of education will be able to offer a finished education to the sons and daughters of our grand republic; not alone for farmers, but for all kinds of useful industries, to enable them, in measure with the advance of our republic, worthily to fill all governmental and executive positions that our nation will have to extend to its sons and daughters.

The experiment-stations, whenever they get well harnessed and hitched up, and well understood by the farmers, will prove of exceeding value to this industry. It is with scientific farming, as in other industrial sciences, that the more we learn the more we can see of what is yet to be learned. And so also with experiment stations; the farther farmers advance in the application of science, the more questions experiment stations will be called upon to answer. They already have proven of exceeding benefit to agriculture and the general farming industry.

NOTE 4.—The Farmers' Education in Social and Political Economy.—This is a most vital part of our educational system, and stands at the door to success or defeat. And so much has it been neglected and imposed upon, at a time when the decaying remnants of monarchism were constantly imported, and perhaps unawares braided into our social and political fabric, that aristocratic European wastefulness and domineering royalism has become fashionable as a privilege amongst what is called the "upper ten," gradually drifting away from the sublime and noble simplicity, from the cherished memory of our old illustrious prototypes of ideal democracy, and republican patterns of dignified golden rule force and invincibility. We are coming more and more down to European social and political deterioration and decay.

Whenever a people takes upon itself the responsibility of a republican form of government, it sets out to solve the problem of an ideal commonwealth founded on liberty, equality and brotherhood. The educational department of such a commonwealth must extend over the whole people. It cannot give special privileges of education to only a part of the people. If it does it imitates monarchy, adulterates and corrupts republican true principles, and undermines its own existence. Republican commonwealths must exercise continued watchcare on this vital point. The very great danger to the republic does not alone consist in ignorance, but anti-republicanism is also lurking in education unequally divided, forming class distinction. The amphibious half-studied old-fashioned doctrinal preceptor, may, for an apron, hammer ever so much upon the fact of the many graded intelligence humans possess; republics nevertheless must hold out equal opportunities of education to all members, else one of the main pillars of the republic will be weakened.

Our prosperous pioneer republic has been much retarded in its advancement by being burdened and encumbered with monarchical influences, but which, with few exceptions, it has withstood very successfully.

According to the necessary ruling equity of our republic, the consumption per capita must agree with amount of production per capita. For instance: if the chief magistrate of our republic needs $50,000 for his yearly consumption, it must be proven that such expenditure for consumption is legitimate, on the general platform of equity and economy, at present. And then as we advance in the value of production per capita (that is, in national welfare) then, and not before, can also, legitimately, the value of consumption per capita be advanced in proportion.

The stern consistency of this publican equity may be an ugly feature to the only partly trained and yet traditionated aristocratic inclined citizens of our young republic; but they will have to come round or withdraw from the battlefield of our glorious destiny.

Our educational system must be executed in this republican spirit of economy. It must harmonize with the condition, financially, of all true wage-earners. The student's life, financially and socially, must not estrange him from the farming life he is expected to return to after graduating. That humble, social, sublime simplicity that marks all true merit and ability should eminently prevail in all institutions of learning. A teacher and professor in agriculture must as much as possible live the life of a farmer. And economically he should keep himself on the same level. University and college life must in no degree unfit the farmer-student for his practical position in life's struggle, or put him above his common life condition. This is a point that should be closely guarded. If not, our educational system will miss its mark.

The financial decline of farming, through attempted avarism, within the last twenty years, must again be retrieved; and the farmer's better education is looked for as a powerful lever, sufficient for both political and economic advancement to gain lost ground. The Agricultural College should have teachers advanced above par in farming life, and the economic application of agricultural science, for both male and female. It should faithfully preserve the character of refined farming life on the farm, enabling them to move above class distinctions of any kind. But it should untie the traditional farming knot of dullness from its moorings of ignorance. The child of old rural education should through college life be extricated from a dormant intellect, and be actuated through a system of true and thorough college-training to a new life, worthy a citizen of our grand republic.

NOTE 5.—Conclusion on Farmers Education.—Traditional mankind, as yet, to some extent place the social position of the agriculturist as that of an inferior caste, or as belonging to a kind of feudal dependency, where muscle and produce were the main considerations. This is simply a reflection on farmers' prevailing ignorance and degradation under feudal slavery, and which as yet throws its shadows, as the lingering remnants of a condition that modern embryo feudalism would like to renew.

Until of late agriculture in Congress was represented with only two or three per cent of farmers, and who were not strictly producers; they did not work with their own hands, but made their profits on the work of their tenants and hired labor. Under the rule of adulterated republican principle, they earned both their money and honor by the toil of their dependents. Think of it! Was it any wonder that the farming interest of our republic was on the down grade? And is it any wonder now that picked men amongst the farmers today have come to the front, to correct the blunders of past neglects, that they, with unprecedented intensity of minority effort, may be able to open the breach through which to pour in the legions of present necessities, in the interest of and for the production of the farming industry?

At present, it seems to be the main financial lever in the interest of the farming industry to establish a national banking system, through which the people's money is handled and governed in the interest of the people, and which will set at rest the now prevailing financial uneasiness and uncertainty, and prevent in the future such financial calamity as we now are suffering under, through giving a power in the hands of a few which they have proven themselves unworthy of.

In the past our national welfare has been left too much in the hands of the Shylocks who have been and are figuring on how to entangle the world into a general dependency under the money-power. It is this yoke that now will be thrown off. A Mosaic year of release (Deut. 15) would make a short process of settling that matter.

But to close with we will present a short illustration. The present financial ability has been diminished about fifty per cent compared with twenty years ago. But for the purpose of keeping within smaller figures, let us suppose that the farmers have been financially disabled only to the amount of buying one pair of shoes less per capita; and the farmer's disability would also diminish the custom to the shoe industry about $35,000,000 financially, disabling all concerned in the same proportion. Where does this disability commence, and where does it end?

From where, in the main, did the farmers to all appearance derive their present financial decline? How did it come to pass that the farmer's consuming or purchasing ability is lowered about fifty per cent? How came the present panic and depression? How is it that merchants lost more than half their trade? How is it that millions of hands are idle, and the producers and wage-earners, the feeders of the nations, are without work; starving and suffering women and children are crying for bread? How is it that there is want, when there is plenty in the country to supply all?

And how is that the purchasing power of money is about doubled, while the value of labor, produce and real estate has, declined that much.

As a long way about answer to these many questions, we may be permitted to ask: Is it an accepted axiom that producers or wealth-earners only are, or can be, legitimate citizens of our republic?

If the producer be dethroned, and the greedy consumer and manipulator of conquered toil be exalted to honor and power, it is only a repetition of what has passed on through millenniums but which is now speedily hastening on to its doom. CHRISTIAN A. MADSEN.

BIGLER'S BIOGRAPHY.

ST. GEORGE, Utah, April 13, 1894.—When spring opened in 1844 I made my way to Jackson county, Virginia, where my labors mostly were until the death of the Prophet and Patriarch. I was in Ripley, the county seat, when Lawyer Smith, of that place, told me there was a paper in mourning for me in the postoffice. It was the Times and Seasons that gave me the sad news. I could have fought. Soon feelings of loneliness came over me. Sorrow filled my bosom; it would have been a relief to me could I have been alone and wept. The counsel to the Elders out on missions was to stop preaching for the time unless invited, and return home. I did so and found my father living on his own little farm sixteen miles south of Nauvoo.

In the autumn of 1845, mobs began to turn out the Saints, driving men, women and children from their homes. My father was obliged to pack up and move into Nauvoo for safety. I have seen the heavens lit up at night by the flames burning some poor brother's dwelling. In October of this year a general Conference was held in the Nauvoo Temple, lasting three days, when it was decided that the Church leave and go to a country "where God Himself was the sole proprietor of the elements." This motion was made by George A. Smith, and a sea of hands went up in its favor.

As soon as the Conference adjourned the whole Church began in earnest to make preparations to leave the county the people not knowing where to go, neither did they care much, only that it might be where they could worship God without being mobbed for it or for believing the Book of Mormon to be a record brought forth by the inspiration of the Almighty.

The Book of Mormon as a divinely inspired record seems a big bugbear to this generation. When the Elders brought the Book of Mormon to the county where I lived in 1838, proving its authenticity by the Bible and showing that it had come forth in fulfillment of prophecy as found in holy writ, and that it was a history of a people who inhabited this continent, of whom the Americans are a remnant, my father sent to Kirtland, Ohio, 200 miles away, for a copy. This was before he joined the Church. After reading it I remember hearing him say that no man in and of himself could write such a book. Polly, my eldest sister, then a young woman, read the book, and she too believed it and said it made plain to her passages of Scripture that were not plain to her before. Well do I remember the first time I ever saw a Lamanite. I could not take my eyes away from him, he calling to mind the Book of Mormon, the history of his race as I then verily believed it to be and do yet.

Returning to my story, on the 7th of February, 1846, giving endowments in the Temple ceased. That day over 600 went through, so I was told. On the morning of the 9th the Temple was discovered to be on fire. Fortunately it was put out before much damage was done. Since then I heard that a man living near Warsaw by the name of Agnoe, or some such name, was offered $500 to burn the Mormon Temple. In the afternoon of the 9th of February, in company with my father and Elder George A. Smith's family, I bade good bye to our beautiful city and Temple. Crossing the Mississippi river, we made our way to the place of general rendezvous on Sugar Creek, six or eight miles west of Nauvoo. There the Saints remained in camp for several days. My father and some of the brethren put up a coal-pit to burn charcoal so as to have it for shoeing horses. While in camp there fell a deep snow, making the surroundings look dark and gloomy, after which it turned severely cold, freezing the Mississippi river so that the Saints crossed over on ice.

On the 17th of February the people began to be organized into companies of hundreds, of fifties and tens. My father was captain of ten. The following are the names of his men: Jacob Bigler, captain; George A. Smith, Father John Smith, John L. Smith, Thomas Callister, Albert Carrington, John D. Clark, Jesse B. Martin, John Harvey and myself (Henry W. Bigler). The following was the outfit: Five wagons, nine horses, two yoke of oxen, one thousand pounds of flour, twelve bushels of corn-meal, two bushels of parched corn-meal, three hundred and fifty pounds of crackers or sea biscuits, one hundred and fifty pounds of meat, two bushels of seed corn, two bushels of wheat, three bushels of buckwheat, two sets of plows, two spades, two hoes, one iron wedge, five augers, fifty pounds of soap, one hundred papers of smoking tobacco for Indians, three rifles, three muskets, two kegs of powder, one hundred pounds of lead besides an assortment garden seeds of various kinds.

On March 1st at 2 p.m. camp broke and a general move was made. The afternoon was warm, melting the snow in a very little while. The road became muddy and miry and all cut up with more than five hundred wagons. On the moving of the 3rd the camp was called together when President Young addressed the brethren and cautioned them to be careful and not crowd upon each other with their wagons while driving and gave instructions to the pioneers in regard to their duty and likewise to the guard that they bring up the rear and see that nothing was lost or left behind.

Late in June we reached Council Bluffs and on the 18th of July I volunteered, with 500 brethren, to serve one year in the Mexican war. That same day we marched eight miles to the Missouri river, where there was a French trading post. There Colonel Allen issued to his men provisions, camp kettle, knives, forks, spoons, plates, coffee, sugar and blankets. On the 21st of July, at 12 o'clock, we took up the line of march for Fort Leavenworth, the men keeping time to the tune of "The girl I left behind me." It was a solemn time, leaving families, friends, a near and dear relatives, in an Indian country, without house or home, perhaps never to see them again in this life. I bade my parents good-by and did not see them again for nine years.

At Fort Leavenworth we received our tents, arms and accoutrements as United States infantry. As we approached the garrison a great many came out to meet Colonel Allen and his Mormon battalion, of whom he seemed to be proud. Notwithstanding we were ragged and dusty yet we heard it remarked that the colonel had a noble looking lot of men. They were wonderfully taken up with our martial music, especially with one young drummer, Jesse Earl, who was a perfect Duzette. On the 18th of March captains of companies took up the line of march for California by way of Santa Fe. The colonel, remaining behind to complete his outfit, died suddenly. The battalion had become much attached to him and his death was deeply mourned by his men.

A WINTER MONTH.

Observer Salisbury, in his official monthly bulletin to the government, says in his review and comparison:

"March, 1894, in Utah, was essentially a winter month. Although its temperature was not notably severe it averaged somewhat below the normal. As is usual in March there were several raw, blustery days, but, contrary to the old saying, the month both came in and went out pleasantly. A decided cold spell lasted from the 5th to the 8th. The warmest day was the 29th, at most stations.

"Vegetation did not advance much in March, and the spring may fairly be called a backward one. Considerable snow fell, although the monthly precipitation was below the normal, and judging from all reports, the amount of snow lying in the mountains is sufficient for a good irrigating supply for the ensuing season.

"On the whole Utah was especially fortunate in escaping the severe storms and frosts at the close of March, which were so devastating in the eastern and southern states."

TO THE WOMEN OF UTAH.

Now is the time to plant out mulberry trees and cuttings, and it is important that this should be done as the starting point of the silk industry, and also that the trees and cuttings should be of the very best quality, and put in at the proper season of the year. The interest awakened during the World's Fair work must not be suffered to die out again, but the fact kept before the people that this climate and the soil of Utah are specially well adapted to silk culture, and that it can be made a remunerative industry in the homes of the people if they will persevere in the work, which is light and easy, much more so than many other occupations; women and children can perform the labor and make it profitable if they set about it with a determination to succeed. The mulberry trees do well raised in brush planted in rows and each row cut every year, so the young tender leaves could be picked easily even by the children.

ZINA D. H. YOUNG.

UTAH MILITIA UNIFORMS.

The question of providing uniforms for the various companies of the Utah militia was discussed at a meeting. Governor West explained that the matter would be referred to General Ottinger and Lieutenant Lassiter. He stated, however, that the goods must be according to the United States Standard which was thoroughly understood by Lieutenant Lassiter. Of course, the Governor and his staff explained that they were in favor of home manufactured goods and had already recommended that preference be given to Utah mills, but as between the latter they felt they could make no discrimination and would not. All who wished to enter the field of competition were invited to do so.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

THE SURE WORD OF PROPHECY.

It is not inappropriate at this time to call the attention of the Latter-day Saints to the well known and most remarkable prediction given through Joseph the Prophet concerning the disturbances to be expected before the consummation of the present era. The prediction referred to is that contained in the 87th section, Doctrine and Covenants. The Seer first depicts the awful convulsion of this nation, terminating in the "death and misery of many souls." But this war was only the beginning of a series of disasters of a similar kind, for "the days will come," he says, "that war will be poured out upon all nations, beginning at that place." Thus far the words of prophecy relating to this subject are perfectly clear. Viewing them in the light of history, we can not fail to perceive their literal fulfillment in every particular; nor can it be denied that the great Seer of this age, for clearness of prophetic vision and perception of details of history to him still future, ranks among the foremost Prophets sent to man by the Almighty.

But of the latter part of this prediction there is evidently something which is not yet completely fulfilled. We read:

And it shall come to pass, after many days, slaves shall rise up against their masters, who shall be marshalled and disciplined for war. And it shall come to pass also, that the remnant who are left of the land will marshal themselves, and shall become exceeding angry, and shall vex the Gentiles with a sore vexation.

Now, if part of this prophecy has had its fulfillment in the War of the Rebellion, it is almost universally understood that there are other parts of the prediction still to come to pass. There is a series of events that are distinguished from that war as something which will take place "after many days." It is true, the slaves as well as their masters were marshalled and disciplined for war; but there is evidently something more, even of that, to expect. In this connection, and in view of the recent marshalling and disciplining of an army calling itself "Industrial," an observant and studious friend ventures the suggestion that the term "slaves," although primarily applying to the African race in the South, may admit, like so many other prophetic expressions, of a metaphorical use; why may it not, in short, find application, in a metaphorical sense, to the laboring classes? Our friend argues: The appropriateness of such metaphor cannot be questioned when it is remembered that the working men themselves in their controversy with their so-called "oppressors" often represent their condition as "white slavery" and themselves as "slaves." Terms like these have become almost a universal battle cry.

Without assuming the correctness of this interpretation, the prophetic passage under consideration may safely be called a forecast of impending troubles in which the labor agitation may and doubtless will play an important part, followed by or perhaps contemporaneous with agitations among the Indians, of a serious nature. But this is not all. For to the calamities of internal contention among the nations of the earth shall be added those of famine, plague and earthquakes, and thunder and storms, until the nations shall feel the chastening hand of the Almighty. And all this is, according to prophecy, in consequence of the innocent blood that has flowed on earth, and which, like that of Abel of old, is crying to the Lord of Sabaoth for vengeance.

The present movements among the industrial classes of the civilized nations point to a speedy fulfillment of many of the predictions of Joseph the Prophet. Even the world now can see danger ahead. Master Workman Sovereign says the Coxey agitation is the foreboding of a revolution, and he compares it to the insurrection of John Brown previous to the Rebellion, an opinion which is shared by others. Fear for what may soon transpire has seized many a brave heart. In connection with this subject it is well worth noticing that the question has been sprung to call representatives of the various labor organizations together in a general conference for the purpose of discussing the practicability of consolidating the various interests, so as to enable them to present a solid front not only against employers, but also against legislators all over the country. Surely these portentous events would seem to be leading to the remaining great occurrences which were foretold by the Seer more than half a century ago.

To the Saints these things are most significant. The Saints shall be the only people not at war one with another. Among them the conditions of the world do not prevail and cannot prevail as long as they are adhering to the commandments of God. Their mission is one of peace and their whole interest is centered in the salvation of mankind. They are commanded to be faithful in this work while destruction is sweeping the earth. "Wherefore stand ye in holy places, and be not moved, until the day of the Lord come; for behold it cometh quickly, saith the Lord." And in as much as they will adhere to this with all their hearts, they shall certainly be preserved in times of peril and obtain final victory, to the honor and glory of the great Captain of their salvation. And in the meantime they will give heed to the sure word of prophecy as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawns and the day-star arises.

ELDERS EXPELLED FROM PRUSSIA.

The latest issue of the Millennial Star which has come to hand—the number for April 9—contains extracts from letters written by President J. H. Stoecker and Elder Vetterli of the Swiss and German mission regarding the expulsion of two of our missionaries from the kingdom of Prussia. Some days ago the News noted an item in an exchange wherein the statement was made that North Germany had recently imposed the penalty of banishment upon Latter-day Saint Elders. At the time we observed that, according to information received, such action had been taken by the authorities in Lorraine, the province won by the German empire from the French; but as no news of like character had come from Prussia we thought it probable that a geographical mistake had been made in the name of the country which had imposed the edict. It now appears that our cotemporary was right; it was the Silesian province of Prussia that did the expelling. From the letters above referred to the following extract is taken:

There is quite an uproar at Sorau, Prussia, at present. Elders Vetterli and Billeter have been banished from the kingdom and their banishment placed on the passports. Brother Vetterli was bidding the Saints farewell in the branch and returned on the evening of March 21. A surprise awaited him in the shape of an invitation to go before the police, and a newspaper announcement that the "Mormon Elders" had been banished from Prussia. The following day they went to the court house, where they were informed of their banishment and that they would have to leave within eight days. They pleaded their cause, but without avail. They spoke of Elder Weller, who was unable to speak the language, but were told to take him along or banishment would follow. The order for banishment came from Frankfort on the Oder. It was indeed a surprise to the Elders, not only to be banished, but to find that the priests had gained their object in expelling them; and while it will be hard on the Saints they feel that the Lord will turn everything into good. Elder Weller has remained temporarily at Sorau, but he may also be banished.

It was at Sorau that the late Elder David Hoagland Cannon passed his last days on earth; it was there he died. But the work which he was instrumental in beginning in that vicinity did not stop with him. An Elder who lately returned from the Swiss and German mission and who had excellent opportunities of information, made the statement that in this very branch of Sorau there had been more accessions to the Church than in any other branch of the mission, if not more, indeed, than in any other branch in Europe. In view of this condition, it is easy to understand the uproar of the opposition and the expulsion of the Elders. The adversary is not asleep, and he always acts in this way when the power of light seems to be preparing to make great headway.

MEXICAN COLONIZATION.

Periodically there is an agitation by the newspapers of the country regarding a proposed exodus of the Mormons from the United States to Mexico. This has occurred so frequently that it might be thought no one would be deceived by the statements made, for the Mormons are yet living in these valleys, with no indications or intention of moving. The agitations referred to are generally chargeable to interested parties in Mexico, who have secured land grants on condition that they bring in a certain number of colonists, and who seek to recruit the ranks of these by Mormon settlers, some of whom occasionally take up their abode in the southern republic. An unpleasant feature of these stories is that there are plausible statements made in connection therewith regarding Church officials approving this, that or the other location as a suitable place for settlement, when there is no truth in the assertion.

There has been a considerable number of the Saints settle in Mexico and others may go. But any action in this line is on individual responsibility and not the result of any concerted action or counsel. Most of these settlers have gone to the grant of the Mexican Colonization and Manufacturing company, which has lands in Chihuahua and Sonora. These settlements are in the Mexico Stake of Zion, and comprise a population of probably 2,000 souls. As matters are at present, the people can secure individual title to land, except in what is called the prohibited zone, where only Mexican citizens can acquire such title.

Regarding colonists going to this part of Mexico, Elder George Teasdale, who is in charge of the Mexican Mission, in response to an inquiry by the NEWS, makes the following statement: "We are not urging any migration to Mexico. If worthy people want to come and help build up the country, they are welcome. The Mexican Colonization company has obtained a new concession of desirable land in northern Chihuahua, on which there is room for settlers. It is called Colonia Leal. Anyone who wishes to go there can obtain information respecting the place by writing to Henry Eyring, at Colonia Juarez, Chihuahua, or if persons wish to go to the warmer district of Sonora, they can write to George C. Williams, at Colonia Oaxaca, Baisape, Sonora. These brethren will give authentic information to those who may wish to make their home among us in Mexico. There is one precaution which should be observed by every intending emigrant to Mexico, as its neglect causes a great deal of delay and expense, and sometimes severe hardship. Those who go to Mexico should send, at least a month in advance of them, a full list of all they intend to bring with them, with the names, ages and birthplaces of all persons in the company, their intended destination, and many other items of which they may be advised by the brethren whose names I have mentioned. These lists have to go to the City of Mexico and be returned to the custom house before the parties can pass in with their goods. Sometimes people have been detained for a month through not attending to this formality, and in some cases have had to turn back."

So far as settling in Mexico is concerned, those who feel that it is a desirable place for a home, and who are willing to do their share by remaining in the country and aiding to build it up, doubtless will get along as well as people usually do in a new and sparsely settled region. There are a great many hardships and difficulties to be encountered there that are not now to be met with in this region, and that can be coped with only through great endurance and very hard work. Those who go there anticipating any other condition will be disappointed.

People in Utah and surrounding states and territories should not be misled by the glowing accounts and descriptions that are sent out to induce immigration to Mexico. They are inspired chiefly by a mercenary motive on the part of present or prospective owners of land grants, who want to dispose of the land for a cash consideration or to obtain sufficient colonists to make their own title to the grants secure. The various tracts of country described may or may not possess the advantages claimed. But when it comes to asserting or intimating that any of these private grants receives the approval in whole or in part of the Church authorities as a place of location or settlement for the Saints, the assertion or intimation is entirely without foundation in fact.

The NEWS does not wish to be understood as endeavoring to dissuade from going to Mexico any who wish to go. It does desire, however, to be understood as not being in the business of advising anyone to emigrate to that country. There may be people who would like to take up their residence there and would be welcomed as valuable acquisitions to the new settlements. There are others whose restlessness causes them to shift from one place to another, and who, because of this wandering, seldom are welcome anywhere. But for the vast majority of the Latter-day Saints who reside in these valleys there are better opportunities where they are, with the same amount of labor and energy, than can be found in any distant clime. Any encouragement of an inclination to "pull up stakes" in this part of the country is inadvisable.

THE DISPENSARY LAW.

The South Carolina trouble, which at one time threatened to assume the proportions of a civil war in that state, has been settled—temporarily at least—by the decision of the supreme court of the state, which declares the famous dispensary law unconstitutional. This law provides for the selling of every kind of intoxicants by the state, and makes it an offense for any private citizen to keep liquor in his house. When the governor undertook to enforce the latter clause of the law, it was found necessary to enter private dwellings and search the premises, a proceeding which aroused the indignation of the people. The "spies," as the officers were called, were met with resistance and a conflict ensued at Darlington, in which two citizens and two officers were killed, while many were seriously wounded. The governor ordered out the militia, but several companies refused to obey the call and disbanded. Others were called in and the row in the state promised to become general. However, the question was referred to the judiciary with the result mentioned, and as a consequence many private liquor houses have already emerged from their secrecy and openly extended their invitation to the public to partake of their hospitality in spite of the dispensary law. The ground on which the decision was reached is that the law creates a state monopoly. The governor declares that the case is not yet finished; he will find other means to protect the state.

It will be readily seen that the fight in South Carolina is not one between prohibitionists and their opponents, since the law passed in that state was not framed to suppress the saloon evil, but to transfer it from private persons to dispensaries owned and controlled by the state. The law was evidently aimed to be somewhat in imitation of the renowned Gothenburg system. So far no serious objection might have been raised against it. But when, in order to make it effective, it was found necessary to submit the homes in the state to the search of government officials, the resistance of the people cannot be much wondered at or blamed. The right of the citizen to be secure in his home against unreasonable searches and seizures is guaranteed by the Constitution, and even Governor Tillman ought to admit that this privilege is of too great a value to be surrendered for the sake of finding a possible offender against a state law regulating the sale of liquor. People will fight for the sanctity of their home precincts, and resist their invasion, even if they favor ever so much the abolishment of the liquor traffic.

THE MEAT INSPECTION LAW.

Considerable feeling has been engendered over the proposed methods of carrying out the provisions of the meat inspection law passed by the late Legislature. It is to be hoped, however, that the City Council will remove any cause for uneasiness by taking a judicious course and acting in the premises free from the influence of any combine in one way or the other. Whatever individual expressions of opinion two or three members may have made on the subject, as yet there is no reason to believe that the City Council will adopt any other policy than that which is for the good of the whole people and aims at the protection of all in their legitimate interests.

The meat inspection law has a catchy title—"to prevent the exposure for sale of unwholesome or diseased meats"—but an examination of the law as it now stands shows it to be little if any less objectionable than the diseased flesh it is ostensibly directed against. In the first place it is aimed at only Salt Lake City and Ogden; though if its provisions were commendable Provo, Logan and other cities would be alike entitled to the benefits thereof. This fact alone gives reasonable basis for the assertion, made by some who have criticized the law, that it was worked through the Legislature in the interests of a monopoly, and that the unsophisticated lawmakers had not sufficient discernment to detect the scheme, which was operated so quietly that the proposed enactment did not receive the public and careful scrutiny which it should have had.

Excluding the smaller cities from the effects of the statute, however, is by no means a disadvantage to them so far as the plan of meat inspection is concerned; in fact it is about the most commendable feature of the law. But associated with this is a provision which is an outrage upon the people of Utah and especially on the residents of Ogden and Salt Lake City. Under this law not a pound of beef, mutton or pork that is not slaughtered in or adjacent to the two cities named can be sold therein. Provo butchers may kill their hogs, and the grade of flesh may be the highest and best that the animal can produce; Logan may slaughter her cattle, and they may be the prime of the choice Cache Valley beef; Salt Lake and Weber counties, outside of the favored zone of the inspection yards, may prepare the best quality of mutton for market; but not a pound of any of this can be used in Salt Lake City or Ogden, unless the point from which it comes shall voluntarily choose "to adopt the sanitary provisions of this act;" and if anybody can tell from the act itself how that can be done, he is smarter than most of those who have read the document. A resident of either of the two cities cannot buy a leg of mutton, a roast of pork, or a quarter of beef from his farmer friend without laying the latter and himself also liable to a penalty of two hundred dollars fine. At the same time imported hogs, which often have been brought to this city in such an unwholesome and diseased condition that they had to be hurried to the crematory because of the pollution with which they filled the air, can be dumped into the chief cities of this Territory without let or hindrance so far as this law is concerned. All they need is the tag of the loose Chicago inspection such as the filthy cargoes above named had, and they are free to this market, while the home meat butcher and slaughterer outside of the "inspection districts" for this city and Ogden finds the Chinese wall of the law an effectual barrier against them. Meat slaughtered outside of the city cannot be brought in here, inspected and sold.

The inspection provision of the law makes no improvement in the condition inside of the city. It evidently was directed at crushing out all slaughterhouses not contiguous to the place where the inspection should be had. It provides that all animals intended for consumption in this city shall be inspected at the inspection yards the "day before being slaughtered;" they also must be inspected after being slaughtered. This provision would shut out all slaughtering except at the inspection yards or close in the neighborhood, as slaughterers could not ship their animals 10 to 14 miles down, and back the same distance the day before killing, and then treat the meat similarly afterward, in order to get it before the inspector. This provision is so injurious to general business that it is questionable whether the courts would hold it to be a rightful subject of legislation in such form as it is.

One of the duties imposed upon the inspector is to determine the ownership as well as the health of animals. He is a sort of peremptory court, without other legal knowledge than comes in the education of a competent veterinarian, to decide at once whether or not the person bringing live stock is the owner thereof. In addition to these extra-judicial powers he is required by the law to take any animal which he believes is in the unlawful possession of any person, and to sell the animal at the market price. No matter if the real owner be there and demands his stock, the inspector has got to sell it at given figures. After the sale, he shall make diligent search for the owner, and the proceeds, less the cost of sale, etc., go to him, while the animals go out of his possession unless he has purchased that which was his own and that at the market price, and he also is mulcted the cost of a sale that never was necessary.

There are other objections that might be urged against the law, but these are sufficient to show that it is an extremely bad measure, and the sooner it is wiped from the statute books and a properly drawn inspection law placed thereon, the better it will be for the people. It is urged in behalf of the law that it was approved by those who have "the city's good at heart," and is in line with "modern methods." "The city's good" and the methods which Salt Lake, Ogden and the whole Territory need are more in line with honesty and fairness than anything which is revealed by the features of this inspection statute.

It was the evident purpose of the framers of the law that there should be but one place of inspection at one time for either this city or Ogden, for the examination of all animals to be locally slaughtered for consumption. If the instigators of this monopolistic idea are applicants for the favored location they should be given, in the interests of the public, a cold shoulder. If they are not, then no reflections should be cast upon the applicants. The City Council, however, can arrange this matter of inspection so that the municipality cannot be chargeable with aggravating the faults of the statute. No extra expense would be required therefor. An inspection point for two days in the week could be made at one location, and for four days at another, or such other division of time made as would be equitable. The inspector could go as well to one place as another. This would lighten matters in one respect, and would be within the city's power. But the inconsistent, outrageous and, we believe, unconstitutional provisions of the new inspection law would remain just the same, and will do so until some Legislature, wiser than the last in this respect, wipes the objectionable measure from the statute book.

ONE OF THE SIGNS.

A young man of humble appearance and a decidedly foreign accent is at present visiting the southern suburbs of this city. On being admitted to a house he informs the residents that he is a special messenger of the Almighty, sent to inform the people in this valley that Christ has now appeared and commissioned him and others to warn them of impending calamities and to direct them to repent, be baptized and study the word of God. He positively refuses to answer any questions as to when, where and how the alleged Divine appearance has occurred, stating that it is not consistent with his commission to answer any questions whatever; his time is so limited that he must barely state his message and then proceed to the next house. He seems to understand his duty to be that of a watchman sounding the alarm in every direction and then hurrying off, leaving his hearers in the dark both as to the nature of the threatening calamities and the way to escape them.

It is supposed that the young man in question is connected with the religious craze in a settlement still further south, where an eccentric person for some time has claimed to be the Lord and succeeded in gaining a few followers. Little is known about the delusions of these individuals, but the information is gathered from a reliable source that one feature of their creed is the denial of the resurrection. Even the Biblical account of the resurrection of our Savior is regarded as a falsification, added to sacred writ by later transcribers. But while denying this, they firmly believe in re-incarnation, and on the strength of this view, one of them claims to have had existence on the earth, first as Reuben, the eldest son of Jacob, and then as Andrew, one of the twelve Apostles of our Lord. Another is said to inform people that he first appeared as the fourth son of Cain; then as Benjamin, the youngest of Jacob's twelve celebrated heirs; then as King Meneleah and finally as a plain tiller of the ground in Cottonwood.

What gives to this local delusion, and others like it, their only claim to serious notice is the fact that the atmosphere all over the world is being filled with rumors of the appearance of our Lord. Schweinfurth is a name familiar to all newspaper readers, and he is only one among many who lately have claimed divine attributes. Browne, Coxe's right hand man, explains the industrial army movement on the principle of the re-incarnation of Christ in the leaders of the marching hordes, and his allegations were, only a few days ago, repeated by a hermit who suddenly appeared in one of the eastern cities claiming to have a direct command from Christ to lead a band to Washington. The dispatch conveying the incident stated that the queer looking person had gained a wonderful influence over the unemployed laborers. There seems to be an epidemic of rumors of Divine appearances, and the situation is sufficiently peculiar to suggest very serious reflections in the minds of the thoughtful.

It is well known that our Lord in His memorable discourse on the signs preceding the fall of the Jewish state, the destruction of the temple and "the end of the world," among other things predicts that "many shall come in My name, saying, I am Christ." This happened in a remarkable manner as the calamities thickened around the Jewish country and capital. Theudas, Judas of Galilee and later Bar-Cochba, and a host of others arose in various parts of the world among the Jews, claiming to be their Messiah; and Bishop Newton points out that never were such claimants more numerous than at the time when the destruction was nearest at hand. With the prediction of Christ still before us, that the signs should be repeated at "the end of the world," and the fact that never before, since the time of the close of the Jewish dispensation, have so many persons claimed to be the second Person in the Godhead, it may well be assumed, even if one reasons from analogy only, that we are approaching a change of equal importance to the world at large as that of the destruction of Jerusalem was to the Jews. The thought forces itself upon the mind of the believer; for "All these things are the beginning of sorrows."

The warning to all men is, not to believe or be misled by persons who come crying "lo, here," and "lo, there." The appearance of Christ is not in the manner taught by these pretenders. "For as the lightning cometh out of the east and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." There is no need of looking for Him in the desert, nor in the obscure chambers. When He comes it will be in glory. But the very appearance of the many false spirits is an indication that preparations are being made for the real advent of the King of kings and Lord of lords.

JEWISH SETTLEMENTS.

The Jewish colonization scheme in the Argentine republic under the auspices of Baron Hirsch is attracting attention on account of the great success it has met with, and the socialistic principles to which this success partly is due.

The enterprise was undertaken as a means of relief to the thousands of Jews who were crowded out of Russia by the edicts of the czar. A committee selected for the purpose recommended suitable families as settlers, and at present the colonists amount to 8,306, most of whom are from the southern parts of Russia. Practical men are superintending the work of the settlers, and they have already brought 17,250 acres under cultivation, with the prospects of an abundant harvest.

The sum invested by the Hirsch fund amounts to $2,200,000, and this capital is represented in the municipal government of the colonists. As soon as a colony is formed, a council is appointed consisting of three members, two of whom are elected by the settlers and one by the manager of the fund. This council meets every day and decides upon what work is to be done by each colonist. It regulates the distribution of the machinery and deals with matters of transport, building and the public health. It receives the produce and distributes it to each individual according to his contribution of labor. With these principles carried out in every detail, it is not surprising that great success should be achieved; and the eulogistic reports sent by colonists to their friends in other parts of the world will readily be believed.

The Jews gathering in Palestine and settling in the agricultural colonies in that country are meeting with great success, too. Nothing in the whole country is more striking to the traveler than the glaring contrast between the old villages of the natives and the new settlements of the Jews. The former are mere mud huts surrounded by filth and debris and neglected fields and apologies for orchards, while the latter stand as oases in the gloomy desert, inviting and smiling upon the stranger from beneath the luxurious shading leaves of a semi-tropical vegetation, made more inviting still by the application of industry and genius. What the Jews are capable of doing in the way of cultivating the soil, when properly guided and supported, is perhaps nowhere more apparent than in their settlements on the southern slope of Mount Carmel. It seems, then, that the result is equally satisfactory in the old world and the new.

To ascribe this notable success to a certain system of government alone as the true cause of it would be a fallacious conclusion. Nothing can account for it except the interference of Providence. To the Ruler of nations it is due that the people long scattered on the surface of the earth are beginning to assemble and achieve a success that will ultimately result in their being acknowledged as one of the leading nations of the world. Their gathering on this continent—the land of Joseph—and in the country of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, is no accident, but clearly a part of the great, divine plan for bringing that people to a fulfilment of their final destiny.

A WHOLESOME AND EXCELLENT PLAN.

Of talk and even of schemes of charity there has been no end during the past twelvemonth; from Sunday rabbit hunts all up the scale of expedients to the plan for national pawnshops the ingenuity of man has ranged, in the endeavor to effect real help for the needy and to tide over the dire emergency into which the whole world seems to have simultaneously come. Many of the plans resorted to have been worthy and effective; and the best of them have been such as started out with the idea of letting the recipients earn what they got, not insulting their proper self-respect by making them dependents on donations—helpless paupers living on sheer charity. Nathan Straus, the well known New York merchant, is one whose benevolence has taken a most practical turn; the recent closing of the place where he has been operating it makes present mention of it timely and interesting. He has been running a store on Grand street, New York, where coal, sugar, coffee and tea, bread and flour have been sold at cost to the poor all winter. Five-cent tickets were sold at the door and in the store exchanged for small packages of the commodities, and the same articles were sold in larger quantities at the same rates. On the last day of the store's operation, 27,440 of these five-cent tickets were sold and exchanged for goods, and over 400 loaves of stale bread were sold at one cent a loaf in four minutes after the store opened. Since December 30, when the store began business, there have been thus disposed of more than 6,000 tons of coal and 218 tons of sugar, with 338,000 pounds of bread, 235,000 pounds of flour, 78,000 pounds of tea and 52,000 pounds of coffee. The charitable part of this scheme lay in the fact that the dealer was willing to forego all profits; and it further involved charity of the highest order in that it helped those who were helping themselves, and made the scanty, hardtimes income of many a poor family go twice as far as it otherwise would in providing food and fuel. When the list of human benefactors comes to be made up, we venture to say the name of Nathan Straus will be found upon it in plain and conspicuous characters.

QUORUM-COUNTING NOT PATENTED.

A great deal of badinage back and forth has been indulged in over the acceptance by the Democratic majority in the national House of Representatives of a plan very like Speaker Reed's quorum-counting rule. The Republicans laugh at the discomfiture of their opponents, who, after trying in vain to muster a sufficient force to proceed with business, were at last compelled to adopt the plan for which, in the Congress before the last, such furious malediction was heaped upon the Shakespearean head of the Maine chieftain. The Democrats, on their part, make wry faces while trying to point out that the rule now adopted is radically different from the odious plan of the czar-like Speaker three or four years ago, in that the House itself, and not its presiding officer, does the counting. The difference in fact amounts only to that between tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum; the object in either case being to compel members actually present and determined not to vote, to be recorded as present for the purpose of making a quorum to transact business.

The new rule reads as follows:

Upon every roll call and before the beginning thereof, the Speaker shall name two members, one from each side of the pending question if practicable, who shall take their places at the clerk's desk, to tell the names of at least enough members who are in the House during the roll call, who do not respond, when added to those responding, to make a quorum. When a quorum does not respond upon a roll call, then the names of those so noted as present shall be reported to the Speaker, who shall cause the list to be filed at the clerk's desk and recorded in the journal; and in determining the presence of a quorum to do business, those who voted, those who answered as present, and those so reported as present shall be considered. Members noted when their names are called may record their votes notwithstanding the provisions of clause one of this rule.

Mr. Reed simply went ahead on his own responsibility and counted enough filibusterers to help the House out of the deadlock into which dilatory tactics had forced it; he assumed to determine, without the aid of the House or any of its members or employees, whether a quorum was present or not. The Democratic plan of meeting the same problem is by the aid of tellers, whose enumeration and eyes shall determine the necessity of counting silent members as present, and how many of them. But as the Speaker appoints the tellers, the whole power and responsibility appears to resolve itself back, as Mr. Reed without any red tape or formality resolved it, into the hands of the presiding officer himself. It is not to be supposed that under either rule members were or will be counted who really were not or are not present; so that whatever difference there is seems to be largely imaginary—there is a slight variation in the practice but not any in the principle.

If men elected to Congress to represent the various districts of this great nation, and to transact the nation's business, know no better way of fulfilling that important trust than deliberately to sit and block all proceedings, the country ought to feel to congratulate Mr. Reed on devising and employing his scheme to force some of them into sight and temporary usefulness, and ought to thank him that, as inventor, he did not patent it. The great majority of the people of these United States will agree that it is better to count a quorum, in this perfectly legal and proper way, than to permit any number of dumb and recalcitrant representatives to disgrace themselves, their constituents and their country by childish proceedings which are an insult to the dignified term of "parliamentary obstruction." If members would do their duty there would be no need of any such rule; for even if the opposition preferred not to be registered for or against any pending question, and hoped thus to leave the result to appear in the minutes as having been decided by less than a majority, there always is, as a matter of fact, a majority, whether present or not. The party which organizes the House and elects the Speaker is itself to blame if business can be stopped by the tactics of the minority. Especially in a Congress like the present one is the majority placed in a humiliating light. With over sixty votes to spare in the full House the Democrats have not only not been able to rally enough to overrule the tricks of a compact opposition, but they have been forced to resort to a plan which a short time ago they branded as tyranny and bossism of the grossest sort. Mr. Reed's famous Congress couldn't spare quite so many Republicans without being left in the minority, but it easily contained enough to have made quorum-counting unnecessary. As it is, neither party has anything to boast of over the other; honors seem to be fairly easy.

CENT PER CENT.

An astonishing illustration of the growth of capital when assisted by even a very low accretion of interest has been called forth by a recent statement by Master Workman Sovereign of the Knights of Labor. It was made in the course of an after dinner speech; and while for that reason its absolute accuracy might be doubted, it will serve nevertheless to point the multiplication lesson which it seems to invite. Mr. Sovereign proceeds to draw a comparison between the wealth of the Vanderbilt family and the presumptive savings of Adam, if our common ancestor had survived to the present day; and he said that even if Adam had been so fortunate as to earn $50 a day since the creation, and had been remarkably prudent in saving, the venerable patriarch would still have to labor 5,000 years to attain the wealth of the Vanderbilts.

The statement was so impressive that calculators at once set to work to verify or disprove the gentleman's conclusions. Whether or not his figuring was found to be correct we do not know; those mathematically inclined may test it for themselves. But the important and interesting part of the problem is that Mr. Sovereign forgot all about the interest on Adam's savings and didn't figure it in. It happens to make all the difference in the world as to the grand total or product. We take the amended problem as worked out by the Boston Herald, again leaving it to those who would rather prove than question the solution, to verify its figures. If Adam had earned but $1 a day, instead of $50 a day allowed in the computation, and had saved only 1 cent a day, and invested his first year's savings, say $36, so as to bring in the very moderate return of 8 per cent per annum, that little sum of $36 compounded at 8 per cent would have made our worthy ancestor so enormously rich that all the wealth of all the Vanderbilts and Astors and Goulds—nay, of the whole body of American millionaires—would not amount to one-thousandth of his possessions. Why, at the end of the first 1,000 years Adam would have had the really incalculable sum of $24,419,979,611,149, and at the present the mere figures to represent his accumulation would exceed our power of realization. Of course the whole problem is an irrelevant and perhaps absurd one; but it illustrates, better than a large sermon could, the progression of small saving at continued interest.

AMERICA AND SAMOA.

Now that the cession of Pago Pago harbor to the United States is finally accomplished, the most ardent advocates of this government's taking a hand in the control of islands in the Pacific Ocean probably will conclude that the territorial limit of extension is about reached, and that efforts hereafter should be directed to the field circumscribed by the boundaries thus laid out. Pago Pago, which almost cuts in two the island of Tutuila, in the Samoan group, is regarded as one of the finest harbors in the world. It has plenty of deep water, without dredging, to float the combined navies of the world, and, being well sheltered, it affords protection from the hurricanes which sweep over that part of the globe. Had the fleets which were at Samoa been in Pago Pago instead of Apia harbor, the disaster which has made the latter place famous would not have occurred. In its location, it is as far again from the United States as is Honolulu, being two-thirds the distance to Australia. It is in line north and south with the most westerly limit of the mainland of Alaska, and east and west it lies between southern Peru and northern Australia.

The negotiations for ceding the harbor to this country were completed by W. L. Chambers, U. S. land commissioner to Samoa, who has just returned home. The land question had become so important that Germany, England and this country had to unite in a commission to settle it in order to prevent continual turmoil, as a result of disputed claims, between citizens of the three governments which might involve the nations interested in serious disputes. The aggregate of these claims which the commission had to settle was 8938. These were for over 2,000,000 acres of land on the Samoan group, the entire area of which consists of but 9,000,000 acres. The English had the greater portion of the claims, the Germans coming next and the Americans last. The first named had more claims than both of the others combined; in fact, every foot of land was sought to be gobbled from the natives, and numerous claims were made for the same tract. The commission, however, cut right and left into these, giving the natives preference and then adjusting the title of the others. In this way over 700,000 acres were awarded to the natives, the rest going to the foreign element, the Americans securing the largest amount in proportion to their claims.

While the settlement of these land disputes will go a long way toward preventing the troubles which afflict Samoa and cause outbreaks against the ruling powers, yet the islands cannot expect anything like permanent peace until the system of government is changed. As it is now, the islands are virtually ruled by Germany, England and the United States, through their consuls, who run affairs pretty much as they like. The government is settled on one island, Upolu, and the others get little benefit and know nothing of what is going on in the way of improvements. About the only knowledge they have of the government is the visit of the tax collector, who takes $1 per year for each man, woman and child. This is galling to the natives, who do not comprehend the justice of the system, which yields them no benefit that they can see, for the money, it is said, goes mostly to pay high salaries to a foreign minister and chief justice, and other officials. By the recent adjustment of claims and the cession of Pago Pago, the American influence has been largely increased, and as the Germans have predominated heretofore, any prospect of a change, either to American or English supremacy, is favorably looked upon by the people. Naturally the trend of affairs is in favor of the United States, and it is not improbable that the Samoan group will yet mark the southwestern limit of American domination in the Pacific. Pago Pago is now the most distant point held by this government.

KEEP THE BALL ROLLING.

Utah as the pioneer of industry in the West has set the ball rolling in the line of representative displays of home manufactures, and her example is about to be followed by surrounding states. Colorado has arranged already for an industrial fair such as has been open in this city during this month. It is to be conducted under the auspices of the manufacturer's exchange of Denver, on the same general plan as the Fair here. A similar movement has been commenced in Idaho, and Wyoming business men also are talking of a home industry exhibit.

Although the Fair in this city closes on Saturday evening next, Utah is by no means through with the business of displaying home products, and urging them upon the attention of the merchant and consumer. The era of advertising local industries has just begun. If the manufacturers comprehend the great lesson of the Fair to them, it is that they should keep their names and products prominently before the public, that the latter through the importunities of agents and drummers, local or foreign, may not lapse into a state of forgetfulness regarding home made articles. In this connection it will be an excellent thing if the scheme to establish a permanent exhibit of the various manufactures can be carried out. A proposition looking to this is now before the bureau of manufactures, and it can be made to work if the manufacturers themselves will take the interest that is due to their own business. Of necessity such an exposition of Utah products would be materially different from that now on, but if producers will lend their aid to a reasonable extent there is no doubt the committee can devise a plan to keep the object lesson of Utah industries before residents and strangers in this city.

Ogden is now following in the line of the Fair movement here, but is branching out in a way to entitle her to the claim of pioneer in a particular direction. This movement is being conducted by the young ladies of that thriving city, and consequently is an assured success. The exhibition will take place in the latter part of the summer, and will be a display of household articles. Instead of home made cloths being shown in the piece, they will be exhibited made up into clothing; and this rule is to be followed as far as practicable in all the lines of industry. Of course the leading feature will be to show woman's handiwork in the matter of home production. The manufacturers of the Territory will be asked to give what assistance will be consistent in this movement. Then by the time the Ogden Fair is through with, the great Territorial Fair will be at hand, and of necessity must present a grander exhibition of home products in every line than ever has been seen here before. Keep the ball rolling for home workers!

BETTER OFF IN UTAH.

There are some parts of the Great West where even those engaged in farming are subjected to very severe hardships, as is shown in the case of the settlers at Harriburg, Arapahoe county, Colorado. The settlement is near the eastern Colorado line, in what is known as the rain belt, where the crops have to depend on the rain for irrigation, as there is no opportunity at present to secure water from other sources for that purpose. The settlers there are mostly Germans and Scandinavians, and are an industrious, persevering lot of people. Their crops have failed for two years past, but they hope for better success this season. Should they fail, they will have to be supplied with the necessities of life, and perhaps have to move elsewhere—a proceeding they are loth to adopt, as they have made many substantial improvements and like the locality in fruitful seasons.

That section of the state is regarded as excellent for grazing purposes, but these people have been endeavoring to convert it into farms and gardens. They were progressing favorably for a time, until the dry seasons came, two years ago, and since then they have had to endure many privations. This spring the reports of their destitution led the Arapahoe county commissioners to send a committee to investigate. Two of these gentlemen, Commissioners Wheeler and Nicholl, completed their labors on Saturday, and have made their report. They say they traveled over sixty miles of the section where these people live, and "never want to see such distress and destitution again. People were living in sod houses, burning buffalo chips for fuel, almost nothing to eat, roasted wheat for coffee, bare-footed and almost naked. We gave out orders for provisions and shoes, and promised them some grain for seed, to be sent at once. If there is another failure of crops this year, steps will have to be taken to move the people to a better locality. Some of them have a little stock, but everything they own in the shape of property is plastered with mortgages, and it is little they have to look forward to, even should they get one or two fair crops."

There is nothing like that to be found in all Utah, where the farming part of the community are much better situated. The account given of the Colorado settlers is strongly reminiscent—except as to the plaster of mortgages—of the hardships and sufferings here in the early days, but those times have gone by with the settling up of the country, and in the remotest settlements of the Territory there is no fear of such destitution under existing general conditions as has overtaken the Harriburg settlers.

EDUCATION FOR A LIVING.

The closing session of the religious congress held in San Francisco during the past week in connection with the Midwinter Fair was devoted to addresses on social topics. One of the speakers was Mr. Walter Lindley, superintendent of the Whittier school, and his theme was the state's duty to its unfortunate children. In presenting the subject he took occasion to point out the apparent inadequacy of all efforts to stem the tide of crime and pauperism sweeping over the land with ever-increasing force. "Educators," he said, "tell us of a new education, and of the laboratory plan of teaching history and the natural sciences, but crime stalks onward with giant strides. New religions are launched upon us; the Salvation Army invades the slums, but crimes and criminals still increase in far greater ratio than the increase of population. Temperance movements, moral revolutions and nineteenth-century Savonarolas all seem impotent to stay in the least the mighty tide of crime that is sweeping forward with unrelenting certainty over this great Republic. Whether we look toward the poor Indian who falls dead while playing poker in Los Angeles jail, or toward the Yale or Princeton student, who is seen in bacchanalian orgies that equal those of the noble debauchers of ancient Rome, in whatever direction we look, the hideous form of crime is seen making its slimy way."

Even an optimistic philosopher can hardly deny the statements presented on this subject. As to the young generation of this country, it is undeniable that vast numbers, notwithstanding a good education, so-called, are unable to find profitable employment, simply because their early training did not include physical labor. The schools have advanced but not altogether so as to cover the growing practical need of the nation. Primarily, the object of the institutes of learning was to place the various sciences within the reach of the few whose circumstances permitted them to pursue a scientific life. Then the attainments of a high school were certain to place their happy possessor in a position to make a good living. His book learning was worth all he had invested in it of time and capital. But as the facilities for education were placed within the reach of everybody, the competition increased, until mere book learning, whatever its intrinsic intellectual value may be, lost its power to sustain, physically, its devotees. When in a community but a few persons are masters of the arts of reading and writing, for instance, they may be able to turn this achievement to pecuniary advantage, as is still done in countries where a man who can use his pen is considered a very learned individual; but when education becomes so general that everybody can read and write, these acquirements alone can clearly not give profitable employment to all. And the same is true of other educational branches. To place them within the easy reach of all is virtually to lower their money value. It is the law of demand and supply again. The more abundant the latter is, the less it is worth in cash.

The only remedy seems to be to embrace in the education of the young such things as are sure to enable the scholar to make an honest living after he has graduated. It is no harm for a young man to know the distinction between the subjective and objective genitive or the correct interpretation of the Greek definite article, but if to this knowledge is added the ability to make a good pair of shoes or to cut a suit of clothes, the student after leaving school would in most cases be vastly better off. The need of the age is industrial schools, and in this direction education must progress to meet what is an imminent requirement.

But even when this goal has been reached, as in time it surely will be, it is questionable whether pauperism and crime will be effectively combated. These depend on conditions so deeply rooted in human nature that mere education, be it ever so perfect, is inadequate to reach it. Religion alone points to the supreme remedy for all such evils. It urges individual "regeneration," and sound philosophy will sustain this method as the only one ultimately effective.

VENTILATION.

Following is the full text of a lecture on the above important and much abused subject, delivered by Dr. James E. Talmage in his course of lectures on general chemistry at the Church University. The lecture was given on the evening of Monday, April 28, before the large evening class, composed of the University laboratory workers, and the special students. The greatest attention was paid throughout the address, and it is to be hoped that the excellent instruction so imparted will be put to good service in an earnest attempt to correct some of the many flagrant violations of the laws of health, now so common amongst us through the wilful and almost criminal disregard of our need for pure air. Dr. Talmage said—

In ordinary usage the term "Ventilation" is applied to any process designed to remove impure air from enclosed spaces, and to provide for the introduction of pure air in its place. In considering this subject we have to inquire: (1) What is pure air, and wherein lies its indispensable service in the body? (2) By what means and at what rate is the atmosphere generally contaminated? (3) How may the purity of the air of dwellings be maintained?

1. PURE AIR is air in its normal condition; this we say in general terms consists of about four-fifths nitrogen, a little less than one-fifth oxygen, with very small amounts of carbon dioxide and vapor of water. More accurately speaking, pure air consists of the following, the proportions being by volume:

Nitrogen.....	79.00	per cent
Oxygen.....	20.96	"
Carbon dioxide.....	.04	"
Water vapor.....	variable	amounts.

The presence of each of these ingredients has been demonstrated by conclusive experiments in this class. Oxygen, you will remember, is the universal and vigorous supporter of combustion. To its presence is due the possibility of burning ordinary fuel. Nitrogen is the diluent gas, efficient in restraining the ardor of the fiery oxygen. It may be separated from the oxygen by burning out the latter through the agency of phosphorus in a bell jar. Carbon dioxide alone will not support combustion. Its inhalation in quantity is fatal to life, not because of any specifically poisonous properties in the gas itself, for in its effects it is generally inert, but because of its taking the place of the invigorating oxygen in the lungs. Carbon dioxide is a colorless gas; its presence in the atmosphere may be proved, as has been shown here in experiments, by aspirating a quantity of air through clear lime water; the carbon dioxide enters into combination with the lime which is in solution, forming calcium carbonate, and this substance, being insoluble in the water, appears as a solid precipitate giving a faint milkiness or a deeper turbidity to the water. That water is present in the atmosphere is here proved by placing a freezing mixture of ice and salt in a beaker of thin glass, the outside of the vessel being clean and dry; in a short time a dew appears on the glass. This increases in quantity and by the intense cold is congealed, so that now we have a thick layer of hoar frost on the glass; and the moisture so deposited and frozen could have been derived from the atmosphere only, in direct contact with the glass. Such is the composition of the atmosphere, in its undisturbed condition—the state in which the Creator designed it to be breathed by His earthly children. Although these atmospheric ingredients are of widely varying specific gravities, there is no separation into layers; on the contrary, the atmospheric gases evince a decided tendency to mingle uniformly; so that air taken from the earth's surface—if there be no local cause of contamination—or from different elevations, over land or above water, the same relative proportion is discovered. Through that strange property of fluids, known as diffusion, both liquids and gases tend to mix; this may be shown by the following simple experiment: You see here two wide mouth glass jars, each capable of holding about a quart; one of them we will fill with dry hydrogen, a gas which is fully  $14\frac{1}{2}$  times lighter than air; now let us invert the bottle containing hydrogen over the one containing air, the vessels being placed, as you see, mouth to mouth. It would seem that hydrogen, the lightest and most buoyant substance known to chemists, would tend to rise toward the bottom of the inverted jar; and the air,  $14\frac{1}{2}$  times heavier than the upper gas, would tend to remain at the bottom. On the contrary, as a light is applied to the mouth of each of the bottles, an explosion occurs, indicating that in each there was a mixture of hydrogen and air, for neither hydrogen nor air is alone explosive, but when together they form a highly explosive mixture. It is clear then that the very light gas, hydrogen, has sunk, and the comparatively heavy substance, air, has risen, to produce a uniform mixture in the two bottles. By similar diffusion, the atmospheric ingredients mingle together to our great advantage.

Air is absolutely indispensable to the respiratory processes of living beings; let us take the human subject as an example. We are conscious of a continuous bellows action of the lungs and certain adjacent organs as long as life lasts; this we call the breathing act; and this when analyzed is seen to consist of alternate inhalations and exhalations, with a short interval between. During the inhalation a certain quantity of air is drawn into the lungs, and in the succeeding expulsive action a corresponding quantity of gaseous matter is thrown from the lungs; but a careful chemical investigation would show a great difference in composition between the air taken in and that exhaled. Let us examine this process more in detail. Here is an excellent model of the human lungs, with the heart nestling between, life size, and true in color. This large pipe, composed of rings of cartilage with connective tissue between, leads from the mouth cavity to the lungs; it is the trachea or wind pipe. As it enters the lungs it divides into two main branches, each called a bronchus; these divide into bronchial tubes, and these again are subdivided until the divisions become so fine that the unaided eye fails to trace them. The microscope, however, reveals the fact that the ultimate branches of these tubes terminate in tiny bladder-like enlargements called air vesicles, which are clustered about the tubes like bunches of grapes. As air is taken into the lungs, entering through mouth and nostrils, thence through the trachea and its many divisions, the air vesicles become inflated. Tiny blood vessels, called from their minuteness capillaries (meaning hair-like) convey the blood to the exterior walls of these vesicles, and while passing round them, the life fluid is separated from the air only by the extremely thin walls of the vesicles and blood vessels themselves. It has already been seen that fluids tend to diffuse if brought together; but there is another tendency, even more wonderful than diffusion, by which fluids are caused to pass through separating walls, if these partitions be at all permeable; this is the phenomenon of osmosis, and through it, the gases collected by the blood in its passage through the body, pass from the veins into the vesicle chambers, to be subsequently expelled from the lungs, while the life-sustaining oxygen diffuses from the vesicle cavity into the blood vessels, and so purifies or aerates the blood. If a person's respiration be checked, as by choking, or by immersing his head in an inert gas or liquid, no oxygen can enter the lungs to aerate the blood, and if not relieved, the person dies of suffocation; or as physicians say, of asphyxia, he has in fact been poisoned by the foul products of his own vital energies. Pure air, then, is indispensable to health, in fact it is essential to life.

2. AIR CONTAMINATION is constantly in progress, and were it not for a counteracting process of purification, the entire atmosphere would soon become foul. In closed spaces, such as the rooms of dwelling houses, however, there is no chance for purification of the air once befouled, and the only possible course is to expel the mephitic atmosphere and replace it by pure air from without. Carbon dioxide in abnormal quantity is one of the most constant ingredients of contaminated air; and this is in accordance with what would be very generally supposed from the known facts that carbon dioxide is a constant product of animal and vegetable decay, of animal and human respiration, of ordinary combustion, and of fermentation. Remembering the easy test afforded by lime water becoming turbid in the presence of carbon dioxide, we can readily test for this gas. Take a goblet containing some clear lime water; as one breathes through this tube into the liquid you see the milkiness becoming apparent. You will remember in a recent lecture on combustion the gaseous products resulting from the burning of a candle were drawn through lime water with a similar result. If the gases rising from fermenting wort, or from decaying plants be passed into lime water, the presence of the gas will be proved conclusively. The amount of carbon dioxide in air has been regarded as a proper index of purity; though it must not be forgotten that other contaminating substances are formed in many of the processes already referred to. As already seen, the quantity of carbon dioxide ordinarily present in pure air is .04 per cent, or 0.4 parts in a thousand. Experiment has shown that an adult person in a restful condition will exhale about .6 cubic foot of this gas per hour. From these facts we may form a good conclusion regarding the rate of contamination from human respiration alone. If a person be shut up in a tight room of 8000 cubic feet capacity, he would exhale during an hour .6 cubic foot of carbon dioxide which, added to the amount normally present, would make the quantity 1.8 cubic feet in the 8000 cu. ft. of air, or .6 cu. ft. per thousand; and this amount—.6 cubic foot per thousand—is regarded by good authorities as the maximum amount to be tolerated in the air of dwellings. It is plain, then, that in order to keep the enclosed space within the permissible limits during a second hour, the place of the 8000 cu. ft. of impure air must be filled by like quantity of fresh air from without. This amount, 3000 cu. ft. per hour per person, is regarded as a proper requirement in ventilation. Excessive as this may seem, there are some reliable authorities who place the amount higher; thus Dr. Billings says an adult needs one cubic foot of pure air per second, or 3600 cu. ft. per hour. These references are to adult persons in a condition of but moderate activity; children exhale less carbon dioxide; grown persons in vigorous exercise would exhale more than the average amount.

I take some illustrations that have been cited in this class before. At the rate mentioned the air of a bedroom 12x14x11 feet, containing 1848 cu. ft. of space, would be contaminated by the exhalations of one person in less than 37 minutes. A room suitable for school purposes, say 28x35 feet, and 14 ft. high, containing 13,720 cu. ft. of air, if occupied by 60 children, allowing to each only 2000 cu. ft. of air per hour, would be vitiated in less than seven minutes. According to measurements made by Architect Don C. Young, the large Tabernacle building of this city has a capacity of 1,825,588 cubic feet. Suppose that building to be occupied by 8,000 adults—and such an attendance is far from unusual there—allowing to each person 50 cubic feet of air per minute (that is, on the accepted basis of 3,000 cubic feet per hour) the air would become foul in less than five minutes; and if an adequate amount of fresh air be not supplied, after that lapse of time the people will be re-breathing the foul emanations of one another's lungs.

Besides respiration, ordinary processes of combustion are to be considered as sources of atmospheric contamination, and the rate of such contamination has been ascertained with reasonable exactness. Dr. Tracy, sanitary inspector of the New York City health department, has given us the following data:

Petroleum, slit burner, 10-candle power light, produces 1.98 cu. ft. of carbon dioxide per hour.

Petroleum, round burner, 7.6-candle power, 1.98 cu. ft. per hour.

Candle, single candle power, .89 cu. ft. per hour.

Coal gas, slit burner, 7.8-candle power, 3.25 cu. ft. per hour.

Coal gas, flat burner, 10-candle power, 3 cu. ft. per hour.

Dr. Youmans has approached the subject from another side, having determined the amount of oxygen withdrawn from the air by definite quantities of combustibles. He finds that a pound of mineral coal requires the oxygen of 120 cu. ft. of air to burn it; and this means, at the rate of 5 pounds of coal per hour, the vitiation of 600 cubic feet of air per hour. A candle (of size six to the pound) will consume about  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the oxygen from 10 cubic feet of air per hour, and an oil lamp with large burner will similarly change 70 cu. ft. per hour. A gas burner consuming 4 cubic feet of gas per hour will render unfit for respiration 400 cubic feet of air in that time.

In these comparisons and illustrations reference has been made to the increase of carbon dioxide in the air, this being taken as an index to the state of purity; but beside this gaseous emanation, other substances, particularly water and organic matter, are thrown into the air from the lungs and skin of human beings. All are familiar with proof of moisture in the breath afforded by breathing on a mirror, or by the visible condensation of the breath in cold weather. That similar emanations come from the skin may be proved by enclosing the hand in a dry glass jar; then sealing the mouth of the vessel by wrapping a cloth around the wrist; in a short time moisture will be seen on the inner surface; this may increase in quantity till it collects in drops and runs down the bottle walls. If a vessel containing moisture from the skin, or from the lungs, be tightly corked, then set in a warm place, a foetid odor will be soon manifest when the bottle is opened; this is due to the decomposition of the organic matter thrown off from the body; and these putrescible substances constitute in reality the greatest source of danger from foul air. The microscope may aid us in determining the nature of these organic particles. To collect such for examination, cause a large quantity of air to pass through convoluted tubes, kept cold by immersion in a freezing mixture; by these means the moisture of the breath is condensed and carries the solid particles into the liquid. Another way is to cause the air to pass through a drop of glycerin, in which the solid particles will become entangled. If the microscope be turned upon a drop of the condensed liquid or the glycerin, a surprising lot of solid debris will be seen, mostly epithelial cells, and other fragments of tissue. It is among these particles that the germs of certain specific diseases are frequently communicated. A simple means of demonstrating the presence of organic matter in exhaled air consists in causing the breath to pass through a tube into strong sulphuric acid, the acid chars or blackens any carbonaceous particles and by the decoloration proves their presence.

In connection with our present topic of air contamination the question of the effect of impure air upon the body is pertinent. We have an array of the best authorities to support the view that the breathing of foul air is productive of a multitude of ills. In the first place many specific diseases are caused by these means. Scrofulous disorders are common among those who dwell in foul air. Consumption is a frequent result of breathing contaminated air, as are also certain forms of sore throat, particularly Tonsillitis. This latter, resulting also by the breathing of air contaminated from the back flow from sewer pipes, is commonly known as sewer-air throat. Concerning its symptoms, Dr. Parkes, of London, has said:

"It is marked by great inflammatory swelling of the tonsils, very foul tongue, gastric derangement, accompanied by severe headache and intense depression. The temperature of the body is often not much raised, certainly not to a height proportionate to the severe symptoms; but this low temperature, together with the intense prostration, are characteristic of most illnesses resulting from the entrance of sewer-polluted air or water into the system."

But beside these specific disorders, the breathing of foul air tends to weaken all the bodily and mental powers. A body so subjected is robbed of a large part of its vitality, the capacity to resist the encroachments of disease is lowered, and the chances of an early surrender to the influences of destruction very much increased. Let me call your attention to some authenticated instances of ill effects from this cause:

The extreme cold of the winter of Iceland reduces the system of domestic ventilation in that country to very primitive principles. A traveler there was so choked one night by the close atmosphere of the air-tight little chamber in which he slept with all the male members of the family, as to be compelled to wake his host, who sprang out of bed at the call, pulled a cork from a knot-hole in the wall for a few minutes, and after replacing the cork, with a shiver returned to bed.—Science, 1880.

On the imagination of mothers, educated as well as ignorant, the feeling still seems to be stereotyped, that the free, pure, unadulterated air of heaven falls upon the brow of infancy as the poppies of eternal sleep, and enters the lungs and circulates as a deadly poison; and still the shawls and blankets, sleeping and awake, are pretty generally employed to deprive the objects of the most rapacious, paternal solicitude of what was originally breathed into the nostrils of the great archetype of the human race as the "breath of life."

During the English war in India in the last century, 146 persons were shut up in a room scarcely large enough to hold them. The air could enter only by two narrow windows. At the end of eight hours but 23 persons remained alive, and these were in a most deplorable condition. This prison is well called "The Black Hole of Calcutta." Percy relates that after the battle of Austerlitz, 300 Russian prisoners were confined in a cavern, where 280 of them perished in a few hours. The stupid captain of the ship Londonderry, during a storm at sea, shut the hatches. There were only 7 cubic feet of space left for each person, and in six hours 90 of the passengers were dead.—Dr. Steele.

[The lecturer here read numerous other instances, quoting Lord Derby, Dr. Newell, Dr. Youmans, Von Pettenkofer, Bernay, etc.] Continuing he said:

Yet how terribly neglectful are a great part of mankind to this pressing requirement! Fortunately for us carpenters and builders oftentimes do their work imperfectly, and leave many a crevice through which air may enter our dwellings, against our knowledge and our consent. Not alone in our domestic habitations do we lay the foundations of weakened minds and bodies by such unclean atmospheric surroundings, but in places of general assembly, in lecture halls, and sad as it is to say—in places of worship erected in the professed service of godliness. Cleanliness was long ago ranked next to godliness; it is now regarded as a part of godliness, and what uncleanness can be more disgusting, or more distinctive, than filth in the air we breathe? Is it any wonder that congregations go to sleep, within sound of a voice that may have been inspired, when the mephitic surroundings have made the soul deaf to all reason and truth? Yet I have sat in places of worship, where the lights could scarcely burn for want of supporting oxygen. Architects who plan public structures are now generally capable men, understanding the requirements in the way of ventilation, and usually they make adequate provisions; but the janitor, and others, in immediate charge of those buildings are prone to neglect every facility and to doom the audience to a stifling and filthy atmosphere.

3. THE MEANS OF SECURING PROPER VENTILATION, constitutes the third, and perhaps the most practical of the divisions of our subject. We have to provide for the removal of foul air and the introduction of a fresh and pure supply. I speak only of ventilation in this sense, that is, ventilation proper; though attempts have been made to provide chemical means of decomposing the foul emanations, and of supplying oxygen to re-establish the purity; such methods, however, are now very generally abandoned except on the very small scale of divers' suits, etc. To ventilate a room we must arrange for the entrance of fresh air, for the egress of foul; while a means of moving these great masses of air must be provided. Most systems of ventilation depend upon changes of temperature to effect the moving of the air body, or upon some mechanical contrivance, such as fans, either to drive air into the rooms, thereby forcing out that already there, or by drawing air from the rooms, thereby tending to create a vacuum, in consequence of which other air will enter. Any source of heat in a room will cause a disturbance of the air, producing currents. In general the tendency of the warmer air will be to rise; then the cold air must fall in some other part of the room to restore the equilibrium. Air in contact with the cold walls or windows, becoming specifically heavier because of its contraction in bulk through cold, will sink, and the presence of such downward currents under these conditions may be shown by holding a lighted candle near the wall or window. An excellent method of producing an up-cast current whereby foul air may be removed from rooms, is by constructing a ventilating flue alongside the heating flue. The warmth from the latter will cause the ascent of the air in the ventilating flue; air from the rooms may then be made to enter, if openings from the rooms into the flues be properly arranged. Such openings should be provided with registers whereby the flow inward may be controlled. An objection to the use of such flues has been urged in the possibility of back currents, whereby smoke may be drawn downward from the top of the adjacent fire flue into the rooms. To obviate such difficulty, automatic valves should be used in connection with the registers. A simple form of such a valve is a sheet of oiled silk or of thin oil cloth, hung inside the flue, fastened at the top, covering the register opening. Such a sheet will yield to any pressure from the room toward the flue, but any current in the opposite direction will close the flap against the wall. The Arnott valve is constructed to work on the same principle; this consists of a sheet of metal hinged delicately so as to respond to very slight pressure.

The Gillis system of ventilation is based on one of the best methods for removing foul air from rooms. This requires a large central shaft running from the cellar to the top of the building; in each room adjoining openings are made into the shaft, both near the floor and near the ceiling; these are fitted with registers and valves. A steam pipe passes up the middle of the shaft; and the heat from this causes a violent, up-cast current effectually aspirating air from the rooms.

An opposite application is seen in the Lyman ventilator, which consists of a box of coarse ice at the top of a large pipe; air in contact with the ice becomes cooled and consequently falls through the pipe and more air follows. In this way abundant currents of fresh air may be carried downward and distributed over the beds of the sick, about desks and in other small ways. [Note—These devices as also those that follow were all illustrated in the lecture by drawings or models.] Mechanical means of effecting the movement of air bodies are usually efficient but expensive. Fans, driven by steam or electric power, are now largely used; on a small scale they are set on tables, desks and the like for producing local cooling currents; in a larger way they are employed either for driving large volumes of air through the flues of a building or for aspirating air from the buildings so that more will enter.

In any system of ventilation ample care must be bestowed in providing both an inlet and an outlet for air; and in the neglect of one of these requirements lies the cause of failure in so many attempts. With a roaring fire in the grate, conscious of a voluminous outrush of air, we are apt to be content, letting air find its way into the house in whatever way it may, perhaps through the cracks in the floor, from beneath the house, and from other unclean sources. Windows and transoms may be utilized as efficient channels of inlet and egress; but let it be remembered that double passages are needed. You will see that necessity illustrated in this experiment: Take a lamp chimney, provide a saucer in which water stands half an inch deep; place in the saucer a short candle, lighted; put the lamp chimney over the candle, so that all entrance into the chimney from below is cut off by the water; in a short time the candle is extinguished through lack of air to support the combustion. Now, divide the upper part of the chimney by inserting a thin strip of metal, wood or cardboard; two channels are now formed, and if the candle be again lighted it will continue to burn; a bit of smoking paper held at the top of the chimney reveals an up-current in one passage, and a down current in the other. In a very wide space these opposite currents will usually establish themselves, as may thus be proved:

Set an outer door ajar; by holding a burning candle alternately near the top and bottom of the door opening, opposite currents will be revealed—toward the room at the bottom, and outward at the top if the temperature of the room be higher than that of the outer atmosphere; in opposite directions if these conditions be reversed.

In admitting air to dwelling rooms care should be taken that it becomes diffused before reaching the floor; and this may be accomplished by deflecting the air upward, as may be done by hinging the transoms at the bottom, and setting them at such an angle as to drive the air toward the ceiling. Windows opened at the top may be provided with a strip of wood set at such an angle. Slots properly inclined upward may take the place of panes of glass. Ordinary window sashes may be partly opened, the lower opening being stopped to prevent draft by a strip of board; air will then enter between the sashes, and by the upward deflection given the current, will tend toward thorough diffusion.

It is a popular error that good ventilation is only possible through the use of elaborate and expensive apparatus. With adjustable windows and transoms it is possible to keep the air of our rooms in a condition approximating purity, though the conditions of each dwelling may make the problem of ventilating somewhat special. The subject of house-heating is closely connected with that of ventilation, but the limits of our time forbid the treatment of that topic at present.

Manuel E. de Costa, who resides six miles south of Sacramento, has built an ingenious machine for irrigating his flower garden and his orange and lemon trees, says the Sacramento Bee. It consists of a wooden wheel ten feet in diameter and with a rim or tire about two feet wide. A dog is placed inside the wheel, which is turned by his weight as he gallops in treadmill fashion. The revolution of the axle turns a crank which operates the handle of a pump set in a dug well. After half an hour's exercise the dog is taken out and a fresh dog put in for another half hour. The dogs seem to enjoy the work, for they bark and wag their tails when they are brought to the wheel. They know that it means something good to eat at the end of the half hour's work.

N. D. Goldberg, of East Oakland, Cal., came very near losing his two children by the serious mistake of a drug clerk who failed to fill a prescription in a proper manner. The children had been sick, and they were under the care of a physician, who gave a prescription for medicine. Instructions were left as to how the medicines should be given, and then the doctor went away. When the drug clerk came to put up the prescription he substituted three grains of a tripla sulphate, a deadly poison, for three grains of spartim sulphate, as ordered by the doctor. The children took the medicine, and in a short time they became very sick and a physician was summoned. He made an investigation at once, and found that the druggist had given the children poison. It was several hours before they were declared to be out of danger.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

A canal has just been completed to carry water on some of the new lands taken up north of Minersville.

The Christian Home association, of Chaffee county, Colorado, has been incorporated, with a capital of $100,000. It is intended to be used as an abode for superannuated ministers.

Observer Salisbury, in his last official monthly report, says that the first apricot trees in blossom in Utah were at Moab, Grand county. The date of their appearance is given as March 19.

Wanted to know the whereabouts of Mrs. E. Cardwell, who immigrated from Northampton, England, in the spring of 1887. Any information will be gladly received by S. J. Cardwell, Orono P. O., Ontario, Canada.

The cattlemen and ranchmen of De Beque, Colbran and Mesa, says the Denver (Colorado) News of the 16th inst., celebrated the exclusion of Utah sheep with a grand dance, a supper and speech making.

The public schools of Bountiful will close for the year on Friday, April 27th. The program of exercises will be held in the tabernacle at 10:30, followed by a basket picnic and an exhibit of school work.

The sheepmen seem to have a more hopeful spirit this season than last, as they expect a better demand, quicker sales and better prices, so writes the Mt. Pleasant Pyramid. Shearing will begin soon in earnest, and something like 150,000 pounds will be clipped this spring by Mt. Pleasant parties.

Mrs. Sophia Johansen, of the First ward, attempted to commit suicide last Saturday by taking strychnine. A doctor was summoned, however, in time to prevent her death. The woman is hard of hearing, but of a set and determined mind, and there is no doubt but that family troubles were the cause of her rash act.

The captain of the Sacramento police force, Mr. Lee, took the train for Sacramento last evening having in his charge Frank J. Marks, who was arrested on the 16th inst in this city on a charge preferred against him in Sacramento for stealing a book from the state library at that place, and mailing it to himself at Ogden.

What may be termed the starting of work at our woolen mills, began this week in real earnest, says the Beaver Ullantan. For some time past there have been hands at work renovating the machinery, adjusting the pulleys, oiling up the gearings and giving the works a general overhauling, and now the work of manufacture has been commenced.

On Wednesday evening ex-President Harrison and party, composed of Mrs. McKee, her two children and his private secretary, Mr. Tibbott, arrived in Ogden in special car "Mascot," and several hundred people were there to welcome them. The ex-President made a brief speech and at 8:15 again resumed his journey towards Indianapolis on his return from Palo Alto.

The large barn on Tenth street, Provo, belonging to B. Backman was on Friday night completely destroyed by fire. The barn was rented by M. M. Kellogg, who had in it two horses, a buggy and a harness, all of which were burned. The barn was worth $2,000 and was insured for $500. Mr. Kellogg's loss on horses, vehicle and harness is estimated at $500—no insurance.

In Logan on Sunday Joseph Ballif was thrown from a horse, and later was found lying in the road in an unconscious condition. The attending doctor found that he had sustained several severe scalp wounds and was suffering from concussion of the brain. He remained unconscious until Monday morning, when he was temporarily aroused, only again to relapse into unconsciousness.

On Friday, the 20th inst., at Mr. L. B. Adams's ranch at Wilson ward, Weber county, as a young man named Clark was leading a Clydesdale stallion to water, the animal picked him up in his teeth, carried him several yards, all the time striking at him savagely with his front feet. Fortunately the beast finally dropped him in a water ditch where he could not reach him, or the incident might have had a more serious ending.

An employe of the Arlington saloon, named William Fagan, while walking along Washington avenue, Ogden, was seized with an epileptic fit and fell heavily to the ground, severely cutting and bruising his head and face. He was picked up and carried into Cave's drug store where he received attention. After regaining consciousness his wounds were dressed and he was conveyed to his home.

Mrs. W. Van Dyke and her two children, while driving homeward on Washington avenue, Ogden, were thrown from a buggy, but luckily sustained no serious injury. The lady, when near the power house, attempted to cross the track of the Henderson-Brinker railroad, and in doing so caught the rails, which are considerably higher than the level of the street. The vehicle was overturned and the occupants were hurled to the ground. Mrs. Van Dyke and one of the children were slightly bruised and much shaken up.

The residence of Hon. S. W. Sears in East Waterloo, presented a lively and animated scene at 3 o'clock Friday morning. The cause of the commotion was a burglar.

A hasty examination of the house was made but nothing was missed so far as known.

It is only two or three days ago that the residence of J. M. Sjobahl, in the same neighborhood, was raided during the temporary absence of the family. In this case the looting was done during the day.

Sister Laura M. Christiansen died on Sunday afternoon at her home in the Sixth ward, Logan, after an illness of two weeks' duration, of brain fever and meningitis. The lady was the wife of

H. J. Christiansen, who is now absent on a mission to Norway.

The funeral services, held Sunday afternoon, were conducted in the Tabernacle, the ward meeting house not having a sufficient seating capacity to accommodate all who wished to attend. Much sympathy is expressed for Bro. Christiansen; also for the three adopted children.

The funeral services over the remains of Edward Draper, an aged veteran of the Church, were held Friday at the Second ward assembly rooms, Provo. The speakers were Elder Wm. Paxman, president of Juab Stake of Zion; Bishop Evan Wride and Elder James Hardy. Deceased has led a useful and industrious life. He was nearly 84 years of age at the time of his death. He leaves behind several children, but one of whom, however, is in Utah, the others being in England, the land of his nativity. Some twenty grand children also mourn his loss.

The Bear Lake has collapsed and soon we may hear the whistle tooting at the various landing places of the steamer. We are informed that it is ready to be launched and will be placed in operation as soon as the blocks of ice now floating on the lake will have vanished before the sun's direct rays. Then hurrah for Bear Lake! The lake is twenty-two miles in length and will average seven miles in width. It is a beautiful body of water, and a ride thereon must be a pleasure to pleasure seekers. The pier is almost constructed, immediately east of Bishop Calder's residence.

Word has been received in this city to the effect that the Carbon county Democrats, who held their convention at Price yesterday afternoon, endorsed Henry C. Smith for the office of probate judge of the new county. Mr. Smith's name and the endorsement referred to, as well as others, will be sent to Washington without delay, and it is thought that Presidential appointment will not be long delayed.

The same message conveys the information that James H. Barvis was chosen chairman of the Democratic county central committee.

NEPHI, April 22, 1894.

The first half of the fourth term of the Juab Stake Academy was celebrated by a very pleasant surprise, gotten up by the larger scholars, on the teachers, in which a large number were participants. The party was on the 20th instant. A lengthy program was carried out, and afterwards a sumptuous feast was served, the board being represented by one of its members. This has been the largest school year in attendance since its organization, having enrolled 159 members.

STUDENT.

There was a well attended horticultural meeting held in Big Cottonwood Wednesday night. Prof. W. H. Brown and Inspector Thos. E. Wisling, from Salt Lake, spoke on insects and the manner of extermination.

The horticulturists of South Cottonwood met in the ward house with Inspector Lester acting as chairman. Prof. W. H. Brown was invited to give a lecture and the large audience showed the interest manifested in the destroying of orchard pests. Mr.

Thos. E. Wissing, from Salt Lake City, spoke in behalf of an organization in Cottonwood and a meeting was called for Thursday next at 8 p. m.

Please give the following a place in your issue, so that it may reach the farmers in this county.

In your last SEMI-WEEKLY I noticed something relating to the law passed by the last Legislature in regard to spraying, where you ask, "Who is doing the spraying?" Undersigned, being one of the inspectors in Salt Lake City, will be glad to answer any questions in reference to spraying, and the best and cheapest way of getting it done, as I am very well acquainted with the business and can give the best advice without charge.

THOMAS E. WISSING,

5 Morgan row, opposite Postoffice.

There is something out of shape in postal matters when letters posted in Salt Lake county and addressed to parties in this city have to go by way of Ogden for delivery. One day the NEWS received a letter which had been mailed in Farmers' ward, and which visited the Junction City before it was brought here, to where it was directed. Today another letter, mailed in this city on Saturday last, came to hand. It was plainly addressed to this office, "City," but found its way to Ogden, where in the postoffice it was marked "Try Salt Lake." This brought it back here, and indicates commendable diligence on the part of the postal officers to find the addressees of letters. But the route taken for city mail is rather too roundabout.

Probate Judge Charles Herman, of Tooele, reports that the material resources of that section were never more promising than at the present.

The great amount of snow has made an immense crop of "dry farm" wheat and lucern almost a certainty. The returns from regular farming and fruit growing, he believes, will be heavier than for many years, if indeed all past seasons will not be entirely eclipsed.

Judge Herman states also that he has just returned from a surveying trip over the great desert and that the heavy rains have produced a mantle of verdure more luxurious there than he ever remembers having seen. This he says has made the hearts of many sheep men glad already, as it is the grass and brush that grow there in early spring time upon which their flocks graze in winter.

Assistant Jailor Sol Kimball was the first man to ascertain that the city had four prisoners less to feed Thursday than dined at its expense Wednesday. Some time during the night—just what hour is not known—three bars had been sawn in twain at the top and wrested from their fastenings at the bottom from the northwest window, facing the city hall. Out of the opening thus made four men jumped to the ground below, a distance of about twelve or fifteen feet and made their escape. They were headed by Kimball, the man who Chief Pratt says bound and robbed Frank Castleton in his store in the Twenty-first ward recently and who had served about two-thirds of a term of ninety days' imprisonment for petty larceny.

The men who went with him were Samuel Grice, serving sixty-five days for stealing a set of harness from R. K.

Thomas, and who is under indictment by the grand jury for grand larceny; James J. Dunn, sent up for ninety days for petty larceny with only twenty-four more days to serve, and Thomas Roe who was doing ten days for trespass.

A few weeks ago a letter was sent by Superintendent D. R. Allen to the various county superintendents of the Territory, calling attention to the desirability of formulating a uniform course of study for district schools. As a result, a meeting was held about two weeks ago and a committee appointed to prepare a suggestive course. The results of the labors of the committee are not blinding upon any, but it is expected that a greater portion of the schools throughout the Territory will adopt the course.

Pursuant to call, the committee met at the University at one o'clock this afternoon, and entered upon their duties. The course of study as prepared by Superintendent D. R. Allen for Salt Lake county is made the basis of the work before the committee. Those present were Superintendent D. R. Allen, Salt Lake county; Supt. S. Oidham, Cache county; Supt. M. Hall, Weber county; Supt. D. H. Christensen, Utah county. The committee are now working upon the second year of the course. Several meetings will be necessary to complete their labors.

The Payson Globe of the 21st inst., tells a strange story of the 12 year old daughter of Mike Ferless of Wales, Sanpete Co., who was for two years the victim of a terrible distressing and growing pain in her stomach. Various doctors said she was troubled with a stomach worm; but at last the parents took her to Dr. Johnson, of Fountain Green, who declared there was some kind of a living creature in the stomach. The parents were told to keep food and water from the child for three hours. They did as directed, and when she began to call for water and it was not given her she grew frantic and it seemed as though she would tear herself to pieces. She would scream and rave and cry: "It is coming, it is coming," "I can feel it, I can feel it." For a time it seemed as though the child would choke to death. At last she savagely thrust her hand into her mouth and drew from her throat a lizard about eight inches long. The head of the reptile had been chewed so bad that it died in a few minutes. It is not known just how the reptile ever got into the little one's stomach, but is supposed she swallowed it while eating watercress.

Shortly after noon Wednesday the lifeless body of a man was discovered on an island in the Ogden river near the Becker brewery by two boys, J. Brown and Frank Foster. The boys informed the men at work at the brewery and they notified the police of the fact. A rope was placed about the body and it was hauled to the opposite side of the river and Charles Lindquist took charge of the remains and conveyed them to his undertaking establishment on Main street. Some trouble was had in ascertaining the man's name, but the last report is that it is Curless. He was very poorly dressed and wore a leather strap around his loins. He is apparently a man of about 47 years of age, is five feet seven inches in height, strongly built and of a dark complexion. The face was somewhat bruised and scratched, but this may have been from coming in contact with obstructions in the river, as the body had doubtless been in the water four or five days. Ten cents and a mem. book were found in his pocket, the mem. book containing the names of several prominent men of Ogden as well as of Salt Lake.

A special session of the Utah county court was held Wednesday afternoon pursuant to the legislative enactment, requiring the spraying of fruit trees. In his spraying proclamation, Judge J. D. Jones gives the following instructions:

For spraying the first time, from seven to ten days after the blossoms have fallen, when the fruit shall be set. For spraying the second time, from ten to twelve days after the first spraying. Every orchard or parcel of ground upon which fruit trees, bushes or vines are growing, shall be thoroughly cleaned by the removal of all rubbish, dead or decayed trees, fallen leaves or decayed fruit.

Spraying mixtures:—

1. For apple, pear, plum, cherry trees, etc., mix one pound of London purple or Paris green with 200 gallons of water.

2. For peach trees mix one pound of Paris green with 400 gallons of water.

3. For fungus diseases, use "Bordeaux's Mixture."

4. For currants, raspberry and gooseberry bushes, etc., mix one pound of hellbore with fifty gallons of water.

Note—Keep mixtures well stirred while using.

A meeting of the Fifth Horticultural district of Salt Lake county was held in the Tenth ward meeting house, and a branch organization effected by the election of the following officers:

E. S. Loveey, president; H. F. F. Thorup, vice-president; John C. Swaner, secretary and treasurer. The twelve horticultural districts of the county are divided as follows:

1. Between Jordan river and Third West, north of Tenth South street, to the county line.

2. Between Third west and Fifth East, and all north of Third South street.

3. East of Fifth East and north of Third South street.

4. All between Third West and Fifth East streets and between Third South and Tenth South Streets.

5. Between Third South and Tenth South streets and all east of Fifth East, including Fort Douglas, Emigration canyon and Mountain Dell.

6. Between Tenth South and Thirteenth South and east of Jordan river.

7. East Mill Creek and Mill Creek proper.

Big and Little Cottonwoods.

9. Union, Granite and Butteville.

10. Sandy, South and West Jordan.

11. Draper, Bluff Dale, Riverton and Herriman.

12. All north of West Jordan and west of Jordan river to the county line.

One of the most pleasing, interesting and long to be remembered Sunday School reviews was given at the Church University, Salt Lake City, yesterday (Sunday) morning. There was quite a large number of visitors in attendance.

The exercises consisted of ordinary conversation; sketch of the life of the Redeemer of the world; organization of the Church; brief histories of the Prophets of this dispensation; Articles of Faith in full, all of which were written on the blackboard; rendering of the hymn, "Nearer My God to Thee" in signs by the little Misses Swift and Pearl Ault, accompanied by the singing of the words by Miss Maude Pratt, recitations by the two girls named, and Miss Amy Devine and Andrew Madsen, and others; rendering of the Lord's prayer in concert, which was heavenly. Supt. Henry Charles Barrell spoke the words as the signs of the prayer were being given.

Superintendent Barrell and Assistant Elder Laron Pratt are entitled to the greatest credit that can be given teachers for their efficient labors, in view of very difficult obstacles they have to contend with.

Encouraging remarks on the blackboard were written by Elder Angus M. Cannon, Sister Bathsheba W. Smith, Elders Willard Young and Nathaniel V. Jones.

Joseph Olorenshaw, in choice words, wrote thanking the University board for the use of the nice room the class had to meet in this season. He also thanked the visitors for their presence and good feeling towards the scholars.

There was a very serious accident in City Creek canyon this morning and the victim was a little school girl about twelve years of age, the name of whose parents is Stevenson. It appears that the little one with a younger brother had gone up the canyon in company with their school teacher and a number of her scholars to spend the day picking flowers and running over the foothills and indulging in a picnic.

Unfortunately she dropped behind the party with her brother and while near the big flume on the east side of the canyon just above the tower she fell down a very steep place a distance of ten or twelve feet, cutting a gash over the right temple. The fall rendered her unconscious and in that condition she was picked up by Al McQuarrie, who secured a pillow upon which he laid her apparently, more dead than alive, and endeavored to stop the flow of blood that was saturating her clothing. His next act was to make provision for bringing her down town where she could receive the attention of a physician. Presently a gentleman and a lady came down the road in a buggy and took her to the city hall. Dr. Richards was sent for and on his arrival dressed and sewed up the wound, after which he made preparations to take her to her home in the Fifteenth ward.

As she was carried to the doctor's buggy from the hall she slowly revived and as she saw the blood on her hands she innocently asked what was the matter. Dr. Richards stated this afternoon that he did not regard her condition as serious and is of the opinion that she will soon recover.

Brief mention has been previously made in these columns of the death of Bishop M. L. Lee, of Panaca, and the following with reference to the sad event is taken from the Pioche Lode: For the past three weeks he had complained and Tuesday medical assistance was called, when it was found he was suffering from gall stone passages and bilious colic which developed into inflammation of the bowels, resulting in his death.

Mr. Lee was a man of great worth in the community in which he lived, was well known throughout this section and most favorably honored and respected. He was one of the early settlers of Panaca, and his kindness of heart, his natural ability and gift, his humane feeling to his fellow men soon won the esteem and confidence of his people, and in due time he was placed at the head of the Mormon Church in this section, being ordained a Bishop on June 3rd, 1882. He was born in Tooele, Utah, February 4th, 1853, and is consequently forty-one years of age.

In public and business life Bishop Lee had many friends and few enemies. He leaves an affectionate wife and fourteen children, the eldest only nineteen years old, to mourn his loss, and the only consolation to the bereaved is the kind and tender sympathy of their many sorrowing friends. Several prominent residents of Pioche went to Panaca today to extend sympathy and consolation to the afflicted and to attend the funeral, which took place at 10 o'clock this morning, and was largely attended.

The local industrial army movement, of which mention will be found on page 597 of this issue, the following additional items are quoted from the daily News of Monday, April 23 was discussed at a meeting of business men held at the office of Selectman Bamberger. Among those present were P. W. Madsen, M. J. Cheesman, Henry W. Lawrence, A. L. Thomas, W. E. Hubbard, George W. Snow, E. P. Newell, Henry Dinwoodey, Louis Cohn, Herman Bamberger, T. E. Bailey, B. F. Grant, C. R. Barratt and others.

Mr. Lawrence was chosen chairman and "General" Carter was allowed to state his case, which he did in a speech rather more pacific than the utterances he has made in public of late. He stated that he had 360 men enrolled and that the number would soon be increased to at least 500 and probably more than that. What he wanted for his men now were provisions and clothing, a large tent and transportation to Washington. Those were small matters that he thought the business men of Salt Lake should furnish. He stated that they did not intend to stop until they had reached the capital and interviewed the President. What they intended to do when they got there was to ask the nation's chief executive to do something for silver, advocate the building of new roads and the improvement of those already built and see also what could be done towards stopping foreign immigration.

A committee was then appointed consisting of Messrs. Newell, Cheesman, Bamberger, Hubbard and Snow to confer with the railroad officials, with a view to securing transportation for the army, after which an adjournment was taken until tonight at 7:30, at which time another meeting will be held and at which time the citizens' committee hope there will be as large a presentation of business men present as possible.

This afternoon there were filed in the office of the county clerk the articles of incorporation of the Cottonwood Gold and Reservoir Discovery Mining company. By this filing is made public a scheme and information which the parties concerned in have been jealously guarding for some time, till they had made their rights secure. The company is incorporated for $100,000 and the incorporators are Frank Smith, David Lundeen, Samuel L. Tobias, Henry W. Hooton and Thomas Kane. The stated purpose of the company is to purchase, operate and develop mines, and also reservoirs, canals, etc., in Salt Lake county.

Mr. Hooton, one of the directors, says that two of the company, Messrs. Lundeen and Tobias, made a very important discovery about three months ago. They were prospecting for ore up Dry Canyon, about four miles from the mouth of Big Cottonwood canyon, and were making the ascent in a very perilous locality, searching for the ledge, which they found, and which shows $6 to $8 per ton gold. But they also made another discovery worth more to them and to this locality than any ordinary gold mine. This was a deep pocket in the mountain, surrounded by rocks. In this is large fresh water lake, the water of which ran through a narrow opening eastward and was lost among the hills.

On further examination, he says, they found that by means of a tunnel 300 feet in length, which tapped the ledge, the water from the great natural reservoir could be brought through at a point within thirteen miles of this city, and in such quantity that a permanent stream as large or larger than City Creek could be conveyed down Dry Canyon into this valley and utilized on the farms.

It is the purpose of the company to pipe the water some distance and supply the people in that locality with irrigating water. If the find should be all that is claimed for it by the owners, it will prove of immense value. The work of tunneling for the waterway is to be commenced on Monday next.

Of the 7,997 votes in Tacoma 5,000 are natives of the United States. The greatest number from any one state is 756, from New York. Only sixty-seven are natives of Washington.

F. H. Harvey and A. A. Clough, of Douglas, Wyo., have invented a machine for elevating water from the Platte river on to the uplands for irrigating purposes. An undershot water wheel is placed in the bed of the river, which furnishes the motive power to operate the centrifugal pump, with a capacity of 1,000 gallons a minute. The wheel just put in operation on the Harvey and Clough ranch near this place is ten feet in width and fourteen feet in diameter, and develops forty horse power, which is sufficient to operate seven pumps of the capacity mentioned. It is estimated that seven pumps will elevate water enough to irrigate 1,500 or 2,000 acres. Heretofore great difficulty has been experienced in getting the water from the bed of the river onto the land, but this invention completely overcomes that obstacle, and ranchmen believe it will work a revolution in irrigation enterprises in the Platte valley.

CHEAP LIVING IN JAPAN.

(Copyrighted by Frank G. Carpenter, 1894.)

TOKIO, Japan, February 10, 1894.

JAPAN is doing all she can to keep silver in the air. She has to pay for the goods she imports from America in gold, and the silver question is a far more important one here than it has ever been in the United States. The country is now on a silver basis, and there is sure to be a general rise in the prices of everything. At the present writing the exchange is going up every day and a gold dollar in Tokio looks as big as the cover of a Japanese umbrella. Such foreigners as are here who get their incomes from America are rich through the fall of silver, and they now get two dollars for every one that is sent out to them from home. I made out a draft of one hundred dollars on my New York letter of credit at the bank this morning and got two hundred and eight dollars for it and the money I have brought with me has doubled in value. This makes traveling comparatively cheap, and though I have been paying four dollars a day at the Grand Hotel at Yokohama it really costs me only two. Clothing here is wonderfully cheap, and all English goods can be bought for the same prices they bring in London. The treaties with Japan prohibit her from charging more than five per cent duty, and labor is worth so little that one could come across the Pacific and save the expenses of the trip by laying in a stock of clothing for himself and his family. The tailors are Chinese, but they give you good cuts and you do not need to pay if the clothes do not fit you. You can get a good business suit of English goods made to order for about ten American dollars. Patent leather shoes made to order cost two dollars and a half, and a fur-lined overcoat with beaver collar and cuffs can be bought for about thirty dollars in gold. You could not buy the cloth, to say nothing of the fur linings, for that amount in America. Ladies' dresses are equally cheap and you get wonderfully embroidered gowns of silk crepe for less than the ordinary street dress costs you in the United States.

This reduction in silver makes a wonderful profit for our missionaries and diplomats. A missionary who is getting a thousand dollars a year has now two thousand dollars to spend. The American minister to Japan, who receives, if my memory serves me, twelve thousand dollars annually, gets at least twenty-four thousand dollars' worth of value out of it, and the salaries of all our consuls are practically doubled by the change. An American family living on a fixed income at home could now come to Japan and have twice the comforts for half the money, and I am surprised at the wonderful cheapness of all sorts of eatables from cabbage to champagne. I took an interpreter with me to the market this morning and spent some hours in finding out the prices of the necessities of life. I found the articles sold fully as good and in most cases superior to those you find in America, and the prices were from one-twentieth to one-half those we pay. I have reduced them from the silver to the gold basis and give you a few of them. First take the meats. These are very high, as the Japanese do not use them, and they are chiefly demanded by foreigners. I found that fine rib roasts of beef cost eight cents a pound, and was shown veal and bacon at ten cents. Chickens are worth from seven to twenty cents apiece. You buy teal ducks for eight cents each, and eggs are worth from six to ten cents a dozen. Quail cost from six to seven cents. Reed birds, sixteen cents a dozen, and snipe five cents each. Think of it! A good snipe for a nickel. There are no better vegetables in the world than those you find here and the fish of Japan are far superior to those of America. All fish are sold when they are alive or still kicking. Lobsters run from half a cent to five cents apiece. Fine fresh mackerel bring from one to four cents, and sole from two to ten. You can get perch as low as two cents each, and tai fish, the best fish in Japan, at from five cents to fifty cents, according to size. Oysters are worth twelve cents a gallon, and eels bring ten cents a pound. As to vegetables, they are sold in most cases by the pound, ranging from half a cent upwards. Cabbages bring from one to three cents each. Lettuce about a quarter of a cent a bunch, and radishes about the same. You get a fine cauliflower for from eight to ten cents, and fresh mushrooms cost five cents a pound. Soft coal costs three dollars a ton, and firewood sold in little bundles about as large as a bundle of kindling from one to three cents each. These figures, as well as those following this, are on the gold and not the silver basis.

All sorts of luxuries are cheap. You can buy Mum's extra dry champagne for less than a dollar and a half a quart, and good Manilla cigars cost from one to three cents each. Cigarettes, which are now being imported by the million from the United States, and which are being introduced in large quantities among both the men and women of Japan, are far cheaper than at home, and what we pay five and ten cents a package for sell here for from one to three cents a package. Servants are very cheap and very good. The foreign housewife has nothing to do and she lives like a queen. The Japanese cooks are far better than ours, and twenty dollars a month will pay the board and salaries of the help of an eight room house. I have a friend who lives as well here as many a millionaire does in the United States, and he does not expend more than this amount. He pays his cook five dollars a month. His butler gets two dollars and a half, and his gardener and second girl get about the same. These servants all board themselves and the cook does the marketing. His rent costs him less than twenty dollars a month, though he lives in one of the best parts of Japan, and he could have a coachman at five dollars more. He has no trouble about getting good servants, and he tells me they watch after his interests and see that he is not cheated by anyone else but themselves. It is far easier to live well here than in America, and I predict that the time will come when many American families with fixed but comparatively limited incomes will come to Japan, instead of going to Europe as they are now doing. As to the table, they can nowhere find better eating. In some cases the cooks take contracts to do all the marketing, cook the meals and supply the table at a fixed price per day. A well-to-do family of Kobe lives in this way, and for three yen, or about $1.50 per day, they have their meals furnished by the cook. Remember, they pay nothing more than this, and there are six in the family. Their ordinary every day bills of fare are as follows: The breakfast, served when they rise, consists of fruit, porridge, fish, a fry, or grill of mutton or beef, and warm bread or cakes. At noon they have a lunch or "tiffin," which is served in courses, and embraces soup, fish, a warm entree, cold meats, a salad, sweets and coffee. Then there is a tea served at 4 p. m., and at 7 o'clock there is a dinner, the menu of which consists of a soup, a fish, a roast, some game, potatoes and two vegetables, with a dessert, coffee, cheese and nuts.

As to the living of the Japanese, they pay still less and these forty millions of people could exist well on what America wastes. Only a few of the middle classes have more than one servant, and among the poorer classes the wife does the cooking and the entire work of the household. Some families have a woman to cook and do general housework, and such women are paid from one to two dollars a month and are lodged and fed. They generally receive a present of a dress from their mistress at New Year and in midsummer, each costing from a dollar and a half to two dollars, and they expect to get a cent two or three times a week for bath money. Every Japanese takes a hot bath from two to twelve times a week, and where the family is too poor to own a bath room they go to the public bath houses. The richer people have more servants, and a well-to-do family will generally have a man in addition to the women. They pay their men twice as much as the women. Nurses are very cheap in Japan, and the common people keep the smaller children and the old men of the family busy in taking care of the babies. A child of six often has her baby brother tied to her back, and children from nine to sixteen go about with babies so fastened upon them taking care of them. Such girls, when employed outside of their own families, get their board and clothing and a present now and then. They are often poor relatives of the family, and a woman who works in a tea factory will often pay a cent a day to have her baby thus cared for.

Out in the country the wages are even lower and there are parts of Japan where the women do not get more than ten cents in silver a day, or about a nickel of our money. All members of a poor family work, and a man and his wife will often labor side by side in the same field. Women dig up the ground with long spade-like mattocks, and I visited a tea-firing establishment yesterday where I saw about 100 girls bending over hot oven-like pans and rubbing the green leaves of the tea around in them, while the perspiration rolled down their cheeks and now and then dropped into the dainty mixture, which was being prepared for American breakfast tables. I asked as to their hours and their wages and I was told that they worked from day-break to sunset, and that they got the enormous wages of from thirty to forty cents a day in silver. I see men everywhere I go carrying loads that the ordinary American could not lift, and they do the work of both horses and men. There are few horses used and many of the carts are pushed and pulled by women and men. I saw a woman breaking stones for the roads this afternoon, and I was told that she got about ten of our cents for twelve hours' work. She sat bareheaded and barefooted on the stones and pounded away with a hammer breaking the rocks into pieces. As I watched her, two Japanese men in blue cotton gowns passed by, carrying a stone weighing about 400 pounds, which was tied by a rope to a pole, which rested on their shoulders, and a third man pushed past them with a load of long boards on his back.

There are no such things as stone boats and lumber wagons in Japan, and human labor takes the place of steam and horses. There are no lumber mills in the country and logs are sawed into boards by hand. A lumber yard consists of a lot of boards tied up into bundles containing about five or six boards six inches wide and half an inch thick, and usually about twelve feet in length, and it is of such lumber that the most of the Japanese houses are made. The heaviest of the rafters or the temples are sawed out by hand, and it is by men that they are carried up and put into place. There are many queer things here in the way of building, and I understand that there are people who make a business of manufacturing roofs for buildings. The roof of a Japanese house is put on before the walls are fitted in and there is a big scaffolding made of the height of the proposed structure and running all around it before the work of putting up the house begins. This scaffolding is made of bamboo poles tied together with ropes of straw, and the men who put it up have nothing to do with erecting the building itself. There is a company in Yokohama which does nothing else but make scaffolding, and it rents it to the builders at so much per house.

Almost all of the Japanese houses are of wood. They are built close together in the towns and cities and a fire sometimes sweeps them away by thousands. It is said that Tokyo burns down every seven years, and fires which destroy a thousand houses are not uncommon. There are now steam fire engines in the large cities and all of the smaller places have fire departments and hand engines. The Japanese go wild whenever there is a fire in their neighborhood. They turn out en masse, each carrying a paper lantern, upon which is painted the name of his house or his business place, and rush toward it. They have lanterns hung up in their houses ready to run out with them to fires, and it is a matter of etiquette if you have a friend in the neighborhood of the conflagration to call and leave your card, and tell him that you came to help him, thinking the house which was burning was his, and to leave your card with congratulations that he escaped. The firemen themselves carry lanterns and they yell as they run. Each fire company has a leader who carries a lantern fastened to the top of a long pole and ornamented with streamers of paper. He climbs with this to the roof of the building which is on fire and directs the men, and he is expected to stay at his post until these streamers catch fire. The firemen of Yokohama have blue hats, like butter bowls, and on their backs are the characters which mean Yokohama fire brigade. The country firemen tie a handkerchief on their heads and are more often barefooted than otherwise.

Until lately there was no such thing as a fire insurance company in Japan. Now there are several and they are doing well. There are no foreign companies and the insurance companies of other countries confine their risks here to life. I chatted last night with the manager of the Equitable Life Insurance Company for Japan and China. He tells me that this American institution is doing a good business here and that the people are insuring more every day. The highest amount the Equitable insures for in Japan is $100,000. It has taken out two such policies lately and has written a number of $50,000 and $25,000 policies. The most of its business, however, is in $5,000 risks, and it insures here at the same rates as in America. It does not try to push its business among the Chinese, as there is more danger of fraud from them. When a Chinaman sees that he is about to die he wants to go to his ancestral home. This may be a thousand miles in the interior of China, where there are no foreigners, and all sorts of trumped up evidence could be sent in as to the death. You could buy the testimony of the governor of a Chinese province for $100 or so, to anything, and the result would probably be that the company would be systematically defrauded.

In Japan it is impossible for one to defraud as to a matter of life and death. The system of registration of births and deaths is perfect, and the Czar of Russia has not a better method of keeping track of his subjects than has the mikado. There are 30,000 policemen in the empire and no end of detectives. The secret service of Japan is said to be the most perfect in the world, and though this land has the shrewdest of criminals, there is little wickedness that is allowed to go unpunished. Every man and woman in Japan must have a passport, and this is the case with foreigners as well as with the Japanese. In changing his residence the police call upon a man as soon as he has settled and demand to know all about him. They do not take his own statement, but write to the city from which he says he came, and if his story is not a true one he is arrested. He dare not leave Japan without the permission of the government, and it is almost impossible now for a Japanese woman to get away from Japan without she can prove that she is going into some legitimate employment abroad, and that her associations there are to be good.

THE NEW SHEEP LAW.

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the territory of Utah:

Sec. 1. That there shall be appointed by the county court of each county in Utah territory, at its regular session in June, 1894, and biennially thereafter, a practical sheep raiser, as sheep inspector for said county, whose term of office shall be two years or until his successor is appointed and qualified.

Sec. 2. The inspector shall be a resident of the county for which he is appointed and before entering upon the duties of his office shall qualify within twenty days after receiving notice of his appointment by taking the oath prescribed for other county officers and giving a bond in the sum of $1,000, conditioned that he will well and faithfully perform the duties of said office. Such bond shall be approved by the probate judge, and filed with the clerk and may be sued on by any person injured through the neglect of duty by said inspector or any of his deputies; provided that no suit shall be brought after twelve months have elapsed from the time the cause of action has accrued.

Sec. 3. Each inspector may appoint one or more deputies who shall be practical sheep raisers and for whose official acts he shall be responsible, and by whom he may perform any duty required by this act. It shall be the duty of the inspector to advertise in at least one local newspaper if there be one published in the county, at his own expense, giving the name and postoffice address of each of his deputies.

Sec. 4. It shall be the duty of the inspector to examine all herds or bands of sheep in the county between the 1st day of October and the 15th day of December in each year; and to the owner or person in charge of all sheep found to be free from disease he shall so certify, and certificate shall describe the earmarks, wool-brands and number of sheep in each herd and be a permit for such herd of sheep to pass into and through any and all counties in the territory, so long as they remain free from disease and it shall be his duty to examine any herd or band of sheep at any time at the request in writing of any person or owner of sheep, stating that said sheep are diseased and there is immediate danger of it spreading; provided, the person so complaining shall tender the fee for such examination, which shall be returned if said sheep are found to be as set forth in said complaint.

Sec. 5. Any person or corporation intending to bring or cause to be brought from any other state or territory into another county, any sheep, must immediately after crossing the boundary line first obtain from an inspector duly appointed under this act a certificate that said sheep are free from contagious disease; said certificate shall contain a description of the ear-marks, wool-brands and number of sheep so inspected and it shall be the duty of the inspector at the request of any person, corporation or association owning or controlling sheep in the county or within ten miles of the boundary line thereof, upon being tendered the amount of his fees, to with all convenient speed examine all the sheep he may be required to examine and if found free from all infectious and contagious disease, to give a certificate over his official signature setting forth the soundness and freedom from disease of such sheep and issue a permit as provided in section 4 of this act; provided, that sheep which have been previously examined by any inspector of this territory, but have been grazing without the territory, may return at any time within the year without additional examination; provided such sheep are free from disease.

Sec. 6. Any person, company or corporation desiring to move his or their sheep, which are affected with scab or any infectious disease, shall first obtain from the inspector a traveling permit giving the number of sheep, together with the earmarks, woolbrands and name of owner or person in charge; provided, such permit shall only be granted for the purpose of moving said sheep to the nearest convenient place, where they may be treated for such disease, and by such route as the inspector may designate.

Sec. 7. Whenever, upon examination of any herds or bands of sheep kept or herded in any county in this territory, the inspector shall find such sheep or any portion thereof affected with the scab or any infectious or contagious disease, he shall forthwith notify the owner or person in charge of said sheep, in writing, to treat said sheep for such disease within a period of fifteen days from such notice, and also during such period to keep said sheep from contact with all other sheep by such means as he may specify, and at the end of twenty days from such notice the inspector shall examine said sheep and if upon examination he shall find said sheep have not been treated for such disease or have not been kept from contact with all other sheep that are sound, then the owner or lessee of said sheep shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and in case said sheep have not been treated as directed, the inspector shall immediately take possession of said sheep and treat them for said disease and all expense incurred in so doing, including the compensation of $3 per day or part of a day he may be necessarily engaged in treating said sheep, together with 10 cents per mile necessarily traveled, shall become a lien upon said sheep and the inspector may hold said sheep until the same is paid; or if not paid within ten days after such treatment has been completed he may collect the same, together with costs, in the manner prescribed by law for collecting other obligations. If, however, upon examination at the end of thirty days from such notice, as above mentioned, the inspector shall find that said sheep have been treated for said disease but are still infected with the same, then he shall instruct the owner or lessee of said sheep to treat one or more times as their condition demands, as soon as possible, but with an interval between the treatments of not less than ten nor more than twenty days. And if upon examination at the end of thirty days the inspector finds that said sheep have been treated but are still affected, then he shall at once take possession of said sheep and treat them as above specified. If, however, he finds on examination they have not been treated he shall seize said sheep and treat them as provided in this section, and the owner or lessee shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; provided that no band or bands of ewes or any part of such bands in which there are ewes with lambs shall be required to be dipped at any time between the 1st day of April and the 15th day of June of each year; but they must be held in quarantine and kept separate from sheep that are free from disease, and the owner or lessee shall be responsible for all damage done by reason of such disease.

Sec. 8. The sheep inspectors in the several counties of the territory shall receive $3 per day for every day or part of day necessarily spent and 10 cents per mile necessarily traveled in the performance of their duties, to be paid for by the owner of the sheep so examined as provided for in this act.

Sec. 9. Any inspector who shall at any time grant a permit allowing sheep to travel without having first examined said sheep shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sec. 10. Any person or persons owning or leasing any sheep which have become affected with scab or any other contagious disease for a period of thirty days without treating such sheep for said disease shall report the same in writing to the inspector.

Sec. 11. In any civil action arising under the provisions of this act all persons having any interest in the sheep or controlling the same, against which such action or proceedings is brought, shall be deemed the owner of said sheep and shall be liable severally and jointly for violation of any of the provisions of this act provided the leaser of any herd of sheep shall not be liable under the provisions of this act.

Sec. 12. It shall be the duty of the inspector to keep a book in which he shall record as nearly as practicable the date of inspection, a description of the marks and brands, number of sheep inspected, together with the name of each owner and his postoffice address. Said book shall be provided by the county court of each county for the use of the inspector, and at the expiration of his term of office he shall turn over to his successor all books and papers pertaining to said office.

Sec. 13. If any person or company herding or driving sheep in any county in this territory shall get into their herd any stray sheep they shall immediately notify the owner thereof if known, or, if the owner be unknown, he shall forthwith notify the inspector of the county, giving the number of sheep together with the marks and brands, and it shall be the duty of the inspector upon receipt of such notice to immediately examine the records of marks and brands of sheep inspected, and if the marks and brands mentioned in said notice appear on said records he shall immediately forward to the person owning such marks and brands a copy of such notice; he shall also record the description of such marks and brands and the number of sheep mentioned, together with the name and address of the person having such sheep, in the above named record.

Sec. 14. Any person, persons or corporation owning or having in their possession or under their control any sheep that is affected with scab or any other contagious disease shall be held responsible for all damages sustained by any other sheep by reason of such scab or contagious disease; and the same may be collected as other claims for damages are collected; provided, that no damage shall be claimed after twelve months have elapsed from the time the cause of action has accrued.

Sec. 15. Any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sec. 16. All acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of the foregoing sections are hereby repealed.

SALT LAKE COPPER WORKS.

A number of City Councilors went out to the copper plant on Monday, at the invitation of Mr. Simon Bamberger, and inspected the buildings in process of erection there. All of the councilors were not present on this occasion, some of them having paid a visit previously for the same purpose. Arriving at the place, the party was met by Mr. Otto Stahlmann, who is personally superintending the work of construction.

Mr. Stahlmann first conducted the visitors to the ore bins, where several train loads of ore have been dumped already, preparatory to the copper plant starting up five weeks hence. A large proportion of this ore is from the Copperopolis mine at Tintic, from which shipments are being steadily made. The ore has samples showing as high as 50 per cent copper, but the average is seven per cent copper, and one and a half ounces of gold and seven ounces of silver to the ton. Much of this ore has been practically valueless under the process for working now in vogue, and vast quantities of it can be obtained and will be of great value. At the copper plant ore carrying eight per cent copper, without the precious metals, can be made to pay for working.

From the ore bins an electric railway is to be constructed to the crusher, where an elevator will raise the train of cars up to the level on which the crushing, converter and delivery floors are placed, and from there conducted to the proper departments. In the crusher the machinery is being put in position. Next is a furnace room where there are two blast and two reverberating furnaces, with a combined capacity of 400 tons of ore per day. One set of these furnaces is being placed in position, and on the first of June will begin operations. In three months the entire plant will be running. There are other buildings in course of erection for furnaces, etc., which will be prepared by that time.

In the next building are placed reverberatory and other furnaces, where the metal is brought from 50 per cent pure to 98 per cent pure, and is run out in plates, with the gold, silver and copper in combination, preparatory to the operations under the electrolytical process. The sulphur, arsenic, iron and other metals all have been burned out. This building also contains one of the most perfect steam engines ever brought to the West. It is of the latest pattern, 300-horse power, triple expansion, marine type. This engine will start up when work first begins at the plant.

The largest building on the place is the electrolytical refinery, where, by the agency of electricity, the gold, silver and copper are separated. This building is 492 feet long and 204 feet wide, and is covered with an iron double roof. In its walls there are used 1,100,000 brick—350,000 more than in the great smokestack which has been erected near by. The electrolytical building has in it the great 1,000-horse power engine which took first prize at the World's Fair, and which was in operation there in connection with the Westinghouse exhibit. The belt wheel connected with it is 29 feet in diameter, the belt to be used being five feet eight inches wide and an inch and a half thick. In the electrolytical building there will be 400 tanks, and it will have a capacity of 40 tons of refined copper per day exclusive of the gold and silver product. The copper is deposited on sheets of white paper, and when in plates about half an inch thick it is removed for the new deposit. Seventeen days are consumed in precipitating the copper before any is removed. Of the 40 tons to be produced, 15 tons are to be from the smelter at Durango. The copper plant people can ship from Durango via Salt Lake, refine here, and forward the product to the Eastern market 60 cents a ton cheaper than the way it is done now.

Of the ore which the refinery can work on, Mr. Stahlmann says that at the Copper Mountain in Box Elder the company has in sight enough ore ranging from 15 to 20 per cent to keep the plant going six years. There is no gold or silver in this ore, so there will be steady purchase of that containing these precious metals. Silicious ores will be in great demand at the works, as furnaces have to be lined with silica, and ores of this class serve the purpose. Lead ores are not desirable.

LOCAL FORESTRY ASSOCIATION.

If the Utah Forestry Association is going to accomplish the work which it was organized to accomplish, a considerable number of local organizations must be formed this summer, and some good, earnest work must be done. One of the first investigations should be to determine how much timber is around the head waters of the principal streams. Every effort should be made to have an abundant timber supply in these places, and before intelligent steps can be taken to preserve even what is now left, it is necessary to know its exact condition.

Below is presented an outline for the constitution and by-laws of a local society. The outline was prepared by Mr. J. M. Romney, a member of the Utah Forestry Association. It is believed that with slight modifications it will answer the needs of local societies in any part of Utah.

U. A. WHITING,
Sec. U. F. A.

1. The name of this organization shall be the———

2. Its object shall be to study and promote the forestry interests of our special neighborhood, and to aid in the broader efforts of the Utah Forestry Association.

3. The signing of these articles and the payment of all regularly assessed dues shall be the full requirements for membership.

4. The officers shall be a president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer, to serve for the term of one year, and until their successors are duly elected.

5. The officers shall perform such duties as regularly pertain to their respective offices.

6. The president shall have power to appoint committees of one or more members to investigate any special question that may arise within the general purpose of this organization, such as determining present forest areas, securing forest reservations around the headwaters of streams, the trees best adapted to particular localities, the influence of tree culture on bird and insect life, etc., etc.

7. The reports of special investigations may form a part of the business at regular meetings of the organization.

8. All valuable information shall be forwarded by the secretary to the Utah Forestry Association for more general distribution.

9. The organization shall meet regularly on———. It shall be the purpose to make these meetings of interest and profit.

10. An initiation fee of——— and an annual fee of——— shall be assessed against each member to be used strictly in payment of the incidental expenses of the organization.

11. This constitution may be amended by a two-thirds majority of the members present at any regular meeting, provided notice of the proposed change shall have been given at the next preceding meeting.

INTERVIEW WITH A MORMON.

The Quincy, Illinois, Journal has an article on the recent visit of Sheriff G. R. Belnap, of Ogden, to Carthage, Quincy and other points in the East. After reciting the particulars of the sheriff's trip into Kansas for a prisoner wanted at Ogden for larceny, the Journal says:

'The sheriff's father, Gilbert Belnap, is a Latter-day Saint, who came from Toronto, Canada, to Nauvoo, whence he went to Nebraska, and thence, in 1851, to Ogden.

Probably because of his father's religious connections, the son, who did not say whether or not he shares those views, concluded that while in this part of the country he would run up to Carthage, Hancock county, to see the old jail, etc. He went up there early yesterday morning, returned yesterday evening and left early this morning for Leavenworth.

His visit to the old historical jail evidently left a deep impression on his mind and he gave a graphic description of it and of the tragic death of Joseph Smith the Prophet and others.

The jail, which is built of rock and contains seven rooms, is now the residence of Attorney Jas. M. Browning, who has built a handsome frame addition.

The story of the murder, as told to

Sheriff Belnap, contains some details that may be new to some of our readers:

There were four men in the room when the attack was made, namely, Joseph Smith, the Prophet; Hyrum, his brother; John Taylor and Willard Richards. Hyrum was killed by a bullet that was fired through the closed door. As the attacking party pushed the door in, Joseph Smith was behind the door and thus he was not seen for the time being. Taylor was shot four times. The Prophet ran to a window and jumped out. He was shot before he reached the ground.

After he fell his body was set up against the wall and a man ran up with a knife to cut off Smith's head. "Just then," adds Mr. Belnap, "came that strange light that stunned everybody, including the man with the knife."

The well is within the frame addition built by Mr. Browning, and the latter has carefully preserved all of the landmarks and also beautified the space by making grass plate, etc.

Mr. Belnap met Mr. Thos. E. Sharpe, one of the oldest settlers in Carthage, and who, Sheriff Belnap has been told, gave the signal for the attack on the jail. Mr. Belnap added that he could not say whether or not that statement was true.

He should have liked to ask Mr. Sharpe about the matter, but the old man is 76 years of age and has been partially paralyzed in his speaking powers for some four years, and the sheriff would not speak of the matter to him.

Asked whether there is any attempt to practice polygamy in Utah, Sheriff Belnap answered with a vigorous "no, sir." He added that after the construction of the Edmunds law by the Supreme Court, the Mormons accepted the law in good faith.

"The people of Utah," added the sheriff, "understand that quite well. The false reports sent out by office-seeking carpet baggers may fool you eastern people, but we know that the reports are false. Some of these false reports are so ridiculously absurd that it is a wonder that any fair-minded person of average intelligence and education could credit them—but many do. No matter how stupidly foolish a 'book' may be, if it puts a Mormon in the position of violating law, the 'book' is greedily devoured by many people in the East.

"The truth is that the Mormons are attending to their own business, making honest livings, obeying the law and there is not a particle of evidence of the scandalous and unjust misrepresentations."

After a statement of the union that characterized the plural families with which the sheriff was acquainted and the information that they were provided for by the persons who should do so, the interview proceeded:

Questioned as to the Mormon method of educating their children, the number of Mormon churches in Ogden, etc., the sheriff explained:

The Mormon children attend the public schools. Some of the youth attend Mormon academies. In Ogden, which has a population of about 20,000, the Mormons have a tabernacle, in which all meet on Sunday; and each of the five wards has a meeting house.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

LAMONI, Iowa, April 16.—Today's session of the Reorganized Church of Latter-day Saints was well attended, as everybody expected a special revelation in answer to yesterday's fasting.

After routine business was finished a lengthy printed document was put into possession of the several quorums, who retired to examine and pass upon it. It was a revelation, and gave directions designed to set in order and correct certain errors in church government and misunderstandings of jurisdiction and rulings. The leading feature was the defining of duties, powers and privileges of the high council. This high council of the church is a body composed of twelve high priests, chosen from among the priesthood and set apart to this calling by ordination, by direction of a high council or general conference, and presided over by the president of the church.

FRESNO, Cal., April 16.—Ed Morrell, partner of the bandit Chris Evans, was sentenced today by Judge Harris to life imprisonment at Folsom for robbery.

BRIDGEPORT, Conn., April 16.—Twenty years ago Hillman Stillings got an idea into his head that Christ was to visit the earth again and when He came he (Stillings) was to be the right hand man. At that time he left his friends, climbed to the top of Mount Ararat, one of the tallest peaks in the state, and took up his abode in a rude cabin. Ever since he has lived there. In all that time neither his hair nor beard has been cut, and now he is one of the queerest looking personages one can imagine. Last night he announced that Christ had visited the earth and commanded him to lead a host to Washington and join the army of the commonwealth. He has gained great influence over the unemployed in this city and it is announced that he will shortly start out with a large following of woodchoppers and others.

FORT SCOTT, Kan., April 16.—Expert investigation of the books of City Treasurer Mrs. E. R. Pulliam, the only female treasurer in the states, makes it appear that she is $1,800 short in her accounts. It is not thought that she has been dishonest but that the shortage is due to some one having obtained money by illegal means.

MONTREAL, April 17.—The ceiling of Riverside school in Point St. Charles collapsed today. Three children were crushed to death and several injured.

WASHINGTON, April 17.—The House today has by an overwhelming vote decided to adopt a quorum counting rule, which, for all practical purposes, is the same as that which Speaker Reed of Maine inaugurated during the Fifty-fifth Congress. It won for him a world-wide reputation. Neither excitement or tumultuous scenes marked the crushing of the old legislative barriers.

Reed and the Republicans generally are in a happy humor over the victory they had achieved. Those who expected Reed would ridicule and jibe his political adversaries with their inconsistencies were disappointed.

OMAHA, Neb., April 18.—Kelly's

army is still at the old Chautauqua grounds east of Council Bluffs, and the situation is dangerous. The men are wet to the skin and chilled to the bone, and the Iowa militia men still surround them with fixed bayonets and keep them from the shelter of the buildings. There are rumblings in the ranks of the commonwealers, but the discipline has been thoroughly maintained thus far by the officers. There was enough food for breakfast today, and that fact perhaps prevented an outbreak, but something must happen soon to relieve the tension, or violence is sure to follow.

NEW YORK, April 18.—The assignment of Samuel L. Clemens, better known as Mark Twain, and his partner, Frank L. Hall, who compose the firm of book publishers, was filed today in the county clerk's office. The assignee is Bainbridge Colby. The assignment was without preferences, and is signed by Mrs. Clemens.

OMAHA, April 19.—Kelly's army of industrials, wet, bedraggled and chilled to the bone, broke camp, started from Council Bluffs, Chautauqua grounds, east. During the night the ranks began to swell with the arrival from Nevada of sixty-five men under Captain M. Gorman, and today further acquisitions were made, when Captain Morgan with two companies of commonwealers, 500 strong, reached camp from the west by way of the Union Pacific. The objective point of today's march is Weston, fifteen miles east of Council Bluffs. It is believed that a train will be secured at Weston to carry the army to Chicago.

NEW YORK, April 19.—George Gould and his brother Howard have bought Vigilant for $25,000.

COLUMBIA, S. C., April 19.—The Tillman state dispensary liquor law has been declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of South Carolina, two justices concurring and one (Tillmanite) a member of the supreme bench, dissenting from the opinion.

CASPER, Wyo., April 19.—Wilbur C. Knight, state geologist, has made a thorough test of numerous samples of oil from central Wyoming. Of its quality he says: "It is a splendid lubricating oil and stands a finer test than that borne by any other oil in the world."

OMAHA, April 20.—General Kelly is all that the good words hitherto said of him conveyed and more. He displayed the rarest judgment and fortitude tonight, when he declined to put his men on board a train stolen at Council Bluffs by the engineers and firemen of the Union Pacific. It was a Union Pacific engine, with Union Pacific cars, on the Rock Island track. Kelly declined it, because he had not yet broken any law and did not intend to start in here.

HAGERSTOWN, Md., April 20.—The march of the commonweal over from Williamsport, was made under favorable circumstances.

At the toll gate, a mile outside of Hagerstown, there was a delay, the old white-haired gate-keeper refusing to let the army pass without paying tolls on the horses.

Browne declared this was another extortion of monopolists, and ordered forward the flag. The old gateman respectfully doffed his hat to the stars and stripes, but shut down the bars on the horsemen and carriages. The army was forced to pay 82 cents toll.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 20.—Representative Davis, (Populist,) of Kansas, has introduced in the House a long bill reciting the woes of the unemployed and directing the secretary the secretary of war to immediately enlist 500,000 in an industrial volunteer army to serve for the period of one year after enlistment. The army is to be clothed and fed as regular soldiers. They are to be employed on public works, such as canals, rivers and harbors, public highways, etc.

To defray the expenses of this army the secretary of the treasury is to issue $50,000,000 of legal tender notes and certificates and other forms of currency.

CHEYENNE, Wyo., April 20.—Hon. E. S. Morgan, ex-secretary and acting governor of the territory of Wyoming, died at his home in this city at 9 o'clock this morning. The deceased served as a member of the legislative assembly of Pennsylvania for two terms, in 1878 and 1875. He was appointed secretary of the territory of Wyoming by President Garfield in May, 1880, and served in that capacity until the death of Governor Hale, 1884, when he became acting governor. Francis E. Warren was appointed governor to succeed him by President Harrison in 1885. The remains will be taken to the former home of the family, at Newcastle, Pennsylvania, for burial. A wife and three grown children survive him.

MAPIMI, Mex., April 20.—The reported discovery of a wonderful, deserted city in a remote section of the Sierra Madre mountains in Durango, has been verified by Maurice Lentow and a party of explorers. They found the secret entrance to the city and made exhaustive explorations. They returned laden with curiosities from the abandoned residences and temples. The population of the city could not have been less than 25,000.

WELLINGTON, N. Z., April 20.—The cabinet has decided to suggest that Great Britain and New Zealand annex Samoa, as was proposed by King Malletoa some years ago, and establish a protectorate similar to that in Bartonga.

MARSEILLES, April 20.—Advice received here from Madagascar say that Ex-United States Consul Waller has secured a concession of the whole of the southern part of the island, in spite of repeated protests of the French residents. They say all nationalities in the India rubber trade claim their vested rights have been injured by this concession.

OMAHA, April 20.—John Mason and J. J. Morgan, merchants of Harrison, attempted to settle a difference in a street battle with revolvers. Mason was shot in the abdomen and Morgan twice in the body, and once in the shoulder. Both are expected to die.

OMAHA, Neb., April 20.—Three thousand laboring men marched out of Omaha today with banners flying and bound for the camp of Kelly's commonweal at Weston, Iowa, fourteen miles east of Council Bluffs. At 9 o'clock the signal agreed upon, ringing the church bells and blowing the whistles was given, announcing that Kelly's army was still at Weston unable to secure a train for the East. Inside of five minutes 1000 men assembled on Jefferson Square and quickly organized, and the march was taken up.

All the eastern railways have pulled the empty cars out of Council Bluffs to avoid trouble. Fully 2,000 more men have crossed the bridge to join the crowd that preceded them.

POMEROY, Ohio, April 21.—The miners of twenty-two mines in this district laid down their tools today. Five operators have signified their willingness to pay the price demanded by the men.

PHILLIPSBURG, Pa., April 21.—A number of men in this district went on strike at 12 o'clock today, to the number of 7,000. The Houtsdale and Oscala mines quit completely at 12 o'clock. There was no excitement, and no trouble is anticipated, unless the operators should undertake to start the mines, in which event the scene in the coke regions would be repeated here.

WESTON, Iowa, April 21.—Kelly's army had a court martial trial today. A Madison private tried to violate the rules of the industrial army by furnishing and smuggling liquor in camp and is alleged to have been spying on the men in the interest of the railroads. The charges were proven and he was dishonorably discharged and publicly drummed out of town.

ATHENS, April 21.—Later information shows that in some districts there has been great loss of life in addition to the destruction of property. The inhabitants are very much alarmed today at the fresh shocks, and it is feared the worst has not happened. The shocks today shook the northern wing of the palace in several places. A large stone fell out of the Gate of Adrian. The villages at Atlanta suffered terribly.

WASHINGTON, April 21.—The President today sent the following nominations: Justice Warren N. Dusenberry to be judge of probate in Utah county, Utah.

Navy—Assistant Engineer Solon Arnold to be post assistant engineer.

MONTEREY, Cal., April 22.—The Pacific Coast Steamship company's steamer Los Angeles, bound north from Newport, Cal., and way ports to San Francisco, ran on the rocks at Point Sur lighthouse, thirty miles south of Monterey, between 9 and 10 o'clock last night. The steamer sank within a few minutes, and the passengers and crew took to the boats. As far as known four lives were lost. Three boat loads reached shore at Point Sur, and the first news of the disaster was brought here by a messenger today. Two other boat loads and a raft, containing other passengers and members of the crew, were met by the steamer Eureka this evening. The Eureka rescued them and brought them to Monterey.

ATHENS, April 22.—The earthquake shocks that began about 7:30 Friday night continued with more or less frequency until noon today.

In three villages, Malesina, Proskina and Martino, all in the province of Locria, 129 persons perished.

LONDON, April 23.—A dispatch to the Times from Athens says: The earthquake destroyed eight villages in the district of Atalanti. In this district alone forty-eight persons were killed and several hundred injured. The monasteries of St. Martines and Proskina were destroyed. The Pelrat Pelli was rent asunder and sunk below the waters of the harbor. Large boulders were detached from the mountain of Braganda and some of them fell upon shepherd houses that were clustered at the foot of the mountain. All the inmates of the houses were crushed to death. Huge chasms opened in the earth about Atalanti. Heavy shocks were felt throughout the Euboea Islands.

NEW YORK, April 23.—In the church of San Salvatore, the only Protestant Episcopal church for Italians in the city, the rector, Albert O. Pace, just as he was about to open Sunday evening service, was assaulted by two women, Mrs. Caravata and Mrs. Cesari. Mrs. Caravata advanced to the pulpit, and in an excited manner asked: "Is this the Catholic church?"

"This is the Catholic church; the Episcopal church, the church of Christ, not the American Catholic church," replied the rector.

At that both women attacked Mr. Pace, who forgot himself so far as to strike back, knocking most of Mrs. Caravata's teeth down her throat. The rector immediately apologized, had the two women ejected and proceeded with the services. Arrests will be made. The women say Mr. Pace baptized Mr. Cesari's children, telling them that he was a Catholic priest and the church a Catholic church. When they discovered the deception, they determined upon the assault.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., April 23.—The striking miners marched into town today, 5,000 strong, with bands. Speeches were made denouncing H. H. Debarleben, manager of the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad company. Governor Jones has established headquarters here and is in close communion with Sheriff Morrow and the officers of the Second regiment. The militia are at the armories, ready to advance on the strikers at a moment's notice. Seventy-five Ben Creek miners, wanted by the officers for intimidation, joined in the demonstration. The marching strikers are a mixed lot of whites and blacks. Trouble is expected hourly. Dozens of arrests are made at the mines for intimidation, and sixty new deputy sheriffs have been sworn in.

VICKSBURG, Miss., April 23.—Four negroes have already paid the penalty for the brutal assassination of Manager Boyce of the Baun plantation in Madison Parish on Saturday. One was shot on Sunday. During the night a mob gathered at the jail at Tallahue and forced open the door. Sam Slaughter, Tom Claxton and Dave Hawkins were led out and hanged to the ballustrade of the court house. Their bodies were hanging there this morning. Claxton and four pals are still in the swamp. The river and all avenues of escape are closely guarded and the ultimate capture of the five men is regarded as only a question of time. It seems certain they will be lynched.

HOTEL DEL CORONADO, Cal., April 23.—Jesse Selligman, of J. & S. Selligman, bankers, New York and London, died here of pneumonia and Bright's disease. He came here four days ago with his daughter.

NEW YORK, April 23.—The visible grain supply on April 21, compiled by the New York stock exchange is as follows: Wheat 52,425,000, increase 78,000; corn 14,546,000, decrease 145,000; oats 2,885,000, increase 11,000; rye 371,000, decrease 8,000; barley 300,000, decrease 230,000.

LONDON, April 23.—It is announced, as a result of the indignation created by the report of the sanitary institute regarding the conditions under which bread eaten by the people of this city is produced that the government has decided to appoint a select committee of the House of Commons to investigate. According to the report five-sixths of all bread consumed in London is produced in cellar bakeries, not more than six feet high, ten feet in length and twelve feet wide. Sewer gas enters through drains opening in the floor, while further pollution is caused by the ground air and the damp sucked up into the heated cellar through the flooring.

LISBON, April 23.—There are sixty-five fresh cases of cholera in this city.

UNIONTOWN, Pa., April 23.—The Oliver plant, near here, was the scene of disorder today. Sheriff Wilson and a posse arrested Michael Fitzko for a minor offense, when fifty women assembled and demanded his release. The officers warned the women not to interfere. The answer was a yell of defiance and then the whole crowd of women charged the sheriff, attacking him with every conceivable missile and weapon except firearms. Blood was flowing from a number of the men and they were forced to fight back.

COLUMBUS, O., April 23.—The latest reports received by President McBride of the United Mineworkers, show the suspension of work by 3,000 men in Alabama; 5,000 in Tennessee and Kentucky; 2,000 in West Virginia; 5,000 in Indiana; 25,000 in Ohio; 25,000 in Illinois; 1,300 in Iowa; 2,000 in Indian Territory; 1,300 in Missouri; 50,000 in Pennsylvania, and 300 in Michigan; a total of 122,000.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., April 23.—J. A. Crawford, state president of the United Mine Workers of America, today received reports from the state at large, showing that 24,000 miners are now on a strike, out of about $33,600 in Illinois.

CHICAGO, April 23.—J. H. Randall has been chosen general of the Chicago division of the commonwealth army. Kelly has been abandoned and the Chicago army will begin its march some day this week. Randall stated that there were 700 recruits enlisted already and that the number would be increased to 1,000 before Thursday.

Grand Master Workman Sovereign has entered heart and soul into the movement, but has no intention of participating in the march personally.

AVOCA, April 23.—Kelly's reception here tonight was fully as flattering as that accorded him at Neola. The 2,500 inhabitants were apparently all on the streets, and the brawny-armed countrymen and buxom maidens vied with each other in doing them honor.

Company "C" which had been disbanded at Neola, rejoined the army during the afternoon and after an abject personal apology from each member, Kelly mustered them back into the service.

Tonight Kelly consented to outline to the Associated Press representative his plans for the end of the journey. Should his army be refused approach to the Capitol, he will, upon his arrival in Washington, take four of his men and make a personal appeal to Congressman Pence, of Colorado; McGuire, of California, and Senator Allen, of Nebraska. Through their efforts he hopes to be allowed to draw up his men in line where the law makers of the nation may see them.

ANDERSON, Ind., April 24.—An ordinance was passed at a special meeting of the council requiring all tramps found in the city limits to be vaccinated. About fifty were corraled last night and subjected to the requirements.

GRAND RAPIDS, Mich., April 24.—The mystery of the McKendrick murder which occurred January 17th is solved by the confession of Henry Prame, who was arrested near Libertyville, Ill., where he was working on a farm. Prame was brought here Saturday night and kept concealed until last evening when he was arraigned in court and pleaded guilty and gave all the particulars of the crime, telling how he and Charles Macard bound and gagged the old lady, took $800 from her bosom and left her to die of suffocation. Prame says he was led into the crime by Macard, whom he met in Chicago a month before the murder. Macard was arrested in San Francisco some time ago and is undergoing examination here, protesting his innocence.

YANKTON, S. D., April 24.—Sister Florentine, a member of the Order of St. Benedictine and one of a Colony of Sisters of Mercy, who conduct a Catholic convent, in this city, was before a justice on a charge of assault and battery yesterday. She admitted having whipped a little girl who was a student at the convent and the child's body showed marks of a most cruel beating. The affair has caused intense excitement and the city authorities will probably make a thorough investigation of the convents and the methods and practices in vogue there.

WALNUT, Iowa, April 24.—Kelly's industrial army reached here at noon today, and after a hearty luncheon started to Atlantic, where they are due tonight.

At Avoca the populace turned out en masse to bid the commonwealers good-bye. The wagons that brought the men from Neola were returned last night, and today sixty-three fresh teams, furnished by the farmers in the adjacent county, were driven into camp at Avoca and loaded with commonwealers. The vehicles could hold only about half the men, and every five miles shifts were made. As the army came down the steep hill into Walnut, it was received with the same cordial welcome which has characterized the receptions since it left Council Bluffs. The town officials bid Kelly welcome, and the townspeople furnished plenty of provisions. The stop here was brief, and the army was soon on its way for Atlantic, twenty miles from Avoca. The farmers greeted the men with words of encouragement, and now and then a well filled provision wagon wheeled into line amid grateful cheers. A carload of provisions from Omaha was promised.

WALNUT, Iowa, April 24.—Soon after Kelly's army left Walnut today at least a hundred men left the ranks and started across the country. The army left Walnut 1,118 strong, but it is apparent Kelly will be fortunate if he reaches Des Moines with 1,000 men. Seven men arrested in Avoca last night for disorderly conduct were released today. Sheriff Hszen, of Council Bluffs, is following the army with three deputies. Pinkerton men are also on the trail and it is expected wholesale arrests will be made at Des Moines. On the march today Kelly was hailed by a corps of men who asked him to allow them to take a train. "We can do it, and we will do it, general, if you will let us," said the spokesman. Kelly told the men it would ruin the cause of the unemployed if they took such action. There was much adverse comment and Kelly is evidently alarmed.

SACRAMENTO, Cal., April 24.—The city trustees have appointed a committee to see what can be done towards getting the 800 commonwealers stranded here out of the city. Citizens have been providing them well with food and the leader, Col. Inman, now has nearly $200 in cash. Employed mechanics have called a public meeting for tonight to consider the matter of raising enough money to pay the army's fare to Ogden.

ST. PAUL, Minn., April 24.—The Coxeyites at Butte broke into the Northern Pacific round house tonight, seized an engine and train and started east at forty miles an hour.

There are between 400 and 500 men in this army.

They have been camped at Rutte, Montana, several days while the leaders were trying to arrange for transportation. The men concluded that if they wanted a train they must take it. At midnight they reached Bozeman, where they stopped for the break of the day, intending to resume their journey at once. The Northern Pacific officials say there is nothing to stop them until near Livingston, where a single wash-out will cause some delay.

NEW YORK, April 24.—In the court of common pleas today, in the presence of Judge Buschoff, Michael Donnelly, an iron merchant, fired three shots at P. J. McArdle. McArdle was unhurt. Donnelly was plaintiff in a case against McArdle, arising over some partnership account.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., April 24.—Major J. L. Ratbone, ex-consul general to Paris, has received a check for $100,000 for his copper mine in Mexico. The mine is at Tepic, state of Agua Caliente, Mexico, and was purchased by M. Goughenhelm and sons, owners of the great lead and smelting works at Monte Rey, Mexico, and Pueblo, Colorado. They are going into copper smelting as is done at the great Anaconda mines. Goughenhelm and sons intend to invest $1,000,000 in the scheme.

WASHINGTON, April 24.—Consul General Mason at Frankfurt in a report to the state department suggests that our fruit preservers try fruit sugar, made from beet sugar. It is a limpid, white syrup of great density, containing from 70 to 76 per cent sugar, possessing a rich, fruity flavor and capacity to remain fluid and free from granulation for an indefinite period. It has the power, to assimilate, develop and preserve the natural flavor of fruit. It is sold at 8½ cents per pound and the consul general says any trustworthy American firm can, by addressing his consulate, obtain free of charge, except for transportation, 100 pounds as a sample.

PARIS, April 24.—A telegram from Congo says Lieutenant Holpair, at the head of a detachment of state troops, has captured Cadambare, between Lake Tanganyika and Manyema.

CHEYENNE, Wyo., April 24.—The annual meeting of the Wyoming & Utah railroad company, will be held at Aloova Hot Springs, Natrona county, May 1st. Chief Engineer Rogers states that a thorough re-organization is contemplated, and the stockholders feel confident that the company will be able to do some construction work this season.

WASHINGTON, April 24.—Frank Hatton, proprietor of the Washington Post, was stricken with total paralysis this afternoon at his desk. The attack is very serious.

LIBON, April 24.—During the twenty-four hours ended yesterday, there were 104 cases and three deaths from cholera here. The Portuguese government has stopped the telegraphic messages.

EVANSTON, Wyo., April 24.—Ranchmen in the western part of Uintah county complain of the depredations of Utah sheep. They are trampling down the meadows and eating every vestige of grass in the whole country. It is said that there are over 15,000 head between this city and Muddy creek.

LONDON, April 24.—The proposed solution of the Samoan question is causing much discussion here. It is stated that Great Britain will not be loath in bringing the islands under the control of New Zealand, if the United States and Germany be induced to assent.

W. B. Percival, general agent in London of New Zealand, visited the colonial office today and urged a modification of the treaty of 1889 in accordance with the desire of New Zealand. Mr. Percival represented that such arrangement would naturally give a great stimulus to trade. New Zealand considers the present unsatisfactory proposition an opportune occasion for convening another conference. Much stress is laid upon the fact that the German residents of Samoa would welcome a modification of the existing arrangement.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., April 24.—Ex-Confederates are holding a reunion here today. Business houses are decorated with the colors of the Confederacy and Union, and pictures of the great Southern generals hang from the windows of public buildings and private residences.

CONNELLSVILLE, Pa., April 24.—The predictions of the labor leaders that the entire region would be out in a day or two is being fulfilled. The men at a dozen works laid down their tools today, while at many other plants part of the men went out, and others will follow tomorrow. They claim that the whole region will be out in a day or two. No violence has occurred yet.

Written for this Paper
IT IS NOT TRUE?

Every live merchant knows just what his goods cost laid down, and this includes the invoice price, package, cartage, freight, delivery, opening, and sometimes waste. Whatever of discounts or drawbacks there may be, he is familiar with that, and if there is advantage in large lots or carloads, he wants that also, if push will get it. He must be able to discriminate as to quality, must know of adulterations—permissible or otherwise; must realize that some goods shrink materially in weight, they dry out; and that others are not put up full measure, if he is to divide and still secure a profit. Then before he can claim any proceeds personally, he must take into account unavoidable expenses. There is rent, taxes, helps, team perhaps, and interest on investment if this is borrowed. If he gives credit there is possibility of loss; there are risks of several kinds which have to be provided for, and the goods sold must bear the burthen. Of course if a man gives all his time, if he calls into service any member of his family, each should be remunerated. Competition of those in a similar business must be taken into account as well, hence a given percent of profits to cover this array of expense may not be always possible. Whichever way the question is looked at, there are required many ingredients ere a man can say that business is a success. Rules which are inexorable must be obeyed, for idleness and ignorance, as well as inattention and lack of forethought or economy, are alike fatal to trade pursuits.

It used to be said that "Goods well bought are half sold;" yet only a few are good buyers. By this is not meant a close one, as might be inferred, for he is rarely a good one. The first implies much more than the squeezing of a dime or running all over creation to save a nickel. It means judgment, decision, knowledge of many things. No such man is captivated by the wiles of a specious drummer. He knows his own business and is only dictated, if at all, by one of much larger experience.

Need it be wondered at that so very few comparatively continue a successful business career? Can there be surprise that few have the qualifications which constitute a business man? And is it not remarkable that so many seek a livelihood by business without training or even respectable trade proclivities? Whether experiment only secures "the survival of the fittest" let the annals of commercial life tell their story. It is said by them that not more than one-third of all who so engage continue. Failure is written almost universally upon this method of life. And yet its fascination is as great as ever, and most persons have the idea that living by trade is "as easy as falling off a log."

The humblest mechanic, nay even the day laborer, may be more certain of his income, can more readily square his outlay to his resources. He carries far less risk, and bad debts are a rarity at the worst. The carpenter takes an ordinary job; his charges are so much per hour. The man who soles your shoes calculates cost of material and the time spent. Factory hands, foundry men, either work this way or by the job, and every day they know what they have earned, and every few days at most they get it! The manufacturer, while he may be a man of enterprise, is never so sure of results. The woolen mill calls for a heavy first investment, upon which there is interest fairly due. He must secure the raw material in advance, which means interest also. Dye stuffs, coal and incidentals eat into his capital. The man or woman at the spinning or the loom, has no investment or resource save in busy fingers and years of practice and experience; their duty is to work, and to them work is the synonym for pay. But the fabrics they have created have to be in advance of demand. Winter goods must be on the market in early summer, summer goods before the winter is half spent. There is the risk of selling, of change in public taste, of competition, waiting for this market; interest is continually accumulating, and loss is far from infrequent. The laborer knows nothing of this. He is without anxiety. His work is ready for him on Monday morning; it is secured for him until Saturday night. No time has been lost in hunting for it. He has not come home discouraged and weary, to an empty cupboard and hungry children. In consideration of this provision on the part of capital, which includes investment in buildings, machinery, raw material, and industrial effort, it says each soul employed must, or should, contribute a portion or a per cent of what they really earn as a recompense to the investor.

Now, where large numbers of men and women are thus supplied with machinery, material, and an opportunity of subsistence by labor, a slight premium from numbers added to legitimate interest may make a fine income to the proprietor. But demagogues and labor agitators have denounced even this, and made the contrast between the condition of the laborer and the employer, which was at least unfair if not ungenerous; for more than the amount transferred by the laborer could have been lost every week in the search for uncertain opportunity of employment. To meet in compromise such objections, profit-sharing was introduced, which did well in prosperous times, when there was ready demand for that which was manufactured; but in times of depression, when goods were unsold and the mills idle, and capital became non-producing, the owners thereof had to bear the entire burthen. Loss-sharing—equally just, was as distasteful as impossible to the laborer, although the results of that labor was piled up in warehouses around the globe and suffering continuous depreciation. And so it is likely this controversy will be continued until capital unused exhausts itself, and labor begs for bread.

There will come as a consequence in part a drift toward agriculture, with its assurance of living if not of accumulation, and those who engage therein will learn to be as orderly, as systematic, as well-informed, as is the producer of cotton-cloth, carpets, iron, sugar and the multifarious products of creative industry; as well as to those who are engaged in the distributive field, such as merchants, dealers and middlemen of every name and nature. For it is quite as essential from a business standpoint that the farmer should know what his products or goods cost, as it is that the grocer, the maker of crockery, the producer of iron or sugar should know what his product costs; and he should know whether in the marketing thereof he secures a legitimate profit, or suffers a small or greater loss. Those men are few who engage in any enterprise from pure philanthropy. Every one almost asks as an individual and even in a corporate capacity—will the enterprise pay? Is it a good permanent investment? Or is it purely speculative and transient at best? All business men and organizations make continuous or periodical inquiry into their affairs. They make a balance sheet; they know their profit or loss; they declare a dividend or have to retrench; and so important is this that it may be deemed universal.

But how is it among our farmers? Where is the man who can tell what any of his products cost? His wheat per bushel, his potatoes, his calf, or the poultry, eggs and butter as manipulated by the aiding wife? Should not a man in this important, nay fundamental, branch of business know as well as the factory owner, the maker of harness, the creator of brooms? Should he not take account of the hours spent in the raising of wheat, tomatoes, beets, as does the carpenter or the man who soles your shoes, or makes your stovepipe, or digs your garden? Should not the farmer estimate his capital invested in land, in water, in implements, in hired help, in personal labor or supervision? Should he sell at random? Should he and his neighbors compete with each other, or allow dealers—buyers, to put their price upon his produce any more than the producer of cloth or garments, or the gigantic dealer in hog products from ham to lard? Is it fair that the merchant should make the price of wheat and the goods given in exchange for it? That the price of butter and of sugar should be in one man's hands? Or should the farmers organize, as do men in all other industrial directions, to keep up the price of their products to a living and profitable point, as is done with sugar, coal oil and every other manufacture?

To do this successfully the cost of each thing should be closely estimated, production, marketing, waste or shrinkage, as closely as is done by the grocer or the dealer in barbed wire and implements he uses. Such a business supervision would keep the farmer from being swamped by unnecessary machinery, by corroding debt. Every move would be business-like and intelligent; and so the fundamental industry of society, being placed upon a sure foundation, the superstructure would be more stable and enduring, and general prosperity become better assured than it is at present!

UTAH'S INDUSTRIAL ARMY.

FROM DAILY OF APRIL 18.

A new "general" will very probably be manufactured in this city by the unemployed, for the purpose of leading the Utah contingent of the industrial army out of the wilderness for better or worse. The man who is figuring on getting the job is H. E. Carter. At a meeting held in the Galena block, the idea crystallized into reality. The "general" figuratively pocketed his commission and "industrial soldiers" were at once mustered in. At noon today nearly 200 were enlisted.

But the movement has a serious aspect and Governor West's alertness, in preventing any increase to this city's distress from the Ogden transients, may be offset by foisting several hundreds of idle men, at present sojourning all over the Territory, on the people of this city. A call has been sent out for a great convention of the unemployed of Utah to be held in Walker's Pavilion, next Saturday at 2 p. m.

The question is: What is to be done with several hundred of such visitors if they come?

The "officers" of the new "industrial" concern state that they intend to muster them in, and that the army will reach an enrollment of fully 1,000 men. This will not feed and shelter them while they are here, however, and unless some provision is made for their care and reception beforehand there is likely to be trouble.

The secretary states that the business men of the city are generally in favor of the movement to rid the city of the idle host and proffer monetary assistance. To rid the whole Territory of them (those chiefly are meant who are transients and have no families here) would be productive of wider satisfaction, but it is a big undertaking and requires prompt and organized action.

FROM DAILY OF APRIL 19.

At the organization of Utah's contingent of the industrial army last evening, "General" Carter stated that he was a "worker," had worked up to a few years ago ever since he had been able to earn 25 cents a day, but since then he had been practicing law in the East, and was now a professor of religion. He told the men that they might find a great many men with more judgment and sense than he had to lead them, but he would accept the job of "general," and lead them through to success.

After the roll was called and twenty-four men responded, out of several hundred enrolled, and formed a company for drill—who by-the-by, made an excellent awkward squad—the "General" told the crowd that they needn't be afraid to enlist, as the army had been promised provisions and money by several leading business men of the town, and Mr. Fred Simon, he said, had informed him that the men would be provided with boots and shoes and clothes, and everything they required. He also guaranteed that transportation would be furnished for every one who wished to join.

FROM DAILY OF APRIL 21.

The "war correspondent" of the News paid a visit of inspection to the camp of the industrial army, at the Agricultural park, this morning. "Not a drum was heard," nor a bugle note, and sentries and pickets were conspicuous by their absence. The motley garrison gathered together within the bounds of barbed wire fences and muddy streams, is an inviting nucleus around which the transient fraternity of unemployed will flock like bugs around an electric light.

About noon today, the liberally ventilated barracks, the old ice house used by the men, presented a lively appearance. Three great iron pails sat upon a blazing fire of wood, in which beef, onions and potatoes were boiling for dinner. All around the walls of the spacious shack, coats and hats were hung on nails, and several tin cups relieved the wooden monotony. Near the glowing camp fire, a corporal of the guard, that is to be, was busy chopping wood, and every now and then some high private hauled in his contribution to the meagre wood pile. Coal was nowhere to be seen. At the north outlet to the building one of the men was being subjected to a tonsorial operation; another close by was being relieved of a large amount of wig, while at the western door a young fellow was stretched out in lazy Turkish fashion on a brilliant crazy quilt, lathered with soap, and getting his weekly shave. In every corner and all around the building piles of straw were strewn, and forty-seven men were laying idly by, smoking, chewing and sleeping, while others talked and laughed and joked. About twenty of companies D and E, went over to the race track, and indulged in games of baseball; and all along the ditch contiguous to the camp some were having their dust-soiled faces, washing their shirts, and catching fish. "Suckers" were not so plentiful as were caught up town, they said, but it was just as good for them, as long as they were caught somewhere.

The cook is a prominent man, and very popular. The great love the men expressed for him has caused him to paint on the wall the following notice:

"NO ADMITTANCE TO THE KITCHEN."

The kitchen is situated in the middle of the building, and is only separated from the whole by an imaginary line around the fire. Along the wall on the eastern side, a bench is nailed, upon which onions, bread, flour, salt, sugar and other eatables are placed. Coal oil cans are filled with potatoes Lyonnaise, and barring the absence of turkey and mince pie the improvised army appear to be amply provided for. They need coal, however, and some beef; but it is stated that two sides of a tender cow will be sent down to the camp tonight.

At breakfast this morning, about forty-five men were each given a pint and a half of Irish stew, one pint of coffee and one-third of a loaf of bread. There were forty pounds of beef left over for dinner, and enough bread and potatoes too.

As soon as lunch was served, all the men formed into line and started up town for the grand convention of miserables, which was begun at 2 o'clock this afternoon in Walker's pavilion.

A new company was formed this morning at the race track, to be known as "Company E," and from now on, until the departure, the drills will take place in the field south of the barracks at the Agricultural park.

There is nothing likely to happen to change the spirit of their dreams as long as organization and grub are maintained; but, as on the night before the memorable Waterloo Napoleon's hosts were startled and stunned by the rumble of the enemy's guns, so only will trouble be probable if the rumble of their stomach's emptiness is allowed to disturb their minds. The business men of this city who have been called to consider the probabilities and the providing of necessities are as follows:

James Gillespie, J. R. Morris, H. Bamberger, Prof. Metcalf, H. W. Lawrence, F. Simon, ex-Governor Thomas, M. H. Walker, C. P. Mason, W. E. Hubbard, C. E. Allen, M. J. Cheesman, W. P. O'Meara, E. P. Newell, T. G. Webber, B. F. Grant, P. W. Madsen and J. J. Daly. They will meet at Bamberger's office, 67 west, First South street, at 4:30 o'clock, immediately after the convention this afternoon.

WEBER STAKE CONFERENCE.

A conference of two days held in the Ogden tabernacle has just been brought to a close. More interesting and happy meetings have not convened in this Stake of Zion for a long time past. The conference opened at 10 o'clock on Monday morning, the 15th inst. By that hour the house was filled with Latter-day Saints from the several wards of the Stake, who had come together to be instructed more fully in the principles of the Gospel and to learn more of their duties and labors for the redemption of the living and the dead.

The visitors from Salt Lake on the occasion were Elders F. D. Richards, George Teasdale and Heber J. Grant, of the Council of the Apostles, also Elder H. W. Naisbitt. The presidency of the Stake, the High Council, Bishops and a large body of the Priesthood were present, and all on the qui vive for more light, more truth and a clearer understanding of the principles revealed at the April General Conference. A large number of those present at this Stake conference were unable to go to Salt Lake City and hear the rich outpourings of knowledge by the Spirit of God on the 6th inst.

After the opening exercises, Elder N. C. Flygare reported the condition of the Stake, which he said was very good. In fact he said he never knew it to be better than at the present time, especially considering the "hard times." The Stake presidency and the High Council have been during the past few months holding ward conferences in this city and many other wards in the county. Wherever they went the people came together and listened with eager attention to the counsel and advice that were given by the Elders. Peace prevailed among the Saints, harmony, union and love were increasing, and all the ward authorities were sustained by hearty, unanimous vote. The Presidency of the Stake and High Council were united and labored in concert to build up and promote the best interests of the Saints over whom they are called to preside.

The conference during the sessions was addressed by Elders Teasdale, Grant, Richards, Naisbitt and L. W. Shurtliff. The topics dwelt upon were the increased light given by the President and others on the law of adoption, the sealing of children to parents; the great work that has been done, that is now being done, and vast amount that is necessary yet to be done in the Temple of the Lord for the salvation of our ancestors and others of our kindred who have passed to the great beyond without having the privilege of hearing and embracing the Gospel for themselves. These instructions caused the hearts of the listeners to leap for joy, and eyes were filled with tears of gratitude for the opportunities now afforded them to become "saviors on Mount Zion" in the latter days.

Among other subjects were the apostacy from the Gospel of Christ as taught by the Savior and His apostles; the long night of darkness that has intervened between that time and the present—or until the Lord restored the fulness of the Gospel through the Prophet Joseph Smith; the gathering of Israel, the building up of Zion; the rearing of the Temples of God, one of which—that of Salt Lake—was traced in a graphic manner by the speaker, from the closing or designating the site, breaking the ground, excavating for the foundation, the blasting, quarrying and hauling the rock and collecting other material, the laying of the foundation, the various stages in the construction to its completion and dedication for the services of God; economy—the necessity of saving everything and not wasting anything; the establishing and fostering home industries; the Word of Wisdom, temperance in all things, living a sober, pure life; teaching children the law of God, and when they reach a proper age to be baptized for the remission of sins; to be truthful, upright in all our dealings with mankind; to be faithful to all the covenants they have made to keep the commandments of God, and to inculcate all the graces and virtues of the Gospel of Jesus Christ; to so live that they may always enjoy the light of the Holy Ghost to guide them through life and prepare them to enter into exaltation in the Kingdom of God. These subjects were dwelt upon with great fervor and earnestness by the speakers and were listened to with profound attention and pleasure by the audiences. They were seasons of joy that the Saints of this Stake wish repeated at short intervals.

Notwithstanding the stringency of the times our poor are administered to and their wants supplied as far as it is in the power of their co-religionists to do it.

A gloom of sadness was cast over the assembly this morning by the announcement by Elder Richards of the sudden, almost instant death, at the residence of Brother Richards, of Bishop Thomas Wallace. The Bishop was the guest of Elder Richards during the Conference, and last evening the family were engaged in social conversation on various subjects pertaining to the latter-day work of God, etc. All appeared to be cheerful and happy. About 9:15 p. m. Bishop Wallace, without the slightest premonition of his approaching demise, fell from his chair to the floor and expired. This was a sad shock to the family and the community. He was well known and much beloved.

GOLD MINING IN AUSTRALIA.

Sir.—One of the most remarkable industrial features of the last few months in Australia has been the revival of gold mining enterprise in the various colonies followed by discoveries which tend to show that the auriferous wealth of Australia is far from having become exhausted; that, on the contrary, it had merely been tapped, as illustrated by the phenomenal yields at Mount Morgan, in Queensland, and the rich discoveries at Coolgardie and other parts of Western Australia, indicating the existence of many hundred miles of gold bearing country in that colony. Australian geologists have again and again affirmed that there were districts in New South Wales and elsewhere which, if properly prospected, would be found as rich in the precious metal as any in the early days of gold discovery. And this is proving to be the case. In various parts of the colony hitherto neglected, gold has been found in encouraging quantities, and recently, at Wyalong, near Barmadman and Temora, in the southern part of the colony, the discoveries have been of such an extensive character that within a few days there was a population of nearly three thousand on the field, a township springing up, as if by magic, where, only three or four weeks previously there were not above a dozen residents in the whole district. At the time of writing nearly fifty claims had bottomed on gold, and fresh finds were continually being made. Other discoveries have been made elsewhere, and the abundance of the precious metal is significantly indicated by the fact that of the hundreds of unemployed sent out by the New South Wales government to fossick on the old, deserted gold fields or in known auriferous localities, very few have returned, while many are known to be doing well. There are in the colony several gold mines which have been profitably worked for years. The Mitchell's Creek mine, near Welling-ton, has for several years given regular employment to over a hundred men, and has paid fair dividends to the prospectors. Within a few miles of Orange, at Lucknow, is the richest and most important gold mine at present in full work in New South Wales. There are some 370 men at work on the several properties on the Wentworth gold field, all of whom are paid the regular rate of wages, except those who go in for contract work and who as a rule earn more than the average rate of pay. On the different mines on this field the amount of £3,500 is paid monthly for labor, explosives, candles, tools, coal, wood, material, etc. Several gold mines are also paying well in the Cobarr district, and yielding regular dividends. Among these are the Occidental, the Billagoe, Mount Drysdale, and others. But there is no need to multiply these instances of the abundance of the precious metal in New South Wales, although it may be mentioned that the quantity produced in 1892 was 156,870 ounces, valued at £569,178, making the total quantity since the date of gold discovery in 1851, 10,557,304 ounces, of the value of £39,202,666. With an increase of capital for the working of sound, not mere speculative enterprises, the rate of gold production will become largely increased, especially if the use of efficient gold saving appliances is introduced, for in the heaps of wash-dirt or "tailings," found on every gold field, are many thousand ounces of gold in the form of minute specks, the extraction of which necessitates the possession of more patience and perseverance than the ordinary gold miner is blessed with. No wonder that the colonists are sanguine respecting their future, for rich as they are in gold, they are even richer in the possession of nearly all the other known metals, both precious and useful, and, with natural eagerness, look forward to the day when their vast mineral resources will not only become more largely developed, but also utilized in the establishment of colonial manufacturing industries.

Yours, etc., JOHN PLUMMER.

The following appears in the Tooele letter of the Mercur Mercury: Mrs. Mary Pfeister, an old lady who, since the death of her husband five years ago, has lived alone, was found dead on the street Monday morning, having died of hemorrhage. Her bank book showed a balance of $600, $150 was found secreted in various parts of the house, and it is supposed that there is $1,000 more somewhere. Amiel Fellows, of Lake Point, will probably be appointed administrator.

A sad case of insanity has been brought to the attention of the lunacy commissioners at San Francisco, and Edwin Hahn is consigned to the insane asylum at Ukiah. The young man has been attending the Hastings College of Law and was making very rapid progress. He was to have graduated this coming June. A short time ago his health began to fail him and his parents, who live in San Francisco, had him sent to Haywards to recuperate. The student gradually commenced to get worse, and at last his reason gave way. Overstudy is the cause of his insanity.

John Cuddy and Gerry Snow loaded four carloads of cattle at Weiser last week for Troutdale, Or., says the Weiser (Idaho) Signal. They were all dehorned, the first of that class, we believe, that has been shipped from here, and this and the extra fine condition in which they were in caused them to attract considerable interest. The process of dehorning presents so many economic advantages in feeding, increased loading capacity of cars and diminished injury to stock in transportation, that it is growing in favor among cattlemen and shippers, and will, in time, be generally adopted in this section.

George Greenwood, a San Francisco counterfeiter, who arrived at Portland, Or., a few weeks ago, and has since flooded that town with spurious half and quarter dollars, has been arrested with his partner, Frank Sleekhardt, an ex-convict, while in the act of manufacturing worthless coin. A complete set of dies and counterfeiting tools was captured by the officers. On being closely questioned Greenwood admitted that he was in the possession of a secret composition and wash used by the most expert counterfeiters in the country; also that he worked San Francisco until the town grew too hot for him, when he decamped. The spurious coins are said to be of remarkably fine workmanship.

An old rag picker, nicknamed "Tin Can" Adams walked into the Platte river at Thirty-eighth street, Denver, on Monday, and was drowned. Whether it was a case of suicide or an accident will never be known. The body was found washed up into shallow water a few yards from where it was supposed to have fallen into the stream. Nothing was found on the old man's clothing except a pipe and some smoking tobacco. Adams was about fifty years of age and lived alone in a little cabin near the Burlington railroad. Little is known of him save that he has been in Denver several years and that he had made few friends and frequently went on sprees of drinking. Following these sprees came seasons of melancholy, and it is presumed that he was getting over one of these periodical drunks and deliberately walked into the river with suicidal intent.

Word has just been received at Denver of the finding of the remains of an unknown man near Crook's mountain, on the stage line between Lander and Rawlins, and about five miles south of Roncis postoffice. The discovery was made by Eli Signor, postmaster at the above mentioned place, and from indications the man had been dead two or three years. There were found with the body a shotgun, which was loaded, and a five-shooter, two chambers of which were empty, and in one of the pockets of the clothing a $10 gold piece and $4 in silver. No clue has been discovered as to his identity, and no one is known to be missing from that section. The coroner has left for the scene of the discovery to make an investigation.

James Hassmer was shot at Boulder, Col., at 10 o'clock on Tuesday night by Mrs. Cyrus Deardorff and died two hours afterwards. Hassmer, with five other men, were out taking in the town. Calling at Mrs. Deardorff's house, which has rather a shady reputation, they were refused admittance. After parleying a while, Hassmer attempted to force an entrance, and was met at the door by Mrs. Deardorff, who fired one shot. Hassmer fell and was carried away by his associates. On examination it was found that the bullet had pierced the brain, near the right eye, and could not be extracted. Mrs. Deardorff was arrested at once. She states that she has frequently been annoyed by Hassmer. Hassmer leaves a wife. The coroner's jury returned a verdict declaring that Mrs. Deardorff did not shoot with felonious intent.

On Tuesday, George Raymond, who is serving a sixty-day sentence and a $100 fine in the county jail, at Denver, and who is also held under a failure to put up a $500 bond for assault to murder, is a criminal with a record. Word has been received from Chicago that the photograph of the prisoner sent there is that of John Brophy, an ex-convict who has served time in several state prisons. March 1, 1891, he got a year in Joliet for burglary. Previous to that he had served three years in the Kansas penitentiary and a year in San Quentin, Cal. He will be given a trial at the criminal court on the charge of assaulting Morris Isaacs, a clerk in Rosenthal's Denver clothing store, about a month ago. He slashed Isaac's across the face with a knife while trying to escape with several pairs of trousers which he had secreted under his coat.

The Manti Sentinel says a new canal is being built from above Redmond to Dover. It covers over a thousand acres previously left without water.

Mr. and Mrs. George Wood, says the Springfield Independent, met with quite a serious accident last Monday evening. George was already asleep. Mrs. Wood was sitting up in bed, when, somehow the heavy upright portion fell, crushing her down and completely closing them in. The lady was severely hurt, besides receiving an injurious nervous shock. The husband was nearly smothered when liberated by the mother, who came to the rescue from the adjoining room.

The manufactured woolen cloth supply is far from sufficient for the needs of the country, so that a great amount is yearly imported from abroad. For example different kinds of woolen fabrics, chiefly clothings, are imported to the value of $7,000,000 annually, stocking goods to the value of $640,000, and woolen yarn dyed and undyed, to the value of about $1,550,000.

In Sweden there are about 26 cotton weaving mills with 3,739 weavers. In these were produced cotton cloth, calico, shirting, fustian, moleskin, etc., to a total value of over $3,618,000, and a length of about forty million meters. In the town of Boras there are five such mills and in Norrköping three, amongst which latter is to be found the largest in Sweden and which alone manufactures one-fifth of the total cotton cloth production of the country.

Several attempts have been made in Sweden to introduce lighting by means of water-gas, that is to say, a mixture of hydrogen with carbonic oxide in the flame of which is placed an incandescent material. Mr. O. Fanehjelm has the merit of bringing this system into practical use. By means of the high temperature developed fine needles or rather filaments of magnesium or lime are rendered incandescent. This system of lighting has in many respects been very satisfactory.

FROM DENMARK.

AALBORG, March 28, 1892.—I have for some time thought of addressing you a few lines from this portion of the Lord's vineyard. It is now twenty-two months since I bid my relations and friends adieu, and with C. W. Wright, Adam Petersen, Nephi H. Nielsen, from Huntville, left the beautiful city of Salt Lake for Scandinavia. Many a pleasant sight of mountain scenery was enjoyed while traveling upon the D. & R. G. railway. I will not attempt to enter into details as the journey probably has been described many times. Suffice it to say that our journey was very pleasant both by land and sea, and that I arrived in the beautiful city of Copenhagen on June 20th, 1892.

I was appointed to labor in Aarhus conference. From there I was sent to Slesvig, one of the provinces taken from the Danes in the war of 1864, and now belonging to Germany.

According to our instructions Elder German Rasmussen, from Ephraim, and myself reported ourselves to the authorities of Haderslev, asking permission to labor as missionaries for the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and obtained permission with the exception of holding public meetings. Brother Rasmussen was called away and Elder R. C. Hansen was called to take his place. Upon our reporting the change they had learned that we were Mormons and asked why we had not told that when we were here before. After considering the matter two weeks we were summoned to appear at the police station at 8 p. m., which we did, and to our surprise we learned that our stay in Germany would be limited to 24 hours. Upon inquiring what the accusation against us was, we were answered, nothing; only they did not want that sect there. Before leaving we gave each of the officers a tract and bore our testimony to them, telling them they were fighting against the work of God. We were given to understand that they meant business, so we consented to leave, which we did the following day, Sept. 1st, 1892. At the time cholera was raging in Hamburg and this was the last day people were allowed to pass from Germany to Denmark.

Since then I have labored in Horsens and Skive until November, 1893, when I was appointed to labor in Aalborg conference. The work of the Lord is slowly but steadily progressing here; prejudice is being removed fast and in places where, a few years ago, Elders were persecuted and banished they can hold meetings now.

For instance in the city of Nibe, where the Elders a few years ago scarcely escaped (having their meetings broken up and being "baptized" as they called it, we have held two large meetings. We succeeded in getting a hall on the largest hotel in the city and held meetings without the slightest disturbance. Several people seemed pleased to hear us. Such remarks as these were heard among the crowd: "That is the best meeting I ever attended;" "they told the truth;" "can it be possible that is Mormonism?" and many others. In Saby our Elders have also been banished, but there also have we held meetings lately, and thus a great deal of the clergy-men's power is gone. The old tales do not take so well as formerly.

There is one very great drawback in preaching the Gospel here. Times have advanced, but we are still in our old halls. The conference is too poor to hire good, suitable halls—and the Elders have almost more than they can do to keep themselves. The old way of preaching the Gospel without purse or script seems to become more and more difficult. The Elders are seldom offered a place to stop, of anything to eat, except they can pay for it. If we could afford to hire suitable halls I think we could bring the Gospel to people that scarcely have heard it.

As regarding myself I have enjoyed the best of health. I have never been engaged in anything that has given me so much true pleasure as the spreading of truth and light among my fellowmen. I feel that God has greatly blessed me during my mission. I am satisfied to remain here until the servants of God call me to return home. Then I shall with pleasure turn my thoughts towards "Utah, the Queen of the West."

The weather here is beautiful, we have scarcely had any winter. I saw men ploughing in January.

The DESERET NEWS gives the Elders much comfort.

Kind regards to all of my old friends in Utah. Yours in the cause of truth,
P. C. GEERTSEN, JR.

OBITUARY NOTES.

JAMES HOLT.

TRASDALE, Wayne County, Utah, April 9, 1894.—Not having seen a notice of the death of my father in your paper, I take the liberty of sending you a short sketch of his life.

James Holt was born Feb. 10, 1804, in North Carolina. He was the son of Jesse and Elizabeth Holt. His parents moved to Tennessee when he was six months old where they made a permanent home. My father received the Gospel in the year 1839 and was baptized. In 1840 he emigrated to Nauvoo, where he became intimately acquainted with the Prophet Joseph. He was sent on a mission in the spring of 1844 to Tennessee, and was preaching on the day the Prophet was killed. He was filled with prophecy at the time and said: "Now they have murdered the Prophet of God; he has sealed his testimony with his blood and my mission is ended for this time." He immediately started home and on his way learned it was all too true. He left Nauvoo in the fall and suffered all the hardships of that trip. He stopped in Iowa until 1852, when he came to the valley and settled at North Ogden. He was counselor to Bishop Thomas Dunn for a number of years. He was one of the first to settle Ogden valley. In 1862 he moved south and settled at Washington, and from there he went to Long valley, and finally, when the settlers were all run out by the Indians, he went to the Mountain Meadows, finally settling at the mouth of the Meadow canyon, where he resided until his death, which occurred on the 27th of January, 1894; he lacked a few days of being 90 years old.

He was honest as the day is long, and a staunch believer in the Gospel, and was always on hand to respond to every call made upon him. He was the father of nineteen children, ten having gone before. He leaves a wife, nine children, many grandchildren and great-grandchildren, and a host of friends to mourn his loss. He had a great deal of work done in the St. George Temple for his dead.

HENRY M'EWAN.

Henry McEwan, the particulars of whose sad death, on the 16th inst., as the result of an accident received on the 15th, were published in the News a few days ago, was born at Edinburgh, Scotland, July 4th, 1830. His parents were among the first members who joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints under the preaching of Elder Orson Pratt, on his first visit to Edinburgh, in the year 1840. Elder McEwan joined the Church in his youth. He learned the trade of a printer at the publishing house of Oliver & Boyd, in Edinburgh. In the spring of 1853 he left Liverpool on the packet ship International, with a company of Saints, bound for New Orleans, on the way to Utah, via Keokuk. He crossed the Plains in Elder Jacob Gates's company. On his arrival in the valley he located at Provo, and during his residence there was a prominent member of the Provo Dramatic Association. During the summer of 1855, he accepted a situation in the DESERET NEWS office, where he continued until the fall of 1856, when he left for several weeks in response to a call made by President Brigham Young for volunteers to assist in bringing in the handcart companies. He went east as far as the Sweetwater, driving a four-mule team and enduring the hardships attendant on that trip. On his return he resumed his labors in the News office. On March 6th, 1857, he was married to Sister Agnes Hogg, of Edinburgh, Scotland.

At the April Conference, 1857, he was appointed on a mission to California to labor in the Western Standard office, and in the ministry. He arrived at San Francisco July 15, 1857, and continued his labors until the suspension of the publication of that paper the following fall. On December 1 of that year he left San Francisco on the steamer Senator, on his homeward trip, in company with Elder Orson Pratt and several returning missionaries from the British mission on their way to Salt Lake City via San Bernardino, from which point he drove Elder Pratt's team. He arrived home about January 15th, 1858. During his absence his first child was born, a girl, and died. In the exodus of the Saints from Salt Lake City, occasioned by the Buchanan war, he and two others were sent to Farowen, Iron county, with a printing outfit, where it was expected the DESERET NEWS would be published alternately with the issues of the paper at Fillmore. He returned to this city in the fall and resumed his labors in the News office—the paper being again published in this city. In the fall of 1860, Judge Elias Smith, then editor of the News, appointed him foreman of the newspaper and job departments, which position he filled with entire satisfaction until he accepted the position of assistant stage manager, in the spring of 1866, at the Salt Lake Theater, he having been prompted from its first opening.

On retiring from the Theater, he engaged with Mr. T. B. H. Stenhouse and took charge of the Daily Telegraph office, which position he held until its removal to Ogden City. He then became financially interested—owning half interest—in the Utah job printing office, the first exclusive job office established in this city, which, under his skilled management, was a success. Several years afterwards he sold out his interest in the business.

At the October Conference, 1869, he was appointed to a mission to the Eastern States and labored most of the time in the state of Pennsylvania, under the presidency of Elder Robert T. Burton. The following spring he was honorably released to return home, having in charge an Elder who was quite sick. On their return the train they were on met with a serious accident by the overturning of all the coaches except the one he and his companion were in, and doing great damage; but the Elders escaped without injury and arrived home in safety. In 1875 he went to San Francisco to fill a situation tendered him in one of the leading printing offices, where he remained several months, when he went to Carson City, Nevada, and took charge of one of the leading newspapers of that city. He returned home in the fall of 1876. In the spring of 1877 he again became associated with the News, and from shortly after that date had charge of the newspaper department until February 17th, 1887, and on his retiring was presented with a handsome testimonial from his fellow-workmen as a token of their friendship and the esteem in which they held him.

In 1890 he became personally interested in a newspaper published in this city entitled the Advertiser, which was afterwards changed in title to the Stock Exchange, and was published under the auspices of the Board of Trade of this city. After its discontinuance the printing outfit was taken to Bingham canyon, and at the time of his death he owned a third interest in the paper now published there, called the Bulletin. Several months ago he connected himself with the Tooele Times as manager and continued with it until recently.

For many years he was a resident of the Twelfth ward and took great interest in the Sabbath school, and for a time had charge of the theological class. He also took an active part in the Mutual Improvement association of the ward. He was a member of the Eighth quorum of Seventies.

Brother McEwan was the father of ten children—five sons and five daughters; all of the latter and one son have preceded him to the spirit world, leaving four sons living, three in this city and one now laboring in the missionary field in Berlin, Germany.

The funeral services were held in the Twelfth ward chapel, on Wednesday, April 18, at 2 p.m., Counselor Druce conducting the services. Elders Whitney, Pyper, Spencer and Ensign sang several choice selections suitable to the occasion. The speakers were Elders George Teasdale, Abraham H. Cannon, James E. Talmage and Charles W. Penrose, all of whom spoke in terms of commendation, and alluded to the sterling integrity of the deceased to the work of God, his devotedness to his family and his straightforward business course through life, which won for him a host of friends. The benediction at the chapel was pronounced by Elder John T. Caine. Some forty carriages followed his remains to their resting place in the cemetery. The dedicatory prayer at the grave was offered by Elder Joseph Ball.

JOHN ENGLAND.

PLAIN CITY, Weber County, Utah, April 20, 1894.—We have the sorrowful duty to record the demise of a worthy man, whose good deeds will survive him in the loving memory of a wide circle of friends. There died in this city, April 7th, Brother John England, surrounded at the time of his death by most of the members of his family. From the first he was fully conscious of the change impending. He did not wish a doctor, for he said one could do him no good—he was anxious to go. He bore a faithful testimony to the truth of the Gospel, and with his latest breath he exhorted his family to keep faithful.

Brother England was born March 20, 1815, at Stoford, Somersetshire, England; was baptized Sept. 13, 1847, at Bridport, ordained a Teacher Nov. 8, 1847, a Priest Feb. 13, 1848, an Elder Dec. 10, 1848, and a High Priest about the year 1882. He was the father of fifteen children. Eight died in England and five emigrated to this country with him. His son John and daughter Ann came to Utah three years before their parents. Ann was in the family of President Young and John was one that helped to build the first telegraph line across the Rocky mountains; and they assisted their parents to emigrate. Brother England left Liverpool April 9, 1862, on board the John J. Boyd, and crossed the plains in Captain Duncan's company. His first wife died November, 20, 1882; his second wife died March 7, 1890; he leaves a wife, and seven children by his first wife, sixty-four grandchildren and ten great-grandchildren. He lived a life of usefulness and has gone to his well-earned rest. He said himself just before the close that he was going "on a mission." He calmly awaited the messenger of death and was pleased to go.

GEO. C. GREEN.

ELDER THOMAS WALLACE,
Late Bishop of North Ogden, Weber Stake of Zion.

It becomes our painful duty to record the death of our esteemed friend and fellow laborer, Elder Thomas Wallace, which occurred at the residence of Apostle F. D. Richards, Ogden, on Sunday April 15th.

For many years past Brother Wallace's health has been failing, but quite recently he had been gradually recovering his former strength and had attended the General Conference in Salt Lake City, and was present at the Weber Stake Conference meetings held on Sunday the 15th. He complained, however, of a pain in the chest, otherwise he acted in his usual cheerful, happy frame of mind. He took supper with Elder F. D. Richards and family, who prevailed upon him to stay over night with them. At about fifteen minutes past nine he was chatting pleasantly when he suddenly arose to his feet, turning his face from them, and fell to the floor in a lifeless condition. Medical aid was immediately summoned, and pending its arrival remedies were applied, but all to no avail—the doctor pronounced death to have been instantaneous, caused by neuralgia of the heart.

On Tuesday at 1 p. m. the remains were taken from the residence of Elder Richards, where they had been viewed by a large number of friends, and conveyed to the Tabernacle. The funeral procession was led by the North Ogden brass band, followed by the Presidency of the Stake, the High Council and the Bishops and their counselors of the several wards of the county, relatives, and a large concourse of people. High Councilors Joseph Stanford and Thomas Doxey, Bishops James Taylor and David McKay and the two counselors of the deceased, Nathaniel Montgomery and James Ward, were pall bearers. The services were conducted by President L. W. Shurtliff. The Tabernacle was crowded and a large number failed to gain admittance. Bishop David McKay offered prayer. The speakers were Elders Joseph Stanford, Oliver G. Workman, Nathaniel Montgomery, Franklin S. Richards, C. F. Middleton and Apostle F. D. Richards. Time and space forbid a detailed reference to what was said; each in turn spoke of deceased as he knew him in the mission field, of his labors and faithfulness in the varied positions of responsibility and trust which he had occupied, and of his trials and afflictions, as he had lost by death his second wife and ten children born to him by his widow who survives him. Elder Joseph Parry pronounced the benediction; after which the funeral cortege reformed, a large number of vehicles and followers being added, and the line of march was resumed until it reached the cemetery where the remains, with a parting blessing and prayer from Elder Richards, were laid to rest until the dawn of the resurrection day.

Thomas Wallace, the fourth son of Robert and Nancy Egan Wallace, was born January 25, 1829, in the city of Glasgow, Scotland. In June, 1839, his father left home on a business trip and did not return until after the death of the mother, which occurred in the November following. In the meantime the family had been scattered and after a fruitless search to find them in the great city, he went to Dundee, but he was never afterwards heard from by any of the children. Thomas embraced the Gospel in his native city, being baptized October 8, 1849. He was ordained a Teacher in April and a Priest in September of the year 1850. In April, 1851, he was ordained an Elder and sent to labor in the ministry in the south of Scotland, embracing the district subsequently known as the Carlisle conference. He labored with much diligence and zeal among the people, being very successful as a missionary. In 1854 he was sent to labor in the Newcastle-on-Tyne conference. He made an intimate acquaintance with a great many people in the counties of Westmoreland, Cumberland, Northumberland, Durham and Yorkshire, and brought many persons and families to accept the faith and doctrines of the Church. Several branches were organized, and on January 1, 1857, he was appointed president of the Durham conference. In January, 1858, he received an appointment to the pastoral charge of the Newcastle-on-Tyne district; his field of operations now consisting of the Durham, Newcastle and Carlisle conferences. May 11, 1859, he married Mary Ann Burnhope, the marriage ceremony, according to the rites of the Latter-day Saints' Church, being performed by Elder Joseph Stanford. About a year later he was transferred to the Sheffield district, and in April, 1861, he was honorably released, after ten years' service in the ministry, to emigrate to Utah.

From early childhood, as an orphan, Brother Wallace commenced the struggle of life and battled with all the unward conditions which surrounded him with heroic perseverance. He was a reader, studious, meditative, of excellent memory and by application he acquired readily an extended knowledge of theology, human nature, history and other kindred subjects; and being naturally gifted with a command of language, he made a successful, intelligent, impressive speaker, and was listened to with interest, being always at home and ready in the pulpit.

Elder Wallace sailed in the ship Underwriter from Liverpool in 1861. The voyage to New York was made in twenty-eight days, and Utah was reached in September. The first winter was spent in Salt Lake City; in the spring of 1862 he moved with his family to American Fork; in 1868 he returned to Salt Lake City; in 1869, entering into an engagement of Z. C. M. I. to serve as salesman, he moved to Ogden where he at once interested himself in local, sectional and church affairs. He was appointed second counselor to Elder F. A. Brown, the president of the first ecclesiastical ward of Ogden city. He was also ordained a member of the High Council of the Weber Stake of Zion and was an able and active member of that body for twelve years. He labored for many years as a home missionary as well as an assistant superintendent in the Sabbath schools of the county. During the small-pox epidemic in Ogden in 1876, Brother Wallace lost his second wife Alvira Stowell, also a 11-year old son; this was a severe affliction to the family, who shortly afterwards moved to North Ogden. On July 9, 1882, Elder Wallace was sustained as Bishop of the North Ogden ward.

Among the many improvements made in North Ogden under his administration was the erection of the new and commodious meeting house and the excellent day school building. He was indefatigable in his labors among the people, and he represented their interests as a selectman in the county court for several years, and had recently been elected precinct justice of the peace. Brother Montgomery, his counselor, said of him at the funeral: "Brother Wallace has been a father to the people, watching and caring for their interest, visiting the sick, the widow and the fatherless, and ministering to the wants of those in need. The people of North Ogden will miss their Bishop, and it will be exceedingly difficult, if indeed possible, to find another who will do as much to watch over and care for the wants of the people as he has done."

A NOBLE WOMAN.

Sketch of the Life of Sister Margaret D. F. McMaster.

As has been chronicled in a brief notice in the News, Sister Margaret Drummond Ferguson McMaster, one of Utah's early settlers, was released, on Saturday, April 21st, from the cares and pains of mortality by the hand of death. About five years ago she had a severe attack of la grippe, from which she never fully recovered, though her health had been good since that time, except when she would contract a cold. Her last illness commenced about the first of the present year. On the 4th of January last, while absent attending a meeting, thieves entered her house and carried off a number of keepsakes in the form of jewelry, which she prized highly. The discovery of the robbery, several days after it occurred, gave her a severe nervous shock, after which she seemed to grow rapidly worse. Four weeks ago her condition was so critical, that her family was summoned to her bedside, this being the first time her children had all been together for several years. She rallied again, however, and improved so much that hopes were entertained that she would recover. This was not to be, as dropsy ensued, and though every possible care and attention were bestowed upon her, she again began to sink and at 11:30 on Saturday morning, April 21, with her mind clear and reason unimpaired, she passed peacefully to rest. She was perfectly resigned to go, and death seemed to have no terror for her.

Sister McMaster was born in Renfrewshire, Scotland, May 15, 1822, and was the daughter of John and Margaret Drummond Ferguson. On the 16th of May, 1840, she embraced the Gospel, at Paisley, Scotland, and in 1842 she married William A. McMaster, (who died about seven years ago.) In March 1851, she left her native land and went with her husband, to reside in England. After living there three years, during which time her husband labored in the ministry, preaching the Gospel, she and her family emigrated to Utah, arriving in Salt Lake City October 1, 1854. In 1858, at the time of the Move, she went with her family to Provo, but returned to this city in the autumn of the same year. During the time of the famine and incidental trials, she passed through many trying vicissitudes, showing much self-sacrifice and devotion to her family. When the Relief Society was organized in the Eleventh ward, Sister McMaster was chosen treasurer, and held that position for many years. When the society was reorganized in 1884, she was elected president, which office she held at the time of her death. During the last few years of her life, her family having grown up, she devoted her entire time to her duties in the society and looking after the poor and needy of her ward. The untiring energy she manifested, together with the co-operation of active counselors and an able corps of teachers, brought the organization over which she presided to a high standard of efficiency. The total absence of ostentation in her nature, and the quiet, and modest dignity which characterized all her actions, won for her the love and esteem of all who knew her; and her tender and earnest solicitude for the sick and distressed caused her to be much beloved by them, and proved her to be indeed a mother in Israel. From the time she embraced the Gospel till the end of her life she was earnestly attached to her religion.

Deceased was a devoted mother, and as her husband was absent from home many years during their married life, preaching the Gospel, the entire care of the family devolved upon her. This duty, as all others, she discharged with cheerfulness and fidelity. She was the mother of twelve children, nine of whom (four girls and five boys) survive her, together with many grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

DISCOURSE

Delivered at the General Conference of the Church, in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Saturday, April 7, 1894, by PRESIDENT JOSEPH F. SMITH.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

I shall require the assistance of the congregation this afternoon in order that I may make myself heard and speak of those things which will do good. I feel my dependence upon the Lord for His Spirit and for strength to do my duty on this occasion. We have had a variety of subjects treated upon during our meetings, ten of the Twelve Apostles having addressed you, each of them having spoken upon one or more different subjects—all of interest to the people, and it is necessary that these things should be weighed carefully by us, that our coming together may not be in vain.

THE TABERNACLE CHOIR.

There are a few things which I would like to call to your attention. One thing is the concert that is to be given here this evening by the Tabernacle Choir. Perhaps many of the Latter-day Saints are not aware of the fact that it is through the proceeds of these concerts that Brother Evan Stephens and the Choir are able to meet their legitimate and necessary expenses—and the expenses of so large a choir are by no means inconsiderable. They have their music to procure, and many other expenses attending their labors; and they raise means to meet these expenses by giving to the people their delightful music. It is through practice and indefatigable labor that they have attained the proficiency which they have reached, by which, as you are aware, they went to the World's Fair last summer, and if justice had been done them they would undoubtedly have carried away the first prize as the best singers in competition with all those contestants from the United States and from foreign countries. Without being an authority on the subject, my decision was rendered on the spot that the Salt Lake Tabernacle Choir carried off the first prize at the Fair, but they were awarded the second. Having said this much, I invite this whole congregation to be present this evening, no matter what it costs. It will not cost you a great deal, and you will get your money's worth, if you love music. If you don't love music, you ought to come here and get a little of the love of it stirred up within you.

SUNDAY SCHOOL AND Y. M. M. I. A. NORMAL CLASSES.

I suppose the Latter-day Saints are generally aware of the fact that we have Sabbath schools, which are of vast importance to our children, and which are necessary for the good of our youth. It is requisite at this advanced stage of our proceedings and experience that men and women should have opportunity of becoming qualified for the labor and duty of Sabbath school instructors. For this purpose we have established in the Brigham Young Academy at Provo a normal class, to which Sunday school teachers may go and receive instruction from the best intelligence and under the best rules that we know of, by which they may become qualified to more efficiently and effectively teach the children in the Sabbath schools. To meet the expenses of this normal class in the Brigham Young Academy provisions have been made by the Sunday school authorities.

There are also Mutual Improvement Associations organized throughout the land. In these associations many a young man has received that impetus in the work of the Lord which has made of him in after life a successful minister of the Gospel to the nations of the earth. Your sons who attend these associations will give you pride and joy when they are called to go out to the world to preach the Gospel, because having attended these associations and qualified themselves to preach the Gospel, they go out prepared to meet the errors and traditions of men, and to advocate the principles of the Gospel with power and in the demonstration of the Spirit of God. They do themselves and the cause which they represent honor; they do their parents honor; and they do honor to the associations in which they have received their preparation. Yet these associations are comparatively in their incipency and much more labor is necessary to make them more effective in the education and qualification of our young men for this work. In order that we may the better teach our young men in regard to these matters, we have also established a normal class in the Brigham Young Academy at Provo, where today there are in attendance from sixty to ninety young men, from all parts of the country, taking a ten weeks' course of instruction, that they may go home and become in turn teachers to the young men of the associations to which they belong. But, unfortunately for the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Associations, we have not been so successful as the Sunday schools have been in collecting means for the payment of the expenses of teaching this large class of our young brethren; and it has been agreed by the General Superintendency that fifty cents a year shall be required of every member of the associations in order to pay for this and for other expenses connected with publishing the record books, certificates and circular letters which are necessary. The object in referring to this matter here is to say, before the President of the Church (who is also the General Superintendent of the Y. M. M. I. A.) and the Twelve Apostles, and the Presidents of Stakes and Bishops, as well as those who are associated more directly with the mutual improvement work, that we expect to collect from the members of these associations the sum of fifty cents a year from each one, in order that we may meet our legitimate expenses; as the choir have to have means to meet their expenses so do we to meet ours; in getting theirs they give you music and enjoyment; we help to educate your sons. So with the Sunday schools. What benefit do the people receive from these sources? Can you compute the value of these institutions in dollars and cents? You cannot; and yet it costs you very little, while you are preparing a corps of intelligent and valiant men and women for this good work by the little contribution required. So you are preparing your sons to be ministers of the Gospel, defenders of the faith, and exponents of the principles of life and salvation to the world by merely contributing this insignificant sum of fifty cents per year. Parents ought to urge their children to be faithful to this little duty; and children who are not able to furnish this themselves ought to ask their parents to assist them, that we may not allow these interests to be uncared for and not sustained while they are such means of benefit to the whole people of the Church.

CARD-PLAYING.

Brother M. W. Merrill referred yesterday to the subject of card-playing. I desire not to prolong the meeting by going over this subject again, but merely to refer to it by way of emphasizing, if I can, that which he said. I want to tell you a circumstance that I heard of. I think the person is in this house who told me, and I shall therefore be very careful to tell you only what I heard from that person, for fear I might be charged with overstating matters. This person is aged, reliable, and a good Latter-day Saint. I am not going to tell you whether it was a woman or a man; at all events, I shall not tell you if I can help it, though it may slip out. This person told me that he or she went to Manti to attend to some Temple work. While at Manti she (laughter) or he was stopping at a house where a number of other people were stopping who had gone to Manti for a similar purpose that my informant had gone for. After supper, a number having gathered together, the question arose, "What shall we do to pass the time?" And it was determined that the best and most profitable, the most intellectual and useful expenditure of the time, from then until three o'clock the next morning, was to sit down at the tables and play cards. A gentleman whose wife was at a distant settlement, in order that she might be present to enjoy this game of cards, had sent all the way to her home and invited her to come by rail and take a hand in it. My informant was invited to play also, but refused, but was there and witnessed the others' enjoyment until a late hour and finally retired to bed, but was informed the next day that this party had kept up their card-playing until three o'clock in the morning.

Here is an instance of people who have gone to administer in the ordinances of the House of God for their dead, occupying their time in the worse than idle habit of playing cards. I say that this was an evil. I say that evil will grow out of such practices as this; and I say that every Latter-day Saint, whether he goes to the Temple or stays at home, ought to constitute himself a teacher in relation to this matter, and set his face like flint against this evil and pernicious practice. The best you can say of it is that there is no good in it, except to kill time; and if people have time which they can murder in this manner, they have more leisure on their hands than ever I have. I call it the murder of time; and not only so, but the murder of the spirituality of men and women that engage in such a practice. Its natural tendency is to evil, and not to good. I asked one person what good there was in it, and I was told, "Oh, it killed time!" This is the only virtue that I have ever yet heard in regard to card-playing. I do not signalize card-playing as a pernicious thing in contradistinction to other practices that simply tend to consume time, to waste precious moments, and to dull the sensibilities of the head and the heart. Anything that tends to a morbid desire for that which is not beneficial is a sin in the sight of God, and it ought to be cried down, whatever it is. It is no more card-playing than it is checker-playing, if checker-playing is indulged in to the wasting of time. Perhaps the one is as pernicious as the other, although I have not noticed in my life the same tendency to evil in playing checkers for amusement as there is in playing cards. As I understand, it takes four or more to make a good party at card playing, and they get to cheating one another and practicing fraud in order to win. You cannot do that in checkers. I know a little about checkers myself. I protest against every practice that has no better recommendation for it than the wasting of precious time. I pronounce it wrong. And I say to the Latter-day Saints that idleness is one of those things set down in the revelations of God to this Church as evil, which we should not indulge in, "for he that is idle shall not eat the bread nor wear the garments of the laborer," and "the idler shall not have place in the Church, except he repents and mends his ways." Card-playing creates idleness, and worse than that. Much might be said to show you the great danger there is of people who indulge in this practice being led from step to step until they become gamblers—and worse than that; for one crime leads to another, and when men get started upon the road of crime, however small the beginning, they go with accelerated speed the longer they continue in that path, until they fall finally into utter ruin.

ROUND-DANCING.

I am going to preach another little discourse in regard to round dancing. I have been out in the country lately, visiting the conferences, and at one place I understood that the President of the Stake had finally concluded that the Presidency of the Church had let up with regard to their objection to round dancing, and he had actually gone and danced in that way himself. Wherever I have been, the Presidents of Stakes have enquired of me as to what is the wish of the Presidency of the Church with regard to this practice of round dancing; for they say that in the parties in Salt Lake City and those held in the theater, round dancing is all the rage, and "is it possible for us to prevent this practice here when it prevails so much at headquarters?" The question is, have the Presidency of the Church let up on this matter, and do they counsel the people now to round-dance all they please? Now, I do not suppose that any more evil would grow out of two innocent persons dancing a waltz (if innocent persons do such a thing), than would out of the playing of a game of cards. Two or three persons might sit down and play a game of cards and no evil come out of it, for that once; but if they indulged in it until they became infatuated with it, then it results in harm and may lead to destruction. So in relation to round-dancing; people become infatuated with it. It is a practice, to say the least of it, out of which nothing can possibly come calculated to ameliorate the condition of mankind or to elevate the moral standard of men and women. Therefore, the Latter-day Saints ought not to tread where no good can be found. We ought not to cross the line from our own ground on to that of the adversary; for when we do we place ourselves in his power and he will take advantage of us if he can. I think I may safely say here, speaking as I do in the presence of the authorities of the Church, that the First Presidency do not encourage, do not endorse, and do not recommend round-dancing. On the contrary, they deprecate it. They are sorry that some of our young people desire it and will indulge in it in spite of counsel; and we hope and pray that the day will come when they will pay stricter attention to the counsels of men who have experience, and whose only desire is the welfare of the youth of Zion. We do not give you counsel with a view of curtailing your legitimate enjoyment. We would rather increase your enjoyment in every proper way. But this is not something that will add to your enjoyment ultimately, because the tendency of it is toward passion, lust, and immorality. Some may call me an old logy for making this declaration; but I have been young myself, and have passed through the stages of youth, as many are passing through them today. I have had an experience perhaps that some of my younger friends have not; and I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that round-dancing is an evil, because, if for nothing else, there is no good in it. Further than that, it is wrong because evil may come out of it, and often very great evil, too. As a result of this familiar contact of men and women in the dance, their native modesty, and that respectful regard for each other, and proper decorum which should exist between men and women, are broken down. They become familiar with each other's touch and feelings in such a way as to lead on to greater evil. Therefore, I say it is an evil in Zion. And I think I can say, as speaking the minds of the Presidency of the Church on this subject, that we deprecate it, and wish that it did not exist among us, and we would like you to curtail it as much as you can and if possible stop it. We do not want you to be unwise in this matter. A skilful horse trainer who has a fractious horse does not draw the reins tight all at once, but he pulls up gently, guiding and directing and, so far as possible, steering clear of the obstructions in the road, until in time he is successful in quieting his fractious animal and getting it under control. Deal gently with the youth. Act cautiously and warily with them, and kindly withal; for it is our love for them that causes us to speak in this way. We want to save and exalt the youth of Zion, and bring them back into the presence of God. Therefore we talk this way. We say to the Presidents of Stakes, to the High Councils, to the Bishops, to the presidents of Seventies and the Seventies, to the High Priests, and to the Elders in Israel, set an example in these matters that I have referred to, and wield an influence where you labor that will be felt for good. It is necessary that this should be done.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

There is another little thing I want to speak upon. It is in relation to a subject that has been repeatedly brought to the attention of the Presidency, and especially to my attention while I have been attending the conferences in the outer Stakes for the last few weeks. Last night, after meeting, a good brother approached me. I trust he is here, because I want to talk to him. He is an eminent man, in some respects. He has been on missions, I believe, and has borne many responsibilities at one time and another in the Church. He put into my hand a copy of the constitution and by-laws of a certain society which is seeking to enlist the Latter-day Saints as its members. When he spoke to me about it, I saw in a moment that he was thoroughly imbued with the idea that to join this secret association was the proper thing for Latter-day Saints to do. I read it in his countenance and saw it down deep in his heart. This alarmed me. I have been alarmed a little about it a good many times, from the representations that have come to us in relation to this matter. I could read you the principles laid down in the constitution of this particular association, but I do not wish to name it, because I wish to make no distinctions, nor to antagonize one against another. I do not consider one better or worse than another. For my part, I hold this position: that as for me and my house, we have enlisted to serve God, and I have come to the conclusion long since that it is impossible for me to serve God and Mammon. I cannot carry water on both shoulders without spilling some of it. I cannot wear the yoke of Christ and the yoke of Belial at the same time, and call the yoke of Christ easy and His burden light. Some of these articles in this constitution are most excellent. There are no better contained in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, simply because they are taken directly from the Gospel. They are: peace on earth and good will to men, charity, forgiveness, longsuffering, patience, love unfeigned, kindness one towards another, every effort to be exerted to prevent brethren from going to law one with another, and to settle their difficulties between themselves. They have a chaplain, and a lecturer or preacher, and among other things it is the duty of the chaplain to be present and open the meetings and officiate in all the burial services of the members of the association. I suppose that these are some things that are common to all these secret organizations. It is no harm for any one to believe in all these good things. President Woodruff has been preaching these very same principles for some sixty years, and he has at no time advised you to join a secret association in order that you may be taught these principles or that you may the better practice them. He has taught that these are the commandments of God to the people, and that it is their duty to observe these precepts, and that, too, without taking an oath to become associated with any secret society. But one of the provisions of this constitution requires that each member of this secret association shall stand by the principles of the association unto death. That is pretty strong. Suppose, for instance, an Elder of the Church has entered into this association and has taken upon himself this covenant, and something should arise which should be derogatory to his interests as a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, what position would he be in? He would be under the necessity of either violating his covenants with the Church or the oath that he had taken in that secret society. He would prove himself in either case a traitor. Therefore, it is better that we should not mix up with these entangling alliances. I tell you, in the name of Israel's God, that the Almighty has established in this Church every principle necessary for the salvation, for the happiness, prosperity, development and growth, both in temporal and spiritual things, of the children of God; and we have no need to go outside to find these. In connection with this, I want to read a word or two from the revelations of God to us through the Prophet Joseph Smith:

Otherwise Satan seeketh to turn their hearts away from the truth, that they become blinded and understand not things which are prepared for them;

Wherefore a commandment I give unto you, to prepare and organize yourselves by a bond or everlasting covenant that cannot be broken.

And he who breaketh it shall lose his office and standing in the church, and shall be delivered over to the buffetings of Satan until the day of redemption.

Behold, this is the preparation wherewith I prepare you, and the foundation, and the ensample which I give unto you, whereby you may accomplish the commandments which are given you,

That through my providence, notwithstanding the tribulation which shall descend upon you, that the church may stand independent above all other creatures beneath the celestial world.

This is the purpose that God had in view in establishing this Church and calling you from darkness into the marvelous light of the Gospel, that His "church may stand independent above all other creatures beneath the celestial world," in which the foundation is laid of every provision necessary to be carried out for the feeding and clothing of the poor, the protection of the weak, and the administering of comfort and cheer unto the widows and fatherless, the destitute and sick. All these provisions have been amply established in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; and there is not a soul within the pale of the Church upon the earth that needs to go and seek succor or comfort from the world, whereby he enters into covenant and agreement with the world that he may find protection, or assistance, or means for his burial. Cannot the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints bury its own dead who unfortunately lack the means for their own burial? Are we so poor that we cannot look after our members under such circumstances? Have we ever deserted the widow and the fatherless when they have made application for assistance? Have we turned our back upon the poor, the imprisoned, and upon those that were afflicted, when they were faithful and worthy members in the Church? Never, to my knowledge; and we never will. It is wrong to join these associations. By doing it you place upon yourselves burdens and you put bands around your necks by which others will lead you whithersoever they will; and you are no longer free to serve God as men and women ought to be who are made free by the liberty of the Gospel of Christ.

PERSONALITY OF GOD.

I have one more subject in mind, though it may be unnecessary to speak of it before this congregation, or to dignify those who are in error by mentioning them here; but when you take into consideration the fact that these very men who are advocating error and false doctrine, and finding sympathizers in the Church, are Elders in Israel, men who have been on missions, you may see the propriety of referring to them here. They have got their thoughts fixed on one idea, which they have followed to an extreme, and they have formulated a plan by which they suppose they have defined how God can be three Persons and yet one Person, and they tell you all about it by publishing a series of pamphlets. Taking the scriptures for a standard, they try to show that God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost are one Person, as well as being one in attributes. If you will indulge me just a few moments, I desire to call your attention to a few things that are written with regard to this matter, and then I trust there will be no necessity of talking about it any more. Those who are indulging in this fallacy ought to be guided by the Holy Spirit, by common sense and by the judgment of men who have had experience in the Church, and forsake their error and folly, call in their pernicious publications, and cease to try to lead away the unwary and the ignorant. In the first place, I will read a few words from the Second Lecture on Faith in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants:

"We here observe that God is the only supreme governor and independent being in whom all fullness and perfection dwell; who is omnipotent, omnipresent [that is, not in person, but by His power and spirit], and omniscient; without beginning of days or end of life; and that in him every good gift and every good principle dwell; and that he is the Father of lights; in him the principle of faith dwells independently, and he is the object in whom the faith of all other rational and accountable beings center for life and salvation."

Again, in the Seventh Lecture on Faith:

"All these sayings put together give as clear an account of the state of the glorified saints as language could give—the works that Jesus had done they were to do, and greater works than those which he had done among them should they do, and that because he went to the Father. He does not say that they should do these works in time; but they should do greater work, because he went to the Father. He says in the 24th verse: 'Father, I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory.' These sayings, taken in connection, make it very plain that the greater works which those that believed on his name were to do were to be done in eternity, where he was going and where they should behold his glory. He had said, in another part of his prayer, that he desired of his Father that those who believed on him should be one in him, as he and the Father were one in each other. 'Neither pray I for these (the Apostles) alone, but for them also who shall believe on me through their words, that they all may be one; that is, they who believed on him through the apostles' words, as well as the apostles themselves, 'that they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me and I in thee; that they also may be one in us.'"

Here is the language of the Savior himself, quoted by the Prophet Joseph, distinctly setting forth a principle that your minds cannot be blinded upon, if you will only open your eyes and your understanding to this saying. How can the Apostles become one in Christ as Christ and God are one, if Christ and God are one person? Can the Twelve Apostles become one person? And how can all they that believe on the words of the Apostles also become one with the Apostles in Christ as Christ is one with God, if God and Christ are one person? Of course, the absurdity appears at once. I do not need to multiply words in regard to this matter, because every child ought to know better than that because Christ is God because of the Spirit and the Son, because of the flesh, therefore that He and the Father are one person, or body, and the Holy Ghost is one in them, and they three are only one being. Strange as it may seem to you, this is the doctrine advocated by men who profess to be Elders in the Church.

In conclusion upon this matter, I want to read the positive word of the Lord, that cannot be denied. You may twist the scriptures as you please; but if you believe the truth and are willing to be guided by it, you will have to come back to this that I shall read to you, and then it will clear up all mystery from your minds with relation to the personality of the Father and the Son. Joseph Smith, on April 2nd, 1843, declared as follows:

"The Father has a body of flesh and bones as tangible as man's; the Son also."

Then how are you going to get them into one person? President Cannon says this agrees with what Paul says. Of course; it agrees with all the scriptures of divine truth, and with every manifestation of God to man since the beginning of the world to the present time. Then the Prophet says:

"But the Holy Ghost has not a body of flesh and bones, but is a personage of Spirit. Were it not so, the Holy Ghost could not dwell in us."

When Joseph Smith, a boy of 14 years of age, went out into the woods to ask the Lord to guide him into the right church, he knelt down and prayed, and after he was delivered from the power of the adversary, who tried to destroy him, two heavenly personages appeared before him. One of these personages, pointing to the other, and calling Joseph by name, said, "This is my beloved Son; hear him." Here were two distinct persons—the Father and the Son, each with a body of flesh and bones as tangible as man's; the Father bearing testimony of the Son, not only to Joseph Smith, but through Joseph Smith to all the world of mankind. These are truths, and you need not care what you read about the Father and the Son being one. Of course, they are one—in attributes. They are one in love, one in knowledge, one in mercy, one in power, one in all things that make them united and powerful, glorious and great, because in them is perfected all truth, all virtue, and all righteousness. But they are two persons, as much as my father and I are two persons. Yet there is unto us but one living and true God. Paul says:

"There be gods many, and lords many, but to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him."

And Jesus Christ says:

"This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

That alone should be enough to dispel from the mind of every intelligent man and woman the fallacy that the Father and the Son are not two beings.

Let us seek for the knowledge of life eternal. Let us work out our salvation in fear and trembling before our Father, and be faithful to the end. Remember that you have enlisted in this work for time and for all eternity. There is no backing out of it, no falling away from it, except in sin, and then comes the penalty of transgression. But if you expect exaltation; if you expect fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, kindred and friends; if you expect glory, intelligence and endless lives, you must get them in God's work; for nowhere outside can you get them. Therefore, let every sympathy and interest be centered in this cause. Let all your love go out toward this cause, and this alone. Let the world go. Let it have its secret combinations, and let it have its own way; but let us preach the Gospel to them and show them a better way, and that men can only become one when they are Christ's. They can never be united until they do become Christ's; but when they become Christ's, then they can be one with the Father and with the Son, as the Father and the Son are one. God grant that we may come to this knowledge, and be faithful to the end. Amen.

WHAT IS THE MATTER?

Looking over the pages of history from away back to yesterday, it seems evident even from a superficial glance, that "a thousand and one" things have occurred which are difficult to account for on the ordinary hypothesis of cause and effect. Great movements among men have had certain features of spontaneity and measurable universality which can not be attributed to organization, to special unity of effort, or any general intention founded upon common sympathy or specific purpose as communicated from one to another. The migration of races, gigantic wars, and apparently fanatical movements are of this peculiar character. Great mental, intellectual and religious periods are just as striking, as famous, and as far-reaching in influence, as is under the most astute originators and superintelligent direction. Who can explain or give a reason for the way in which China was overrun by the Tartars, or Europe by the northern hordes in ages long gone by? Who can say why the genius of war and conquest should be personified in Alexander, Hannibal or Napoleon? What of the Crusades, what of the propagation of Mahommedanism, what of Luther, Calvin, Knox, the Wesleys? Can it be told how or why these men went out, failed or were a success? What of the Elizabethan period in English history? What of the eras of discovery and invention, and the manifestations thereof in widely separated localities without collusion and beyond intent? Can the subjugation of India or the colonization of Australasia by the British be decided by any rule of probability? Or could the rebellion and success of the American colonies have been predicted on experience had there not been something behind it all? Who claims to understand the revival spirit in Europe or in America when the Prophet Joseph was a lad? Who has given the key to the late Civil War in our own devoted country? What about the great wave of spiritual phenomena which swept over this land, moving parallel and dying out contemporaneously with the close of that fearful struggle? What causes revolution to appear simultaneously in South American republics and on the islands of the sea? What about the universal drift of labor toward strikes? What of the unanticipated general move of large bodies of men toward the Capitol of the nation, under the guise of "the Industrial Army"? Or is this an unsolvable as financial depression, as the "masterly inactivity" of production?

The world is full of money, the power of production is without limit, the capacity and desire for possession and utilization was never as great as it is today! But everything is at a stand still. Money is unproductive in the great centers, locked in barren and bolted safes. Mills, foundries, factories are silent or on slow time. Sixty-five millions of souls in this country, and many millions outside, would like to have and enjoy a share of the world's possibilities of production, but are denied! The wise men and statesmen of the nation seem unaware of that feeling of foreboding and unrest which agitates the masses everywhere, and it is claimed that confidence is wanting, has fled in fact, and none can woo back in this extremity the beneficence and blessing of her presence.

The only solution possible in regard to these great, gigantic, alarming movements of the past and present, lies in the acceptance of the fact that humanity is subjected to influences outside of its own peculiar sphere; that the spiritual forces of the universe are responsible for these fitful phenomena which agitate, change and push onward, in the lines of progress, the grand hosts of mankind in the eras of history and in the manifestations of our time! Spirit possesses power to act upon spirit, and under the control of one angel after another, seal upon seal is broken (see Revelations) and myriads of attendants, waiting upon this authority and these times, bring to pass those pulsations of mental, moral industrial and religious life which form turning points or hinges upon which swings the destiny of nations and peoples, and the effects of which are seen after many days.

Our age may be more prolific in these manifestations than any preceding one. Events follow each other with unceremonious rapidity. Limited human vision may not always discern the connection between events and results. The world may object to this sequence in the Divine drama, may disclaim supernatural order, purpose or influence in human affairs. But the eye of faith discerns if dimly the program of the Infinite. It realizes that inspirational power exerted through chosen vessels in the ages past, predicted all the changes and calamities, and made allusions to each of these points or paragraphs of development, from time to time!

The Lord is claimed to have "a controversy with the nations," and the issue has been decreed beforehand. Our age is more essentially transitional because it is "the dispensation of the fullness of times," and upon us "the ends of the earth have come!" These impulses which have become historic, those now in operation which will speedily become so, are the workings of unseen agencies upon susceptible man; for "many spirits are gone abroad into all the earth," subject in part no doubt "to those they have listed to obey," but yet so overruled and controlled that from apparent evil there will yet come the ultimate good! Nor is this any reflection upon Deity "who sees the end from the beginning;" it is but for the thoughtful to know that calamity every time brings its own lesson, one probably which never could be learned save in those startling exigencies of sad experience and consequent thought!

Still further, faith takes on no feeling of alarm, though "the earth reel to and fro like a drunken man," though riot hold high carnival, and bloodshed tells its bitter story to broken hearts; though social, civil or international strife may devastate neighborhoods or nations, until carnage is as familiar as the noonday sun, and the sickened heart may seek to exclude the sight thereof as did the Prophet Joseph; there will remain the abiding solace that through suffering and judgment, the dicta of infinite wisdom will be made manifest in its plenitude and power.

A true and righteous faith cannot be indifferent to "the signs of the times," nor can human wisdom rebuke the spirit of unrest which for shadows the proximity of change. The wisdom of the wise men of the earth will be taxed as never before, and it has been decreed that that shall perish and "the understanding of the prudent shall be hid;" but "unto those that fear my name (saith the Lord) shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings."

The great problems of society are being cogitated upon by numbers, and a solution is being asked for by the civilized world at least. What constitutes a righteous relationship between "labor and capital?" What can be done to equalize the question of production and distribution? How shall education be made universal and poverty be exterminated from the earth? What will reduce crime to a minimum, and how can insanity be overcome save by restraining the mental pressure upon human kind? Where is the restriction as to individual wealth, and how can the gulf be narrowed between that and the honest abject poverty, seen in the midst of our civilization? What form of government can best meet the situation and drift of today? Is absolute or constitutional monarchy, is paternalism or mechanical and selfish rule, or shall republicanism prevail?

These are queries for the student in the abstract, or for the one who combines with that the light of faith—the inspiration of the Eternal Spirit—and the answer will reflect the lower or the higher thought! Surely there is already the dawning of a new era, the transfusion of a brighter and loftier spirit, the conception of a more beneficent rule, the creation of better conditions, the evolution of a more God-like life! Surely the manifestations of brotherhood will swell and grow; interest in each other will increase, and a provision will be made for man, which while "not of him but for him" will find a foothold on the earth. To this all discipline tends, all trial works for good; and this community, already blessed beyond degree, will continue under divine direction to pioneer the way; to create, more than to reform; to introduce rather than improve; to be original rather than copyists, and to be susceptible to higher teaching rather than to be the sport of erratic or destructive spirits such as are now moving vast masses of mankind!

Let the Saints be patient, faithful and true; let their allegiance be to Heaven and God; let them withdraw themselves from dependence upon Babylon and her institutions; let "every eye be single and the whole body shall be full of light." So shall it be, as was of old, when thick darkness fell upon Egypt—there was a special illumination in all the dwellings of Israel, favored of the Lord!

ELDER GODDARD'S JOURNEY.

MESA, Maricopa Co., Ariz.,
April 20, 1894.

Since leaving Salt Lake City last Friday at midnight, Elder George Reynolds and myself have traveled eighteen hundred and sixty-nine miles, landing here in Mesa City between 5 and 6 o'clock this morning, and making our home with the hospitable family of Brother George Passey, and very thankful to find one after so long and monotonous a ride on a railroad car.

It was 2 o'clock a.m. on Saturday when we left Ogden. At 6:30 we had traveled 124 miles and the weather was cold and raining. Every few miles our train would stop at some railway station, and varying in size from a few wooden shanties to a neat and pretty sized village. For several hundred miles across the desert in Nevada not a tree was to be seen, neither cow, horse sheep or swine, nor even a bird.

About 500 miles across the desert, which abounds with sage and rabbit brush, we came to the sink of the Humboldt river, now about five miles long and three miles wide.

Reaching within about one hundred miles of San Francisco, we cross the Sacramento bay on the largest ferry boat in the world, capable of conveying across 35 freight cars. A short distance further brings us to Oakland, where we alight from our cars and on to a steamer which conveys us across the San Francisco bay, an arm of the Pacific ocean. Though four miles across, it only takes twenty minutes to land us in the great city of the West. On the steamer we were met by two of our brethren who conducted us to the Latter-day Saints' meeting house, it being about 10 o'clock on our arrival (Pacific time.) We attended three meetings on Sunday, and were thankful to greet our old-time friend, Dr. Karl G. Maeser, besides a number of others from Salt Lake City and Kaysville, including our time honored photographer, C. R. Savage. The weather during the day was cold and windy, and an overcoat was indispensable. While crossing the bay I had to go into the cabin, lest the wind should carry us off, my weight being only 102 pounds; consequently my power of resistance was insufficient to cope with a blow which outside the Golden Gate reached 70 miles an hour.

Monday was spent in visiting some old time friends, including Mr. James Linforth, Mr. Gilbert Clements and Mr. Fred Walker, after which we went to a museum, where our particular attention was called towards a mammoth elephant which was found in Siberia many years ago, embedded in ice. This creature is 16 feet high, 26 feet long from tip of his tail to the end of his tusks. He is a monster. Afterwards, in company with seven others, we responded to an invitation of C. R. Savage to enjoy a supper with him, which closed the labors of Monday; tired and weary.

Tuesday we went to the Cliff house to see a host of seals, some plunging in, others crawling out, of the water, and nestling in the sun, which afforded an agreeable change in the weather since Sunday. From the Cliff house we went to the Midwinter Fair, visiting the machinery hall, liberal art gallery, fine art and agricultural building, also Manalou or Sandwich Island, scenic view of a volcano; this latter baffles description and must be seen to be appreciated. It represents the largest active volcano in the world, which covers a space of nine square miles. The visitor finds himself in the midst of its central operation, and it requires but little stretch of the imagination to believe that one has been carried to the home of the Hawaiians and set down in the midst of these raging furnaces. I was much pleased with both the Utah exhibit, presided over by Mrs. Caine, who takes great pleasure in imparting information to the visitors, also with the Church educational department over which Professor Karl G. Maeser presides. While there is much to admire in witnessing the wonderful skill displayed in machinery and art, I was astonished to find such a variety of souvenirs being offered to the visitors, by almost every nationality in the world, many of them being positively obtrusive. This day was closed by about two hours' profitable chat with Elder Karl G. Maeser, missionaries, etc., in his private lodgings.

Wednesday, April 19, we bid adieu to San Francisco at 9 o'clock a. m., and after traveling through southern California 730 miles we reach the Colorado river; crossing it we find ourselves in Yuma, Arizona. Before reaching here we see one of the oldest Catholic churches on the continent. The Arizona penitentiary is in Yuma, and also a fort. The town is small and has only a few inhabitants, made up of Mexicans, Indians and others, and is 731 miles from San Francisco.

At midnight we reach Maricopa, 892 miles from San Francisco. After waiting more than three hours, sitting in a railway carriage, we proceeded on our journey and arrive at Tempe about 5 o'clock a. m. and found Stake Superintendent Lewis with a carriage to take us eight miles to Mesa.

During a trip of near 2,000 miles we pass over every variety of soil and scenery, from the most fertile to the sandy desert; from an altitude of over 7,000 feet above sea level, to a depression of 263 feet below the sea, and while in this low country it was fortunate the sea did not heave itself over its bounds and drown us. We passed by some lovely orange orchards, and it is not an unusual thing for one tree to contain at the same time blossoms, small, green, and fully ripe yellow oranges. We saw loads of oranges being taken to the warehouse to be assorted and packed for shipment. We paid five cents each for oranges on our route, and twenty-five cents for twenty-six oranges neatly packed, box included.

Friday morning, April 20th, finds us between 5 and 6 a. m. in Mesa City enjoying a hearty breakfast with our friendly host and his family, after which I will simply mention a few existing facts as we find them in this State of Zion. The roads are excellent; we saw a large field of lucern being raked up after the first cutting, and by being once irrigated, after each cutting, six crops during the season may be harvested; barley and wheat are heading out and will soon be ready to cut. We noticed an orange grove of forty acres and a vineyard of sixty acres. The fig tree, pomegranate and almond grow luxuriantly, also the Texas and China umbrella and pepper trees, palm, orange and lemon. We also had green peas for dinner today. Tomorrow our two days' Sunday school conference begins.

GEORGE GODDARD.

The water of Boise river has risen very fast the past forty-eight hours, says the Idaho Daily Statesman of Tuesday. It is now near last year's high mark, and if the warm weather continues Boise valley will doubtless experience the worst floods in years. Yesterday forenoon a log smashed into a row of pilings under what is known as the second railroad bridge, taking them out like so many ten pins. This so weakened the bridge, passengers and baggage were transferred there until evening. Late in the afternoon two or three piles gave way in the main bridge and this necessitated a transfer across both bridges.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

WHEN REVELATION IS EXTINGUISHED.

The Latter-day Saints hold, as is well known, that the continued guidance of the Divine Spirit is as necessary for the well-being of the Church in this age as it ever was. Enlightened by the Scriptures and experience, they feel convinced that the education of the children of the Almighty can not be accomplished except by His never-ceasing, fostering care, revealing His will as the varying circumstances, in which they find themselves, may require. The impossibility of success in the mission entrusted to the Church on earth, if actual communication with the Founder of the Church be cut off, is to their minds perfectly clear. Revelation there must be, in the same sense of the word as it is admitted to have existed in the days of the Prophets and Apostles of old.

Those who take an opposite view of this important subject are forced to a position full of contradictions. They admit the divinity of the revelations given in the beginning of this age and all through the older dispensations, but deny that similar divine manifestations belong to this time. They argue that the Church in the beginning of its stormy voyage had to be guided according to the charts and compass carefully adjusted by the Divine hand, and that its course had to be set in obedience to the commands of the great Captain; but, the voyage well begun, they think the ship can go on without such commands, drifting before the winds and currents and yet reach its destination. Many devout advocates of the no-revelation theory feel their own dependency on the Lord. They will pray for wisdom and enlightenment; they will invoke His aid in the pulpit and in their pastoral duties; and yet they loudly declaim against the possibility of that for which they ask. They will maintain, with a faith not to be shaken, the orthodoxy of their creeds, the all but infallibility of their churches; and yet they claim that such desirable results have been attained by frail mortals without the aid of immediate and continued revelations. Was there ever such inconsistency exhibited in any other cause of so much concern to the human family?

Fortunately for those who aim at truth in this matter, the question is not one of theories and opinions but one of facts. The whole ecclesiastical history teaches us that churches without revelations have gone lamentably astray not only in dogmas and doctrines but, what is worse, in the practices and the awful effects of these among men. If we open the pages of history we find nations thrown in the darkness of ignorance because false priests have been engaged in extinguishing every spark of light among the people; we see countries devastated by armies led on to plunder, murder and black crimes by fanatical leaders; from the reeking dungeons of inquisitors tales of horror reverberate through the ages, too deeply infernal almost to be repeated; to our wondering eyes are presented the facts that philosophers have been compelled to perjure themselves in order to hide the light sent in their hearts by God Almighty; homes destroyed, innocence murdered, kings and queens, otherwise noble, made into cruel persecutors, and all by whom? History answers, by just such persons as have claimed to be expounders of a religion not guided by revelations. The history of the "war" against the Waldenses and Albigenses, in which thousands of unoffending men, women and children were slain like wild beasts; the sanguinary persecutions in Spain, France, Germany, the Netherlands, England, all testify to this. The lesson conveyed to the generation of this age, which enjoys liberty to a degree not dreamt of by former tyrants, ought to be, it would seem, to render powerless forever a system that is responsible for such atrocities by falsely claiming to rule by Divine authority. There is need for earnest men and women to point out this lesson; for should the time ever come that the nations again find themselves enchained by the power that held sway during the middle ages and revelled in blood and flames, the last will be worst than the first.

The appearance in this age of inspired servants of God is the signal to all, who honestly seek the welfare of men, to abandon a course that always has led to disastrous errors and to rally to the standard of religious truth and liberty as raised by the Almighty Himself. The claims of Joseph the Prophet to be a servant of the Lord are beautifully illustrated in the results of his teachings as contrasted with the results of the doctrines of uninspired men. Among the latter we find oppression, persecution, death and all the powers of hell, while the Church that is founded upon the rock of revelation enjoys liberty and gives liberty to all, laboring for the salvation of all, forgiving even its enemies and striving to exemplify the happiness of heaven on earth. If these things are duly considered, who can escape the conclusion, that the man whose life was given for the promotion of the true happiness of his fellowmen, was in these efforts guided by Him who has declared Himself to be the fountain of love, of peace, as well as of life?

AS TO SEWAGE.

The subject of sewage may not be as interesting as some others, but it is very important; and the talk of the early completion of the system for this city will not fail to attract to the matter its full share of notice. Properly constructed and controlled, such a system should be a powerful safeguard against epidemics of various forms; but a system imperfectly handled would be almost sure to develop a terrible scourge. Salt Lake is not situated so as to have its sewage carried off by some swiftly flowing stream to a safe distance or to lodge it in the ocean depths, though even the latter is not always satisfactory; for, as in the case of San Francisco, the health authorities now report that conveying the sewage into the bay there is a menace instead of a protection to the health of the city. It is asserted that the bacilli of disease are developed by the sea water, rise to the surface and are conveyed back by the winds, finding lodgment in the city, at some time destined to burst forth in a dreadful plague.

An instance of a city where danger from this source is reduced to a minimum, is Berlin, Germany. The Germans have made a profound study of disease germs and their development, and the leading authorities of that country assert that Berlin is as near proof against epidemic as any large city can be, because of the manipulation of its system of carrying off and disposing of the sewage. Though the city is on a river, the latter is small and sluggish; and the system of sewage farms is regarded as far superior to carrying off the waste matter by any waterway; and the immunity of the city from epidemic at the recent cholera visitation indicates that there is virtue in the sanitary precautions taken.

The city is divided into sewer districts, from which the sewage is pumped off on to land specially prepared for the purpose. One of the farms, the Blankenburg, contains 2,700 acres. The process of utilizing the sewage is simple and comparatively inexpensive, and consists chiefly of a system of irrigation by which the sewage is distributed over the land and plowed under for fertilizing purposes. The amount of material that has to be disposed of by burning is consequently very small. On the land are produced staple crops of hemp, mustard, winter rape, winter and summer wheat and rye, oats, Indian corn, barley, buckwheat, peas, beans, clover, grasses, potatoes, beets, cabbage, chicory, etc. Land which formerly was of little value is thus rendered very productive, and it is estimated that the 10,000 acres of sewer farms there yield a net profit of about $18.50 per acre per annum, and give support to nearly 84,000 people.

The objections which formerly were raised against the sewer farm project have been entirely swept away. The water of the neighborhood, which it was thought would be poisoned by the drainage from the irrigated farms is found to be not affected, and such an eminent authority as Dr. Koch asserts that by the farming process the bacteria is rendered innocuous and thus effectually disposed of. The stench which it was asserted would become unbearable has not fulfilled that prediction, and the fear that the soil would become so impregnated with sewage matter that it would not yield has passed away, for the workers have been able to adapt their crops to the strength of the soil, and exhaust it as fast as the city can restore it.

Of course Salt Lake needs only small sewer farms compared to those of Berlin, but the disparity between the cities is not anything like as great as the different proportions of the land utilized. Enough by all means, and even much more than enough, should be had, in order that all sewage may be properly taken care of, without occasioning any complaint from neighbors. And when this is accomplished the land could be made a fruitful source of income. But if there is too much cramping in area, the result will be not only a heavy expense to be rid of scold material, but constant liability to damage suits from neighbors who may feel aggrieved. There will be no more opportune time than the present for the municipality to investigate the subject thoroughly and secure or negotiate for needed lands while they are obtainable at reasonable prices. We need hardly say the News is opposed to any ax-grinding in this matter. But suggestions on the subject seem to be timely, and they ought to bring about investigation and careful consideration of all present and prospective requirements.

YOU TAKE YOUR CHOICE.

It is amusing, and not altogether uninteresting, to listen to the explanations given by political speakers and writers on either side, of the results of the local elections recently held in some of the northern and western states. These elections, it will be remembered, have almost universally shown immense Democratic and Populist losses, and corresponding Republican gains. This fact being undeniable, the amusement which the non-partisan finds in the situation is furnished by the ingenious variety of reasons given for its existence.

Strangely enough, those who, it would naturally seem, should be embarrassed and disappointed by the result alluded to, only see in it an additional incentive to faster progress along the line they have already marked out. Their courage is quite unshaken, their confidence wholly undiminished. The Democratic view, for instance, is that the political upheaval is unmistakably an expression of strong popular disapproval of Democratic delay in carrying out the pledges upon which the party was voted into full control of the government two years ago. The Republican view, on the other hand, is that the same upheaval signifies a sweeping change in popular sentiment since the general elections of 1892 upon the question of tariff revision, and that the voters of the country, having been converted from the error of their former opinions, are now declaring as strongly for the retention of the McKinley law as they declared in 1892 for a reduction of duties. Just how the Populists regard the situation and explain it, we are unable to say; we meet with very few of the genus in this vicinity, and have but very few Populist newspaper exchanges—in those which do come to hand, the disposition, like that of "Brer Rabbit," seems to be to "lay low."

In view of the fact that the argument on the side of both the great parties is in favor of an adherence to the respective and antagonistic party policies, the independent voter will again be forced into the necessity of doing his own thinking in election affairs. The editor of Public Opinion seems to strike a happy medium of independent advice when he suggests that the individual voter is left no alternative but to study the questions at issue upon their merits and shape his own course without regard to election returns. It would not be strange if the individual voter should ask himself at this point what reason there is anyhow for allowing himself to be swayed by the course of any other voter or number of voters. His class in the great political school room does not appear to be increasing in numbers very fast, but it is usually respectable and always more or less influential; and in these recent events there is nothing that it ought to regard as discouraging.

SENATOR PEFFER'S PLAN.

Only a few days more and our national legislators and government officials will have to deal with the industrial army problem in some practical way. It is supposed that about 50,000 men from all parts of the country are now converging upon Washington and the advance columns are already outside the gates of the capital. But little, so far, is known of what measures have been adopted for possible emergencies. There seems to be a general disposition to allow the crusaders full liberty to present their petitions to Congress and to go and come unmolested as long as they commit no acts of lawlessness. President Cleveland's semi-official proclamation, issued after consultation with cabinet members, and warning all intended visitors to the capital to respect the laws or be prepared to take the consequences, is a fair expression of the general sentiment on the subject in Washington.

This course will be regarded as wise and will meet approval throughout the country, but it will not satisfy the petitioners, who come not for courtesies alone. Senator Peffer, according to the reports, is almost the only one who is endeavoring to find some means of meeting the immediate demands of the industrials. He proposes that Congress appropriate $1,000,000 to be expended for the improvement of the public grounds of Washington, by laying out and making walks and wagon ways and by opening up highways wherever needed in the District. He adds that the wages are to be fixed at $1.50 a day and the time of labor at eight hours.

As this measure is intended to meet an emergency in which good advice is precious because conspicuously scarce, it may perhaps not be timely to criticize it too closely. But it is certainly only a palliative, and nobody should be allowed to harbor the illusion that its adoption would cure the malady for which it is applied. In the first place it may be asked, whether Congress has the right to take a million dollars from the country's treasury and distribute it among men who say they are out of work. Is that what is expected of our legislators? But granting them such a prerogative, how long would a million dollars last among say 20,000 men at $1.50 a day? It would carry them just about one month, giving each man $5; and at the end of the month, when the expenses for living were paid, they would be ready to form another industrial army and demand another million, virtually at the expense of the workingmen who have no government employment. How long would the rest of the people stand an experiment of this kind? If Mr. Bel-lamy's socialism has to be applied by Congress, as Senator Peffer proposes, it must be extended to every laborer in the country; but the Congress of the United States is, not as yet constituted for that purpose.

It would seem, if labor must be provided by the State for the unemployed that some scheme must be devised whereby that labor is made remunerative to the State, and thereby lessen the burdens of taxation. It would never do to think of increasing them for any such purpose. The work proposed by the Populist senator is of the latter kind; it would simply entail an extra outlay of a million dollars at a time when the people can ill afford it. It would have been less surprising if the senator from Kansas had recommended for our country to follow for the benefit of the "industrials" the example of the European monarchies in adopting a colonial policy. If the state is to engage in the employment business without embodying socialistic principles, that seems to be about the only resource open at present.

HIS OPPORTUNITY.

President Cleveland has, or is about to have, the chance of his lifetime to win back a measure of that popularity which ought to attend the most prominent citizen of the Republic but which in his case has considerably departed. The opportunity which presents itself comes in the form of the so-called "industrial army;" and whether the incident is to yield him favor or blame will depend altogether upon his treatment of the problem—the reward is sure to be abundant either way.

No one doubts Mr. Cleveland's courage, or his unyielding temper when once an object or a plan has been decided upon. But in this case tact will be a more effective attribute than bravery, and stubbornness will only be applauded if it happens to be on the right side. There will doubtless have to be a disregard in some degree of the narrow, strained construction of governmental prerogatives; but such contingencies are not wholly novel—Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln met and grappled with them, and both are heroes now. Unexpected and desperate emergencies require the same kind of treatment; yet prompt decision must not be unmet with patience, and a high determination to maintain the integrity of the laws will be rendered far more amiable if presumed offenders are regarded as respectable and patriotic but unfortunate and perhaps misguided fellow-citizens.

The course of some of the state governors where these "armies" are originating, or through which they pass, adds materially, and we think unnecessarily, to the embarrassment which the President must naturally feel. As a Democrat he holds that it is the duty of the respective states to check and punish lawlessness within their borders, and that the aid of the national forces should only be invoked when the local power is found to be inadequate. The dispatches have narrated, however, that in more than one instance no attempt whatever has been made by the state authority to protect the property of citizens, and that, so far from restraint, there has been actual applause of the acts mentioned. Under such circumstances there seems to be but one course open—that which was adopted in Montana. We believe that unpartisan citizens throughout the nation at large will commend the action there taken. It will be a sad day for American liberty when, because the states themselves will not protect its citizens' property, the national government must not do so. There is no longer credit in, and we trust there is no longer necessity for, the coarse and cruel suggestion that though "your cause is just we can do nothing for you!"

NEW GOLD PROCESS.

General Don Carlos Buell, who first came to public notice through his bravery in the Mexican war, at Monterrey, Contreras and Churubusco, and retired from military service in 1864 subsequent to his defeat of General Bragg, who had served with him in Mexico, but who espoused the cause of the Confederacy in the Rebellion, now appears in the roll of inventor of an important gold recovery process. If the general's claims for his invention are verified in practical use, he soon will be numbered among the greatest gold miners of the age, notwithstanding the fact that he is 75 years old.

The general has been a close worker as a chemist for some thirty years, and has attained a high grade of proficiency. Of late years he has devoted himself to electrical science, and it was in this branch that his discovery was made. It is on the same general line as Edison's idea of reducing iron ore, but is adapted to recovering gold from sand, extracting the entire quantity of the precious metal that is determined by chemical analysis to be present. The process consists in dissolving the gold from the sand in a solution, which is the inventor's secret, and then the precious metal is separated by the use of electricity.

The practical application of the method is to be made at Westport, state of Washington, where a plant is being erected and will begin operations early next month. It consists of a number of tanks and a powerful electric battery. The material to be operated upon is the black sand along the coast of Oregon and Washington. General Buell says it will yield $10 of flour gold to the ton of sand, and that enough exists on the Oregon and Washington beach to pay the national debt. He also says that the quantity of platinum which he can extract is equal in value to the gold. If the veteran soldier should prove as successful in this venture as he anticipates, none will begrudge him the honor of a brilliant scientific triumph to mark his closing days.

THE "WHIPS" GET PAID.

The members of the British Parliament serve without salary, but connected with the House of Commons are several well-salaried positions, the occupants of which earn their money by reason of their labors in keeping the M. Ps. at work, so that their party may not be defeated through the absence of members of the majority. These gentlemen with pay are the "whips" of the party in power, whose duties gentlemen of aristocratic birth and high social position are eager to perform. The duties of junior whips are not only onerous but irksome. Their hours are from 11:30 a. m. to 12:30 p. m., or thirteen hours daily, and sometimes longer, with intervals for lunch and dinner. From 12 to 3 o'clock they have to attend in their office. Then from 8:30 to 12:30 o'clock at night they have to sit or stand in the outer lobby of the house, and ascertain from every member who passes out where he is going, whether he is paired, and when he will be back. If he is not paired they have to either find a pair for him or prevent him from passing out by coaxing or threats, preferably the former. If members fail to come and have not made the necessary pairing arrangement, they must rustle them up. For this service the junior whips get £1,000 a year. Those holding similar positions for the minority party do this work for nothing, except that they are relieved from office duty.

The chief whip of the party in power gets £2,000 a year for his services, and his official position outside of the simple duties of whip is such as to enable him to render material service in bringing recalcitrant members to time. In addition to keeping an eye on the junior whips he deals with members on their more touchy side, inasmuch as it is he who practically distributes ribbons and titles and sees that cards of invitation are sent to this man and that—that no one is given undue preference—a delicate duty which requires much tact and skill. Of necessity this office must be filled by one prominent in aristocratic circles, and is frequently, though not always, occupied by one of the nobility, even with the liberals in power. While in Britain there is a strong feeling against paying the legislators, there is no advocacy of requiring free the services of the majority party whip, as there attaches to his official position much expense of which members of Parliament are relieved.

THE CRY FOR STATE HELP.

The grave question raised by the appearance of "industrial armies"—whether there be any proper way for the state to give work to the unemployed—is discussed, pro and con, in the last issue of the Forum; and nothing could be more timely and interesting. Dr. Stanton Colt, of the University Settlement in New York City, who is recognized as one of the most eloquent and earnest advocates of state aid, makes a plea for help by cities—and if by cities also by states. He argues that it is not socialism for a city to appropriate money in a time of general distress to make great public improvements; and that by this method employment, at the usual rate of wages, would be given to large numbers of idle men. This would help only those who are willing to work, and it would not be charity or socialism.

On the other hand, Mr. David McGregor Means, the political economist, under the heading, "The Dangerous Absurdity of State Aid," maintains that such a plan is nothing less than socialistic, because the work must be paid for, and it can only be paid for by taxation. If, therefore, any unusual quantity of work be given out in a time of depression, to that extent the city or state overtakes itself just when it can least afford to do so. This is the very essence of socialism, Mr. Means contends, and history is full of instances of bankruptcy and ruin that have been brought about in this identical way.

The controversy, while sharp and direct, will not settle the problem that at present confronts almost every locality in the country. But its bearing on that problem will be readily seen, and its discussion can hardly fail to excite sober and serious thought among many who, up till the present time, have only approached a decision under the influence of sentiment or passion.

THE FIGHT IS ON.

It is gratifying to note that the Utah coal miners are not participating in the general strike which has been inaugurated in the country by the mine workers. The present dullness makes things bad enough for the miners any way, and a strike here would make the situation worse. This the local miners seem to realize, and acting upon such understanding, they are deserving of consideration on the part of employers for not giving way to a popular pressure in the ranks of mine workers. Some of the Colorado miners, however, were not so judicious in their action, and already they are beginning to find out that there are two parties to the conflict now being waged.

As might have been foreseen by the mine workers, the operators are taking a hand in the matter in a way that will make any settlement favorable to the miner hard to reach. The prospect is that in Colorado the strikers will get back to work after a while at reduced wages, and that they will thereby bring down the wages of those in the state who did not strike. An example of how affairs are going may be seen in connection with the Colorado Fuel company's mines at Coal Creek. The men went out for a week, in conformity with the program of the general strike. One effect of thus throwing down the gauntlet to the mine operators was that the miners were discharged, and a notice was posted up that a ten per cent reduction would be made in the wages of all who returned to work. Thus the week off there is likely to be an expensive luxury, since it involves a lowering instead of an increase in the price of wages. The company's manager in explaining his action said, "That is our way of treating strikers. The only reduction made at any of the mines of this company the past year was at Newcastle, and the reduction there was due to a strike. When the men struck at Newcastle I told them it would cost a reduction of 10 per cent per month every month they staid out. They were out three months and returned to work at a 30 per cent reduction and were glad to get that. You may be sure the Newcastle men will not join this strike. They have had all that kind of business they want."

Other coal companies are in the same mind as the one named, and the fight is now on in earnest. The companies appear determined to stand out, claiming that the strike is wholly without justification, as there has been no general reduction in wages for several years, the men being employed under the wage scale of 1889. It will be interesting to note the attitude of the men after their week's experience, and in the changed aspect of affairs.

MAY DAY AT HOME AND ABROAD.

For years it has been the custom of laborers in foreign countries to make Mayday a special occasion of demonstration. The return of beautiful spring, the air filled with the fragrance of the budding trees and flowers and the love-awakening warblings of the sweet, winged singers, has by a tacit understanding been the time selected by the sons of honest toil to give voice to their own sentiments and to let the world know that there are millions of human beings to whom the resurrection of nature to sunshine, life, love and joy serves but to intensify their own feelings of discontent and despair. They have made Mayday, above all other days, a time in which to recite loudly and sing in concert the wrongs, real and imaginary, under which they are suffering.

Only a few years ago the bold idea was conceived to induce every employe in the civilized world to strike on Mayday, just to show the world its helplessness without the laborer, and to demonstrate the incalculable loss the latter have it in their power to inflict on capitalists whenever they chose to act as a unit. The agitation was carried on with great diligence led by socialists and anarchists in Europe, and the authorities had to resort to extraordinary measures to prevent the realization of the plan. Of course, it came to nothing, or almost to, but great apprehension was at one time felt for the result, should a conflict ensue. So far the labor demonstrations in Europe have been confined to more or less imposing parades, hot speeches and drinking. In the larger cities a few hundred laborers would gather and march through the principal streets, displaying their banners and characteristic mottoes; they would sing patriotic songs in all sorts of keys, sharp and flat at once, cheer their orators, distribute literature, more or less red, and then resort to a beer garden and spend a week's wages or more until midnight, rendering themselves unable to provide a living for their families for several days to come, all the while closely watched by the police, objects of pity and contempt. No doubt there are exceptions among the numerous paraders of respectable laborers in some countries, but as a rule the labor demonstrations in Europe have been of this general character. As thoughtless tools in the hands of shifful agitators workmen have suffered themselves to be paraded in the streets, only to unstrut the nerves of society and cause what annoyance there may be in that condition. No serious harm has been done to anybody, except such as has been to the cause of labor itself.

Newspaper correspondents, however, have always made the most of it, and the press on this side has always had much to say about the wretched condition of the laborers abroad, predicting a terrible uprising as the result and all the time contrasting the situation in this country with that of Europe as one of Utopian excellence. It is all the more surprising, therefore, to find ourselves on this Mayday in a situation more grave than that which has confronted either France, Switzerland, Belgium or Germany for many a year. At the very steps of the Capitol today an advance guard of unemployed laborers are endeavoring to frame, according to their views, the legislation of the country, and thousands are directing their steps to Washington for the same purpose; while thousands and thousands more are expressing sympathy with the movement. At the same time the various labor organizations contemplate combining for united action in case of emergency; and what the final outcome will be, not even the sages of the country can foretell.

Surely it is the turn of the European press now to discuss our troubles, and its comments consist chiefly of expressions of surprise that the governments of the various states have not long ago made such a May demonstration impossible; that that would have been the European way weeks ago.

And in truth there is much in the situation that is matter of wonder. Americans argue that the right peacefully to assemble and petition for redress of grievances is accorded to the citizens of this country. Nobody questions this; but does that right include also the privilege of a free ride from coast to coast on the railroads or the levying of assessments in the shape of provisions on the communities through which the march goes? Does it warrant speeches of an almost incendiary nature, like that in which "General" Carter indulged in in this city yesterday?

All things considered, there is much in this Coxy movement that is not based on constitutional rights. It is an anomaly foreign to the institutions of the country. It may pass off without any serious results, but it may, under certain conditions, prove to be the little spark from which a great fire is kindled, uncontrollable and disastrous.

GREAT IS THE MISSISSIPPI.

The near approach of the season of floods in the Mississippi valley, the ever-recurring discussion of the jetties at the mouth and the levees along the banks of the mighty Father of Waters, and the project of bridging the colossal stream above New Orleans—all direct attention to the river itself, its tributaries, the engineering problems it has presented, the generous sums that have been and must still be spent upon its improvement, and lastly, to the restless enterprise of the American people which refuses to be satisfied so long as there is still one obstacle to overcome, or one more triumph of skill and daring to accomplish.

The spring is the season for floods in the Mississippi, which in its lower course usually receives a culmination of the early freshets, coming mostly from eastern rivers, in March. From the western rivers come the later floods in June. Occasionally there is an intermediate flood resulting from a late rise from the Ohio, meeting and combining with an early freshet from the western and northwestern streams. It is worthy of note, and extremely important in view of what may at some time happen, that within the history of the white man's observation the highest floodwaters from the Ohio basin have never yet reached the lower Mississippi at the same time as the other basins, which act together, were discharging. Such a united maximum discharge would amount to more than 8,000,000 cubic feet per second, or greater by half than any recorded discharge.

While the western tributaries of the great river possess the greatest interest for citizens living on this side of it, an understanding of the subject may only be had by considering also the sources of contribution from the other side; for while the area comprised within the Ohio watershed measures only 202,000 square miles, as compared with an area of 541,000 square miles drained by the Missouri, the latter does not contribute as much as does the former, to the main river; and the upper Mississippi, draining an area of only 171,500 square miles, contributes nearly as much as does the Missouri, with more than three times the area. Further affluents of importance come from the west, south of the Missouri, between which and the Red river the drainage is in volume about three-fourths that of the Missouri; so that, for purposes of easy recollection, the proportions of these contributions may be given as 100, 76, 66 and 52 for the Ohio, Missouri, Upper Mississippi and the Lower Western rivers respectively; while the proportion of northern and eastern drainage combined is to the total western drainage as the figures 4 to 3 very nearly.

In this connection it may be mentioned that one explanation of the comparatively small volume of water turns into the Mississippi from the Missouri watershed is that, according to the observation or experienced explorers and recent reports of United States engineers, the upper Missouri is going underground. Actual measurements show that between Great Falls and Fort Benton, only twenty-five miles below, the loss in volume of water is no less than 456 cubic feet per second. The engineers explain that the water enters the soil and accounts for the presence of the great South Dakota artesian basin; and the finding of eyeless fish in these artesian waters is consistent with the explanation.

What gives to all this consideration of the Father of Waters—with his sources and volume and periods of rise and fall—its present interest, is the fact that there has just been begun the final survey for the great bridge over the river above New Orleans; the data above given will help the reader to an appreciation of the boldness of the project. The bridge is to have a main channel span of 1,070 feet, a height of 104 feet above the mean water line and a height of 85 feet above the highest water mark. The enterprise of constructing and maintaining a railroad bridge of such dimensions at a point so low down in the course of the giant stream will deserve to rank among the great mechanical achievements of the century.

THE INSTINCT OF ANIMALS.

In a recent issue of the San Francisco Chronicle the subject of the instinct of animals is interestingly discussed. The writer argues against the notion entertained by some, that the instinct of the animal creation is in many instances superior to the intellect and knowledge of man. It is an admitted fact that the senses of some of them are developed to an extraordinary degree. A few birds, for instance, have the faculty of seeing their prey from a considerable distance in the air; the rabbit and the deer have the sense of hearing, and the dog the sense of smelling exceedingly well developed, and they are in these respects more favored than man, unaided by artificial contrivances; but beyond that, the article referred to says, the instinct of animals does not extend. It concludes:

A bird or beast is like man in regard to the weather. It judges by what it feels at the moment and by what it sees about it. If it is warm or cold, if it rains or the sun shines, it is apt, like a simple human being, to suppose that the cold, the heat, the rain and the sunshine are likely to continue indefinitely, which is naturally an error. It is really time that these extravagant notions in regard to the prophetic instinct of animals, beyond the simple premonitions depending on their perceptions of the moment, should cease. They have no solid foundation of science.

The views expressed are probably in the main correct. But there are phenomena in what may be called the psychical life of animals, which are highly interesting and which cannot be accounted for on the principle of highly developed senses. When a camel, for instance, in the desert where no sign of vegetation can be seen, with unerring accuracy directs his steps towards the nearest spring of refreshing water, though this may be miles off, it is hard to believe that he is guided only by outward senses. Equally difficult of explanation is the fact that the sea gull and other water birds will find the shores of the nearest land, when they are on the trackless ocean. The wonderful ability of pigeons to find their homes is well known. They may have been taken in a closed cage on a train or a steamer hundreds of miles away from their familiar surroundings, but on being liberated, they will, without hesitation, start in the right direction and return by the shortest route.

Equally interesting animal traits are told by observers, showing that many creatures have premonitions of coming disasters. These may not be very definite, but they certainly are strong enough to cause them to feel anxiety to a marked degree. Everybody has heard of the firm belief of many sailors that rats leave a ship threatened with destruction. The idea may be declared superstition, but is there for it no foundation in facts as observed by the sons of the deep? Barleti, in his Letters About Calabria and Sicily, describing the terrible earthquake in 1783, asserts that animals previous to the disaster showed signs of uneasiness and fear long before the doomed inhabitants were aware of their fate. Dogs, he says, were seen to run from one place to another and utter strange sounds, expressive of fear; cattle became uneasy, and some domesticated animals were seen to leave the city of Messina in wild terror before the first shock occurred. Facts of this kind cannot be overlooked in a discussion of the instinct of animals. Science may not have found the true key to them, but they are not the less real, nor less interesting.

Man in his selfish pride is too apt to overestimate himself and overlook the wonders of the creation in which he has been placed as a central figure. But only he who duly appreciates the workmanship of the Creator in his innumerable surroundings can feel his heart swell with gratitude and adoration; only he understands the saying of an inspired author, that "the creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God."

CO-OPERATION IN HOUSEKEEPING.

The National Economist outlines a scheme of co-operative housekeeping which is going to be tried in Chicago "for the benefit of married men with small incomes." The experiment is not going to fail for lack of complete and extensive preparations, for by way of starter a $200,000 home is to be erected, covering an entire block in Hyde Park. The colony will consist of forty-four houses on forty-six lots, with a common lawn, laundry, kitchen, furnace, electric light plant, assembly hall and reading room. The central court will contain a common building, where all the rudgeries will be performed. Here will be seen the cooking, heating and lighting machinery, the ice chests, grocery store-rooms and vegetable cellars, the dish-washers, servants and butler. The forty-four families will need but thirteen people to do all their household work. These people include the baker, the professional cook, a gardener, a superintendent, two engineers and the corps of helpers. Mrs. Coleman-Stuckert, the lady who is managing the movement, claims that this saves the salaries of at least eighty domestic servants, besides having the food cooked economically and in excellent taste. An electric carrier will deliver the cooked meals.

The details of the scheme are equally plausible and interesting. Take for instance the matter of dining: Each house will be a station, and when the big dinner gong sounds, the company cook will push the button and send out forty-four smoking dinners. Each hamper will be heated, so that the hot viands and vegetables will be at their prime. Each matron will serve the meal in the company dishes or her own—the hamper will then go back for the second course and the third, until the dessert and coffee are reached. Mrs. Coleman-Stuckert promulgated all these facts on paper during the World's congresses last summer, and her diagram shows it will cost only $2 a week for each person.

Further particulars of the experiment may be thus summarized: From the joint heating and lighting plant each house will get its steam at cost from its own boiler, and all this branch of the household economy will aggregate but a modicum of the usual expense for each family. A family consisting of man and wife, the former earning say $65 per month, will have a suite of six rooms. These figures are applicable only to the second best system of co-operative homes. The proprietor has a plan for one for the very wealthy and another for the very poor. She claims that they are all equally practical, and she is going to prove that this is the way to live by building the first one in Hyde Park. This new home will not occupy one big building and thus have the characteristics that belong to existence in a hotel. Every family will be allotted a house, with room sufficient for the members. Each tenant is to become a householder and own his own rooms and thereby become a stockholder and voter in the common affairs of the community. He will select such a location as he can afford—the prices ranging from $2,000, and he will pay on the installment plan.

There should be no reason why a colony of this kind, composed of the right sort of people—families that are agreeable to each other—the whole managed carefully and with discretion, can not be made a social and economical success in every sense. Mrs. Coleman-Stuckert's experiment will be watched with the keenest interest; carried out in the proper spirit, it will make her a real benefactor of the race.

THE EARTHQUAKE IN GREECE.

The disastrous earthquake that recently occurred in Greece is among the most notable ones in recent years in that part of the world. The official reports show that the whole coast line from Larina to Theopolyte suffered terribly. In one district alone three hundred people lost their lives, and an idea may be formed of the mighty convulsions of nature from the statement that in seven hours not less than 815 shocks were counted. During this commotion houses tottered and fell; the surface of the earth heaved like a stormy sea; huge masses of rock were detached from the mountains and hurled into the valleys below with a crash like thunder; the coastline was changed, the shore in some places sinking six feet and allowing the water to rush in; torrents of boiling water were spouted forth into the air, and the disturbance was felt more, or less in the whole kingdom striking terror in the hearts of the inhabitants of palaces as well as of lowly huts. It is during occurrences of this kind that the insignificance of man is realized as never before.

The district now devastated by these seismic disturbances is one full of classical interest. The city of Atalanta, for instance, brings to mind the beautiful myth of the swift Arcadian huntress of that name, whom no mortal could overtake in a race, but who was outwitted by one of her suitors who dropped golden apples in her way, which she stooped to pick up and thus was defeated, her heart and hand being the prize of the race. Athens, the capital of modern Greece, a distinction due probably more to its famous history than its present natural advantages, is a city with about 85,000 inhabitants. Thebes, once the principal city of Boeotia and Sparta's ally against Athens in the Peloponnesian war, and whose inhabitants were later sold into slavery by the great Alexander, when the internal quarrel between the free states ended in the destruction of the liberty of Greece, is now a small city of 9,000 inhabitants.

The whole region bears evidence of former disturbances of a similar kind, and according to the latest reports, the rumblings in earth still continue, causing the terror-stricken people to fear that perhaps the worst is not yet over. The prompt action taken by King George and his family to relieve the distress of the people and the expressions of personal sympathy will add to the popularity of the royal family in the little kingdom, although the king is not a native of Greece, but of far away Denmark.

THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

The proceedings this week in the Hawaiian Islands will be of great interest and importance to the residents of that part of the globe. Tomorrow, May 2, is the date set for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention. These delegates are to meet at the call of the provisional government at as early a date as practicable after the result of the elections is ascertained. Their business will be to adopt a constitution for the government that is to be instituted on the islands, in harmony with the views of the existing government.

It is promised that the constitution will be liberal in its form, and patterned generally after the Constitution of the United States. The suggested name of the new government is the "Commonwealth of the Hawaiian Islands," with the executive power vested in a president; the vice-president is to preside over the senate, but is not a member of the cabinet; the cabinet is to be made up of secretaries of state, finance, interior, justice, and health and education; the legislative branches are to consist of twenty-four senators and forty assemblymen, all elected by popular vote. Japanese and Chinese are excluded from the franchise, as are also those Hawaiians who do not register under the existing order of the government.

The constitution thus outlined is that which has been drawn up by President Dole and his advisers in the provisional government. The judiciary, army and navy, and other matters are to be left to the convention to be passed upon. The proposed constitution has opponents not only in the royalists but in many of the annexationists, who protest against the proceedings as being arbitrary to the extent that they are tyrannical and subversive of the rights of citizens which they effect to preserve. The provisional officers, however, assert that they do not intend the part of the constitution which they have arranged for the convention to be binding on that body, but only as suggestive of the line which the government desires to have followed.

It is not to be thought, however, that the powers at present in control will permit the adoption of a constitution that is at variance with their ideas. To do this would be to relinquish a measure of the supremacy which the provisional government now holds; while if the constitutional convention is either cajoled or overawed into framing or adopting a document that is not in harmony with the actual views of the majority, it will emphasize the claim that the present governmental administration is not based on the will of the people.

In the document outlined there is shown a weakness that does not augur well for the stability of the government which exists there. If it is permitted to go on, another change in Hawaiian affairs, whether by annexation to the United States or not, is sure to result at no distant day, because the people of the islands will not rest satisfied under what may be properly termed factional rule. They may be held under for a time by superior force and activity, but the progress of events will bring opportunity for redress of grievances. As the matter stands at present a portion of the inhabitants of the islands are to be arbitrarily deprived of the franchise, and consequently placed in a state of semi-slavery. Those adult Hawaiians who did not register by April 21 are to be permanently disqualified from taking part in the government. This, with debarring other citizens who have acquired, both by birth and residence, equal rights with Americans and others who are now running affairs, does not speak well for the boasted liberty of the constitution so far arranged. If the constitutional form of government now proposed for Hawaiian would be permanently established among the people of those islands, it must be so modified in its restrictions and broadened in its provisions as to be truly expressive of a republican form of government, based upon the consent of and benefits to flow to the whole people instead of to a faction. It is likely that the Hawaiian commonwealth will be established on the lines followed by the convention. It is to be hoped that its stability will be provided for in a document that recognizes the rights of all the inhabitants of the islands.

IT WAS FULLY JUSTIFIED.

The jurisdictional question raised by the government taking a hand in the apprehension of the "industrial" who stopped and captured a train is only one of those quibbles which arise every time the national authority does something that it has previously had no occasion to do. It not only has the right but it is its duty to strengthen the hands of its courts and their executive officers (when armed with process) and see that orders therefrom are obeyed, no matter whether the governor of the state in which resistance occurs calls for aid or not. Furthermore, the line on which the trespass occurred is a carrier of the United States mail and whether or not the particular train "held up" had mail on board, we can all understand how the detention of one train might occasion delay to others, on some of which would inevitably be mail matter. It is like deranging part of a piece of mechanism, a general derangement is likely to result; and no man or combination of men has the right to create obstructions or otherwise menace the free action of the postal service.

FINAL COMPUTATIONS by the director of the mint fix the gold production of the United States for the year 1893 at the value of $35,950,000, an increase over 1892 of 78,455 ounces, worth $1,518,423. In the following table, which shows the production of the various states in fine ounces and in comparison with the output for 1892, the value of the product may be found by multiplying the number of ounces by $20.67:

IF IT is proper, patriotic and necessary to furnish free food and transportation to two hundred men led by a blatherkite, is it not also proper and patriotic to furnish free food and fuel to a hundred heads of families who ask for work, or to a score of strollers who want nothing but transportation? Is there such virtue in numbers and demagogism that in one case there should be sentiment, peace offerings and libations, and in the other a hard, stony denial, or the grip of the policeman and the rattle of the Black Maria?

CONSIDERING THE numbers engaged and the advertising received, the industrial army movement has been remarkable for the mediocrity of its leading spirit. Kelly, whose forces were our guests at Ogden for a few days, seems to be about the only one who does not do all his thinking with his lungs. He is smart enough to be dangerous. The Coxeys, Brownes and Carter's won't hurt anything.

A BOSTON trade journal reports that the wool sales in that great market since January 1 aggregate 44,084,400 pounds, against 52,288,100 pounds for the same period of last year. A falling-off of over two million pounds per month is serious enough to excite notice; but the fact that there is still an average sale of over ten million pounds goes to show that the woolen mills are not so hopelessly inactive as some of the croakers would have us believe.

What Governor Walte would say and do if he were a Mormon is hard to imagine.—New York World.

With your power of imagination, that oughtn't to be hard; what would you say and do yourself?

VETERAN'S RECOLLECTIONS.

ROCKVILLE, Utah, April 10, 1894.

Seeing an invitation given—or a request—in the DESERET WEEKLY for any person that felt disposed to give an account of his early experience and seeing that two or three have complied, I thought I would venture and contribute a few items of my recollections.

I will begin by saying my father's name was Parshall Terry. He was born at Fort Niagara, York state, September 30, 1778. My mother, Hannah Terry (whose maiden name was Terry) was born at Goshen, Ulster county, New York state, October 8, 1786. My parents moved before I was born to what was then called Upper Canada, now Ontario, where I was born January 1, 1830. In February, 1838, one of my sisters brought two Mormon missionaries in a cutter to our place. They were Theodore Turley and Robert B. Thompson. Through lies that were told, my father and some of my brothers were much prejudiced against the Mormons, and my father talked pretty ugly, and cross to the Elders, telling them what he thought of them; but he gave them liberty to preach in our house, and before they got through he was satisfied that the doctrine they taught was true, and the result was that most of our family was baptized a few days later in our mill pond after cutting a hole through two feet of ice for that purpose. I remember hearing Brother Turley say afterward that when they received their setting out or lecture by my father he thought they had come to a pretty tough place to make Mormon converts. Yet, ours was the only family in the neighborhood that joined the church.

I will here relate what I consider a miracle or a remarkable occurrence: My sister who brought the Elders to our house had borrowed a Book of Mormon from them to read, and her husband was so much opposed to it that he took it out of her hands and went and threw it open into the fire and stamped it down with his foot. My sister went from the farther part of the room where she was reading when he took the book from her, and on taking it from the fire she found it not even so much as scorched, though they had on an old-fashioned Canadian winter's fire, as it was very cold. I heard my sister relate this before the Elders and my brother-in-law who sanctioned it as being true. I now regret that I did not get a deposition of these persons before they passed away, but I have two sisters and a brother yet living who will testify to having heard our sister relate this remarkable incident. We saw the book afterward.

My father moved with his family to Missouri in the summer of 1838 in time to be driven out by the famous or infamous exterminating order of Governor Boggs. On day in November, just at sundown, two men rode up to our house and without any provocation ordered my father to begone from there the next day by 4 o'clock p. m. or they would come, tie him up to a tree and give him a hundred lashes; and if that wouldn't do, they would burn the house over our heads. My father tried to reason with them, telling them his teams were away, (my brother-in-law being gone to move a family to Adam-on-d-Ahman,) and that his family was sick (my mother not having been able to go across the room for two months without help). But they became bolterous, would not listen to reason and left. The troubles became so bad that the family which my brother-in-law went to move did not go all the way, so providentially he got home in the night. So my father loaded what he could of his effects in the wagons, but he was unable to take any of our winter supplies and had to leave quite an amount of outstanding accounts. We started out about 8 o'clock in the afternoon. We traveled about two miles and camped as best we could in the timber and snow for the night. My brother-in-law, who stopped behind to attend to some affairs and watch the movements of the mob, informed us that as we went out of sight of our home into the timber, the mob, said to be 300 strong, came in sight from the opposite direction evidently intending to carry out their threat; but as we were gone they did not follow us.

One day while we were traveling we met 700 of the mob militia in a heavy snow storm going up to Far West. We were forced to turn out in the snow to let them pass. There were some other teams with us and the mob searched their wagons for guns. One man of our company was not a Mormon, but his wife was. The mob searching his wagon threw a box of books into the snow, pretending to hunt for guns. The captain of the boat that ferried us across the river at Quincy as we went into Missouri was along with the mob, and I think he was the captain of the company. He told them they needn't search our wagons, for he searched them when we went into Missouri and that we had no guns then. But my father did have a gun when we went into and also when we went out of Missouri. When we reached the Mississippi opposite Quincy the river was running full of ice and the ferryboat was so crowded that we could not get across that afternoon. In the night the river froze over so solid that we crossed the next day on the ice; so you can judge it was not very warm.

A few days after we arrived in Illinois one of my sisters died from cold and exposure. Myself and brother, Joshua Terry (not having been baptized at the time the others of our family were) were baptized in June, 1840. I assisted to haul rock for the Nauvoo Temple. I was present when the crane fell over backward with, I think, the last stone for the building. I was at the meeting in the Temple when the floor settled and caused the stampede and big excitement, but upon an explanation by President Brigham Young quiet was soon restored, not, however, until several had been more or less seriously hurt. In February, 1846, I crossed the river on the ice to visit the camp on Sugar creek, when the road was filled with those fleeing for their lives from civilization (!) I remember President Young counseling the Saints to parch corn to take along to eat, which many did. I also recollect corn being ground into meal, some of which became so strong and bitter that it could hardly be eaten.

It is hardly necessary to relate much of incidents of travel from Nauvoo to Great Salt Lake valley, where hundreds and thousands have had similar trying experiences of crossing the Plains. I will say, however, that I came out with others in the fall of 1848, to assist those who were moving to the valley. I came as far as the Pacific Springs, 802½ miles from Winter Quarters, where we met relief teams from the valley. There was only one other, I think it was Oscar Sperry, who came this far, President Young being camped on the upper crossing of Sweetwater, 12½ miles east of here. From here we returned to Winter Quarters on the Missouri river.

In 1849 I came on to the valley with my father and mother and one of my nephews that was living with them. One day while traveling up the Platte a stampede occurred in our train, and one woman (Sister Hawke) was killed, and a young woman named Finley badly hurt. I had the early experience in the valley with the crickets and grasshoppers. I had my crop all destroyed by the grasshoppers one summer, which saved me the trouble of harvesting it. I have seen the grasshoppers flying so thick on a clear day that a person could not see the sun.

I see this is lengthening out, but there is one more incident I would like to refer to. It was at a celebration of the Fourth of July, 1850, in Salt Lake City. It was a fine, clear day, but there was a gust of wind came up in the afternoon which snapped the liberty pole off a few feet below the flag and it fell to the ground, after which it was as calm and as fine as it had been. Of course this was just a "happen-so!"

JAMES P. TERRY.

A MODERN JOSHUA.

President John Taylor was a modern Joshua in many respects. He took the place of President Young, even as Joshua took the place of Moses anciently. The first we hear of him on this earth was that he was born in England. He received a common education at school; the high scholarship he attained to afterwards was acquired in every-day life. At a young age he was apprenticed to the wood-turner's trade; at the age of twenty his father moved to Toronto, Canada, where he worked at his trade. He had joined the Methodists in England and became an exhorter, which means, when the preacher is absent the exhorter takes his place, and in ordinary times do as some of the hard praying and singing.

John Taylor with a number of his young friends were not satisfied with their religion. They prayed to the Lord to show them the truth. About that time came Parley P. Pratt to Toronto with a letter of introduction that a merchant had given him to Taylor, who, not knowing anything of Pratt's mission until later, was told how Heber C. Kimball and others came to his house in Kirtland, Ohio, after he and his wife had retired: Heber requested him to get up as he had a prophecy to deliver to him: "Arise and go forth, take no thought for the necessities of life, for the Lord will supply you all things; thou shalt go to Upper Canada even to the city of Toronto; then thou shalt find a people prepared for the Gospel, and they shall receive thee, and thou shalt organize the church among them, and the Gospel shall spread, and from the things growing out of this mission shall the fullness of the Gospel spread into England." After Pratt's preaching several sermons, John Taylor with others received the good tidings and joined the church, and from that day until the day of his death he was a zealous worker.

The other part of Heber C. Kimball's prophecy was also literally fulfilled as he gave it to Parley P. Pratt, for on the 8th day of August, 1839, he left Montrose to fill his mission. In Nauvoo Elder Taylor joined Wilford Woodruff, who was scarcely able to drag himself along, and who remarked that he felt and looked more like a subject for the dissecting table than a missionary. (Look at President Woodruff now, 55 years afterwards!) These two were among the first to take the glad tidings to England. The thousands that heard them there will remember with what pleasure they were received in that land. To speak and to write was John Taylor's pleasure; if his children, grandchildren, and the young of Utah had heard him, as I have heard him, and read his editorials on the duty of the Saints, they would be proud of him. I will here advise his children and grandchildren and all the young people of Utah to read his "Life," by B. H. Roberts; but even that book can give you but a faint idea of the great, good and brave man. He was a server of the Lord, and a champion of human rights. He was shot with five bullets at Carthage jail when Joseph and Hyrum Smith were killed. Hear what he says: "When I reflect that our noble chieftain, the Prophet of the living God, had fallen, and that I had seen his brother in the cold embrace of death, it seemed as though these was a void or a vacuum in the great field of human existence to me, and a dark, gloomy chasm in the kingdom, and that we were left alone. Oh, how lonely was that feeling! How cold, barren and desolate was that thought!"

The bullet that was aimed at John Taylor's heart buried itself in his watch; he suffered and lingered many months between life and death. On getting well, hear what he says: "I shall never forget the feeling of gratitude that I then experienced towards my Heavenly Father (when he found how his life was saved). I felt that the Lord had preserved me by a special act of mercy; that my time had not yet come, and that I had still a work to perform upon the earth." The hands of the watch stood at five o'clock, sixteen minutes and twenty-two seconds, thus marking the moment when its possessor stood between time and eternity. That he was preserved for a great work, and that he did that work and did it well, all those that knew him can testify. In organizing the people into companies to move from Nauvoo to Council Bluffs, and getting them quartered away from the mobs, to prepare a large company to live, and afterwards to prepare them to follow the Pioneers, was no small job. He had no sooner landed them at the Bluffs before he was again called to go to England on important business. When he returned President Young with Elder Woodruff and others were ready to start West; no one knew where they were going—they were led by faith. Elder Taylor was left in charge; it was he that sent men out into Iowa and Missouri to trade horses for cattle, buy corn and flour. When a company of one hundred wagons was ready they started out. His company consisted of 1,300 souls; more than half were women and children, some of the men having gone with the Pioneers, and five hundred men with the Mormon Battalion. It was a brave undertaking to start with this train through hostile Indians. Parley P. Pratt took the lead with 50 wagons, then Elder Taylor with 50; Charles C. Rich between them with a small cannon. These trains kept as close together as grass and water would permit.

On, on, these pilgrims traveled, and what faith they must have had! Think of it, young people; five hundred brothers, husbands, and sweet hearts, marching to the then far off land of Mexico to war, perhaps never to be seen again, and still others ahead, with but a handful of men in the midst of Indians and a wilderness! How often must the thought have occurred, "O where is my husband tonight! or my brother, or my lover?" What fortitude these grand, brave people must have possessed. They were men and women that must have been born for the occasion. Still, they were in a manner happy, for they would pray and sing and make the best of it.

In all these anxieties, labors, fears, hopes and rejoicings Elder Taylor took part. Many leaned on his strength in those days. When despair settled over the colony he infused it with hope; when the weak faltered he strengthened them; when the fearful trembled he encouraged them; those cast down with sorrow he comforted and cheered. His faith and trust in God, and in His power to preserve and deliver His people, was as unshaken in the midst of the difficulties in coming to and settling these valleys of Utah as it had been in the midst of mob violence in Missouri and Illinois; as unmoved as it was amid the confused shouts and curses, groans and shriekings and murderous bullets, all mingling together, that made up that scene of hell and death in Carthage jail. What caused fear in others provoked merriment in him.

We find in October, 1849, at that conference, that Elder Taylor was called to go to France, Lorenzo Snow to Italy, and Erastus Snow to England. With only eight or ten others, they traveled the plains in the cold, pitiless winds and storms, only about half clad, with no extras. It is different now, going in a Pullman palace car with cash to pay your way. His labors in France the reader will get in his history. After three years' absence he returned, only to be appointed a home missionary. Soon after he was sent to New York to start a paper called The Mormon. Horace Greeley in giving it notice said it was a creditably printed newspaper and well edited. The office was situated on Nassau and Ann streets, between the Herald and Greeley's paper. Here is the prospectus: "We believe in good, sound, healthy morals, in matter of fact philosophy, in politics uncorrupted, and that secures the greatest good to all. We believe in the God of heaven and certainly in religion. We believe in a religion that will make a man go down to the grave with a clear conscience and an unflinching step, to meet his God as a Father and a friend without fear."

Well do I remember when in San Bernardino with Bartholomew's circus, buying the old papers from Joseph Rich, and Marion Lyman, and among them were The Mormon. The editorials of many I cut out, and though a thoughtless boy they interested me. I recognized the writer's ability then, and when I became acquainted with him in after years it was as though I had known him always.

When the Johnson Army of 1857 was camped on Ham's Fork, Captain Van Vliet came to Salt Lake for grain for the command, but there was none for him; the people had made up their minds not to be persecuted any more, and this is what they said and did. Elder Taylor addressed the meeting that the captain attended, and the Elder asked the people, "Would you if necessary put the torch to your houses and lay the land in waste and go to the mountains?"

Brigham Young said: "Try the vote."

Elder Taylor—"All you that are willing to set fire to your property and lay it in ashes rather than submit to military rule and oppression raise your right hand."

About four thousand all voted.

Elder Taylor—"I knew what your feelings would be. We have been persecuted and robbed long enough, and in the name of Israel's God we will be free!"

The captain was astonished and went home a friend to the people.

While preaching that day Elder Taylor got very earnest, and President Young caught him by the coat-tail as a reminder. Taylor turned around and said, "Brother Brigham, let go my coat tail; I tell you, the bullets in me yet hurt!"

All know how the army were at last used; first to bring money to the people, and afterwards they were sent down South to fight the battles of the nation.

After President Young's death John Taylor was chosen as President of the Church. He brought to that office the experience of many years with President Young. He at once pushed the three temples in course of erection, sent out more missionaries, and gave great life to everything. One of the first incidents was a jubilee, such as ancient Israel used to have. Eight hundred and two thousand dollars ($802,000)—one half of that was owing to the Perpetual Emigration Fund—was forgiven the people, so that those who were too poor to pay it were relieved. The Female Relief Societies had saved up 34,761 bushels of wheat which they loaned out to the poor that had none for seed. Many other good things were done at that jubilee which has had its good effect.

In one part of the Bible we find where Joshua asked the Lord to let the sun and moon stand still, while he licked the five kings. This shows to me just how anxious he was to have a good chance to do their work. In a later verse we can see how long the time seemed while he was in the fight; it says the sun stood still and the moon stayed until the people avenged themselves upon their enemies; after the fight, we read that there was no day like that before it or after it; the sun did not go down for a whole day. I can appreciate the feeling and anxiety, for when the Indians had us surrounded once it seemed to me an age, before we got out of it; since that time it has been plain to me about the sun standing still on Joshua. Well, Elder Taylor was like Joshua, only more so; when he got into debate or in a moral fight he wanted the sun, moon and stars all to stand still and look on while he demolished his adversaries.

President Taylor's life is known to us elder ones, and the young can learn of this great man from his books and writings, from the many sermons that are printed. It will pay them to hunt them up and read them for the many good lessons they will glean therefrom. He was himself, and there was or is none like him. When we recount the activity of his life, when we contemplate the dignity of his character and of his cause, and how exceptional it has been, what an example it is for us! Should we not emulate him continually?

RETURNED ELDERS.

Elder C. A. Carlquist, of this city, who has been absent for almost two years on a mission to the Scandinavian countries, arrived in this city in company with twenty-one Elders, all released from their various fields of labor in England, Germany and the Scandinavian kingdoms. Elder Carlquist left his home on May 28, 1892, and arrived in this city, returning, on April 28, 1894. The first nine months he labored as a traveling Elder in the Gothenburg conference, over which he later presided a short time. On May 1, 1893, he was called to Copenhagen to preside over the Scandinavian mission, which position he has filled until released to return home.

Elder John A. Johnson, of Monroe, Sevier county, Utah, left for a mission to the North on May 5, 1892, and returned in company with Elder Carlquist on April 28, 1894. He has labored principally in the Jonkoping branch of the Gothenburg conference, Sweden, where he has met with fair success.

Elder Gustave Lindahl, of this city, also returned in the same company, April 28, 1894. He has been absent since May 7, 1892, and has labored in the Stockholm conference, Sweden, presiding over the Vesteras branch.

The Elders state that the work in Sweden is progressing fairly, the prejudices of the people having been almost overcome in many places. The clergymen of the established church still have the power, by law, to silence any lay preachers of any denomination, provided they can induce the members of the church board to concur with them. In former years this law was made operative against numerous persons, many of whom were imprisoned for disobedience to such clerical edicts, but at present the difficulty for the priests to obtain a prohibiting order from their less orthodox church boards has been so great that the Elders have in most cases been left alone, and people listen to them with respect. Some opposition is met with through slanderous newspaper articles, but in most cases even such can no longer do the injury that formerly resulted from them.

The Elders feel well in body and spirit and are full of hope for the mission in that part of the field. Their journey across the ocean was a pleasant one.

Elder Christian Munk Jr., of Mantä, returned on Saturday evening, April 28, from a mission to the Northern States. He left his home March 30, 1892, and was assigned to the Indiana conference, laboring six months in Grand county, Indiana. The remaining portion of his mission was spent in southern Illinois. He was kindly treated by the people, better than he had expected, and met with fair success. The majority, however, were indifferent to the Gospel message.

TWO WOMEN BADLY HURT.

PROVIDENCE, April 24th, 1894.—An accident happened to a couple of ladies from our town yesterday. Rosina Trabber and Bertha Beutler were going to Hyrum to get some flower roots to plant, and when they reached the other side of Millville, and going over the bridge that spans the large canal crossing the county road leading to Hyrum, the horse took fright at some rocks by the bridge, made a bolt and the ladies were thrown into the canal eight feet below. Mrs. Trabber had three ribs broken on the right side, and Mrs. Beutler had her leg broken in two places; her head was also badly bruised. It was fortunate there was no water in the canal or they both would have drowned, as they lay there helpless over an hour before any one found them. Doctor Snow is attending them, and hopes are entertained that they will soon recover.

I can report our town in a good condition; the people are not waiting for things to turn up, but they are turning them up in great shape. Many trees and vines are being planted to spring, and garden stuff is being put in rapidly. The people feel encouraged at the outlook for crops. The Bishop and other leading men are preaching by example, and the consequence will be, we will have plenty and will not have to join anybody's "army." Providence takes the lead of the county in raising fruit; a few years ago it was called Dutchtown and was not much known, but today she is pointed to with pride for her thrift. We are sending two missionaries this spring, and the people are doing nobly in helping them to their fields of labor.

CATTLE AND SHEEP.

A number of Utah men left Friday and Saturday for Evanston, Wyoming, to take part in a meeting which they expected to be held there on Monday, in regard to the sheep and cattle contention that is now going on there. These men, while they are residents of Utah, own large flocks of sheep which are kept in Wyoming. They cannot be classed as Utah sheep, for the reason that they seldom if ever cross the line into this Territory. The taxes on them are paid in Wyoming, so that state gets the benefit of their presence, and also of the business connected with their care; but when there is any profit to the owners that comes this way.

The present agitation is caused, so the sheep owners state, by the disagreement with the cattlemen, some of whom are residents of Utah. The latter have interests, by purchase or lease, in the railway sections of land in the district where the trouble has been. They also use the otherwise unoccupied government land. There is a fence law in Wyoming, but the owners or lessees of railway sections cannot fence public domain, so the cattle ranges are left open. The sheep men consider that they have as much right to the public domain as have the cattle men, so they come in there when they feel so inclined. In so doing the two interests are brought into conflict. Although the boundaries of the sections are pretty generally recognized, sometimes a shepherd gets his flock on a cattlemen's land, and then he has to move out. This was the case in the recent sheep removals near Evanston, as told in the dispatches. The sheepmen came in to the east of Evanston, between that town and the Muddy, for the lambing season, and the cattlemen had them removed.

The question to be discussed on Monday, if the proposed meeting can be held, is whether the sheep or the cattle shall roam on the public domain in that locality. There is expressed a hope that the matter will be amicably settled without having recourse to the courts, though there is considerable feeling on the part of some parties on each side, one asserting that the cattle barons want to claim and use the whole district regardless of the public domain sections, and the other that the sheep kings herd their flocks on private and public land indiscriminately, denuding it of vegetation so that cattle cannot thrive.

Regarding the condition of the sheep this year in that section, a heavy owner said today: "Our wool went at 8½ cents for last season's clip. We got 6 cents advance and the other 2½ cents has just come, so we may be able to keep even with that, but we haven't figured up yet. It will be pretty close. But the sheep are in as good condition this spring as I ever knew them. We never had so little loss any winter as the past. So far as the sheep are concerned we are in an excellent situation. If there is a fair market this season we will have no reason to complain."

A PIONEER BRUSH MAKER.

I wish to call your attention to an article published in your daily issue of one day last week, concerning a visit to the fair of home productions, by a reporter, in which occurs a conversation between the aforesaid and a brush-maker, who is made to say in reply, or to convey the idea, that there are no brushes made here now, nor since the death of the veteran Thomas C. Jones, who died a few years ago. I desire to rectify the impression made, and would state that I commenced to manufacture brushes in the fall of 1861, in a building owned by Elder George Goddard, about six doors below Godbe's store. I was the successor of Gilbert Clements, who thought there was more money in merchandising, and who received such a severe scoring from President Young when he asked him to preach a discourse upon the necessity of home manufactures; he tried but could not do it. He grew cold and went out west, and I stuck to it, with little success. I expect, however, I shall be succeeded by my son when he becomes of age.

Second Pioneer Brushmaker.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

The district school at Kamas, Summit county, has been closed for lack of funds.

The directors of the Deseret National bank held their regular meeting Tuesday and declared a quarterly dividend of three per cent.

The Lehi Banner says it is more than likely that the schools of that place will have to close at the end of five weeks of the present term, for the want of funds.

The Deseret Woolen mills, as announced in the News would be the case, have started up. A portion of the plant is now being operated, and the whole will be working at as early a date as practicable.

J. McCulloch, Logan, was assisting in the performance of a surgical operation on a colt on Tuesday, when a sudden lunge or kick drove the knife into one of his wrists. Four large arteries were severed, and it took nine stitches to sew the gaping wound.

A Weiser, Idaho, dispatch says that W. O. Hemlow, of Payson, Utah, has entered into a contract with prominent fruit growers in the locality of Weiser, to establish there a canning and pickle factory with a capacity of 1,000 cans daily. The machinery is to be shipped from Chicago.

The old settler A. S. Warren was a visitor, on Tuesday, says the Springville (Utah) Independent. He is engaged in attending to the honey bee and expects fairly good results this season. Amos drove one of the first wagons on the present site of Springville, Sept. 18th, 1850.

The sugar factory directors announce that on May 1st the factory will start up on a special run of sugar, the material for which it was thought to hold till the opening of the next season's run. This special run will last nearly a month, and produce about 800,000 pounds of sugar.

The directors of the Provo Woolen Mills have made an important order for the enlargement of the plant at Provo, in order to meet the demand for a greater variety of goods. The order consists of several thousand dollars' worth of machinery for the finishing department of the mills, wool scourers, etc., which will be placed in operation as soon as it can be set up. The mills are now working to their full capacity.

Mr. John Callis on Wednesday was exhibiting a specimen of copper ore that was literally filled with virgin copper, says the Coalville Times, fully one-fourth of the piece shown being pure metal, and the specimen was as large as a hen's egg. Mr. Callis informs us that he discovered this rock within ten miles of Coalville, by accident, the specimen he brought being knocked off with a shovel and was less than eighteen inches from the surface.

Between fifty and seventy-five persons are at present busily at work at Swan Lake, "the coming capital of Millard county and possibly of Utah Territory," as Superintendent Aldrich enthusiastically puts it. Upward of 1000 acres of wheat, barley and oats have been planted, besides a large tract of land seeded to lucern. The grain is looking well, and there is no danger of floods or bursting of reservoirs. Some building is also going on.—Fillmore Progress.

Mr. Joseph Huff, a merchant of Oasia, is in town, and was circulating freely among his friends. Mr. Huff is also interested in gold mining properties in Osceola and reports that camp to be brightening up with signs of increased activity. He states that he is here principally to lay in a stock of supplies with which to begin operations on his property, and as soon as the weather breaks up in that district he anticipates quite a number of men being put to work.

A warrant has been issued by Commissioner Greenman for the arrest of one H. C. Webb, on a charge of obtaining money by false pretenses, the complaining witness being W. B. Preston. It is claimed that the defendant secured $50 on a horse and wagon, of which he falsely represented himself to be the owner.

The sheriff's officers are searching for Webb, but it is believed that he has left the city, as he has been in trouble in another quarter in the city, and the police would also like to hear of him.

Messrs. William Redden, John Sprigge, Charles and Cap Morby went down to Henefer this week to explore the bottomless pit about three miles from Henefer, says the Coalville Times. Parties have been down in this pit 280 feet, and were unable to go further, but they say there is a hole from that depth in which they dropped rocks, and were unable to hear them when they struck bottom. The party were unable to make any explorations of the immense cave on account of the water which is now running in, but will make another visit at an early date.

Word of the sudden death of Amelia Christiansen at the Templeton hotel in Salt Lake City reached Logan by telegraph on Tuesday morning. The young lady, who was 22 years of age, was in Logan last week for the purpose of attending the funeral of her foster mother, and appeared to be enjoying robust health. She returned to Salt Lake on Saturday, and her sudden death determined her relatives to have a post-mortem examination made to ascertain the cause. The examination was made by four physicians, who discovered a large tumor in the neighborhood of the kidneys which undoubtedly caused her death.

Henry W. Hooton, of the Cottonwood Gold and Reservoir Discovery Mining company which filed, its articles of incorporation with the county clerk on the 23rd inst., says the newly discovered natural reservoir above Dry Creek canyon has an area of from 600 to 700 acres, and has been sounded to a depth of 275 feet. The water is beautiful, clear and fresh from the mountain snows. The face of the tunnel which is being driven is to the west, directly on this valley. The nearest route to the place is a bridle path up the other side of the canyon from the wagon road, meeting the latter beyond the reservoir. In addition to the ledge location, the company has forty acres of placer claims. The ground is granite and gravel, carrying free gold at $8 to $10 to the ton.

Elder Edward Stevenson, who has recently returned from a trip to California, where he has enjoyed the sights at the Fair and the pleasure of a walk in orange groves, and under olive trees and palms, favored the News with a pleasant call Tuesday morning. The gentleman celebrates the 74th anniversary of his birthday that day and has the congratulations of a host of friends, including the News. Elder Stevenson was born at Gibraltar, Spain, May 1, 1820. He joined the Saints in the state of Michigan in 1833 and has passed through the various experiences of the Church both in the states and this Territory, where he arrived in 1848. He looks hale and hearty and capable of weathering many a storm yet in the cause so dear to his heart.

In addition to the many applicants for pugilistic distinction with which this city is graced (?) there is now another advent in the shape of a potato-eating freak. This man comes from Seattle, Washington, and has a reputation in that city for doing what he claims, at least, to eat potatoes to disappear by the wholesale. He wants to be allowed the opportunity of disposing of internally 100 lbs of potatoes daily, 83 1-3 lbs to each meal, or 700 lbs a week, and he is willing to make a bet of 10 to 1 that he can do the trick.

It has been suggested, however, that if he will go to the "Industrial army" camp, he is more than likely to meet many who can go him one better, if he is willing to skirmish around and furnish the potatoes.

The nightwatchman at the Provo woolen mills at 10 o'clock on Saturday night discovered the wool room, which occupies the fourth story of the stone building, to be full of smoke. He searched for the fire, but was unable to locate it. A further search in connection with the electrician revealed nothing. Policeman Buckley was next called upon. He sprung open the door of the carding room office on the third floor and some papers and pieces of burlap were found in a red smouldering mass emitting a great deal of smoke, which ascended through the elevator shaft to the fourth story. The fire was extinguished without any excitement being caused. No damage of any consequence was done. Investigations are being made by the city marshal and the manager and superintendent of the mills as to the origin of the blaze.

Spencer Clawson Jr., the 15-year-old son of Councilman Clawson, was the victim of a serious accident about 5 o'clock Sunday evening.

The young man was returning from the city cemetery where he had been strewing his mother's grave with a collection of beautiful flowers. As he was driving along the incline of First Street where that thoroughfare intersects with Canyon Road his horse took fright and dashed down the steep grade at a terrific rate.

The young man tugged away at the reins and endeavored to get the animal under control, but failing, sprang from the conveyance and struck the ground with considerable force. As a result his left leg was broken in two places below the knee. He was also seriously shaken up and the extent of his injuries is not exactly known. Dr. Richards reduced the fracture and with the care that will be bestowed on the patient it is expected that he will soon recover.

Mrs. Howes, a tenant of the Ricketts block, on Thursday night had a bundle containing a little girl baby about two weeks old deposited on her door step. She heard a sharp rap at the door and on opening it saw the form of a woman rapidly disappearing. She then stooped over to examine the parcel and discovered that some heartless mother had taken that method of thrusting her offspring from her. Accompanying the child was the following note:

TWENTY-FIRST WARD,
Salt Lake City.

Dear Mrs. Howes:

I believe you are a good, kind-hearted woman, and I trust to you my dear baby. I cannot support it, and must give it away. Please take it and be kind to it, as you are to your own little girl. God bless my darling, and bless you for taking care of it. My husband has deserted me and I cannot get back to Boston, where my relatives are.

A BROKEN-HEARTED MOTHER.

Brigham Perkins and Miss Rose Jenkins will be salutatorian and valedictorian respectively at the commencement exercises of the Latter-day Saints college in this city. The exercises will occur June 7th.

At the meeting of the Salt Lake County Trustees' association held on Saturday afternoon, as stated in the News, a resolution was under consideration to establish two other county high schools besides at the Central Seminary, Mill Creek. The proposed second one was to be established in Farmers' ward, the third one to be farther west. Upon more mature consideration it was thought best to establish but the one, that at Mill Creek. A mass meeting of the citizens of the thirteen contiguous districts probably will be held in the near future at the seminary building, when final action will be taken upon the project. The action on the part of the trustees' association has been of an advisory nature.

Coroner Taylor Monday, April 30 held an inquest over the remains of John Lynch, the night porter of the Walker House, who was found dead in his bed room on Saturday evening, at the residence of his mother at the corner of Second and C streets.

It appears that the deceased went to his home about 1 o'clock Saturday morning, ate a lunch and retired to bed. Nothing more was heard or seen of him till his lifeless body was found by his mother on the evening of that day. A bullet hole in his head, his brains oozing from the ghastly wound, pools of blood upon the bed and floor, and a .38-caliber revolver near his right hand, told briefly the story of self destruction.

The coroner was notified and took charge of the remains, but was unable to find any clue or reason for the rash act. The deceased had a brother who committed suicide in this city two or three years ago. The mother of the dead man is 70 years of age, and is prostrated with grief.

The Salt Lake County Trustees' association met Saturday. Superintendent D. R. Allen presided. Mr. Cornwall, chairman of the committee appointed at the last meeting to consider the feasibility of establishing a county high school, reported that the committee had received a proposition from the ecclesiastical board of the Central Seminary to the effect that the seminary building could be had for high school purposes at a reasonable rental. Upon motion the report of the committee was accepted. A resolution was unanimously adopted that it be the sense of the meeting that one or more high schools be established in Salt Lake county, and that one of such schools be established at Mill Creek, in the Central Seminary. At the time of going to press, a resolution was under consideration to establish two other schools in the county.

The county commencement exercises will be held in the Salt Lake Theater on June 18th, 1894. After the exercises of graduation, the graduates and their friends will repair to Calder's park for recreation.

There was a lamentable and fatal accident at McCornick's bank shortly before 5 o'clock Thursday night. The victim was John Belike, a professional freecor, decorator and painter, who came to America from Germany about eighteen years ago and who has resided in Salt Lake for the past three years and a half.

O late he has been employed by C. W. Midgley, and when he met with the mishap which cost him his life was finishing a day's work on the inside of McCornick's bank. It appears that he lost his balance and was precipitated to the floor, a distance of ten or twelve feet, with considerable force. He was rendered unconscious and remained in a comatose state most of the time until his death, which occurred at 1 o'clock Friday morning. His injuries were about the head, neck and shoulders. The deceased had no relatives here. He has a brother somewhere in California. He was considered a very fine artist in his particular profession and did a good deal of work in the Salt Lake Temple. He was 47 years of age.

There was a very large attendance of relatives and friends of the late Margaret D. F. McMaster at the Eleventh ward meeting house Tuesday afternoon, at the funeral services. The building was filled to its utmost capacity by those who came to pay their last respects to the departed. Four of her sons acted as pall-bearers. One son, Don, is absent in Montana, and was unable to get here. He last saw his mother about two weeks before her death, when she was very ill. The Relief society of the ward, over which Sister McMaster had presided for many years, attended in a body. The services were conducted by Bishop Robert Morris. The meeting house was appropriately draped in white, and lilies and other flowers adorned the stand and casket. The speakers were Elders Joseph E. Taylor, Samuel W. Richards, C. W. Penrose, Wm. Smith, Joseph H. Felt, Robert Morris and Mrs. M. Isabella Horne, who referred to the estimable life of the deceased and the noble example she had set to all her associates; her untiring devotion to the needs of the poor and the afflicted was especially dwelt upon. The choir, under the direction of Elder Henry Tuckett, furnished appropriate music, and a long cortege followed the remains to the grave, where the dedicatory prayer was offered by Bishop Robert Morris, and the body of Sister McMaster was laid to rest to await the resurrection morn.

April 25 the Great Salt Lake & Hot Springs railway began tracklaying on its line to the north of Bountiful, and will continue until the station in Centerville is reached. The intention is not to stop then if arrangements under way can be completed, but to push on to Kaysville and beyond. The grade on which tracklaying was begun today was made last fall.

The road is also putting in a spur to the large brickyard plant started up near Bountiful by Bridge & Kirk, thus bringing another extensive brick manufactory in close railway connection with this city.

A passenger line has been established connecting the road with the stockyards. For the present passengers destined to the latter place will be carried in a carriage from the railway station to the yards, until rail connection can be made.

Mr. Bamberger is confident that the road will be pushed on to Coalville at an early date, and that $3 coal from that point for this market will be the result. This will be important not only to ordinary coal users in the city but to the copper plant, which will consume about 60 tons of coal per day. Had it not been for the great financial depression it is estimated that not less than seven million dollars would have been invested in the road before this by outside capitalists. Now that confidence in the West is being restored, and investors are beginning to feel as safe or safer here than in the East, it is expected that the enterprise will be taken up and carried through, as the prospects for a heavy business are excellent.

Many hearts in this community will be filled with sorrow at the demise of Mrs. Lusanah J. McEwan, which occurred April 25. The deceased was the wife of Henry T. McEwan, whose father was accidentally killed last week. She was the daughter of the late Bishop L. W. Hardy, and was a native of this city, being in her thirty-first year. She leaves three small children.

Sister McEwan was a most estimable woman, whose sweet disposition and amiable ways made her a large circle of friends. She has been very ill for several months, and all that loving care and skillful attendance could do was done for her, and it was hoped that she would be again restored to health. But this was not to be, and in her departure is mourned an affectionate wife, a kind and loving mother, and a noble woman. May He who doeth all things well comfort the hearts of the sorrowing husband and children and other relatives and friends, and strengthen them in this time of great affliction. The funeral services were held in the Twentieth ward meeting house Friday afternoon.

There was a very large attendance. The floral decorations in the hall were beautiful and appropriate. The speakers were Elders H. J. Grant, A. H. Cannon, A. M. Cannon, O. F. Whitney and George Romney. The closing prayer was offered by Bishop Romney, and a large cortege followed the remains of the deceased to the cemetery. In their addresses, the speakers at the funeral services feelingly referred to the noble example and estimable character of the deceased. The remarks were also full of consolation and sympathy for the bereaved.

A representative of the News Thursday morning met Hon. W. H. Seegmiller, of Richfield, Sevier county. In answer to questions the gentleman stated that the spring was somewhat backward in his part of the country. There was an immense amount of snow in the mountains and that fact was cheering the hearts of the farmers. The Sevier river was lower now than he ever knew it at this time of the year. Just how low it was could be better understood, he said, when he stated that it was not only fordable at almost any point, but that pedestrians could cross over dry shod. The cause of this remarkable contraction of a stream that has the reputation of being the most treacherous of any of Utah's rivers when at its height, which will be about one month hence, is the cold wave that has been hanging over this region recently.

The prospects for the coming crop season are very good. In fact, says Mr. Seegmiller, they are better than ever before. The acreage of cultivated land in Sevier county is larger this year by several thousand acres than at any time since the settlement of that part of the country. The increase is mainly due to the purchase last year and this of 8,000 acres of university land, the most of which will be made to yield to the sturdy husbandman for the first time during the coming summer. Horses, cattle and sheep all wintered well in that section.

A new creamery is to be built at Richfield immediately at a cost of $4,000.

The people are hopeful and generally in good health. A gloom, however, has just been cast over the community by the death of one of the most estimable young women of Richfield, Mrs. E. J. Heppler, wife of the county clerk of Sevier county. She was one of the most popular and useful ladies of Richfield, and her death will be sincerely mourned by a host of friends. She leaves a husband and one child, a week old, for whom the sincerest sympathy is felt.

SHOCKING MURDER AT MURRAY.

FROM DAILY OF MAY 1ST.

One of the most cold-blooded and deliberate murders ever perpetrated in this Territory occurred at a late hour last night about half a mile west of Murray, and distant some seven miles from this city. The scene of the awful tragedy was a saloon kept by one Charles Thiede, who is said to be of German extraction. In conjunction with the saloon is a small brewery, and these, located just at the rear of the Germania smelter, have been run by Thiede for the last eight or ten years. Prior to settling in Murray he had been a saloonkeeper in Salt Lake, first on Second South street and subsequently on the State road near Tenth South, the latter familiarly known as "Thiede's dive," it being the regular resort of questionable characters of both sexes. Thiede himself was an ex-pugilist, has long borne a bad reputation, and as an offender against the law he has figured conspicuously in the various courts of this city for several years past. His offenses have included selling liquor without a license, dispensing "fire water" to minors and assaults of various descriptions. Among the objects of his brutality was his wife—the poor woman who now reposes in the embrace of death, and whose life he will be required to answer the charge of taking. In short, Charles Thiede stands at this moment as the alleged murderer of her whom years ago, in a foreign country, he swore to love and cherish.

So far as obtainable at this writing, the facts of the murder are these: Thiede is 36 years old, his wife being near the same age. Quarrels have been of frequent occurrence between them for long past, owing largely, it is stated, to the man's drunken and dissolute habits, and when in his cups Mrs. Thiede has been invariably the target of her husband's ill-usage. A sister of Thiede, Mrs. Smith, of Sandy, was a visitor at the house during a portion of yesterday, and left there for home towards eight o'clock last night. It is believed that Thiede had been again drinking during the day, though at that time there was nothing particular to indicate any approaching trouble.

It would appear that just after the closing of the premises—somewhere about 10 o'clock—certain of the neighbors heard a woman's piercing screams proceeding from the direction of the saloon, but as this was no very uncommon thing at Thiede's, no particular notice was at first paid to the incident. The presumption therefore is that these were the unfortunate woman's dying cries. What actually happened, however, is at present a matter of conjecture, but it is thought that Thiede chased his wife out of the house into the yard and there inflicted the fatal injuries upon her.

It was shortly after midnight when the news of what had happened became known outside, and Thiede was the first to proclaim it by going over to Dr. W. E. Ferbee, to whom he conveyed the information that his wife had been killed. The doctor hastily dressed himself and at once went to the spot indicated by the husband. Lying at the east end of the saloon, and from four to six feet distant from the building, was the dead body of Mrs. Thiede, in a great pool of blood, the head being almost completely severed from the neck. It was a ghastly sight; but Thiede looked on in a very cool sort of fashion while the doctor and a Murray resident named Jacob Leuenberger carried the corpse into the house and laid it temporarily upon a billiard table. It was pretty evident, too, that he had been drinking.

The next step voluntarily taken by Thiede was to telephone to the office of Sheriff McQueen, in this city, requesting that he go over to Murray. The message was received soon after 1 o'clock, and the sheriff, accompanied by Deputy Montgomery, immediately upon learning the circumstances started thence in a buggy.

Upon reaching Murray, and on alighting at the front of the premises, the sheriff observed Thiede, whom he well knew, standing in the alleyway between the saloon and the brewery but without saying a word Thiede quickly vanished through a side door into the house. The sheriff entered a moment later by the west door, and found him standing behind the bar quietly taking a drink.

"Well," said Thiede, "I killed my wife last night," or words to that effect.

"It looks that way," rejoined Sheriff McQueen; "and I now place you under arrest."

"No; you have no right to arrest me," promptly answered the other man, and then changed his tune by adding, "I didn't do it."

It was nearly 11 o'clock this morning when Sheriff McQueen arrived in the city with Thiede, to have a glance at whom nearly 100 persons had congregated in and around the approaches to the sheriff's official quarters.

In a private conversation with a News reporter Thiede said he knew nothing at all about his wife's murder; that she kissed him before leaving the house about ten o'clock last night, and the next he saw of her was when he went out into the yard towards midnight and found her lying on the ground, dead. They had had no quarrel and he was at a loss to know who murdered her.

"Don't you know where the knife is that the murderer used?" asked the reporter.

"No, I don't," answered the prisoner in a surly way; "go and ask somebody else about it, not me."

The knife with which the deed was committed has not yet been found. It is believed, however, to be somewhere in the creek which runs at the rear of the premises, and a diligent search is being made for it.

Coroner Taylor was also notified of the bloody tragedy shortly before 5 o'clock, and half an hour later he was driving rapidly toward Murray in company with Undertaker Skewes. Arriving at the scene of the murder he at once commenced an investigation with a view to securing witnesses for the inquest, which he set for 2 o'clock this afternoon. Mr. Taylor ascertained that Thiede had abused his wife in a most violent manner the last few days. As late as Sunday night he struck her over the head with a beer glass and otherwise maltreated her. Yesterday morning he sent their only child—a little girl about ten years of age—away from home. During the day he continued to swear at and threaten his wife, but no particular importance or stress was attached to that fact by the neighbors, as it was a common thing for the pair to quarrel.

About 10 o'clock screams were heard by several persons coming from the direction of the saloon, and they were so piercing that some of those who heard them sprang from their beds and at least one man walked out into the street to listen. But when he got there all was silent and he went back to the house.

MODERN SHANGHAI.

(Copyrighted by Frank G. Carpenter, 1894.)

Shanghai, March 28, 1894.

It is now a week since I steamed through the mouth of the great Yang-tse-Kiang river into the wide waters of the Whampoa, on the French mail from Japan, and was anchored under the shadow of the immense fortifications which the Chinese have built at the Woosung bar to guard this entrance to their mighty empire. Standing on the ship I could see the guns frowning down upon us from the ramparts, and could almost hear the queer cries of the officers as they drilled their cotton-gowned, yellow-faced, almond-eyed troops. We lay for some time right opposite the entrance to the fort, a Chinese structure of gold carving, looking much like the gate to a temple, and our vessel was surrounded by the big gunboats of China's modern navy. It is twelve miles from Woosung up the Whampoa river to Shanghai, but the water is too shallow for the largest ocean steamers, and we made the journey in a steam launch. The country is dead flat. It is made up of the rich sediment which is carried down by the Yang-tse-Kiang river from the uplands of China. Standing on the deck of the ship you look for miles over gray mud plains, relieved here and there by what, in the distance, appear for all the world like cocks of hay, but which are the graves of Chinamen. On some of these graves I could see great black coffins resting, and I am told that the Chinese often leave their dead for years outside the ground, and that few burials are made when the ground is frozen. Here and there over the landscape were thatched huts surrounded by trees, and in the creeks, which cut the plain like the canals of Holland, the masts of the ships and boats could be everywhere seen. All along the river were platforms of bamboo, with little sheds at the back of them and nets hung out from their fronts into the water for the catching of fish. We passed hundreds of craft of all kinds, from the little fat-eyed gondola-like sampans to the ocean steamers bound for all parts of the world. Near the forts there were scores of great Chinese war junks, with cannon extending over their sides, and with great sails ribbed with bamboo, looking for all the world like the wings of gigantic bats, and the whole river was filled with other bat-like craft, carrying all sorts of cargo to and from Shanghai. As for our boat, it was filled with foreign and Chinese passengers. The only three Americans were Mr. and Mrs. Curwin Stoddard, of Philadelphia and myself. My photographer took a snap-shot at us, as we stood on deck, with Ah Shing, the rich Chinese tailor of Yokohama, who was on his way with his wife and baby to visit his papa in China.

Nearing Shanghai is like sailing into one of the great harbors of the Mediterranean. You see a foreign city lining the banks of the river and the smoke stacks of a dozen great factories send out their black clouds into the blue sky. There are several miles of these factories, and one I noted which covered many acres was in ruins from a recent fire. It was a big gray brick of many stories, which the Chinese had built for the manufacture of cotton and in which they have for some years employed hundreds of hands and had the finest of modern machinery. Until within a few months they have been paying for insurance to the foreign companies about $1,500 a year in gold. The fall in the value of silver to about 50 cents on the dollar made them grumble at this and when their policy lapsed last fall they economized by not renewing it. The result was that the fire cost them a million and a half of dollars, and as Li Hung Chang and others of the officials were largely interested in the stock the people will probably be squeezed to make up their loss. Going on up the river through great house like barges known as opium boats past a mile or so of massive wharves backed by iron-roofed warehouses, almost touching our side-wheeler gunboat the Monocacy, we landed at the French wharf and a moment later were in the greatest foreign settlement of China, the Paris of the east, the city of Shanghai.

There is no town on the globe like Shanghai. It is a city of the rich, who out here on the shores of Asia, within a stone's throw of the poorest people of the world, live more luxurious lives than do the wealthy people of the United States or England. I speak of the Shanghai of the European and the American. The Chinese who are mixed up in it are as poor or as rich as they are in other parts of the empire. The foreigners have the right to the land in what is known as the concessions. These belong to England, France and the United States, and the government is made up of a council elected by them, so that there is in reality here a little republic, which makes its own laws, has its own police force and manages its own business independent of the celestials. The land nominally belongs to the emperor, but it is the property of the foreigners by their paying a certain ground rent, which has been fixed by treaty. This amounts to about five gold dollars per acre a year. When it was bought it cost something like two hundred dollars per acre, but much of it has been sold for from sixty to one hundred thousand dollars per acre, and thus made the fortunes of the original holders. Upon it all sorts of improvements have gone up, and along the river there are now as fine houses as you will find anywhere in the world. Business blocks of immense size lie just back of a beautiful park between the river and the street, and a big city has grown up on the ground owned by the foreigners. There are only about three thousand foreigners, but the foreign settlement contains more than two hundred thousand people, the remainder of whom are natives, who like to do business and live under foreign protection. In addition to this, there is within a short distance the native city of Shanghai of one hundred and twenty five thousand. This is surrounded by walls, and it is as dirty and as nasty as are the Chinese cities of the interior, where a foreigner has never been seen. Foreign Shanghai is a city of electric lights, of newspapers and of libraries. The subscription library here contains twelve thousand volumes, and the library of the Shanghai Club has more than five thousand.

The Shanghai Club has a finer building than any club house in Washington. It cost $120,000 to build and ruined three contractors. At noon and in the evening you will meet in it as cosmopolitan a crowd as you will find in New York or Paris and its lobby buzzes with a noise which makes you think of the big hotels of Chicago when a national convention is in progress. The foreign settlement is, in fact, a city of clubs, and there is a racing club, cricket, rifle and yacht clubs and about a dozen different Masonic associations. There is a brass band that gives concerts three times a week during the summer and there are concerts and dances almost every night in the winter. Washington or New York has hardly as many entertainments as Shanghai, and the people here chase the Goddess of Pleasure much as they do in Paris. The city has its swell four hundred and the turouts of the rich are driven by Chinamen in livery with almond-eyed, long-gowned tigers on the footboards. The horses are generally little Chinese ponies, not much bigger than Newfoundland dogs, but their drivers race them like mad, and with gay harness the miniature baby coupes, landaus and drags are quite impressive. The conveyance of the ordinary citizen is the Japanese jinriksha, pulled by ragged, bare-headed coolies, and the Chinese, who wish to ride still cheaper, go about on wheelbarrows which are a sort of a cross between an American bicycle and an Irish jaunting car. They are made of wood with a wheel of about the size of the front wheel of a wagon coming up through the center of the bed of the barrow, and a frame work extending out in front of and behind this covering the wheel and leaving seats on both sides. The passenger puts one foot upon the seat and hangs the other in a stirrup made of rope of the size of a clothes line tied to the front of the seat and holds on for dear life to the frame while a coolie pushes the barrow along from the rear. If there is a second passenger he takes the other side of the barrow and holds on in the same way. Many of these vehicles carry freight and passengers at the same time. I saw one this morning which was loaded on one side with money in the shape of about a bushel of strings of copper cash, while an almond-eyed maiden tried to pull down the other side of the machine with her weight. She wore a silk coat and wide silk pantalets which reached to her feet, but where she put her foot into the stirrup I could note her little blue shoe with its pointed gold toe. It looked more like a miniature club foot than the real variety. Her leg, which was wrapped with cloth, was as thin as a broom handle and showed no signs above the ankle of the curve of the calf. She wore a silk cap, out of which her oily black hair peeped at the back, and from her ears hung triangular pendants of green jade. On other barrows I saw Chinese men riding in pairs, and I met still larger barrows used for the carrying of freight. The passenger wheelbarrows alone in Shanghai number about three thousand, and there are more than three thousand jinrikshas. The prices of both are very low. You can ride to any point in the city on a jinriksha for five cents, and the wheelbarrow hackmen get, I am told, about a cent a mile. I expect to take a trip on one soon, and will have my photographer take me en route.

I paid a visit yesterday to the biggest Chinese newspaper in the empire to make inquiries as to the employment of a Chinese artist to do some native illustrations for me, and had a most interesting talk with the manager. The paper is called the Shun Pao, and it is the best-paying and most widely circulated of the three native newspaper dailies of Shanghai. It is an eight page sheet of about the size and shape of Frank Leslie's newspaper or Harper's Weekly, printed on the thinnest of rice paper. It is so light that it does not weigh more than a man's handkerchief, and so thin that the paper can be printed on one side only. The paper goes to press in big sheets, which are so folded that the blank side is turned inward when taken in hand by the subscriber, and so that there is neither cutting nor pasting. Owing to the thinness of the paper, it has a greasy yellow appearance, and it is printed so closely with Chinese type that not an inch of space seems to be wasted. The head line or title of the paper consists of two Chinese characters, taking up a space not wider than one of the columns of our newspapers, and not more than an inch in length. It is a one-cent sheet, its price being ten cash, but, as China is on a silver basis, this should, in our money, now be divided by two, and its price would here be only half a cent.

But let me give you my talk with the managers. I went to the office without my interpreter, and my jinriksha man, after driving me through a series of narrow Chinese streets, in which we had a number of narrow escapes from pony caps and freight wheelbarrows, landed me at a ragged two-story building, with a side entrance. Over this were large tea-box characters, meaning the name of the paper. I went in and made my way to the second story, where I luckily stumbled into the room of the managing editor. I addressed him in good plain United States, and found that he spoke English as good as I did. I introduced myself, and showed him some letters which I carry from the State Department and from high officials at Washington. He read them and looked at the seals, and then bowed low again and again, and shook his own hands at me in Chinese fashion and asked me to be seated. At my request he took up a copy of his newspaper and explained it to me, giving me a number of facts about newspaper work among the celestials. "We have," said he, "the largest newspaper in China, and our daily circulation is about twelve thousand. There are two other native newspapers published in this city, but neither of them makes as much money or does as well as we do. We are the oldest, and we have been in existence now twenty-two years. We have a good advertising patronage, and the Chinese believe in newspaper advertising. Take a look at the paper and you will see that it is prosperous from an advertising standpoint."

I looked at it, but for the life of me I could not tell the "ads." from the editorials, and I said so. The editor took it from me and said: "The first page is all editorial. We don't let any of our advertisers use it. If we let one they would all want it, and so we use it only for ourselves when we have special announcements and for editorials and news. The second page and part of the third page is news and the ads. do not commence until the latter part of the paper. We often have to issue supplements to get in all our advertising, but our Chinese customers object if we do not put news and reading matter in the supplement as well. You note the lines run up and down the page instead of across it and the beginning is at the right of the page instead of the left, as with you. Our lines are about fifteen inches long and we count by the word; not by the line. Each Chinese character represents a word, and our rates are 5 cents for each ten characters for the first insertion, 3 cents when the advertisement runs for a week and 2½ cents a day per each ten words for all time after that."

"Are there many papers in China and do you find them in the interior?" I asked.

"No," replied the Chinese editor. "We circulate all over China, but you do not find papers published in the native cities. The governors would not permit them, as the editors might say things they would not like, and many of them would not want their doings criticised and reported. The Chinese are very economical. Money is worth a great deal here. We charge, for instance, 10 cash for this paper and we have in reality a circulation of at least 50,000, though we print only 12,000 papers."

"How is that?" said I.

"The paper is resold and rented by the subscribers and others, so that at least that many heads of families get hold of it. We pay our newsboys two cash a copy for selling, or, rather, we sell them the papers, so that we get eight cash out of the ten. They receive in your money just about one-tenth of a cent for selling and delivering the paper. Well! they cheat the regular customers often by renting the paper for six or seven cash to outsiders till 11 or 12 o'clock, when they will come around and get it and deliver it. We can't prevent this here. Then different shops subscribe for the Shun Pao and their customers come in regularly every morning and read it. Families pass it from one to the other, subscribing to gether for it, and there are men who make a business of going about day after day and buying up old and clean newspapers of the subscribers to carry them out in the country districts to sell. So you see every newspaper reaches at least a half a dozen persons or families before it is burned."

All of the unsold copies of the Shun Pao are burned by the office. The Chinese reverence literature so that they think it a sin to use as wrapping paper or in any common way anything written or printed in Chinese, and along the streets of the Chinese cities, fastened to the walls of the houses, you find little boxes filled with written scraps, which the passersby pick up whenever they chance to fall upon the street, to prevent the characters from being defiled. In Chinese houses, instead of pictures, you find often long scrolls containing a sentence of classic Chinese beautifully written, and the literati often write to each other in poetry.

I saw such scrolls in the little room of the dramatic critic of the Shun Pao, as I walked through the offices with the manager and was introduced to the editors. The city editor was a fat Chinese gentleman in tortoise shell spectacles, the glasses of which were as big as a trade dollar, who wore a blue silk gown and a black cap with a red button on it. He was surrounded by his long-gowned reporters, to whom he was giving the assignments of the day, and he told me that he would be on duty till 3 o'clock in the morning, when the paper would go to press. I next visited the composing rooms and took a look at the printers. There were, perhaps, a dozen at work, and I was told that their wages were from a dollar and a half to three dollars a week in silver, equal to seventy-five cents and a dollar and a half in our currency. The editors get from thirty to forty dollars a month, and reporters from eight to ten dollars a month in silver, according to their efficiency. The printers do night and day work for seven days in the week and 365 days in the year at these wages, and it takes no slight learning to be a Chinese printer. There are in the Chinese language 13,000 different characters, and each of the cases I saw in this composing room, the editor told me, contained about 10,000 different characters. Think of that, ye printers of America, and thank God you were born in a land where the alphabet contains only twenty-six letters, and where there is not a different sign for every word in the language. In a Chinese printing office the cases are ten times as big as ours, and each printer stands surrounded by three walls of type, running from his feet to the top of his head and sloping out from him on all sides.

After a look at the business office of the newspaper, I was shown the only illustrated paper in China, which is also issued from this establishment. It is published every ten days. It is about as big as an old-fashioned almanac, and it always appears in red or green covers. It publishes many descriptions of life in America, and its pictures of foreigners and their ways are laughable in the extreme. There is no perspective shown in the drawings, and the Chinese stories are full of blood and thunder of sentiment and humor. Here the Chinese Romeo woos his almond-eyed Juliet, and there the tragedies of love, abduction, of crime and superstition are depicted by the Gillams and Remingtons of this celestial land.

EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM OF EUROPE.

Permit me to furnish the readers of the News with a few elementary principles of the system of education on the Continent of Europe, or rather the organization of public schools.

I shall not here attempt a comparison with the "Educational System" of either Great Britain or the United States, but simply give a few elementary principles underlying the bases of their system. Through the courtesy of the Council of State or Minister of Public Instruction in Geneva I obtained cards permitting me to visit its public schools; and I took advantage of the opportunity. That which is said in this connection will, in general, have reference to the Canton or State of Geneva.

The public instruction here is under the superintendence of the State Council, with the aid of thirty commissioners. The rector of the university and the deans of the several different departments have likewise the voice of consultation. From the fact that education is obligatory upon all children between the ages of six and fifteen years it is necessarily free, the state being encumbered even with the furnishing of all books and other necessary school supplies for the use of its children. This modification, however, ought to be noticed, that it is optional with the parents whether they send their children to the public school, to a private school, or whether the instruction be given at the home of the parent. But in the two latter cases the mode of instruction followed is subject to the inspection of the State commission, and ought to correspond with the program by them arranged or be equivalent to it. The instructors of public schools are appointed by the State Council and their salaries fixed by the same body, not being permitted to exceed nor fall short of a certain sum, except in special cases. With but very few exceptions, the sexes in public schools are invariably separated—the girls in one school, the boys in another. From this general rule, however, we must except the different departments of the university. Sometimes, too, the sexes in the public schools receive their instructions in the same buildings, but in separate departments of the buildings. I was agreeably surprised upon entering a class of the college, in which the English language was being taught, to see so many young men rise simultaneously in recognition to the entrance of my companion and myself. The same act of courtesy was repeated upon our entrance to the superior school for the instruction of young ladies at a recitation upon French literature, with, however, this contrasted exception—it was a body of young ladies who rose to their feet instead of young gentlemen.

The course of public instruction comprehends, firstly, primary instruction; secondly, intermediate or secondary instruction; lastly, superior instruction. The primary instruction is subdivided into (a) ecoles infantines, or schools for the smallest of children; (b) primary schools; (c) complementary schools. Les ecoles infantines are again subdivided into an inferior and a superior department. In the inferior department children are received from the age of three to six respectively; hence the instruction is not obligatory, but seems to be designed for the children of parents who are to be away from home or at work during the day, or perhaps for those who would rather not have the care of their children. It thus serves as a safe and instructive retreat for the little ones. The child is occupied with some little play or manual performance which serves as a development of its physical and intellectual being. In the superior division of this department the child enters at the age of six years, where he remains till the age of seven, and is taught in connection with that which precedes—reading, writing, the elementary principles of calculation and drawing, together with little songs. The instruction given in this department is entirely by lady teachers, and is the true type of kindergarten schools.

At the age of seven years the child enters the primary school, where he remains for a period of six years—until he is thirteen. Here he is taught reading, writing and the French language, as well as the elements of the German language, arithmetic, mental calculation, the elementary principles of geometry, geography, natural history, elementary drawing, music and gymnastics; to which we may add manual labor for the boys and needlework for the girls. The scholastic year embraces from forty-two to forty-six weeks of study with from twenty-five to thirty-five hours per week. The scholastic year being divided into two semesters, the child undergoes an examination at the end of each semester.

On reaching his sixth degree and the age of thirteen years, the pupil on leaving the primary department enters the complementary school, which is designed for the completion of his elementary education and embraces a period of two years. The instructions given and received at this stage will necessarily depend upon the future aspirations of the pupil; also whether he is in the city or the country. But whatsoever may be his aspirations or the locality in which he dwells he will be instructed upon the elements of physical and natural science—if a boy, the institutions of his country; if a girl, domestic economy. The scholastic duration of this department embraces a period of from twenty-five to forty weeks, with from ten to eighteen hours per week; and, as in the primary department, the pupil undergoes an examination at the end of each semester. The results of the examination not only depend upon the examination in question, but also upon the year's work. The instructions given in primary schools as well as in the complementary schools are sometimes by male teachers and sometimes by female.

The department of higher or secondary instruction is divided into 1. The Professional Instruction, 2. The College, 3. The Superior School for the Instruction of Young Ladies. The professional instruction is designed as preparatory for the industrial, commercial and agricultural careers of life, and is divided into a. professional schools, b. evening schools, c. secondary schools for country districts. The pupil having arrived at this stage, the instruction is no longer free nor obligatory, unless it be for those who may have chosen to enter this department, (upon the arrival of their sixth degree and thirteenth year), instead of entering the complementary school. The professional school extends over a duration of two years of from forty-two to forty-six weeks each, and from thirty to thirty-five hours of lessons per week. The instruction given is the following—the French and German language with a view to special correspondence, commercial calculation and book-keeping, mathematics, physical and natural science—which have a special bearing upon the industry they are following, history, commercial geography, the duties of citizenship, industrial arts, beautiful arts, watch-making, carpentry, etc. The evening schools are designed for those having completed their complementary course and arrived at their fifteenth year. This period extends over a duration of two years, with but ten to twelve hours of lessons per week. The secondary school for the country districts are designed for those pupils having achieved their sixth degree in the primary schools. The instruction in this department must necessarily be of a rural nature in connection with other instructions; the boy is taught lessons of practical agriculture, the girl domestic economy.

The college, which is a division of the secondary or higher course of instruction, is designed for boys who have arrived at their 5th degree in the primary schools. The candidate is permitted to enter his matriculation in the college upon the presentation of his certificate of examination from the primary department of education. If, however, he has not followed the course of instruction in the public schools, he must then undergo an examination. The college is separated by two divisions, inferior and superior. The inferior embraces a period of three years, and in general terms comprises the following branches: The French, Latin and German languages, geography, history, arithmetic, general notions of constitutional government, the primary elements of physical and natural science, penmanship, drawing, music, and gymnastics. Having completed the course prescribed for the inferior division of the college, the student enters the superior division, where he remains for a period of four years. This division has four sections, (a) classic, (b) commercial, (c) pedagogic, (d) technic. In general terms, instruction is given in this department of the college upon the following branches: The French language and literature, the German language and literature, the Greek and English languages, geography, history, cosmography, mathematics, the physical and natural science, book-keeping, the elements of logic, psychology and political economy. The superintendence of the college is entrusted to one director, who does not form—at least only in exceptional cases—part of the Faculty of Instruction.

The superior school for the instruction of young ladies forms part of the secondary branch of public instruction. It is separated into two divisions, inferior and superior, the first extending over a period of four years, the latter comprising only three. In the first, instruction is given in the French and German languages, general history, geography, arithmetic, the elementary principles of physics and natural science, drawing, penmanship, music, gymnastics and needlework. The superior is divided into two sections—literary and pedagogic. In both of these sections a number of studies are obligatory, such as the French and German languages, abridged history of literature, general history, national history, geography, and cosmography, a general notion of geometry, commercial forms, natural and physical science, drawing, penmanship, music, cutting and dressmaking, hygiene, and a general notion of domestic economy. In connection with these obligatory studies, the following are optional: an abridged history of the French language, history of French literature, general literature ancient and modern, the English language, history of philosophy, the history of arts, the elements of civil and commercial law. To the pedagogical section the following extra instructions are given: arithmetic, algebra, psychology, the theory of pedagogy and the practice of elocution. Like the college, this superior school for the young ladies is under the direction of a superintendent who is not considered as a member of the Faculty of Instruction. The Faculty of Instruction is composed of ladies and gentlemen. According to the laws of the state no class in any of these schools (so far described) ought to contain more than fifty pupils or students. The teachers are called to attend their public conventions at stated intervals and their presence is obligatory. Each one of these departments of public instruction—the professional school, the college, the superior school for the instruction of young ladies and the University—form separate and distinct moral persons capable of receiving gifts etc.

I will only add that the University of Geneva has been gradually increasing as a medium of superior instruction for the last three hundred years, until now it is counted as one the leading Universities of Europe. Its affairs are governed by a senate which is composed of a Rector, a Vice Rector and the Deans of the several departments of the University. Each department is governed by the Faculty of the department at the head of which stands the Dean. Among the several branches of the Universities, its medical science and legal are, perhaps, the most important and influential. Its legal department is virtually the same as the Nancy College at Paris. After following the course prescribed in one and the other for three years and passing successfully the examination the candidate receives the grade of Licencie en Droit, or Master of Laws. Another year's time is usually required for the writing and publicly defending a thesis, at the end of which time the candidate receives the title of Docteur en Droit, or Doctor of Laws. It is frequently the case that the candidate takes his Master degree at Paris and comes to Geneva to take his degree of L. L. D. and vice versa. Besides other preparatory work, the student occupies his time with the Roman Law—that is to say the pandects or several branches of the Justinian Code; the French Law or different branches of the Napoleon Code; the Public Law of the principal nations and the comparative Commercial Law.

Conformable to a law of the 10th of June, 1876, the Republic of Geneva has created an inalienable fund for the encouragement of her students who may excel in superior work and conduct. To this fund is added ten per cent of the proceeds of the tuition of all students in the professional school, the superior school for young ladies, the College and the University. The fund is distributed by means of purses to those who may distinguish themselves. It may be stated without fear of refutation, that this system of instruction has produced good effects; as, generally speaking, the people are well informed.

UTAH'S INDUSTRIAL ARMY.

"General" Carter and his "industrial" army, numbering about 550 men, left the city Monday afternoon. All direct negotiations with the Rio Grande Western railway officials having failed, at least for the time being, the journey was commenced on foot.

All was activity in the camp of the army in the western part of the city at an early hour in the morning. At noon dinner was eaten at the soup house on Second West street. Beginning at 2 o'clock there was a parade over the principal streets. Three quarters of an hour later "General" Carter commenced a fiery speech on the vacant piece of ground opposite the Metropolitan hotel on West Temple street.

In substance he said that the movement was the greatest scheme ever started in the Territory of Utah. The cause of its birth was twenty-one years of unwise legislation. The culmination had come and disastrous results would follow unless the administration yielded to the living petition that had already commenced to present itself to the authorities at Washington. Should all peaceful supplication fail to bring relief, "Then," shouted Carter, "I say to arms. We will endure tyranny no longer."

Further along in his harangue Carter boastfully declared, "I desire it understood that we will not falter or fail in the accomplishment of our mission. We are going to Washington and no power on earth can stop us very long at a time. There are 5,000 men in Utah alone who would spring to arms and to our defense at a single word from General Carter."

The railroad officials came in for a goodly share of mild manuevered abuse, for refusing to carry the army from the Territory to Kansas City, as originally contemplated. In this connection the rumor comes from a source that should be reliable, that it would not be much of a deviation from the program if a freight train should be held up on the Rio Grande Western tonight or within two or three days at most and be pressed into service by the industrial s.

The most of the army has been reloaded the last few days and scores of suits worn by business men were identified as the marchers went by. Most of them have good shoes and are comparatively well provided for in all respects. Several wagon loads of provisions and bedding were sent on ahead to Murray, where the army proposes to camp for the night.

It was a matter of frequent remark that no bona fide residents of Salt Lake were seen in the ranks of the industrial. Very few of the men have lived in this city more than a few months. Most of them were of that class that was attracted here last fall on the promise that this was a good city to come to on account of the boundless charity and hospitality of the people.

MURRAY, May 1.—The industrial army is still here and there is no telling when it will move. If some of the men had their way they would remain here a good deal longer than the citizens will be willing to keep them. They passed the night in the Germania Lead Works, a building that has not been in use for some time. It is mechanically heated and ventilated; has hot and cold water and is just the sort of place any swell fellow would like to put up at during a vacation. Besides the men have plenty of food and clothes and all the comforts of home life.

General Carter went to Salt Lake today to see if he could not make arrangements for the long expected train. The men are waiting to hold it up. It is earnestly hoped here that they will not have to wait long.

MURRAY, Salt Lake County, May 1.—3:30 p. m.—The industrial army is still in camp at this place. The men are waiting around, and all are quiet. Carter, their commander, is in the camp, talking to the men, who are given to understand that they will move out for the south tonight. It is expected that they will be able to capture a train and make their way on to Colorado.

The R. G. W. officers say their position is unchanged regarding resistance of any attempt at capturing a train on their line.

MAY WEATHER.

The chief of the weather bureau directs the publication of the following data, compiled from the record of observations for the month of May, taken at this station for a period of twenty years.

It is believed that the facts thus set forth will prove of interest to the public, as well as the special student, showing as they do the average and extreme condition of the more important meteorological elements and the range within which such variations may be expected to keep during any corresponding month.

Mean or normal temperature, 59 deg. The warmest May was that of 1886, with an average of 62 degrees; the coldest May was that of 1880, with an average of 54 degrees; the highest temperature during any May was 93 deg. on May 31, 1887; the lowest temperature during any May was 31 deg. on May 1, 1887; average date on which last "killing" frost occurred (in spring) April 5th.

Average for the month, 1.78 inches; average number of days with .01 of an inch or more, 7. The greatest monthly precipitation was 4.30 inches in 1876; the least monthly precipitation was .06 in 1886; the greatest amount of precipitation recorded in any 24 consecutive hours was 1.35 inches on May 17, 1876.

The greatest amount of snowfall recorded in twenty-four consecutive hours (record extending to winter of 1884-5 only) was 3.5 inches on May 1, 1887.

Average number of cloudless days 11; average number of partly cloudy days, 13; average number of cloudy days, 7.

The prevailing winds have been from the Northwest. The highest velocity of the wind during any May was fifty-one miles on May 19, 1893.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

DENVER, April 24.—The first regiment of the Coxeys home reserve was formally organized at Lincoln park this afternoon. There were present about 1,000 men and 100 women, and it is stated this number have already signed the roll, which is expected to reach 2,000 within the next few days.

OMAHA, Neb. April 24.—Edward Rosewater of the Omaha Bee, was today sentenced to imprisonment for thirty days and to pay a fine of $500 for alleged contempt of court. Without being given an opportunity to appeal, Mr. Rosewater was ordered taken to jail at once, and for six hours he was behind the bars of Douglas county jail. At 7 p. m. the state supreme court granted a supersedeas and Mr. Rosewater was released until the case can be reviewed by the higher court.

CINCINNATI, April 25.—Mary Gilmartin, a clerk, was shot and killed today while on her way to work, by Father O'Grady, a Catholic priest who came from Ireland three months ago. Miss Gilmartin is from Sligo county. Father Gilmartin, of Chicago, is her brother. She met O'Grady in Oakland, and his attentions caused gossip. Last September she came to America. After the shooting O'Grady took arsenic, but it did not kill him. He confessed the murder. Among his letters was one written by Miss Gilmartin to Archbishop Ireland exculpating O'Grady from wrongdoing.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 25.—The strong hand of the national government has been extended to check the Coxeysites who seized a train at Butte, Mont. Colonel Swain in command of the department of Dakota has been instructed by telegraph to intercept the mob and restore the railroad's property. There are sufficient forces of the United States troops at St. Paul and Bismarck, and the train seizers will be stopped at one of these points. This peculiar movement throughout the West has aroused the apprehension of the national authorities. Further trespass upon vested rights and good order will probably be severely repressed whenever the United States laws are violated.

WASHINGTON, April 25.—The Senate has confirmed the following appointments: Members of the board of registration and elections in Utah—J. R. Letcher, Albert G. Norrell, Hoyt Sherman Jr., Erasmus W. Tatlock, all of Salt Lake City, and George W. Thatcher, of Logan, Utah.

TACOMA, Wash., April 25.—About 1 o'clock this morning, the Coxeys contingent from Butte, 600 strong, wearing tri-color badges, rolled into Billings on fifteen freight cars loaded on top and inside, and with flags flying, followed closely by a train containing United States marshals.

On arriving at Billings, Leader Cunningham, from the top of a car, addressed the large crowd collected. About fifteen deputy marshals rushed past under arms to capture the engine. The crowd surged forward and around the marshals, while the Coxeysites from their train "guyed" the marshals warning them to commit no violence.

The engineer was placed under cover of rifles and ordered to leave the cab, when bang went the rifles.

The Coxeysites charged and wrested most of the guns from the marshals who retreated under the protection of their revolvers, firing occasionally.

"Kill them," "Hang them," shouted the Coxeysites, who saw one of their crowd on the top of the train, with blood streaming from a wound on the forehead.

The Coxeysites smashed the captured rifles in pieces, over the railroad rails. The action of the marshals in shooting in the miscellaneous crowd is severely condemned as foolhardy, and one citizen was shot through the lung, but will recover.

SHERIDAN, Wyo., April 26.—Frank Grouard, chief of scouts of the U. S. A., has left Sheridan intending to cross the Big Horn range. His errand is a secret one, and there is much conjecture as to what it portends. It will be necessary for the veteran scout to travel a part of the distance on snow shoes.

CLEARFIELD, Pa., April 26.—An army of not less than 10,000 men are idle here in connection with the miners strike.

The judge refused to allow an appeal.

WASHINGTON, April 26.—The House Indian affairs committee today made a favorable report of the compromise bill for the settlement of the Ute question. The bill provides for carrying out the treaty of 1880, settling the Indians in severalty anywhere on the present reservation within ninety days and those not settling or not qualified to settle in severalty to take the western forty miles of the reservation and four townships in New Mexico. The rest of the land will be thrown open to settlement, and the proceeds of the sales given the Indians.

TOLUCA, Ills., April 26.—A consignment of guns and cartridges has been received here by the mining operators. There are believed to be no less than 200 guns and 4,000 or 5,000 cartridges. This equipment was placed in the hands of the deputies sworn in by the sheriff.

LONDON, April 26.—The special correspondent of the Times telegraphs from Atlanta, Greece, today that the only street of Pelli, the port of Atlanta, has been laid in ruins by the recent earthquake shocks and that all the villages of the vicinity have been destroyed in a similar manner. The stricken places include the prosperous village of Libanetes, where one church has collapsed and the dome of another has fallen. The destruction caused in the villages south of Atlanta is more terrible. In this district alone 238 people have been killed and 180 injured. Several slight shocks were felt yesterday and the ground rumblings continue.

HYATTS TOWN, Md., April 27.—The Coxeysites were astir today at 6 o'clock as usual, but did not begin their march until 9:30. Coffee and hard tack constituted the breakfast. The men slept on the ground last night. Some said they were too weak and stiff to march today but declared they intended to stick to their task.

ADAIR, Iowa, April 27.—One hundred and twenty-one Sacramento men were missing today when Kelly massed the industrial army for march. The men asserted last night that they would wait no further, and after breakfast prepared to steal rides. Rain began falling soon after dawn and there was scarcely sufficient teams to haul the baggage. The grumbling among the men was loud and deep. Kelly ordered the army forward, telling the men to take the railroad instead of the wagon road, if they wished. "But do not interfere with the trains," he commanded. "If you do, you cannot go further with me." The five mile tramp to Casey was very slow, but a hot meal and coffee revived the men's courage and on the remainder of the trip better time was made. One of the Council Bluffs advance committee, R. O. Graham, became convinced today that further efforts to secure wagon transportation for the army was useless and returned home. Kelly spent considerable time today organizing a baseball team. The camp artist is preparing a banner for the club-bearing the inscription "The Industrial nine-slave; the Kelley slide on to Washington."

WASHINGTON, April 27.—George Francis Train lectured here last night without license and today the police arrested him for violation of the license ordinance. Train wanted to go to jail but the police took him to court. Judge Milner refused to make a martyr of Train and dismissed the charge.

The Peveril landed here thirty-three of the crew, eight passengers and two stowaways who were taken off the Helvetia.

PARIS, April 26.—An employee of the French war office named Fenan, has been arrested on a charge of complicity with the anarchists. In his desk the police found incriminating letters and at the lodgings, caps which could be adjusted to explosive bombs.

FORSYTHE, Mont., April 26

night last night saw the end of the Butte contingent of the Coxe army marching on to Washington.

For sixty hours traffic on the Northern had been stopped in this state, and during all this time a train had been running wild from the mountains to this point, where it was taken in charge last night by Colonel Page, with 500 men from Fort Keogh.

Before leaving Miles City, last night, the authorities had warrants sworn out for the arrest of General Hogan, Lieutenant Pat Meaney, Conductors Smith and Wiley, Engineers Olney and Cleveland, and ten others, charged with grand larceny, in stealing a box car of tools and car of coal.

The charge of burglary will also be entered against them as soon as the government reaches them. The commonwealers are still here and will be here until tomorrow awaiting orders from the secretary of war.

The arrested men are to be turned over to the United States marshal and his deputies and escorted by them to Butte, accompanied by two companies of troops for the better protection of the deputies.

TOLUCA, Ills., April 27.—The miners who halted for rest at Big Sandy last night, broke camp at 4 a. m. today, arriving at Toluca at 6 a. m. with the Blair brass band and drum corps. There were nearly 5,400, although foot-sore and weary they had not lost their enthusiasm. Most of the colored miners that work here left for other places last night to avoid a skirmish. The army from Streator and Kingley arrived later. Gill, president, J. Crawford and Vice-President James W. Murray came in a special train and the conference took place between the men and Charles J. Devlin in the latter's private car. The mine officials wanted Devlin to address the miners, but he declined, saying he had not invited them here. The meeting was addressed by Gill, Crawford and Murray, who counseled peace, and urged the army to leave and told the Toluca miners to decide for themselves whether to strike. Finally this was agreed on and Devlin at once arranged for a special train to take the army home. It is the general impression here that the Toluca miners will not return to work.

NEW ORLEANS, April 27.—A special from Tallulah says that four more of the Boyce assassins were captured last night at Shearley, a place two miles from Tallulah. Two hundred mounted men overpowered the officers and took the assassins to the place where they killed Boyce. The four men, Shell Claxton, T. Claxton, Scott Harvey and Jerry McCly were hanged to a tree. Every effort possible is being made to capture Tom Griffin, the only one of the murderers at large. There are seventeen negroes in jail here who will be tried.

TAMA, Iowa, April 27.—Over 2,000 men mostly farmers, have surrounded a four mile strip of timber which contains a tramp who last evening met Miss Maggie Ormle Pooth, the 17-year-old daughter of Merchant Pooth, on the public highway two miles east of the city and assaulted her. son, evidently a woman, writing from Bevier, Mo., calls upon Governor Lowelling to appoint April 30th as a day of fasting and prayer in Kansas for the purpose of interceding with Divine Providence to remove the industrial troubles which hang over the country. MOUNT STERLING, April 28.—Galvin's men are still holding the train. Attorney General Richards is here with Adjutant General Howe. John Mahoney offered to attempt to drive the men from the train with his thirty special officers, but was advised by the attorney general not to use force or shoot. The attorney general said the military alone should do the shooting.

The train of soldiers at 11:30 pulled out for Mount Sterling. Gatling guns were taken. A special to the Dispatch says when Mahoney was presented to a committee of Coxeyites they laughed at him.

At 11:55 a. m. Adjutant General Howe and Attorney General Richards arrived. After conference with them Scott Chenoweth, the sheriff, ordered the men off the train. Attorney General Richards said to them: "If you refuse to get off the train the state of Ohio will compel you to do so." Galvin then said to the men: "I have no control over you; you must act on your own judgment in this matter. Every man must act for himself individually, but I would advise you to obey the orders of the sheriff."

Not a word came from the men. The sheriff then asked for the assistance of the military. Galvin said to a reporter: "I don't see the necessity of all this trouble. All the men want is to ride on that train. They do not expect to do anybody or anything any injury."

The troops arrived at Mount Sterling at 12:10 p. m. At 1 o'clock they mounted the cars and the Galvin men scrambled off and the train moved away. No shots were fired.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 28.—The city commissioners for Golden Gate park have at last taken a hand in the athletic event which Colonel Daniel Boone has been so energetically advertising to take place in his animal arena on the Midwinter Fair grounds tonight. Fully 1,500 tickets have been sold for admittance to the "wrestling" match between the lion "Parnell" and a big grizzly bear from Nevada. Col. Boone has positively announced that the harmless little affair will come off tonight and the executive officers of the Fair have offered no very serious opposition. The park commissioners came to the front yesterday, however, and flatly warned the executive committee of the Fair that the match must not take place. They threaten that if the battle takes place their concession of the use of Golden Gate park will be withdrawn and the Midwinter Fair brought to an untimely end.

DENVER, April 28.—The Boston and Colorado Smelting company has decided to rebuild the burned smelter at Butte, Mont., with a capacity to treat 150 tons of ore daily.

PHILADELPHIA, April 28.—At the end of the first week of the coal miners' strike but one mine is operating east of the Alleghenies. That mine is near Oceola, and employs but a hundred men. Threats are made if they do not quit they will be driven out. The supply of coal is fast becoming exhausted.

OMAHA, April 28.—In a fight with thieves at Missouri Valley, Iowa, today the city marshal was killed and two other people desperately wounded. The city marshal was notified that a gang of thieves was concealed in a barn on the edge of the town. He swore in several deputies, who surrounded the barn and demanded the occupants to surrender. Instead of doing so, some of the thieves opened fire on the officers.

DENVER, Colo., April 29.—A special to the Rocky Mountain News from Chicago says: A scheme of prodigious proportions, which contemplates the overthrow of the country and government in the interest of co-operative enthusiasts, was sprung this afternoon at a meeting of the White City Co-operative association, a powerful organization of known socialistic tendencies. Colorado was declared to be the state where the overthrowing should begin. It is intended to place the co-operative committees in one state, so they can multiply and eventually control the legislation of that state to the establishment of a complete state co-operative machine, and then the conquest of the balance of the country would be the more easily and more quickly secured, through the example of its practical operation on so large a scale as a state.

TROMSO, Norway, April 29.—The North Polar expedition under the command of Walter Wellman, has arrived here, en route for the Island of Spitzbergen and the far north.

Henri was permitted to read a paper which ended with the words: "You have killed anarchists, but you cannot kill anarchy, which will end by killing the bourgeois."

The jury brought in a verdict of guilty, and Henri was shortly afterwards sentenced to death.

The prisoner received his sentence laughing and shouting: "Courage, comrades; vive l'anarchie."

He was removed under a strong escort of republican guards.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 29.—Citizen J. S. Coxey, commander-in-chief of the good roads army of the commonweal, standing on his rickety wagon in the center of Brightwood Driving park, waving aloft his alpine hat to one of the most cosmopolitan and extensive audiences ever gathered in Washington, announced this afternoon that the greatest march of the nineteenth century had been accomplished.

Three hundred and fifty miserably dressed, woe-begone, grumbling, out-at-the-elbows and run-down-at-the-heel specimens of humanity marched into the park, led by a wheezing apology for a band, pitched tents and stretched themselves in the sun. Thousands from the city turned out to make a holiday of it and inspect the curious aggregation.

The men who had marched were the most unique and inexplicable aggregation ever brought together. Some of them were at work at the tents and wagons. Others were curled up on the damp ground, munching great chunks of bread, and many were stretched sleeping in the sun, with their heads pillowed on rolled-up overcoats.

The encyclical will be translated and published simultaneously in all languages.

CHICAGO, April 30.—Senator Francis B. Stockbridge, of Michigan, died suddenly at the residence of his nephew, J. L. Houghteling, this evening. The senator expired while seated in a chair in his sleeping room.

At 7:30 the senator arose from his chair to walk across the room, when he was suddenly attacked with pain in his left side. He made no outcry, but with his hands clasped over his heart, and his face showing that he was suffering intense pain, he, in a very short time, breathed his last.

OMAHA, April 30.—A special to the Bea from Corning, Ia., says: News was brought in this morning of a fearful cloudburst in Lincoln township, Adams county. The damage will be about $80,000, all on the farmers.

NEW HAVEN, April 30.—The students of Yale law school raised a fund of $50 to buy bread and banners for Swedenland's contingent of the Coxey army, which arrived today. They intended to parade with the commonwealers and made arrangements to cut the afternoon recitations. Dean Wayland heard of the project and burst into a meeting of the Yale "army." He hoped that the students would not disgrace themselves and Yale College by associating with a soup-hunting and vermin-haunted rabble. The boys abandoned the plan.

PORTLAND, Or., April 30.—United States District Judge Baillinger this afternoon ordered the discharge of the Portland contingent of the industrial army, who are charged with contempt of court in violating the injunction of the court, restraining them from interfering with the property of the Union Pacific Railway.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, Iowa, May 1.—The sequel to the shooting of Marshal Williams at Missouri Valley, by a gang of burglars Saturday last was the lynching at 2:10 this morning of the robber. About 100 men met at the school house at midnight, a leader was appointed and others sent out to get more men at 1 a. m. About 150 were gathered there and 400 more were on the street. They sent out parties to look up a rope and sledge hammers and by 2:10 Wilson was dangling from the city hall steps.

LANING, Mich., May 1.—A committee of citizens from Iron Mountain, headed by Mayor Crowell, have waited on Governor Rich and laid before him the condition of the destitute miners of that place. It was explained that five hundred families are now receiving aid, and the number is daily increasing, while both city and county treasuries are empty and there is absolutely no prospect of relief in the way of resumption of operations at the mines. Should the present conditions continue through the summer and winter, fully $100,000 will be required to meet the needs of the people. Governor Rich explained that under the constitution the legislature, even if convened in extra session at vast expense, could appropriate only $50,000, and as other sections would doubtless ask for aid if money was to be appropriated, the amount apportioned to the mining regions would not be of material aid. At the suggestion of the governor, the delegation went to Detroit to consult with the citizens relief committee appointed by him last winter and with whom he had agreed not to call an extra legislative session until such committee had declared its inability to meet the wants.

ST. LOUIS, May 1.—Steamboat men are exercised over the prospect of a coal famine because of the strike of the coal miners. Several steamers are making arrangements to burn wood.

CLEVELAND, May 1.—One thousand unemployed paraded the streets today. A motorman refused to stop the train and the mob attacked him and wrecked the car. Later nearly one hundred shots were fired over another car which was compelled to stop. Several persons were knocked down and others were injured by missiles. On Pearl street another car was wrecked by the mob and the motorman seriously injured. A policeman drew a revolver, but before it could be used the mob closed in and he received rough handling. Pistols were fired in every direction. Many plate glass windows were smashed and a panic ensued. There were many narrow escapes, but fortunately no one was killed outright.

At Pearl street and Detroit street a motorman who refused to stop his car was knocked down. Further along a grocer wagon was looted. On Superior street the leaders seemed to lose all control.

The crowd numbered seven to eight thousand, and the police were powerless to cope with them. A teamster was struck with a heavy iron bolt and badly injured. In Monumental park the marchers disbanded.

MEETS A CAMPBELLITE.

SPARTA, Tenn., April 12, 1894.—Sometime ago some of our Elders in this conference were challenged by a "Campbellite" minister to enter into a public debate and discuss the merits of the two respective creeds from a Biblical standpoint. The Elders informed the reverend gentleman that they were not hunting a debate, but if he was anxious for one he could be accommodated. He stated that he was eager for the fray, and was desirous of taking "Mormonism" by the foretop and show the people the nothingness of it. In fact, he would knock a hole through it that we would never get plugged up.

The challenge was accepted and articles of agreement drawn up and signed, after which your correspondent was apprised of the fact that he had been selected as the one to defend our cause. The date for debate was set for the 30th and 31st ult.

The news spread like wildfire. The whole country seemed very much interested in the coming event. When we arrived at the place (Spencer, Van Buren county,) we found the debate to be the general topic. Long before the appointed time a large concourse of people had assembled to witness the affair, and were seemingly very curious to get a glimpse of the contestants, especially your correspondent, as Mormons as a rule are objects of curiosity in this country.

The church house was filled to overflowing; the aisles were full and many standing with their noses flattened against the windows looking in from the outside. There was scarcely room for the participants.

We each selected a moderator, and the moderators selected a third man to act as chairman. We were each allowed four hours and twenty minutes in which to defend and plead our cause, making the time of debate eight hours and forty minutes, which was divided up into four meetings. The congregation was almost exclusively Campbellite; hence our sympathizers to begin with were very limited in number. But after the first meeting it was very evident that the tide had changed; much of the prejudice which existed at the beginning had now vanished away. We continued to gain ground during the remainder of the contest, and at the close of the debate we could easily carry the vote. The sentiment of the great majority of the people was "a victory for Mormonism and a stunner for Campbellism." To say the least it was a big boom for Mormonism, and no doubt much good will eventually be the result. We take not the honor unto ourselves; but we made it a matter of prayer and fasting, and realized the blessings of the Lord in our defense of truth. It was, in comparison, another battle of David and Goliath. My opponent boasted of his eighteen years experience in the ministry, and of the laurels he had won for himself in other debates. But God is able to take the "weak things of the world" and "confound the wise" and refute error against great odds.

After the close of the debate congratulations came in thick and fast. Next morning we were called upon to talk to the Sunday school, after which we were invited to hold services in the afternoon; also at night. Next morning we were cordially invited to attend the "Burrit College," and upon arriving at the college we found, to our great surprise, that the students had petitioned the president of the college to let us talk to the school, which was readily granted. And accordingly we occupied about an hour of their most valuable time, and were treated with the greatest courtesy by both professors and students. After our visit at the college we were kindly requested to hold a meeting at night in the M. E. chapel. The people insisted upon our holding meeting once a month in the future and as much oftener as we felt disposed.

We had a most enjoyable time during our visit at Spencer, and it is needless to say that we are entirely satisfied with the outcome of the debate. I venture to say that the impressions that were left upon the minds of the people in general will be lasting. We were treated with the greatest respect by one and all. I feel to make special mention of Mr. J. R. Baldwin (our chairman) on account of the fairness of his decisions and his unlimited kindness; also Mr. Masler, my opponent's moderator, who, with his wife, treated us with perfect kindness. Mr. Campen, the proprietor of the boarding house, was none the less kind. Heretofore our Elders have been under the necessity of sitting in the cold to do their writing. But now we have many pressing invitations to come and make ourselves at home whenever we are in town. The seeds that have been sown will no doubt take root and bring fruit in due time.

The work throughout this conference is progressing nicely. We have an earnest set of workers, and all feel encouraged in their labors. Many people are seemingly converted to the truth; but there is an insurmountable obstacle, viz: "Can't stand persecution and have our name cast out as evil." Yours respectfully,

W. W. BEAN.

FROM AN OCTOGENARIAN.

LEEDS, Washington Co., Utah,
March 18, 1894.

I consider myself invited to give a sketch of what took place in my time and travels with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. I will commence with my father. Although he never heard the Gospel preached by the Latter-day Saints he advocated it and could not join any of the sects of his day. My father, Cornelius Fuller, was born September 14, 1770, in Columbia county, New York. He married Zilpha Knapp, born June 29, 1771; by her he had sixteen children who all lived to marry and have families. My father and my brother Peter Fuller were both in the war of 1812. My father was on the general's staff and held the office of major. He moved west, twenty-five miles from the Hudson river, to Green county, right in the backwoods, where there was no land clear of timber. The timber consisted of hemlock, birch, maple and beech. This all had to be cleared out of the way before a crop could be grown. It was then a barren, sterile, rocky country, with long, cold winters and deep snows. They generally had to feed stock six months. The staple articles of food raised there were rye, buckwheat and potatoes.

I was the fourteenth child in the family and was born in Windham, Green county, New York, June 13, 1811; Married Harriet Loomis of the same place December 20th, 1831. I made a start in life on the farm. The chief articles that would bring money then were hemlock bark and lumber. I believe that not one in twenty of our Utah boys would dare to tackle one of these large trees for the bark. It would take four trees to make one cord of bark, and then it had to be hauled out of the woods so as to get at it with a wagon, and then be hauled twelve miles to get $5 a cord. The lumber, after cutting the logs, hauling them to the saw mill and giving one half for sawing, and hauling the other half twenty miles, would bring $5 per thousand.

I was baptized in May, 1842. I went 130 miles to the city of New York to get an Elder to come and baptize. There were five in the place ready to join the Church. Elder Moses Martin came and baptized us all. I was ordained an Elder and appointed to preside over the branch. Then came the outside pressure of persecution. The Baptists, Presbyterians and Methodists were all arrayed against us. The Methodists were the worst persecutors.

The year that Joseph the Prophet had his name on the list to run for President, I lectured in his behalf. The leading politicians in that part of country said his views on government showed him to be a powerful man. When we heard of his and Hyrum's assassination the Saints mourned as though they could not be comforted.

I sold out, and in September, 1844, started with my family to Nauvoo and arrived there in October. I have been with the Church from that day to this. There was a good deal of suffering and privation in Nauvoo the year before we left, such as I have not power to describe. My wife died July 27, 1845, in Nauvoo, aged 31 years; Harriet Francis Fuller, my daughter, died August 9, 1845, aged 9 months; William Henry Fuller, my son, died September 22, 1845, aged 12 years; Mary Lovina Fuller, my daughter, died October 7, 1845, aged 7 years and 7 months. When I left Nauvoo I buried them all in one grave.

President Brigham Young called a meeting of all the members of the Church in the Nauvoo Temple and we made covenants to use our means and do all in our power to help move the people to the far West, but not knowing where we would locate. The people commenced in earnest for the move in building wagons, gathering cattle to haul them, and providing provisions. The main body of the Church left in April and May and traveled in small companies. While they were moving came the requisition from the government for 500 men for the Mexican war. I was asked to go and said I did not feel much like it as I had served seven years. I had a commission as captain. I told Brother Kimball, however, to put my name down and I would go. Later he said if I would let one of my drivers go he would go. The driver's name was Edwin Walker. He could not have gone any farther that season had it not been for this opportunity.

When the news came that our brethren who were left in Nauvoo were all driven across the Mississippi river at the point of the bayonet, by the mob, and were in a deplorable condition, a call was made for volunteers to take teams and wagons to go back and aid them. Many responded to the call. I took two teams and brought three families up to the camp of Israel, and then began to fix for winter quarters. I had traveled three times across Iowa. A company called Pioneers was organized to leave early in the spring. They started in April. The main body of the camp was organized in companies of hundreds, fifties and tens, and counseled to start as soon as the grass grew for feed. I was organized in the fifty of which Peregrine Sessions was captain. I was placed in the second ten as captain. In my ten were Father John Smith, John L. Smith, Thomas Callister and Silas and Jesse Smith. We left our winter quarters in May, 1847. There being a good deal of rain the ground became very soft and it was with great difficulty we could move our loaded wagons.

We traveled for over four months and reached the Salt Lake Basin, as it was then called, September 16th, 1847, rejoicing that we had got out of the reach of the mob. I came to Nauvoo in 1844 with three thousand dollars; money and when I arrived in the valley I had only 25 cents left. We were all on the same footing and union and the spirit of the Lord was with us. We went to work and put up houses in Spanish style with flat roofs, but the roofs were a failure; they would not keep the rain out.

Next came another trip of a thousand miles across a vast desert. There was a company fitted up to go to California by the middle route. Father John Smith called on me and asked if I was going with the company. I told him I had talked of it but had given up the idea, as I thought it was too much of an undertaking; he said cattle could be bought cheap and said if I would go they would send a recommend signed by the High Council—that they would be responsible for our acts in whatever cattle we purchased. We fitted out with thirty-five days' of provision as that was thought plenty for the trip, but we were forty-six days on the way. We started the middle of November and got to the first ranch in California the 1st of January. We were nearly out of provisions and had been on half rations. We ate horse and mule flesh, a hawk and a wolf, which was the worst of all. Our outfit consisted of eighteen men. The rancher, a Frenchman named Redon, sent out twenty head of horses to help us into his ranch. 19th two of our men had started ahead from the Mohave. One of them became nearly insane and wanted to turn back, but the other prevailed on him to go on and they got to the ranch and gave notice of our situation.

We soon left for Williams' ranch, ten miles below, what is now called San Bernardino. After we had been there some time we commenced to negotiate with Williams for one or two hundred head of his cattle. His price was six dollars per head for cows and calves. It looked rather dark to him to trust men who had been driven out from the United States and were in a place a thousand miles from civilization. At this juncture we saw Capt. Jesse D. Hunter, and he loaned me two hundred dollars, and I was to pay this amount to his family in Salt Lake in cows at a fair value, which I did. By paying this two hundred and giving our note of one thousand dollars we got two hundred cows and calves. The next thing was to get them across the desert. Two hundred and fifty miles stretches without water, and three from twenty-five to thirty-five miles each with no feed, and sharp gravelly ground to pass over. It took him and his boys to manage them.

We engaged six Indians to help drive the stock. They stayed with us until we got to Salt Lake. We had got out in the Cahoon pass on our back trip when I enquired if any had any potatoes along. No one had and did not know where to get any. One of the Indians said he knew where there were some, but they were small—thirty-five miles distant. I fitted pack animals, took the Indian for a guide and struck on a bee line across the country. We got to a ranch owned by an American, who received us very kindly. I told him I was after some potatoes for seed. He asked where I was going to take them to plant. I told him to the Salt Lake basin. "I'll let you have the potatoes," said he, "but you are fooling yourself. You had better leave your potatoes here. You can't raise any crop there, for I have been there trapping for many a year."

I got between three and four bushels, and the next question was how I could pack them so they would keep from spoiling in going across the desert. I was inspired to use a rawhide that we had just taken from a small creature and cut it in half and make two sacks. This I did and filled them while the hides were green, and when dry they had shrunk so the potatoes were so compact that they would not shake, and they got through all sound. This is what seeded Utah with potatoes. I had about a bushel that I could not get in these rawhide sacks and gave them to the brethren. There was but one of them ever got a sound potato through.

Then we got over on the Mohave, about fifty miles from the ranch, forty-five of our cows got away and went back. We sent to Williams; he did not want to gather them again and endorsed that amount on the note. I have no language to describe the toil, labor and hardship that it took to get those cattle across deserts. When I think of it now it makes me shudder.

I got back the 10th of May, and was offered $100 for one bushel of my potatoes. I refused and said I wanted to have 25 or 30 men plant them. Some who got eight potatoes raised one bushel and a half from them.

While I was gone on this mission Brother John Evrets and wife, who crossed the plains with me as one of my family, sowed five acres to wheat north of City Creek and we raised only twenty-one bushels. We had to pull the most of it by hand. It was the only way we could save it. We knew nothing about irrigation then. We put in ten acres of wheat and corn and a patch of potatoes out on Mill Creek, and the crickets destroyed all the wheat except that we saved six bushels. As for the potatoes, the crickets had eaten the tops off to the ground. Aaron and Lorin Farr proposed to take up the roots and plant them down on the side of the creek where they could keep the crickets off and give me one half of what they could raise. They did so and raised a number of bushels. Having our crops destroyed by the crickets caused a good deal of suffering those two years.

I was one of the minute men commanded by Colonel Wm. Kimball to guard against and subdue the Indians, and was out on several excursions; at one time we were out three months. I went with the late President John Taylor to New York City to assist in publishing the paper called The Mormon. This was in the year 1854. I went to Uintah valley on an exploring tour with Jesse W. Fox and others, and to the Los Vegas, New Mexico, in 1856. I was called in 1861 to go to Dixie, which was the last but not the least. I have spent thirty-two years on this mission. Since I joined this Church I have owned and lived in sixteen different houses and reared nearly thirty children, the youngest three years old.

TWO INTERESTING MEETINGS.

IDAHO FALLS, Idaho,
April 24th, 1894.

By courtesy of the officers of Binghams county, together with the citizens of Blackfoot, an invitation was given to the presidency of this Stake to hold meetings at Blackfoot, placing the court house at their disposal. As a consequence of this two meetings were held there last Sunday.

The large room of the court house was crowded with a very respectable congregation, some of the Saints from the surrounding wards having gathered there with the presidency of the Stake. At 10 o'clock the meeting was called to order by President T. E. Ricks and prayer was offered by Bishop Cannon, of Pocatello. President Ricks then addressed the congregation; he said that he was pleased to meet with the people of Blackfoot for the purpose of giving them our views on religion; that there was no prophecy of any private interpretation, but that holy men of old wrote and spoke as they were moved upon by the Holy Ghost; but men had changed the laws and the ordinances. He bore his testimony to the divine mission of Joseph Smith, now he in answer to prayer was visited by the Father and the Son, now the Priesthood was conferred upon him, giving him authority to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ to the children of men. The speaker closed by reading the Articles of Faith.

Elder Steele then made a few remarks, testifying that there were hundreds of men that knew that Joseph Smith was a Prophet of God, and all might find out the truth of the doctrines he taught by complying with the ordinances of the Gospel the same as he had done.

Benediction by Bishop Liljenquist. Two o'clock p. m. meeting called to order by President Ricks; prayer by

A. W. Beach. Elder Ben E. Rich was the speaker. His subject was Mormonism. He showed how the world was divided up in different denominations and hence the word of the true Gospel had to be revealed; there was only one true Gospel, it being one law, one faith and one baptism. He then dwelt upon the first principles of the Gospel, proving his assertions by scripture references in a forcible manner, and showing how the Gospel of Christ was the Gospel of the living and the dead; how that Christ Himself went and preached to the spirits in prison and set the captives free.

President Ricks made a few closing remarks, thanking the people for the use of the courthouse and the good attendance and order. He also thanked the choirs, which were from Riverside and Basalt, for their good singing, and the babies for keeping still. I don't think there was one baby that cried during the services.

Benediction by Bishop William Thomas.

Clerk.

SAVED FROM DEATH.

Sondra Sanders, of East Waterloo, is one of the most grateful persons in town April 26. The cause of his feeling of gratitude is that his wife and two children are still alive and well after an alarming experience Wednesday afternoon. Mrs. Sanders had been visiting her parents south of the city, and was returning home in a light wagon, the driver of the team being Mr. Steffenson, her father. She had with her her little boy three years old and girl eighteen months old. About 4 o'clock they were coming down the hill on the State road, at Gordon's mill, seven miles south of the city. The county is putting in a large bridge over the Cottonwood creek at that place, and for that purpose has constructed a temporary road, and has a number of men engaged. On the west side of the road, at the foot of the hill, is the old mill pond, in which the water is ten to fifteen feet deep. Around the edge of the pond the mud is very deep, caused by the clayey soil being covered by water. When part way down the hill, the neckyoke broke and Mr. Steffenson's team started out on a run. The animals had gone but a few jumps when they suddenly turned and plunged into the mill pond, going completely under the water.

When the wagon went into the pond it was suddenly checked, and the four persons in it were thrown violently forward. Mr. Steffenson alighted on his feet in the pond, and fortunately was in a position to quickly extricate himself. The little girl had been thrown beyond him in the deep water, and floated toward him, thus enabling him to seize and rescue her. It gave him some trouble, however, to get out of the pond, and had there been no assistance near by Mrs. Sanders surely would have lost her life. She was plunged into the mud and water in such a way that she could not extricate herself, and the men at work on the road rushed to her aid, drawing her out of her perilous position, in which she had been almost strangled by the mud and water.

When Mrs. Sanders was rescued she appeared unconscious, but quickly rallied for a moment. She opened her eyes and caught a glimpse of the little girl in her father's arms. She glanced around for the other child and not seeing it, called for her boy. This was the first intimation the workmen had that there was another child, and they hurriedly sprang forward to search for it. One of the men clambered over to where the horses were struggling in the water and there, between the floundering animals, discovered the feet of the little boy just sticking out of the water. His head was imbedded in the mud below. He was drawn out quickly, and to all appearances was dead. The mud and water were cleared from his mouth and nostrils, and he gasped, showing signs of reviving life. Being given attention immediately, he was brought around all right in about half an hour.

The family were taken to the home of Mr. Splers, near by, where they received every care and obtained a change of clothing. Mrs. Sanders and her children came on to their home, and Mr. Steffenson returned to his abode. Today all are feeling pretty well, the only effects visible being the nervousness due to the exciting experience.

SANPETE ITEMS.

The Sanpete Stake Academy completes its sixth academic year this week. Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday written examinations have been held, and tomorrow (Thursday) is commencement day, for which a very nice program of public exercises is prepared. Arrangements are made to spend Field day at Funk's Lake, where swinging, dancing, boating and fishing will occupy the attention of the students and their friends.

For the past two years the school has been presided over by Elder Newton E. Noyes, who, with an able corps of teachers, has been doing much for the advancement of the institution and its patrons. Brother Noyes has been untiring in his labors for the academy and we think the people appreciate his efforts. The faithfulness and efficiency of Brother John Petersen has added much to the advancement of the school. Brother C. C. A. Christensen, teacher of drawing, painting and Danish; Sister Christina Willardson, lady superintendent, and the Misses Sophia Jensen and Ella Dorius have been earnest and efficient in their labors, and each has "preached without purse or scrip" so to speak, but they feel amply paid in the appreciation shown them by their pupils.

The people of the Stake cannot well overestimate the value of an institution of this kind. Its influence is being felt throughout the county, and we trust it will continue to grow until every Latter-day Saint's home shall have been blessed by the Sanpete Stake academy.

Sanpete county has been districted for the inspection of fruit trees, and the following inspectors appointed: District No. 1, C. A. Madsen, of Gunnison; No. 2, Joseph Braithwaite, of Manti; No. 3, A. C. Nielsen, of Ephraim; No. 4, Edward Clift, of Mount Pleasant; No. 5, R. P. Larsen, of Moroni. Said inspectors are allowed three weeks in which to perform all the duties pertaining to their office.

The beautiful piece of land in the south part of Ephraim commonly known as the "Silk Farm" will now be transferred with a clear title to its rightful owners, the Women's Relief Society, at least such was the the majority vote of the city council last Monday evening. The society held the land undisputed for many years, but through the neglect or mismanagement of some one, the title was never rightfully acquired, and of late years considerable trouble has been met with in straightening things out. The city council are now in a position to take action in the matter with the result above stated.

Elders John Nye and J. R. Burbridge have been appointed to labor as Traveling Elders in the Norwich conference.

Elder J. R. Hardman has been appointed to labor as Traveling Elder in the Nottingham conference.

Elder Thomas S. Newman has been appointed to labor as Traveling Elder in the Cheltenham conference.

Elder Thomas A. Howard has been appointed to labor as Traveling Elder in the Newcastle conference.

WEATHER AND CROPS.

Since the snow storm of the 16th there have been but a few scattering showers; occurring on the 22nd or 23d. The early part of the week was cold, and light frosts occurred. The latter part was warmer and sunny until the 22nd. The serious defect in the weather was the lack of rainfall. The drouth is universal throughout the Territory and is unusual at this season. Watering has begun in some places, much earlier than commonly. Thus far not much injury has been done by the dry spell. Crops do not grow as well as they otherwise would, still, as a rule, they look fairly well.

In the north sowing is not yet finished. Winter wheat does not seem to be uniform in condition. In some places it is not doing well; in others it is stooling out well, and making fine growth. Fruit trees are blossoming. All farm work was hindered by the storms of the 15-18th.

In the middle section it has been too dry for rapid growth. Barley is up; oats have not sprouted yet. Some grain will have to be watered up. Sugar beet fields will have to be watered this week. Strawberries are blooming nicely. Corn and potatoes are being planted.

In the south fruits are growing finely. Grain looks very well. Alfalfa is about a foot high. It is not growing very fast.

United States Attorney Judd, of Utah, says that the sheep men are not popular, remarks the Hailey (Idaho) Times. That is a fact. The Mohave Indians of the far west, says an exchange, have one curious superstition that is supposed to be of comparatively recent origin. They refuse to eat the flesh of the beaver and declare that whose eats beaver's flesh will have a swollen neck. The memory has been handed down through the tribes, and no Mohave eats beaver flesh since that day.

Judge Frost, at Denver, has discharged A. W. Gilman, accused of running a private gambling room in the Hallack & Howard block. The police officers testified that they had to break in the door. There was gambling apparatus in the room, and a number of men sitting around and the box under the "kitty" hole in the table contained over 100 chips. A court has been held at Byers, Colo., to take evidence in connection with all ditch claims on the tributaries of the South Platte river, in order to determine definitely the priority of all parties interested in the same. Quite a number of proofs of claims were put in by residents of this section of the country. The waters that appear to have the most ditches represented are the West Bijou, the Kiowa and Muddy creeks. The people at Byers now recognize the importance of irrigation. For years past people have been experimenting as to the best way of tapping the underflow of the said creeks, and it is now thought that the problem has been solved.

A Boston man who has a pretty summer residence up near the line of the Grand Trunk in Northern Maine, says the Lewiston (Idaho) Journal, mutely indicates that he has "been there before." Over the roof of his dwelling runs a stout iron rod, both ends coming down over the eaves. To these ends heavy chains are attached and are fastened solidly into the ledge by means of rings. The stable and summer houses are likewise chained down, and it is reasonable to expect that though Eurus or Boreas and all the rest of the winds may rent and blow, that particular summer resident will find his property sticking fast to the rock when he returns with the robins.

W. D. Daniels, ex-governor of Idaho, has just died at the hospital of Tacoma, Wash., of Bright's disease, aged 78 years. He had been ill for the past two months. Governor Daniels was born in Ohio on a farm adjoining that on which James A. Garfield was brought up. The two were boys together. Daniels crossed the plains with an ox team in 1858, and settled in Yamhill county, Or. In 1863 he was appointed governor of Idaho by President Lincoln. He returned to Oregon on the completion of his term. In 1870 he was appointed to a position in the Portland custom house. He went to Tacoma about eight years ago, and had held various positions with the Northern Pacific railroad.

A damage suit has been started in the district court at Colorado Springs, in which $15,000 is asked for false imprisonment. The suit is entitled James Sandall, John L. Anderson and Chas. T. Larson vs Gavin Leslie, J. E. Gibbs, T. J. Matthews and M. F. Bowers. In March the plaintiffs were arrested at Leadville charged with being the men who held up and robbed the Oxford saloon at Colorado City. They were held there two days and then brought to Colorado Springs and given a preliminary examination, at which they were discharged. They now seek to recover $15,000 from Sheriff Leslie and his deputy of Lake county and from T. J. Matthews, owner of the Oxford, and Sheriff Bowers. Mr. Bowers says he did not authorize the arrest of the men.

An escape from the county jail near

Grand Junction, Col., caused quite an excitement in that city on Wednesday evening. Fred Collins, who was in for breaking open a cabin near town and taking some things of small value, while in the occupation of cooking supper for the inmates of the jail slipped outside the door to empty some water and concluded it was a good time to sever his connections with the institution and started on a run towards the east part of the city. Sheriff Innes saw him and started in pursuit, but was prevented from shooting by the man Collins keeping in line with a house. After going only a few yards the sheriff was obliged to return to the jail to lock up the other prisoners, who had access to the corridor and could easily have escaped.

A horrible crime has been committed at Wilmington, Cal., says the Los Angeles Express, and the people of that town are all wrought up over it. John Hawkins, an old baker was this morning found bound hand and foot in bed, black in the face from strangulation, and cold in death. It has been made quite evident that Hawkins was murdered for his money, and this enhances the indignation that is felt over the tragedy. It has been ascertained that two tramps slept in a barn near the house of Hawkins and were seen to act suspiciously on Friday night. They are believed to be the perpetrators and are supposed to have gone to San Pedro. They were observed to be gathering rope and it is supposed the rope they gathered was that with which poor old Hawkins was strangled.

At a San Francisco undertaking house is the body of a Mexican woman who has just died at the remarkable age of 120 years. Her name was Mrs. Claudia Herrera and she was well known among the Mexican residents of San Francisco, all of whom are positive that there is no mistake in regard to her age. Mrs. Herrera arrived in California from Mexico in 1849. She was then an old woman. A daughter of the old woman was married the same year Mrs. Herrera came to California. For years the dead woman eked out an existence by washing and ironing. She was only sick one day, and friends of hers who gathered at the undertaking parlors stated that they never before knew her to be sick. In fact, she worked at ironing until a few days before she died. Mrs. Herrera went to confession at the Spanish church once every month, and one of the priests is confident that the dead woman was as old as she represented herself to be.

SAN JUAN STAKE CONFERENCE.

The Quarterly Conference of the San Juan Stake of Zion was held in Moab, Grand county, on Saturday and Sunday, the 14th and 15th. There were with us Elder B. H. Roberts and Stake President F. A. Hammond. The usual meetings were held, all of which were well attended by both Mormon and non-Mormon, of which we are about equally divided. Elders Hammond, H. Stewart and Roberts gave us good counsel. Elder Roberts occupied the most of the time, was well appreciated by all, and left a good impression among our friends not of the faith.

Amongst the more widely known manufacturers may especially be mentioned the Eskilstuna Iron Manufacturing Company (Tunafors,) which chiefly produces table knives, forks and scissors.

In temperance literature calculations are often made concerning the expenses of a nation for different important articles of consumption, and the sums paid for intoxicating liquors. Similar calculations have been made for Sweden, and it is computed that the annual value of the consumption for the entire nation is: Bread $43,000,000; milk $27,000,000; cheese and butter $20,000,000; sugar and syrup $12,000,000; potatoes $11,000,000; coffee, tea, cocoa $3,000,000, while the expenses for ardent spirits and beer run to $21,000,000, and for tobacco to $5,000,000.

M. K. Allerups large works in Odense were sold to Engineer Hansen and contractor Hansen, both of the same city, at a price of 162,000 kroner.

THE NORTH AND EAST.

The News acknowledges a pleasant call from Elder Chas. W. Stayner, who has just been released from the presidency of the Northern States mission, which position he has held during the past four years. Elder Stayner left this city for his field of labor on April 21, 1890, and has made his headquarters in Washington, D. C., where he has also done business for his clients in the courts and departments, and before Congress. During his presidency the field has been prosperous, and several hundred souls have been added to the Church. In the winter of 1892-3, the mission, which comprised the range of northern states, and extended from Nebraska to Nova Scotia, and the eastern part of Canada, was divided and an eastern mission formed, comprising the New England states and Canada, with headquarters at Brooklyn, New York, and since that time the Northern States mission has included Pennsylvania, part of West Virginia and Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, North and South Dakota and part of Missouri.

The work is gaining ground in most places, and notwithstanding the division of the field, the last report of the mission in charge of President Stayner showed over twice the number of baptisms in the preceding half year, and nearly double that of any preceding six months during his presidency.

Being asked as to persecutions and the general feeling in regard to the Gospel, Elder Stayner said that some threat had been made at times in various places, both against the Elders and the friends who entertained them, but no whippings or mob violence of any kind had been experienced. The conference meetings had been generally well attended, and although some school houses had been refused, buildings had been secured suitable to hold the conferences twice a year, and also for the assembling of the Saints as the Elders visited from place to place. Much ignorance still prevails, however, in regard to the people in Utah, and notwithstanding the labors of the Elders, many, especially in country places, cling to their prejudices and preconceived notions concerning the Latter-day Saints. The reading population are not so ignorant of our doings, and politicians everywhere make themselves acquainted with our movements in Utah, and the status of our Territory in the political field. In fact, there is greater interest manifested in our position than in our religion, and the richness of our resources is more sought after and studied than other reasons for making this the gathering place of the Saints.

Elder Stayner's health has been excellent, and he expressed his thankfulness for this, and for the fact that although a few of the many Elders who have labored with him, had to be released on account of ill health, not one had died in the field or since returning home.

WHAT A JOLLY TIME IT WAS!

Thinking that a few lines from Randolph would be interesting to quite a number of your readers, I trust you will find room for this communication.

We are about thawed out after long winter just passed. I am glad to say our losses in stock have been quite light; we having had plenty of feed, and some to spare to our neighbor ranchers to the amount of $1,500 for hay alone. Our prospects were never better for crops, both hay and grain, the ground being in good shape, and the snow in the mountains piled in huge drifts for irrigation.

Our valley is fast filling up with home and outside emigration. The sagebrush is fast disappearing, and in its place are fruitful fields dotted with happy homes. While the country at large is crying hard times, we know very little about it. We have none, neither Mormon nor Gentile, that lack the necessities of life. Most all live in their own homes, milk their own cows, drive their own teams, and till their own farms. When I hear our elder brethren talk and preach about the great sacrifices they made in leaving homes (which they never owned), kindred and friends, and all that was near and dear to them, to come to Zion, I am led to think, how long would they have to live in the Old World before they could say as they do here, this is my home, farm, cows, horses, etc.

On Saturday last, the 21st, Randolph put on its holiday attire, an invitation having been sent to our sister town, Woodruff, to come in a body and spend the day with us, to partake of our hospitality, that we might meet and mingle together, and so strengthen the bond of brotherly love and friendship—the Woodruff people to furnish one-half of the program to be given in the evening. Committees were appointed, and when I say that the sisters of the Relief Society and Young Ladies' association were the committee on picnic and refreshments, you will know that that part of the program was a success—I never knew the sisters to fail. The reception committee, accompanied by Bishop McKinnon and our brass band, met the 25 vehicles loaded with the good people of Woodruff at the south side of town. As they approached the band struck up, which soon brought the train to a stand. Our Bishop gave a short address of welcome, when all marched to the ward hall to the music of the brass band.

Teams all taken care of and everybody seated, the exercises commenced. Prayer was offered by W. H. Lee; singing by our choir (by the way, we have some of the best and sweetest singers in the Stake, Sister Comfort Peab being the Agnes Olsen of the Bear Lake Stake); five minute speeches were next in order—Bishops J. M. Baxter and McKinnon, Bros. Charles Dean Sr., A. C. Call, W. H. Lee, E. Lee, William Rex, J. C. Gray all answering promptly to the call. The scene changer, the curtain rises, when out come dozens of young men and women each carrying a tray loaded high with ham sandwiches, pie, cake, and in fact everything good to eat; more young men pop on the scene, dispensers of the liquid part of the feast, pure cold water. The hour spent in eating and drinking was one of joy, mirth and merriment, everybody seemed to want to eat, laugh and talk at the same time, and they all appeared to do it. After picnic came more speeches, singing and band music, when recess was taken until 7:30 p. m. The 150 or more guests from Woodruff were taken to our homes, where supper was provided, including tea, but I am happy to say that not many of the Latter-day Saints drink tea.

At 7:30 the evening exercises commenced: songs, duets, music, recitations, etc., were rendered by members from each ward or town, when up goes the curtain again, and the waiters appear with the same trays, but this time loaded up with oranges, candy and nuts, plenty for everybody and the remnants of the loaves and fishes put away for the younger children, those under fourteen not being allowed to join with the older people.

Monday following was their day, and none over fourteen years allowed to join them in their dance and picnic except the committee. The youngsters met 300 strong. There were plenty of eatables and dancing for all. After dismissal each went home with a paper bag of nuts and candy, as happy and bright a lot of children as ever met together.

I will close by saying, as we always say when returning home from Conference, it was the very best we ever attended. Ecclesiastically we are in good working order. The health of the people is very good. Success to our paper, the DESERET NEWS.

Yours very truly, J. S.

BOX ELDER STAKE CONFERENCE.

The quarterly conference of the Box Elder Stake was held in Brigham City, April 22nd and 23rd, 1894.

There were present on the stand President Lorenzo Snow and Elder F. M. Lyman, of the Council of the Apostles, Elder Seymour B. Young, of the Presidency of the Seventies, the Presidency of the Stake, the members of the High Council, and the bishops of the various wards.

After singing and prayer, Elder Rudger Clawson reported that the Stake Presidency always visited all the wards in the Stake, except the three outlying wards, between the quarterly conferences, to become familiar with the interests of the Stake. Had visited numerous Sunday schools, and Young Men's and Young Ladies' associations and had noticed many improvements after the grading of the schools and the introduction of the Manual and Guide in the associations. Sunday school and association work has been systematized and advancement has been the result. Those who have children should give much attention to their training and education. Care should be taken to guard against bad habits. Had also visited several quorums of the Priesthood and had found that their attendance was not as it should be; this was perhaps due to a lack of understanding of the obligation the members had taken upon themselves. He gave instructions to the Bishops and Teachers as to the manner in which they should conduct their labors to secure the utmost harmony in the wards.

Elder Seymour B. Young said he often asked himself how he realized the privileges and blessings placed within his reach, and if he came short of the blessings promised, who was to blame? The arm of the Lord has not been shortened nor have His promises failed. He had faith in the promises of God and in the development of the conditions to bring about Zion. Referred to the building of Temples from the early organization of the Church and to the great works therein performed, in turning the hearts of the children to their fathers and the hearts of the fathers to their children.

The general authorities of the Church and the authorities of the Box Elder Stake were presented and sustained by the unanimous vote of the conference. The statistical report for the three months ending Dec. 31st, 1893, was also read.

Elder F. M. Lyman spoke very extensively on Church discipline and how the officers of the Church, Stakes and wards should be voted for and sustained. All the Church officers should be presented at all conferences of the people in order that every member of the Church may have an opportunity of voting for or against them.

The Twelve Apostles are going to continue, for the authority of God will not be taken from the earth, but the keys and authority will continue with the Twelve. Everything that is done by the authorities should be done in a kind and brotherly manner. No person should be ordained to an office in the Church until he has first been presented before the branch or ward where he belongs, and if he be accepted by the people he may be ordained. Records of all proceedings in each ward should be kept and the Bishops should be familiar with all blessings, baptisms and ordinations in the respective wards. Every Bishop should also keep a history of his ward, showing the doctrines taught in each meeting and of the various administrations and ordinations that take place.

APRIL 23—10 A.M.

After the usual opening of the services President Lorenzo Snow said that obedience referred not only to this life but also to the life hereafter. More light gives us knowledge of our failures and mistakes in the past. Mistakes in our daily life cannot be avoided. God so understands it and is willing to forgive; The Saints feel that as their light increases, their failings appear plainer to them; instead of feeling discouraged they should take courage, profit by the lessons and improve their lives. Referred very extensively to temple work and the principle of adoption. There are about seventy persons laboring in the Salt Lake Temple every day, free of charge. Every one should see that his temple work is done for the benefit of the living and the dead. If the Saints are faithful the desires of their hearts will be fulfilled.

The choir sang the anthem, "Come, listen to a trumpet's voice."

Elder Seymour B. Young referred to the testimony of the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon and bore his testimony to the divinity of that work. These witnesses denied the Prophet Joseph Smith and apostatized from the true faith. It could not be otherwise, as these men chose the road of apostasy and God could not interfere with their agency. The speaker saw Oliver Cowdery in Iowa in 1848, and he was true to his testimony to the Book of Mormon; so also was the testimony of Martin Harris ever the same although he also fell from grace. Spoke of the estrangement of the book and the attacks made by reverend gentlemen who endeavored to show that such a book could not have come forth in the manner in which it did.

2 p.m.—Elders A. Madison and Chas. Kelly, of the Stake presidency, spoke of the Primary and other associations of the Stake and of the feeling of the people in general; also of the necessity of instructing our children in the principles of the Gospel before they are eight years old in order that they may be baptized into the Church as understanding members when they arrive at that age.

President Lorenzo Snow said there were persons in our own midst who were sowing seeds of disunion among our young people, who should have been cut off from the Church years ago; now the fruits of their labors can be seen. The Priesthood here have been too lenient in some instances.

Congregation sang, "Now let us rejoice in the day of salvation."

After Elder F. M. Lyman had given further instructions regarding the order of the Priesthood and Church discipline the conference adjourned with singing and benediction.

The house was crowded to its utmost capacity during all the meetings, and all seemed well paid for their attendance. NELS JENSON, Clerk.

BRIGHAM CITY, April 25th, 1894.

SPRAYING FRUIT TREES.

Allow me to offer a few suggestions through your widely read paper regarding the spraying of fruit trees. It would be quite a hardship at the present time for many persons to pay from $5 to $25 for patented and other tree sprayers, but it can be done just as effectually on small trees by a very simple method, and that is by using a small whisk broom which can be purchased for about ten or fifteen cents and kept for the purpose; the little broom can be dipped in the solution of London purple or Paris green (which, according to the directions given in the printed notices, should consist of one ounce of the powder to thirteen or fourteen gallons of water) and sprinkled on the trees. By the use of a step-ladder the same means may be employed on larger trees. The London purple and Paris green should not cost more than 30 or 35 cents per pound, and can be bought at any of our drug and paint stores at that price, the English cost being not more than one-third that amount.

Great care should be exercised that small children do not handle it, as it is of course very poisonous and the color very attractive to the little ones.

Respectfully, C. DENNEY.

OBITUARY NOTES.

MARGARET ANN MANNING BELNAP.

OGDEN, April 23, 1894.—I have been requested to furnish a few items in relation to the demise of Sister Margaret Manning Belnap. The families to which she belonged are widely known and, like deceased, are highly esteemed by all who knew them. She was the daughter of Henry W. and Margaret Galbraith Manning, and was born in this city 11th June, 1839. In 1871 the family removed to Hooper, in Weber county. As soon as the Sabbath school was organized in that place she became a member of it, and soon thereafter she became a teacher of a class, in which position she labored with much pleasure and also profit to the pupils under her charge. She took delight in the law of the Lord, and strove to honor it to the best of her ability.

When, in 1878, the Primary Association was organized at Hooper, she was appointed first counselor to President Jessie Wilson. She filled this trust with honor to herself and satisfaction to those who presided over her in the Stake, until 1882, when she was chosen by unanimous vote president of the association. She presided over the young people in that institution until 1886.

On the 5th of January, 1881, she was married to Oliver Belnap, son of Bishop Gilbert Belnap. The fruits of this union were six children, the youngest of whom is about fifteen months old. In 1890, they came back and took up their permanent residence in Ogden.

About two years ago she experienced a severe attack of la grippe. She never fully recovered from the malady—indeed she has since been afflicted with a complication of diseases from which she, for many months, has endured the most intense physical sufferings. I can recall but very few who have suffered so severely. She endured all patiently till the end came.

She had strong faith in the ordinances for the healing of the sick, and was always benefited by the administrations of the Elders. She had no fear of death, but she had great anxiety to recover and live for the sake of her children. According to her earnest desire, her parents, husband and family held on to her and exercised all the faith they could for her recovery, until it became apparent that her work here was done, and she was "wanted on the other side." Her father at last desired the Elders to dedicate to the Lord and ask Him to take her to Himself. Their petition was granted. On the 18th inst. her spirit passed quietly away to the paradise of God.

On the 20th instant the obsequies were held in the First ward meeting house, which was filled to its capacity with friends, very many of whom had known her from her infancy, and by whom she was much beloved. Services were conducted by Elder D. H. Ensign. Consoling remarks were made by Elders Joseph Hall, Chas. Welch, Geo. E. Browning, Chas. Parker, W. W. Child, C. F. Middleton and D. H. Ensign. All knew her well, and bore testimony that she was generous, kind, virtuous, firm and strong in the faith, full of integrity, and always took delight in doing good and relieving the needs and sufferings of others. She possessed a comprehensive knowledge of her religion and always rendered an intelligent, willing obedience to its requirements.

An immense cortege followed her remains to the Ogden cemetery, where the grave was dedicated by Bishop G. Belnap.

Yours truly, JOSEPH HALL.

SISTER MARY OLSEN.

FERRON, Emery county, Utah, April 20, 1894.—Mrs. Mary Olsen, wife of Bishop Frederick Olsen, of Ferron, Emery county, Utah, born September 1, 1821, in Falster, Denmark; died April 17, 1894, after a lingering sickness during more or less of the last ten years, from asthma.

Sister Olsen joined the Church in her native land in the year 1854, and with her husband emigrated to Zion in the year 1857, crossing the Plains in the handcarts company and suffering all the trials and hardships of that long and tedious journey without a sign of murmuring. They arrived in Salt Lake in September, 1857, and moved south to Sanpete, residing there until the fall of 1865, when they went to Alma, now known as Monroe, being called to do so by Apostle Hyde. During the Indian war the mission was abandoned and they returned to Spring City, Sanpete county, where Sister Olsen acted as first counselor to the president of the Relief Society until the year 1882, when her husband being called to Castle valley, she also left her home once more to make another start. She was the president of the Relief Society of this place until recently, when owing to her ill health, she resigned the position.

The funeral was held on the 19th, and was the largest gathering of the kind we have ever had in this place, there being 28 wagons and buggies in the procession. The speakers were Elders C. G. Larsen, President of the Stake, who has known the deceased for the last 35 years; W. Taylor, of the High Priests of the Stake, and Bishop Henning Olsen, of Castle Dale, who all spoke of the good traits of Sister Olsen. Sister Olsen has raised a large family and she has gone to mingle with some of them, having fought the good fight and proved faithful to the end. The grave was dedicated with all it contained by President C. G. Larsen.

Great sympathy is felt for Bishop Olsen in his sad bereavement; he has now lived beyond the allotted time of man, is left alone, and is not likely to endure much longer. W. TAYLOR.

A GOOD WOMAN GONE.

The beloved wife of Charles Partridge died at Goshen, Utah county, March 16, at 10 o'clock p. m., of dropsy, aged 65 years, 8 months and 6 days. Born in Trumbull county, Ohio, December 10, 1828; baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints March 12, 1841, at La Harpe, Hancock county, Illinois; from there was driven out of that state with her father's family to Iowa, where she was married April 8, 1849; crossed the Plains in 1852. A husband and eight children survive her and six children are buried; she has thirty-five grandchildren and four great-grandchildren; also a wide circle of friends to mourn her loss. She was a true Latter-day Saint.

THE DEAD.

Peaceful be their Rest.

HOGLE.—At the residence of Dr. Mantor, April 27, 1894, Patrick Hogle, aged 84 years.

PLAYER.—In this city, at the residence of her daughter, Mrs. Alma Katz, this morning, Mrs. Anne Player. Aged 84 years.

EVANS.—At Provo, Utah, April 23, Ann Evans, relict of the late William Evans, at the age of 74 years. The deceased was born in South Wales and came to Utah 24 years ago, and resided in this Territory continuously from that time until her demise.

ROBERTS.—In London, England, Sunday, March 11, 1894, after a five days' illness, Jane Roberts, aged 59 years. For many years the Elders found a welcome under her hospitable roof. She retained her faith in the divinity of the Gospel to the last.—Milennial Star.

ROBINSON.—At Dover, Sanpete county, of old age, Phillis Robinson, daughter of George and Sarah Siddell. Born August 29, 1810, at Philadelphia, Yorkshire, England; embraced the Gospel in 1842, and emigrated to Nauvoo; came to Utah in 1853; lived in Salt Lake City and Springville where her first husband, McTaggett died. She married Wm. Robinson and came to Dover where she died, April 18, 1894, very suddenly while on a visit to some of Brother Robinson's family, a short distance from her home. Sister Robinson was a faithful Latter-day Saint. The funeral was held April 17. She leaves a husband and large number of friends to mourn her loss.

McEWAN.—In Salt Lake City, April 25th, 1894, of hematocele, Lusanah J. Hardy, beloved wife of Henry T. McEwan. The deceased was born October 29th, 1863.

Another one of God's chosen ones has passed into the great beyond—her spirit has left the pain-racked body and flown to its Maker "who doeth all things well." "Lou," as she was called by her numerous friends, was a loving wife, a devoted mother, a true friend, an example of God's best handiwork. To her husband, so doubly afflicted by the recent death of his estimable father and now the loss of her who was his all in all, the hearts of his friends and hers bleed with sorrow and sympathy. To the dear little motherless children are pledged the comfort, the advice, the care, and above all the remembrance that their mother was a noble woman in whose footsteps anybody may follow with glory to themselves. For her mother, sisters and brothers; expressed sorrow and sympathy deep and true. May God bless and comfort them all is my prayer. R—

THE OBJECT OF THIS PROBATION.

Discourse Delivered at the General Conference of the Church, in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Saturday, April 7, 1894, by

PRESIDENT LORENZO SNOW.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

I will read from Section 84 of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants:

For whoso is faithful unto the obtaining these two Priesthoods of which I have spoken, and the magnifying their calling, are sanctified by the Spirit unto the renewing of their bodies;

They become the sons of Moses and Aaron and the seed of Abraham, and the church and the elect of God;

And also all they who receive this Priesthood receiveth me, saith the Lord;

For he that receiveth my servants receiveth me;

And he that receiveth me receiveth my Father;

And he that receiveth my Father, receiveth my Father's kingdom; therefore all that my Father hath shall be given unto him;

And this is according to the oath and covenant which belongeth to the Priesthood.

Therefore, all those who receive the Priesthood, receiveth this oath and covenant of my Father, which he cannot break, neither can it be moved;

But whoso breaketh this covenant, after he hath received it, and altogether turneth therefrom, shall not have the forgiveness of sins in this world nor in the world to come.

In connection with this, I will read the following, from the 88th section:

And if your eye be single to my glory, your whole bodies shall be filled with light, and there shall be no darkness in you, and that body which is filled with light comprehendeth all things.

Therefore sanctify yourselves that your minds become single to God, and the day will come that you shall see him; for he will unveil his face unto you, and it shall be in his own time, and in his own way, and according to his own will.

Brethren and sisters, with your help, through the exercise of your faith and prayers, I wish to say a few things. I have been very much pleased and edified by what has been said during this conference. It has been to me a feast of fat things. The instructions that have been given and the principles that have been elucidated have been presented to the people by the power of God.

I often ask myself, what am I in the world for? Where did I come from, and where am I going? Well, we have learned something in regard to this. We have learned that we existed with God in eternity before we came into this life, and that we kept our estate. Had we not kept what is called our first estate and observed the laws that governed there, you and I would not be here today. We are here because we are worthy to be here, and that arises, to a great extent at least, from the fact that we kept our first estate. I believe that when you and I were in yonder life we made certain covenants with those that had the control that in this life, when we should be permitted to enter it, we would do what we had done in that life—find out the will of God and conform to it. I have not the least idea that I would be here today talking to you, unless it was distinctly understood in that life that when I came into this I would be obedient to the will of God as it should be revealed. Of course, we have forgotten these things; but the Lord is beginning to illuminate our understandings and is bringing to our recollection certain things in regard to how we were there, and for what we have come into this world. What you and I now want to know is how to secure the position we occupied in the other life when we go back, and that which will naturally be added to us in consequence of the experience that we had in this life; for the Lord has told us that those who would keep their second estate, glory should be added upon their heads forever and ever. It seems to me that no man or woman can afford to do anything in this life only that which, directly or indirectly, will be in conformity to the will of God.

There is a course that men and women may pursue wherein there will be no failure. Whatever disappointments may arise or seeming failures may result, there will be in reality no failure, as a general thing. As we have heard from the different speakers, there has been no stoppage with this Church. Apparently there has been. There have been times when it seemed as though we were moving backward; at least, it has to those who were not fully enlightened in regard to the mind and will of God. The Church has passed through very strange experiences, and the people have made great sacrifices. No people were ever raised up, excepting perhaps Enoch's, that have sacrificed to the extent that this people have. But we have come along through these sacrifices, and as a people there has been no failure. Why has there been no failure? Because the people, as a whole, have had their minds fixed upon the true principles of life, and they have conformed to their duty, as they did in the other life. The people generally have had the Spirit of the Lord, and have followed it. Hence there has been no failure. So it may be with individuals. There is a course for every person to pursue in which there will be no failure.

It will apply to temporal as well as spiritual matters. The Lord has given us the keyword in these verses that I have read from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants:

If your eye be single to my glory, your whole bodies shall be filled with light, and there shall be no darkness in you, and that body which is filled with light comprehendeth all things. Therefore sanctify yourselves that your minds become single to God.

That is the key by which a person can always be successful. Paul says:

I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

A grand object that every Latter-day ought to have before him constantly. What is that prize? I have been reading it. "All that my Father hath shall be given unto him." The Savior on one occasion made an extraordinary statement. It is in the 5th chapter of St. John, and is as follows:

I can of mine own self do nothing.

It is remarkable that the God who made the worlds, who came down here clothed with flesh, performed mighty miracles, and sacrificed his life on Mount Calvary for the salvation of the human family—that He should say, "I can of mine own self do nothing." And He goes on to say:

As I hear, I judge; and my judgment is just; because I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent me.

That is a wonderful saying, and there is a great deal in it. Now, what we want is to have that spirit in every act of our lives and in every undertaking, whether temporal or spiritual, and not think of self. We should try to ascertain how we should spend the money and the information that God has given us. The answer is simple—for the glory of God. Our eye should be single to the glory of God. That is what we have left the other life for and come into this. We should seek to promote the interests of the Most High God, and to feel as Jesus felt, "I can of mine own self do nothing." Inasmuch as we act today and tomorrow, this week and next week, in the interest of God, and have our eye single to His glory, there can be no failure. We send our Elders to preach the Gospel. Who sends them? President Woodruff? In one sense, no. The God of Israel sends them. It is His work. There is no mortal man that is so much interested in the success of an Elder when he is preaching the Gospel as the Lord that sent him to preach to the people who are the Lord's children. He begot them in yonder world, and they came here because the Lord wanted them to come. As we are told by the Apostle Paul, "the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of Him who hath subjected the same in hope." It was not a pleasing idea to come here. No one wished to come, only as it was the will of God, and that we would receive through this greater glory. I have not found it so very pleasant in my experience; still I have tried in the scenes through which I have been called to pass to enjoy the circumstances as far as God would give me wisdom and power to do so. A man's mind should be single to the glory of God in everything that he starts to accomplish. We should consider that of ourselves we can do nothing. We are the children of God. We are in darkness, only as God enlightens our understanding. We are powerless, only as God helps us. The work that we have to do here is of that nature that we cannot do it unless we have the assistance of the Almighty. Those who go into these temples to accomplish the glorious labors there performed feel that they cannot do this work satisfactorily to the parties in whose interest they are officiating unless God gives them His Holy Spirit. Here is the great trouble with men of the world, and too much so with the Elders of Israel; we forget that we are working for God; we forget that we are here in order to carry out certain purposes that we have promised the Lord that we would carry out. It is a glorious work that we are engaged in. It is the work of the Almighty; and He has selected the men and the women whom He knows from past experience will carry out His purposes, as a general thing.

What wonderful promises are contained in this 84th section! Can you comprehend them? I cannot. I can see that God means a great deal in these promises which He has made to us. There may be some strangers here who will say, "You read that from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, which we do not know anything about. Why don't you read something from the books that we believe in?" Now, what I have read here conforms exactly with what the Lord has said in the Bible. The Lord has said that He will give us all that He hath—and this according to the oath and covenant which belongs to the Priesthood. Nobody ought to doubt what Jesus says, and He declares, as recorded in the Revelations of St. John, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in His throne." Can anything be said greater than that? Does not that comprehend everything? And there are many statements of this kind recorded in the Old and New Testament.

Brethren and sisters, my testimony is that this is the work of God in which we are engaged. I had not been in this Church two weeks when the Lord revealed to me a knowledge that He was God, and that He sent His Son into the world to be crucified for the sins of the world. No man ever did or ever could receive a more perfect knowledge in regard to the existence of God and of the truth of this work than God gave to me by revelation and the opening of the heavens. From that time on I have tried to live in such a way as not to lose His Holy Spirit, but to be guided by it continually, trying to get rid of my selfishness and any wrongful ambition, and endeavoring to work in His interest. I believe these are the intentions and feelings of the Latter-day Saints generally.

God bless President Woodruff and his two counselors with a fullness of His Holy Spirit; and may we all live in that way that we may be prepared at any moment to go back into the other life and inherit the position that we occupied there, with the additional blessing and glory that we receive by conforming to the mind and will of God in this life. The prayer which Jesus made before His crucifixion may be offered by the Latter-day Saints: "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." God bless you, my brethren and sisters, and may we so live as to be worthy to receive these wonderful blessings and promises in may prayer, in the name of Jesus. Amen.

TRAVELS IN OLD MEXICO.

COLONIA DUBLAN, Chihuahua,
Mexico, March 31, 1894.

On Wednesday, March 28, 1894, in company with Elder Joseph B. Jackson, who took me with his team to Dublan, I left Diaz to visit the other settlements of the Saints in Old Mexico. After traveling two miles southward, we crossed the river Casas Grandes, and two miles beyond we arrived at the Mexican town La Ascencion, said to contain 3000 inhabitants. This is undoubtedly a sample modern Mexican town. As the stranger approaches it, he sees from the distance something that resembles a huge adobe wall, without anything lofty to relieve it, and as he enters the place, he finds narrow streets and low one story adobe houses, with flat roofs throughout the entire plan, without fruit trees, shade trees or even as much as small gardens to add comfort to the town. How people can content themselves with living in such a cheerless place with nothing to look at but clumsy, rough adobe walls is more than an enterprising white man can conceive of, especially in a country like this where trees, vegetables and all kinds of grasses would grow abundantly with but little care.

The town of La Ascencion, unattractive as it is, will long be remembered by the first Latter-day Saints in Mexico, as it was immediately north of this place that many of our people were encamped on the bottom lands of the Casas Grandes before Colonia Diaz proper and our other Mexican colonies were founded. The custom house was also at La Ascencion at that time, and it was here that our brethren took their first lessons in Mexican "duty" business—an experience, which partly owing to their ignorance of Mexican laws, cost them very heavily. Through the influence of some Americans, who lied about our people and misrepresented their intentions, the Mexicans of La Ascencion looked upon their new neighbors (the Mormons) with great suspicion, and they generally believed them to be a wicked and corrupt "set;" this, no doubt, also led to the issuance of the so called "exterminating order" from the governor of Chihuahua, when our people, in April, 1885, were ordered out of the country. It seemed that the bigotry and hatred toward the Saints at that time ran so high that some of our persecutors were not satisfied with driving some of the best citizens of the United States into exile, but followed them with their enmity and wicked accusations into a foreign land. But the Lord, in answer to the prayers of His servants, turned away this danger. Instead of the Saints being driven out of Mexico, the governor who issued the order of expulsion lost his official head, and the Saints have since, through their honesty and straightforward course, gained the good will and confidence of their Mexican neighbors, many of whom will now trust in the word of one of our brethren far more than in that given by one of their own number.

Though the Mexicans are a very gentle and polite people, they are not all honest. True to their Indian traits of character many of them consider it no crime at all to steal if they are not caught at it. Hence, when our people were encamped near La Ascencion that class of citizens made it their special business to pilfer and steal from their prospective neighbors. Nor were they particular in regard to the articles secured. Anything from a horse to a needle would answer. On one occasion the temporary home of Elder Joseph H. James was visited by these thieves, when Brother James was out and the family was fast asleep. After having emptied a trunk and a smaller box containing the family clothing, and after taking the shoes and clothing which the respective members of the family had taken off in retiring to rest for the night, the robbers proceeded to steal the bed-clothes off the very beds occupied by the members of the household. Without waking the smaller children they stole the covering of their cots, and were just in the act of pulling off the blankets of the bed occupied by an adult member of the family, when Sister James awoke and gave the alarm. Then the thieves made good their escape with their booty, leaving the family so destitute that kind neighbors had to furnish them with the most necessary wearing apparel before they could arise the next morning. But this was going a little too far. From that time on guns and other firearms were brought to play in uncomfortably close proximity to the midnight prowlers, who at length desisted from their "evil deeds" for fear of being sent to the great beyond before they could have an opportunity of seeking at the hands of their priest that forgiveness which was so readily granted them for such "petty crimes as that of stealing from the Mormons" was considered to be.

Since the recent raid of the rebels upon the custom house of Palomas, a company of Mexican soldiers has been stationed at La Ascencion, which for the time being adds a little to the business of the place. The soldiers are intended as a protection to the inhabitants; but if they were all like the one who kept us company part of the way from Colonia Diaz to La Ascencion, and who tell off his horse through dizziness superinduced, no doubt, by having got on the outside of too much "mescal" (a sort of Mexican whisky), we fear that the presence of the troops does not add much to the safety of the place. Another cause for the presence of troops in La Ascencion is this, that the inhabitants of the town quite recently arose in open rebellion against their "presidente," the principal municipal officer, and killed him, together with his brother-in-law, who sought to protect him. Such occurrences are not very uncommon in Mexico. The recent Temoeche outbreak was an attempt to raise a general rebellion against the present federal government, with Porfirio Diaz at the head.

From La Ascencion I traveled about 20 miles in a south-southeasterly direction to Corralitos (Little Corrales), another Mexican town situated on the Casas Grandes river. The ranch of which this town is the center is very extensive, and includes some rich mines (Sabanal) situated in the mountains about 18 miles away. At these mines nearly 1500 Mexican peons are employed and about the same number are working on the ranch and at the smelter situated immediately south of the town. The American company which owns this place is said to be very wealthy.

Six miles south of Corralitos, on the bank of the Casas Grandes, we reached the ruins of the Mexican town Barrancas, where Young Wesley N. Norton was murdered for his money by Mexicans on the 4th inst. The young man, who was a son of Jacob Wesley Norton, of Diaz, was in the sewing machine business and had just collected some money at Corralitos. Continuing his journey southward, intending to go to Juarez, he is supposed to have been waylaid by men who had secreted themselves in the old adobe ruins, and who killed him with rocks. The murderers took nothing but his money and gun, and left his team to wander about in the brush, where it was found two days later, when also the dead body of young Norton was discovered, lying on the mud floor of a two-story adobe ruin in Barranca. The ground was still stained with the blood, as we visited the place, and presented a sickly sight. Brother Norton, who was born in Nephi, Juab Co., Utah, January 22, 1873, was an exemplary young man, beloved by all who knew him; and his death has cast a gloom over all our Mexican colonies. He is the first Latter-day Saint who has been killed by Mexicans since our people settled in the republic. Three men were arrested on suspicion of being the young man's murderers, and they were imprisoned for several days at Casas Grandes; but sufficient evidence not being forthcoming to convict them, they have just been released. The Mexican laws not allowing dead bodies to be removed from one municipality to another, the earthly remains of the murdered man were interred at the Corralitos graveyard, which I visited.

Continuing our journey southward about 15 miles from Barranca, we arrived at Colonia Dublan, thus named in honor of a Mexican federal official (the secretary of the treasury). This place is beautifully situated on the east bank of the Casas Grandes river, near the center of a very large valley in which most of the lands are very level and productive. The settlement is scattered, the thirty-three families or 300 souls of Saints who compose its inhabitants living on their respective "terrenos," which extend north and south about two miles. Each of these "terrenos" is about 14 rods wide and from one half to one and a half miles in length according to the windings of the river, which forms the west boundary, while the "camino real" (the main road) running from Corralitos to Casas Grandes, from north to south, forms the east line of the "terrenos." The brethren each own one or more of these narrow strips of land which were originally taken up by Mexicans, of whom our brethren bought them, together with water rights, the Mexicans having, before the Saints came, constructed an irrigation ditch from the river about two miles long. This ditch has since been enlarged by the brethren. Immediately east of the settlement is a large tract of level, fertile land which was partly purchased by Elder Geo. M. Brown and others as early as 1888 of a Mr. Louis Huller. But this man, failing in business, his creditors were unwilling to carry out the stipulations of his contract with the "Mormons;" and thus the purchase has not been perfected yet. It may be, however, in a near future, in which event Dublan would soon (judging from prospects and natural advantages) become a large and prosperous settlement. Water for irrigation purposes can be secured by taking advantage of the splendid natural facilities which the country affords for making extensive reservoirs.

Among the first settlers of Dublan were Geo. Lake (formerly Bishop of Oxford, Idaho, and Brigham City, Arizona), Charles A. Foster and others, who located here in February, 1888. Soon after that a large company of Saints came in with a view to becoming permanent settlers in this desirable locality; but as the land purchase did not materialize, a number of them left for other parts of the country, while others bought out Mexican claims and settled in the present settlement. The place was first organized as a branch of the Juarez ward, April 14, 1889, with Fred. W. Jones as presiding Elder; it was called the San Francisco branch, that being the name by which the locality at that time was known among the Mexicans. The present ward organization with Winslow Farr (late of Ogden, Utah) as Bishop was effected by Apostle George Teasdale July 19th and 20th, 1891.

Dublan is six miles northeast of the Mexican town Casas Grandes, 16 miles from Colonia Juarez, the headquarters of the Mexican Mission, 55 miles south of Colonia Diaz, 25 miles northwest of Galeana, where A. J. Stewart and others are about to start a new settlement, and about 145 miles by wagon road from Deming, New Mexico, and about 110 miles from Gallego, the nearest accessible railway station on the Mexican Central.

A MODEL FARM.

While visiting the World's Fair at Chicago and also the Midwinter Fair, my attention was attracted by a magnificent model farm picture and I could but admire the particular selection of a choice place to hang the picture, for to my mind it was one of the grandest of all pictures, and it was a very large one, requiring much space. Not only was the artisan, the mechanic, the banker, the engraver, the capitalist and the husbandman—the good old farmer—attracted to this picture, but also the ladies with fingers sparkling with gems, and milk maids with rosy cheeks, pictures of health and strength.

E. T. Clark, his wife, my sister and others of our party had been admiring the great display of luscious fruits and California wines, together with a vast pyramid of pure olive oil pressed from the olives grown in Pomona valley, and other valleys of the California Pacific slope. On every hand were absorbing sights of great attraction. Leaving those earthly scenes below, we ascended heavenwards up into the gallery, where we, as will do those who finally ascend into a higher and better world, looked down upon lower objects. Indeed it was a grand scene almost bewildering in its attraction. There were to be seen in one glance a massive wheel turning around exhibiting the various kinds of oranges, lemons, limes, etc. Close by this attraction was a column of whiskey. A little further along was exhibited pure olive oil.

After sitting a short time on comfortable seats and viewing the many sights below, turning our attention to our surroundings above in the gallery, we found so many things of beauty to see that we could scarcely know which was the prettiest. But in the northernmost portion of the gallery was in plain view the Illinois model farm. This was to be seen from below and also above where we were, and at the head of the stairs where the moving throng passed down, making the picture all the more conspicuous. There, said one of our party who raises an abundance of beeves, grain and hay, just look at that great farm house, barn, fields and flocks, gardens, lawns, walks and everything pertaining to the happy farmer's life, and men, teams, machinery, all seemingly busy in the various fields waving with ripe grain, hay in the swath, winnow and in cock; men handling the grain near by, and on the hills at a distance crowds were to be seen viewing the picture. As we with difficulty, on account of the pressure of the throng, found finally a space where we could see and hear, a gentleman in charge of this department of the Illinois exhibition—a Mr. D. O. Loy, of Chicago, Ill.—was explaining the history of the getting up of this model farm. When I informed him that I expected at a future period to publish a brief history of the general attractions, he took pains to explain more fully the details. A committee was appointed, arrangements made and contributions solicited from every county of the state of Illinois, which resulted in forwarding to said committee 10,000 parcels of 125 kinds of materials. A superior artist was procured to plan the artistic work; designs and plans were drawn up and many lady artists with nimble fingers were ready to engage in the grand enterprise. Forty persons worked with a will on the various fields, lawns, gardens, houses, barns, hedges and the one thousand and one things pertaining to this great modern farm. Four hundred and eighty days' labor was performed on the 82 x 24 feet picture. The work began March 1st, 1893. The house was sided up with corn shucks, but so nicely devised that it looked neat and admirable. The roof represents corn leaves and husks. The barn is sided up with cat-tails or flags, and roofed with sugar cane leaves taken from the lower joints of the stocks near the ground.

The cows, horses, etc., are made from millet hemp and flax, the tails being made of corn silks and their hoofs and eyes from buckeyes, or horse-chestnuts. Fences are made from corn stalks, joint or slough grass, and tooth picks. Roadways and walks are made from broom corn, sugar cane and Egyptian corn, with corn silks intermingled. The trees are made from golden rod. Cabbage and tomato patches were made of sage brush, hops and hopvines, etc. Seventy-five yards of curtains were made and covered with water grasses, trimmed with oats, held in position with cord made from popcorn. The moon was made of (green cheese) cloth with light put on. One hundred different kinds of grasses are represented. Around the frame work was common corn, and popcorn in thin slices, also in an open shed was to be seen a choice stallion, and other choice stock. Everything looked very natural, and worthy of imitation to those who are slipshod farmers, with fences down, gates open, graineries with broken platforms, steps torn down and everything out of order.

Tens of thousands of visitors looked upon the scene with admiration and many remarks of its artistic beauty. Certainly it is a successful effort of the corn cracker state of Illinois. I very much admired it at the World's Fair at Chicago, as well as at the Midwinter Fair of California. It was damaged by removal from Chicago to California, by mice undoing the work of nimble fingers.

MORE ORGANIZATION.

It can safely be said that no community is so facile in creating organization for any assumed need as are the Mormon people. It is their genius some way—an innate characteristic; and one too, which the circumstances of their history have rather fostered than suppressed. It has been a mighty lever wherever applied. Migration, colonization and missionary success have each been indebted to this, and all educational appliances of social, intellectual and religious life have been founded and sustained by this organic unity. The school house, meeting house, amusement hall, have been primary things everywhere, and they have grown years earlier among the people here than would have been possible elsewhere. Poverty seemed to offer no impediment to these products of unity and effort, and the grandest conceptions sprung out of what the world have deemed an unpropitious soil. The systematized irrigation of this Territory was made possible by the general will. Road-making, canyon opening, mill building, the old sugar works, the iron project, cotton raising, the theater, the University, the temple were all begotten when apparent inability and poverty was supreme. But organization supplemented necessity and desire; success was secured by "the removal of mountains," and every failure had in it the elements of success.

Co-operation as applied in a mercantile sense met a gigantic need which no man nor a few individual men could have overcome, and its history is but a later evidence of cumulative power. The Territorial telegraph, the Utah Central, Coalville branch and the Cache Valley railroads, were all built, and even the main lines to which each of the above became tributary, were wonderfully fostered—nay, were completely in accord with, and mainly under the influence of, this almost omnipotent feature in application. And still later Saltair and the Lehi sugar works show that this agency is still active and is as capable of organizing in gigantic projects as in the less embarrassing days of yore.

Financial tension subject to general strain may have affected for the moment these combinations of "faith and works," but absolute and enforced failure can never libel the souls who perceived or conceived a need, and then in the bravery of intention amid forbidding appearances, at the inspiration of this mighty faith, went out in what they deemed the path of duty, for the welfare of a growing people.

This community is today confronted with conditions, which to say the least, are not favorable to our temporal growth, prosperity and increase. In obedience to the commandment and to our desires we have multiplied exceedingly; our sons and daughters are numerous and yet increasing. But however they may be imbued with the disposition of the fathers, they are at the present in a large measure effectually chained. They do not want to marry for poverty, and they see no way to self-sustaining independence. Our missionaries by the hundreds are still preaching the gathering and a few are yet coming from half-favorable to unfavorable surroundings. Land is limited, labor is congested in our cities, and the remedy is not near so come-at-able as is desirable. We cannot suspend (although we have partially done so) the law of increase, nor can we withdraw the Elders yet from the nations of the earth!

Now, is it possible in any way or in any multiplicity of ways, to increase by organization the facilities for honorable labor and consequent support? The trite yet ever important query of home industry suggests itself, and we claim and urge that the people en masse should repudiate importation in favor of locally produced articles wherever practicable. We export wool by the millions of pounds, we import clothing fabrics in fabulous amounts; and it is suggested that this wool should be manufactured at home, and that the surplus if any should be exported. This would mean more factories and more labor, for there must be a margin to the credit of labor, between wool at eight or ten cents a pound and flannel at forty cents and cloth at one dollar to one fifty per yard. Then it is suggested that the clothing of one hundred thousand of the "male persuasion" in this Territory should be made at home. The waiting fingers of women and girls in Utah are just as deft as are those of women in the crowded homes of New York, Philadelphia, Boston or Chicago. And it is said that economy and necessity both favor this industry, even if we have in greater or less degree to import goods beyond the reach or capacity of Utah mills.

It is claimed that more leather, more shoes, more harness should be made at home; that more sugar factories are a necessity; that meat, cheese, butter, eggs, should come from Utah farms, dairies, or company organization; that success in the canning of tomatoes means similar success in fruits, instead of cumbering our shelves with California goods; that every article exhibited in the "Industrial Fair," with many others, should be the creation of our own hands, from resources everywhere in such unlimited profusion.

And yet, with this enlarged or general increase of industries, even to the point of surplus and exportation, all the avenues of labor are not explored. Every settlement in Utah and every one where the Saints are located, possesses within itself the opportunities of improvement by labor, if there was but the tact and disposition to organize, and compel success in one as yet untold direction. Suppose the Bishop of some settlement, imbued with the full sense of the power of united organization, should call a general meeting and point out how indifferently the town or village represented the evidences of thrift, order, beauty and progress; how inadequately the brotherhood of man and the genius of the Gospel was in it exhibited; how closely we cling to the methods of Babylon, and how little interest is displayed in and for each other's success and comfort; and how far we are yet from producing the glory and excellence of that Zion which is to arise in its beauty and to become "the joy and praise of all the earth!" Then call attention to the positive waste of muscle, the enforced idleness the undirected power of available wealth, and the moral and spiritual demoralization consequent in life without an aim and without a prospect. Then suggest the possibility of bringing this creative energy and the opportunity together in the revolutionary processes of change and improvement; every one working for his neighbor and instituting again exchange or barter of produce, or labor for labor; organizing rock into foundations; brick and adobes into houses; lime and sand into plaster; lumber into building, barns, sheds, fences; and the elements into trees, shrubbery, and flowers under some method of representative scrip based on ultimate local redemption, using what little cash might be available for that which no local skill could produce.

Would it not be possible with a movement of this kind once originated and wisely directed, to work such a change as would surprise and lead to emulation in other places on the right and left? Would not individual selfishness and purely personal aggrandizement be put in the line of permanent suppression? Would not our youth be employed in mechanical pursuits? Would not the present difficulty as to their securing a home, marriage, sustenance and comfort vanish away? Would not the tone of society be improved, the character of the town be renovated? Would there not be enjoyment, convenience, order, cleanliness, beauty, love and unity, in such a community far beyond our present ideas?

"Idleness" is said to be "the Devil's workshop;" but that would be closed. Land would be more equally divided, and no wanderer would want to seek in questionable places or distant locations to satisfy that hunger for the responsibilities of wife, family, society and religion which is now suppressed or crushed into unwilling abeyance—all for lack of systematic action based upon the broadest conceptions of duty to ourselves, our families, to society, to religion and to God!

Is it not as feasible, is it not as desirable, is it not as advantageous to build up our own homes, our own village, our own town, and to make them under divine blessing our glory and our pride? And does it not savor more of common sense and manly independence to provide, by general caucus and unity, labor at home, instead of calling upon capital from the four winds, or from the deaf owner of money at home, piling up an indebtedness which will be a drag upon our children's children, and ignoring the grand example of our leaders, who inaugurated the mammoth enterprises and magnificent purposes of the past, when money was a myth, and muscle and faith in legitimate union laid the foundation of an empire—a kingdom in the desert!

TOOELE STAKE CONFERENCE.

The Quarterly Conference of the Tooele Stake of Zion was held in Tooele city, April 29th and 30th, 1894. Present on the stand Elder H. J. Grant, of the Council of the Apostles, Elder H. S. Gowans and counselors in the Stake presidency, and a number of Bishops and leading officers of the Stake.

Ten a. m., April 29th, President Gowans called the conference to order, and after the opening exercises Bishop Thomas Atkins, of Tooele, and John G. Shields, of the Lakeview wards, reported briefly the favorable condition of their wards, the organizations complete and accomplishing good results; peace and good will prevail. President Gowans said the condition of the Stake in general was very encouraging; the good works of the people denote a steady increase in faith; union prevails with the officers and organizations of the Stake, and a desire on the part of all is manifest to faithfully perform their duties and be exemplary in their lives.

Elder H. J. Grant, by illustration, forcibly brought to the notice of the Saints the importance of our becoming self-sustaining, producers and manufacturing what we wear and consume and to live within our resources and avoid entailing obligations we cannot meet; also not to allow our prejudices to swerve or warp our better judgment.

Two o'clock p. m., Bishops Joseph L. Warthall, of Grantsville, and D. H. Caldwell, of St. John wards, reported the Saints generally responsive to duty, no ill feeling existing and the organizations ably controlled by efficient officers.

Elder H. J. Grant again referred to the importance of the Latter-day Saints becoming self-sustaining and reserving the means that we expend on importations to foster home industries, giving employment to the people and utilizing the vast resources that we are so abundantly blessed with; advised a sacrifice of our appetites wherein it is injurious to our health and decreases longevity; called attention to the words of wisdom revealed, and urged the Saints to adopt them in their lives and receive the blessings promised. Stop the heavy drain upon our means in importing the articles forbidden that are injurious.

10 o'clock a. m., April 30, Elders O. P. Bates of the Batesville branch of the Tooele ward, Anderson of Clover, and Joseph Yates of E. T. wards made statement of the progress, prosperity and good feeling existing in their localities.

A. G. Johnson, superintendent of the Stake Sabbath schools, applauded the superintendents, officers and teachers of the respective schools for their energy and faithful labors, as manifested by the interest created with the scholars.

A. J. Stookey briefly reported his labors as superintendent of religion classes and home missionary of the Stake, assisted by John S. Lee; took great pleasure in performing their duties.

Elder H. J. Grant spoke for a short time on topics and principles of great interest.

2 o'clock p. m., Elder Gowans presented the general authorities of the Church and the local officers of the Stake, all of whom were unanimously sustained.

Elder G. F. Richards portrayed some of the privileges and blessings enjoyed in the Gospel.

Elder H. J. Grant occupied the remaining portion of conference in his usual interesting and instructive manner, impressing the importance of obedience and good works in observing the revealed word of the Lord.

The meetings during conference were well attended notwithstanding the inclement weather, and a grand treat was enjoyed in the rich outpouring of the Spirit of the Lord.

Professor Beesley and choir contributed largely to the interest and pleasure of the meetings.

GEORGE ATKIN, Clerk.

PRIESTHOOD MEETING.

The Priesthood meeting of the Salt Lake Stake was held today in the Assembly hall, beginning at 11 a. m. Elder Angus M. Cannon, president of the Stake, presided.

After the usual opening exercises the roll was called, showing the following attendance: One High Councilor, five Patriarchs, all the members of the Presidency of the High Priests quorum, ten presidents of Seventies, eleven Home Missionaries.

All the wards of the Stake were properly represented except the Thirteenth city ward. The First, Second, Third, Fifth, Tenth, Twelfth, Fourteenth, Fifteenth, Sixteenth, Eighteenth, Nineteenth, Twentieth and Twenty-third quorums of Elders were represented by their presiding officers.

Richard S. Horne, assistant Stake superintendent, represented the Sabbath schools.

On the representation of their Bishops, twenty-five members of the lesser quorums of Priesthood and one lay member were endorsed for ordination to the office of Elders.

It was decided to organize a new quorum of Elders in the Sandy ward, to be known as the Twenty-fourth quorum.

Instructions were given by Elders Elias Morris, A. H. Raleigh, Charles W. Penrose, Angus M. Cannon and D. B. Brinton.

Their topics were the care of the poor; the necessity for closer heed to proper counsel; the advisability of suggesting to some of the poor people of the city the propriety of moving to the country settlements, where there is practically no want, where living is much cheaper, and where they will be in a better position to help themselves; the necessity of adapting ourselves to all conditions; the need of providing employment for the idle; the proper means of checking the growing tendency toward discontent and lawlessness; the exercise of self-control and charity under the present exciting conditions; the proper use of the authority of the Priesthood toward influencing others for good; the necessity of lessening contention and strife in all directions; the need of exertion to settle all obligations; the danger attending indiscriminate charity; the need of developing all productive resources; the encouragement of home industries; the proper performance of the work for the dead; and the folly of overlooking the necessity of most of the people being producers.

IN WASATCH COUNTY.

CHARLESTON, Wasatch Co., April 26, 1894.—The farmers in this valley are busy planting their crops. The land is very dry and unless rain comes soon irrigation will have to be resorted to to get grain to germinate.

A company has been formed here for carrying on the dairy business. A start was made this week and the results of the first run proved very satisfactory. The machinery is of the latest improved make and the owners are confident of success. The climate and natural grasses in this valley are favorable for the production of good butter. Z. C. M. I. has given the firm an order for a certain amount each week as a starter. George Dayball is president and Joseph R. Murdock secretary of the company.

Today is the closing day of the district schools at Heber. Preparations were made to take the school up the river for final exercises, but the day is stormy and cold, which will mar the expectations of the scholars.

The Stake conference will convene May 5th instead of April 28th, as previously announced.

The roads through Provo canyon are almost impassable on account of loose rocks, mudholes and other obstructions. It would be a comfort to the traveler passing through this gorge if the county commissioners would put on some men to repair the road.

Some improvements are being made through the county despite the "hard times."

Dr. and Mrs. Lindsay have gone to Europe, where the doctor will take up some special study in his profession. They expect to be absent a year, when they will return to Salt Lake City, where the family intend to make their permanent home. D.

By May 1st 500 men will be at work on the extension of the Burlington from Sheridan to Billings. Then contractors will have 110 miles to grade and 185 miles to iron before the line is fully completed. Much of the grading is through the Crow reservation which begins with the south line of Montana.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

PAYING THE DEBT.

There probably has never been a time in history when a nation in the enjoyment of as perfect immunity from armed conflicts as is the United States, has experienced such a general feeling of uncertainty regarding the immediate future as does the Republic under the present industrial situation. If there were well-defined issues as in the days of the Revolution or preceding the great civil war, there might be some way for the people to make up their minds as to the nature of coming events; but at present, while there seems to be a general fear in all parts of the nation regarding an approaching crisis, there is no definite idea as to the form in which a settlement of the questions will be effected, nor is there unanimity of opinion as to what these unsettled questions really are. The nation is truly perplexed to an extreme degree. The armies of unemployed, the strikes, the uncertain relations of capital and labor, and the growing disaffection with political parties and systems, all create a condition of unrest that is far from comforting to the nation at large.

Who would have thought that so great a change could have come in so short a time, as has been witnessed within two years? By way of contrast, turn attention for a moment to the situation as described in the New York Herald in July, 1892:

The business of the country is in a provokingly healthy and flourishing condition. Imports during the fiscal year ending June 30. h were greater than those of any former year, amounting to $833,000,000, while exports also exceeded the highest record and reached the enormous aggregate of $1,027,000,000. Railroad earnings for the first six months of the year are greater than those for any similar period in history, and the output of manufactures has been greater than ever before. Business failures for the first half of the present year have been 1,000 fewer in number and $40,000,000 less in gross liabilities than they were during the corresponding period of 1891. New industrial enterprises for manufacturing iron, cotton and woollen fabrics are going into operation in various sections, and while the margin of profits is small, business is on a solid foundation, and the outlook in every direction is hopeful and encouraging. The grain crop is promising, money is abundant and collections are easy. In the face of such a condition of things the calamity howler must remain silent.

That all this is changed no one will deny; but for the change, political papers and speakers give this, that or the other cause, chief among these being the policy of one or the other party relating to tariff, silver, etc. Yet when one looks deep into the facts of the case, it cannot be denied that neither of these is the main cause of the trouble, nor that each is at best but contributory in one way or the other.

The truth of the matter is that the roseate picture of two years ago was not a true one. It may have appeared on the surface as described, but at that very time many of the causes which have produced the later unpleasant effects were in full operation. With the boast of great prosperity the people were extravagant and reckless, and "boom" operations were in vogue in factories and shops, in states and municipalities, in homes and private living. The country was reaching beyond its capacity in expenditure, and now the debt contracted is being collected. The day of reckoning is sometimes swift and sometimes slow in its coming—but come it must, every time.

REMEMBER THE SABBATH.

The obligation on the children of men to set apart one day every week for the worship of their Maker and for devotional meditation and exercise is solemnly set forth by holy writ in all ages and among all nations favored with divine revelations. It is one of the duties so clearly stated as to admit of no justifiable misunderstanding. During the Mosaic dispensation, when the Jewish state was governed on theocratic principles, the people were told: "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work; but the seventh day, the sabbath of the Lord thy God, thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates." Violation of this statute was a capital offense; for the law reads: "Whoever doeth work therein shall be put to death." The sanctity of the Sabbath was recognized throughout this dispensation, although the prohibition against work on that day was later somewhat modified. Thus, it was considered lawful to perform acts of charity that could not be postponed, as for instance, saving the life of an animal in imminent peril, an interpretation sanctioned by our Savior, who also, as Lord of the Sabbath, allowed such work to be performed on that day as was necessary to allay suffering and sustain life, all of which was contrary to Pharisaical orthodoxy.

In the following dispensation, the sanctity of the Sabbath may be inferred from the fact that Christ's followers on that day particularly commemorated, in the breaking of the bread and partaking of the emblematical cup, the atoning death of the Savior. As long as the Jewish state existed, the Sabbath of the Mosaic dispensation was conscientiously observed by the converts; but on the fall of the capital and the destruction of the temple, the day was gradually changed from the seventh day of the week to the first day, and the Sabbath received new significance from the resurrection of Christ. As the old Sabbath was the commemoration of the creation of the world and the deliverance from Egypt, so the new Sabbath became the day in which to remember that regeneration and deliverance heralded by the victory of the Son of God over death and hell, as evidenced by His resurrection and ascension. The Christian Sabbath, therefore, is so much more worthy of observing as the Christian dispensation is in advance of the Mosaic era, as Christ was superior to Moses.

If we turn to the Book of Mormon we find that the people of this continent observed the Sabbath as part of their religious duties. Alma, on the authority of the Almighty, taught his followers to set apart "one day in every week" that they should gather themselves together "to worship the Lord their God."

Nor does the Lord in this age speak with uncertain voice concerning the duties of the Saints as to the Sabbath. In the revelation on this subject, given through Joseph the Prophet, he says: "Remember that on the Lord's day, thou shalt offer thine oblations and thy sacraments unto the Most High, confessing thy sins unto thy brethren, and before the Lord. And on this day thou shalt do none other thing, only let thy food be prepared with singleness of heart that thy fasting may be perfect, or, in other words, that thy joy may be full."

With this unanimous testimony from servants of the Lord in all ages and dispensations, it is strange that anybody should be in the dark regarding his duty in the matter. Yet such is the influence of the worldly spirit, that even professed Saints stand in danger of continual violation of the precepts of their Father relating to the Sabbath. One form of Sabbath-breaking seems at this time to call for particular censure, because of the pernicious and widespread influence it may exercise, unless abandoned in time, for a better course. We refer to the growing habit of arranging parties on the Sabbath day, where friends meet for mutual amusement, instead of visiting the house of the Lord for edification. Need it be said, that such parties, even if the pastimes indulged in are in themselves innocent—which very often is far from the case—are flagrant violations of the law of God? In the first place they detract from the attendance at the public places of worship, thereby exercising in a negative way a detrimental influence on the services. In the next place they tend to empty the hearts of the partakers therein of such feelings of devotion and Christian sentimentality as are absolutely necessary for a healthy, spiritual growth. An individual whose heart is not habitually and regularly brought under the influence of the heavenly dew will soon be a barren desert, void of all fruit of righteousness. What the life-giving stream of water is to the parched field, that is the communion with brethren in the public meetings to the soul. Withdraw it and substitute for it worldly pleasures—whether these be sought at the bathing resorts, the amusement hall, or the card table—and the results will be disastrous.

And then the example to the children! These are taught to worship God and to honor His day, but such teachings will be wasted, if by the habits at home they find that the Sabbath is no more than any other day. And thus the seeds are sown which in a future generation will ripen into further violations of the law of God, all through a neglect to keep that day holy.

The Sabbath is a day to be kept as one of rest, of moral improvement and of holy devotions in joy. All that tends to promote this is commendable, but all that prevents these things is sin, no matter what name is given to it. To the Saints of God more than to any other people the command should be sacred: Remember the Sabbath day.

A NOTABLE WOMAN.

The Philadelphia papers bring news of the death, at her home in that city, on April 21, of Mrs. Martha G. Kimball, in the fifty-fourth year of her age. The deceased had a career of most unusual character, and probably no woman of this generation has wielded more influence or occupied a higher place in the confidence of leading men of the nation. She was a woman of indomitable force of will and a strong sense of justice, and was possessed of rare accomplishments and great personal beauty. Her life is stated by those who knew her most intimately to be one long benefaction. George W. Childs once said of her: "She has done more good deeds and said more kind words than any woman I have ever known." The immediate cause of her death was a surgical operation performed in the hope of relieving her of a severe illness by which she had been prostrated the past four months.

Mrs. Kimball was a native of Portland, Maine, and prior to the outbreak of the war became the wife of Henry S. Kimball, who was connected with the treasury department and during the war of the Rebellion was appraiser of the cotton seized by the Union forces. While traveling with him, Mrs. Kimball was attached to General Sherman's army, and gave material aid in directing the hospital corps and rendering individual assistance. Her marked ability and energy was recognized by General Sherman, who appointed her chief inspector of hospitals. During the war she had many hairbreadth escapes, and was twice wrecked on voyages from New York to southern ports. She was the only woman on board the steamer Louise when it took Secretary of War Stanton into Charleston harbor after the obstructions had been removed. When the Stars and Stripes were restored at Fort Sumter she took part in the ceremony, aiding in hoisting the national colors. As the flag was raised some of the flowers on the top of the flagstaff broke off and fell. She caught them up and preserved them as a memento of the historic event.

The deceased was known as a steadfast champion of the poor and unfortunate, the weak and oppressed, and a determined and active foe to harshness and tyranny. At one time she paid a visit to this city, and was the guest of President Brigham Young. She was a firm and consistent friend of the people of Utah and ardently advocated the righteousness of their cause in the face of almost overwhelming public sentiment. At the close of the war she took up her abode for a portion of her time in Washington, where she enjoyed great popularity, numbering as her personal friends President Grant, Generals Sherman, Sheridan and Hooker, President Johnson and others of equal prominence. One way in which she did good may be shown in the following incident: A number of years ago there came to her house, on a winter's night, two boys who asked for something to eat and stated they were trying to get to the South, where they would not suffer from the cold. She took them in, cared for them and sent them to school. Afterwards she set them up in business, one as a merchant and the other as an electrical engineer. Both are now doing well.

The memory of Mrs. Kimball, however, probably will live longer in connection with the fact that she was the originator of Decoration Day than with any other event of her life. During a visit to the South she noticed Southern women decorating the graves of the Confederate dead. She was pained by the lack of exhibition of general respect in the North for the Union dead, and opened up a correspondence with General Logan, which resulted in the latter, at her request, naming a date for Decoration Day.

She will be truly mourned in Utah, for whose people she entertained a steady and influential friendship, and where she had many personal acquaintances and a host of grateful friends.

A SILLY CHARGE.

At a meeting called last evening to consider ways and means for helping the Carter army of unemployed out of the country, the following among other resolutions was adopted:

Resolved, That when railroads discriminate against one class of American citizens and refuse to transport them, the mass of American citizens being in sympathy with that class, it is just to determine that the roads shall not carry other classes until they desist from such unjust discrimination.

This has a somewhat plausible sound, and would ordinarily be sufficient, were the circumstances were not known, to intensify the already existing dislike that many persons in every community feel against the railroads. In the light of the facts, however, which form the basis for this direct charge aimed against the Rio Grande Western, the resolution is nonsensical in the extreme.

What the author of that resolution must have meant was to rebuke the railroad, not because it was discriminating against, but because it stubbornly refused to discriminate in favor of, "one class of American citizens." What he doubtless intended was to arouse a feeling against it because it was not complacent enough to be "held up" by the industrial army and convey that body of men to the state line for nothing. Giving his motive the most charitable construction, his expressions are nothing but disappointment that the road has declined to make a special cut rate to the state line, or enter into contract to dump down certain passengers for a reduced price into territory and under conditions which it could not legally or legitimately invade or connive at. It is not so very long since the "heartlessness" and "barbarity" of the Southern Pacific railway were roundly and noisily criticised. Yet the act of that road was not far different from that which these resolution-mongers demand from the Rio Grande Western.]

As to railroads in this part of the country "refusing to transport" passengers—that is all rubbish. They are in the transportation business, and the more passengers they can get the better they like it. But they are under no obligations to furnish free transportation to three or four hundred men who have been made to believe they represent and enjoy "the sympathy of the mass of American citizens" in a foolish march on Washington; and the News sincerely hopes they have too much nerve to surrender their property in the manner of these prearranged hold-ups of trains; it's winking at lawlessness and permitting an example that at a later day will surely return to vex them. As to what terms they are willing to make for the transportation of Mr. Carter's contingent, we neither know nor care; but the talk about unjust discrimination against him and his followers is idle, and the expressed determination that "until the roads desist from such discrimination they shall not carry other classes" amounts to a threat that is monumental in its stupidity.

THE FREELAND COLONY.

The failure and consequent distress which followed the attempt to found an English colony in the Argentine and later a settlement of people from Australia in the same locality, does not seem to act as a deterrent on the colonization scheme business in the Old World. The English are now giving substantial aid to Dr. Theodor Hertka's plan to found an ideal commonwealth in East Africa. The pioneer expedition which left London a short time since in the interest of this movement is expected to arrive at Mombas, an East African port in Zanguebar, in time to give the members of the party a few days' rest preparatory to starting inland on the 15th of May.

From Mombas the pioneer corps will make its way in a northwesterly direction for Mount Kenia, distant about 250 miles. From there it will explore the country around the Tana river, to which has been given the title of the Valley of Eden. The valley is more than three thousand feet above the level of the sea, and lies to the east of Victoria Nyanza. Though it is immediately south of the equator, its elevation and surroundings are such that it is said to be not uncomfortably warm, and to be a healthy region. The elevated table land is described by Captain Lugard as well adapted to the colonization enterprise, being fertile and well situated. The explorers intend to select and define the territory in this locality, which the colony, or the commonwealth of Freeland as it is to be called, will occupy. There the promoters anticipate founding an ideal government, in which land will be free to the colonists, and everybody will be well clothed, well fed, well sheltered and well educated.

The British government has made a grant of the land—though on what foundation the British claim of ownership rests is not made plain—and a considerable sum of money has been contributed to the expedition now en route. The explorers anticipate procuring much valuable information regarding the fauna and flora of the Valley of Eden and collections therefrom, and the Freeland colony proposes to institute a regular service of small steamboats from the mouth of the Tana to the limit of navigation, about 350 miles, and to carry on experiments in the domestication of the elephant and zebra. It is reported also that there are extensive gold deposits in the Mount Kenia district. The prospects for scientific information have enlisted the assistance of the Royal Geographical society, the South Kensington museum and other similar institutions in Britain; also the Royal Imperial Military and Geographical Institute and the Royal Museum of Natural History in Vienna, which have contributed liberally.

Of course, a great many persons will look upon the Freeland effort as one of the utopian schemes in which people frequently have embarked in the hope that they had found the key to contentment and success in life, only to have their hopes dashed to pieces. Yet to others the readiness to aid the scheme which has been shown by Britain would indicate that there is in it a plan for further territorial aggrandizement on the part of the empire. The founding of a powerful colony in the interior of East Africa would be of material aid in permitting an extension toward South Africa, and the bringing of the major part of the dark continent under British rule. This would be in perfect harmony with the policy of England for the past century, in which time the British possessions in South Africa have been increased from about 200,000 square miles to six times that amount. The new colony and the land adjacent thereto would add to Britain's territory in Africa an area larger than the German empire in Europe. It is safe to assume that the British lion will keep his eye on the main chance in the matter, and that British gold in aid of the expedition is not being expended without hope of rich returns.

THE GREAT NORTHERN STRIKE.

The Great Northern strike, whereby, on the orders of the officers of the American Railroad union, about 4,500 miles of railroad was tied up, is remarkable in the history of strikes, on account of the victory won by the employees at a time when the general depression has caused a condition of affairs in which, one would naturally suppose, labor might be had at about any price offered. That a corporation of so gigantic proportions had to yield so quickly to the demands of their men indicates that the day has already come when the voice of united labor has to be heard in the matter of wages.

It seems that the Great Northern last year, when the financial troubles burst like a cloud upon the country, reduced the wages with a promise that they would again be raised on March 1 of this year. The men accepted this as inevitable. March came and went, and still the reduced wages prevailed.

Then came the announcement that, instead of the restoration of the old scale, a further reduction of ten per cent would be made, and information was further received that the company had quietly provided for new men to take the places of the old employees, should the latter decide to quit work. This apparently treacherous breach of promise decided the men to strike and demand the restoration of the old scale, a demand to which the company has finally acceded.

The decided stand taken by the men is not surprising under the circumstances. A cut of 10 per cent is a serious matter to any workingman whose wages are so small as to allow but a kind of a vegetating existence. It may mean the impossibility of meeting unavoidable expenses and the loss of home and other property, while he is expected to work as much and as hard as if his efforts were remunerative. No intelligent laborer will submit to such a fate without a struggle for a more satisfactory condition. And in this case it seems the strike was justifiable, for the easy victory leaves room for the supposition that the railroad officials themselves, on the matter being properly represented to them, acknowledged their mistake and the justice of the men's demands. The conclusion is almost inevitable that the proposed cut in wages was not absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the credit of the company, but rather was an attempt to take advantage of the financial depression of the country and shift too large a part of the burden on the shoulders of the men.

The lesson of it all is that united labor, when intelligently directed, is a mighty factor in modern society, in as much as railroad corporations are not in the habit of yielding on moral principles alone. The victory won will encourage to further efforts in a similar direction and the question will be whether the right to reduce wages can be properly exercised without consulting the wage earner. Modern notions seem to deny this in opposition to the entire record of the past.

EQUAL SUFFRAGE, PRO AND CON.

"A white horse of another color" is the movement lately organized among the women of New York state in opposition to female suffrage. Their purpose is to show the lawmaking powers and the country at large that the suffragists, whose organization is of many years' standing and whose perseverance has been proved in many a hard-fought campaign, do not represent the views and have no right to voice the demands and sentiments of many thousands of their sex who have until now been silent on the matter. In a word, they propose to meet club with club, petition with protest, organization with counter-organization, and at least assert that inalienable and undisputed woman's right of refusing to accept or perform anything she doesn't want to. The first pronouncement of these unwilling ladies bristles with sarcasm at the expense of their more clamorous sisters who it says are like the "three tailors of Tooley street" in assuming to speak "for us, the women of the country;" and it insists that hereafter those who demand the ballot be honest enough to do so in their own name only, not in the name of the sex.

The movement is not half bad, so far as it affects either side of the case. Good will assuredly come of it, even to the cause which it sets out to assail. One of the chief arguments in the past against giving the ballot to women has been that the noise made by those who wanted it was altogether too great for their number; that the vast majority of the sex didn't care anything about it or were actually opposed to it; and that this indifference, being an evidence that the voting privilege was not sought and would not be valued or appreciated, supplied a most excellent reason why it should not be given. The present organization will tend at least to explode the notion that the sex are all apathetic and careless on the question, and since out of agitation come light and zeal and vigor, so should the campaign now announced prove valuable in quickening and strengthening the influences with which the cause is envolved.

The only question among intelligent and fair-minded people with reference to woman suffrage is as to its wisdom, benefit and expediency. All admit that in justice the right cannot be denied them, and that so far as fitness goes, they are fully entitled to it. Year by year prejudices are melting away; and in view of the really marvelous progress the cause has made within the past two or three years, it is easy to believe the day is near when the last lingering doubt shall have vanished, and the last sullen objection have slunk away.

LATE ELECTIONS.

The Republican tidal wave that appears to be sweeping over the country has been during the week twice significantly stayed—in the city of St. Paul, Minnesota, and in the third congressional district of Ohio—in both of which places, as well as many others elections were held on Tuesday, the 1st inst.

The significance of the Democratic victory in these two places is that at the last election both went Republican. Two years ago the Democratic mayor and city administration of St. Paul were routed; and it was with much confidence that the Republicans expected this time a confirmation of that victory. But a factional fight is understood to have been stirred up, and the anti-Catholic agitation was worked for all it was worth, which happened to be a good deal. The result is that the verdict of two years ago is reversed, and it is to be Mayor Smith, not Mayor Doran, for the ensuing term.

The result in Ohio is not quite so unexpected, but it is scarcely less interesting. The third district is recognized as strongly Democratic; and in 1892 it gave Mr. Houk a majority of more than 4,000 votes over his Republican opponent for Congress. Mr. Houk's death made a special election necessary, and this is the event that was decided last Tuesday. The Republican hope of carrying this stronghold of the enemy was based, first on the fact that last fall it gave Governor McKinley a majority of 500; second, that Democratic disaffection is widespread, and disaster has been lately overtaking that party everywhere; and third, that the candidate, Major E. G. Rainbone, was personally popular, and had the aid and sympathy not only of his party throughout the state, but to a great extent throughout the nation, Ohio elections being always interesting from a national standpoint, and this particular occasion being chosen as a fitting one for a supreme test of the strength of the parties, national issues being at stake and all eyes being on the contest. On their part the Democrats put up an exceptionally strong man, Mr. Paul J. Sorg, immensely rich but a workingman, and an employer and friend of workingmen; and his own energy and cash were reinforced with the best Democratic aid that could be obtained. The result was his election by a majority variously estimated at from 1,500 to 3,000.

All the comfort that has been coming to local politicians lately from elections throughout the country has been appropriated—and with abundant reason—by the Republicans. On the day above mentioned there were many other events calculated to add to this feeling of satisfaction; but these two are singled out by way of a balm for local Democrats, and as an evidence that their party is still afield and on occasion knows how to get out and “hump itself.”

GIVE THEM MORE LIGHT.

To say that the so-called industrialists who are heading for Washington from the western states chiefly consist of men with no other motives than a desire to get away from places where they can find no work, and to journey towards their homes in the East at the expense of the country, is probably to underestimate the situation. It will readily be admitted that some individuals may have joined the ranks for that purpose alone, but the movement itself owes its origin to far more serious conditions. Nothing is gained in either denying or misrepresenting the actual facts.

Among the laboring class there exists at present much dissatisfaction on account of the depressed condition of business. And this feeling is intensified by a deep conviction, bred and fostered by a partisan press, that the legislative and administrative branches of the government are largely to blame for it. It is astonishing to find how easily the great financial questions are disposed of in the minds of many. They seem to think that the key to the situation is the hands of the executive and his advisers, and that the smallest effort on their part would lift the lid that covers the wealth of the world, just as easy as a lady turns the key to her jewelry box and lays its sparkling gems before the admiring gaze of her friends. That the government does not make that effort, they regard as a crime against the toiling masses, and their demonstration is undertaken to force it to do something. The existence of such notions among the people has caused these bands to move for Washington, and has aroused the sympathy of thousands and thousands more, who do not actually join the marching ranks.

Only a few days ago a workingman, in every respect honorable and intelligent, voiced his sentiments in somewhat the following manner. The rich men have managed to deprive the vast majority of the people of almost every right except that of paying taxes. They are tools in the hands of politicians, led at the end of a string of high sounding phrases and empty oratory, like cattle. The laws are made for the benefit of the rich. This has prevailed so long that at last the worm has turned, and everybody feels that something must be done. The remedy is easily within the reach of the government. Let Uncle Sam pay, he continued, his debt to England in silver, and tell the bankers over there that if they would not accept silver in payment, their only chance would be to come with the whole navy and get it—if they could. That would soon bring England to terms and she would be pleased to get our silver. This would empty our treasury and necessitate its being filled again. Free coinage of silver being established, a wonderful activity would be developed in all our mines and the United States being free from debt could act independently of every other country.

Then the next step would be, he said, to stop pauper immigration for at least ten years, securing the employment to American workingmen. Add to this the closing of our shores to all foreign trade, since our country is rich enough in resources to supply the reasonable demands of everybody. We do not need anything we cannot produce ourselves. All this, he thought, would be easily secured by legislation, and he looked upon the leading men of the nation as little better than traitors, because they did not relieve the situation by some such means. These views, radical, chimerical and absurd as they are in some respects, are actually said to be the sentiments of thousands in this broad land; and if this is true, it shows plainly the nature of the soil in which Coxeyism is rooted.

The opinions and sentiments of the vast, toiling masses of the people are well worth studying, particularly in this country where the political power as exercised by the ballot is evenly divided between the citizen. The unification of labor is progressing at a remarkable rate, and the time seems to be near at hand when they must be counted as an enormous factor in the affairs of the nation. Coxeyism is but a small outburst of the volcanic fire already at work in the deeper strata. Its little smoke cloud will in all probability soon be cleared away, but as long as the conditions that brought it forth exist, the country is not safe. Something must be done by the leaders of the people and the voice of the majority must be heard, even if all the demands cannot be carried out, on account of their impracticability.

Political education is what the laborers need. If they had been fed in years past on political truths instead of on partisan misrepresentations, villifications and promises made to be broken, there would have been no Coxeyites today. For it is evident they are moving under false impressions, in the hope of obtaining impossibilities. Their ignorance may be pitied, but unless that feeling takes the form of an effort to spread light and knowledge and real information, it is wasted. An enlightened class of laborers is the glory and the strength of any country, while an ignorant mob is a danger ever present. Americans are naturally intelligent. They will seek information, and it should be given them instead of the husks so liberally supplied by partisan agitators. When rightly educated they will know what to demand of the government and what to expect of themselves.

THE TELEGRAPH'S BIRTHDAY.

Mayday has so many observances—some pleasurable, some ominous—that it is not singular if occasionally one of its greatest claims to commemoration is overlooked. We refer to the fact that on the first of May the first news dispatch was sent by telegraph. This was fifty years ago, and the dispatch was sent from Baltimore, where the Whig national convention was being held, to Washington, announcing the nomination of Clay and Frelinghuysen as presidential candidates. It is related that the crowd in Washington would not credit the telegraph until the first train arrived from Baltimore confirming the news.

Few of the anniversaries which the world celebrates is more deserving of the orator's eloquence, the gala procession, and even the rattle and roar of musketry and artillery, than the birthday of the telegraph, with its enormously beneficent record of revolutionizing the entire circle of modern life. That its agency in this direction is appreciated is evident from the recent assertion of a statistician, that there are 2,000,000 miles of telegraph wire in the world today, besides 150,000 miles of submarine cables; while experts say the future development of the telegraph service is “bound to be immense,” as though, indeed, it were still in its infancy. Yet we read that in 1860, sixteen years after the first news message was sent, only one operator was required at Chicago to send out telegraphic reports of the convention which nominated Lincoln; the convention which nominated Cleveland in 1892, on the other hand, required the services of 125 operators in the convention hall. Newsgathering, from the four quarters of the globe, appears to have almost reached perfection in its completeness; yet who can tell what the next two or three decades may have in store by way of improvement, even in this perfected and completed line!

LIQUOR LAWS IN SWITZERLAND.

The different methods adopted by different countries for the regulation of the liquor traffic and the solution of the problem of drunkenness are interesting from the fact that every civilized people suffers to some extent from the effects of that vice and has found it necessary to engage in warfare against it. A recent report sent out by the British foreign office, shows the laws in force in Switzerland and the rigidity with which they are administered. According to this report the legislative measures are directed in the first place towards the suppression of the vice itself, while they deal with the regulation of the liquor traffic only as a secondary matter. The saloons are severely taxed and subject to restrictions, but the strong arm of the law falls most heavily on the drunkard and on every person who aids him in his vice. Anyone who drinks to excess is liable to fine and imprisonment, and in some cantons he may be confined for an indefinite period in "homes" established for inebriates. Liquor dealers are liable to severe punishment for selling to minors and to intoxicated persons, or even to individuals known to be in the habit of drinking too much.

Persons convicted of drunkenness are in some cantons prohibited from entering a saloon and the proprietor is liable to a fine if he permits them to remain. Fathers of families, known to be poor, are punished if they enter a saloon, and in Berne the law is that any person who helps a pauper to drink or gamble may be imprisoned for sixty days, and no one convicted of drunkenness can lawfully enter a place where liquor is sold for a period of two years from the date of his conviction and sentence. Any appearance in public of an intoxicated person is generally followed by the arrest of the offender.

It is claimed that these severe strictures have had a most beneficial effect on the public morals in the Swiss republic and some have advocated the adoption of similar measures in other countries. The general principles on which they rest are the same as those on which most laws against drunkenness are framed; if the results are not equally satisfactory in other places, the difference must depend on the way in which those laws are administered. The Swiss people, although enjoying the benefits of a republican form of government has been trained to submission under the strong arm of the law to a marked degree. From the days of the severe reformer, Zwingli, when public flogging was the penalty of habitual neglect of attending church on Sundays, to the present day of militarism and police regulations, when even the Christmas joy of the little ones is marred by the presence on the Christmas tree of a formidable looking rod, the people have been inspired with the awe necessary for the enforcement of rigid measures. In the absence of such education the administration of unusually severe laws must necessarily be defective, since there are numerous ways in which any law can be evaded by those so disposed. And it is beyond question preferable to restrict the enactment of laws to such measures as can be administered to the very letter, rather than to multiply laws, to remain dead letters except in particular cases.

The Gothenburg system is the opposite to the Swiss method of warfare against drunkenness. It deals almost entirely with the regulation of the sale of intoxicants. It minimizes the opportunities for indulging in drink and deprives the dealers of any motive for violating the law, by fixing their salary and making it independent of the amount of business transacted. It also gives back to the community a part of the money earned, by yearly donations to public improvements and benevolent institutions, and it is founded on philanthropic principles. For these reasons many have recommended it as superior to any other method.

Probably the regulations of Switzerland are most practical to that republic, while other measures will have to be taken in other countries. One rule cannot be applied everywhere. Nations have their peculiarities, not to be overlooked in the efforts of lawmakers and philanthropists to conquer vice.

SHOULD BE DEFEATED.

There is a touch of sentimentality in the announcement that Colonel Breckinridge has confessed his shortcomings to the church with which he is associated and that his co-religionists have voted to forgive him. Of course they could do nothing less, provided they were satisfied in their own mind that his confession and expressed determination of leading a better life were made in good faith. Religion requires this as a duty men owe to each other. The return of the prodigal is the occasion of rejoicing in the household of the father and the recovery of the lost sheep is a pleasing event to the faithful shepherd. To refuse forgiveness to a repentant sinner would be to adopt a course opposite to that commanded by the Christian religion and exemplified in the conduct of its prominent followers in all ages.

It cannot be denied, however, that the close connection between this effort to regain the confidence of the church people and the political campaign into which the colonel has thrown his powerful energy and glittering eloquence, has anything but the right color on the surface of it. He has in this matter laid himself open to the suspicion that his seat in Congress is as important to him as the square settlement of his moral account on a Christian basis. It will always be an open question whether his repentance was not after all one of the ordeals submitted to for purely political purposes. Even those unwilling to constitute themselves judges of the hearts and secret motives of men will find it difficult to dismiss thoughts of this kind, and it is hard to see how his public career can retain any elements of usefulness as long as this suspicion of hypocrisy clings to his reputation.

As a general rule it is understood that the place of men like Breckinridge is not in the front ranks of a great and free nation. No country can afford to entrust the framing or the execution of its laws to men not of the highest excellence. If the representatives of a people are not men of tested moral qualities, the cause of public morality is lost. And the inevitable conclusion of this is, that when a man has been tried and failed as miserably as the Kentucky colonel has done, he ought to retire modestly from public life, with an apology to the country that he ever undertook a responsibility so heavy for his frail shoulders. Even when the charitable view is taken of his case, that his failings were entirely due to the weakness of his character and not to villainy, he ought to see that such weakness makes him unfit for the exalted position for which he now is making a fight. What is there to guarantee that in a moment of temptation he may not again fall, causing the shadow of scandal to darken his own path and the reputation of the august body of which he is a member?

It would be an act of friendship to the famous gentleman and an act of justice to the country to defeat him in this race. True repentance creates humility, and this feeling would long ago have suggested the propriety of his taking a back seat in the political conventions. To push himself forward, as he has done, after the sorry spectacle presented to the country, evinces bad taste and disregard of propriety to an extreme degree seldom witnessed among the ranks of public men.

SOLUTION OF THE SEWAGE PROBLEM.

The problem of an effective disposal of sewage on scientific principles that are within the reach of practical application has been long and deeply studied by those specially interested in methods of sanitation. Many plans have been suggested to accomplish the desired object, and the practical application of these suggestions has caused the expenditure of vast sums of the public money, in most instances without obtaining even an ordinarily satisfactory result. Thus the problem of sewage disposal has been regarded as a growing one, especially in its relation to the defiling of the water supply, and its investigation has been and is a matter of grave study as its existence has been an item of serious concern.

Cities that have adopted a sewage system generally are in the position that they must stay by it because of the enormous expense and inconvenience of change, particularly of a radical nature. But those cities which have not yet adopted or fully completed their sewage system exhibit wisdom in seeking the latest suggestions that have received through practical demonstration a satisfactory endorsement of their utility. For the perfect handling of the subject, however, in a way to reach permanent and satisfying results, it should receive scientific study and treatment, to be demonstrated by actual experience. Such a procedure the eminent sanitary engineer, Mr. Waring, has sought to follow, and his article in the last issue of the Century would lead people to suppose that he had at last reached the great object of his long and tireless search—the cheap and effective disposal of sewage by simple scientific or natural rules.

The gentleman's conclusions are of great value to growing towns and cities that are about to enter upon extensive public improvements in the line treated of. As Salt Lake belongs to this class, Mr. Waring's investigations and demonstrations should be of deep interest and great value to the municipal administration and the citizens generally. The conclusion of his inquiry, like that of the most prominent of sanitarians of modern times, is that complete oxidation is the only proper treatment for making sewage inoffensive to the senses or to health. Oxidation is due to an organized ferment; that is, to the work of living organisms. These bacteria find their food in the organic matter contained in sewage. They multiply in and consume it before it can putrefy, if it can be submitted to their action under favorable conditions.

This is taken as the key to the whole situation. In conformity to this view it is laid down as a first, though difficult, condition that sewage proper should be kept separate from storm water and the deposits swept from the surface of the streets. This is a marked departure from the usual rule, but is indicated as essential to perfect success. With this accomplished, the sewage may be made completely harmless by filtering it through successive layers of gravel, sand and loam; so that not only is there no annoyance to those living in the immediate neighborhood of the sewer outlet, but the resulting fluid drawn off from the bottom of the filter is as sweet and pure and free from living organisms as the best water supply can be.

Under the manner of treatment outlined a comparatively small area of land, of the proper kind, will take care of the refuse of a great city, at small expense and with a perfection of sanitation that no other known method approaches. The system requires that organic wastes be discharged at the sewer outlet in fresh condition, before putrefaction has set in. They are then conveyed immediately to the land selected for sewage disposal. The liquid first passes over and through a mass of broken stone, then over a fan-shaped surface of denser material, and then through still another earth filter. All this, of course, is in the open air, on a hillside. The matter is applied three times a day, and then the soil is allowed to rest two days, for the complete oxidation of the organic matter. Then it can be used again, and even improves with age. The tests made showed that four acres is adequate to take care of 200,000 gallons of sewage a day, or sufficient for 1,600 to 4,000 population, according to the perfection of the arrangements. The experiments in France, Germany and the United States uniformly appear to show that by this method the offensive organic portion of the sewage is completely destroyed. The results of the test and long experience in France are thus stated:

At Gennevilliers, where irrigation and filtration are combined and where the soil is gravelly, the sewage of Paris is made purer than the best drinking water of that city. Prosperity has been brought into that district, which was originally a poor one. Land that was formerly of trifling value now sells at $2,000 or more per acre, and its rental value has been quadrupled. The population has increased by one-half, and general prosperity has taken the place of comparative penury. The health of the people is excellent, and even in 1882, when there was a cruel epidemic of typhoid fever in Paris, there was none here. The general mortality of Gennevilliers in 1865 was thirty-five per thousand. In 1876 it was twenty-five, and in 1881 only twenty-two. Measures have now been taken to extend the same system over other lands sufficient for the purification of the entire flow of the sewers of Paris, saved during floods of the Seine, when there is no objection to its direct discharge therein.

In view of the fact that land described as desirable for the purpose is abundantly available in this locality, the suggestion that the system be carefully studied even to the extent of limited experiment does not seem amiss. The method seems to be as applicable to single houses as to a collection, and its utilization might lead to the banishment of the disease-breeding cesspool which is so prevalent. The system seems to be thoroughly scientific, and follows nature's own method and suggestion in the disposal of waste products. Its utility appears to be so well established as to lead to the conviction that it will be the system employed in all careful work for the future, and that the problem for disposing of sewage may be regarded as effectually solved.

THE CITY'S FINANCES.

It is a matter of congratulation to the city that its credit stands so high as indicated by the bids offered for the new issue of bonds. To pay a premium for the city's paper under the conditions which exist at present shows marked confidence on the part of capitalists in the ability of the municipality to meet its obligations as they fall due. In such a situation it should be the first care of the administration to see to it that the city's credit, either present or prospective, is not subjected to any process of impairment by reason of extravagance or of unnecessarily heavy burdens upon the taxpayers who ultimately have to furnish the cash.

The majority of the present City Council were elected on a reform platform. The verdict at the polls last November was notice from the people that they had had enough of reckless extravagance and misuse of municipal funds. The city then had reached the point of financial collapse under the powers it possessed, so relief was secured by extending its borrowing capacity; this proceeding being an exhibition of confidence that the new administration would not abuse its trust as the previous one had done and at the end of its term leave the city in a hopelessly insolvent condition. At the same time the sentiment of the voters was that public improvements be carried on with reasonable diligence, as the good of the citizens might require.

Less than five months has elapsed since the new administration took hold of affairs, and the manner of how these are being conducted is beginning to show for itself. The figures and arguments presented in the City Council at last evening's session will arouse in the minds of the taxpayers some perplexing questions, and if matters go on as they are it looks as though property owners will become convinced that things are becoming no better mighty fast. Take for instance the city and county building. The committee reports that there might be made there a temporary saving of $20,000 as to improvements that were intended. This means that if the Council had not sent a special committee to look into this business there would have been $20,000 spent on that building for which there was no necessity at the present time.

It is urged that to stop work on the city and county building to save money would not be judicious in the present condition of the labor market. That is true; and it is equally a fact that there is no necessity for the municipality plunging deeply in debt to rush the building to completion in a few months when it might be consistently extended over a longer period. The same suggestion applies to the sewer work. But it is not the part that gives employment to local workmen that calls for serious objection. That which sends the money away when we need it so badly at home is the specially odious feature. In the City Council committee report, the item of $20,000 was stated to be only that which would "be sent from the Territory, without any monetary benefit to the people." Then from the list of other expenses a small one may be selected by way of illustration of needless extravagance. That is the furniture item. The contract for the city's portion is $28,000, every dollar of which goes out of the Territory when there is absolutely no need of it. One-tenth of this sum would have sufficed for present needs, and the remainder, with an amount larger still from the county, could have been disbursed for needed labor by home workingmen. It is stated that this contract was made without the knowledge of some of the members of the Council, who would have opposed it had they known thereof.

It is a question whether all of the $800,000 bond issue is to be sold at the present time, or whether three-fourths of the amount would suffice. As a reason for selling all it is urged that because of the reduced assessment this year if the sale is allowed to go over the full amount cannot be legally disposed of. The argument is not correct, but if it were its only force would be that the city must go into debt merely because it has the power to do so now, even though the indebtedness entails upon the taxpayers double or treble their present burden for the future. For, as a matter of fact, although the assessment has been reduced a little the rate of tax must be raised this year; and if the city borrows all it can taxes must be further heavily increased for years to come. Under the issue of bonds as at present proposed the interest alone will reach over $125,000, or five-eighths of the city revenue. The balance remaining is insufficient to run the city for three months out of the year. The expenses for the other three-fourths of the time must come from an additional load upon the taxpayers. Is the present administration ready to assume the responsibility of throwing this great burden upon property owners and to meet the storm that will follow?

There is no desire to take a pessimistic view of the situation, but merely to present a few cold facts, with the reminder to the municipal fathers that the taxpayers have some rights in the premises that should be respected. Some of the members of the present Council labor earnestly for a judicious handling of municipal finances. It is to be hoped that a majority will be found in this position, though influences to secure an opposite result evidently are at work.

AS TO SPRAYING.

MILL CREEK, May 5th, 1894.

We are having discussions on the Law and Bug questions out here; one "exterminator" has been delivering lectures all through, but I voice the people's view in saying there was nothing learned from him of any interest to the fruit grower.

But if you can find space in your valuable paper I will relate my experience in regard to spraying, which I hope the reader will get some ideas from. I commenced spraying with Paris green in 1888 on the potato bug with success and have followed it more or less ever since. When coming to Mill Creek I talked the matter up, but met with no encouragement until the spring of 1893 when I prevailed on T. G. Boam to spray. A pump and Paris green were purchased and spraying started in good faith. I sprayed for nine parties with satisfactory results. It will not be necessary to go any further on this subject, but I will say that my remedy is Paris green. Purple may be cheaper but it requires a little care in mixing to get the benefit sought for. One thing further—you should not suppose that all your trees are affected with every insect; that is not so. It is my opinion that some insects are provided by nature for the benefit of that tree, if your tree is in a healthy condition. But I am not an entomologist, and have only studied the potato bug, codling moth and woolly aphid.

As to the moth, which is our enemy now, it is a moth in April and May, stings the fruit and hatches a worm, which at the end of five or six weeks after hatching returns as a moth again about the last of June and first of July. In about two weeks later this moth lays an egg on the fruit or in crevices and growing vegetables which hatches a worm and stays in the larva state till next spring, when it is a moth again, ready for your fruit—and you should be prepared to spray.

Precaution in Spraying—The man that uses a spray pump assumes a responsibility he should not neglect. Label all poisonous preparations; never leave poisonous compounds in the reach of children or animals; never spray trees of any kind while in blossom—there is nothing at that time to spray for and you waste time and material; if you have the least doubt that your mixture is too strong, and you are not using Bordeaux mixture, use a little milk of lime, say one gallon to forty; spray in time; don't wait till the worm is inside; don't spray indiscriminately anything and everything; study the enemies you spray for; remember that spraying requires a little judgment and knowledge to get the best results; don't use your mixture too strong; if possible spray mornings and evenings, not when the sun is scorching hot; never spray fruit on vegetables when they begin to ripen, but before that all poison will evaporate; my opinion is that our greatest trouble is the codling moth, and after we have subdued that enemy we will conquer all the rest; codling moth never destroyed a tree, but it is the means of ruining our apples for use and for sale, so that we have no profit.

Preparing for Spraying—Insects should not be allowed to get a foothold; spraying the trees with blue vitriol and lime when the leaf shows in the spring is a good thing to destroy many insects by preventing them from hatching; an arsenic solution is now practiced by good orchardists in the East, and why not in the West? It will destroy the apple worm with other leaf-eating insects, but never spray a tree in blossom—it endangers the best assistant of the fruit grower, that is the bee. There is one thing that ought to have consideration: I will give some facts below—it being a fungicide and a fertilizer; it destroys the fungus disease and we are enabled to grow a healthy tree when properly applied, because it checks the lice and aphids, also the red spider, knocking them off the tree and covering their eggs so they cannot hatch.

Bordeaux Mixture—Bulletin No. 2, Experiment Station, Horticultural Department, Agricultural College, Michigan: Blue vitriol, dissolve 4 pounds in 16 gallons of water; in another tub slack 8 or 4 pounds of fresh lime in 6 gallons of water; when cold, strain your lime carefully through a burlap sack and add to the vitriol; but enough lime should be added so as to neutralize the free acid, as if this is not done it may injure the foliage; if much of this mixture is to be used it is a good plan to make a stock up, as it will keep good a considerable time; the strength can be varied considerably, but the above is as strong as we care to use the first spraying, and it is our custom to reduce it to 50 gallons when made at intervals if the ingredients are fresh and proper amounts are used it is one of the least expensive of the fungicides and it is generally conceded to be the most effectual of all in its efficiency which is owing in part no doubt to the fact that the lime sticks it quite securely to the foliage so it is not readily washed off. Another desirable feature about this fungicide is that Paris green be used with it when spraying for the codling moth, this saving separate application. This station says use bordeaux mixture for all fungus diseases of the plant and tree, such as mildew, rust, rot and blight, in which either the spores or the body of the fungus itself is exposed to its action.

Now as to the law; if I understand it, it only requires two sprayings. That is poor policy. If you intend to hit the moth and gain any harvest, spray four times and do it well. It is not a good idea to use too many mixtures at one time on a tree nor to mix too many together. Don't kill your tree all in one year trying to cure it; don't get too many mixtures clogged up in your barrel that you spray from—arsenic sometimes corrodes and becomes useless and then the spraying is all a humbug you will say; clean your barrel every time you are through and then you have just the mixture you want when you mix again, and nothing else.

Now I am not writing this with any disregard to the law, because the law is needed and is all right so far as it goes; but I am speaking from my own experience, and facts taken from experiment stations which make me firmer in my opinion. If every one here would read the bulletins put out by our own agricultural station, they will learn something to their interest; these are sent out free to all who send their name in for the same.

I am yours,

WILLIAM LAURENSEN.

FISH LAKE ONCE MORE.

Having read the articles in the SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS lately about the destruction of fish in Fish Lake, I beg leave to say a few words about it. Since I first came to this valley in 1877, there certainly has been great destruction of fish and game at Fish Lake, and in the adjacent mountains, and the fish are greatly diminished, but I do not believe the stories told of the great amount of fish allowed to waste on the shore of the lake. The NEWS of April 24th, in giving an extract from a letter by Mr. Carter, fish and game commissioner of Sevier county, makes him to say, "Fish Lake is made a reservoir for Rabbit Valley, and that destroyed more fish than the whole people get from the lake." I wish to say Mr. Carter is misinformed, and his statement is not warranted by the facts. My business has called me to the lake very often ever since 1873, and for weeks together I have camped there, more especially the last two summers, having been there as agent for the Fremont Irrigation Co., and I know of the conditions. Men go there from St. George in the south and Uintah and Sanpete in the north, with barrels, and have hauled away tons of fish. About the time they expect us to open our gates the Indians and whites congregate there, and wait anxiously for us to "make a fish way," so they can catch the fish. When I opened the gates last June and refused to "make a fish way" for a few days, I was "cursed" by both whites and Indians because they could not manage their traps in so much water.

There are three good-sized creeks, and two or three smaller ones, running into the lake. They make excellent spawning grounds for the fish, but these creeks are watched day and night, and I risk the opinion that of the fish that venture up into them, not five in a hundred ever live to get back into the lake. That is the true cause of the decrease of fish in Fish lake.

Our irrigation company will be happy to co-operate with Mr. Carter in protecting the fish, but inasmuch as we use all the water flowing from the lake for irrigation purposes, we think we have a perfect right, by law, to close or open our gates at pleasure; and hence, we hope no one will give too much sympathy to the cry of hungry fish peddlers for a "fish way" in our dam. All they want it for is so they can catch the fish. If the fish can be protected in those beautiful crystal streams during June and July, and some springs in May, of each year, and the fish and game commission will direct or allow us to put in a screen at our headgate, so as to keep the fish in the lake, and will then protect them from Indians and others at the side outlet for a few years, the lake will be filled with the most delicious trout again.

Then the Indians and others should be taught to cease kindling fires in the forests about the lake as they did last year, when they went away from there angry because they had failed to get a "fish way" at our dam to suit them. We are very much interested in the attempts of Prof. Whiting and others to protect our forests, and will be pleased to help all we can in that direction.

We have bought a right of way, and are constructing a dam, by which we expect to make a nice fish pond, equal to one mile square and twenty feet deep. This is not intended for a fish pond, but for the storing of water for irrigation, but it will be a fine fish pond all the same.

Yours respectfully,

FRANKLIN W. YOUNG.

MOB WAR IN MISSOURI.

SPRING CITY, April 17, 1894.

Reading the letters of Cheney and Bigler—old time friends and comrades—caused me to reflect upon the past, and I now present a few facts, if you deem them worthy a place in your valuable paper.

I was the son of Isaac and Mary Calvert Allred, born in Bedford county, Tenn., February 21, 1822. There were two of us, and although my brother was born first, it has been said I was the oldest. We moved with our parents in 1829 to the state of Missouri, where we first heard of the "Mormon" Prophet in 1831. The bearers of the tidings were Hyrum Smith and John Murdock. They preached once and passed on to assist in locating the center stake of Zion, which was to be the "New Jerusalem." Other Elders came along in 1832 and a large branch of the Church was raised up, called the "Salt River branch." All the Allred families in that locality and other relatives and friends joined the new religion. My twin brother and I were baptized in the early spring of 1833.

The falling of the stars which occurred on the night the Saints were driven out of Jackson county, was witnessed in our locality in all its splendor, and many believed the end of the world was at hand. But we soon learned that that night marked the flight of the Saints from mob violence.

We first saw the Prophet in 1834, as "Zion's camp" passed through our branch. They camped there a week recruiting and organizing, and Uncle James Allred joined them with ten men from our branch. Our people having already disposed of their farms moved up into Clay county and bought land in 1835, but were not permitted to stay there long, and removed with the Church into Caldwell county and again purchased land, where we hoped to live in peace, where there would be "none to molest or make afraid," as there were but few settlers in that new county.

As soon as the surrounding country witnessed our success in opening up the new lands the mob spirit again revived and we were threatened on every side. In order to be able to stand the siege which appeared inevitable, a company was sent into Davis county under Captain Buchanan, to bring a horse mill into Far West to grind our corn. I went with my father's team to assist in hauling the mill. After our return to Far West I put up at Father Morley's, not having time to go home, eight miles out, before night. I had just fed my team and was eating supper when father came into town with a report that the mob was making a raid upon the scattered settlements on the head of Log creek. He told me to hitch up and go home that night so we could move into Far West the next day and he would ride home as soon as possible to guard his family. It was dark when I started, and as I crossed the square Apostle David Patten was in his saddle raising his men to go out to protect our people. Having had scarcely any sleep for two nights, I could not keep awake in the wagon, so I walked by the side of my oxen, and there I even slept as I walked, at the same time not knowing what moment I might be in the hands of the mob. I got home at 1 o'clock and found all safe. Father kept on the alert, and at break of day he heard the guns at the "Crooked River battle," it being only five miles from our home. That morning we moved into Far West, and witnessed the approach of the army, the capture of the Prophet and others, the surrender of arm, etc., etc.

History has it that Joseph Holbrook came in about midnight with the news of the raid. He might, but I know the foregoing to be true.

REDICK N. ALLRED.

SOUTHERN SUMMIT COUNTY.

WOODLAND, Summit county, Utah, May 4.—The people in the south end of Summit county are just completing the planting of their grain. The weather is still quite cold nights and the snow still lies in great banks close to some of the fields.

At Wanship meetings have been held in relation to home industry, and the starting of some line of manufacture was urged. It looks as if a creamery will be built there in the near future. It is a splendid point for such an institution. All the people of this locality are stock raisers and small farmers; all keep cows, and it will cost but a trifle more to feed and milk cows than to feed and not milk them, as is now done; or, where they are milked, the butter produced is a drug on the market, never selling for more than fifteen cents, often for ten cents a pound, while a good article of creamery butter will bring twenty to twenty-five cents a pound wholesale. Peoa, Kamas and Woodland each are points where creameries and cheese factories could be established by the people on the co-operative plan and this would tend to lessen their present cry of hard times, which are indeed more imaginary than real, as is evidenced in their actions and surroundings. This winter there has been more means spent in social pleasure in some of these places than ever before; and in my travels through the Territory I think I see need of a great reform in our way of living, if we may hope for greater prosperity, which can only come where there is perfect thrift. Industry produces prosperity and without frugal industry as communities we cannot hope to be prosperous.

There are many praiseworthy improvements in this part of the country. New and commodious barns have taken the place of the old, dilapidated sheds with straw coverings; farm machinery is more generally kept under cover and taken care of; yet this region is not without some of the sights seen elsewhere—harvesters left in the field, sulky rakes stopping gaps in the fence, and threshing machines exposed to the elements.

The lumber business that was so brisk here a few years ago now seems to be almost at a standstill, but it is hoped it will revive.

A good spirit prevails among the people. Meetings seem to be well attended and a general spiritual awakening is apparent.

The crop prospects were never better at this season of the year.

More anon.

TRAVELER.

FIFTY YEARS AGO.

PABOWAN, April 15, 1894.

As reminiscences of nearly fifty years ago furnish interesting reading to the survivors of those times and instructive reading to others of later date, I venture to furnish you a few scraps relating to those days, when that remarkable pilgrimage was begun and accomplished, the results of which we see today in the wonderful development of this valuable mountain region. Surely an inspiration from God dictated and directed the movement, as can easily be discerned at present, though surrounded with fog at that time, and only carried out by an unusual exercise of faith and a providential condition of necessity.

Some of the readers of the NEWS will remember the curious story of the three-dollar wooden wagon and the remarkable dove-tailing outfit of relief to necessity when monocratic orders made movement from Hancock county a necessity, published a few months ago. In company with a dozen or so of English families from the same neighborhood, the outfit journeyed through the state of Iowa to Garden Grove and Pisgah—points well written up in history—where President Young and associates, accompanied by a recruiting officer, met us. There was quite a large camp at the latter place attending to a growing crop, it now being in the month of July. I say met us, because, as is well remembered, the President had started earlier in the season and had reached Council Bluffs with the advance companies of the exodus; and pitching camp was waiting for others to catch up, and looking out for either winter quarters or the possibility of moving forward.

In order to carry out the request of the government for volunteers to serve in the Mexican war, he started on the back track to meet the traveling companies on the way. As remarked, the meeting in our case was at Pisgah. The emigrants were all gathered to an appointed place and the business was explained. As when he and his associates of the Twelve Apostles harangued the same men in England about six years previous upon the first principles of the Gospel, and the great events of the fullness of times, so the spirit of enthusiastic devotion to duty and obedience to counsel seized those dusty English travelers—for they had had not yet acquired citizenship; and with nothing but hopeful faith for the progress, safety and support of their large accompanying families, they cheerfully gave in their names to the officer, for enlistment, and with scarcely time to say good-bye to their friends were off to the point designated for organization and ultimate start. Father Bundy, of wooden wagon fame, was too old to be enrolled, and the present writer too young—so upon them fell the duty of herding and yoking the cattle, and the general male service required in the travel of six extra wagons, each containing the family and outfit of our enlisted volunteer. Their names were Daniel Browt (Browet), John Cox, Levi Roberts, Robert Harris, Richard Stater and Robert Pixton. (All returned from the trip except Daniel Browt, who was killed by Indians in the Sierra Nevada mountains, and all kept the faith and have ended their days in the mountains.)

Our proposed and agreed duty also extended to caring for and assisting in every possible way these lonely families on the way and at their stopping place or places, until the meagre relief expected from their husbands' government pay could be received.

About August 1, 1846, we arrived at the ferry near Council Bluffs. The onerous increase of duty thus undertaken and measurably carried out, together with the great heat of the season, the miasmatic influence of the rank and uncultivated vegetation of the wild Missouri bottom, soon had a telling effect upon Father Bundy and myself; for before crossing the river we were both prostrated with ague and fever, and the poor grass widows with their families had to care for themselves or be assisted by others, in most cases as busy and toil-worn as themselves. The further progress of these and accompanying exiles, including their sickness, semi-starvation, exposure and ultimate arrival in Salt Lake City, may be forwarded later on, if considered of sufficient public interest.

A FEARFUL RIDE.

MORONI, Sanpete Co., Utah, May 7, 1894.—As Brothers Edwin Scott, Aaron Hardy and wife, were approaching town through the north hills at about dusk on the evening of the 4th inst., with Brother Hardy's team, a stop was made to adjust something about the wagon, all alighting for the purpose. The front wheels were blocked while the work was done, which occupied but a few minutes. Brother Scott then took the lines and the blocks were removed. Being on a descending grade the wagon crowded the horses, at which they began moving, during which Brother Scott sprang on the wheel to resume the driving. He failed to get entirely on the wagon, being caught in the wheel which took him at least once around. His right foot caught between the sandboard and the axle. The team became frightened and began a wild run, which was continued for three-fourths of a mile, when, having made a turn on an ascending grade and run against a fence, it stopped.

Brother Scott was dragged across a large irrigating ditch and on a hard, dusty road, along which he was bruised and battered, yet he was thoroughly conscious during the whole of his frightful ride. When friends reached him the wheel had to be taken off to extricate him. How he escaped death at the time seems wonderful. His right leg was badly broken above the ankle joint, the muscles badly cut and his body bruised in places, also a slight fracture of the right temple.

Doctors Woodring and Cassidy reset the limb and sewed up the gashes, in which it was found necessary to put twenty-six stitches. They performed their work very well, but on account of Brother Scott's age, he being near sixty-eight years old, and the bad break, they can only hope for the best.

A WATER CYCLE.

NOTTINGHAM, May 7.—During the present month an attempt will be made by William Oldham, a resident of Nottingham, to cross the Atlantic on a water cycle. Oldham is twenty-nine years of age, and is member of the army reserve. He served with the colors for ten years, mostly in India. While in India he studied the art of navigation and got the idea in his head that he would some time endeavor to cross the Atlantic in the smallest boat possible. His craft, which is named Marion, is of remarkable construction and it is the smallest boat that it was ever proposed to use for such an adventurous voyage. It was built entirely by Oldham. Its dimensions are ten feet six inches in length, three feet beam and two feet six inches deep with a draught of twenty inches of water. It is constructed of the best iron; the plates are an eighth of an inch thick and these are supported by one and one-quarter inch angle barribs. With a view to making the most of its very limited capacity the little vessel's bottom is flat with a wooden floor over the iron work. In the center is a small cabin rising nine inches above the deck. It is four feet long and two feet broad. It has seven windows, two in front, one looking each side of the mast, two on each side and one at the back. All the windows can be opened and are watertight when closed. They are glazed with quarter-inch glass in pieces four and a half long and three inches deep. At the top of this miniature cabin is a water-tight hatchway sixteen inches square. The boat is provided with a brass screw worked from the inside by the hands and rest in a similar manner to a bicycle. This mechanism is for use when the weather is too bad to permit of the use of sails or when the boat may be becalmed. It is also intended as a form of exercise for the occupant. The mast and bowsprit are constructed of iron pipe with steel wire ropes and there is a small steering wheel. Nothing in the boat is movable, everything being made fast or concealed in boxes, and not a particle of wood is used in the framework of the craft. When ready for sea the Marion will weigh about fourteen hundred weight. In this extraordinary craft Mr. Oldham will leave Nottingham towards the end of May. Starting from the bridge crossing the river Trent at Nottingham, he will proceed by way of Newark and Gainsborough, enter the river Humber, work down the east coast to the English channel, and after putting in at one or two seaside resorts on the south coast, will start direct for New York. He expects to reach the latter place in six weeks.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

On December 4, 1893, Orson Davis, formerly a resident of Luna ward, N. M., was cut off the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints by the presidency and High Council of the St. John's Stake of Zion, Arizona.

Johnny Hansen, one of Mayfield's brightest and most popular young men, died of typhoid-pneumonia last Monday. He leaves a widowed mother and a sister, besides a host of friends throughout Sanpete county.

Hodges and Gibbons will plant two hundred or more acres of grain this season. Their farm and ranch is situated about one and a half miles south of town and is known as Hodges' Dell. Their ranch comprises some 900 acres of farm and meadow land of the best in this valley.

The citizens of Garden City turned out and made a new water ditch above the field for the purpose of catching the snow water from the canyon in order that they can water fruit and shade trees before the water can be turned into the canal from the head of Swan creek. On Saturday they turned out again and fenced the graveyard. Two steps in the right direction.

Mrs. Foot, an old lady, met with a painful and serious accident between nine and ten o'clock May 7th while watching the merry-go-round near the Knutsford hotel. Her right arm was struck by a projection from the revolving machinery and broken below the elbow in two places. She was taken in to a drug store in the vicinity where her injuries were attended to by Dr. Sharp.

At the request of County Attorney Murphy and associate counsel in the case of Charles Thiede, charged with wife murder, Drs. Worthington, Benedict and Richards rent asunder the stitches placed in the throat of the murdered woman, and by which the wound was drawn together by Undertaker Skewes. The purpose was to make a minute examination, the result of which will be made known at the trial of Thiede.

On Friday last, Peter Connors, a Columbian restaurant cook, was discharged from work on account of drunkenness. This afternoon he dropped dead in front of Malquist's blacksmith shop on Plum alley, in the vicinity of Commercial street.

The deceased it appears came here from Leadville, Colorado, and of late was a lodger at the Leadville house on Second South street. He was about fifty-five years of age, and so far as known here was unmarried.

Fornication is the charge upon which Deputy Marshal Boman Cannon has arrested, in this city, Gustav Christensen, on the request of one of the deputy U. S. marshals of Sevier county. The following telegram was received from the deputy, who expects to reach here tomorrow to fetch the accused man: "Charge, fornication; bond, $3,000, if any. Await grand jury at Nephi." That is all that is known of the matter here at present. Christensen will remain in the penitentiary until the officer arrives. But $3,000 reads like a pretty high bond for this class of offense.

An officer of the Industrial army came up from West Jordan. He says the men are getting very restless and that they are deserting every day. There is great dissatisfaction over the course that Carter is pursuing. The latter is living high at the restaurants and hotels here, the men say, while the members of the army are on short rations at camp. The offer to work on the railroad for $1.50 a day was laid before the men and rejected. They want to go to Washington. That, they say, was the object of their organization and not to get work on the railroad or anywhere else. The army is apparently on its last legs and the sooner it disbands the better it will please the farmers in whose neighborhood it is camped, as they have been taxed almost to the limit.

On Friday, May 4, says a correspondent at Garden City, Rich Co., Hyrum Cook had a very narrow escape from being seriously hurt. He was between a horse and the wall of a stable, currying the animal, when it took fright and began striking and kicking in a furious manner. Mr Cook tried to extricate himself from his dangerous position, but was hurled beneath the horse's feet; and when he did succeed in partially escaping the animal made a sudden turn, lashed out with his heels and kicked him into a stall in an opposite direction. On examination it was found that the shoulder blade was dislocated, which was soon, however, placed in proper position again; with this and a pretty tough shaking up, Mr. Cook thinks he had a very narrow escape. He only just returned a few days ago from Ogden, where he had been serving as a juror for nearly a month, and that absence and this accident put him back considerably in his spring work.

Coroner Allen went to where the remains of the dead man had been found the day before and had them conveyed to the city and buried in the city cemetery by Undertaker Lindquist. Papers were found on the body which proved the dead man to be E. M. Vance and a resident of Ohio. He was well dressed and apparently about thirty-five years of age, but could not otherwise be recognized as the body was too badly decomposed. The pockets contained $35 in greenbacks as well as a note drawn at Martin's Ferry, November 1, 1892, in favor of E. M. Vance and signed by M. C. Vance for $40.

The opinion of the coroner is that the man was traveling west and stopped over here with the intention of remaining a few days, and as is often the case with eastern travelers, took a run up the hill and when reaching the point where the body was found had sat down to rest and froze to death, as his coat was tightly buttoned about him, indicating that he had been cold. Near the body were found a five cent piece and a lead pencil.

Monday and Tuesday were taken up in the examination of J. L. Brana-gan on a charge of arson in the second degree, setting fire to the Provo woolen mills on Saturday the 29th. The examination was held before Commissioner Dudley, being taken from Justice Wedgwood's court on a change of venue. County Prosecuting Attorney Gash prosecuted and M. M. Warner defended.

Testimony was introduced to show that Mr. Branagan was very drunk Saturday. It was also testified that the burlap had left impressions on the greasy, dirty floor, which would not have been unless it had been stamped or pressed down in some way. One witness testified that a calendar, hanging in the window, was but partially consumed, which would not have happened if the fire had not been put out. A great deal of testimony was introduced to show that the defendant was very drunk on the Saturday when the fire occurred. After the arguments of counsel, Commissioner Dudley discharged the defendant. After the discharge the defendant took an oath in presence of his wife and the audience that he would never touch liquor again.

The Utah Commission completed its organization:

Commissioner Norrell nominated J. R. Letcher for chairman, and Commissioner Tatlock nominated Hoyt Sherman on the Republican side.

The first ballot resulted as follows, Letcher, 2; Sherman, 2; Norrell, 1.

The second ballot resulted in the election of Mr. Letcher, the vote being Letcher, 3; Sherman, 1; Thatcher, 1.

The election of two clerks was then proceeded with. The first ballot showed G. W. Parks, 3; Colonel Sowers, 2; Colonel Page, 2; Joseph Cohn, 1; George E. Blair, 1; Will Lett, 1.

The second ballot resulted in the election of Messrs. Parks and Blair on the following vote: G. W. Parks, 3; Joseph Cohn, 2; George E. Blair, 3; Will Lett, 2.

The services of Colonel Page, who has been chief clerk of the commission since its first organization, will be retained until June 30.

Commissioners Norrell, Tatlock and Letcher were appointed a committee on building. The commission has adjourned subject to call.

Dr. A. E. Winship, of Boston, well known as the editor of the American Teacher and of the New England Journal of Education, is in the city today. The doctor is returning from a seven weeks' visit in the West, principally in California, and will resume his trip homeward this evening. He expresses great surprise at the growth of the city, which he visited the first time in 1875 with an editorial excursion which was crossing the continent. The visit at that time was a source of great pleasure to himself and to the entire party, all of whom speak in very complimentary terms of the courtesy shown the company by the citizens of the city. The News acknowledges a pleasant call from Dr. Winship, and trusts that he will carry away the same pleasant impressions as on former occasions.

In company with Dr. Millsbaugh, he visited the various schools of the city, and was delighted with the efficiency of the system and with the educational structures that adorn the city.

Responding to an invitation from Superintendent Millepaugh, the doctor delivered an address at the high school building at 4:15 this afternoon, at which the teachers of the city, as well as the prominent educators, were present.

His subject was "A New Basis of Education."

The collection of mummified human remains and other relics of the ancient peoples once inhabiting these valleys, which collection has been on exhibition in this city for several weeks past, has been purchased entirely by the Deseret museum. This afternoon the large collection was removed to the museum building, where they will soon be displayed in connection with the very extensive array of ethnological relics previously belonging to the institution. The museum authorities are to be congratulated on their successful efforts to keep these collections of Utah antiquities in the Territory. This latest move will do much to increase the usefulness and extend the fame of our growing home museum of science.

In this connection it may be pointed out what is not generally known—that the Deseret Museum received full recognition in the Museums' Association of the World, the headquarters of which distinguished organization is in Great Britain. The Deseret Museum was represented by its president at the London meeting of the association in June, 1893, and expects to be similarly represented at the following meeting next month in Dublin.

The Museum has been closed to the public for a short time, but will soon be re-opened under greatly improved conditions.

A representative of the News had a pleasant chat Monday evening with Andrew Duthie, an expert engineer and machinist, who for the last two weeks has had charge of the immense plant of the Pinos Altos Mining and Milling company in the Sierra Madres mountains. Last night, after a visit of two or three weeks with his family in this city, Mr. Duthie left for Mexico, where he expects to remain until Christmas.

Concerning mining matters in Mexico, Mr. Duthie stated that there were three districts in the Sierra Madres mountains that are yielding in some cases enormous profits. These were the Jesus Maria, Pinos Altos and Conchenco. All of them, he said, are turning out vast quantities of free milling gold and silver. In each of these districts there is also a great deal of low grade ore but the processes in vogue there for extracting are very crude as compared with the way in which the work is done in the United States. With the same facilities there as here Mr. Duthie says that the low grade mines could be made to pay handsomely. There is a population of about 12,000 in the three districts named and the number is increasing rapidly. Wages for skilled workmen are higher in the Sierra Madres than in the United States. The Mexican peons, however, get only $1 to $1.50 a day.

The Mexican government is offering every inducement to foreign capital and immigration and as a result development work is being done very fast and the resources of the country shown up.

PLEASANT GROVE, Utah, May 6, 1894.—George Aldridge, who had his large toe taken out in the hope of saving his foot, grew steadily worse and it was decided to amputate his foot. The operation was performed, but all to no avail—the unfortunate young man succumbed to his suffering on Wednesday last. He was the son of Wm. Aldridge of Deseret, aged 35 years, and unmarried.

Edgar White had his horse fall upon him, crushing one foot. The young man will use a pair of sticks for several weeks to come. The accident is a severe one.

The Pleasant Grove choir were over to Provo yesterday in competition with other singers from the county. They will be accorded first honors—if they don't they will always think they ought to.

The county commission both of Utah and Wasatch county are putting on a force of mason, making repairs through Provo canyon; none too soon to suit the traveling public.

Henry Boren, John Duke, Jr., and Henry Nelson have located an onyx mine at Charleston, Wasatch county. The stone is similar to that found at Pellican Point, west of Utah lake.

The whistle at the Lehi sugar works can be heard daily. The mill is working up syrup from last season's run.

The prospect for fruit is very flattering.

Three of Pleasant Grove's school "marms" have gone and got married the last week, two of the maidens selecting husbands in other towns, thus contradicting Josh Billings' idea that "School marms never marry." D.

Mrs. Mary Standing died at her home on Bear River, near Collinston, Box Elder county, at an early hour this morning, the cause of death being paralysis. She had been in excellent health and spirits of late, but on Thursday morning she was found lying on the bedroom floor in an unconscious condition. Sister Standing evidently had arisen yesterday morning, about the usual hour, 7 o'clock. She could not have felt very ill, if at all, as shown by her care in dressing. This latter act was about completed, as she had partly buttoned the basque of her dress. It is probable that while doing this she was suddenly stricken down.

The deceased was in the 69th year of her age. She was the mother of Elder Joseph Standing, the missionary who was murdered near Varnell's station, Georgia, July 21, 1879, by a mob.

The body of the deceased will be brought to this city for interment. It is expected to arrive here on the Union Pacific train from the north, at 10:10 a. m. on Sunday, and will be conveyed from the station to the city cemetery, where funeral services will be held at the grave.

She was discovered less than half an hour after the attack of illness. In the judgment of those present the time was 10 to 15 minutes from when she fell. At the time Mrs. Dr. Jimmett was passing and was called in, and Dr. Snow was telegraphed for to Logan and came. Both did all they could to revive her, but the stroke was too severe for her to rally, and she died at about 2 o'clock on Friday morning.

Sister Standing came to Utah in 1849 and with her husband resided in the Twelfth ward of this city until about nine years ago, when they moved to Bear River. The deceased had been a widow eight years. She was the mother of ten children, seven of whom still are living. She was a native of England, and was among the first Saints who emigrated from that land.

Jacob Nielson, a miner by occupation, who came in from Bingham on Thursday last and who has been "seeing the town" ever since, attempted to kill himself this morning about half past eight o'clock by firing a bullet into his heart.

Since his arrival in this city Nielson has been spending the most of his time at saloons and Commercial street resorts. It is claimed that he had a considerable amount of money but the class of companions with which he associated encouraged him in spending it and soon it had almost entirely disappeared and remorse took possession of his mind and he refused to be consoled. One man who knew something of his conduct says that he has not slept since he came to Salt Lake and that together with the liquor he drank temporarily unhinged his reason.

He obtained a revolver on the pretext that he intended to buy it. The weapon was unloaded and he asked for a cartridge. That also was handed him and he placed it in one of the chambers and like a flash turned the muzzle of the gun on his breast and pulled the trigger. In less than a minute the place was filled with people to ascertain the cause of the shooting. Officer Lund who was near by at the time took the man in charge and conveyed him to the police station in the Black Maria.

An examination disclosed a bullet hole in Nielson's clothes directly over the heart. On striking the skin the ball deflected and turned outward toward the arm, ploughing a furrow as it went and causing a flow of blood that crimsoned his clothing as it trickled down his body to his shoes.

The would-be suicide would give no reason for his rash act and was placed in the city jail to sober up.

Mrs. Ellen Piner, care of Mrs. Hole, the Lord Nelson, Nelson Place, Harrow-on-the-Hill, near Uxbridge, England, writes under date of April 13th, for information of her sister Margaret Thompson, from whom she wishes to hear, and to whom she desires to convey the sad news that her (Mrs. Piner's) husband is dead. If this should meet the eye of the person inquired for, or any of her relatives, a reply addressed as above will be gratefully received.

The issue of $71,000 city bonds has not been sold yet, remarks the Boise (Idaho) Statesman. Several bids have been received, but they were unsatisfactory. A Los Angeles and a New York firm bid a trifle above par, but they asked excessive commissions. A Philadelphia broker bid 99½ cents, but the law prohibits the selling of bonds below par. The city is now negotiating with a New York broker who offers par and only wants ordinary expenses for handling them. The bonds are deposited in banks here, and will be sent to the New York broker as soon as he deposits $71,000 payable to this city.

THE COMMONWEAL ARMY.

TACOMA, Wash., May 7.—The commonwealers put a torpedo on the Northern Pacific track east of Easton last night and stopped the east bound freight train. Over one hundred of them boarded it. The engineer backed the train into Easton and sidetracked it. Deputy marshals are on their way from Stampede, a station eleven miles west of Easton, to eject the commonwealers. It is estimated that but one half of the army originally camped at Puyallup has crossed the mountains. The marshal's headquarters are still at Stampede.

WASHINGTON, May 7.—The defense had its inning today in the trial of Coxe, Browne and Jones for the May day demonstrations. Attorney Hyman made the opening statement for the defense. There was no denial or defense for what the commonwealers had done. He began to say that the defense would consist in the lawfulness of their action. He could remember but one similar occurrence in history, and thereupon he produced a Bible and began to read a Scriptural passage.

"The gentleman should confine himself to the statement of facts," interposed the District attorney.

"Does the attorney deny that this is a fact?" demanded the young attorney, holding the Bible aloft dramatically.

He was permitted to read a passage of the Old Testament citing that the Lord commanded Moses to take off his shoes because he trod on holy ground. From his discursive statement it was gathered that the defense would be based largely on the brutality of the police clubbing the citizens. It would be shown that Coxe had not walked on the grass and Browne had been driven through the shrubbery by the police.

Frank Harper, a newspaper man from Alexandria, Va., testified that the police had driven the citizen on the grass before the procession arrived, in order to clear the pathways. Coxe walked so quietly to the steps that he was not recognized until the people pointed him out. Thirteen police surrounded the general when he arrived. Witness was certain Coxe had not walked on the grass. On examination he said there were 50,000 or 60,000 people waiting and cheering for Coxe.

"Disorderly, were they not?" inquired the district attorney.

"Oh no, they had the right to cheer; they were American citizens."

The police came near running down a little girl in front of Harper. He had been ordered off the asphalt streets two or three times but returned every time.

"Then you disobeyed the police?" said the district attorney.

"The police are not the law; they are the agents of the people to carry out the law," was the reply. One person in the crowd on the grass was Senator Allen.

Witness No. 2, Sam'l L. Perlick, opined, when asked his business explained: "I am one of the army of the unemployed." Until the beginning of the Democratic administration he had been employed in the treasury. He swore that Coxe did not touch the grass.

Being called upon to give a ruling upon a question asked this witness,

Judge Miller said it might be a mitigating circumstance bearing upon the intent to violate the law, that defendant had been forced upon the grass by circumstances. The judge added that a hundred thousand violations of law did not excuse one violation. This witness also had seen the police drive the people on the grass.

Coxe took the stand and said he was a lobbyist in behalf of the unemployed. The men who came with him did so, Coxe said, upon the principle that they might as well be with him as anywhere. Coxe said he told Major Moore the army might break up and enter the Capitol grounds as American citizens. The chief said there was no objection. "My object in going to the capital," said Coxe, "was to present to Congress my two bills, the good road bill and the non-interest bearing bonds bill, and address the Congress of the United States and the American people on them. I demanded the protection of the police who seemed to be Colonel Bright's right hand bower, to present to Congress a petition from the labor organizations in favor of the bill."

Judge Miller would not permit the introduction as evidence of the speech Coxe intended to make or the protest he issued, saying that they had nothing to do with the trial. Coxe told his story of the march to Washington without embellishments.

DES MOINES, Ia., May 6.—The eighth day of Kelly's stay in Des Moines saw preparations for his final leaving under good headway. Early this morning lumber began to be delivered at a point below the confluence of the Des Moines and Moon rivers. At 10 o'clock a detail of 600 men, mostly mechanics of mere or less experience, picked out of the army, left the camp, under the leadership of General Kelly, and marched three abreast to the place where the lumber had been delivered and began working on the boats. Before noon at least twenty boats were in process of building and about fifty were nearly completed today. At 5 o'clock this evening the first boat was completed and launched. Three cheers were given for the first evidence of Kelly's navy.

SPRAGUE, Wash., May 7.—The Coxeyites in this vicinity this evening sprung a neat coup on the Northern Pacific. This evening a train of live stock, eastbound, stopped at Harrison, ten miles west, and the officials of the railroad sent a crew and engine from here to take the train east through Sprague without stopping. The Coxeyites were alert and one of them, evidently a railroad man familiar with the air brakes, rode the pilot of the engine back to Harrison. Concealing himself on the trucks of the stock cars, this man put on the air brakes as the train reached Sprague, neatly stopping it at the depot, to the intense dismay of the railroad officials and amid the applause of the large mob of Coxeyites and sympathizers.

The officials swear they will not carry the commonwealers out of town, if not a wheel turns for a month. The industrials are equally determined to ride.

MASSILLON, O., May 7.—The prospect of arrest on the charge of abduction awaits Messrs. Coxe and Browne when Judge Miller of Washington is done with them. This trouble is in consequence of the appearance of the "Angel of Peace" in Coxe's May Day parade. The "angel" was Miss Mamie Coxe, who is still in Washington, and who got there without her mother's knowledge or consent. The mother, Mrs. Caroline Coxe, the divorced wife of the general, secured her decree on ground of excessive cruelty, and was made legal custodian of the girl.

JUAB STAKE CONFERENCE.

The quarterly conference of Juab Stake was held at Nephi, April 28 and 29. It was well attended considering the stormy weather. Elders Brigham Young, F. M. Lyman and Juo. W. Taylor, of the council of Apostles, were present. They made many encouraging remarks, admonishing the Saints to faithfulness, and advised them not to join secret societies, as there was nothing to be gained by so doing. It was shown that the Gospel embraces enough organizations and associations for those who desire to be active. If the Latter-day Saints will keep the commandments of God there is a bright future for them. The brethren spoke of the great work of preaching the Gospel to the millions who are yet in darkness. Many convincing testimonies were given by the Apostles and by local speakers.

Bishop Taylor, of Juab, gave a very interesting account of his labors in southern California during the past winter.

Encouraging reports were given by President Paxman and the Bishops.

An excellent spirit prevailed during the entire conference. It was a spiritual feast that gave the Saints much to reflect upon. JNO. T. MILLER.

Assistant Clerk.

INFORMATION WANTED.

The following notices appear in the Manchester (England) Times; and in the belief that the parties named will be interested, the News gives local publicity to them:

KENDRICK.—Information will be thankfully received of William Kendrick, late of Darlaston, who was last heard of at 876 west, Third North, Salt Lake City, Utah, U. S. A. ## BIG CHINESE GUNS.

(Copyrighted by Frank G. Carpenter, 1894.)

SHANGHAI, China, March 20, 1894.—

NE hundred acres of factories for the making of arms and munitions of war!

Vast foundries for the smelting and rolling of steel

Gun works turning out cannons as big as the highest now being made at the Washington navy yard! Shops covering acres devoted to the making of the latest of modern magazine rifles!

An army of two thousand celestials in blue gowns with their pig tails tightly wound about their half-shaven heads manipulating with their slender, yellow fingers the finest of the modern world's improved machinery, and doing successfully all kinds of factory work under Chinese foremen!

These are some of the wonders I saw at the great government arsenal near here today.

Any one who thinks that China is asleep to what is going on in the modern world has only to visit one of its great government gun factories to be convinced of his mistake. I have spent some time at the gun works of Washington navy yard, where are being built the guns for our largest warships. We pride ourselves upon them as a nation and consider them among the finest gun works of the world. Away out here in China there are similar foundries doing even more wonderful work, and that to a large extent with native-made machinery, and just now with Chinese iron and Chinese coal. Of the two thousand men employed in the Shanghai works only two are foreigners, and these are consulting engineers, one of whom, Mr. N. E. Cornish, is an Englishman from Devonshire, who was for years connected with the great Armstrong gun works in England, and the other, Mr. Bunt, an Englishman who not only knows how to run all kinds of machinery, but has invented several engines, and who, with Mr. Cornish, is making many improvements in the Chinese munitions of war over those of other nations. It was through Mr. Cornish that I was able to go over the gun works, and with him I had chats with the Chinese managers, foremen and workmen.

Leaving the Hotel Des Colonies, in the foreign quarter of Shanghai, I rode in a jinriksha, pulled by two men, far out into the country. The day was cold, raw and rainy, but I decided to risk arrest by taking my camera with me, and, wrapped in oiled silk, it lay between my legs as we dashed through the muddy streets crowded with bare-legged coolies in hats as big as umbrellas and rain coats of a reddish brown jute, who were carrying heavy loads swung on poles from their shoulders. We passed many women in blue gowns of wadded cotton, who hobbled along on their little feet through the mud with a knock-kneed gait, and met at every turn the rikshas and sedan chairs of swell Chinamen, whose eyes were so shrouded by their big black spectacles that they looked like Gargantuan brownies rather than scholarly Chinese. Many of these swells had on their winter bonnets of wadded silk and their clothes were of the brightest of reds, blues and greens. Their bonnets covered the entire head and were fastened under the chin in a wadded cloth which protected the neck and throat. They were so made that only the front of the face was exposed to the weather, and they extended out behind into a sort of a cape which fell to the waist and concealed their cues. The gowns of many of them were fur lined and the silk brocade of which they were made seemed more fit for a ball room than a rainy, muddy Chinese country ride. Beside these rich worked the poorest of the poor. We passed scores of sweating men pushing freight wheelbarrows, each containing a load for a horse, and jostled by the hundreds of other queer working characters who fill the country roads of China with as many travelers as you will find on the roads approaching one of our little cities on a circus day.

Just outside of the walls of the native city I passed a guard house filled with Chinese soldiers. The sun came out at the moment, and I attempted to photograph them. But when they saw the camera they scowled and went inside of the guard house. Not far from this I came to a fortification which I afterward learned was the barracks of the troops which the viceroy keeps here to guard the arsenal and to protect Shanghai. A white wall, perhaps twenty feet high, surrounded them, and I could only see the great flags of black net work embroidered with red Chinese figures, twenty odd feet long, which floated from a pole above the tent of the commander. I saw many soldiers, however, and I photographed a good natured one who evidently did not understand what my camera was. These soldiers were dressed in all sorts of bright colors, and the uniforms of many of them consisted of the brightest of blue cotton sacques, trimmed with black velvet and ornamented with red stripes. They wore wadded cotton pantaloons, which they tucked into black, short topped wadded cloth boots, and their heads were covered with stiff skull caps of silk. They look entirely different from the people about this part of China, and are much more muscular and are taller than the Chinaman we have in America. They come from the interior, and the best fighters among them are from the rebellious province of Hunan, where the insurrection against the missionaries of a year or so ago originated. There are only a few thousand of them in this barracks, and they are but a small part of the army of the Viceroy of Nanking, who lives at his capital in the interior.

Reaching the arsenal we stopped for a moment under a white wall, on which was a gaudy painting of one of the heroes of Chinese mythology, who is supposed to give luck to the officers within, while one of the Chinese soldiers took my card into Mr. Cornish, and a moment later I was inside of these vast works and surrounded by the din of machinery. Practically the only difference between these works and those of any of the great gun factories of Christendom lies in the gorgeous colors of red, blue and green in which the Chinese delight and with which they paint not only the interior woodwork of their shops, but some of their machines as well, and in the fact that all of the work is done by Chinamen. The first room we entered was about the size of the biggest shop in the Washington navy yard. It covered, I judge, about an acre of space, and in it were being turned out some twelve-inch guns for the navy. You have seen pictures of such guns in the newspapers. They are the biggest made at our navy yard, and they are immense iron cannons, the barrels of which are thirty-five feet long, and which fire projectiles of steel which weigh a thousand pounds. To make one of these guns costs in the neighborhood of $50,000, and the Chinese are now just finishing their fourth gun of this kind. Those completed have been tested, and shown equal to anything made in Europe or America, and the projectiles for the guns are made here. The Chinese, however, like the other nations of the world, now believe that these immense guns are not so good for defense and warfare on the sea as the smaller varieties, and they will build no more of them at present. Near these I saw some twenty five-ton guns, and then visited the shops, where about 300 Chinamen were at work making the latest improved patterns of Armstrong rapid firing guns. I looked at a 4.7 inch gun of this kind which had just been completed, and was shown its working. It moved so easily that a baby could have almost worked it, and the Chinese foreman in charge told me that they had just finished a dozen of these weapons, and that they were now working on some which would fire 100 pound shot.

China has no scruples as to patents, and she gets now all of the latest improvements in war machinery and copies them here. There is no doubt about the great mechanical ability of the Chinese. Here are two thousand men, who have been brought up on lines entirely different from those on which they are now working, and they make as expert workmen as our mechanics, who have had generations of hereditary descent and years of experience. A great part of the machinery used here was made by Chinamen, and Mr. Cornish tells me that he found that parts which he had thought it impossible for a Chinaman to turn out, and which he had expected would have to be imported at a great expense from Europe, had been made by these men from drawings. Some of them are so expert that only general directions and the knowledge of the results required need be given them, and they will straightway make the designs and castings. I was shown one machine—I think it was for the rifling of some of the guns, though I am not sure as to this—which contained a screw of only three inches in diameter and thirty-five feet long, which was designed and cut by a Chinaman, and I took a time exposure of a yellow-faced Chinaman, who makes the finest of the improved sights of the Armstrong guns. The work is as delicate and as beautiful as that of a watchmaker, and there is an improvement on the original, which this man has added. The rifling machine for the big guns would have cost $15,000 to import. These Chinamen were shown the drawings, and they made it for half that sum. It is so in nearly every variety of machinery, and among the things now actually being made in these works are all sorts of modern projectiles, from the revolver bullet up to great shots of steel weighing 1,000 pounds. They make cartridges from those fitted for a revolver to the kind required for a six-inch rifle, and I saw Chinamen drilling steel, cutting our grape shot and making brass cartridge cases from disks of metal and paid a visit to the warehouses, where I was shown the 200 different kinds of shot and shrapnel which are made here. They are now turning out about 30,000 pounds of shot a day, and they have made recent experiments with Chinese iron which demonstrate its superiority in some respects over any other iron of the world.

No one knows much about the mineral resources of China. But coal and iron are said to exist in nearly every one of the eighteen states or provinces of the empire, and there have been some iron mines which have been worked for years. Up to this time, China has been importing the raw material for her arsenals, but she is now experimenting with her own supplies, and the manufacturing China of the future will probably be entirely independent of the rest of the world. The coal and iron formations of the province of Chili are said to be the largest in the world, and the product is unsurpassed. The iron now used here comes from the province of Hunan, in about the center of China, and some idea of its character may be learned from a test which was recently made here. A shot was cast of this iron for a three-inch rifle, and it was fired against a target with the same charge and the same gun in competition with imported shot of steel. The target consisted of three iron plates an inch thick, interleaved with boards of wood. The steel shot penetrated the target, but none of them went through it. The Chinese cast-iron shot passed clear through the target and were lost. The process of manufacture of the iron is not known at the arsenal. It comes here in the shape of iron plates or slabs, from half an inch to two inches thick, and I should say, at a guess, for I did not measure them, fifteen by twenty-five inches in size. I saw a great quantity of the ore lying outside of the foundry. It is of a reddish brown color, and looks much like some which we get from the Lake Superior mines. The pigs or slabs are laid down here at about twenty dollars a ton, or ten dollars a ton in gold, thus costing about half a cent a pound. Mr. Cornish tells me that the Chinese make castings of iron which would be considered impossible in America. They will cast kettles as big as the largest

American apple butter kettle, holding about as much fluid as an old-fashioned wash tub, and only a sixteenth of an inch thick. These kettles are wonderfully strong. You would think they would snap like glass, but they are thrown about as though they were made of copper, and are very hard to break. In the experiment above mentioned Mr. Cornish told me that he had no idea that the shot would go through the target, and he was disappointed in not being able to find it. He says the iron is far superior to the average European iron, and that he is satisfied that it is made with charcoal. It does not melt easily, however, and the foundries do not like it.

There are hundreds of steam engines of all kinds in these works, and they are all managed by the Chinese. I saw one of four-hundred horse-power which was in charge of a boy and a youth of twenty-one, and I noticed that numbers of the Chinese mechanics are under age. Some of them are old men, but it is hard to tell the age of a Chinaman, as they all shave, and there are few gray hairs. I spent some time looking at the men putting up an engine of two thousand horse-power. It is of the most modern variety, and has cost a fortune. The immense furnaces burn gas, and a look into them would scare the religion out of any modern Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego if the Viceroy of Nanking cared to play the part of the cruel Babylonian king of the Scriptures. These furnaces are controlled by two easily-moved levers, and a mistake would blow the whole into atoms. A Chinese engineer about thirty years old has entire charge of them, and he stood for me beside the furnace doors while I took his picture.

The steel works of this arsenal cover about four acres. The men are now experimenting in making ingots for armor plate, such as we turn out at Bethlehem, and they are putting in a steel furnace which will smelt fifteen tons of steel at one time. If it is a success, they will add others. They have made some small ingots, and I saw some steel rails for railroads which they turned out the other day to show the Chinese authorities that they could make them. They do all sorts of forging. They are now putting in a seven-hundred-ton steel press, which will exert a force of two thousand tons on the ore beneath it. I saw great steel hammers forging out immense lumps of steel, and I was surprised at the wonderful way in which these people handle all sorts of metal and machinery. There is never a mistake, and the men are on hand every time.

What I saw today has removed from my mind all doubt as to the ability of the Chinese to construct and manage modern machinery, and I question much whether they have not the germs of a creative ability, which, under proper conditions, might produce as great inventions today as the Chinese mind has done in the past. The compass, gunpowder and printing originated here, and we may have a Chinese Edison in the future. I asked questions of Mr. Cornish concerning this, as we walked through the works, and he told me that several of the mechanics had improved upon the original models which had been imported, and I saw a machine for cutting steel which a friend of Li Hung Chang had adapted to the making of candle wicks, and which, by his favor, he was running with the arsenal power. Said Mr. Cornish:

"The lack of inventors in China may come from there being no patent law. These men tell me they don't care to work at getting new things, because their neighbors will steal their ideas. Besides, you must remember that the Chinese mind has for years run in other directions. A mechanic is not of much account here, and the man who can write a three line poem or can quote Confucius would be thought more of than any inventor. Tupper, the poet, had he been born in China would have outranked an Edison, and the literati look down on such work as beneath them."

I did not have time yesterday to visit the powder works where the Chinese are making all sorts of powder from the brown cocoanuts which are used for the heavy guns to the small black grains which are made for modern rifles, but I saw samples of the powder and Mr. Cornish says there is a chemist now on his way from Germany to China, who will teach them how to make the smokeless powder which has been recently invented.

I asked as to the hours of work and the wages of the men. Mr. Cornish replied: "It is a curious thing that we have an eight-hour law in existence in these works and our employes work fewer hours perhaps than in any other native establishment in China. The men begin work at 7:30 a. m. and work until 11:30. Then they have an hour for lunch and work on until 4:30. In case of necessity, however, of war or otherwise, we could work them almost twice that long and we could add to the force largely without much trouble. Our mechanics get from three to six Mexican dollars a week, or from a dollar and a half to three dollars a week in your currency. The very best of the foremen receive as high as eighty dollars a month, and under foremen get about thirty-five Mexican dollars a month. Our possible supply of labor is, of course, unlimited."

"By the way," continued Mr. Cornish, "I suppose the eight-hour rule came from the fact that this establishment was originally organized by an American who came here a score and more of years ago and was employed by the Chinese to run it. He ran it so well that he made a fortune out of it, and for this reason it was taken out of his hands. The Chinese don't object to money being made, provided they make it themselves, and they saw that Mr. Falls was getting rich very fast. They now handle the thing themselves and if there are any fat contracts or squeezes to be made it is a Chinaman who has charge of them."

At this moment one of the officers of a Chinese naval vessel came in to see about getting two six-inch guns for his ship, which was lying at the arsenal wharf, and with him we took a trip over a Chinese man-of-war. But of this I will write in another letter.

THE FUTURE FARM.

VII.
INTENSE FARMING.

NOTE 1. The meaning of intense farming is: On the same extent of land, and with the same amount of labor and expenditure, to produce the most valuable yield in crop; and which, according to experience and science, it is possible to bring forth from a given acreage of land.

Prosperous commonwealths are built up by the prosperity of their population. And the root to welfare lays in the richness of the returns from labor. The greater the fruits are of life-sustaining power that the same amount of labor will produce, the greater is the prosperity of the people and the nation. And as we calculate to prove, in this the last chapter of "The Future Farm," that intense farming, eventually, will solve the problem (together with a corresponding advancement in physical and chemical sciences) of ideal state prosperity and national welfare, as a Republic, and according to the spirit of our glorious Constitution.

This short article on intense farming is not calculated to set forth now to execute intense farming, but only to present its outlines.

We have in the preceding chapter, intended to prove (how successful the reader may judge) that permanency of republics necessitates an equal practical and intelligent ability in all branches of wealth-earners (laborers) and that only laborers are or can be legitimate citizens of a Republic, and therefore the necessary intelligence and practice to execute the most advanced farming is in harmony with the necessary general intelligence requisite for citizens of our Republic.

NOTE 2.—INTENSIFICATION OF OUR FARMING INDUSTRY.—The best farming we are not acquainted with, because we have not reached it, but it is, may be, faintly foreshadowed in the promising analyses of modern science, as also the increasing data of intelligent experience, open to view more and more, the unlimited field for improvements, through applied science.

By the best farming we know of today we mean the most remunerative. It is also the most satisfactory to cultivate minds. Through the blessing of God it will improve the country and make it more healthy, beautify and shape it in a character approximate to our faint ideas of paradise.

Developments of the sciences, and their practices, particularly in the last century, make it possible at the present time to arrive at a higher productiveness of the soil than perhaps ever known before. And if we are able correctly to read the providential discoveries of latter times, in science and mechanism, we would most likely also be able to see that the most ample and fitting preparations have been made for a more perfect agriculture to be built up in this era, than we were acquainted with from the past.

At the present time we should not rest satisfied with anything less than ideal farming, built up upon true science and practice, both in farming, gardening, architecture, zoology, hygiene, esthetics, etc.

We are well aware that to some extent it requires scientific men, more than empiric farmers, to prosecute unsolved scientific problems in farming, but in consideration of the thousands of young people now educated and trained at our agricultural colleges, universities etc., there is a most hopeful prospect for a speedy advancement from empiric to rational scientific farming; and it is a significant and encouraging feature the great number of young people that already have been and are now trained under the tuition of our most advanced professors in agricultural science.

NOTE 3. It is a well known fact in botany that to favor plant life, the soil must contain 1. depth, 2. looseness, 3. nourishment, 4. heat, and 5. moisture, most congenial to the kind of plant production wanted.

To conclude with we will therefore, very briefly, consider certain conditions, as above mentioned, for intense farming.

1. Depth of soil.—The penetrating power of roots into the soil, of cereals and fodder plants (lucerne, esparsette, and a few other kinds expected) such as belong to farming products generally, is not much over 24 inches. Wherever possible by a favorable underground it can be plowed and cultivated to that depth, it is presumable (until thoroughly tried and concluded on at our experimental stations) to be the proper depth.

2. Looseness of the soil, and nourishment in it. Irrigation, by leading the water on the land, to furnish necessary moisture for vegetation, has a tendency to bake and harden the soil more than rain does, if organic matter (except entire sandy) is not sufficiently contained in the soil to withstand the contraction in drying. In order to obtain this necessary consistency, by properly mixing the soil with organic etc., (both physical and chemical) matter, is necessary in order not alone to make it 1. loose enough to be favorable to the growing of roots; but also to be 2. rich enough for the most fruitful vegetation; also 3. to secure approximate evenness in temperature; and 4. moisture; and finally (there are still other considerations) 5. greatest retaining power of moisture, effecting measurably arrest of evaporation. Altogether this will be of the most costly and improving features towards more remunerative and perfect farming. It will probably more than double the present cost of land while it is sure to enrich it several hundred per cent. How much percentage of organic matter, and how much chemical effect, if any, it will require to reach this high character of soil will be an exceedingly interesting problem to solve by our western agricultural experiment stations. But in doubling the cost of land, it is certain it will more than treble its producing value.

3. Nourishment or strength of soil.—Necessarily, in improving the physical qualities of the soil by adding organic matter, for the object of retaining that looseness most favorable for vegetation, the chemical conditions for the same purpose should also be imparted. We will not risk to forestall the future outcome of this very interesting and most important national problem. But we are certain that these proposed intensive improvements carried out with practical economy will give an average interest on cost, enough to make a good living for a family, on from ten to fifteen acres.

Always providing that plutocracy does not rule over the nation; that the equilibrium of true values be re-established, and honest government prevail in our Republic. We expect it to be of great economic value that particular accent be put on the prosecution of solving this agricultural problem, at our western experiment stations; and that liberal appropriations be provided for answering these important questions. We have reason to look for the greatest agricultural achievements of our experiment stations, in our era, in a true solution of these all important subjects.

4. Heat. Another point in intense farming is the preservation of, as much as possible, an even temperature in the soil during the growing time. It is as yet uncertain to what extent are the effects of expansion and contraction of the soil, on the tender roots, caused by variation in temperature, but empirically it is considered to be very injurious. It is a fact that by drill culture and surface cultivation the most remunerative crops are produced. The pulverized condition of the cultivated surface, between the drills, being a less effective leader of heat and cold, may partly account for the very favorable results of drill culture and surface cultivation. It is most likely that for various reasons, and particularly in connection with irrigation of the farm, that this mode of agriculture will prevail with the future farm as one of the main levers in intense farming. We recommend as a most important economic question to be answered by our experiment station: If it would be profitable, together with intense farming, to supply the ground, when needed, with artificial heat, during growing time? And, if it can be made remunerative, then, in what way to do it?

5. Moisture.—Since farming with irrigation was introduced on the Western slope, mountain streams and rivers became of great value. And through experience and increase of population the application of irrigation on the growing crops has more and more increased the value of these streams, until now our well populated valleys cause us to study up, and practically try, to what extent irrigating water can be economized. It is by this time a certainty that old-fashioned farming loses more than half the water used by evaporation, giving only a small amount of its benefit to the crop while evaporating. Shallow plowing, light crops, and only a small amount, if any, of organic matter in the soil, causing the surface (more so on clay land) easy to harden or bake together; such contraction, through drying sun heat, altogether facilitating evaporation. By the above hinted at improvements in farming, it is most probable that the same amount of irrigation water will be made from three to four times more profitable, both by arresting a great deal of evaporation and open for cultivation more than twice the amount of farming land now irrigated with the same streams.

It may also be of importance for the experiment stations to solve the problem: If underground irrigation, through piping or otherwise, can be made profitable? as there are known features connected with this question, seemingly, of importance in agricultural economy.

CONCLUSION ON THE FUTURE FARM.

NOTE 4. In the above few hints in regard to the future farm I have constantly had my mind upon the main question:

What is the highest productiveness attainable from the soil, at profitable expenditures thereon? as a guide for "The Future Farm."

I believe the answer will be that at this time, and as far as this question can be answered at present:

1. The average benefit of the now cultivated land can be at least tripled.
2. The average amount of water now available can be extended over at least double the acreage.
3. The average amount of water that can now be saved by storage can still irrigate 30 per cent more land.
4. When these improvements have been fairly executed, the farming population can be more than tripled, and make a good, average living.
5. Always provided, that our glorious Republic preserves its dignity, and tellingly and peacefully teaches plutocrats how to make an honest living on a level with their fellow citizens and the good people of the United States to go on to their glorious destiny!
