last week in the gulch putting into White Bird at Joe Jewell's. Two men with horses says the Grangerville (Idaho) Free Press, from the prairie stopped there that night, and they slept in the girls' room upstairs, while the young ladies made a shakedown bed on the floor down stairs. The snowslide went through the side of the house, throwing the boards down on them as they slept, and all were either crushed or smothered. An infant child which lay between the two eldest girls was recovered alive. The old folks also slept down stairs, but escaped without injury, as did the guests. The name of the family was Thompson, formerly located at Cottonwood. The young ladies' ages ranged between 8 and 18. It is without doubt the most melancholy tragedy that has occurred in the country since the Nez Perce war, and the bereaved family have the sympathy of all.

FARMS INTO SWAMPS.

Since the bringing out of the canals from Jordan river for irrigating purposes, the use of the water on bench lands has caused many tracts lower down to become so moist that where formerly irrigation was required to raise crops on them it is now unnecessary. In many instances on the east side of the river and which was formerly cultivated has been converted by irrigation above into meadowland. On the west side of the river, however, the changes from this cause have been more marked and in many cases more ruinous in their effects.

While instances of the kind noted are generally to be found in the cultivated section between the Oquirrh mountains and the Jordan, the peculiar condition is to be witnessed in its strongest aspect in Granger precinct, eight to ten miles southwest of the city. A few years ago that whole stretch of country was entirely devoid of water for many feet below the surface of the ground and so dry that even dry farming was a failure. With the bringing out of the canals, however, the soil could be irrigated, and when thus treated was capable of raising large crops. This caused many tracts of what was soon regarded as choice land to be brought under cultivation, and a great part of the district became as a fruitful field. The good appearance of the country there was taken advantage of during the boom, and real estate men sold for exorbitant prices large quantities of comparatively worthless land located northward down the slope.

In time land farther up the slope of the sandridge than the earliest settled part of Granger was taken up and reclaimed, and in a little while trouble began. Suddenly a farmer would find his season's crop unusually heavy because of the bountiful supply of moisture in the ground, but experience soon taught that this was anything but a welcome condition, for the next season the land would become a worthless, dangerous swamp. The reason for this is that in the particular section referred to there is, a few feet below the surface, a strata of "hard pan," through which the water will not percolate. As irrigation goes on in the more elevated sections the water, holding alkaline compounds in solution, gathers beneath the lower fields and finally converts them into swamps.

In many instances drainage was resorted to, with the effect of partially preventing the land being ruined for farming purposes. A common plan which is followed is described by a Granger land owner. It is to drive short pipes vertically into the ground, the water that rises in these being carried off through ditches. In some places where the land became swampy, drainage was resorted to, with the result that the water, which is strongly impregnated with mineral, is partly drawn off, and meadowland formed, on which there comes a liberal growth of bunch grass.

No general system of drainage has been adopted, but is being urged by some interested parties. There is a natural basin in the White saleratus lakes for the surplus water, and it is urged that the expense of a good drainage system would be amply repaid by the reclamation of the land which is now comparatively valueless and by preventing other farms from being ruined by the excess of brackish water.

YOUNG LADIES' TRAINING CLASS.

A News representative was informed by Professor Done that a young ladies' class in normal training will be organized in connection with the college, on Monday, Feb. 5th. The presidents of the Young Ladies' Improvement association of the several wards in the Salt Lake Stake will appoint two students from their respective wards; the class will be composed of such students, and will be under the direction of Prof. Done. Information is also given that a few more pupils can be accommodated in the kindergarten department of the college. Miss Aggie Sharp is teacher.

RETURNED ELDERS.

Elders W. T. Stewart and D. B. Stewart, of Kanab, Kane county, called at the News office January 26, having returned from a mission to foreign lands. They left this city on July 17, 1891, and returned on Jan. 24, 1894. Elder W. T. Stewart has presided over the Austral-Asian mission and Elder D. B. Stewart has labored in Australia. They both report the work in that part of the world fairly prosperous. There are thirty-five missionaries in the field. They are all desirous of doing their best for the furtherance of the Gospel and meet with but little opposition at present. Many Europeans are beginning to inquire into the doctrines held by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

A postal card from an Elder who left with a party of missionaries for the Southern states the other evening gives a brief account of an incident on the journey the night after leaving here. All of the party were in a chair car, and thought of remaining there for the night. They were moved, however, by a sudden impulse to go into the Pullman car, and did so. Next morning they learned that the car they left had been derailed and badly damaged, some of the passengers in it being severely hurt.

WESTERN NEWS ITEMS.

At Elbert, Colo., about 100 farmers have organized a co-operative creamery company.

Boulder, Colo., has sold its water-works bonds to Boulder parties and will now pay for its water supply with cash.

Eureka county, Nevada, mines have produced gold, silver and lead valued at a grand total of $125,000,000 since 1870.

It is a cold, dreary day when El Paso emits to telegraph a revolution in Mexico, sarcastically remarks the Denver News.

At Longmont, Colo., cannery, a new pea sheller has been invented, which discounts all the patents heretofore applied for in that line.

At Grand Junction, Colo., strong pressure is being brought to bear to reduce the price of irrigated land so as to induce investment.

Santa Cruz, Cal., sports are seeking to form a baseball league including the cities of Santa Cruz, Monterey, Salinas and Watsonville.

A Chinese leper who had been confined in a dungeon without windows or ventilation for two years has been discovered at Denver.

Del Norte, Colo., is considering the advisability of purchasing an electric light plant, which will soon be offered for sale there.

There is a proposition at Santa Monica, Cal., to bond the town for the purpose of building a wharf solely for the enjoyment of visitors and residents.

Two newspaper men named Schiffer are said to be realizing $200 a day out of a Silverton, Colo., mine. They have no desire for further journalistic glory.

Julesburg, Colo., has become quite a shipping point for hogs and cattle. The "rain betters" are marketing hogs and cattle on an average of $4,000 a month.

The deputy constable of Los Angeles, Cal., captured six Chinamen on Tuesday night who were engaged in selling lottery tickets. They put up $50 each for their appearance in court.

Farmers in the San Juan, the Mancos and Montezuma valleys, Colo., are preparing to put in large crops this year to feed the expected rush of miners down that way.

Near Otto, in northwestern Wyoming, a vein of coal has been discovered four feet thick and forty feet wide. A road is being constructed so that the coal can be mined for market.

A colony from Eaton, Colo., has purchased potato land north of Cheyenne, Wyo., of the Wyoming Development company and will irrigate and plant extensively during the ensuing season.

Mancos and Montezuma valleys, Colo., are over-supplied with fine draft horses awaiting market. Horse men throughout Colorado are invited to go there for good bargains in heavy work horses.

La Veta, Colo., will be brought ten miles nearer to the San Luis Valley by the building of the proposed Indian creek wagon road over the range into the San Luis valley. It is a big thing for La Veta.

Twenty-two miles west of Canon City, Colo., in South gulch, valuable zinc, copper and lead discoveries have been made at a depth of ninety-six feet. The discovery is said to be a paying prospect.

Congressman Bell, of Colorado, owns a six-year-old orchard of 105 acres, containing apples, pears, apricots, peaches and plums. It is in the Uncompahgre valley, three miles from Montrose.

At Reno, Nev., last week a Plute, under sentence of twenty years for murder, was pardoned. He went almost crazy with joy, uttering war whoops and wanted to kiss everybody he met.

A fire at Moscow, Idaho, has consumed $20,000 worth of property. A frozen fire plug caused a delay in getting water so that the damage was much greater than it otherwise would have been.

J. M. Quigley, a switchman out of employment, who attempted to wreck the Santa Fe "flyer" near the Union depot at Denver some three months ago, has been sentenced to three years in the penitentiary.

A house famine prevails at Florence, Colo. The papers there announce that twenty cottages would find ready sale or good tenants there now. People have to live in tents or go to Canon City for shelter.

Trinidad, Colo., gamblers have philosophically accepted the municipal decree closing the gambling houses. They say "there is no business these hard times" and are willing to suspend a profitless trade.

At Florence, Colo., a town lot boom has been started. A 300-acre ranch has been platted by the Florence Oil and Refining company and another ranch is to be cut into five and ten-acre vegetable ranches.

On Friday at Florence, Colo., was consummated a real estate deal of $4,000, being the sale of S. J. Tenner's 390-acre ranch to the Florence Oil and Refining company. Some large deals in city real estate are being made.

Cattle owners in San Miguel, Santa Fe and Texas counties, N. M., are confederating for the purpose of suppressing the wholesale slaughter of cattle on the range by cattle thieves from the vicinity of Las Vegas.

Trinidad, Colo., has made a proud record for charitable work this winter. Families numbering 315 persons have been carried along for a month past by the charitable organizations, and some furnished transportation eastward.

Snowslides have commenced. Near Wallace, Idaho, in Boulder gulch an avalanche last week buried alive Doc McGrevey and John Bollon, two miners. McGrevey was crushed down upon a hot stove and burned to death.

Northwestern Colorado contains several hundred square miles of petrified fish. These beds of shale are said to be about 150 feet thick and extend along Green river for a distance of about 200 miles.

The great tunnel through the Santa Lucia mountains, which the Southern Pacific company has been boring for more than a year past, was pierced on Monday morning, and is one of the largest and most important tunnels in the world.

In the Sierra Ancha, Arizona, district the cattle men rejoice over a fine prospect for cattle. For two years past cows have been too poor to breed. This spring the stock is said to be in fine condition, and a large lot of calves are confidently expected.

Astec, N. M., is bitterly complaining of the Navajo Indian nuisance. The Indians obtain passes to leave their reservation and roam at will among the white settlers, frightening or insulting women when found alone in their homes.

A large reservoir located on the Highlands, north of Pasadena, Cal., burst on Sunday evening, flooding a considerable section of country lying below it, and doing much damage to young fruit orchards. The reservoir was a new one, having only been built last summer.

At Longmont, Colo., R. C. Benton, clerk and recorder of Holt county, Mo., has arrived with a boy said to be the son of a farmer near Longmont. Holt county has a bill against the farmer for fourteen years board and lodging for the boy and wants a settlement.

Despite the fact that last winter was the most disastrous the stockmen experienced in many years, the shipments of cattle from Montana netted the state not less than $8,000,000 during the shipping season. The cattle business saved the country in 1893, says a dispatch from Helena.

Shortly before midnight on Saturday a destructive landslide occurred in the northern portion of Sausalito, Cal., at a point near the railroad shops, known as Woodward's valley. Two dwelling houses at the foot of this canyon were badly wrecked and the occupants barely escaped with their lives.

Montrose, Colo., only shipped twenty-eight tons of beets to the Lehi, Utah, sugar factory last year, while Mesa county shipped over sixty tons. Now, Montrose county has got on its sugar beet war paint and proposes to raise sugar beets by wholesale.—Denver News.

Electricity will be used to operate the Rio Grande Southern railway during the present year. The Ridgway Herald states that the San Miguel Consolidated plant will furnish 1,000-horse power at Ames and that the road will soon be operated by electricity.

The Montpelier (Idaho) Post says that for the first time in twelve years there is ready cash in the treasury of Bear Lake county to pay all county warrants, and this, too, in the face of the fact that three terms of the district court have been held during the year, one term lasting two weeks.

During a terrific blizzard and while the mercury registered 20 degrees below zero on Wednesday afternoon, the residence of A. C. Wallace, six miles north of Beatrice, Neb., was destroyed by fire, with its contents. Loss, $3,000; insured for $1,500. Cause, a defective flue.

Martin Hobbs had a narrow escape at Grand Junction, Colo., on Tuesday. A horse became entangled in a loose wire and while Mr. Hobbs was endeavoring to extricate him, the animal started to run. The end of the wire caught Hobbs across the neck, cutting a gash in his throat, which required eight stitches to close.

An inventory and appraisal has been filed at Oakland, Cal., showing that the estate of the late William Hayward, deceased, is valued at $15,588. A provision in the will of the young man announces that he was engaged to marry a young lady in the East, and he bequeathed her one-third of his estate.

The Superior court at Sacramento has rendered a decision sustaining the provisions of the new charter that the police court shall be conducted by a city justice instead of a police judge. The police judge contended that municipalities had no right to create or abolish courts. He sentenced a man to thirty days' imprisonment for vagrancy to make a test case. The matter was brought up on habeas corpus and a decision now given against him.

John McGarvey, formerly foreman at the Ore mine at Breckenridge, Col., met with a serious accident on Monday, in which he was badly cut and bruised and had one eye entirely destroyed. He was working a mine and while cleaning up the shaft house, he was shoveling debris into the stove, among which was either giant powder or caps, thereupon blowing the stove and shaft house to atoms. Fatal results are looked for.

Bartholomew Garibaldi, an Italian market gardener, employed at Bay View, near South San Francisco, met with a painful accident a few days ago while hunting along the bay shore, his gun exploding as he was firing at some birds in the bay. The bursting of the gun shattered his left hand. Two of his fingers were amputated, in an effort to save the hand. The injured member failed to heal as desired and fears are entertained that the entire hand will have to be cut off below the wrist.

The first carload of green apples which ever left the Santa Clara valley (Cal.) for Europe was shipped on Wednesday from San Jose by E. H. Rhodes. The shipment contained 800 fifty-pound boxes of Newton pippins, and was sent to Liverpool as an experiment to test the European market for California apples. Arrangements have been made to rush the car through to New York in nine days via the Santa Fe route, to make connections with the steamers leaving New York February 2nd for Liverpool.

News has been received at Idaho of the death of W. H. Brunt at the hospital at Salt Lake, where he had gone for treatment, says the Idaho Falls Register. About six years ago he was injured by being thrown from a horse, and before recovering typhoid fever set in, leaving him with an abscess in his side, from which the discharge was carried off through a silver tube. He finally concluded to go to the hospital where two ribs were taken out and afterwards six more. Reports came that he was doing nicely, but a change occurred and he died very suddenly.

There is a gang of eastern desperadoes in this city, says the Los Angeles Express, whose plan of action and lines of operation are somewhat different from those usually employed by the average crook and highwayman. This gang confines itself solely to banks and large offices where a great deal of money is handled. One of them goes into the bank and engages in conversation with the cashier, while another of the gang snatches whatever money happens to be near at hand and runs off with it. So skilled are these men that the bank officials little suspect what they are after or who they are.

Stephen A. O'Neill of Beatrice, Neb., mysteriously disappeared from the hotel where he was boarding at that place about two weeks ago and has not been seen or heard from since. He is an inventor of a variable uncompleted patent, and as he is generally believed to have considerable money, his friends have become greatly alarmed for his continued absence. On an examination of his room which had been left unlocked, it was found to have been broken into, apparently for the purpose of examining his model. Foul play is suspected. O'Neill is about 45 years old.

Mrs. Anna Peterson, a childless widow sixty years of age, arrived in Pueblo at 1 o'clock on Sunday morning and was given lodgings for the night in the city jail. The woman was a Cherokee boomer and, on being starved out, started to walk to Denver. She tramped along the Santa Fe railroad track the entire distance to Pueblo, with the exception of 118 miles, when a railroad conductor took pity on her, twenty-eight days being occupied on the trip. At 7 o'clock on Sunday morning she resumed her tramp along the Santa Fe track to Denver without a cent in her possession, the authorities not being notified of her destitute condition.

Charles Greenwich Howard, a pioneer lawyer, and his wife were on Sunday found suffocated in their bed at their home in Oakland, Cal. Both had been dead several hours when found. Defective gas fixtures filled the room with gas while they slept. He was about seventy years old and a familiar figure among the old timers of the city. His wife was fifty-four, and had been in poor health for some time. Howard came West in the early fifties and practiced law for a short time in Nevada, where he became a judge. He next removed to San Francisco, where he acquired quite a lucrative practice. Howard and his wife, it is said, were both addicted to the inordinate use of liquor and laudanum.

In Johnson county, Wyo., there is what is called the burning mountain. It is an immense coal bank that has been on fire ever since the first white man visited the country. There are many traditions among the Indians as to the origin of the fire, but all point to its great antiquity, and it is possible that this bank has been burning for 200 or 300 years. The country around presents a singularly barren appearance, which is not in the least improved by the looks of the mountain itself. In places here and there the coal crops out and a high wind fans the fire to a furious blaze. It is dangerous to go about the place, for not only are there frequent cavings of the surface, but the gases which arise from the burning coal are overpowering.

Philip Boogar, the aged capitalist who has gained so much notoriety of late, is again before the public, says the San Francisco Chronicle. He is now on trial in an Oakland court on a charge of attempting to poison his wife. There seems to have been a good deal of poison somewhere in the Boogar family. Not very long ago the defendant was poisoned and nearly died. When his wife refused to leave his room she was ejected by the lawyers and thrown down stairs. As a result of the fall she sustained two broken ribs and has been confined to the house for a couple of months. Last Wednesday, in court, was the first time that she appeared in public since the accident. The case has attracted a great deal of attention owing to the fact that the husband and wife have been in the courts for months.

The party sent out from Kendrick, Idaho, to rescue Colgate, cook of the Carlin party, who was left in the mountains, has been forced to return owing to the deep snow and ice in the Clearwater country. The party reached the mouth of Black canyon, where the snow was five feet deep and the river choked with floating ice. After camping three days in the snow waiting for better weather they had to return, as the snow kept falling daily and the ice gorges grew larger. The Post Falls party reached Hamilton's cabin, eighteen miles below the canyon, on the 12th, where they met the Kendrick party coming back. Martin of Rathdrum, leader of the Post Falls party, will probably winter on the Clearwater and go up as early in the spring as possible. The rest of the party will return home.

Mrs. Frank R. Smith, wife of a Rock Island depot official, committed suicide on Sunday afternoon at Beatrice, Neb., by firing a shot from a revolver which pierced her heart, the bullet lodging in her spine. She was twenty-four years old, had been married eighteen months and was the mother of a four-month-old child. Just before committing the act she dispatched a boy with a message requesting her husband to come home at once from the depot. He responded and was the first to discover the lifeless form of his wife lying on the kitchen floor in a pool of blood. The weapon used was one belonging to her husband. No motive is assigned, nor could the coroner's jury disclose one. On the back of an envelope found on a shelf in the room where the act was done were these words: "Do not grieve for me, dear husband. Take good care of our darling. I am not worthy of you. Tell papa and ma I could not live any longer." The deceased, while living happily with her husband, was subject to fits of melancholy. She was a handsome woman.

At Laramie, Wyo., the rolling mill has work on hand sufficient to keep the men employed four months.

A woman's auxiliary to the Knights of Pythias is to be established at Laramie, Wyo., at an early day.

THE SCANDINAVIAN FATHERLAND.

Prepared from Special Cablegrams.

SWEDEN.

Strong fortification will be built at Vaberget, near the city of Varberg.

Lieutenant C. H. Schultin, one of the ablest and oldest gentlemen in the Swedish army, died at the age of 87 years.

Queen Sophia has donated 10,000 kronor, which she received as a Christmas gift from the king, to the Sophia Asylum of Stockholm.

The government has asked the Riksdag to grant an appropriation of 11,000-kronor for the building of three new iron-clads of the first class.

The number of Laplanders in Sweden has decreased during the last decade, and it seems that the peculiar people is gradually dying out.

Mrs. Karin Jansdotter, of Lasserud, near Carlstad, will soon celebrate her 103rd birthday. Her eyesight is not very good, but otherwise her mental faculties are all right.

Most of the Swedish manufacturers, who were represented at the Chicago Fair, have declared themselves well satisfied with the result of the sale of exhibits.

Johannes Elmlad, the Swedish singer, has met with great success wherever he has appeared in Germany and Austria. Mr. Elmlad is at present connected with the Royal Theater at Prague.

The inventor of the revolver was J. Offrell, a Swedish clergyman of Elfkärlaby. Probably very few people know this. The first revolver was manufactured by Rev. Offrell in 1839.

Fritz Kramer, the famous hotel owner in Malmö, is dead. All American tourists, who have visited Sweden and Malmö, have probably stopped at the Kramer Hotel, which has the name of being the best of its kind in Scandinavia, if not in Europe.

Mr. Gustaf Waman, a citizen of Warren, Pa. for more than sixteen years, arrived at Wimmerby, his native city, a few days before Christmas. Mr. Waman, who was a very wealthy Swedish-American, was suffering from consumption, and died Jan. 2nd.

The Swedish-Americans are a very generous people and usually remit large sums annually to their poor relatives in the old country. Last year, however, the amount of money sent home was several hundred thousand kronor less than in 1892, for which the hard times in America undoubtedly were responsible. The emigration from Sweden to the United States was much smaller in 1893 than in 1892.

The home consumption of wheat is annually 38 kilograms per inhabitant (12½ bushels), or at the present state of population (4,900,000) 6½ million bushels in round numbers. To this must be added a half a million bushels for sowing, making in all above 7 million bushels. The home supply consequently meets but little more than half of the demand. Germany, Denmark and Russia mostly supplying the rest, though indirectly much wheat comes from America.

A great many mercantile undertakings in Stockholm as well as in the provinces are carried on by women. From olden times women have had the right to sell haberdashery, imported from abroad, and this right was further confirmed in 1749. Since freedom of trade was introduced in 1845, they have also taken up other branches of trade. At present they principally do business in millinery, outfittings, woodwork, perfumery, tobacco and victuals. Some of these businesses are large, and the principal ones in their neighborhood. A married woman may, however, not carry on trade without the consent of her husband.

Probably no American, who has visited Stockholm within the last decade, has neglected seeing the great Northern Museum, formerly entitled "The Scandinavian Ethnographical Collection." The whole of this magnificent collection has been brought together solely, it may be said, through the efforts of one man, Dr. A. Hazelius, who in 1873 opened his museum to the public. It has been his aim to present a picture, complete as far as possible, of Scandinavian life and culture during past centuries. Dr. Hazelius labored, especially at the commencement, not so much to illustrate the life of the higher and wealthier classes, but endeavored principally to show the conditions under which the peasantry existed, and the collection fully carries out his design. By means of arranging in the museum interiors of peasant-cottages in which stood war figures dressed in national costumes, he succeeded in awakening a great general interest in the collection, and probably few enterprises in Sweden have received such public support.

NORWAY.

Infant schools were established in Norway in 1858.

Alexander Kjelland, the author, is writing a new novel.

Prof. F. W. K. Bugge has been appointed bishop of the Christiania diocese.

The annual number of divorces granted in each 100,000 inhabitants was during the decade 1882-1892 5.02.

Farmer Elling Ellingsen, his wife and two children were killed by a snow-slide at the Gjeldvold farm in Borge.

According to the latest information Dr. Nansen, the explorer, left Chabarowa, on the Norwegian coast, last August.

Ludvig Munthe, the Norwegian painter, has been appointed a professor at the Art Academy of Düsseldorf, Germany.

The inland trade of Norway has increased during the last years, and is now favored by good means of communication.

The consul and wholesale merchant, Christian Johnson, of Christiansund, is dead. Johnson was probably the largest exporter of stock-fish in Norway.

The city council of Christiania has been asked to grant an appropriation of two million kroner for a direct railroad between Christiania and Bergen.

The first step towards raising the level of female education was the procuring of competent female teachers. For the intellectual development of such, several training colleges are now to be founded in some of the larger cities.

The teaching of needle-work in Norway has undergone a favorable change, even if it has not reached the high degree of development as in Sweden. The method of needle work, which is used in the schools has been partly taken from Germany and partly from Sweden.

DENMARK.

The Danish population in the United States is estimated at about 300,000.

The Middelgrundsfort will be strongly fortified during the winter.

Helsingfors, the capital of Finland, has now a population of 61,000 people.

Copenhagen can this year celebrate its 450th anniversary as the capital of Denmark.

Ex-minister E. G. Lotze, the most prominent and wealthy citizen of Odense, is dead.

Prince Komatsu, of Japan, has now left Stockholm and Copenhagen, where he has been visiting, for Berlin.

The Danish export to Sweden represents a value of about $12,000,000 a year, while the import amounts to $10,000,000.

Mrs. A. M. Christiansen, of Frederiksborg, who died a few weeks ago, donated 11,000 kroner to charitable institutions in her native city.

The wholesale merchant La Cour, who died a few weeks ago, donated 80,000 kroner to charitable institutions in Odense and Svendborg.

"Lycko-Pers Resa," the revolutionary play by Aug. Strindberg, the famous Swedish author, was given at the Casino Theater in Copenhagen, and scored a success, which set the whole city talking.

It has caused some surprise that a considerable number of ladies of the most select aristocracy of Edinburgh order their finest toilet articles from a Copenhagen milliner, Th. Wessel & Wett. A few days before Christmas seventeen superb robes were sent in one consignment.

It is now settled that the Hamburg American Packet Company will run a new line between Copenhagen and New Orleans. The first steamer will leave New Orleans March 30, and arrive at Copenhagen about April 18, and thence forth one steamer will be run each way once a month.

Dr. Ostrup, the Danish scientist, has just completed a remarkable journey, which conclusively proves that "blood will tell" in horses as well as in men. He is an archæologist and linguist, and in order to study carefully the eastern dialects in their transition from one country to another, he traveled from Damascus to Copenhagen, a distance of 5,000 miles, on horseback, taking eighteen months to make the journey. He rode one horse clear through, and the animal is in perfect condition. It is of pure Arabian breed, chosen by himself, and personally reared and cared for throughout the trip. Although 5,000 miles in eighteen months would be an average of only ten miles a day, yet the constant strain would have worn out a horse of poor blood. Dr. Ostrup passed through Syria, Asia Minor, Turkey, Bulgaria, Servia, Hungary and Germany. In spite of his special credentials he had some hair breath escapes in Asia Minor and Syria.

In the resting place of the old kings of Denmark, the Cathedral of Roskilde, a recent visitor notes that there is a column against which a number of monarchs have been measured and upon which their different heights are recorded. One of them is Peter the Great, and we learn by this means that the shipwright car measured no less than eighty Danish inches, equivalent to something like six feet ten inches in our measurement. Only one other of the sovereigns was taller, and that was Christian I., of Denmark, who according to this authority, was just a trifle over seven feet English. The czar, Alexander III., is about six feet one inch and is about a couple of inches taller than Christian IX. of Denmark, and about four inches taller than King George of Greece, neither of whom, nevertheless, is what would be called a short man. It is worth noting that in the same ancient cathedral, where this column is to be seen, Saxo Grammaticus, the Danish historian, from whom Shakespeare borrowed practically the entire plot of "Hamlet," lies buried.

OUR STOCKHOLM LETTER.

STOCKHOLM, Jan. 4, 1894.—As soon as an anarchist has thrown a bomb, by which, perhaps, several persons have been killed, there is talk of dynamite, but very seldom, at such occasion, people think of the man, who invented these terrible means for the purpose of favoring the modern technicals and not for the aim of furnishing the enemies of society with a dreadful weapon.

The inventor of the dynamite is Alfred Nobel, a Swedish engineer. A few facts about the life of this remarkable man may be read with interest. Nobel was born in Stockholm, Sweden, and emigrated when a young man to Russia, where he soon built up a large fortune by coming into possession of large petroleum wells.

The inventor is living a very quiet and happy life. He spends the winter at his villa in San Remo where he works in his studio, as he pleases, having the prospect, however, of being blown to atoms at any moment. He stays a part of the summer in Switzerland, or makes a voyage aboard his aluminium steam yacht. Once in a while he goes to Paris, where he likes to live in his little palace, near the Bois du Boulogne, for a few days only, as he gets soon tired of the noise of the big French capital. The great inventor has neither wife nor children. His only relative is a nephew, who is the owner of immense petroleum wells near the Caspian Sea. Besides chemistry there is one thing, which keeps the inventor of the dynamite busy, and that is—peace, Nobel being a very prominent member of the many anti-war societies of Europe. His ideal aim is to make war as terrible, that it will become an impossibility.

Prof. Lieblein has written a series of articles in the Christiania Aftenposten, in which remarkable editorials he advises his countrymen to take warning of the fate of Poland. He obtained the initiative to write on this subject through an article in a French paper, which concluded its description of the political struggle on the Scandinavian peninsula with the following question: "Can it be, that the Norwegians have not read the history of Poland?"

Prof. Lieblein found that the question was very proper, as the unfortunate fate of Poland gives both a sad and warning example of how hatred, discord and persecution amongst two political parties can carry an even mighty realm to ruin and destruction.

"Norway," says the professor, "is an independent kingdom as also Poland was once, and the Norwegians ought not to be as discordant as the Poles were because, in that case, the same fate will happen to them as happened to the Poles. We may be slain by our neighbors, who are the Swedes. It is likely that our radical demagogues will tell us so, as they seem to regard, once for all, the Swede as an adversary, if not an enemy, instead of a brother, which he really is both on account of tie of blood and history.

"It is proper to acknowledge that the old party of the left is worth all praise because it always insisted upon, that Norway ought to be a kingdom fully independent of Sweden. We have, in principal, obtained everything we can ask for in the Union, and all that we need in order to develop ourselves in every way possible and at the same time maintain our position as an independent nation. We have gained a victory in principal. What remains to be done, can surely be arranged through friendly transactions between Norway and Sweden. With a good will on each side a satisfactory solution of the difficulties ought to be found, if not today or to-morrow, at least some time in the near future.

"But, unfortunately, the extreme radical elements do not seem to be willing to await that time; they intend either to carry through their wish immediately by means of force and violence, or dissolve the Union. As they ought to know, that they will never succeed by using force, everybody must arrive at the conclusion that they aim at the annihilation of the Union. If our usurped and implacable leaders have resolved to undertake this, it cannot be denied that the comparison with Poland is very striking. For albeit Norway is by itself an independent realm, she forms a unity with Sweden as compared to other states. The essential benefit and importance of the Union are, that the two kingdoms shall stand together in war against foreign countries, that they shall defend the Scandinavian peninsula against any hostile powers and preserve it whole and independent.

"Those, who try to rouse strife and dissension amongst the inhabitant of the two countries only in order to promote their own interest or the interest of their party, those demagogues act as the Poles, and history shall pronounce the same sentence of condemnation and curse in regard to them, as once befell the Poles, if the punishment for their inflexible stubbornness and unbridled egotism—not spirit of liberty and patriotism, as they call it themselves—should come as heavy over the United kingdoms as formerly over Poland.

"If the Union should be dissolved, our strength against foreign powers would amount to nothing. But the annihilation of the Union signifies more. It means that Sweden and Norway, after the old hatred between the two nationalities had again been aroused, would turn against and, perhaps, tear each other to pieces. If this does not happen, the parties within Norway will try to destroy each other."

Prof. Lieblein concludes his last article with the following many words in favor of the maintenance of the Union:

"United, shall Sweden and Norway always occupy a prominent position in Europe. Protected as they are by their natural boundaries, they shall probably, hereafter as hitherto, escape hostile attacks. They shall be able to use, in peace and rest, their natural resources. Our national life shall develop itself independently, and, if fortune does favor us, bloom and bear fruits, which will bring happiness and blessings to ourselves and be of profit to Europe. In other words: we will be able to fulfill our national duty, to accomplish our national share in the mutual labor of all humanity. Only in that way we will succeed as a people in living a life, which will not be in vain."

* * *

The Public Libraries of Sweden are among the best in Europe. First in rank, both as regards appointments, grants, and number of volumes, stands the Royal Library in Stockholm, which since 1878 is housed in a new building erected at a cost of close upon $300,000. The volumes number 230,000 besides 7,800 manuscripts, many thousand portfolios containing maps, engraving, smaller prints, etc. The accession of 1892 was 1,194 foreign works, while in the same year 13,162 issued from the Swedish press. The libraries of the universities of Upsala (about 230,000 volumes) and Lund (about 140,000) have also of late years been granted more extensive premises, and have larger reading-rooms and increased grants for purchases. The Academy of Sciences owns about 60,000 volumes; the other libraries being all of less extent. Among older and more valuable libraries though at present without noticeable increase, or accessibility, the school libraries in Strengnas, Vesteras, Skara, Linköping and Vexjö (the old episcopal town) ought to be mentioned. At other colleges there are less important collections of books. The Popular and Parish Libraries are developing rapidly, both in the capital and in a great number of parishes in the country. Private libraries with family archives, often of a very respectable age, are to be found in several provinces, even if, during the past decades, not a few of them have been dispersed, while hardly a single private library of any importance has been founded during the same period.

* * *

The navy of Norway is, as known, very large, but the quality does not at all correspond with the quantity. According to the English technical magazine Engineering, Norway's annual loss of ship is proportionally five times as large as that of Great Britain, and on that account Norway occupies the very lowest position among all civilized countries in regard to the safety of its sailors. A discussion on this subject was held at a meeting of ship owners some time ago, Congressman Gunnar Knudsen was one of the speakers of the convention. He declared, that the high number of Norway in the statistics of shipwrecking is due to the fact, that her merchant fleet consists of too many poor sailing vessels, which, having been bought at a cheap price from foreign countries, were old and unfit for service already 15 or 20 years ago.

OBITUARY NOTES

EMMA HERRON.

Emma, the little granddaughter of H. W. and Elizabeth Naisbitt, and daughter of Lillias Naisbitt and James Herron, died about midday yesterday, Jan. 25, of scarlet fever, after a very brief illness. The deceased was near four years old, and a bright child, loved, nay almost idolized, by the family, who now mourn, yet not as those without hope. The funeral services were held at the grave.

WM. CAPENER.

Father William Capener, of Centerville, Davis county, passed from this life yesterday, at the age of 88 years. The deceased was one of the early settlers of Utah, and more than a third of a century ago was a member of a firm of furniture dealers in this city, Joseph E. Taylor, of the Presidency of the Salt Lake Stake, being the other partner.

Father Capener has three daughters living in Utah, Mrs. Hardy of St. George, Mrs. Giles of Heber City, and Mrs. Taylor of Salt Lake. Some of his children also reside at Cleveland, Ohio, where he formerly kept a large hotel. Dr. Capener, of Cleveland, Ohio, is his youngest son, and Father Capener's grandson is the editor of the Baraboo (Wisconsin) paper.

ELLA DECKER-RUSH.

Many persons will receive with sorrow the information that Mrs. Ella Decker Rush, wife of Edward H. Rush, the well known plumber, passed from mortality yesterday (Sunday) morning at 1 o'clock. The sad event occurred at the family residence at No. 257 west South Temple street. The lady's demise was due to a complicated order of ailments superinduced by curvature of the spine. She was an invalid almost constantly for ten years and at times suffered the most intense pain. Throughout her long and severe illness, however, she exhibited an amount of fortitude and patience that was wonderful. Her anxiety and care for the poor and considerate regard for persons unfortunately situated endeared her to the hearts of many. Acts of kindness and charity characterized her life to the very last. She was the mother of but one child, who died four years ago, aged six years. The husband has the sympathy of a wide circle in the sad bereavement that has cast so dark a gloom over his home. The deceased was the daughter of Charles and Louisa Decker, was born in Salt Lake City, and was but thirty-three years of age.

JAMES FINN.

James Finn, son of John Finn and Caroline Nind, born April 12, 1842, at St. John's Parish, Worcestershire, England, died at Rudy, Fremont county, Idaho, Jan. 19, 1894. He was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints Nov. 3, 1852, emigrated to Utah in 1853, and settled in Draper, Utah. His labors in the Church having been chiefly with the Sunday school and Mutual Improvement Association, where he has been a zealous worker. He was superintendent of the Rudy ward Sunday school of the Baurock Stake at his demise. He was conscious till the last and willing to go when the call to depart this life came to him. He leaves a wife and family to mourn his loss, and also a host of friends, especially the young. For the funeral services the remains were taken to the meeting house, where a numerous host had gathered. Consoling remarks were made by the Bishop and counselors, assistant superintendents of the Sunday school and others. The line of procession to the cemetery was in accordance with the order in the Sunday school; next to the family were the classes—theological, Book of Mormon, Testament, Juvenile, then three classes in "Chart." [Com.]

JOSEPH HADFIELD.

At Portage, Box Elder county, Jan. 16, 1894, of Bright's disease and lagrippe, Joseph Hadfield Sr., aged 67 years, 10 months and 13 days. Deceased was born in Cheshire, England, joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in 1851, emigrated to Utah in 1854, locating in Farmington, where he resided until March, 1892. He then moved to Portage. He was a brick maker and silk weaver in England, and the two occupations were of valuable service to the early settlers of our town, in weaving home made cloth, blankets and carpets; and in moulding adobes, or sun dried brick, with which to replace the primitive log cabin.

The silk fringe in the St. George Temple was woven by him in the spring of 1877. About that time Brother Hadfield also wove ten silk dress patterns, one or more of which was on view in the Utah exhibit in the Woman's building at the World's Fair. All of the above were made of Utah silk. Deceased was "one of nature's noblemen" in all that the term implies—honest, industrious and temperate in all his habits, and an affectionate husband and father. He leaves a widow, four children and twenty-three grandchildren to mourn their loss.

The funeral services were held in our meeting house last Sunday afternoon. The room was crowded, and fourteen vehicles followed the remains to their last earthly resting-place. C. T., Farmington.

HARRIET A. LEE.

At Woodruff, Utah, Sunday, January 21, 1894, after a lingering illness of six months, Harriet Amelia, wife of Bishop Wm. H. Lee.

Deceased was born November 25, 1831, in Ben-on, Rutland county, Vermont. She was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints March, 1840; was married to William H. Lee March 11, 1849, in Kanessville, Pottawatomie county, Iowa. She was the mother of thirteen children, six of whom, with three grandchildren, survive her. She passed through all the early scenes of the Church; received her endowments in the Kirtland Temple when fifteen years old; emigrated to Utah with her husband in 1850; passed through the Move and other early scenes in Utah; moved from Bountiful ward, Davis county, to Woodruff, Rich county, in July, 1870, was appointed president of the Relief Society, Sept. 20, 1874, which position she occupied until her death. She was a teacher in the Sunday school and assisted in all the organizations of the ward, and was ever faithful to her duties and callings. As a nurse to the sick and in devotion to the needy, she had few equals and was a kind and loving mother to her family.

Her remains were taken to her old home in Bountiful for interment.

DANIEL M. BURBANK.

Daniel M. Burbank died at his home in Brigham City, January 13, 1894, from concussion of the brain, aged 79 years 1 month and 9 days.

Brother Burbank was born in the state of New York, December 3, 1814. When five years old his parents moved west and settled in the state of Illinois, but in the year 1830 he went to Cincinnati to learn the carpenter's trade. On December 31, 1835, he married Lydia Vanblarican, at this time he was a steamboat pilot, receiving as high as $100 per day for his service on special occasions. His wife and only child died in September, 1838. On the 3rd of August, 1839, he married a widow by the name of Abigail King, her maiden name being Blodgett. He was baptized into the Church by Wm. Smith at Nauvoo, April 11, 1841. He passed through all of the mobbings and burnings of Nauvoo, worked on the Temple by day and guarded the Prophet by night, was pilot of the Maria of Iowa at the time the Chicago Bell tried to capture her, thinking the Prophet was aboard. On the 8th of April, 1842, he was ordained an Elder by Brigham Young, on October 3, 1844, was ordained a member of the Tenth quorum of Seventies by Brigham Young, and received his endowments January 16, 1846. He left the city in the spring, stopped a short time at Farmington to obtain food for his family. In the fall he again started west, and wintered at a place called Old Agency. In the spring of 1847 he again started west, arriving at Harris's Grove, or Harrisville, near Kanessville, where he acted as Bishop for some time. In the winter and spring of 1852 he was busy in making and repairing wagons for the poor Saints to cross the plains with, and himself started in Captain Walker's company, he being captain of ten. His wife died July 20, leaving four children under four years old. Afterwards, at the South Pass, he married Sarah Southworth, by whom he had thirteen children.

For ten years he lived in Grantsville, Tooele county. In 1863 he, with all of his family, moved to Brigham City, where he lived up to the time of his death. On April 29, 1883, he was ordained a Patriarch by President Woodruff.

He leaves a wife, six sons, seven daughters, seventy-two grandchildren and seven great grandchildren; eight children, seven grandchildren and three great grandchildren have preceded him to the spirit world.

It was estimated that there were between seven and eight hundred present at the funeral, which was held in the Stake Tabernacle January 15, Elders Lorenzo Snow, Rudger Clawson, Kelly, Jensen and Watkins being the speakers. —[Com.]

THE DEAD.

Peaceful be their Rest.

RUSH.—In this city, January 25th, 1894, at 1 a. m., of heart failure, Ella Decker Rush, wife of E. H. Rush and daughter of Charles and Louisa Decker; aged 33 years.

HAWKES.—At West Weber, January 16, 1894, Margaret Ann, beloved daughter of Nathan and Elizabeth Hawkes; aged 23 years, 4 months and one day.

Millennial Star, please copy.

CARR.—At No. 15 South Brisbane street, Sydney, New South Wales, Australia, on December 11th, 1893, Mrs. Kezia Medhurst Carr; aged 77 years; late of Seven Oaks, Kent, England. Canadian papers, please copy.

HARDY.—At Logan, Cache county, Father William Hardy, January 19th, 1894, aged 84 years and 6 months. He was born at Road, Summer-setshire, England, July 30th, 1809; baptized May 1st, 1849, at Gosport; emigrated to Utah in August, 1871.

PEARSON.—At Sandy, Salt Lake county, Jan. 33, 1894, Johanna Amanda, wife of H. M. Pearson. She was born in Stockholm, Sweden, in 1836, was a faithful Latter-day Saint, and died in the hope of a glorious resurrection. —Com. Skandinavien S jerne, please copy.

CAPENER.—At Centerville, Davis county, Utah, January 24th, 1894, of old age, William Capener; born at London, England, July 30th, 1806.

Funeral services will be held at Centerville meeting house on Saturday Jan. 27th, at 12 m. Friends are respectfully invited to attend. Wisconsin papers please copy.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

Truth and Liberty.

No. 8.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, FEBRUARY 10, 1894.

VOL. XLVIII.

PROPHETS, SEERS AND REVELATORS.

Discourse Delivered at the Cache Stake Quarterly Conference, Logan, Sunday, October 29, 1893, by PRESIDENT JOSEPH F. SMITH.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

President George Q. Cannon this morning expressed his feeling at the thought of being called a prophet, a seer, and a revelator, and being sustained as such by the vote of the people at our various conferences, and how the natural man shrank from the responsibility involved in this great calling. He expressed very clearly my own thoughts and feeling in relation to this subject; but on reflection I take some consolation to myself in the fact that I am only one among many who are called to this high calling. We must remember that while there are but few upon whom is laid the responsibility of revealing to the people, by the inspiration of the Almighty, the word of the Lord for the building up of Zion, yet, if I comprehend correctly the spirit of this work, it is that all who receive the spirit of the Gospel in their hearts are prophets, seers and revelators, in a certain sense; not to give the word of the Lord to the people for their government and direction, but to receive the same for their own guidance and knowledge of the doctrine, that it is of God.

It is fair to suppose that this large congregation, or those of them who profess to be members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, have received the testimony of Jesus Christ. If we have not we need to become converted, that we may receive the Holy Ghost, which testifies of the Father and of the Son, which is the testimony of Jesus Christ. It is said in the scriptures that "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy." If, therefore, men or women have received the testimony of Jesus, then they have received the spirit of prophecy; and if they have received the spirit of prophecy and exercise that spirit, if only in the discharge of their personal duty and for their own guidance, then they are prophets and prophetesses. The possession of the testimony of Jesus Christ and the spirit of prophecy constitutes man a prophet, a seer and a revelator. No man can be a prophet, a seer, or a revelator in the true sense, unless he has received the testimony of Jesus Christ, which is the spirit of prophecy. Hence I take some consolation to myself in knowing that I only bear my portion of this responsibility with many others. I see before me a host of men and women who should be as much prophets, seers and revelators in their spheres and callings, and for the purpose of their own guidance in the path of truth, as President Woodruff is, or President Cannon, or as was the Prophet Joseph Smith, or any other man of God that has ever stood upon the earth. Of course, there is a distinction that should be understood on this point. President Woodruff is called to be a prophet, seer and revelator to the whole Church? You and I are not called to act in this capacity; but we are called to be the sons and daughters of God and should have the testimony of Jesus in our hearts; and this constitutes prophets and seers; for when we have the Spirit of God, we can see the truth and comprehend His purposes by the inspiration of the spirit that is within us. And every man and woman in the household of faith, if faithful, is as much entitled to the possession of that spirit as is President Woodruff. One of old said, "Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put His spirit upon them." Paul, in exhorting the saints to seek after the gifts of the Gospel, said, "Follow after charity, and desire spiritual gifts, but rather that ye may prophesy." If a man has the spirit of prophesy from God, he is a prophet. Not that he is thereby called to prophesy to the whole Church; not that he is necessarily called as a lawgiver unto the Church; but he is called to be a child of God and to partake of the principles of light, intelligence, wisdom and knowledge, which come, through revelation, from God to man. It is right that every man and every woman should know of the doctrine for himself and herself; and inasmuch as we may all enjoy this spirit, and if we have this testimony in our hearts, then we are inspired of the Lord and are prophets.

Furthermore, when we enter into the sacred places that the Lord has instituted for us in this dispensation, and receive certain ordinances and blessings that God has ordained for such as are worthy, we not only receive the gift of the Holy Ghost, the testimony of Jesus Christ, which is the spirit of prophecy, in our hearts, but we become "the Lord's anointed," on whom rests great responsibility, and of whom the Lord will require faithfulness and virtue, honesty and uprightness, justice and charity, purity of heart and of life, and all the gifts and graces that pertain to the Gospel.

So that it is not such a terrible thought that one should be called a prophet, and that we should have this responsibility devolving upon us. Yet it is a most sacred thought; and while it may be regarded as a blessing common unto all who receive the Gospel, its prevalence does not diminish the individual responsibility of those who receive it. It is just as sacred as though but one or two possessed it. You sustain the Presidency of the Church and the Twelve Apostles in the conferences as prophets, seers and revelators. That they may magnify this calling properly they should indeed be most faithful before our Father; for in thus being sustained they are called, not only to be revelators, to receive truth and inspiration from the Almighty for their own guidance, but also, as general officers of the Church, for the guidance and instruction of the people of God. Hence this is a requirement above that which is placed upon the people at large, and the responsibility is increased upon individuals as they are called and appointed to certain positions in the Priesthood. But the principle is no more sacred in their keeping than it should be in yours; it is no more direct from God to them than it should be to you. It is not necessary that they should hold it more sacred in their hearts than you should hold it sacred in your hearts.

It is written, "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and His Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years." Who is it in the kingdom of God that is not called to be a priest or a priestess, in holiness, in purity of life, in devotion to God, and in all the gifts and blessings of the Gospel? Ye are all called unto salvation, unto exaltation, and unto the gift of eternal life, and to obtain heavenly dominion, power and glory. This constitutes the priestly calling unto which the Saints of God are called. Should we not, therefore, look carefully to our conduct, to see whether we are worthy to receive the blessings that have been promised upon our heads, and that it is our privilege to receive through being adopted into the family of our Father? President Woodruff has been telling us that that spirit which prompts to do good is of God, while that spirit which prompts to do evil is not of God, but of that evil one. Where we discover within ourselves a disposition to take advantage of our neighbor, to be unforgiving toward our brother or toward any man, we may know that that is not of God. It is not the spirit that those who are entitled to become priests unto God should have. On the other hand, when we have a spirit of charity in our hearts, prompting us to be merciful, forgiving and charitable, we may know that we have the spirit of the Lord, and not the spirit of the evil one; for the spirit of the evil one does not prompt to charitable deeds, nor promote feelings of love and forgiveness. It is the duty of the Latter-day Saints who should be prophets, seers and revelators, to live so that they shall know the truth when they hear it, that they shall be able to judge between good and evil, that none need say to them, "Know the Lord: for all shall know Him from the least to the greatest," all being prophets and seers, inspired of God. This is the great work that lies before us, as I understand it.

The Lord has called us together from the nations of the earth, as was shown to the Apostle John upon the Isle of Patmos. The voice of the angel crying, "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." Come out of what? Out of Babylon. We have been trying to come out of Babylon. The Lord, by the hand of our enemies, drove some of us out in the beginning, and planted our feet here, and said to us, through His servants, "Abide here and prosper. I will bless the land for your sake and make it fruitful." "Here," as the Prophet Brigham said, "we will build up a country, and also a temple." These were promises made to the Latter-day Saints. But since we have been out here we have not all magnified our privileges as prophets, seers and revelators, but have dealt deceitfully, and foolishly and have fallen into the ways and the fashions of Babylon. This is to be regretted, because it hinders the progress of the work of the Lord; it puts off the day of God's power; it prolongs the work that we are engaged in. But, says one, is it possible for the sins of the people to put off the day of God's power and the judgments of the Almighty? Why did not Zion's Camp, which went up by the commandment of the Almighty, in 1834, redeem Zion at that time? The Lord tells us why:

"Behold, I say unto you, were it not for the transgressions of my people, speaking concerning the Church and not individuals, they might have been redeemed even now; but behold they have not learned to be obedient to the things which I require at their hands, but are full of all manner of evil, and do not impart of their substance, as becometh Saints, to the poor and afflicted among them, and are not united according to the union required by the law of the celestial kingdom; and Zion cannot be built up unless it is by the principles of the law of the celestial kingdom, otherwise I cannot receive her unto myself; and my people must needs be chastened until they learn obedience, if it must needs be, by the things which they suffer. *** Therefore in consequence of the transgression of my people, it is expedient in me that mine Elders should wait for a little season for the redemption of Zion, that they themselves may be prepared, and that my people may be taught more perfectly, and have experience, and know more perfectly concerning their duty, and the things which I require at their hands." (Doctrine and Covenants Sec. 105: 2—10.)

It was barely possible for that Camp to go up to Zion at all; for the Lord said that unless they should have at least one hundred of the strength of His House they should not go, and they were only able to obtain about two hundred. But they did not redeem Zion, because the Saints were not prepared. Consequently the day for the redemption of Zion was postponed, until the time should come when the people, through the experiences they would be called to pass through, should be prepared for the redemption of Zion and for the building of the House of God at the center stake thereof. And the day has not yet come; and no man, so far as I know, can foretell the day or the hour, the month or the year when the people of God shall be ready to redeem Zion and build up the center stake. The Lord has not revealed this, so far as I know. But I can tell you, in one sense, when it will come to pass. I will not attempt to point out the day or the year. It will be in the due time of the Lord, when the people of God are prepared to go back, and not before. Whether it be in this generation or in the next generation, it matters not; it will only be when the people have prepared themselves to do it by their faithfulness and obedience to the commands of God. I prophesy to you, in the name of the Lord, that when the Latter-day Saints have prepared themselves through righteousness to redeem Zion, they will accomplish that work, and God will go with them. No power will then be able to prevent them from accomplishing that work; for the Lord has said it shall be done, and it will be done in the due time of the Lord, when the people are prepared for it. But when shall I be prepared to go there? Not while I have in my heart the love of this world more than the love of God. Not while I am possessed of that selfishness and greed that would induce me to cling to the world or my possessions in it, at the sacrifice of principle or truth. But when I am ready to say, "Father, all that I have, myself included, is Thine; my time, my substance, everything that I possess is on the altar, to be used freely, agreeable to Thy holy will, and not my will but Thine be done," then perhaps I will be prepared to go and help to redeem Zion. For Zion can only be built up by the law that God revealed for that purpose, which is the law of consecration—not the law of tithing. The law of tithing was instituted because the people could not abide the greater law. If we could live up to the law of consecration, then there would be no necessity for the law of tithing, because it would be swallowed up in the greater law. The law of consecration requires all; the law of tithing only requires one-tenth of your increase annually. If the law of consecration were observed, the Lord would have plenty in His storehouse and could accomplish a vast deal more and none would lack. All the energies and power of the people would be concentrated in the direction He chose, the people giving all their labor, talent and possessions, if required, for the accomplishment of the purposes of God. God's purposes, mark you. Not the purposes of man. Then the people would be converted; they would possess the spirit of revelation, and would be prophets, seers and revelators in very deed. They would then know when God spoke through His servants, or to themselves directly by the voice of His Spirit. They would have the gifts of discernment, of prophecy, of knowledge, of faith, and all virtue dwelling in them, and their whole being would be full of light. When the Lord spoke to them, they would know His voice; when He made known His will, they would not only know it was His will, but would cheerfully subscribe to it. There would be no division, no contention, no darkness; all would be clear, and they would see as they are seen and know as they are known. If we could only reach this point; if we could deal justly with each other, and not deceive ourselves by vainly imagining that we can deceive God; if we could come to this standard of perfection in the truth, oh! how quickly would the Lord open the way for the redemption of Zion and the building up of the center stake thereof, the erection of that glorious house that has been promised should be built there, on which the glory of God should rest, and in which the Saints should have communion with the heavenly hosts. The Lord can soon smooth the rough places and make the road clear for the journey of the people to the place of His choice, whenever they are ready. But we are not yet prepared for it.

We heard today from President Geo. Q. Cannon that many had apparently abandoned their faith for the healing of the sick, and placed their trust wholly in the doctors. When sickness comes some of us send at once for the doctor, instead of administering to the sick, exercising faith in their behalf, nourishing them with wholesome food and mild herbs, as the law directs, that by the prayer of faith and the anointing with oil they may be healed by the power of God, if they are not appointed unto death; and if they are appointed unto death, that they may die in the Lord. While this lack of faith prevails as it does, this is a very great obstacle in the way of your redeeming the waste places.

There was a time not long ago when the people were sorely tried in certain directions. Men's hearts were wrung to the core because they were separated from their families, driven into exile, or dragged before unfriendly courts, and convicted and imprisoned for having done what they believed to be a religious duty. Their wives were no less tried to see their husbands thus cruelly treated. Not only that, but many of the wives themselves had to flee from home with their little children, and were subjected to suffering and hardships before unknown to them; risking the lives of themselves and their children. They were also tried when they were taken prisoners and compelled to bear witness against their loved ones or be charged with and punished for contempt or perjury. These were sore trials for the people. Many of them had to endure them, and all honor to the men and women who were faithful; they did endure them and were true to their integrity to God. They did not deny the faith; they were not driven from the Gospel, nor from the church, because of these great trials that they had to endure.

Now let us look at ourselves in another light. Would all of these men and women who have endured these severe tests as patiently submit to it if the Lord should now try them in their pockets? They stood the test of principle when they felt that they were persecuted and harassed for conscience sake, but suppose the Lord should require them now to contribute their means for the accomplishment of certain needful ends, not directly benefiting themselves, do you think they would be able to stand the test; or would some of them say, what I have is my own, and I propose to handle it to suit myself? Are there any possessing that spirit among the Latter-day Saints? You would not need, I fear, very much discernment to find that kind of a spirit existing in some of those who have actually been tried and proven faithful in that other great test. It is said that the Lord will try us in all things, that power shall be given Satan to tempt us and to deceive even the very elect, if it were possible.

It behoves us, therefore, my brethren and sisters, to look to ourselves, turning the eye of scrutiny in upon our own souls, and to ask ourselves, "Am I preparing to help redeem Zion and to build up the waste places thereof?" Am I shaping my conduct so that when the Lord shall call upon the people to do this, I will be one that will be chosen for the work?" I was very much tried in my feelings when banished from my family for seven years. I served seven years in banishment—not in idleness, for I found plenty to do, though I was away from home much of that time. It was a very great trial to me; but in all of it I never had a feeling of doubt cross my mind. Of course, I could see the clouds of darkness before me, which looked impenetrable, and almost interminable. I did not know when the end would come, for the Lord did not show it unto me. If I had known in the beginning how far off the end was, I might perhaps have acted unwisely. But He withheld the vision of the end from my mind and I saw it not. As to the fact, however, that the desired end would come I never had a doubt; for I believed that God was able to remove the clouds of darkness and to cause the sunlight of heaven and of peace to shine again upon the household of faith. Yet I grieved when I heard of my brethren being haled to prison and my own family and those of my brethren driven from home with their little ones, in the dead of winter, to seek shelter away from those who sought their hurt; I thank the Lord who gave me fortitude to endure it, and was very grateful to Him and to my friends for the termination of that ordeal. If the Lord had required me to go to prison or to face the indignities that many of my brethren had to, I do not know how well my strength and my patience might have held out. I was spared that test, and I am thankful that it was so. But I pray always that if I should be brought to the severest test it would not shake my confidence in God, nor weaken my faith in or love for Him. And if He wants the little means I have, I want to feel as though it belonged to Him, for He gave it to me. If He sees fit to allow it to be destroyed or to be taken from me by any means, let me say like Job of old: "The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord." It is the only true feeling on this point that prophets, seers and revelators should have.

May the Lord bless and help you to magnify this calling unto which you are called, to be witnesses of the Lord Jesus. Having received in your hearts the spirit of prophecy, prophesy good for Zion, and not evil; for as sure as the Lord lives, if you prophesy evil against Zion you will be proven false prophets. God has decreed good for Zion. He has determined that His work shall continue in the earth and that His purposes shall be consummated, and the man that prophesies against Zion will be proven a false prophet. Therefore, if you desire to be true prophets and exercise the gifts that are within you, let your prophecy be good for Zion, for the people of God, for the honest in heart, and for the contrite and humble of all lands and climes, that the Gospel may be preached unto them, that they may be gathered into the fold and be saved with an everlasting salvation in our Father's kingdom. Speak good things, and speak no ill. Stop faultfinding, backbiting, lying, and multiplying the evils that may exist among us. Promote good. Speak of that which is good and pure. Speak of the good qualities of men. Let your minds dwell upon that which is good.

Seek for the spirit of righteousness, of truth, of meekness, of love, and of devotion to the work that we are engaged in, for it is the continuance and will be the winding up of the greatest work that was ever begun on the face of this earth, and it will be completed in the due time of the Lord. Those who are not faithful will have to bear the consequences of their acts; while those that are faithful will rise and be exalted with it. Their wives, their husbands, their parents and their children will be theirs, in time and throughout eternity; and they will have kingdoms, thrones, principalities, powers, dominion and exaltation. These are some of the blessings promised unto God's people, and no power on earth can hinder them from receiving them, except their own failure to do His will. May the Lord help us, therefore, to be faithful, is my prayer in the name of Jesus. Amen.

Written for this Paper.

MILLIONS IN PAPER.

The new 5 per cent bonds are now scattered all over the United States. They are but a drop in the bucket with what Uncle Sam has borrowed since he began business a little more than 100 years ago. The total amount of bonds sold by the government from the beginning of the Union down to the year 1880 was ten billion, six hundred and ninety million dollars, a sum which makes the mind dizzy and which would buy up a dozen of the small monarchies of Europe. This vast sum includes the bond issues of the United States up to that time. Many of them were made to fund previous loans, but interest was paid on every one of these dollars, and the gold which has been spent in this way by Uncle Sam would gild the great departments of Washington and leave enough to make a solid gold statue as large as that of the Goddess of Liberty which stands on the Capitol dome. This last loan is for $50,000,000. The interest on the bonds is 5 per cent, but Uncle Sam has sold them at such a rate that he pays in reality only 3. Fifty years ago if a Secretary of the Treasury had made the statement that in half a century the United States would be borrowing money at 3 per cent he would have been looked upon as a fool and a madman, but there is no security in the world better today than that of Uncle Sam, and it is believed here that a 2 per cent bond could be floated. Every one wants these bonds. The banks cry for them. Old maids sigh for them, and the timid capitalists are almost ready to die for them. They feel that their money is safe and that this $50,000,000 in bonds is surer than safe deposits or stockings under the rafters. Thousands of comparatively poor people will invest in these bonds. They will get them through the bankers and they will pay high prices for them, but their money will be safe and the interest will always be paid when it is due.

Have you ever seen a government bond?

It is only a piece of paper, but it is often worth its weight in diamonds. The bonds of the present issue are in denominations of $50, $100, $1000 and $10,000. The bonds are of the same size and the difference is shown by the figures on their faces. Four of these would make a good-sized dinner napkin, and I would like to have a set of napkins made up of these $10,000 bonds. Each napkin would be worth $40,000, and the twelve would make a nice snug little fortune of $480,000, or nearly half a million. These bonds run for ten years and they bring in 5 per cent interest. Each of the napkins would pay $2,000 a year in the way of interest, or $20,000 before they would have to be redeemed for their face value.

The new bonds are of two kinds. One class is of registered bonds and the other coupon bonds. The coupon bonds are payable to bearer and to them are fastened a number of detachable coupons about the size of an old 10-cent shinplaster. The interest is payable quarterly, and every three months you clip off these coupons and cash them at the treasury of the United States or at the banks. Any bank in the country knows just what they are worth and will pay you the interest on them. You can use the coupons and the bonds in business deals and their value is so well fixed that they could almost pass as money. The chief danger connected with them is that any one can use them, and if the holder of a coupon bond loses it the man who finds it can turn it into money on the next pay day. No identification will be asked at the bank by the man who presents it, and the burglar who gets hold of a lot of coupon bonds considers them more valuable than so many greenbacks or $20 gold pieces.

As to registered bonds, these are of a somewhat different nature. They have no coupons and are payable to the person whose name is written on the bond. In the office of the register of the treasury at Washington there is a record kept of the men who hold these bonds, and about a wagon load of ledgers and journals are devoted to this purpose alone. As soon as a bond is sold an account is opened with the person who buys it between him and the government, and in this is stated the amount he paid for the bond and the rate of interest. Every three months the clerks go through the books and make out a set of accounts. They notify the treasurer of the United States to pay all the interest due to the persons who hold these bonds, and this money is forwarded to them in the shape of a treasury draft. As soon as the bond is redeemed the account is closed. If the owner of a registered bond desires to transfer it to another the transfer must be indorsed upon the back of the bond before witnesses appointed by the government and a record of this must be made at the Treasury Department. As the interest is always paid to the last owner of record the books for these transfers are closed a month before interest payment day. These registered bonds are the safest investments known to the United States, and rich men put large sums of money into them. In a recent letter I told you how Vanderbilt once owned $45,000,000 of these registered bonds. Only the fewest cases are known where such bonds have been stolen. One of these occurred a few years ago when the Manhattan Savings Institution was burglarized by Jimmy Hope, and over $1,000,000 of these bonds were stolen. In this case Congress authorized duplicate bonds to be issued to the Manhattan Institution, and they lost nothing. Hope was finally captured, and the story of his burglary and punishment is one of the most interesting chapters in the history of bank detectives.

Can bonds be counterfeited?

Yes; and there have been many attempts of this kind. The only really successful one, however, was in connection with Jay Cooke & Company. These bankers once bought $80,000 worth of coupon bonds of the denomination known as seven-thirties. They were pronounced counterfeit by the Treasury Department, and although the Banking Company sued the government for the value they represented they lost the case. The counterfeit was made with the aid of a lead impression taken from the genuine plate in the bureau of engraving and printing at Washington by an unfaithful employe, which accounted for the wonderful likeness of the spurious article to the genuine.

The most extensive attempt at wholesale counterfeiting of government coupon bonds was undertaken in 1880 and nipped in the bud by the secret service officials of the Treasury Department. The officials were on the track of the counterfeiters for a long time, but allowed them to perfect their plans to the point of execution, when they were stopped. On October 21, 1880, James B. Doyle was arrested in Chicago as he was alighting from a New York train. He carried in his satchel counterfeit government bonds to the amount of $204,000. They were of the denomination of $1000, and were excellent likeness of genuine government obligations of that class. At the same time, other secret service officers raided the house of William E. Brockway in Brooklyn. He was known as a counterfeiter and was suspected of complicity in the deal. He turned state's evidence and confessed to having made them. He guided the officers to a spot in the woods where they dug up twenty-two steel and copper plates, about $50,000 in counterfeit national bank notes and a plate for $1000 5 per cent bond which had not yet been used. Two or three years later he was again rounded up through the efforts of secret service officers and caught in the act of making plates for counterfeit railway bonds. This man Brockway was one of the most noted counterfeiters in the United States and is now alive, and, while in destitute circumstances, is said to be leading an honest life. His partners and associates have also been made to suffer for their crimes, and are now aged and broken.

There are lots of interesting things about these valuable bits of paper Uncle Sam issues. If any reader of this paper could have the biggest bond given out by the Treasury Department he would be rich beyond the dreams of avarice. This bond is now in the register's office of the treasury at Washington. It has been redeemed and canceled by the government. It is the only one of its kind ever issued and it was engrossed by hand. It represents the enormous sum of $15,500,000 and it was given out when the Geneva award compelled Great Britain to pay this country $15,500,000 on what was known as the Alabama claims the money was paid to Hamilton Fish, then Secretary of State. Congress had made no provision for the disbursement of this sum, and pending legislation upon the subject Secretary Fish invested the money in government five per cents, receiving one bond of the face value of his investment.

The oldest bond now extant is also in the possession of the treasury. It is a faded document about the size of a $5 bill, dated February 6, 1777, by which the government acknowledges the receipt of $300 from John Bonfield, which it agrees to repay on February 6, 1780, with 4 per cent interest. A cancellation mark on the face shows that Uncle Sam redeemed his promise to Mr. Bonfield.

The largest denominations of bonds now outstanding are those of $50,000. The fortunate possessor of one of these draws $2,500 interest every year and his original investment has increased in value about $7,000. This denomination of bond is held by trust companies and millionaires. There are a great many bonds outstanding of the denomination of $10,000. The holders of these draw $100 interest every three months upon each bond.

The largest issue of bonds ever made by this government at one time was in 1877, when a total of $741,000,000 was issued. Of course the public debt was not increased to that extent, as a portion of the bonds redeemed others outstanding at the time. They had fallen due and Uncle Sam was not prepared to meet the obligation with ready cash, so he did what you would try to do if your note in bank should fall due and you had no money to take it up—you would give another note in its place. This was a very popular loan, drawing 4 per cent interest, and was negotiated without trouble.

Uncle Sam has, however, had his money troubles in times past. His credit was once quite low and just before and during the war the money lenders were not so greedy for the government credits. The first bonds that were sent out were sold with some difficulty and the financial skies looked dark. Many of the banks had very little faith in the future of the government and the treasury had to call upon bankers and capitalists to help them in placing their bonds. It was the faith which Jay Cooke had in the government that made his great fortune. J. Cooke & Company at the beginning of the war did a great deal for the United States Treasury. The firm possessed the confidence of Salmon P. Chase, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, and they made a great deal of money by taking the bonds from the government in big blocks and dealing them out in smaller lots to purchasers.

At times of great financial depression throughout the country caused by a downright scarcity of money the Treasury Department may come to the relief of capital by anticipating the redemption of bonds. That is, if a bond has not yet reached its maturity and the owner has no legal right to call upon the government for payment, yet would like the money, the Secretary of the Treasury may waive the technicalities and take up the pledge, giving the owner his equivalent in cash. The department sometimes anticipates the payment of interest also to relieve a temporary stringency in the money market. This has been done in several notable instances and has never failed, it is said, to have a good effect immediately upon the money market. The alternate of such action is left largely to the discretion of a Secretary of the Treasury, but as this official is presumed to be the leading financier of the country and to be in sympathy with the promotion of the financial interests of the whole nation his acts are seldom questioned except for political effect.

The negotiation of the present issue of bonds has not been attended with any difficulties. On the contrary, instead of Uncle Sam begging for takers of his promissory notes he has been besieged by capitalists anxious to lend him their money. Several firms immediately signified their willingness to take the entire issue of $50,000,000 at an increase of even the Secretary's premium. He fixed $117.223 as the minimum price of a $100 bond, and the sharp demand for the securities ran the bids up to $118. The price of the bonds was paid in gold to the assistant treasurer in New York city, who delivered the securities.

The history of the United States bonds is interesting.

The first loans ever negotiated by this government were with foreign countries, France, Spain, Belgium and Holland furnishing the money in several small sums.

The first issue of anything like a bond for home investment occurred in 1775, when the government negotiated what were then called loan office certificates. This scheme was modeled upon a plan proposed in the Virginia legislature ten years earlier, when the junior branch of the legislative body of that state proposed to borrow £240,000 sterling at five per cent interest. The fund for payment of interest and principal was to have been raised by an impost duty on tobacco. That scheme was abandoned by Virginia, but the general government remodeled it in 1775. Congress believed that if a popular loan was proposed the people would subscribe liberally, and the government would raise all the funds needed for the exigencies of that occasion. The loan office certificates which were issued in accordance with this plan were of two kinds, one bearing interest in specie, the other in paper money. Unfortunately these certificates were immediately thrown into circulation, which was contrary to the expectations of the promoters in Congress. The fact that these certificates bore interest induced many persons to prefer them to paper money. Contracts were drawn requiring payment in loan certificates, and they soon became the preferable medium of exchange, decreasing the value of the paper currency. Finally the government could no longer pay interest on the loan certificates and the holders of them were in dismay. Many persons during the great popularity of the certificates had sold their worldly possessions to invest in certificates and now found them on a par with the depreciated currency.

In 1790 the first issue of bonds to any considerable extent was made. It was found then that the indebtedness incurred by the war of the revolution was a matter of grave importance. The indebtedness was in many forms, and on numerous accounts. Alexander Hamilton came to the front with a plan, which, after a long and heated debate in Congress, was adopted. It was decided to fund the revolutionary debt by means of a bond issue. The bonds ran in three series, the bulk of them drawing 6 per cent interest, the total issue amounting to about $64,000,000. The scheme proved to be a success, and Hamilton lived to triumph over those who had opposed it.

In 1812 the government was again compelled to borrow money. This time a loan of $11,000,000 was negotiated, stock being issued for the amount borrowed, and the revenues of the government pledged for its payment. Other loans followed at intervals between this time and the beginning of the civil war.

* It was in 1861 that the government made the largest loan in its history up to that time. In consideration of the difficulties surrounding the situation and the critical conditions of the times, that negotiation may be classed as one of the signal feats in the financial history of the United States. Uncle Sam borrowed $150,000,000 on this deal.

At that time the credit of the government had become so impaired that a large loan could not be obtained in any ordinary way, nor even a small temporary loan, except for a very short period and at a high rate of interest. Before Congress adjourned in 1861 it conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury greater power to contract a public debt than had ever been given to any of his predecessors. Early in August, immediately after adjournment, armed with the authority thus conferred upon him, Secretary Chase hurried to New York to make a loan.

A meeting of New York bankers was called on the evening of August 9, at the residence of John J. Cisco, the assistant United States treasurer. It was a memorable occasion, and the results of the conference then held were all important to the nation. The financial situation was discussed, and various plans suggested for relieving the country. Finally, Mr. Coe, president of the American Exchange Bank, proposed an association of the banks throughout the country for the purpose of lending to the government the capital of the country. This could be accomplished very easily by the banks, and the money distributed in small sums to the people. This plan met with instant favor. Another meeting was held the following day, and a committee appointed. On August 15 the committee reported that thirty-nine New York banks would agree to the plan. Boston and Philadelphia banks also concurred.

The plan adopted was that there should be an immediate issue of $50,000,000 of treasury notes to run three years at 7.30 per cent. The banks were to take this and be allowed to take $50,000,000 more the following October. The government was to appeal to the people to subscribe to the notes, and the banks to take them in proportion to their capital.

The plan worked admirably, and three issues of the notes were made. They were disposed of to the people through the banks and through agents, 148 of whom were appointed to negotiate the notes and receive a commission therefor. From time to time since the war the government has made loans to recuperate its cash balance or to fund previous loans. The interest-bearing debt of the government on January 1, 1894, exclusive of the Pacific railroad debt, was $585,039,315.

FRANK G. CARPENTER-

Arizona's total cattle shipments in 1898 were 7,409 head.

THE MEETING OF SEVENTIES.

In response to invitations extended to the members of Seventies and Elders' quorums a large number of brethren met in the Assembly Hall last night, Jan. 30, to listen to the suggestions and instructions of the first presidency of the Seventies as to the best mode of conducting theological classes. Elder B. H. Roberts, one of the first presidents, occupied the time and delivered a most excellent address, showing the necessity of the Elders of Israel to acquire knowledge in all branches of learning whereby they may be made efficient as ministers of the Gospel and witnesses of the work of the Almighty in this age.

The speaker briefly emphasized the great responsibility resting upon those bearing a portion of the Priesthood, and then pointed out that the duties belonging thereto could not be discharged without earnest effort on the part of the members. The revelations of God command them to study things both past, present and future, for although the Lord has chosen the weak of the earth to be His messengers, yet he does not intend them to remain weak, but wants them to be filled with strength. He then stated the positions taken by Catholics and Protestants. The former maintained that the Church of Christ has never been taken away from the earth but has continued to grow, according to the promise of the Savior that He would be with His apostles until the end of time. The latter admitted that the Church suffered from partial apostasy, but that through the efforts of such men as Luther and Melancthon, Zwingli and Calvin, Wycliffe, Huss, Knox, Wesley and others it was restored on the basis of the Bible. Both are united in denying the necessity of a restoration in this age. How can the Seventies meet these arguments intelligently without having a detailed knowledge of ecclesiastical history and familiarity with the doctrines taught by the various churches? Elder Roberts concluded by recommending a careful perusal of his Outline of Ecclesiastical History and, if possible, of the works referred to in the book.

The discourse was listened to with deep interest throughout. Another meeting will be held tonight (Wednesday) for the purpose of giving a practical illustration of how to conduct a class. Those attending are expected to be prepared to answer questions on the Ecclesiastical History just mentioned. The meeting should be largely attended.

THE FISH INDUSTRY.

Fish Commissioner A. M. Musser was feeling jubilant today, and rightfully so. His exultation is one that can be joined in by the people generally, as it arises from the success of experiments in fish culture that means a great deal for the Territory. Two years ago Mr. Musser placed in Utah lake 2,000 black bass fry, varying from a year old down. Today, at the request of the fish commissioner, M. P. Madison, of Provo, brought up several black bass, which he took in the lake just north of the mouth of the Provo river. The fish were beautiful specimens of the finny tribe.

The law protects the fish in the lake for another two years, and the results of the experiment thus far make it certain that by the time the protection is removed there will be a vast quantity of the bass in the lake, which means many thousands of dollars to the people. Mr. Madison says the waters of the lake on the east side are fairly teeming with the fish. They are frequently caught by fishermen with seines, but under the law have to be turned loose. Last fall there was brought up in one seine over a hundred pounds of fine samples of black bass, which were again placed in the watery element. Now that the ice has to be broken through by the fishermen they are not so easily caught, as they are more wary than most of their finny neighbors.

There are vast quantities of carp in Utah lake, but the black bass is superior in quality and flavor, and the attempt to raise them has proved even more successful than with the carp.

PROSPEROUS PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, Cache Co., Utah, Jan. 30.—As it is not often that any news is sent from here for publication, I thought I would let you know a few of our doings.

Last Friday evening, in response to a call from the Bishop and a committee appointed for the occasion, the married people assembled together in a social party, and to say we had lots of fun would be drawing it very mild. Why, it seemed as everyone had just fallen heir to a $1,000, they were so pleased. We had songs, recitations, dancing, indulged in by old and young, and if you could have seen the picnic spread out, you would have forgot that the country is suffering with hard times. We had eight hours of solid, unadulterated fun, then went home feeling well.

We have a fine settlement here; it is well adapted for fruit of all kinds as well as hay and grain. Brother Peter Hansen has shipped hundreds of dollars' worth of fruit from here for the people the last two years. We have acres of small fruits and orchards of the larger kinds of fruit are being planted every year, and we are spraying our trees, so we can furnish the market with good, sound fruit. Our Bishop takes active part in this fruit industry and has had the matter well laid before the people, till the town is almost a solid bed of fruit from one to the other, and the consequence is there is a little money coming in town all the year round.

I can also report our meetings are well attended, and our Sabbath school is a grand success; from 250 to 275 pupils from 136 families is not a bad showing.

Well, not wishing to weary the patience of your readers, I will close, subscribing myself
TRAMP.

Grand valley, in the vicinity of Glenwood, will start into the beet sugar business in earnest next spring. Two hundred farmers will combine to plant 4,000 acres of beets and this will secure the location of a sugar factory in the Grand valley.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

PREACHER VS. SCRIPTURE.

A student of the New Testament cannot but be struck by the variations therefrom in doctrine that are taught by many men who profess to be preachers of Christianity. The clergy of this class, represented in the various denominations, pretend to elucidate and maintain the teachings of the Scriptures, yet vary from the expressions of that word and endeavor to explain away statements of historical fact contained therein in a manner that is truly amazing to a thoughtful and observing person, and that would lead one to believe they had a much higher opinion of the credulity of their congregations than of their discrimination and intelligence, or than of their knowledge of the contents of the sacred record. An instance of this class of preaching in a line that is quite common is that of the Rev. J. S. David, of the San Francisco New Jerusalem church. Last Sunday evening he spoke on the Lord's second advent and the resurrection. Regarding the first division of the subject he said:

The second advent is not a descent of the personal Christ out of the visible sky to Jerusalem, to reign on a local and perishable throne. It is the Lord's descent out of the illimitable sky-depths of the spiritual universe and His entrance into the hearts and understandings of men, to reign there. The fashionable Pharisees of the church will not know of His presence, for He "cometh without observation" and "as a thief in the night."

The "illimitable sky-depths of the spiritual universe" is a rather unique way, to say the least, of describing the place into which Jesus ascended when He departed from His Apostles. Upon that occasion He was taken up from the earth, and the holy messengers declared that he had ascended "into heaven." The messengers further called the attention of the disciples to the fact that they had seen the Lord ascend and beheld that "the cloud received Him out of their sight." The promise was that he should "come in like manner" as they had seen Him go. There was nothing about the "illimitable sky depths of the spiritual universe" at that place, but among other earthly appearing things there was the actual, ordinary, temporal-looking cloud that hid the Lord from the disciples' view.

But the reverend gentleman's imaginative fallacy does not end here. He says the Lord's descent is His "entrance into the hearts and understandings of men." If that be true, and the statement of the angels be also true that His descent will be "in like manner" with His ascent, then His disappearance was going out from the "hearts and understandings of men," and not a mere departure from this terrestrial field of His labors to the celestial globe on which His Father dwelt. Yet the Apostles sustained no loss like such a going out would bring; on the contrary their hearts were still so full of the Christ whom they recognized as their Redeemer, and He was so deeply engrafted in their understandings that they hesitated not to lay down their lives for His sake. As the clergyman and the angels differ regarding the place where Jesus ascended from and where He will descend to, believers in the Bible must conclude that the heavenly beings spoke the truth.

Again: "It is not a descent of the personal Christ?" Who is it then? The angel said it would be "this same Jesus." Paul says it is the Christ who "was once offered to bear the sins of many" who should "appear the second time," and the other Apostles bear similar witness. Jesus Himself declared that He, the Son of man as He was wont to call Himself, "shall come in His glory, and all the holy angels with Him." The Prophets also assert that He shall stand "on the mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem on the east." Thus the Scriptures proclaim that the second advent of the Lord is a personal descent of the Christ who was crucified, and that He should come to Jerusalem. But that is not the Lord which the Rev. David is looking for; he tells us that the being to whom he gives his worship and adoration proceeds on wholly different lines.

The preacher further says "the fashionable Pharisees of the church will not know of His presence, for He 'cometh without observation' and 'as a thief in the night.'" Now the Scriptures do not say that the second advent is without observation; the Lord said the kingdom "cometh not with observation," or "with outward show," and immediately goes on to say that His own second coming shall be so thoroughly with "observation" that it shall be "as the lightning, that lighteneth out of the one part under heaven, shineth to the other part under heaven." He is to "descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God." The "Pharisees of the church" knew of His presence at His former visit, and were not pleased thereat; so at His next coming they will be thoroughly apprised of the fact, if not by the light that shall envelop the earth or the archangel's voice that shall wake the dead, at least by the "flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God," and probably will not enjoy it any more than did their prototypes of old. His coming will be as "a thief in the night," that "sudden destruction" shall come upon the wicked; and "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." So far as the second advent is concerned it is plain from the Scriptures that the Rev. Mr. David and all who figure out an exclusively spiritual and noiseless coming are as far from the truth as Satan is from salvation.

As the Lord has nowhere expressed an intention "to reign on a local and perishable throne," but is coming to exercise dominion "eternally," that part may be regarded as a figure of speech introduced merely for effect. Regarding the other branch of his subject the reverend speaker said:

The resurrection that shall attend the second coming is the emerging or evolution of spiritual thought out of the illusion of matter.

Laying aside any question as to the absurdity of "the illusion of matter" in this connection, it may be said that, as Christ was the first fruits of the resurrection and that He brought that great law into operation on this earth, then if His resurrection was an "evolution of spiritual thought," so that of all others must be, for all must go the same way. As by the unvarying operations of universal law all men enter mortality, so they emerge from it in the resurrection by a uniform process which the Redeemer wrought out. The resurrection of Christ was a physical operation. His body was laid in the tomb, and when He arose the visitors to the sepulchre beheld the vacant place and exclaimed, "He is not here: for He is risen, as He said." There was no "evolution of spiritual thought" about it. The Lord arose in the same body in which He had before been with the disciples, and on appearing to them said: "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have."

Those who deny the resurrection or seek to make it spiritual, that is, without the raising of the body of flesh and bones, not only antagonize the Scriptures but controvert a plain principle of philosophy. Resurrection means a raising or revival to life. By the death of Christ there was not a death of the spirit, for during the time His body was in the tomb He went and "preached to the spirits in prison." It was the physical body that was affected by death; the flesh and bones that were laid down. If this body was not revived, or raised to life, then there could not have been a resurrection of any kind. This is the teaching of science, of common sense, of Scripture.

The proof is positive that such professed expounders of Bible truths as the reverend gentleman who has been quoted are proclaiming to the world a false theology and a false philosophy. It is no wonder that the condition of mankind is so far from purity and happiness, when their instruction has been so antagonistic to Christian truth.

WHERE THE CHURCH STANDS.

The position of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints among the religious denominations of the world has always been well defined. From the beginning the Lord told Joseph the Prophet that none of the existing churches was the true Church, but that if he would remain faithful, he should be instrumental in restoring the Gospel and build the Church anew, never to be overthrown but to remain as the foundation of the Millennial kingdom. In accordance with this revelation the Saints claim that the primitive churches were overthrown, that the true Gospel was not known for centuries and that it has again been proclaimed in this age by inspired Prophets of God.

To these statements substantially but one objection is made, although on two distinct grounds. The defenders of the Catholic organization claim that the primitive churches developed into the great religious body whose head is the pope, and that this was done under the direction of the Holy Spirit, in direct fulfillment of the promise that the gates of hell should never prevail against the Church. They claim to believe in God and the Savior, and teach repentance, baptism for the remission of sins, the laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Spirit, etc., according to the Gospel of Christ. Apostates and heretics there always were, to be sure. But the Church has not fallen away, they say. The claim of the Saints that an apostasy had taken place necessitating a restoration is therefore held to be absurd and preposterous.

The same conclusion is reached by the Protestants. These admit that there was an apostasy of the main body of the visible church, but that it was only partial after all. They hold that through the efforts of the reformers the Church was restored from its fallen condition. Any further restoration is, therefore, in their view, superfluous and the Saints are deceived or deceivers. On this point Catholics and Protestants are united.

If the word of God and the ecclesiastical history are consulted on this point it will be clear that the position of the Saints is fully sustained, notwithstanding the laborious arguments to the contrary. In the visions of Daniel it is clearly shown that in the post-Apostolic time a power should arise which should "wear out the Saints of the Most High," a power of which it is said: "He shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practice and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people." This fact was well known in the first Christian churches. The Apostles preached about it and appealed to it in their letters as a familiar truth. Paul reminds the Thessalonians of the "son of perdition"—which expression evidently reminds of the history of Judas, the fallen Apostle—who should "sit in the Temple of God and exalt himself over all that is worshiped," showing that that opposing power described by Daniel was to be looked for in the very midst of the churches. Its characteristics are given. Not only is it a great power, but its authority is asserted by "signs" and "lying wonders." It is a "strong delusion," a "departure from the faith" and branded with hypocrisy. John further describes the representatives of this power as ruling over "peoples and multitudes and nations and tongues," and arrayed in "purple and scarlet color and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls." This is the general tenor of the great apostasy as outlined by ancient seers. It is enough to remark that if, as our Catholic and Protestant friends claim, there never was a falling off, or if it was only partial and of little consequence, then all these prophecies have failed. But if the "sure light of prophecy" is misleading, the word of God is in toto a myth.

History proves clearly that seers of old were well informed about these things. As early as at the writing of the Apocalypse the condition of the Asiatic churches was such that the Lord threatened to remove the "candlesticks," unless speedy repentance followed. The letter to the Colossians shows the nature of the heresy at work among the early converts. The inspired writer evidently combats in their incipency the principles which later developed into various systems of Gnosticism, from the influence of which even some of the early church fathers suffered. The false principle laid down that evil was inherent in matter and that sinful propensities consequently should be fought in the body seems to have led some to asceticism and others to licentiousness, two practices equally wrong. But gradually the main body of the church fell into one or another of these two extremes. Merle d'Aubigne truly observes that in the first time of the Gospel we find the Church filled with Spirit and life, but gradually the Spirit vanished, the life died and only the form remained. When the spirit has departed only a dead body is left; or when the life-giving water has evaporated, only an empty vessel remains. Something of this nature took place in the Church. But the vessel did not lose its contents all at once, but gradually. In the first century the invisible presence of the Savior was the strength of the Church; in the third century this power was still felt and also in the fourth, although then diminishing.

Historians describe the condition of the church at the time of Cyprian in anything but eulogistic terms. At that time, church members intermarried with gentiles frequently. They were seen at the theaters and gladiatorial exhibitions, where they were delighted with the brutal spectacle of human beings carving each other. The ministers loved the world more than God, and the bishops devoted themselves to their own pleasures and to making money. The result of all this was seen when the persecution by the Emperor Decian took place. The Christians were panic-stricken. Some fled; others hastened to the authorities and renounced their faith.

While in this condition the church gradually lost the true doctrines as preached by Christ. The ordinances were changed. Priestly authority superseded that of Christ. What had once been the Church was made a political machine. The Church itself was brought into "the wilderness" for a period of "a thousand two hundred and threescore days," while the great "dragon" flooded the earth with errors of doctrine and practice. To claim that the apostasy was not universal is to deny the facts of history as well as the prophetic word.

It is necessary to remember, however, that although the true Church, as an organization, was removed and the authority of the Priesthood was "caught up unto God," yet the coming of Christ in the meridian of time and the preaching of His Gospel was necessary for the accomplishment of God's plans and purposes. Without the Mosaic dispensation, the preaching of the Gospel would have been in vain. People would not have been able to comprehend it. Notwithstanding all the follies and sins and errors of ancient Israel, the truths revealed through Moses served to prepare the world for Christ. In the same way, the Gospel preached by Christ has gradually prepared the world for the reception of Him in His second advent, which has been announced as near by Joseph the Prophet. And this was one of the great objects of the Gospel. The Church as an organization was removed, but the truth enunciated could not be stamped out. Much of it has shone in the dark all the time. Men have been inspired thereby to noble acts and thoughts and feelings; their attention has been directed towards a coming golden age, when Christ shall rule the world. And in the meantime the work behind the veil has been going on. This is founded on the atonement. Viewed in this light it is clear that the first coming of the Lord was necessary as a preparation of the world for the reception of the Gospel as revealed in this age. The position of the Saints will be found to be in full harmony with the general plan of the work of salvation.

TOO RADICAL A VIEW.

If the recent ruling of the superintendent of immigration shall be found to be good law, and shall be carried generally into effect, there will be little need for further legislation on the great subject referred to. Heretofore it has been the steamship companies and agents who have been most anxious to get immigrants, and who have been most troublesome and evasive with reference to the laws of this country on the subject. If the interpretation of the statute just now given is the correct one, these parties will in future be quite as anxious to prevent the importation of improper persons as the most diligent and vigorous U. S. official possibly can be.

The ruling alluded to is to the effect that an immigrant who becomes a pauper within a year after landing may be brought from any part of the United States to the port where he or she entered the country and turned over to the steamship company which brought the immigrant here to be sent back to Europe. All this must be done at the steamship company's expense. The decision is evoked by the fact that a woman who was landed in New York last May afterwards went to Kansas City and became a public charge because of illness. She was brought back to New York by an inspector and sent back to Europe by the line which brought her over. It cost about $100 to bring her from Kansas City, and the steamship company has been called to pay the bill.

It is hardly necessary to say that the company will appeal from this ruling, on the ground that its responsibility ceased when the woman was passed by the government inspectors at Ellis Island. The woman was really inspected twice by government inspectors, once in Europe, and again after landing, and was sent to her relatives in Missouri. The company claims exemption from responsibility for what befell her there and denies that she was a pauper when she left their jurisdiction. We are inclined to think the appeal will be sustained—that being the evident justice of the case. If not, the only safe step for the steamship lines will be to insist that all immigrant passengers insure their lives for at least a year after the date of landing, and immediately make the companies the beneficiaries under the policy thus secured. The climate of the United States is generally most salubrious and healthful; but people do die here sometimes, and some who are apparently quite sound even get sick and poor within a year after reaching our shores.

THE "MUDDLE."

Twenty-five days since the opening of the Legislature, five-twelfths of the time of its entire session, have elapsed—and only now has the august body made choice of its public printer and awarded the contract for its public printing. The gentlemen composing the minority who favored the acceptance of the lowest responsible bid have made a gallant fight, and the News commends their stand for principle, without caring anything about the personality of the respective bidders. We shall certainly not hoist in double-leaded editorial cap-trap the personal qualifications of any employe of this establishment. We are gratified to believe that it is not needed.

As to what the reporters have chosen to designate the "printing muddle," it began in an unwillingness to meet a plain business proposition in a plain business way. In order to complicate the question and befog those who were expected to vote on it, every conceivable trick has been resorted to, and all manner of side lights and confusing explanations have been thrown upon and injected into it. The great and only linotype machine has played a dumb but dramatic part, the labor-union has figured as a feature, the plea of an advocate, warped and twisted as to facts in a way that some advocates have a reputation for, has been hurled uncalled-for against reputable men and institutions, and a week later apologized for by the ranting declaimer. And through all this the simple legislators have evidently been unable to see that, whether or not through the magnanimity of their expectant public printer, public work was being put into the office that pays him his salary, without any contract price whatever, and that public business was being hampered and injured pending a conclusion that a fair business man could reach in five minutes.

The question was merely this: Which responsible establishment will do certain work at the lowest figure? Whether the bidder had this, that or the other machine, or employed union or non-union labor either in his editorial or mechanical departments, was no part of the original question. Neither was it required that the work must be done in colors, on vellum, or in gilt binding. A great deal that the Legislature does is not worth printing at all; and the representatives of the people could not properly go into any extravagance or consider any extraneous arguments in favor of unions or anything else. Yet, as we understand it, the lowest bid has not been accepted, and after nearly all the juice has been sucked out of the job by the temporary contractor, the huck for the remaining half of the session has been cavalierly tossed over to some one else.

It has been a ridiculous farce all through, and not very creditable to the performers. Although the minority have exhibited their figures—their case having been stated with mathematical accuracy—they were met with airy perorations and much flow of words—which, strange to say, have prevailed with the majority. We have no doubt that the latter have been sincere and honest in following such leadership as they have had, but they have surely looked crosswise at a simple matter of figures and of duty, and have shown a guilelessness that would hardly be deemed a virtue in a kindergarten. The News salutes them!

CALLOWNESS EXTRAORDINARY.

The simplicity of some of the Eastern papers, which venture to expatiate learnedly on matters political, social and religious in the Territory of Utah still remains a source of profound wonder. Of gullibility wellnigh monumental is the esteemed Mall and Express, New York, which admits to its pious columns the most improbable sort of stories, from the most irresponsible of writers, and from the most out-of-the-way places—the only requirement being that the word "Mormon" shall appear in as many of the sentences as possible and that the whole communication be generously interlarded with "polygamy."

In its issue of Tuesday, the 23rd of January, the M. and E. gives place to a typical production of this kind. Its writer modestly omits his name, initials or even pseudonym, but the paper dubs him a "special correspondent." He dates his letter from Deseret (1), Utah, (this gives the clue that he is perhaps a woeful Deep Creek miner stranded at that pleasant little town of Millard county); and his observations of Utah sentiment are centered upon the conversation of a woman who had been her husband's fourth wife, and a young man, "a progressive Mormon, who has allied himself with the Republican party." On the words of these two Deseret people, altogether mythical personages we think, but called by the correspondent himself "enthusiasts," he grinds out a dreary column of precious rubbish as to the impropriety of listening to Utah's appeal for statehood. Flaming headlines warn the nation of the abyss over which it hovers, and "spook" predictions of Mormon treachery and lawlessness grin and glibber from every paragraph. The whole thing is amusing yet pitiful. The good gray matter under the skull of the M. and E. editor must have suddenly become very mushy or very badly addled.

"ABOLISH THE ENGROSSING OFFICE."

The following assault upon an institution founded upon red tape solely, is made by the New York World:

It would be difficult to give any good reason why the fashion of engrossing laws, that is writing them with a pen on parchment or some imitation of it, should survive in this practical land. It has no reason in convenience, in accuracy or in permanence. It is simply a fashion persisted in for sentimental reasons.

It is proposed to do away with the system in this state for a reason that should be controlling if there were no others. It has been notorious for years that laws are not engrossed as they were passed by the legislature. The engrossed copy which is signed by the governor and becomes the law is not infrequently characterized by omissions or additions or punctuation which substantially change its language and effect.

This has become so common that it is already scandalous, and the tendency is to a worse condition instead of a better one. There is a sure cure for the evil. Abolish the engrossing office. Let the bills be printed as passed for the information of legislators, and let a copy of the printed bill be signed by the governor. The possibility of making changes in a law, either by mistake or fraud, without timely detection, would thus be reduced to a minimum.

There was a time when all books were manuscripts, but this is the age of the printing press, not of the penman. The reform is a good one and tends to safety.

The ridiculous addendum of errata appended to the Compiled Laws of Utah, 1888, and the plentiful sprinkling of errors in grammar, spelling, punctuation, etc., with which the pages of the session laws of 1890 and 1892 are bespangled, are striking object lessons illustrative of the soundness of the World's ideas upon the subject of engrossing bills passed by a legislative body, instead of using, as the original, a printed copy. The printer who prints the laws in book form is required by law, and by his oath and bond, to "follow copy" in every particular. This copy is either the original bill as signed by the presiding officers of the two houses of the legislature, and by the governor, or it is, presumably at least, an exact transcript of it; and as the original bill is often engrossed by a clerk who is not expert in orthography, punctuation, etc., or who is careless in regard to such details, it frequently happens that an exact reproduction of his work in type calls for severe criticism on account of the errors it contains, for which, however, the printer is generally blamed.

The Utah Legislature of 1884 made the innovation suggested by the World, by using as the originals printed copies of several long bills. The reason why this was done, however, was that the bills were not passed until near the close of the session, and it would have been a physical impossibility to engross them in time to have them signed before adjournment, on account of their great length. Hence printed copies were taken, and necessary corrections made in them, when they were adopted as originals. As a precaution against interpolations, a red line was drawn between the printed lines.

The present Legislature has made one innovation in the direction advocated by the World. Early in the session, by concurrent resolution, it directed the chief clerks to use a printed copy of the bill instead of the original manuscript, while the measure should be under consideration. Only one more improvement remains to be made: Let the bill as finally passed be put in type, carefully proof-read by competent persons, and a printed copy of it be signed and filed in the secretary's office as the original, while another printed copy is furnished to the printer who is to put the laws in book form.

THE FIRE AND POLICE BILL.

The bill introduced in the Legislative House last Saturday afternoon, designed to place the fire and police departments of cities of the first and second class on a strictly non-partisan basis, is a long document, and covers the subject in detail. The city council appoints two members of a commission, who must belong to different political parties, and the Governor appoints two other members, who must also differ in politics. These four, together with the principal officers of the fire department, comprise the board of fire commissioners; and the same four in conjunction with the principal officers of the police department, make up the board of police commissioners. Their compensation is to be fixed by the city council.

These two boards, or this board, whichever they or it may be called, control the fire and police departments, and all appointments therein. They are required to formulate rules for the government of both, and for competitive examinations of applicants for positions and promotion. Attaches of both departments are prohibited from taking active part in political conventions, but are not debarred from voting, and numerous provisions appear throughout the bill the design of which is to secure non-partisan management and conduct on the part of all persons connected with either department. Firemen and policemen hold their positions during good behavior, and are removable by the board only after a public hearing on charges preferred in writing. The city council is authorized to pension retired or disabled firemen and policemen, in certain cases.

No argument is required to support the proposition that the fire and police departments of a city ought to rest on a strictly non-partisan basis. Neither should ever be permitted to become a part of any political machine. No truth in American political economy will receive more general acceptance than this. Competitive examinations, and reasonably secure tenures of position, are also desirable features. As to the matter of pensions, there is a difference of opinion. In respect to the details of control of the two departments, the bill has a number of commendable features.

But it has one provision which alone is sufficient to justify its rejection by the Assembly, unless the same can be eliminated. The feature here referred to is the appointive power which it confers upon the Governor. Under this provision only one man would stand between the President of the United States and the selection of the firemen and policemen of the principal cities of this Territory. This will strike some people as centralization run mad, yet singularly enough, the acknowledged Democratic leader of the House is the author of the bill. The present occupant of the gubernatorial chair in Utah is a very urbane gentleman, who sincerely strives to promote harmony and good feeling among all classes of citizens, and the general welfare of all; but territories have often had governors of a very different stamp, and until this commonwealth shall be fully vested with the powers and privileges of statehood, such legislation as that under review will be, to say the least, premature.

While Utah remains a Territory it is the paramount duty of her Legislature to preserve as nearly intact as possible the few fragments of self rule that are left to her; and the appointive power should be placed in the hands of one man only when no other way is open to attain a necessary object.

VERILY, SPEECH IS SILVER!

Just to hand is that particular part of the esteemed Congressional Record specially designated as No. 80, Vol. 25; though bearing date of January 22, 1894, it is devoted altogether to a speech delivered in the United States Senate by our stalwart and silver-tongued neighbor, Hon. John P. Jones of Nevada more than three months since. The legislative body at which Mr. Jones hurled his arguments and oratory had under consideration on the occasion the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, and the business of the speaker and his sympathizers was to talk the life out of that bill if they could not defeat it any other way. Accordingly, when he was recognized by the chair, Mr. Jones, on the 14th of October, 1893, took all the superfluous covering off his nimble tongue and sailed in. Almost everybody knows the size of the Congressional Record—a page contains about two thousand words. Well, our hero gave the gentle Senate twenty pages' worth that first afternoon, a cool 40,000 words including interruptions, etc., and then "the honorable senator yielded for a motion to adjourn," which the grateful Senate adopted, and they and Mr. Jones were able to get a rest until Monday the 16th. On that day he gave them eleven pages more, a dose of something like 22,000 words. At this point Senator Peffer and others relieved him, and we hear him no more until Saturday the 21st, when he administered another sedative in the shape of 20,000 words, again yielding at last to a motion for adjournment. After the intervening day of rest, the tireless champion came up fresh and voluble, and poured forth some 19 pages' worth—about 38,000 words, only suspending operations after that warming-up process because Mr. Teller and others wanted to make a few remarks. On Tuesday, the 24th, he began where he left off the afternoon before. This time he was more moderate, however; he only talked about twenty-one or two thousand words at them; but he gave them nearly as much more next day, concluding this time amid "applause in the galleries." He lay over on Thursday, the 26th, but plunged into the fray again on Friday, the 27th. About 30,000 words was his quota for this occasion; it was largely made up of long extracts in small type and tables of figures that no one on earth could understand. Then "the honorable senator yielded the floor for the day," and on Monday the 30th of October, he proceeded to tie up the loose ends of his argument, array in compact phalanx his facts, marshal in serried ranks his figures, depict and frame his peroration—all this in a few choice sentences requiring not more than 11,000 words. His last words were a stanza of poetry of which the concluding lines are:

But the brave faith hath not lived in vain;
And this is all that the watcher said.

Most people will agree that it was about enough for the watcher to say. We believe the speech is with one exception the longest ever delivered in Congress, the exception being a former effort of the same Senator. As printed in the Record it occupies more than 98 pages of more than 2,000 words to the page, and required for its delivery almost the whole of the time of eight sessions of the Senate.

And yet the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman act passed the Senate, received the President's approval and is now law of the land!

GLADSTONE'S RESIGNATION.

The possibility of the resignation of Mr. Gladstone at an early date and the significance of such a step are discussed by the press at present. The other day the Pall Mall Gazette announced most positively that the prime minister of England would resign his office. The statement was officially contradicted, but in such a way as to convey to the public that the rumor had some foundation. The following was authorized by Mr. Gladstone himself and can hardly be considered a complete refutation:

The statement that Mr. Gladstone has definitely decided, or decided at all, to resign is untrue. It is true, however, that for many months past his age and the condition of his sight and hearing have, in his judgment, made relief from public affairs desirable. Therefore, his tenure of office has been at any moment liable to interruption from these causes, which are, in their nature, permanent. It remains exactly as it has been. He is ignorant of the course which events important to the nation may take even during the remainder of the present session of parliament, and he has not said nor done anything which could in any degree restrain his absolute freedom, or that of his colleagues, regarding the performance of the arduous duties now lying, or likely to lie before them.

The question naturally arose, what "events important to the nation" could be of so serious a nature as to lead the premier to consider the desirability of retiring from public life. He is known to enjoy good health, as usually, and notwithstanding his years, to be "full of fight" as Mr. Herbert Gladstone recently said of his venerable father. The British public therefore at once suspected that Gladstone had alluded to the possibility of a near war, and that he would be unwilling to shoulder the responsibility of an emergency of that kind. The suspicion was all the more strong, because Balfour recently in a public lecture declared that war is imminent in Europe.

Should this be the case, probably no

step that Gladstone could take would serve more effectually to postpone the outbreak than that now under discussion. His well known policy of peace has more than once emboldened countries disposed to aggressive movements to go dangerously near the limit of safety. With Gladstone's resignation the English government would at present be likely to be entrusted to the guidance of men determined to maintain the honor and dignity of the nation among its several competitors at land and sea, even at the cost of war. And whenever England sails out under a "firm foreign policy," her possible enemies will be cautious. Russia and France are strong nations, well equipped for war, but England, supported by the Triple Alliance, forms a more formidable power than either, or the two combined.

INFORMATION WANTED.

A correspondent from Wasatch county, Utah, asks the following question:

Who was the first male child born in Utah after the arrival of the Pioneers in 1847, or who was the first woman to give birth to a son?

Whitney's History of Utah gives as the date of the birth of the first white child, August 9, 1847, two weeks and two days after the arrival of the Pioneers; but this child was a girl, daughter of John and Catharine Campbell Steele, both of the Mormon Battalion, who reached the valley in Captain Brown's company, July 29. The little lady was named Young Elizabeth Steele. The History gives no name of the first boy born, nor have we been able up to this time to ascertain to whom this distinction belongs.

A friend suggests that on the occasion of a Pioneer jubilee some years ago, a young man was introduced to the audience as the first white boy born in Utah. We have failed, however, to find any record of such event in the back files of the News; and Andrew Jensen, who is a thorough searcher after historical facts, has also been unable to give us any information. He suggests that Hon. A. O. Smoot, of Provo, had a son born in the "Old Fort," Salt Lake City, November 23, 1847, and that this boy was perhaps the first. From other sources we hear this disputed. We are accordingly compelled to confess our inability to answer the question propounded; and this seems to be a fitting occasion to ask for any light on the subject that any reader of the News may be in possession of.

THE ESTRAY BILL.

Estray animals have been a perennial subject of contention in this Territory—among legislators when the Assembly was in session, and between farmers and stockraisers in the season of growing crops. For twenty years no law has been in force upon the subject any longer than was required to secure its modification or repeal, and probably no other cause has been more fruitful of neighborhood ill feeling than trespassing live stock. To forestall all trouble on account of damage done by trespassing animals, is beyond the power of the Legislature; but a good law on the subject would be a great help in that direction.

Heretofore, in dealing with this matter, the Utah Legislature has had one serious difficulty to contend with, viz., a provision of the act of Congress, passed in 1874, commonly called the Poland law, which prohibits the exercise in this Territory of any judicial function or authority, by any person or officer except the courts named in the act. The proceedings necessary to ascertain the facts and apply the remedy in a case of damage by trespassing animals, are judicial in their nature, and hence must be had before a judicial officer, properly the justice of the peace of the precinct, if the amount involved does not exceed his jurisdiction, which is seldom or never the case. For this reason, a law conferring upon any person or persons in the precinct, other than the justice of the peace, the power to determine the amount of damage, or to order the sale of the animals, would be unconstitutional. On this ground the courts have declared invalid one or more estray laws which the Legislature has enacted.

At the present session of the Assembly, a bill has passed the House which seeks to avoid the constitutional objections referred to, and at the same time afford a simple, speedy and inexpensive method of accomplishing the ends of justice in cases of damage by estrays. Section 1 provides that the damaged person may keep and properly care for the trespassing animals for twenty-four hours, and that he must, meanwhile, diligently try to find the owner. This gives an opportunity for neighbors to effect an adjustment between themselves without further expense or official interference. But if such an adjustment is not made within twenty-four hours, the animals are to be delivered to the constable, who is made pound keeper. Should legal proceedings become necessary, within twenty-four hours after the damage has been done some disinterested voter of the precinct must appraise it, and furnish a certificate thereof. The form of this certificate is prescribed, and it must be filed with the justice of the peace of the precinct, and becomes the complaint in a civil action. The owner of the animals, known or unknown, is designated as the defendant, a summons is issued and proceedings are had as in other civil cases. In case judgment is rendered in favor of the plaintiff, it is evidently the intention that execution may be had on the animals, which are meanwhile held in the pound; but the bill contains no specific provision to that end, and the omission should be remedied or there may be a clash with the exemption law. If it is the intention to give the owner of the animals the benefit of the latter law, it should be so stated in terms.

The owner of the animals is allowed ninety days after the sale in which to redeem them, and three months longer in which to claim any surplus they may have been sold for in excess of damage, costs, etc. At the first meeting of the county court after the expiration of six months from the sale, the justice must pay into the county treasury such surplus. The fees of the appraisers are fixed at twenty cents per mile, one way, and twenty cents per hour for time necessarily consumed in making the appraisal, to be recovered as costs. The fees of the constable, acting as such in serving the summons, etc., are the same as in other cases; but his fees as poundkeeper are not specified, which is an omission that ought to be remedied, in order to prevent disputes.

This bill is certainly an improvement on the present law, at least in its methods and intent. There are some omissions which should be supplied, and defects of language and construction which should be remedied. Section 2, for example, is long enough to fill nearly half a page of the session laws, and yet is a single sentence. It would make a common farmer dizzy to read that one long sentence and try to comprehend all the law embraced in it; though its meaning when the same is once within the mental grasp, may be unexceptionable. Sifted of its imperfections which may be easily remedied, this bill will probably prove as satisfactory as any the Legislature could prepare and pass. As explained in debate, it purports to be a fair compromise between the farmer and stock raiser.

CUT DOWN THE FEES.

At an early stage of the present session of the Legislature, Councillor J. E. Booth gave out that he contemplated drawing a bill to revise the fees now being collected under the probate procedure law. He also intimated that he might include the district court fee list, and the perquisites of certain public officials. The gentleman should mature and introduce the bill without unnecessary delay. If he does not, the time required by the Assembly to consider and pass it will very likely be spent in maturing other legislation, not half as beneficial as such a law would be, and perhaps positively hurtful.

The recent publication of the particulars in the case of a taxpayer, whose tax was four cents, but who must now pay $8.50 or lose his property, is sufficient proof of a change in the conditions which formerly justified the law because of the few tax sales and sparsely settled condition of the Territory. This change demands that a change be also made in the law, which under present circumstances operates as an outrage upon the people. Perhaps no complaint is oftener heard in the halls of justice in this Territory, than that of the widow and orphan, who cry out against the extortion of which they are made the victims, under the authority of the provisions of the probate practice act, which specify the fees that may be charged in the settlement of an estate. These fees must be paid in cash, and in order to raise it, a cow, a team, and often property of much greater value, sorely needed for their support by the widow and children of the dead husband and father, must be sacrificed.

The fee business is being immensely overdone, under a number of existing laws. Many items of costs connected with proceedings in all the courts are unjust and ought to be cut down or abolished. The perquisites which a number of public officers are permitted to collect from the people are, in many cases, an unjust and unreasonable tax upon persons having necessary business with or before such officers. The Legislature should ameliorate if it cannot remove this evil of fees. Cut them down! Provide for fair compensation for those who carry the responsibilities and discharge the functions of official life, but do not allow them to be vampires!

BUFFALO BILL'S CONVERSION.

Colonel W. F. Cody, better known as "Buffalo Bill," is about to turn Quaker, if one of the latest reports from New York is true. In an interview the other day the colonel explained that he has been negotiating with the Philadelphia Friends with a view of establishing a colony on his ranch near North Platte, Neb., where he owns four thousand acres of land, said to have rich soil and to be well watered. This land he will divide in small holdings with a family on each. His idea is, further, to establish a community of interests and he hopes to gather round him a little colony of five hundred people. In case he succeeds he may even join the sect himself. "Peace hath her victories no less renowned than war," said the colonel, when asked if he would become a Quaker. "Many strange things happen. Why should not 'Buffalo Bill' become a Quaker, if he sees fit?" Why not indeed? Nothing is more delightful to a traveler after a stormy voyage than a calm, peaceful harbor; the balmy spring is all the more enjoyed after a severe winter, and rest is sweetest when the preceding labor has been hardest. On the same principle it is not difficult to imagine "Buffalo Bill" enjoying himself as the chief of a Quaker community after years of Wild West show.

A CALL FOR CONSERVATISM.

Not a city in the Union, of similar population, has a better school system with better school buildings than has the metropolis of Utah. In the amplitude and excellence of its educational facilities accessible to the children of the masses, this city is not surpassed, if it is equalled, by any of similar size in the United States. The example which it has set in this regard is being followed by many of the larger towns of the Territory. Logan has a number of public school buildings which, in size and cost, are ahead of the age, size and wealth of the town. Brigham City has always been in the van of educational progress. Tooele is rivaling any other town of her size in the Territory, and the spirit of school house building, and of school improvement, has been epidemic all over Utah for several years.

So far has this spirit been carried that conservative men are beginning to declare in favor of checking it. It is being characterized as an educational "boom," which, like many other feverish affections of the body politic, is likely to react unfavorably on the public welfare. It is insisted that statements, widely circulated throughout the civilized world, derogatory to the intelligence and educational status of the people of Utah, have too greatly excited their pride and ambition in respect to education, and that, in order to vindicate themselves they have assumed burdens of debt and expense that are out of proportion to the wealth and population of the Territory, and of its municipalities.

The recent discussion of the subject of a union of the University and Agricultural College has given the people a better understanding than they ever had before of the cost of advanced education; and the information has tended to strengthen the popular sentiment in favor of retrenchment. It is being asked why teachers in public educational institutions should be paid salaries that exceed those of some of our highest public officers, and it is being urged that Utah ought not to try to rival Cornell and Ann Arbor, or other great seats of learning, in the older, wealthier and more populous states, in the capacity or costliness of even the principal educational institution of the Territory.

The state of the Territorial treasury, and the financial condition of the people generally, forbid a continuance of such lavish policy in educational affairs as has prevailed for some time past. Retrenchment is demanded. Conservatism is called for. Economy is in order. The rapid progress that has been made, and the extraordinary efforts that have been put forth in improving and enlarging educational facilities amply justify some moderation for the immediate future at least.

A few members of the Legislature appreciate the public needs and sentiment in relation to this matter, and with vote and voice will support a conservative policy in respect to overburdening the people for educational purposes.

TO BRIDGE THE CHANNEL.

The frequently suggested plan to connect England with the continent has again been made the subject of discussion by those interested. A French engineer, M. Hersent, submits his designs for a giant bridge over the channel. The proposed structure will be twenty-one miles long and composed of seventy-three spans, and tower 177 feet above high water. The piers are of steel columns resting upon masonry. Seven years will be needed for the completion of the work and the cost is estimated at $134,000,000.

The idea of bridging the channel, or constructing a tunnel from Dover to Calais has had many advocates among eminent engineers on both sides of the water, but the general public in England has never shown any enthusiasm for the project. That it would facilitate and greatly increase the friendly intercourse between France and England cannot be doubted. The water that separates the two coasts has the reputation of being terribly trying at times to travelers. Besides, international communication by sea never assumes the same proportions as that by rail. As it is, England enjoys practically the full benefits of the position as an island. A bridge or a tunnel would materially alter this condition. The very novelty of the thing would draw traffic. Soon no Frenchman and no Englishman would think life worth living, unless he had crossed that bridge, and tourists from all parts of the world would even go out of their way in order to get the experience of crossing the ocean, or diving under it, as it were, in a railroad car. That this increased traffic and consequent social intercourse would exercise a modifying influence upon both nations needs no argument.

But the plan is not yet realized and the question is whether Great Britain will consent thereto. Objections have formerly always been based on strategic grounds. It has been asserted that such a means of communication would facilitate the invasion of a hostile army, although it would seem that with the means of destruction now known, nothing would be easier than to prevent an enemy from taking advantage of either a bridge or a tunnel of that length. The tendency of the age is to improve communication in every way possible, to save time and conquer all obstacles of both time and space. The connection of Great Britain with the mainland would be another triumph of progress in the interest of the general brotherhood of the human family.

A LADY EXPLORER.

On Saturday Mrs. Isabella Bishop, the famous lady fellow of the British Royal Geological society, sailed from Vancouver for Corea, whither she goes on a trip of exploration. Mrs. Bishop has been in most of the countries of the world, and has written many books of her travels, her literary title being Miss Bird. The volume relating her experiences in this part of the country is styled "A Lady's Life in the Rocky Mountains."

Mrs. Bishop is being sent out by the Royal Geological society on her present trip, one reason for her selection being that the cost to the society would not be so much as if a man were sent, as a woman can secure more liberal concessions from the authorities in foreign lands for transportation than can one of the sterner sex. The lady herself enjoys foreign travel. In fact her own country is the only one that she complains at in going from place to place, and this is on account of the "tips" that are required by railway and other employee. Said she, "Tipping in England has become a national calamity. I travel with no comfort in my own country. Everywhere I turn I find an obsequious attendant with an oily smile and an itching palm."

Mrs. Bishop was very successful in her recent exploration of Thibet, where she met with an accident that nearly cost her her life. She slipped and fell into a river, from which she was rescued by two brave Thibetan youths. Her present calling is to explore through the comparatively unknown regions of northern Corea. The courage she exhibits in undertaking such arduous work is deserving of success.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Written for this Paper.

WITH HONEYMAKERS.

I thought it would be interesting to bee-keepers generally, and particularly to those in this part of the Territory, to learn something of my labors as bee inspector of Cache county, in the interest of the bee industry here.

In my work of inspection I found six cases of foul brood in the county. Two were at Logan, two at Richmond and two at Providence. All were destroyed.

The heaviest loss in the county has been from bad management. There are not more than a dozen scientific bee-keepers in the county, if there are that many. There are but eight extractors in the county; all the bee-keepers outside of the owners of these extractors produce strained honey.

The general idea seems to be that when a man gets a hive of bees he expects them to furnish him all the honey that himself and family can eat and then take care of themselves. Now bees are among the cleanest and most particular things in the world; they love to be in the woods and among the trees and flowers. Then how must they feel to be put on top of each other, close together, and that, too, beside some stinking hogpen, cowshed, or in fact anywhere out of the way, and then have half their number killed in taking away their honey, or robbing them? Robbing them, sure enough, and murdering them too. Yet this is the general state of bee-keeping in Cache county.

There are 2,164 stands of bees in the county, distributed as follows: Logan, 884; Greenville, 92; Hyde Park, 86; Smithfield, 142; Richmond, 180; Hyrum, 246; Weilsville, 200; Mendon, 70; Paradise, 100; Providence, 380; Millville, 187; Coveville, 80; Lewiston, 68; Newton, 61; Clarkston, 15.

The yield of honey per colony has been about one-half what it should be, or not over twenty-five pounds per hive. The increase of bees is the smallest ever known and is not more than ten percent; the reason was because of the late spring.

I have been requested to give some information regarding the proper handling of bees and feel that I cannot do better than relate some of my own experience in this matter.

I began eight years ago with one swarm in a box commonly called a beehive; it should be called a bee-killer. It is made in two parts, the bottom part in the broad chamber and the top for the bees to deposit their surplus honey. These parts are nailed together so that when you want to take the honey you must use an iron bar to pry the top off. When I did this I found part of the honey in the top and part in the bottom, and half the bees were drowned in the melting honey. I could not but feel what a fool-arrangement that was for bee-keeping. Yet two-thirds of all the hives in Cache county today are of that kind. No wonder that a man would rather go to the canyon and get a load of firewood than take the honey from such a hive of bees. I came to the conclusion that if that was bee-keeping I had had enough of it. It took my wife all day to get the dead bees out of the honey.

Just when I had come to the conclusion to have no more to do with bees, I saw an advertisement of A. T. Root, Medina, O. I sent my address and by return mail received the magazine entitled Gleanings in Bee Culture, and Root's catalogue of bee supplies. I learned that there was a proper system of keeping bees, who could be made to build their combs in frames which could be taken out and the honey be removed by an extractor, the frames then being put back again to be refilled, without killing the bees. So I tried another year, with eight Simplicity ten-frame hives. When I lifted the tops off to take out the honey that season I was disappointed, for the bees had built all across the frames and I had a worse mess than ever. I almost gave up in despair, but in looking over the catalogue of bee supplies I found I had omitted what is called a "foundation," which leads the bees to build their combs straight. I sent to Medina for one and tried again.

When I lifted the lids off the hives the third season, I was overjoyed. I called my wife to behold one of the most beautiful sights we had ever seen. There were ten frames in each hive filled with comb honey as straight as a board and as white as snow. I lifted the frames out, brushed the bees off in front of the hives, extracted the honey from the frames and put them back without killing a bee. The next day the little workers were as busy filling the hives again as though they had been undisturbed. I had met with success by following a proper system.

As some people do not know the difference between extracted honey and strained honey, it may be well to explain that extracted honey is thrown out of the combs with a machine called an extractor, in the same state as the bees put it in, and as pure and clean as it was in the flowers. The work is done without killing a bee. With the straining process the honey and comb is mashed up, together with bees, bee bread, and often young brood. As the work is generally done in the fall when the weather is cold, the mixture is melted and strained through a muslin cloth. This treatment takes away the flavor of the honey and leaves it little better than molasses, besides killing half the bees. The mixture is a dirty mess before the straining. On one occasion I asked a lady who was straining honey what she was going to do with it, and received the reply that she did not know, but she was not going to eat it.

In going through the county I found people who were prejudiced against the extractor, as they had been told it caused foul brood. Now the extractor has nothing to do with foul brood. The latter originates from brood that has died in the cells and rotted there, or from a germ as in contagious diseases. I have extracted honey from 100 hives this season, and never interfered with a brood chamber; the queen never laid any eggs in the surplus department. In fact the extractor is a preventive of foul brood. It has contributed largely to my success.

The wise man said, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard." In this part of the country I would say go to the bee. It is one of the best examples of industry that we have, and it is wonderful how bees resemble mankind. Just notice them in spring after a long winter, when there is no bread and butter in the house. Take a pan of meal and put it against the hive, and how soon they will crowd in it to get it on their legs to pack to their young; put your hand among them, and they will walk over it, hum around you and kiss your hand, and you would not have the faintest idea that they possessed such a thing as a sting. They are humble and gentle in poverty and trouble. But try them in the summer, when their house is full of honey and see if they kiss your hand. Not much; you have to clear away then. Yet the workers never loaf around, but make the best of the harvest of honey.

If it was not for the wisdom and industry of these wonderful little things over thirty tons of honey would have been wasted in Cache county this year. All this was gathered from vegetation much of which we in our ignorance call weeds, and with proper care and system much more could have been garnered. I wonder how many more of God's choicest blessings we in our ignorance trample under our feet.

HENRY BULLOCK.

OUR POULTRY DEPARTMENT.

[The gentleman who writes the following letter is a practical poultryman and has made a success of it. Further communications from him will be at all times welcome:

POULTRY WILL PAY.

SALT LAKE CITY, Jan. 30, 1894.

In reading your editorial of January 20, where you refer to the small economies of this life, and especially refer to poultry and eggs, I thought how little the majority of the people know about producing fowls and eggs.

I visit farms with from 100 to 200 fowls upon them at this time of the year, and I ask the question, "How many eggs do your fowls lay now?" The invariable answer is, "Oh! we don't get any, bless you! We have to buy if we use any; and they are eating their heads off and will only lay when eggs are 12½c per dozen. There's no money in poultry." When I tell them that at least one-third and if properly attended to one-half of them should be laying through November, December, January and February, and two-thirds in March and practically all in May—"Well, what do you do with them? Take them up and squeeze them?" "Well," I say ironically, "Yes; I see that they get the proper housing and food and the right kind and at the right time and regularly; also attending to their wants in the way of cleanliness, and the hen, if of the proper age and vigor, will do the rest."

We have an abundance of feed and other material—and that cheap—required for the wants of the fowls right here without going outside for any one article to produce poultry and eggs, with the exception that some of us must bring fresh blood into our yards so as to keep our flocks strong and vigorous; for be it known that there is no kind of stock that so soon show the evil effects of inbreeding as poultry. In breeding is the cause of eggs not hatching, and what few chickens do come, are small and puny and fail to grow. They are the kind subject to all kinds of chicken diseases—swelled heads, roup, gapes and kindred complaints, and fit subjects to feed upon by "the lazy poulterer's reward" lice. Let me here say as a rule there are more chicks die from lice than all other diseases put together. It is called the sleepy disease; and lice put them to that sleep which knows no awakening.

I find, for instance, 100 fowls is what some of our farmers call a large house; 10x10 and about 4 to 6 feet high to the square, with four to 6 roosts in them, crowded together, and the droppings upon the floor from six inches to two feet high—a veritable lice hatchery. Now that amount of room is about right for fifteen hens and a rooster, or without rooster, from twenty to twenty-five hens, and if eggs only are wanted they will be better without the presence of the rooster—you will procure quite as many eggs from a given number of hens and the keeping qualities of the eggs will be increased one-third and the appearance of the eggs for cooking and eating purposes improved. Most farmers could take care of from fifty to one hundred hens, and if properly housed and fed they would bring in an income per hen from $1 to $3 per year (according to manipulation)—and that to produce poultry and eggs for market alone and not the fancy. It would be the height of folly for the average farmer to spend a large amount in fancy stock only in his roosters, and they need not be expensive. Cross-bred and well-bred stock is what is wanted by the farmer.

A hen will cost to keep her about 2½ cents per week, so if she lays one egg per week at 25 cents per dozen it will pay for her keep; the rest that she lays are for your labor and interest upon your investment. The poultry business will pay at least 100 per cent per annum upon all investments. We have many practical poultry men who make three times that amount, and they are not in the fancy business either. But not everybody can run large poultry establishments, as it is a business of a vast amount of small details and fine manipulations if you would produce all the profits.

If any questions should arise I will answer to the best of my ability. You can address me by the initials in care of this paper, as I desire to give information for the general good, and not to work in any free advertising.

Respectfully, G. H. C.

WHAT WILL CURE GAPES?

SALT LAKE CITY,
January 30, 1894.

I noticed in the DESERT EVENING NEWS for the 29th of January an article under the headline "Where Many May be Saved." In the last paragraph of that article you call upon people who are interested in poultry raising to contribute their views and experiences in this matter that our readers may be placed in possession of further general and special information regarding this industry.

I have already had a number of chickens die from the gapes and others are gaping which I expect will also die if no help can be devised. Therefore I would respectfully ask if you would be kind enough to publish in your valuable paper any remedy that you or any readers of the NEWS may be in possession of. I am sure this would benefit a great many besides.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

A GAPE CURE.

To an Old Subscriber:—Remove all chicks or fowls affected and keep them isolated; give half a teaspoonful of coal oil to a quart of water for drink; change the same twice a day and wash out drinking vessels. Give each infected bird a piece of gum camphor about the size of a pea; it will make them cough or heave and the strong fume of the camphor will cause the worms in the throat or gullet to loose their hold and they will be thrown out of the mouth of the bird. Then make the following mixture and give each bird three pills (pill size) night and morning for several days: 1 tablespoonful of soot, 1 teaspoonful of lard, 4 to 6 drops of coal oil and as much Turk y rhubarb as you can lay on a ten cent piece, and slowly mix, if too soft add more soot or pulverized charcoal, the latter if you have it.

Don't overfeed them but, what you do feed let it be generous in quality—a little boiled meat and oil-cake meal (not too much of this); mix rather stiff with milk or the soup your meat was boiled in, and thicken with bran and shorts or oatmeal; give your birds grit and warm quarters and they will improve.

Now you must kill or drive those gape worms out of your yards and coops. Sprinkle a liberal quantity of air-slaked lime, or, if no better, your coal ashes in your coop, and dig them up deep and this will help you to destroy the worms. All birds that die, burn them; if you put them into the manure heap the flesh will rot but the worms will live (so say the best authorities) and your fowls, when they scratch around, will find the worms and become again infected. Stamp it out! Don't breed from those fowls, their constitutions are weakened and at least their progeny are more liable to disease than from others that have not been exposed. G. H. C.

FOWLS.

You want to keep them for profit! Well, you must make a bargain with Dame Nature, and if you will use the good common sense she has endowed you with you can and will have the best side of the bargain, but it means work, work!

Now, you have a large flock of fowls, all sizes—some large. Good layers and others off in size, and if you knew how many eggs they laid, you would find they were eating their heads off. The good wife or daughter will know (if the husband, father or brother don't) which hens they have seen on the nest laying every day and especially those that began to lay in January and February. Let there be about twelve to fifteen of these fine-built (rather longer than square in body) be selected and taken extra good care of. If they are dark in color procure a thorough-bred Barred Plymouth Rock cockerel or cock or Silver Wyandotte and keep him with these selected and they will give you all the eggs you will need for setting purposes. If properly attended they will give you from ten to fifteen eggs per day from the 15th of February or 1st of March and this would be 70 per week.

If your fowls should be white, or light colored, substitute a white Wyandotte male in place of Barred Plymouth Rock; or if you can't procure a Wyandotte put in a white Plymouth Rock.

Now if you follow out the above this year, next year you will have a lot of chicks uniform in size and color which you will find an advantage when you come to dispose of them.

Before these chickens are selected and that rooster procured, the good man of the house (and they are all good when prospective money is in sight) must provide a separate sleeping place and a good run, say 10 feet wide and from 60 to 100 feet in length. Put a foot board all around your run and four feet of wire netting which can be bought for one cent per square foot, and if they fly over that out the flut-feathers on one wing—it will not injure the birds. Haul a load of good sharp sand into this inclosure and leave the rest to the attendant, who should proceed about as follows: First, see that they have plenty of clean water; if you can have it running through the yard so much the better—they can it all times help themselves. Secondly, feed: now for first meal, let it be a breakfast strictly and not a full meal; it should be a mash made about as follows: at least half of the bulk should be lucern leaves or lucern put through a cutting machine and cut into one-third or half inch lengths; about one-fourth shorts, one-eighth bran, and one-tenth meat scraps and bone broken up; put your potato peeling, after being boiled, into the mash and put it into a bucket and the night before pour boiling water (milk is better) over the whole mass; cover with a sack to keep in the steam, and by morning it will be nicely cooked. Now feed your birds, not upon the ground, but have a board about three feet long and six inches wide and spread the feed upon it, so all can have an equal chance; and what they have not eaten in five to ten minutes take away from them; scrape your feed-board clean and hang it up for next morning. Their feed should be given early in the morning, not 9 o'clock, but 6:30 or 7 according to the daylight; if you watch your fowls they are ready for business at daylight. At 11 o'clock some wheat, oats or barley should be given them—not too much; bury it (in leaves, chaff, sand, in the soil or anywhere to make them work for it); you can do this with a garden rake or hoe. Then feed at 2 o'clock and again at 5 o'clock. Don't feed corn. Keep them clean by removing their droppings, use plenty of coal ashes (not wood) or lime, both as whitewash, and dust in your house or coop and yard. Don't overfeed. Give trimmings of cabbage, lettuce, water-cress—chopped up fine—and if you will do the above, you will have fertile eggs and young chickens that will grow like weeds if properly fed and will be free from roup, gapes, colds, scaly leg and the ill of chickhood. But, as I said before, this means work, work! Keep down the lice by taking lard and insect powder mixed, rub it well into the feathers upon the back of the head and put some upon the bare place under the wings; take the chickens by the feet and hold feet up and dust insect powder into their feathers and lice will die as nits, which means to you less feed and more eggs and increased vitality.

Now, Mr. Editor, I had better stop, or you will "waste basket" this. But we want that hen that will lay from 175 to 225 eggs per year and begin to lay them in November, when eggs are 30 cents per dozen. This is the foundation that I have in my weak way mapped out whereby we can build her up.

G. H. C.

LOOK AT THIS!

The New York city Fishing Gazette, January 18th, current year, on page 5, has this to say in favor of fish food and the pockets of the consumer: "The average cost of the fish sent to the markets of Philadelphia, New York, Detroit, Chicago and Buffalo, during the year 1898, was not more than one and one half cents per pound."

Compare this, if you please, with cost of rearing and marketing the beef, mutton and pork, ton for ton, sent to the said markets during the same period, and what would be the result of our findings in the premises?

It is estimated by close observers, that horses, kine and sheep will eat three pounds of the best hay (or its equivalent in other foods) every twenty-four hours, for every one hundred pounds of their gross weight, and that this amount will keep them in good condition, but if the horse or ox works hard his needs become greater. Now add to this the consequential cost to the owner of domestic animals, such as labor of feeding, fencing, herding and marketing, and we have a grand pecuniary margin in favor of the fish farmer.

Respectfully, M.

CHURCH THEOLOGY CLASS.

The class was opened with prayer by Elder S. Clawson. In considering incidental questions, it was stated that many queries had been submitted which were simply a repetition of subject-matter already discussed in the class and time would not be taken to answer such. Several more advanced questions had been answered by letter. The review upon leaflet No. 11 was then continued and concluded.

Dr. Talmage next proceeded to lecture on the fifth article of faith, reviewing the points taken up at the last session. To the instances of unauthorized administrations followed by terrible punishment were added the cases of Uziah as recorded II Chron. 26, of Semei's sons as related in Acts 19th chapter, 13-17. It was not an unlooked-for occurrence to see the same evil among the children of men today for numerous prophecies had been made in the days of the Apostles of Christ concerning false teachers, who should arise.

In the present dispensation divine authority was not only claimed by the true followers of Christ but had also been received from proper sources. The Aaronic Priesthood was bestowed on Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery through John the Baptist, who last held the keys of that priesthood and who stated that he was acting under the direction of Peter, James and John. The last mentioned came soon afterwards and conferred the Melchisedek Priesthood on the Prophet Joseph. This highest Priesthood holds authority to administer and officiate in all the ordinances of the Gospel. True, there is another church which claims to have that authority, stating that the Priesthood had never been taken from the earth and that to it belonged the right of descent from Peter. But the scriptures informed us that there should be a "falling away" and a restoration of the Gospel. It is this restored Priesthood that the Latter-day Saints claim to hold. In this connection the subject of predestination was also briefly considered, it being stated that God predestinates none to eternal happiness or misery except as they merit one or the other. In proof of men's pre-existence and fore-ordination, the word of God concerning Abraham, Christ and others was quoted.

President Jos. F. Smith being invited to address the class briefly reviewed some of the subjects considered. He was pleased to see such large numbers (the attendance being over 1,200) interested in the university class. He admonished the students to profit by these lessons and above all seek the Spirit of God, by which the truths advanced could be best understood, the Holy Ghost bearing witness to every humble soul of the same. Closing prayer was offered by Elder Reuben Clark.

MANUSCRIPT OF A TESTAMENT.

No fewer than 1,760 ancient manuscript copies of the New Testament in whole or in part exist, their abundance markedly contrasting with the small number which have come down to our own day of the classical writers. As no miracle has been wrought to preserve copyists from error, the last century added up 80,000 various readings in the New Testament manuscript; and the present one has increased the number to 150,000. Some interesting particulars are given in the "Sunday School Teacher's Bible Manual" for December. Only the merest fraction of them are of any consequence; and their number, and the fact that they were made originally in different parts of the world and from a variety of manuscripts, enable Biblical students to detect and eliminate the errors and approximate to the original text more closely than if the various "readings" were fewer. This tedious but necessary work has been carried out with untiring energy. The New Testament manuscripts fall into two divisions: "Uncials," written in Greek capitals, with no distinction at all between the different words, and very little even between the different lines; and "Cursive," in small Greek letters, and with divisions of words and lines. Professor Roberts dates the change between the two kinds of Greek writing about the tenth century. Only five manuscripts of the New Testament approaching to completeness are more ancient than this dividing date. The first, numbered by Biblical critics A, is the Alexandrian manuscript. Though brought to this country by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople, as a present to Charles I., it is believed that it was written, not in that capital, but in Alexandria; whence its title. It is now dated in the fifth century, A. D. The second (known as B) is the Vatican manuscript. It has been in the Vatican library from 1475 or an earlier period, but not till A. D. 1859 was an edition of it published, and that one, by Cardinal Mai, when issued, was uncritical and of little value. But in 1888 a facsimile of it came forth, so that now it is fully accessible to scholars. The Vatican manuscript dates from the middle of the fourth century, if not even from an earlier period. The third (C), or the Ephraem manuscript, was so called because it was written over the writings of Ephraem, a Syrian theological author—a practice very common in the days when writing materials were scarce and dear. It is believed that it belongs to the fifth century, and perhaps a slightly earlier period of it than the manuscript A. The fourth (D), or the manuscript of Beza, was so called because it belonged to the reformer Beza, who found it in the monastery of St. Irenaeus in A. D. 1562. It is imperfect, and is dated in the sixth century. The fifth (called Alpha) is the Sinaitic manuscript obtained in 1844 by Professor Tischendorf from the monks belonging to the convent of St. Catherine, on Mount Sinai. It contains the whole New Testament. It is believed that it was made in the fourth century, and its value to the Biblical critic is very great. Any other "uncial" manuscripts that exist are only fragmentary. The cursive manuscripts, though numerous, are of too late a date to stand on the same level for critical purposes as the "uncials." It is possible indirectly to gain access in whole, or in part, to the readings in manuscripts which have perished. There were early versions of the New Testament in different languages, such as the Syriac, etc. In many cases these were made from manuscripts not now existing, but the translation shows what the original must have been. Christians of the early ages, like those now living, were accustomed formally to quote, or informally to allude to, particular Scripture passages. When there is reason to believe that it was done with precision, it is easy to ascertain from their writings what the original reading was in the manuscript of the New Testament in their possession.—Public Opinion.

A Mrs. Kate Davis is anxious to obtain a legal separation from her husband, so she has filed a complaint for divorce in the superior court at Oakland, Cal. The lady has no use for lawyers. She has signed the complaint as her own attorney and proposes to push the case through the courts on her own account. She has drawn up the document in legal form and has made her charges in a way which would reflect credit upon a professional. It is the wife's intention to try and avoid paying attorney's fees.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

Chairman Seegmiller of the board of commissioners to locate university lands has just sold 160 acres of land in Cache county, receiving for the same $842.80, and 80 acres in Sevier county, the purchase price being $282.65. The board has also received applications for the sale of 600 additional acres in Cache county.

The Commissioners to locate university lands have sold to Edward Hanson, county surveyor of Cache county, representing nineteen claimants or settlers, 1,490 acres of land in Cache county, the purchase price of which was $8,959, the payment on which amount was covered into the university fund.

A boy named William Hegstrom was accidentally shot in the leg at Five Points, near Ogden, on Wednesday while playing with a revolver. The ball lodged in the fleshy part of the leg and was extracted by a surgeon. The wound, while a painful one, is not regarded as a very serious one. It is expected that Willie will be careful when he handles a gun next time.

A subscriber of the NEWS writes from West Jordan under date of the 4th inst., giving an account of a very pleasant missionary farewell party given at that place last week in honor of Elder Henry Turner who left for the Southern states on Saturday last. The party was well attended and a substantial purse was made up and presented to Elder Turner.

Monday as William LeGrange, a 15-year-old boy, was leading a horse along Twenty-fifth street, says Tuesday morning's Ogden Standard, the animal fell upon him, crushing him to the earth, and inflicting injuries which may be serious. He was badly bruised and his left leg was terribly cut and lacerated. He was resting as comfortably as possible last night, after a physician had dressed his wounds.

There seems to be trouble brewing for the new Smithfield city government. The one saloon of the town petitioned the city council for a reduction in the rate of license, which was granted; but where the trouble comes in is that the rate was made much lower than the Territorial statutes allow, and those who favor high license talk of entering suit against the mayor and city council.

Daniel Tyler, of Beaver, writes under date of January 26:

In your semi-weekly issue of the 23rd inst., under heading "Correcting a Handcart Incident," Elder J. Jaques says: "The rations of flour came down to four ounces per head per day." He should have added, "for adults, children under ten years of age two ounces per day, with one day's rations left when relief came from Salt Lake." Bro. Jaques will doubtless recollect this fact when his attention is called to it. I was counselor to Bro. Martin and cannot be mistaken.

Coroner Taylor was notified at 5 o'clock February 2 of the sudden and unexpected death of Eben Miller, a gentleman whose place of residence was between Tenth and Eleventh East on Fifth South street. It appears that the family had been in straitened circumstances for some time past and Mrs. Miller, wife of the deceased, has been compelled to go out washing, a service that she did yesterday, leaving her husband, who has been slightly unwell, at home in bed upstairs. On her return in the afternoon she went to his room and much to her astonishment and sorrow he was dead.

Logan city is likely to be involved in a number of law suits shortly, as the new council has repudiated all outstanding warrants, on the ground that the city, owing to a reduction of 25 per cent on the assessed valuation made on account of the hard times, had exceeded its borrowing capacity at the time the outgoing council issued the warrants, making the issuance illegal. The amount is not very large, being principally the salaries of outgoing officers. The question now arises if it was illegal to pay for the services of the old officers, can the new ones be legally paid?

A lad named Anthon Sorensen, who is between 16 and 17 years of age, was badly hurt at Jensen's mill on the Island, Logan, on last Thursday. A mitten he was wearing on his right hand was caught by a set screw in one of the numerous pulleys. He pulled back with all his force to prevent his arm from being wound around the shaft, and managed to escape with the loss of his thumb, from which the flesh was completely stripped. Dr. Parkinson afterwards sawed the bone off, thus completing the amputation. The boy's parents are in Norway.

During the trial of the Gaylor case February 6 Judge Merritt called attention to a book which laid before him, and which he said the family of one of the gentlemen of the jury was anxious the juror should be allowed to have for leisure reading. As the trial is expected to last all the week, it had been probably thought he would want something to while away his spare time after the adjournment of court each day. His honor thought, however, the juror had better devote all his attention to the case and not trouble about the book at present. So the volume was withheld.

Through the courtesy of Ny Fong and Ny Sam, a dinner was given Feb. 5th at the store of Shang Hai Company, 277 south, East Temple street, the occasion being the celebration of the Chinese New Year. The dinner was given in honor of the teachers and members of the Chinese Sabbath school, which is under the auspices of the First Congregational society of this city. The menu consisted of a large variety of Chinese delicacies and sweetmeats, which were prepared with much care and good taste. The table presented a very neat appearance, and the hosts seemed to enjoy the occasion as much as their guests.

BEAVER, Utah, Feb. 6.—A shock of earthquake creating quite a sensation occurred at Kanosh, Millard county, on Sunday evening about 8:30 o'clock.

It was experienced all over the town, but from the rattling of the glass and crockeryware on the shelves indicating the shock, it was felt more severely in the south end of the town than in the other parts. The vibrations were from the southwest to the east, inclining in the direction of the old volcanic hills and lava beds southwest of that place.

Another shock was distinctly experienced at the same place and direction at 8 a. m. this morning. No serious damage so far reported.

The Cassia county, Idaho, Times says that John Barrett was killed by his team dragging him to death on Monday Jan. 29th., on the south-east part of the Traumer ranch in the upper end of the Basin, about six miles south-west of Albion. His nephew was about fifty yards ahead of him when the team started. He lived only about thirty minutes, but never spoke. His skull was fractured and he was otherwise badly bruised. He was past sixty-three years old. He has two sons, one in Pocatello and the other in Bear Lake county. He had lived but a short time in the Basin, and in that short time had had made many fast friends.

In the Third district court February 1st Jas. McGregor and Clarence Cary, receivers of the Utah Central Railway company, filed a petition asking permission to issue receivers' certificates to the amount of $100,000, the same to be used for the payment of pressing claims against the company, to enable them to successfully operate the road. The certificates are to be secured by a first lien on the property. The petition, which was granted, sets forth that it is necessary to pay $28,409.47 at once to parties who have furnished equipment for the road and of the remainder $55,000 to be used to secure a loan. The total indebtedness of the road is placed at $188,804.36.

There was a sensational find in the lobby of the post office February 6th about eight o'clock. The discovery was made by Officer Busby of the police force.

He observed a small bundle lying on a desk and picking it up was surprised to find that within the bundle was the prematurely-born body of an infant. It was first wrapped up in a piece of white muslin about the size of a handkerchief. Next to this was a copy of the Salt Lake Herald of January 31 of the present year.

In the bundle there was also a piece of paper bearing the words: "Little Charlie Pavey." Also a piece of envelope with the trade mark of Mr. Jenkins, the local music dealer.

Oscar Lyons Cluff breathed his last at 10:20 on Sunday evening at the home of his sister, Mrs. Mary A. Bohard, Provo, where he has been since October last.

He was born in Provo City, U. T., July 6th, 1862, being 31 years, six months and twenty-seven days old. He was the son of David and Sarah A. Flemings Cluff. In March, 1879, he was taken with diphtheria and never fully recovered from its effects. In December, 1884, his health was still further shattered by an attack of hemorrhage of the stomach. A two years' trip to Arizona partially restored him, but last October he sustained another attack of hemorrhage, which brought on dropsy and at last caused his death. He was married to Miss Nellie Houtz on Christmas night in 1888. A wife and two children are left to mourn his loss. He was a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

Friday afternoon Thomas Cornell died at his home in this city, of paralysis and pneumonia. Brother Cornell had been a patient sufferer for the past three years from one of the ailments which contributed to his death, and about three weeks ago his sufferings became very acute. The deceased was 59 years of age, and a native of London, England.

Elder Cornell came to Utah in 1887. For eight years prior to that date he was president of the North London branch of the Church, and in that capacity will be well remembered by the missionaries who labored in that part of the country. He was faithful and energetic in all his duties, his life being that of a consistent Latter-day Saint. He was a quiet, unassuming man, firm in his religious convictions, and possessed of the faculty of making friends of those with whom he became associated. In this regard he did a good work in spreading the Gospel. A host of friends will sympathize with the family in their bereavement.

There was a most serious and lamentable accident at Tooele on Saturday last about noon. The victim was Grover, the nine-year-old son of Hon. Charles McBride, now a member of the lower branch of the Territorial Legislature. He had been out hunting with a small boy named Marshall.

His gun was a 22-caliber rifle in which bird shot was used, there being seventy of these tiny pellets in each cartridge. After having done some firing the gun was cleaned and Grover put the muzzle to his right eye and looked down the barrel for the purpose of seeing how well the work had been done.

Unfortunately his companion had inserted a cartridge after the cleaning without his knowledge and in some manner (perhaps how will never be known) it was exploded, the full charge of shot entering and completely destroying the eye and lodging at the side and back of the brain.

The injured eye was removed by Doctors Pfoutz and Richards and a good many of the shot and pieces of fractured bone taken out. All of the shot could not, however, be extracted at this juncture of the case.

Information has been received from Ephraim, Sanpete county, to the effect that an old man at that place named Bernard Hansen has just been found guilty of a piece of quiet stealing that has covered a period of several years and the gradual turning away of small sums of money until it ran up into the thousands.

Hansen is an old bachelor and a number of years ago was given employment by the managers of the co-op. store. For a long time he was regarded as a model of honesty and trustworthiness. His work was that of cleaning out the store to which he had free and unlimited access.

Some time ago the management became suspicious and marked some of the scrip issued by the store. Later it was ascertained that the marked scrip had been converted into cash by Hansen. His room was searched and $1,900 in gold found in an old trunk. He confessed that all but $400 of this amount had been stolen by him. He now thinks that the money is "wind-fall" for the store and that he should be exonerated.

The following was filed with the Weber county court, and is self-explanatory:

Ogden, Utah, Jan. 30, 1894.—To the Hon. County court of Weber county: Gentlemen: Your attention is respectfully called to the fact that between March 2, 1891, and August 30, 1892, there was illegally appropriated from the county funds of Weber county to A. C. Bishop the sum of $1,547.10, on account of "salary" as probate judge.

Such appropriations were held by the Supreme Court of Utah to be illegal in the case of Barton vs. Cutler, decided by said Supreme Court in June, 1890, and reported in Vol. VI, Utah reports, page 409. Therefore, all of said sum of $1,547.10 was illegally appropriated, as it was all appropriated after the decision in the case of Barton vs. Cutler was rendered.

I therefore demand, as a taxpayer of Weber county, that you immediately order a writ instituted to recover said amount, together with interest thereon from the several dates of payment.

Respectfully,

DANIEL HAMER.

Following is a copy of a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce Feb. 6, copies of which have been forwarded to the Speaker of the House and President of the Council:

Whereas, there have been a number of financial bills introduced in the present Legislative Assembly which are calculated to prevent money from coming into this Territory for mortgage investment, some of said bills abolishing the distinction between deeds of trust and mortgages; and,

Whereas, Others of said measures provide for the double taxation of mortgaged property, and others still limit the power of the citizens to enter into contract one with another where money considerations are involved, therefore,

Be it resolved, That this Chamber of Commerce, representing the business interests of Salt Lake City, views with alarm the possibility of the enactment into laws of such pernicious and destructive measures and most solemnly protests against such action.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the members of this Chamber, that the passage of such injurious laws will drive out some investment companies now doing business in Utah, as well as prevent others from entering this field, thus lessening the competition for mortgage loans and thereby increasing the rate of interest and making it more difficult for the borrower to procure a loan.

Resolved, That as there are at present many millions of dollars of foreign capital invested in Utah loans, both on deeds of trust and mortgages, most of which will mature this year and next, and as the amount of said maturing loans is far beyond the capacity of Utah capital and local financial institutions to absorb, we are appalled at the contemplation of the distress and ruin to be wrought by the proposed legislation, which may prevent the renewal of said loans or the procurement of other moneys to replace the same.

Resolved, That during the present unparalleled depression, panic and stringency in the money market, we deem it an act of unequaled folly to disturb by adverse and hostile legislation the well earned reputation of Utah for conservatism and the good faith of its people, in dealing with financial matters.

TARIFF PASSES THE HOUSE.

Washington despatch, January 31.—The tariff debate, on the Wilson bill closed today with a burst of oratory. Crisp, Reed and Wilson came forward in the closing hours to argue for and against the inauguration of the new economical system. The galleries of the House were crowded long before the session opened, and the leaders on both sides were accorded an ovation as they entered the hall.

Reed arose from the Republican side amid wild cheering and handclapping in the galleries and the huzzas of his friends. When quiet was finally restored, with his back to his friends and his face to his foes, towering in defiance, he began his address.

Throughout Reed's speech he was frequently interrupted by applause, and even the Democrats at times joined in the laughter at his witticisms. At the close he was greeted with a spontaneous and long continued burst of applause, and he was warmly congratulated by his friends.

While the demonstration was still in progress Crisp relinquished the chair to Hatch, of Missouri, and took his seat on the floor of the House. When order was restored he was recognized to reply to Reed. Until he warmed up he spoke with hesitation, but as he became warmed his words came in a perfect torrent, sweeping resistlessly over all opposition and he was encouraged by the hearty applause of his Democratic associates.

Wilson, chairman of the ways and means committee, at once arose to close the debate. He was greeted with great cheers. He opened with sarcastic replies to Burrows (Mich.) and Dolliver (Iowa). Turning to the subject in hand, he eloquently portrayed the advance of freedom. "This bill," he said, "is one of those advances; no McKinley bill could stem the advance of human progress. Great causes could not be laughed or ridiculed away, and the gentleman from Maine could not draw from his armory of sarcasm and wit to stop the advance of this cause of the lightening of burdensome taxation."

As Wilson closed, Tucker and several others sprang forward and as wave after wave of applause echoed through the chamber they lifted him from his feet to their shoulders and bore him up the aisle. When let down, he received the enthusiastic congratulations of his conferees. It was a demonstration such as is seldom seen in Congress. Business was at a standstill twenty minutes on account of the disorder.

INDUSTRIES, COMMERCE AND MINES.

Harold M. Plitt, local superintendent for Bradstreet's agency has completed the following statistical report of Utah failures:

January, 1894, 28 failures, liabilities $271,985; assets $215,071; December, 1893, 19 failures, liabilities $204,660, assets $118,448; January, 1893, 28 failures, liabilities $222,548, assets $149,426.

The closing of the house of Goldsmith and company in Utah, can hardly be classed as a local failure. The firm's headquarters are in Baltimore, Md. There are two branches in Utah, one in Washington and one in Butte. These dependent stores could not be held separately responsible for the collapse of the house.

Eight of the total of 28 failures occurred in Salt Lake City, and although this number is over 83% per cent of the whole, the liabilities make but little more than 4 per cent of the total liabilities. In the face of the many dire predictions so freely made of financial disaster that would come with the new year, the actual record is at once surprising and gratifying.

By the utmost conservatism in buying, and economy in business, the majority of local merchants have reduced liabilities to probably one-third of what they were a year ago and although there are very few that have any more than held even, still the knowledge of their safe position gives a feeling of confidence that would not be warranted by the volume of business available. Collections continue hard; in the country they are found almost impossible and the stocks of both retailers and jobbers have been greatly reduced to afford means for the heavy liquidations of the past year.

"How do our local merchants sustain home industries? Is it by keeping the home manufactured goods in the background?" asked a gentleman of a News representative.

Then the gentleman went on to relate three incidents which he stated occurred in a large business house in this city.

Number one was that a customer went into the grocery division and asked for cheese, an article was produced when the customer remarked, "That is not home-made, is it?" "Oh, no," was the response. "I don't want it; I want home-made cheese." "We haven't any," was the reply, and the customer made the purchase elsewhere.

Incident number two was at the counter where they sell shoes. A customer came in for a pair, and the eastern article was produced. "Haven't you got anything made at home?" said the customer. "Oh, yes," said the clerk; and a pair of first-class shoes made at Z. C. M. I. factory was brought forward and purchased.

No. 3 was at the dry goods counter; flannel being what the customer desired. Promptly the imported goods were dropped to the counter. "I wish something better than this. Haven't you home-made flannel?" In a half-apologetic manner, as though the home-made was looked on as inferior instead of superior to the other, an excellent quality of Provo flannel was brought and a purchase made.

Whether these instances are a sample of the way local merchants bring home industries to the front, is what the inquirer wanted to know. It is a question that is of interest to the merchants as well as to customers.

There is a movement on foot to use the water power of the great Shoshone Falls, Snake river, Idaho, for manufacturing and other enterprises, among them a railroad. The Boise Statesman says that negotiations have been in progress for some time regarding this road and recently State Treasurer Hill received a letter from a New York capitalist, who became interested in the enterprise some time ago, stating he was satisfied money could be raised, not only to build and operate the road, but to put in an extensive electric plant to furnish power for mines and manufacturing which the same men would doubtless put in operation as soon as sufficient power was assured. The gentleman asked Mr. Hill to forward him plans showing the ground, and other information. Of course the syndicate it is proposed to form will want to control all the water power. Other parties claim to have rights in that direction but if they be relinquished there is little doubt the gigantic enterprise would be pushed to completion. The length of the proposed electric railroad will be forty miles.

Iron county Record: A great many people are looking to southern Utah as a locality that offers many advantages for homes, investments and the establishment of business enterprises. As our many natural resources are becoming better and more widely known, this interest is becoming quickened, and by spring we look for a great influx into this region. The inducements offered by Iron county in the way of large tracts of arable land, immense deposits of iron and coal, and other resources, together with the bright outlook for railroad facilities in the near future, will draw many of the home seekers and capitalists here, and by another year we predict that there will be a great change in the appearance and condition of Cedar City. By then, we believe, we will have a railroad up Coal Creek to our vast coal deposits, and another one across the valley to the mountains of hematite and magnetic iron ore which abound there; iron furnaces and foundries will be in full blast, manufacturing establishments will be under way, and this city will present a scene of commercial and manufacturing activity.

The fruit growers of Weber county met Saturday afternoon in Ogden for the purpose of organizing a fruit growers' union. G. S. Geddes was elected temporary chairman and I. T. Albert secretary. Considerable enthusiasm was manifested and addresses were made by G. S. Geddes, E. G. McGriff, H. T. Peterson, George Smuin, D. Peebles, J. N. Barker and others. A committee was appointed to draft constitution and by-laws, to report next Saturday, members being selected from the following places: Ogden, North Ogden, Mound Fort, Farr West, Pleasant View, Riverdale, Plain City, Wilson, Burch Creek, West Weber, Kanawville, Hooper and Uintah.

Next Saturday afternoon there will be a general meeting of all the fruit growers to hear and discuss the committee's report.

The Davis county Clipper has an eye to business and puts in a bid for the Utah University. The location it suggests is between Bountiful and Centerville, twelve miles north of this city, where a square mile of land could be easily obtained, with ample water supply. The Clipper adds: The climate is excellent for all kinds of agricultural products and cannot be surpassed for an experiment station anywhere in Utah. This point is between the capital of the Territory and the next largest city; the two cities contain about one-third of the population of our Territory. The people living north, east and south could easily reach it, there being excellent railroad facilities. Students from Salt Lake could attend the school as cheaply as if it were located at Fort Douglas or any suburb of Salt Lake City.

Mr. William Pearson brings in a good sized sample of his Beaver coal. The quantity was sufficient to give the mineral a successful test. It was burned in a cook stove and made a rapid and vigorous blaze, developing an immense amount of heat. Of the entire peck which we burned there was not a teaspoonful of waste, ashes included. The coal seemed to be full of the elements of good fire and heat. Mr. Pearson says he has already been inquired of as to the value of his claim, and this, too, by railroad parties. A representative of the U. N. & C. called upon him respecting his mine, but Pearson stated that he had not sufficiently developed the prospect to know what its value is, and could therefore not talk intelligently on the matter. The coal beds lie within eight miles of Beaver city.

The American Fork Item says it feels to rejoice that it is visited every day by people calling for location notices to stake gold claims in the vicinity. It seems that quite high grade ore can be found in and around the city, but not hardly sufficient to justify mining without a mill in close proximity. But the yellow metal is here, and all it needs is experienced men with money and push to get right in and develop these prospects. It is claimed that one man in this city found gold in his back yard. A bright future has American Fork in store. Ere the opening of spring, we learn that those owning mines in American Fork canyon will resume work upon them, although those mines are principally silver and lead.

The city board of education has had presented for its consideration a proposition to put in a new material for ceilings, sidewalks and wainscoting in the school houses to be erected. The suggested substitute for plaster and wood is iron or steel plating, enameled and decorated. It is claimed that this system is more durable, substantial and ornamental than the old method, is not inflammable, and is as healthful as the lime plastered walls. It can be decorated in imitation of wood, onyx, marble or other material. The board, however, will make no change in the usual style of constructing buildings until it shall be warranted by thorough investigation and ample experience.

Coalville Chronicle: F. H. Wright returned yesterday from a business trip to Evanston and Almy, Wyo. Mr. Wright informs us that the times in that section are in much more depressed condition, many having left Almy for Rock Springs and other more prosperous towns in eastern Wyoming; he also stated that many were stranded there and have no means with which to leave; that the No. 6 mine had resumed work on a small scale, but those who were given employment were the ones who were indebted to the company and were given an opportunity to get enough to help them to leave. The company has given all those who wish to leave a pass to the eastern part of the state.

Rexburg, Idaho, Silver Hammer: Wm. Hill, of the firm of Dwight & Hill, informs us that his firm contemplate establishing a packing house at Market Lake in the near future. They will have a slaughter house and buy and drive live stock there for killing and packing. They establish it at Market Lake so as to be at a shipping point and can thus put their manufactured sausage, head-cheese, etc., on the markets at Butte, Salt Lake or Ogden in a much shorter time than by having to haul it from here to the railroad.

Commencing tomorrow, Feb. 1, the new scale of wages on the Salt Lake City railway goes into effect. The men are brought down two cents per hour. The reduction is not so heavy as on the Rapid Transit line, where the men had to submit to a cut of two and a half cents per hour.

The wages previously paid was 20 cents per hour, and the men had to work twelve hours a day. Now the rate on the Salt Lake road is 18 cents per hour, and on the Rapid Transit line 17½ cents per hour.

Richfield Advocate: Mr. Peter Christensen, Elsinore's favorite postmaster, was in town Monday. He reports everything lively, and the sugar factory all the talk; the gentleman says he has $25 to give the enterprise as a gift, but does not expect anything from the Legislature. He says there are many others in the same good humor, and will take stock in the same if it is a go. Their water works are a huge success. By the way this is a hint to Richfield, Glenwood and several other places which need waterworks.

Charles Caldwell, of this city, is part owner in the Bonanza mine, located six miles from Weatherby, Oregon. Today he received the following from the foreman at the mine: "I have one man driving a crosscut for the ledge from the main tunnel, and two men sinking on the pay chute in the first crosscut. The quartz continues good. I will double the force in a few days and push the work. The snow is about eighteen inches deep from the mine up to the timber."

The Provo mills management received word from California of the payment of the first installment on the contract for furnishing the cloth for the Golden state's militia uniforms. The mills are still working on the contract, which probably will not be completed for another six weeks.

The new 80-horse power boiler just put in at the woolen mills has been started up, and is working satisfactorily.

John Farr and others have taken up and located a dam site south of St. George on the Virgin, above the Beaver dam wash, at what is known as the narrows of the Virgin. The object of this is to bring under cultivation about 3,000 acres of very excellent land. Timber is abundant in the adjacent hills. The land is described as being most beautifully located and will make a lovely townsite.

Ephraim Enterprise: If present indications are any criterion, this year will prove one of the most prosperous this city and county have experienced for years. The immense amount of snow that is piled up in the mountains assures a good crop next season and besides that there are a number of good prospects in the neighborhood of this city that will be developed as soon as the snow goes off.

The people of Sevier county appear determined to have a sugar factory. On Saturday afternoon a mass meeting is to be held in Richfield to consider the subject of embarking in the great industry. Several of the Sevier valley towns have offered inducements for the plant, mostly in the way of water power, land and labor. An effort is to be made to have other counties co-operate with Sevier.

Hon. Orson Smith, of Logan, says the Cache Valley people are hopeful over the prospects for the coming season. There has been plenty of snow in the mountains to insure a bountiful supply of water, the winter has not been severe in the valley, the fall grain is growing nicely, and everything is indicative of a prosperous condition for the agricultural interests, and consequently for others as well.

Prof. Cederstrom is in town and has brought some excellent samples of onyx which he has taken from a lower depth in the quarry than has been worked heretofore. The specimens show remarkably fine stone, being superior to that on which the owner took the World's Fair prize.

Ogden Standard: Everything seems to indicate better times ahead for Ogden. Collections are already getting easier, and the building outlook for the coming season is promising. Travel on the railroads is increasing, and as a consequence business with the hotels is getting better.

A four-foot body of as pretty galena ore as was ever encountered in West Mountain mining district, is a recent strike at the Tiwauakee mine. The more work done, the more and richer quality of ore is found on this property.

One of the greatest unsolved problems which is before the Beaver community is to provide employment at home for the host of young people in our city.

A great number of young men have gone from Minersville to work on the mines near Goode's Springs. Some eighteen are already there working in one mine.

THE LEGISLATURE.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31.

The House committee on public health to whom have been referred three or four bills relating to the practice of medicine, and also the report of the Territorial examining board which recommends numerous and important amendments to the present law "regulating the practice of medicine," has held several informal sessions, but last evening gave the first hearing to physicians. The medical gentlemen who appeared before the committee were of the eclectic school, viz., Drs. Hasbrouck, Dogge, Murphy and De Mouco. These gentlemen were much opposed to many features of the present law, and were inclined to favor the bill introduced in the House by Stanford (H. B. 61). This measure proposes to create a board of examiners to consist of seven members, of whom three shall be regular physicians, two homeopathic and two eclectic. This bill requires a diploma to be presented before license is granted to practice medicine, surgery or obstetrics; but persons who have been practicing in this Territory for ten years are entitled to a license with or without a diploma. All persons who have practiced less than five years must submit to an examination, the general character of which is specified, but the examination papers will bear a confidential number instead of the name of the applicant, so that the board shall not know who the applicant is. This bill is rather liberal in its provisions relating to midwives, cases of emergency, etc., but makes it an offense to vend nostrums under certain conditions. This bill is a sort of compromise between the stringency asked by the "regulars" and the laxity that would leave opportunity for imposture.

On Thursday or Friday of this week, the House committee on public health will give a hearing to such regular physicians as may wish to appear. From expressions that have been uttered by members of the committee there is a possibility that it will content itself with merely recommending the repeal of the present law, thus leaving the subject of practicing medicine without being regulated by any statute. One member of the committee has taken this position, and Clark, who introduced one of the bills upon the subject, says he will heartily support such a proposition.

Warner's new revenue bill is an effort in the direction of economy. The author today informed a News representative that he had estimated that its passage would effect a saving of $50,000 per year to the Territory. A brief conversation with the gentleman discloses the fact that he has given careful and intelligent consideration to the questions connected with Territorial finance. The bill is a long one, and purports to be a complete revenue code, taking the place of all laws now in force upon the subject, which are scattered through the laws passed in 1888, '90 and '92. In the main it follows those laws and leaves the rates of taxation unaltered.

One prominent change proposed by the bill is to confine the compensation of the county clerk to his fixed salary. He will receive no fees at all for tax sales nor any other acts or services.

The costs of a tax sale are limited to $1, one-half of which goes to the general county fund and the other half to the county school fund. The collector of taxes is abolished and his duties are made to devolve upon the county treasurer. The territorial board of equalization is made to consist of the Governor, secretary, auditor and treasurer, whose compensation is fixed at $100 per annum each. This board may appoint a secretary at $4 per day for actual time. Mileage is fixed at 10 cents one way. The board shall equalize taxes between counties and shall assess the main lines of railroads. But county assessors shall assess depots, territorial properties, branch lines, etc.; also railroad lands in the several counties.

There are numerous minor changes of the present laws relating to revenue proposed in the bill, which appears to have been carefully and conscientiously drawn.

The time lost by the Council while the lead memorial was pending has, it is claimed, been fully made up, and members of that body represent themselves to be engaged industriously in the dignified and conscientious consideration of the business before them.

Up to the commencement of the session today, there had been introduced into the Council 58 bills. The House led the Council with 79 bills. These figures do not include resolutions, memorials, etc. When the large number of claims and petitions, etc., that is now in the hands of committees, is added to the above figures, it will be seen that the committees have a great amount of work in hand, considering the stage of the session.

THURSDAY.

After the close of the News' report yesterday, H. B. 59, amending the present law relating to the platting and laying out of towns, came up on third reading. Its object is to allow plats made in boom times, out in the farming districts, to be relegated to agricultural uses, if the owners so desire.

Consideration of this bill was interrupted by the arrival of the hour fixed for consideration of the mortgage tax bill. Sears asked that the latter bill be made special order for next Wednesday. He had written to San Francisco for data and desired time to prepare to discuss the bill.

Varian, author of the bill, opposed delay. He said this was not a bill to tax mortgages, but to tax debts secured by mortgages. The bill was a proposition to enact what had been, up to two years ago, the law of the Territory for twenty years. Sears said the bill was regarded by business men and financiers as a dangerous measure, and urged delay.

Allen said this bill involved the question. Shall a certain kind of property in this Territory bear its share of the burdens of government? He thought the House was as well prepared to discuss this question now as it would be in a week hence. The House voted against delay.

The bill is as follows:

Section 1. All notes, bonds and other indebtedness, secured by trust deed or mortgage hereafter given, shall be assessed and taxed as other personal property, at its cash value to the owner thereof; and any agreement or promises at any time made by the debtor to directly or indirectly pay or discharge the taxes on any loan procured by or extended to such debtor, shall be null and void, and shall not be enforced in any court in this Territory; provided, the provisions of this act shall not apply to non-resident creditors or mortgagees.

Sec. 2. During January of each year county recorders of the several counties shall furnish the respective assessors with a certified abstract of all mortgages and trust deeds remaining unsatisfied of record, for which the recorder shall receive ten cents for each mortgage or trust deed abstracted, half of the amount to be paid by the county and half out of the Territorial treasury. The auditor of public accounts shall draw his warrant in favor of the recorder for the Territory's proportion of the amount upon proof by affidavit of the service and amount. All indebtedness secured by the mortgages and trust deeds so returned shall be assessed as in the first section of this act provided.

Sec. 3. An act entitled "An act to amend section 2009 of the Compiled Laws of 1888, relating to the exemption from taxation of mortgages and trust deeds, and repealing chapter 49 of the Session laws 1890," approved March 10, 1892, is hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect upon approval.

Varian opened the debate by saying he could not complete his argument in ten minutes, and he desired unanimous consent to take more time. He said this bill had been erroneously contounded in the public mind with another which proposed to tax foreign capital, whereas the present one aimed at nothing of the kind. This bill regarded solvent debts and credits, owned by residents of the Territory, as property which ought to be taxed. The proper standpoint from which to view the question was that of the state, not of the borrower nor of the lender. The state must have revenue or it cannot exist, and revenue laws are necessarily harsh and arbitrary. They ought, however, to lay their burdens on all property with as great a degree of equity as possible. Not more than 40 per cent of the property of this country is in tangible form, 60 per cent of it being in the form of notes, bonds, etc. It was held by some that when a debt was created no new property was brought into existence, but the speaker denied the proposition. Credit was the reputation of being able to pay, and was valuable to a man. Up to two years ago the Legislature of this Territory had held that credit was taxable property. Under the present law a man who holds a $10,000 note which is unsecured, must pay a tax on it, but the man who owns a $10,000 note secured by a mortgage on real estate, pays no tax on it. The speaker dwelt on the injustice of this discrimination. He declared that taxing a solvent debt secured by a mortgage was not double taxation. The question had been considered by nearly every constitutional convention ever held in this country, and by the courts of most of the states, and there was only one dissent from the rule that credits, secured or unsecured, were taxable. The supreme court of California had decided that taxing mortgages was double taxation, but the people reversed that decision when the constitution of 1879 was adopted, for they incorporated in it a clause to the contrary. The common law for ages had spoken of both corporeal and incorporeal property. The speaker read from decisions of courts in Alabama and Louisiana supporting his position. He said the Legislature must do one of the two things if it would be fair with the people: It must tax all credits or it must tax none, regardless of their being secured by mortgage. The threat was made if the bill passed, money lenders would not lend. He denied that there was anything in this threat. If security were offered, money could be borrowed, and questions of taxation and interest were self-adjusting. This Territory was about to assume the untold burdens of statehood, and its legislature would have to determine where to place the burdens of taxation. This Assembly would have to confront the question at its present session, not of borrowing, but of how much to borrow. The speaker deprecated having such legislation as this bill disposed of by stock brokers and commission agents, and closed by asserting that the bill was not one to tax mortgages, but to restore to the taxing powers of the sovereignty a class of property which had been unjustly excluded therefrom.

Hubbard proposed to treat the subject from a practical standpoint. If the bill would add to the burdens of the poor, he would oppose it. He read from the report of the board of equalization rendered in 1892, showing that this was the effect of the old law which this bill re-enacts. He also read a statement made by W. J. Lynch, assessor for Salt Lake county, showing the difficulty and expense of enforcing the old law, and that the cost exceeded the results. The provision of the bill that the borrower should not pay the tax would, the speaker thought, cause an increase in the rate of interest. Home capital would evade the law by being loaned in this Territory in the name of some agent residing in another state, and additional difficulties and burdens would be placed upon the home borrower by the passage of this bill.

At the close of Hubbard's remarks Sears said he would like to be heard on the bill, and the House adjourned with the understanding that the debate would be continued today.

FRIDAY.

One of the first bills introduced in the House was that of Johnson, for an estray law. The live stock committee of the House appears to have given it much consideration, and it is understood that a number of persons interested in the subject were listened to by the committee. According to the statement of Hatch, chairman of that committee, the latter fully realized the difficulties which the subject involved, and came to the conclusion that the bill was better than the present law, and a fair compromise between farmer and stockgrower. It was debated with some earnestness, but finally passed with only two negative votes. It remains to be seen what the Council will do with it. That body is considering a bill upon the same subject introduced by Hart.

The conference committee on printing proved a failure so far as breaking the deadlock that has existed upon that subject for about three weeks. The House decided to insist upon its former action, and the Council did likewise, notwithstanding that a majority report of the conference committee recommended that the latter body recede. The conference committee's report, however, is ambiguous. It does not clearly appear from its terms whether it related solely to the matter of choosing a public printer, or whether it is also intended to cover the awarding of the printing. The joint session to be held this afternoon will doubtless settle the whole printing question.

Something akin to a sensation was created by the reading of the bill, introduced yesterday in the House by Stoker, "to promote the science of medicine and surgery." It is intended to supply medical students and practitioners with subjects for dissection, but its advocates claim that is so guarded as to prevent the use of the remains of any person for such a purpose, if the deceased leave any friends who object. The bodies of persons who die in public, penal or charitable institutions are the ones which the bill contemplates shall be used for the "advancement of medical science." Monson expressed a sentiment of repugnance towards certain propositions contained in the bill, which a number of other members of the House shared, when he moved the rejection of the measure; but a majority of the House seemed to think the subject worthy of investigation at least, and voted down the motion to reject.

The memorial asking Congress to open to settlement the Uintah Indian reservation, passed unanimously after very brief consideration. Should Congress grant the prayer, the choicest lands in all the Wasatch mountain region, will be open to settlement by the whites. The memorial asking for the survey of coal lands, which also passed the House yesterday, will, if granted, have the effect to stimulate the opening of new coal measures.

SATURDAY.

Today is the first Saturday in which the Assembly has met, the three previous Saturdays of the session having been devoted to visiting public institutions. Hon. A. B. Emery, Speaker of the House, in response to inquiries, said to a News representative this morning: "The House is keeping up with its committees, and cleans the table every day. As long as it can do this by holding afternoon sessions only, it will not meet in the forenoon. That portion of the day will be allowed for committee meetings." All indications are to the effect that there will be a heavy rush of work near the close of the session. The Council began forenoon sessions today.

The claim of L. G. Hardy, collector for Salt Lake county, for $1,462, presented in the House today, grows out of the order of the Territorial Board of Equalization adding 10 per cent to the assessment of this county, for 1892, after the first assessment had been made. Many taxpayers will remember the annoyance they were subjected to by having to pay taxes twice for that year. But the trouble grew out of a defect in the revenue law for which the collector was in no wise responsible, and he is entitled to compensation for the work he did.

The financial statement of Washington county makes probably the best showing of any of the county reports, all things considered. Ivins, who hails from that county, says that some years ago the county had so much scrip outstanding that it was greatly depreciated, and the officials at length determined to inaugurate a new policy, which was to redeem all warrants in circulation and then pay cash. For several years the pay cash policy has been pursued, and the result is that today the county is entirely out of debt, has a fine new court house all paid for, and a balance of $6,512.75 in the treasury. It is a small county and labors under many disadvantages, and such a showing is highly creditable to the officials who control its affairs.

For some time before the opening of the session of the House today, Powers was engaged in the preparation of his bill to place the fire and police departments of cities of the first and second classes under non-partisan control. The bill makes the fire department consist of a board of four persons, two of whom of opposite politics, shall be appointed by the city council, the other two, also of opposite politics, to be appointed by the Governor; together with the chief and assistant engineers, and such other fire officers as the City Council may name. This board of four persons, appointed as stated, associated with the chief and captain of police, and such other police officers as the City Council may designate, comprises the police department. The board must establish rules for the government of the two departments, and has general charge of both. Competitive examinations for positions in each department are provided for, and it is made the duty of the board to formulate a code of rules for the government of each. The bill is quite lengthy and deals with an important subject.

JOINT SESSION.

At 8:05 President Breeden called the joint session to order. The rolls of the two houses were called by the respective clerks. The chaplain of the Council offered prayer.

President Breeden announced the object of the joint session to be the consideration of the choosing of a public printer.

J. E. Booth said the minutes of the Council indicated that the object of the joint session would be to choose a public printer, and also award the public printing. President Breeden agreed with Booth, and Taylor moved that the joint session proceed to the election of a public printer.

Taylor nominated "the only person who had offered his services to the committee," J. B. Bloor. Hague nominated Edward H. Callister. Williams seconded the latter nomination in a speech in which he vouched for the qualifications of the candidate. There was but one objection to him, he was a Republican. He was willing to let the Assembly fix his compensation.

H. E. Booth seconded the nomination of J. B. Bloor in an address in which he described the candidate's qualifications, and dwelt on the fact that he was willing to serve without pay. Parsons said the Star Printing company had in a bid for the printing, and Mr. Callister was connected with that company, and therefore ought not to be elected. Varian said he knew but little about this matter, and presumed members generally did not understand it very well. He favored supporting the action of the committee, and should vote for its candidate. Tolton moved that the nominations close. Carried.

The candidates were voted for by name with the following result: Bloor, 81; Callister, 5. The former was declared elected.

Taylor moved that the joint session now proceed to award the printing. Carried. He then said that six bids had been received, and named the bidders.

Williams called for the reading of the reports from the printing committees. Powers asked to have read in connection with the reports certain figures relating to printing. The clerk then read the majority and minority reports of the joint standing committee on printing, and of the conference committee on printing, and the two bids which were in dispute.

Varian moved the adoption of the majority report of the conference committee. Williams moved to amend by substituting "minority" for "majority."

J. E. Booth said there was no question about the good faith of every member of the joint printing committee. He reviewed the facts and figures connected with the bids, showing that Mr. Evans's bid was decidedly the lowest.

Sears moved the previous question; carried, and Williams's amendment in favor of the minority reports of the printing committees was put. The amendment was lost by a vote of 19 to 17. The majority report was then adopted by a vote of 19 to 17.

The joint session minutes were read and adjournment was taken.

The vote of the joint session yesterday, on public printer was:

For Bloor—Breeden, H. E. Booth, J. E. Booth, Eldredge, Lund, Seaman, Taylor, Allen, Clark, Dougall, Hatou, Hubbard, Ivins, Johnson, Mason, McBride, McKay, Monson, Moore, Nebeker, Parsons, Pigman, Powers, Sears, Stanford, Stoker, Tolton, Varian, Warner, Wipes, Emery—81.

For Callister—Councillors Adams, Hague, Hart, Seeley, Williams—5.

The vote on awarding the contract for printing was:

For Salt Lake Lithographic company—H. E. Booth, Taylor, Allen, Dougall, Hatch, Ivins, Johnson, Mason, McKay, Nebeker, Parsons, Pigman, Powers, Sears, Stanford, Varian, Warner, Wines, Emery—19.

For J. A. Evans—Adams, Breeden, J. E. Booth, Eldredge, Hague, Hart, Lund, Seaman, Seeley, Williams, Clark, Hubbard, McBride, Monson, Moore, Stoker, Tolton—17.

MONDAY.

Among members of the Assembly and the general public there is more interest in the financial legislation now pending in the Assembly than in any other measures yet introduced. This interest is not confined to Utah, for agents of money lending institutions in the east are receiving letters from their principals expressive of solicitude as to what the Legislature is going to do about taxing mortgages and trust deeds. Talk upon this subject is rife upon the streets, and certain members of the Assembly have undoubtedly succeeded in attracting to themselves, or rather to their bills, as much public attention as they ought to desire for one term in the Legislature. This week is expected to determine what stand the House will take on certain financial questions. On Wednesday Varian's bill to tax debts secured by mortgages and trust deeds will come up as special order. It is expected that Sears will make a strong and able speech against it, and that it will come to a final vote that day. On Thursday next Johnson's bill to tax mortgages and trust deeds, as a part of the realty, comes up as special order. The prevailing sentiment, as nearly as it can be determined from expressions heard in the halls of legislation, is that this bill will be lost without much of a contest.

The House committee on public health is holding back any report on the bill "to promote the science of medicine and surgery" by furnishing practitioners and students with subjects for dissection, until the current of public opinion relative to the proposition is sufficiently indicated. Such legislation, either actual or proposed, is new to this Territory, and the bill referred to excited sentiments of repugnance when it was first offered. It is asserted, however, that a more deliberate second thought is finding matter in the bill which is deemed at least worthy of candid consideration. Heretofore the committee on public health has been required to bear no very heavy portion of the burden and responsibility of legislation, as a rule, but at the present session the medical law agitation, the veterinary bill and the bill to provide material for the dissecting table, cause the members of that subdivision of the House to feel the weight of their calling.

Shortly before the House met this afternoon a member who was conversing about the union of the University and Agricultural College expressed himself, in very emphatic language, to the effect that Utah was carrying the matter of free education entirely too far. He thought our educational system was outgrowing the Territory as a whole, and that it was time to inaugurate a more conservative policy in this regard. He favored a tuition fee to be charged University and Agricultural College students.

TUESDAY.

The unfolding of a certain plot, which is being matured by a number of prominent citizens of the town from whence good flannel comes, would have been more startling if more sudden, but premonitory intimations of what the town was going to attempt have partially forestalled the sensation that might, and doubtless would, have been created by the sudden springing, on an unsuspecting public and guileless Legislature, of the scheme. Yet there will be general surprise when it is learned that a cold, deliberate and confident purpose exists in Provo to make that place the capital of Utah. The most surprising feature of the matter is the confidence, not to say assurance, of the promoters of the proposition. A bill is being drawn and will shortly be introduced into the Council, designating Provo as the site of the Capitol building, so it is said. The claim is further made that the Southern Utah members will vote solidly for the measure, and that, if a very small amount of support can be secured from the north, it will go through.

The owners of real estate on Capitol hill in this city should see that the northern members are "seen" at once. Logan wants the University and Provo wants the Capitol, and one vote is worth another. But if the University is to go to Logan and the Capitol to Provo, what is to become of Ensign Peak? Kanab will put in a claim for that next, and the metropolis will be dismantled. Where is the chairman of the Capitol grounds commission?

The Provo promoters of this proposition say that 'tis well to remove the Legislature while it is in session, from too close contact with the moneyed influences of the metropolis! How will this argument strike the law-makers? The introduction of the bill is awaited "with interest" but a joke is made insipid by being too long anticipated.

In 1884 a bill was introduced into the Assembly forbidding the sale of toy pistols. It was referred to the committee on militia, was duly considered and reported favorably by that committee, and became a law. So far as memory now recalls, that is the only law in the enactment of which the committee on militia has ever taken an active part since his historic order in relation to militia was promulgated by Governor Shaeffer nearly a quarter of a century ago. And yet there has always been a standing committee on militia, in each house, though it has often been referred to as a standing joke. At this session of the Assembly, however, the House militia committee proposes to take a hand in legislation. Two bills creating a militia are in the hands of that committee, one of which was introduced by H. E. Booth, in the Council, and the other by Allen in the House. Both are long documents. On Friday evening last a joint meeting of the militia committee of the House and Council was held, at which an earnest discussion as to the merits, and comparative merits, of the bill took place. The meeting adjourned to give Allen an opportunity to advocate his bill at a subsequent one. Pigman, chairman of the House militia committee, says he thinks the committee will prepare a bill to create a militia and urge its passage.

This forenoon the House committee on ways and means had a long session for the purpose of considering Warner's revenue bill. It is a very long one and the committee did not finish the reading. Numerous amendments were made to the sections that were considered. While it is premature to say what the report of the committee will be, it is believed the bill will be favorably recommended, but with numerous amendments.

OUR STOCKHOLM LETTER.

STOCKHOLM, Jan. 18.—(Special.)—All the Danish papers deny the truth of the statement, made by the Berlin correspondent of the London Times that some Norwegian politicians were in favor of electing the Danish Prince Valdemar King of Norway, in case the Union between Sweden and Norway should be dissolved.

The Swedish and Norwegian publications deny the rumor most emphatically. Many of them make comments to the effect, that the Berlin journalist must have a very vivid imagination, and one paper comes right out and styles the correspondent "boss liar of all newspaper writers."

***

The extraordinary Diet, convened in 1892, decided that there should be important changes in the somewhat antiquated army of Sweden, with a view to greatly increase its defensive power. The new organization will, however, take a few years to complete.

In times of peace the Swedish army is about 50,000 men, about a fourth being enlisted, but the larger part consisting of so called "Indelta" troops, which are annually called to attend exercises, but, during the greater part of the year, farm the small crofts set apart for their use by the landowners. This military tenure system, which makes a good and useful citizen of the soldier in times of peace, and a good warrior in war time (the famous soldiers of Charles XII were chiefly men of this stamp) is, however, rather expensive, and under the new organization just mentioned, will be chiefly confined to infantry, while the artillery and the greater part of the cavalry will consist of men that have enlisted. Including the enlisted soldiers that have already served their time but have not attained the age of 32 years, it is calculated that in time of war the Swedish standing army would consist of 65,000 men. Besides this, conscription claims every male capable of military service between 21 and 32 years of age (about 325,000 men); the necessary training being imparted, in altogether 90 days, for the cavalry in the first year, and for the other conscripts during the first two years. The "landstorm", about 160,000 men, composed of militiamen between 32 and 40 years of age, is intended only for local defense. The chief fortifications of Sweden are Karlskrona, on the south coast; two fortresses outside Stockholm, viz Vaxholm and Oscar Fredriksborg; and, in the interior, Karlsborg, near Lake Vetterh. A new fort will probably soon be built in the northern part of the country.

The navy consists of 5 first class iron-clads, 6 large and 10 smaller iron-clad monitors, 25 torpedo boats, 10 gunboats of the first class and 6 of the second, and about 25 other vessels, with altogether 200 guns, the crews numbering in all about 5,000 men, not including conscripts to the number of 10,000.

The entire cost of the defence of Sweden by land and sea runs to more than 12 million dollars a year.

***

Sweden possesses vast quantities of ore, and mining has, for several centuries, been one of the chief occupations of her people. In days of yore the copper and silver mines were the most productive, but nowadays iron is the main stay of the Swedish mining interest. Swedish iron, as is well known, is deemed the best in the world. In consequence of its extraordinary quality, it fetches the highest prices in the markets of the world, but the comparatively large cost of production, owing to long freightage and want of coal, has thrown many obstacles in the path of the Swedish iron-works, during the present untiring competition, and the progress made by the Swedish iron trade—as regards quantity—has been greatly impeded by this fact. During the past sixty years the production of pig-iron in Sweden has risen from 100,000 tons to 600,000, but the share Sweden takes in the production of pig-iron for the whole world has decreased to a considerable degree; from more than 7 per cent in 1830 to but 2 per cent at the present time. The figures as to the production of steel (210,000 tons) are far more favorable, great progress having been made of late years, and it must be remembered that Sweden has taken an important part in the improvement of the celebrated invention of Bessemer. Of late years no slight export of iron-ore has taken place, the ore coming both from Central Sweden, and from the famous Gellivara, in Lapland, a true mountain of iron, which is considered capable of supplying the present demands of the whole world, as regards iron-ore for centuries. As it is but a few years since a railroad has been built between Gellivara and the coast, it is as yet too early to express any opinion concerning the development which may attend this Lapland iron trade. Besides iron Sweden produces copper and silver and in the southernmost province, Malmöhus, about 210,000 tons of coal; while the raising of zinc ore is of no slight importance. As regards useful materials there is a good supply of many kinds, but Sweden totally lacks the indispensable article salt.

**

In Sweden, as elsewhere, outward circumstances often put a check on the artistical activity of woman. Her physical strength is inferior to man's, she is subject to domestic restraints, and it is often with difficulty that she can make her talent appreciated. Though she enjoys at present advantages, that were out of her reach in former times, she is always in danger of stopping at dilettantism.

Among lady artists are, however, many richly gifted, who have been able to compete with men, but who during a preceding age would have lacked opportunity to develop their talent.

The most remarkable among them, even on account of the branch she has chosen, is Mrs. Lea Lundgren, better known under her married name, Lea Ahlborn. Her father was engraver of medals at the Royal Mint of Sweden. After having studied abroad and worked at home under the guidance of her father and her brother, who practised the same art, she succeeded her father at his death in 1853. She was the first lady who obtained a government office, which moreover was one of great responsibility.

She has not only engraved all the coins of the Swedish state, but even a number of those issued in Norway and in the United States. Besides this, she has executed most of the medals, stamped in Sweden in later times, and even many foreign countries. Among those may be mentioned the jubilee medal which was issued by the city of New York in 1876, in commemoration of the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America. The number of medals engraved by Mrs. Lea Ahlborn amounts to nearly 400; the largest being the one stamped in commemoration of the 400th centenary of the University of Upsala, holding three inches and a half in diameter.

Mrs. Lea Ahlborn received, in 1863, from the king, the medal "Litteris et Artibus," and she has also been highly honored abroad. She was elected member of the Academy of Fine Arts in 1881, and in 1883 she obtained the great gold medal: "Illis quorum meruerit labores" for 30 years of meritorious public service.

**

Amongst the European countries Sweden takes the precedence in the development of the telephone system. This development depends partly upon the fact that among women plenty of hands can be had at a cheap price. But the telephone service has proved a very unwholesome occupation, so much so even, as to incapacitate women for a service of any long duration, ten years being considered to be the longest period a woman can stand the strain in any of the larger telephone stations.

The telephone-nets are owned partly by the state and partly by private individuals. All the telephone stations are superintended and worked by women.

For the admittance to the telephone service: it is requisite to have testimonials as to "good conduct, fair schooling and a strong constitution."

The lowest wages paid are 360 crowns, the highest 1,800 crowns a year, being the salary of the lady superintendents. The average is 7 hours attendance daily. In some cases vacation is allowed for a fortnight, otherwise no vacation at all.

IMPORTANT TO FARMERS.

Prof. J. W. Sanborn, director of the Utah Experiment Station at Logan, Utah, under date of February 5th, makes the following important announcement.

Editor Deseret News:

Dear Sir—Under the new system of seed distribution recommended by Secretary Morton, the United States Experiment Station will place at the disposal of the Utah Experiment Station seeds to be distributed to those farmers who are desirous of trying the varieties named below, and who will pledge themselves to make a careful trial and to report in full to this station the results of their tests.

I would be pleased to have you announce that any of the varieties of seeds mentioned will be forwarded direct from the national experiment station to farmers in amounts designated by those desiring them, provided it does not exceed the amount necessary to make a full and fair trial.

The kinds of seeds are as follows:

Red Kaffir corn, yellow millo maize, white millo maize, crimson clover, unknown cowpeas, English dwarf Essex rape, Jerusalem corn, viola villosa, spurry, lespedeza striata, serradella, bromus inermis, lathyrus sylvestris, Spanish peanuts, altalfa, melilotus alba, Hester tobacco, Connecticut seed leaf tobacco, Havana seed leaf tobacco, Comstock Spanish tobacco, Drego blood turnip beet, Burbee dwarf Lima bean, Kentucky wonder bean, Sterling peas, melting sugar peas (eatable pods), New York improved egg-plant (thornless), stump-rooted parsnip, snowball cauliflower, New Rose celery, zigzag evergreen sweet corn, Kansas stock melon, Kentucky wonder watermelon, Grand Rapids lettuce, Denver market lettuce, Prize-taker onion, Bermuda red onion, Barteldes glass radish, Prickly winter spinach, Poderosa tomato, Snowball turnip, Golden Ball turnip.

Farmers familiar with the seeds above mentioned will observe that several kinds are adapted to arid regions and dry soil. Others belong to the clover family and have a tendency to improve the soil when the roots are turned under. Others, like rape, are adapted to feeding off the soil by sheep in the fall of the year.

Those desiring these seeds will please write to this office, stating the kinds and amounts of each that they desire.

Very respectfully

J. W. SANBORN,

Director Utah Experiment Station,
Logan, Utah.

UP IN IDAHO.

GROVER, Idaho.

February 4th, 1894.

On February 1st, Bishop C. E. Liljenquist, of Riverside ward, and Bishop A. O. Ingelstrom, of Basalt ward, in company with Elders G. B. Wintle, Isaac Allred and Edward Crofts, came down to our little settlement to organize a branch of the Church. The brethren held three meetings. Elder W. D. Grover was set apart as Presiding Elder, and Elder Justen T. Grover as superintendent of the Sabbath school, with Elder L. W. Wheeler first assistant, Heber White Jr. secretary and Levi Wheeler treasurer. Elder Heber White Sr. is Presiding Teacher, with L. W. Wheeler, Joseph T. Grover and Heber White Jr. as acting Teachers.

The Relief Society was also organized, with Sister Sarah R. Grover as president, Sister Ellen Wheeler, first counselor, Sister Mary Wheeler, second counselor, Elizabeth R. Wheeler, secretary, and Carolina R. Grover, treasurer.

Our Sunday school has got 52 pupils enrolled.

We have got land here for several hundred families, the finest land in the Snake River valley.

If any one wants information in regard to this land, it can be obtained by writing to Bishop C. E. Liljenquist, Blackfoot P. O., Idaho.

GEORGE B. WINTLE.

THE EUROPEAN MISSION.

[Millennial Star, Jan. 23.]

Arrival.—Elder Asmus Jorgensen, of Glendale, Utah, arrived per Cunard steamer Umbria, Sunday, January 7, 1894. He was appointed to labor in the Scandinavian mission.

Releases and Appointment.—Elder F. H. Baugh is released from his labors as Traveling Elder in the Scottish conference, and is appointed to labor in the Birmingham conference.

Elder C. E. Carroll has been honorably released owing to ill health, and returned home December 16, 1893.

A justice of the peace war is imminent in Denver. Justice Harper of South Denver insists that the annexation of that town will give him equal jurisdiction with the four city justices over the whole city, and announces that he will move his office down town and go after a share of the business. The four city justices, it is said, will take prompt steps to throw the matter into court.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30.—Judge Cox, of the District supreme court, this morning declined to grant the application of the Knights of Labor to compel Secretary Carlisle to show cause why he should not be enjoined from issuing fifty millions bonds as proposed.

Senator Faulkner, chairman of the committee on territories subcommittee on Utah, says that Utah's bill will pass the Senate and have a majority of Democratic votes.

Senator White, of California, confirms Faulkner's statement. If any policy of restriction is to be applied to any of the territories it will be found impossible to apply it to Utah; neither does it seem likely that there can be more than a few weeks' delay.

MANSFIELD, Pa., Jan. 30.—Everything in the mining district remained perfectly quiet during the night. There is no doubt, however, that grounds still exist for uneasiness, judging by the sullenness of the men, and it will be necessary to maintain the present

LONDON, Jan. 30.—A dispatch from Oldham says the Rye Mill company's cotton mills of eight thousand spindles have been destroyed by fire. The loss is half a million dollars.

NEW YORK, Jan. 29.—The twenty-fifth annual reunion of the Dolgeville employes, to hear the result of the year's work and receive their share of the profits of the co-operative plan, was held tonight.

It has been Mr. Dolge's custom to invite his employes to a banquet after the annual inventory in January. The costs of these banquets has usually been $500. This time, owing to the closing of the mills and hard times that prevail in Dolgeville, Mr. Dolge decided, instead of giving a banquet, to present his check for $500 for the relief of any extreme distress that may exist among the families of his workmen. He invited the employes to meet him in the new shoe factory, where he addressed them charging the responsibility for the present financial stringency to the policy of the present administration and the Wilson bill.

RIO JANEIRO, Jan. 29.—[Copyrighted by the Associated Press.]—This has been one of the most exciting days Rio has experienced since the commencement of hostilities. The United States naval fleet stationed in the harbor has furnished the excitement. The cause of all the trouble was the treatment which three American barks were subjected to last Saturday by an indiscriminate fusillade from the insurgent warships. The American vessels were the bark Amy, Captain Blackford, Bath, Me., W. S. Wilson; the bark Good News, Captain Myrick, Baltimore, and the bark Julia Rollins, Captain Kiehne, Baltimore.

Saturday, while lying at anchor, all three vessels were endangered by chance shots fired by the insurgents. The three captains appealed for protection to the United States warships and requested that the barks be given an escort to the wharves.

Accordingly the admiral sent an officer to the Aquidaban to ask Gama to have an end put to the reckless gunning. DaGama was apparently in bad humor when the officer arrived, and, with many exclamations of impatience, listened to the recital of the captains' grievance.

When the officer had finished his statement DaGama said, in a sharp tone: "It is not my fault. The American ship captains should know enough to keep themselves and crews out of the range of our guns. I shall not take any notice of this matter."

Admiral Benham was determined to make such a showing as would produce a lasting effect upon the insurgents. He allowed Sunday to pass quietly and, without any appearance that he intended to take further notice cleared for action.

Admiral Benham sent word to the captains of the American vessels that he was prepared to keep his promise, and as soon as they were ready to proceed he would escort them to the wharves.

Captains Kiehne and Myrick weakened, and did not want to accept Benham's offer, but Captain Blackford put his ship in the ranks of the United States war vessels, and a formidable procession started up the harbor. The fleet came quite close to the shore, causing great excitement among the soldiers and civilians on land and the sailors on board the vessels in the harbor. The Amy was conducted safely to the wharf and left there.

ST. PAUL, Jan. 29.—T. K. Stateleer, general agent of the Northern Pacific passenger department, San Francisco, narrates an extraordinary story of separation and reunion. Thirty-seven years ago he and his brother separated, and until a few days ago each thought the other dead. The brother was in the 118th Illinois regiment and captured during the war, and he had not heard of him until a few days ago, when informed that his brother was dying at his home in Todd county, this state. Stateleer hastened to him, and today passed through St. Paul en route to his dying brother's bedside.

DUBLIN, Jan. 29.—The British bark Port La Rock, Captain Forbes, dragged her anchors during a heavy gale yesterday and stranded at Keelcomin this morning. All efforts on the part of the shoremen could not save the wrecked seamen and twenty-five men, including the captain, found a watery grave.

For a time the sailors clung to pieces of wreckage floating about, but one by one they gave up the struggle and were drowned before the eyes of on-lookers, powerless to help them. The vessel was completely broken up.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30.—At the instance of Senator Carey, Wyoming, the commissioner of the general land office has ordered examined all lists of application for patents for lands on the part of the Union Pacific railroad which have been sold in Wyoming, in order that patents may be issued. These lands have in some instances been transferred several times, and final payments have been made to the Union Pacific. The company has complied with all requirements, including the payment of fees and surveying obligations. It appears that there have been no patents issued to the company on lands in Wyoming since 1888. There are to exceed a million acres of land involved, all in the hands of settlers. Carey feels very confident that the issuance of patents will soon follow the promised examination.

GUERDON, Ark., Jan. 30.—News has just been received of a free for all fight with revolvers and knives at a country dance last Saturday night at the house of James Forbes, near Alvina, Clark county. The fight grew out of the free indulgence in a bad quality of whisky. Before it was ended Lewis Jones, Chas Ross and Sam Powell were killed. Walker Jones and Sam Jones were probably fatally wounded and several others were more or less seriously cut or shot.

DENVER, Jan. 30.—A. C. Fisk, of whom Senator Boyd said in the senate today that he had never earned an honest dollar, tonight challenged the senator to fight a duel. The colonel says if the senator does not publicly retract and apologize for the offensive remarks or accept the challenge, he will beat his brains out with a club.

Colonel Fisk is president of the Pan-American Bimetallic association.

LONDON, Jan. 31.—The Pall Mall Gazette announces from reliable source that Gladstone, on account of advancing age and the arduous nature of his duties, has decided to resign before the assembling of the parliament. Domestic influences and deep regret at the rejection of the home rule bill are also elements in his decision.

WASHINGTON, D.C., Feb. 1.—In the House the vote upon the entire rejection of the internal revenue amendment resulted in the amendment including the income tax being adopted, 182 to 50.

Upon that motion Cockran demanded the ayes and nays, but only thirty-six Democrats rose to second the demand, principally those who had voted against the income tax, together with the Louisiana sugar men, not a sufficient number. The motion to recommit was then defeated on a rising vote, 103 to 177.

Then came the final vote on the bill itself, on which the aye and nay vote was asked and granted by a rising vote. The roll call was watched with marked attention and frequent bursts of applause greeted accessions to one side or the other.

Then the Speaker announced: "On this question the ayes are 204 and the nays 140, and the bill is passed."

The following Democrats voted against the bill:

Cadmus, Campbell, Covert, Cummings, Davey, Geary, Haines, Hendrix, Meyer, Page, Price, Robertson, Schermerhorn, Sibley, Sickles, Sperry. Or the Populists Newland voted against and Baker, (Kan.), Bell, Boen, Cannon, (Cal.), Davis, (Kan.), Harris, Hudson, McKeighan, Pence and Simpson for the bill.

NEW YORK, Feb. 1.—"Pony" Moore, father-in-law of Charles Mitchell, was arrested here tonight on a charge of disorderly conduct and locked up in Mulberry street police station.

LONDON, Feb. 1.—A dispatch to the Times from Berlin: At a meeting of the Parliamentary committee on the colonial estimates, the emperor admitted the accuracy of the charges made by the Hamburg newspapers against Whydah, agent of the Hamburg firm of Webber & Brahm, that he had bought from the king of Dahomey slaves captured in French Hinterland, paying for them in Winchester rifles and ammunition, which the king of Dahomey had used in the campaign against the French. The firm admitted that the Congo state paid $20 for each Dahomeyan slave.

The emperor denounced the motive of the firm, and declared if the French captured the agent the German government would not raise a finger to prevent his execution.

The committee passed a resolution to extend to all German colonies the penal provisions against human traffic.

DENVER, Feb. 2.—President Jeffery of the Denver and Rio Grand has restored the salaries of the general officers of the road to the basis in force before the voluntary reduction that went into effect last September. It is understood the salaries of the other employees will be adjusted the first of next month.

PARIS, Feb. 2.—Col. Dodds telegraphs that ex-King Behanzin has surrendered to him and is now under arrest.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—Chairman Wilson of the ways and means committee and also chairman of the executive committee of the national association of Democratic clubs, has called a meeting of the latter to be held here on February 8th. Wilson states that it will be very important and insists that every member be present.

PORTLAND, Or., Feb. 3.—Judge Bellinger, of the United States district court, has decided that, as marriage by proxy is legal in China, it must be recognized as legal here. He therefore allowed a Chinese woman, married in China by proxy to a Chinaman in this country, to stand as a legal wife.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Feb. 3.—Geo. W. Childs, philanthropist and proprietor of the Public Ledger, passed away this morning, surrounded by his family and friends. One of his physicians made the following statement to an Associated Press reporter this morning:

"Childs suffered no pain; his end was peaceful as befitted his life. He has been unconscious for three days, except at intervals. The change for the worse became manifest about 9:30 last evening; his pulse faltered and he became rapidly worse. Then it was apparent the end was near and death was only a question of a few hours. The paralytic stroke which he suffered on January 18th only affected his right side, causing him to lose the use of both the right arm and leg. During the last hours he lay like a child asleep, and when he grew so much worse, about midnight, every effort was made to rouse him, but without avail."

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—Capt. Thomas Sharp, of the Seventeenth Infantry, has been relieved from duty as acting Indian agent at Tongue River agency, Montana, and Captain G. W. Stouch, Third Infantry, from Sisseton agency, South Dakota, and has been detailed to the Tongue River agency.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—(Special) 1:35 p. m.—As to statehood, it is noticeable that certain Utah papers have put themselves upon an anxious seat, but it is evident that their influence tends mainly to mislead and delay such consummation. It is certain that Utah must lead the column of territories asking for admission. Patriotism, self-interest and the national welfare call on Western men for wise and harmonious action to augment Western representation in Congress. Why chatter so profusely about Western interests while obstructing and delaying the attainment of the authority to present these interests in the councils of the nation, where alone they can receive effective consideration? The Republican policy heretofore has been to advertise the admitting of Democratic territories. As the Republican party is not now in control their overtures towards Utah's admission do not carry the consciousness of responsibility and power to perform. What they have done is a good deal in the nature of bluff, but they cannot now draw back. The Democrats have not yet taken more than ordinary and reasonable time for consideration. Unless new complications arise important results will be reached this week. C. R.

NEW YORK, Feb. 4.—Heavy seas, high winds and generally rough weather are reported by several overdue vessels arriving today. The German steamer Taermine had her midmast carried away during a hurricane January 30th, off Sable Island. The steamer sustained heavy damage, her capstan being broken, the forward hatch smashed, stanchions carried away and lifeboats swept overboard.

FRESNO, Cal., Feb. 4.—A fight between the bandits Evans and Morrell and Deputy Sheriffs Timmins and Boyd occurred in the Slippery Rock country, about twenty miles from Dinuba, this afternoon. The officers were looking for the bandits in that neighborhood and were riding in a cart. When they got near the place of a rancher named Robinson, Timmins alighted and started in the direction of the house. He had only gone a short distance when Evans and Morrell came out of St. Clair's house, near by, and immediately opened fire on the officers. The latter had the advantage of being separated and could have raked the bandits from both sides.

As Evans appeared the officers took to flight, the bandits diligently firing upon them. After the officers had fled a distance they returned a few shots, without, however, ceasing to fly. In their flight Timmins and Boyd became separated, the former finally turning up at Dinuba and the latter at Reedley. Timmins telephoned the news of the fight to Sheriff Scott, who started for Sanger this evening with Deputy Reelye. It is said that twenty-four or twenty-five shots were fired, the robbers twenty and the officers four.

Another report has it that the officers made a bold stand, but were under disadvantage, as the bandits were under cover.

CITY OF MEXICO, Feb. 4.—Father Caspaneta, a revolutionary priest, has finally lost his life while in the act of leading an armed force against the government in the mountainous regions. He was one of the leaders in the recent revolutionary movement in the state of Guerrero. He was captured with General Canutti Neri and cast in solitary confinement in the Belem prison. He was in prison but a few days when he made his escape and sought refuge among Catholic sympathizers, where he quietly worked up a strong feeling against the government and organized a force of about 100 men. With this small army he made an attack upon a hacienda in the state of Mexico and secured a large lot of supplies. They were pursued by a troop of cavalry commanded by Colonel Solin and retaken, and in the fight the priest and ten of his followers were killed.

ROME, Feb. 4.—Count Soderini, Pope Leo XIII.'s secret chamberlain, has written a pamphlet entitled "Rome and the Government During the past Twenty-five Years." The author maintains as an essential for real liberty, that the Pope should recover Rome, but Leo XIII. will readily discuss other means, if any are suggested, as his dearest wish is the welfare of Italy.

LONDON, Feb. 4.—A dispatch from Rome to the Standard says the Pope has decided that Mgr. Satolli will be among the new cardinals.

PARIS, Feb. 5.—August E. Vaillant, the anarchist who, on Dec. 9th, threw a bomb in the chamber of deputies, was guillotined shortly after 7 o'clock this morning. His last words were: "Death to society; long live anarchy."

At 7.30 the march to the guillotine began. Vaillant marched between the executioner and his assistants, with his head erect and defiant, while persons in the crowd cried out: "He dies like a true anarchist!" accompanied by an occasional cry of "Vive l'Anarchie!" Standing at the foot of the steps leading to the platform and gazing at the flaming flag, Vaillant shouted: "Vive l'Anarchie!" and a moment later, ascending the steps, he said in a loud voice: "A mort les bourgeois!" "death to the Bourgeoisie." On the platform he cried: "Death to society."

These were his last words. He was quickly strapped to the sliding plank and his neck placed beneath the knife, which fell, severing his head from the body.

THE HAGUE, Feb. 5.—The police have unearthed an enormous forgery of bank notes. Notes to the value of 227,000 guilders were seized and eight men, including the leader, an American named Krause, were arrested.

DENVER, Feb. 4.—Chief Ignatio of the Southern Utes passed through Denver last night en route for Washington to testify at the hearing February 10th on the question of the removal of the Southern Utes in Colorado to the eastern part of Utah. The chief says the Utes want to go west and are becoming restless on account of delay in carrying out the treaty. The game in the southern part of Colorado is about exhausted and the Indians are pining for hunting ground in Utah, where game is abundant and white people not numerous.

The registration of the Chinese is going on in Fresno district, Cal., rapidly. About forty a day are being registered, but three times that number apply. A careful estimate, made from the most reliable information, places the number of Chinese in the district at 9,000, over 4,000 of which are in the city.

Written for this Paper.

WHO WILL SHOW US ANY GOOD?

The world is never weary of heralding the extraordinary increase of intelligence in modern times. The long hid secrets of nature have been wrested from ages of hiding, and made auxiliary to grand triumphs in science, mechanism and philosophy. Power has been multiplied for the production of appliances needed for a grander civilization. Raw elements converted by machinery and skill have made a deluge almost of manufactured product. Our country has invited the world to view its palaces of industry. Labor was enthroned in the White City, was feted, honored, glorified and crowned. Capital and genius said its products should be housed in a way never exceeded in the corridors of the Alhambra or in the palaces of kings. Socialism and anarchy hid their heads, for the millennium zephyrs had not power to fill a pirate sail. The reign of glory was but brief, for ere the gathered trophies of toil were distributed, or its architecture dismantled, industrial sickness was seen to be nearer a chronic condition than it had been before. Stagnation settled like a pall upon the nation, and while its elevators and granaries were teeming with plenty, tens of thousands were famishing for daily bread. While the bowels of the earth are pregnant with fuel, these uncounted thousands were starving for lack of fire. While wool was almost going a-begging and factories were rusting in inaction, children, women and men were perishing from the inclemency of the wintry storms.

Our boasted intelligence is at fault, and our distributing power is one of inanition. Even charity lagged, until crazy want and hunger threatened to help themselves ere the former awakened from its dreamy sleep. That slumber long-continued though, would have had a more rude awakening; for turbulence, riot, looting and destruction were but averted or deferred by a hair's breadth, as it were; and even now, uncertainty and fear rest upon the owners of supplies, lest charity and philanthropy should prove fickle. When those who subsist upon its precious but limited dole shall have exhausted these temporary supplies, the excited masses may conclude after all to "help themselves."

Meanwhile, the powers that be seem unaware of the pregnant moment. Political leaders are fighting and maneuvering for supremacy. The silver question is shelved; the Hawaiian muddle absorbs attention; tariff legislation is the football of party; justice and righteousness as to the development of self-sustaining citizenship in new states is relegated to the caverns of political expediency; and wealth shrinks from an income tax on property which may and does cost millions to protect. Some have thought that "Nero fiddling while Rome burned" was the acme of fatuity. But can this great, this intelligent nation see that its very life is subject to volcanic eruptions, unless minor topics are superseded by wise, timely and considerate statesmanship in regard to the present situation?

There is an immense number of ministers or teachers of religion in this country, and as becomes them and their influence, many are taking an active part in relieving distress, in visiting the dens and slums of poverty, in mitigating where possible the severities of a condition which means the suspension of manly independence and self support for a time at least. There is in connection with the churches a good deal of organized effort and no doubt the active and self-sacrificing who are thus engaged will do good, and some day reap the reward thereof. All this has been seconded by a liberal and persistent press; the newspapers "have done yeoman service;" while private enterprise has devised schemes innumerable, until the many rivulets now in combination have become a grand and swollen stream. But without deprecating this labor of love, it needs no prophet to say that this is all a matter of expediency—it is but temporary at best. In some sections it is seen that relief of this kind if steadily pursued is demoralizing. It tends to pauperization, and the easier and more abundant the relief the more surely is this accomplished, so that the inauguration of public works on a grand scale is suggested, based on minimum wages maybe, rather than on indiscriminating charity. If this method was more widely practiced, it would be the best way for the present, and in this city on a small scale it is demonstrated of partial success. Wages paid, when small, have more of the soothing and honorable feeling associated therewith, than a larger pittance in the name of relief or charity.

But neither of these is desired by the majority of men. They want to work, are willing—anxious in fact; but "no man hath hired them," and this enforced idleness is a local, state and national calamity, one too, which should command the attention of the most profound thinkers, of men who have the best brains and the biggest hearts, men who have sympathy with the toilers, and love for their race. No feted, pampered, self-seeking frauds should find place in this; no heavy salaried officers should grow out of a congress, convocation or deliberative assembly, gathered for the solution of the industrial problem, so as to preclude its unwelcome recurrence in a few years or any number of years, if wisdom—concentrated, and sagacity—farseeing, could provide against it. Such an assembly should have in it a variety of element. The laboring man, the sufferer, should have judicious representation. The experienced man of means and executive ability for providing labor would be indispensable. The religious minister or layman could not be denied admission into such a conclave, but they would have to be such as know religion to be more than a sentiment, and withal earnest believers in the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. The statesman, the man of law and order, the framer and founder of institutions, the clear-headed discernor of cause and effect, the one whose ambition is to see this country great and glorious by virtue of the fact that it has grappled with evils, which, originating in feudal times and fostered by ages of cultivation have unwittingly been transplanted, and almost unknowingly have taken root, beneath the clearer skies of this Republic, and found sustenance under the protection of its flag! Prominent members of the all-powerful press would be summoned to give voice, not only that of prominent experience, but to push and make vital the deliberations and conclusions of so potential and august a representative gathering as that. No room there should be reserved for the trifler, the self-seeker, the politician or the demagogue; no room for the hypocrite, the idler, the pretender or the fraud. Earnest discussion, deep thinking, hard work and pure philanthropy would have to suggest and dominate where the vital question of industrial and consequent social and national life were being probed or sifted for the generations now and yet to come.

What name or names can call and conduct such an enquiry? Is there confidence enough anywhere in the so-called leaders of society as it is? Who can point out the statesman, designate the religionist, tell the magician of the press, or say where the philanthropist lives, who can claim or be designated as one of choice? In the ranks of the workingmen who can state their grievances as they really are? Among the capitalists, who is sympathetic enough, and realizes the danger of the hour? Where is the seer who can divine the future—the prophet who can give the word of the Lord, if human discussion should fail in grasping the need or providing the remedy?

It has been said that "in the multitude of counselors there is safety," and such a representative assembly ought to evolve speedily a practical way out of the labyrinth of uncertainty now so prevalent. First, the cause, then the remedy, next the application, until the plethora of our teeming world should be distributed wherever an unsatisfied want was voiced by any soul able and willing to work.

This Territory is an epitome of a greater nation. Its resources are wonderful; its population are progressive and honest in the main; wants are as numerous as snowflakes; hundreds are waiting to marry if they had a decent home and labor; thousands now owning a home would like it improved or enlarged for the convenience of a growing family; tens of thousands could do with better clothing, and more of it; there is hardly a habitation in Utah as well furnished as its owner desires, hardly a home where books, magazines and papers would not be welcomed; not a home but there are some of its members desiring culture, refinement, education; not a farm but what needs improvement in sheds, stables, corrals, fences, trees or implements; and labor enough is wasted every year for lack of utilization under good direction, to transform the villages and towns of this Territory in a few brief years so that none would know them, if some man or board or other organization could control. There is material, skill enough, desire enough, necessity enough, for a change. The magician is waiting—Labor is his name, exchange is his circulating medium which, will buy rock, adobe, lumber, lime, plaster, glass, paint, for the creation and adornment of any number of needed homes.

We made our furniture forty years ago; boots, shoes, cloths, flannels and blankets. We made pork and beef and butter and eggs. Health was the portion of the majority, and children were as the star-dust of heaven for multitude, until today ten thousand crowd the schoolhouses of this city, and legions are growing in the Territory, coming daily to manhood and with none to employ the one sex or marry the other. Zion's mission also is to gather. Her hunters and fishers are out. Who will care for the new arrivals if we cannot sustain or provide for those already here? Our Legislature is in session, but this is not their study. We have Bishops and Presidents of Stakes, but the burthen is none of theirs. We have organizations discussing questions mainly foreign to that temporal salvation which is now needed for Israel. "Who will show us any good?" Who can summon the wise men? And if summoned, can they provide a remedy?

ON THE SOCIETY ISLANDS.

The following interesting letter is to the members of a local club, "the Bonhomie," from one of their absent friends and members. It will be read with pleasure by many others:

PAPEETE, Tahiti, Society Islands, Dec. 1st, 1893.—Having promised to let you know how I get along, I take pleasure in penning these few items of experience as a missionary of Christ among the heathen, lack of time prompting me to write to you all in one letter.

While plodding along through the uneventful student life of figures and rules at the B. Y., the pleasurable anticipation of once more beholding the anniversary of my humble entrance into this world in peace was somewhat disturbed by receiving a birthday gift in the shape of a letter from the First Presidency, appointing me to labor as a missionary on the Society Isles, with but three weeks to prepare for the journey. Accordingly, after a hasty and incomplete preparation, on the dismal day of February 25th, I bid farewell to our beautiful mountain home and its dear associations.

After a pleasant and uneventful ride through the barren deserts of western Utah and Nevada, and descending from the snowy heights of the Sierra Nevadas through the glorious foothills and valleys of the Golden State, just budding forth into new life under the seducing influences of gentle spring, we arrived in wicked San Francisco. Two days' sight-seeing in the city of Sunday excursion fame, and eight of us, and all Utah born boys, boarded the clipper brig Gallilee, bid good bye to friends who had come thus far, and set sail for Tahiti, 4000 miles southwest.

For thirty-six hours we lay helplessly rolling in the open sea just outside the bay. The action of the waves, augmented by the weight of the towering masts, gave a motion to our little craft which soon sent six stomachs into rebellion. Then nature picked us up, as it were, in her hand. The wind whistled around the network of ropes above, and we sped merrily along only to be again forsaken and allowed to bask in the heat of a tropical sun which soon sent the thermometer up to 95 degrees in the shade—this program being almost daily repeated.

There was on board a sociable company of seventeen souls including the crew and after the first three days we had an enjoyable time. The weather was fine, sunrises and sunsets grand, and the company jolly. One meets with many peculiar characters when traveling abroad and our trip was no exception. We had a "whaler" who earned his sobriquet from his all-absorbing desire to keep us posted in regard to whale fishing in all its details. The "mariner" had a passionate longing to climb the rigging and try the boats. The "joker" was listened to with interest; while the unsophisticated youth from Utah, eager to learn more of the mighty deep, listened to the yarns of the "old salts" and the tales of travel and adventure. On the third day's sail one of the latter remarked to another, "We have just gone 29 miles." "Naw, you're mistaken," said No. 2; "we have surely gone farther than that." "No, we haven't," continued the first speaker; "the barometer points to just 29." Explanations followed, during which the man at the wheel looked dreamily off to the leeward, his face visibly expanding with an impressible twitching at the corners of the mouth. The "cure all" was also there and had innumerable remedies to cure sea-sickness, while those who tried them were the most sick of all.

Among the passengers was Captain B. W. Chapman, whom the native call Bennie, who has carried on a trading business with Tahiti for forty years, and we spent many hours listening to his odd and pleasantly told yarns of the sea and ways of the natives with whom we were soon to become acquainted. His descriptions of Kanaka life and customs did not have a tendency to create any love within us for them. "Why," said he one day, "a Kanaka won't do anything but loaf around and drink rum. If you offer him work he will reply, 'What's the good of working? We have plenty to eat and drink.'" After telling a story to back up his assertion he wound up by saying: "And you'll become just like them."

On the 20th we passed the monuments of the industry of the wonderful "coral polyp," the Tuamotu Islands, the highest elevation of which is only about six feet above the sea; and next day sailed into the coral-reef-protected harbor of Papeete, not more than ten feet of water separating our faithful ship from the hard unyielding coral of the narrow and serpentine pass through which we were guided under a stiff breeze without the aid of pilot or tug—a feat I have since learned is attempted by but few.

In contrast to the low flats of the Tuamotu group the sharp pointed volcanic formed mountains of Tahiti rise majestically to a height of 8,000 feet. They are completely enveloped in a mass of verdure, as indeed the whole island is. From our point of vantage on board ship the island seemed to be a fairyland, an immense garden, and all looked so fresh and sweet, so inviting to the eye, with the roofs of the native huts and pretty cottages of the foreigners just peeping above the mass of foliage, that one of the Elders felt down-right sorry he did not bring his wife with him.

The island of Tahiti is in fact two distinct mountains joined together by a narrow isthmus. The briny sea is separated from their massive and almost perpendicular walls by from one rod to three-quarters of a mile of rich, fertile soil teeming with vegetation and immense groves of cocoanut trees and plantains, under the shades of which the dusky native dwells contented and happy in the blissful ignorance of the comforts and conveniences of civilization, and of the motives that impel his white brother to labor and toil. To stand on one of the eminences of this little dot in the Pacific, a sight greets the eye which fills the mind with awe and might well lead one to say that nature had indeed here bestowed her gifts in rich profusion and clothed it in her brightest dress. The undulating stretch of country on either side is covered with a dense growth of tropical shrubs and trees, the cocoanut, banana, orange, lime, guava and other fruits peculiar to the tropics flourish without any cultivation whatever. and the many curls of blue smoke ascending above the tree tops reveal the presence of native huts and cottages and make known to the weary traveler that meal time is near at hand. To the front lies the broad Pacific, calm and peaceful inside the reef of coral which surrounds the island and upon which the roaring breakers spend their strength in vain, while in the background rise the towering fern-covered mountains in solemn grandeur, standing in mid air, as it were, between the blue sky above and the green carpeted earth beneath; drinking in the beauties of nature, one's mind is drawn from earthly things to the great power which made them all, and the great love and wisdom made known through them to man. The distant roaring of the breakers is borne on the gentle breeze, and is as music to his ear. The mind wanders from one theme to another until he is lost in oblivion to all around and drinks deep of the aspiration of peace and love.

Descending from the lofty station the first thing that attracts the traveler's attention is the changed appearance of the inspiring scene upon which he has just been gazing. The land is strewn with dead brush and decaying vegetation which was hidden from view on the hill by the dense foliage of the tall, twisted and regular growing trees. Everything has an unkempt and disorderly appearance. The houses are dilapidated, the roofs patched and mended until they look like crazy quilts. If he asks for a meal, he is probably given some raw or baked fish, grated cocoanut made into a sour mash called "Tacoro" and "fei," a food as yellow as saffron and which leaves a very bad taste in the mouth, at least it does in mine. It is the staff of life here, Uru (bread fruit) taking a second place. He squats down on the ground, eats with his fingers, makes as much noise with his mouth as possible (for you know when you are in Rome, do as Rome does) and as he takes notice of his surroundings and the dress of the people, thoughts run through the brain like a railroad train bound for the World's Fair, and among other things he is convinced that

The maidens of tropical climes,
Where the favors of nature abound,
Wear very few clothes
As every one knows,
They are summer girls all the year round.
The climate of Tahiti, baring a few rather warm days, is fine and no ardent lover could wish for more cool and beautiful nights than are common in this favored land. But notwithstanding that nature has been lavish with her favors, Tahiti is not a pleasant place in which to live. Quite the opposite to one who has been reared among the Saints of God, and one is reminded most forcibly that it is the people, and not the natural advantages of a place that make a country great, prosperous and desirable. Our mountain home, though once a desert, has more flowers and prettier gardens than Tahiti, with all her copious rains fruitful soil and genial sunshine. What wonders can be worked where there is faith and constant devotion!

Tahiti has a population of about 7,000 and there are from one to four churches in every settlement, representing five different faiths. Papeete, our headquarters, has a population of probably 2,000 natives and contains a veritable horde of office-holders of the French government which took forcible possession of the islands in 1844, though Captain Cook with uplifted hand had declared them to be his majesty's, the king of England's, in 1769. Their moral influence (the French) is bad and the public examples set by many of those high in authority are most disgusting. The sanction of immorality (by absence of law as well as individual acts) augmented by the presence of large companies of soldiers and sailors from the men of war and different trading ships, has a demoralizing effect upon missionary labor among the native people of Papeete and who are only too apt to imitate the vices rather than the virtues of those with whom they come in contact. The curse of drunkenness is deeply rooted among the people of this town and my observation leads me to believe that there are few who do not become more or less frequently intoxicated. This evil is allowed to grow without restriction, no laws being made to control it. A crowd of drunks singing and dancing (sometimes the hula-hula) in front of a police station is not an unusual occurrence. In the country villages there is not so much of it. Breweries and gin halls are not so conveniently situated. The people are lazy and in nine cases out of ten where you ask one his occupation he will answer "parahi noa," which means when literally translated, "sitting continually." The men are strong, lusty fellows capable of doing good work and which they do when necessity presses them. In carrying their food from the mountains they will often sustain a burden of from 125 to 175 lbs for many miles. The women generally attend to the household work and the men supply the family with their few necessities as in our own land. A meal for the family costs but a few cents, and they can teach the white man a lesson on economy in cooking. The firewood used by the housewife in America to simply kindle the fire is sufficient by their mode of cooking to prepare the family meal. It is done in this way: A hole is scooped in the ground in which the kindlings are placed and covered with small stones about half the size of an egg. When they have become hot the remaining embers are scraped away and the food placed upon them (fish, etc., being wrapped up in leaves) and the whole is then covered with a thick layer of leaves to keep in the heat and steam, and allowed to remain for an hour or so. It is then ready to be served. The preparation of a meal generally takes from two to three hours, for the simple reason they keep nothing on hand, and when they become hungry they are forced to hunt kindling wood, climb the trees for coconuts, gather herbs to flavor their foods and in fact everything necessary. They have no system whatever and keep nothing prepared for future wants. Consequently they are very often in rather straightened circumstances and compelled to live on half fare. What! you ask, live on half fare in a land so fertile and blest with the copious rains of heaven? Yee; live on half fare and go to bed with a empty stomach, where with a little thought, and less work, everything to sustain life might be had within a few rods of the doorstep. I have had my enduring qualities tested once or twice and am ready to candidly confess that a native can go without anything to eat for a longer period than anyone I ever saw. At one time when Brother Cannon and I were in the country living on half fare, he awoke one morning from a fairyland dream in which he thought he ate a good meal, to find his shirt ripped at the back almost from top to bottom and which his gaunt condition made quite inexplicable. That imagination is the stepping stone to reality, at least for the time being, is herein fully demonstrated.

When partaking of their humble meal they squat on the ground and eat with their fingers, generally first playfully rolling and moulding it in their hands, and constantly dipping their fingers into a sort of sauce which is conveyed into the mouth by a violent suction and which sounds, as near as I can convey it on paper, like z z z o-o-o if you pronounce it with an inward motion of the breath. It always reminds me of the dude, who, after smacking his lips over a dish of ice cream, with a two-for-a-nickle smile, said to his intended, "It's good Sal, go buy you some." They retire to rest at dark and arise at daybreak, or as it is termed in their tongue "feracrao." (the time when it is light enough to see flies flying.) They bathe frequently and as a general rule keep their bodies clean, though one not infrequently meets with disagreeable effluvia, such as is noticed in coming in contact with our Indians.

The native house is made of bamboo canes, the roof of carefully arranged long, tough leaves which keep out the wet as well as shingles, and grass resembling our wild hay is spread on the ground for a floor. They are cool and dry but in a couple of years or so begin to look like old forsaken chicken coops.

The people are naturally sociable and hospitable though the deceptions so often practiced upon them have made them rather shy of foreigners. When we are received they give us the very best they have and spare no pains to make us comfortable and will even go out and borrow beds, etc., that our stay may be a pleasant one. Near friends and relatives salute with a kiss and others by shaking hands and we are spared the ordeal of nose rubbing which is customary in New Zealand. When one wishes to leave he tells the occupants to sit or remain where they are. They then ask him if he is going. He replies in the affirmative and they tell him to go which to the stranger at first sounds rather odd, but when one reflects a little it seems to be much more sensible than pressing one to remain with a hope-you-don't smile as is quite customary in our country. Their only social amusement is singing, and every Sunday and sometimes several times during the week our neighbors squat down in a circle under a tree, rum flows freely, song follows song, and peal after peal of silvery laughter is borne on the balmy air. A more noisy or jolly crowd is seldom seen. This is continued all day and in some cases for three or four days at a stretch, barely stopping for meals and sleep, which is another proof of their enduring powers.

Intelligently they are yet far behind the civilized races, have not much executive ability, while system and order are almost unknown. They have very peculiar ways of reasoning sometimes, and we are continually asked many curious questions. On exhibiting a photograph of our newly completed Temple I was asked by a convert why the Church did not build one like that here in Tahiti. "All the people will then join the Church," said he. Another wanted to know why Queen Victoria did not come to visit them and when told she ruled over ten thousand islands, he said "it would be good to visit all the people." They have no idea of number and even forget their ages. One asked where money came from and upon learning it was taken from the earth, wanted to know if it was planted and grew. Their language is pleasing to the ear being much softer than our own. Its construction is simple and there are but few changes in the conjugation of the verb, though the lack of proper text books makes the task of learning to speak somewhat difficult. The pronunciation is phonetic. To commence on the Bible, the most finished and difficult part of the language, is like teaching a child to read before it knows the A B C's or to climb an almost perpendicular mountain, yet such is the difficulty we have to encounter, and I am happy to say we have succeeded in climbing some few steps up the mountain where we can get our heads above the tangled brushwood and see where we are at.

Many amusing incidents might be told at our expense, of our endeavors to make ourselves understood. While holding consultation near the beach the first day of our arrival some friends brought a couple of baskets of bananas. After partaking freely we desired to thank them but did not know how. Having picked up a few words I attempted to tell them they were very good, thinking they would draw the inference that we were thankful, but unknowingly said they were not very good. On another occasion several of the boys were swimming in a canyon stream near by when several young ladies came along and sat on the shore to watch them in their sport. They endeavored to politely invite them to go away but instead told them to come nearer.

FRANK CUTLER.

WESTERN NEWS ITEMS.

In Shoshone county, Idaho, 26 per cent of the taxpayers are delinquent.

Boulder, Colo., is about to invest $2,800 in an electric fire alarm system.

Mesa county, Colo., claims to have over 1,000 miles of irrigating ditches.

Arizona can agree for tanning purposes is being shipped to Europe.

Fort Collins, Colo., is shipping fine graded Clyde horses to Texas by the carload.

Austin, Nev., is to have a first-class flour mill to dispose of the surplus Nevada wheat.

Routt county, Colo., will raise hogs and hereafter feed surplus wheat to porkers.

Buena Vista, Colo., proposes to elect two ladies on the town board at the April election.

The Laramie, Wyo., Coal and Ice company is cutting 4,000 tons of ice at Laramie for Denver people.

The lightning rod fakers are still "working" the farmers of Boise valley, Idaho.

Red Bluff, Cal., is much wrought up because some one has poisoned several valuable dogs in the last few days.

Valentine, Neb., claims to have been the coldest spot in the West one day last week.

Coal has been struck near Akron, Colo., at a depth of 155 feet, but not in sufficient thickness to justify mining.

Three iron, four-masted British ships are at anchor at Tacoma, Wash., awaiting wheat cargoes for Europe.

The Rankin, Wyo., coal mines near Rawlins, have doubled their output this season.

The Boise City (Idaho) Statesman mentions the survey of the Union Pacific main line through that city.

Near Carson, Nev., Geo. C. Bryson met a lynx in a dark tunnel and killed it after fierce fight with the brute.

The Cripple Creek, Colo., miners and mine owners are endeavoring to settle their differences by arbitration.

Flagstaff, Ariz., stone is becoming widely celebrated. It resembles Colorado redstone, and is making its way to the Pacific coast cities.

Eastern Colorado is rejoicing over the recent snowfall. Plowing will now proceed at a rapid rate now that moisture has loosened the earth's surface.

A number of California tobaccoists have been fined $5 each for violating the ordinance prohibiting the sale of tobacco to miners.

In Butte, Mont., a two-year-old child lighted a match, ignited a bottle of lemon extract and was burned to death.

The new railroad bridge of the Florence and Cripple Creek railroad, 125 feet long, is rapidly nearing completion.

Idaho City reports heavy rains fallen upon deep snows, which, now formed into ice, promises abundance of water next summer.

El Paso and Park counties are vigorously opposing the segregation of territory to form the new county of Cripple Creek, Col.

At Las Vegas, N. M., 2,000 head of 2-year-old steers were purchased last week for feeding in northern Wyoming.

Gallup, N. M., is in the throes of a local war between the city council on the one side and a justice of the peace and city marshal on the other.

Silverton, Colo., announces preparations for an organized scheme for working the gold placers in the Animas river as soon as spring arrives.

Land in the vicinity of Grand Junction, Colo., which sold two years ago for $10 an acre, recently sold for $200 an acre planted in orchard.

Idaho has had deep snows, mild weather and some rain. Large snowslides are inevitable in the valleys in the northern portion of the state.

Montana's total production of gold and silver since 1880, as shown by official reports, amounted to $161,194,360 in silver and $40,392,152 in gold.

Florence, Colo., is considering a proposition to grant a franchise for a waterworks system and the Florence News warns the powers that be to "go slow."

Chaffee, Colo., county alfalfa hay sells for more than it will bring when fed to horses. It brings $12 or $15 a ton while horses sell in Eagle county at $13 each.

Old settlers in Wyoming are wondering what has become of the deep snows of the winters of old lang syne. The snow fall in Wyoming is steadily decreasing.

The state treasurer of Colorado has paid out nearly the $31,000 designated for the different counties from the semi-annual distribution of school fund.

Boulder county, Colo., commissioners have made sweeping reductions in the salaries of deputy clerks and other deputy county officials. The reductions run from 25 to 50 per cent.

Boulder, Colo., records a big cattle deal by S. B. Austin, who has gone to round up about 2,500 head of bees in the Blue River Valley Nebraska.

The Goler placers in the Mohave desert are pronounced no good for poor men. All the good diggings have been taken up by large syndicate agents.

Payette valley, Idaho, farmers are about to start an irrigating canal near Caldwell, Idaho, which will bring into cultivation 20,000 acres of rich land.

Trinidad, Colo., will inaugurate a great union church revival February 12, immediately following the suppression of gambling houses by ordinance in that city.

Another Colorado colony from Weld county has located at Westland, north of Cheyenne, Wyoming. They have bought 1,600 acres of land under cultivation.

The sneak thief has been getting in his fine work during the past few days at Denver, over a dozen cases of larceny having been reported to the detectives.

La Veta, Colo., will have new stockyards and transfer depot as soon as carpenters can be spared from the Cripple Creek branch road to do the work at La Veta.

The Denver News thinks that every county in Kansas, Nebraska and Colorado should have a voice in the arid land discussion in the San Francisco congress.

Fruit and vegetable growers near Tacoma, Wash., are moving in the matter of establishing a cannery. It is thought possible that the company will open next season.

Wolf hunting round ups have become a favorite sport on the plains in Eastern Arapahoe county. Six wolves were run down in one circle last week.

Platteville, Colo., proposes to boom this year. The idea of a large reservoir above the town is being materialized and the wheel of prosperity is said to be rolling that way.

A Tacoma, Wash., barber, who conducts a shop in connection with a hotel, has been arrested for keeping his place open on Sundays. He claims that the shop is part of the hotel.

At Greeley, Colo., the Fort Collins papers assert that coyotes are so tame and plentiful that they run about the streets at night and play with the domestic dogs of Greeley.

Two guns abandoned in the hills near Rankin, Wyo., in 1886 by two Rawlins boys were picked up where they left them when the boys were lost in a storm eight years ago.

There are said to be 2,000 deer hides in Routt county, just across the Wyoming line in Colorado, belonging to ranchmen and others. They are stated to be worth $1 each. Elk hides bring $2.

Sixty thousand rainbow trout eggs are shortly expected in the city from Neosho, Missouri, says the Laramie Boomerang. Twenty-five thousand brown trout eggs were received recently.

At Weiser, Idaho, twenty-five kegs of pickles were imported from the Pacific coast a few days ago because the farmers in that region of Idaho neglected last season to plant cucumbers.

Wind river, Wyo., cattle ranges were leased for five years last week, the government contracting to keep off intruders with a cavalry patrol, 1,000,000 acres for $1,200, and one range of about 1,500,000 acres for $1,500.

Clearmont coal mines, Wyoming, challenge competition. It is said to be the best yet discovered in Wyoming. The Burlington and Missouri river is about to build a branch road to the new discovery.

Marshall pass and the Cumbres pass on the southern branch of the Rio Grande road have had unusually light snow falls this season. Trains have had no difficulty in making regular time.

Rio Grande trainmen running into Salida report the heaviest snow ever known on that road between Tennessee pass and eagle canon. They an-anticipate disastrous snow slides when it turns warm.

Edward Martin, of Oroville, Cal., bought a chicken the other day from a Chinese poultry dealer. When he opened its craw he recovered therefrom about $3 worth of bright river gold.

The work of building a railroad from Cedar City, Iron county, up Coal Creek canyon to the coal beds there is being crowded ahead. The Utah Coal and Iron company is interested in the enterprise.

Parachute, Colo., had a horse sale last week and twenty-five sold at from $2 to $13 a head. Who says money is not scarce when horses won't sell for a week's feed bill? asks the Denver News.

Rio Blanco and Routt county (Colo.) stock men are gloomy and anxious. Deep snow now covers the ranges and the weather is cold. Great loss of cattle by cold and starvation is anticipated.

The Arapahoe County Teachers' association met in the assembly hall of the East Denver High school on Saturday morning. About 200 members were present, together with many visitors from all parts of the state.

Sweetwater valley sheepmen in Wyoming report at Rawlins that sheep have done well in the deep snows while cattle have suffered severely. The sheep do well on sage and greasewood bush.

Near Laramie, Wyo., the Satoris ranch, with 22,000 acres under irrigation ditch and improvements thereon, costing $600,000, is said to have been sold on option to a Chicago capitalist for $500,000.

A Crested Butte, Colo., inventor, who has patented a sage brush cutting and grubbing machine, is having his invention manufactured in Denver and will soon place it on the market for sale.

A movement is on foot in Seattle, Wash., to organize a company to cure fish. Cod and halibut abound in northern waters, and enterprising business men see in this scheme big money.

At Huachuca siding, Ariz., a 166 pound nugget of copper has been taken out by Mr. Downey and sent to Tucson and placed in the school of mines. It was carried seven miles to the railroad on the back of a small burro.

On Wednesday W. J. Wall, employed on the Champion Empire mine at Aspen, Colo., fell out of the bucket, a distance of 250 feet. Death was instantaneous. He leaves a wife and four children in Tipperary, Ireland.

The death is reported of Dr. James Irwin, of Lander, Wyo. Dr. Irwin arrived in Cheyenne on the first regular Union Pacific train and established a private hospital. Since 1871 he has lived in the Lander country.

Sunflower valley, near Trinidad, must be a farmer's Eldorado. Mr. Abe Miller bought forty acres there one year ago and in 1893 sold $600 worth of produce and realized $3 a month for milk delivered at a creamery.

A Johnson county, Wyo., farmer named George Roberts, last year imported thirteen fine hounds for wolf hunting at a cost of $400. Now all are dead except one from the effects of wolf bites and eating poisoned meat on the cattle ranges.

The Genoa, Nev., Courier: Catfish are very plentiful in some of the ponds this side of Walley's Springs. A resident put a steel hook in the top of a barley sack one day this week and scooped up thirty-five fish at a single dig.

John McNulty, who was to have been hanged at Sacramento, Cal., last Friday, has escaped the gallows, after spending six years in prison. Governor Markham, almost at the last moment, commuted the death sentence to imprisonment for life.

COLIMA, Mex., Feb. 1.—Senor J. Jesus Cardenas, one of the wealthiest and best known ranchers of western Mexico, has been assassinated at La Maragera. Robbery is thought to be the motive. Two arrests have been made.

Laramie county, Wyoming, commissioners paid themselves $1,518.30 for the last six months of 1893. Allowing them eighteen days' pay for regular monthly meetings the three county commissioners each received at the rate of $84 a day. Now the Cheyenne papers complain of high priced officials.

Between Huntington and the mouth of Powder river, Or., a distance of about twenty-five miles, not less than fifty miners are engaged with rocker and sluice, fine-gold mining on the bars of Snake river. From $1 to $2.50 per day is counted as good pay.

Georgie, the nine-year-old son of R. W. Starr, of Waterville, Wash., fell in the family well last week. The well is forty-five feet deep and had two and a half feet of water, but the boy was fished out with no other injury than a scratched and bruised knee.

The McDonald ranch, twenty-five miles west of Trinidad, Colo., produces every year a fine crop of Mexican corn, which is out green and used for dairy feeding. The fodder is as green as alfalfa and is grown without irrigation. The butter produced sells at three pounds for $1 all the year round.

A Spanish entertainment, modeled after the fests of old California days, is to be held on Coronado beach on April 24th, 25th and 26th. So far as possible the atmosphere of Mexican California will be revived in the character of sports and in the dress of those taking part.

Another victim of the treacherous balloon lies badly crippled at the Sanitarium in San Jose, Cal., with the prospects of remaining there for at least a couple of months. This time it is a woman. Although but 20 years of age she claims to have made forty-six trips with but one disaster.

Jimmy Eagan stowed himself away on the steamer Walla Walla at Seattle, intending to come to San Francisco. When the steamer arrived at Victoria and more freight was put into the hold where the boy was concealed he became alarmed and called for help. He was handed over to the police.

A half interest in a twenty acre placer claim above Warm Springs Ferry, on Snake river, was lately sold for $1,000 cash. As but little development had been made on this ground, the price is considered a substantial encouragement to those interested in that vicinity, says the Bellevue Herald.

There is a pretty little row at Walla Walla, Wash., over the proposed construction of a water works system. The council has issued an advertisement asking for bids for $160,000 bonds to be used in the construction. The water company announces its intention to contest and prevent the issue of the bonds.

Otto Bolling, a young man who arrived at Evanston, Ill., recently from Leadville, Colo., mysteriously disappeared a week ago. On Monday morning his body was found three miles from Evanston, frozen stiff. He had attempted to walk there from a neighboring town during a storm and had frozen to death.

Phillip Booger, the aged California capitalist, says the San Francisco Chronicle of Saturday, was a happy man last night when he learned that he would not have to go to the penitentiary on the charge of attempting to poison his wife. The case has been a sensational one from beginning to end. Two weeks were consumed in taking the evidence and hearing the arguments.

A Lincoln, Neb., special to the Re-publican says that great excitement has been caused by the arrest of Bishop Bonacum on a charge of criminal libel preferred by Father Corbett of Palmyra, who, dissatisfied with the slowness of the ecclesiastical tribunal before which he preferred charges against the bishop some time ago, determined to put a stop to the persecution by the bishop.

The anti-gambling ordinance recently passed by the city council of Trinidad, has been put into force and as a result members of the sporting fraternity are beginning to leave the city. On Tuesday a number left for Cripple Creek and Denver, and during the present week all will take their departure. The principal issue in the coming campaign, it is stated, will be gambling and anti-gambling.

A dispatch from Rock Springs, Wyo., says, the Henry Fork disturbances have been quieted down by the sheep men pulling out of the cattlemen's country. Sheriff Whitmore since his return from there, states that if he had not gone over there would have been serious trouble, as feeling was running high between the men. As it is, no more trouble is feared, the sheep men saying that they will not again invade that territory.

Forty passengers on a Lake line electric car were badly shaken up and frightened on Monday afternoon when the car left the track, at Pueblo, Col. While running quite rapidly one of the axles broke, the wheels jumped the rails and the car ran entirely off the right of way some fifty feet. Considerable glass was broken. No one was seriously hurt, but many ladies were prostrated. A similar affair happened in San Francisco last week, but with more alarming consequences.

In Gunnison county, Colorado, a new coal company has been organized under the name of the East Baldwin Coal company. It has under development a heavy vein of coal into which a tunnel 300 feet long has been driven.

THE SCANDINAVIAN FATHERLAND.

Prepared from Special Cablegrams.

SWEDEN.

C. O. Unæus, colonel and chief of the famous Vestgotha-Dal regiment, is dead.

At the Stockholm crematory the corpses of fifty persons were reduced to ashes during the last year.

During 1893, 7,025 conscripts petitioned the government for permission to emigrate to America.

According to the latest statistics the population of the city of Gothenburg, "Sweden's Liverpool," is 106,695.

Many new and valuable paintings have been added to the fine collections in the national museum of Stockholm.

Their diamond wedding was celebrated by E. Hallberg, a well-known citizen of Öfvansjö, and his wife.

The city of Malmö, which is the third in rank of Sweden's cities, has now a population of 50,587.

A rumor here says that Viggo Ullman, president of the Norwegian Storting, is to be arrested, accused of high treason.

Crown Princess Victoria will in a few days leave for Italy and Egypt, where she will try to regain her broken health.

Usually between 400 and 500 new houses are being built in Stockholm every year, but only twenty-nine new buildings were erected in 1893.

Dr. John Soderlind, one of the ablest and most popular scholars in Sweden died at Stockholm at the age of 90 years.

The government has decided to build a strong fort in northern Sweden, but the exact location has not yet been made known.

It is not probable, that the Riksdag will grant the appropriation asked for by the government for the purpose of increasing the Swedish navy.

Great preparations are being made for the international skating tournament which will take place at Stockholm in February. The first prize will be donated by King Oscar.

There are many lieutenant-generals and major-generals in the Swedish army, but, King Oscar excepted, there are only two generals. These are M. Björnstjerna and the King of Denmark.

The Liljeholmen Works near Stockholm were completely burned to the ground. The fire was one of the biggest and most dangerous which for a long time has visited that part of the country.

Cashier Rheborg, of the Riksbanken, was arrested the other day accused of having stolen a large amount of money. The thefts had been going on for several years, without having been discovered.

The number of Catholics has considerably increased in Sweden during the last five years, but still does not amount to more than 1200. There is only one Catholic church in the country, that in Stockholm.

The Swedish gymnasts are probably the strongest all around athletes in the world. Gymnastics and all kinds of sport stand very high, but prize fighting or glove contests are under no circumstances tolerated.

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology has received as a gift the very fine collections of iron goods, which were exhibited in the Swedish Building at the World's Fair by the large iron works of Söderfors, Österby, Hornsödal and Ängersrum.

Baron Oscar Dickson is the principal backer of the expedition which will soon depart from Stockholm for the purpose of finding out the fate of Björling and Kallstenius, the two arctic explorers, from whom nothing has been heard for several months.

L. O. Smith, "the whisky king of Sweden," has returned to Stockholm after a trip round the world. Mr. Smith traveled extensively in America last year, and spoke to a reporter on a Stockholm daily in the highest terms of the United States, its people and institutions.

The "Society For Promoting What Is Good" was founded some time ago by Miss Concordia Lofveng of Stockholm, with the object of establishing an agricultural colony for educating poor children to useful members of society. It is intended to arrange it on a very large scale.

An exhibition of American furniture, models and tools bought at the World's Fair for money donated for the purpose by Mr. P. S. Peterson, the Swedish-American millionaire and owner of the Rosehill nursery at Chicago, has been opened in the Industrial Palace in Stockholm.

As a rule, the Swedish woman is temperate, though sad exceptions exist. Of the whole number of persons found guilty of drunkenness during the last nineteen years, 26 were women, and during the same time, of 2,208 alcoholic patients among the poor, 77 were women. Among 92 persons who died in Stockholm of alcoholism during the last 27 years, 62 or 67 were women.

A Swedish-American has swindled many people in Trosa. He knew the name of persons who had relatives in America, and by telling the "old folks" that their sons and daughters, whom he had met in America, were doing very well, he succeeded in bleeding his victims for different sums of money, promising to pay it all back "as soon as he had opportunity to exchange his American greenbacks."

The handicrafts in Sweden, as in other countries, have had a hard struggle in competing with mass manufacture. The entire number of handicraft men and their artzans is at present about 60,000. One kind of occupation that has from days of yore been of great importance to Sweden, is her domestic industry, which has, however, been declining for some time, and only of late years has again been called into play, mostly thanks to the efforts of private associations, which have laid great stress on retaining and developing, as far as possible, national patterns. What has doubtless been of great importance for the revival of domestic industry, is the introduction of loyd as a subject of instruction in the national schools, in which respect it is well known Sweden has been the pioneer of other nations.

As a consequence of the vast riches in woods possessed by Sweden, in comparison to the number of her inhabitants, no economy has been practised as regards home demands until the very latest decades. The amount of wood annually used for buildings, fences, fuel and carpentry is of course difficult to determine, but it may certainly be reckoned as by far exceeding the figures of the export. Nor must it be forgotten that for charcoal used in the production of iron, about five million cubic meters are annually employed. Notwithstanding the vast home demand on wood the forests give so largely, that timber, in wrought or unwrought form, ranks first among Swedish exports. In the fifties and sixties the liberal opinions which then were prevalent, both in home and foreign laws, gave rise to a number of industrial establishments for woodworks, among which saw-mills especially made rapid progress.

King Oscar has absolutely refused to pay the amount of 205,000 kronor which Baron von der Kettenburg of Germany tries to recover from the Swedish state, giving as cause that this money was furnished Sweden during the Thirty Year's War, by some of Kettenburg's forefathers. Baron Kettenburg holds the king himself responsible for the debt, because Charles XIV, Oscar's grandfather, in 1820 declared himself responsible for every state debt of Sweden up to that time, in exchange of which promise the state agreed to pay the head of the Bernadotte dynasty 200,000 kronor annually for all times coming. To the old Bernadotte's honor may be said that he fulfilled his promise, but the Kettenburg claim must at that time have been overlooked. According to Swedish law Kettenburg cannot sue the king in Sweden for the purpose of recovering the amount of money, but a sensational rumor is out, that the baron intends to attach real estate owned by King Oscar and situated somewhere in New York.

NORWAY.

Banker August Andersen, of Christiania, died at the age of 80 years.

The state debt of Norway amounts to 124,625,000 kroner.

The catching of whales has been very successful during this season.

The prominent Christiania paper Morgenbladet celebrated its 75th anniversary.

The number of saving-banks in Norway has largely increased during the last five years.

Many deaths from consumption and influenza have occurred in Christiania during the last weeks.

An earthquake has scared the inhabitants of Nordby. The damage was small.

The average day's work in Norwegian industrial pursuits is ten hours and three quarters.

Norwegian snow shoes (skis) are being exported to Germany and Austria on a large scale.

Christian Ross, the Norwegian painter, has been elected an honorable citizen of the little Italian town of Sora.

The police force of Christiania consists of nearly 400 officers, a good showing for a city, which is not larger.

At a skating tournament at Ely, England, Henrik Lindahl, a Norwegian, succeeded in taking the first prize.

The wolves in the northern part of the country have been more numerous and dangerous during the present winter than for many years.

The government of the Stavanger district has granted an appropriation of 244,000 kroner for the proposed railroad between Egersund and Flekkefjord.

Bjorn Bjornson, the actor and son of Bjornstjerne Bjornson, will probably soon take up his abode in Copenhagen, where he will play at the Dagmar Theater.

The death rate has greatly decreased in Norway during the present century, the yearly number of deaths per thousand being at present only about 16.4.

A. P. Slotrem and A. J. Stinland, of Drøven, and Nikolai Scerdel of Tjøto, were drowned, their boat capsizing off Mosjøen.

The Norwegian ship "Amund Tveten" from Haugesund was damaged during a storm off Yarmouth. Two of her crew were washed overboard.

In Norway it is only exceptionally that cookery and domestic work are taught at the girls' schools. To supply this deficiency in the education of the young ladies several families send their daughters—after having finished school—to a house-keeping school in the country, where they spend a time of six to twelve months.

DENMARK.

Esbjerg was visited by a large fire.

New gas works will be built in Herning.

The queen is again reported to be very ill.

A big sugar refinery will be built at Saxkjøbing.

Three fishermen were drowned of Langeland, their boat capsizing.

Paul Andersen, a prominent citizen of Åsdal, died at the advanced age of 96 years.

The Stiftstidende, the well-known newspaper in Aarhus, celebrated its 100th anniversary.

Prince Komatsu of Japan has been appointed a Knight of the Great Cross of the Order of Dannebrog.

The Copenhagen Casino was forced to make an assignment of a part of its property the other day.

More Swedish-American papers were confiscated in Finland in 1893 than during any previous year.

The country mansion Edderun, near Mariager, was burned to the ground and many cattle were roasted to death.

The number of failures for the first ten months of 1893 was 469 against 533 for the same time in 1892 and 372 in 1891.

The standard time of Denmark was advanced nine minutes forty-one seconds in order to correspond with the time of the central European zone.

Th. Rasmussen, Swedish-Norwegian consul in the city of Korsør, is dead. Mr. R. was a Knight of the famous Order of Dannebrog.

Christian Krogh, the Norwegian author, recently wrote an article, comparing the latest literary productions of Denmark and Norway, to the advantage of the former country.

Counterfeit 50 kroner bills are reported to be in circulation. Danish-Americans, who buy money in the United States for the purpose of sending it home to relatives in Denmark, have better to look out.

The Sorbonne of Paris has awarded le prix Meyrat to M. Tscherning, a Danish M. D., the title of his thesis being "Contributions To Ocular Dioptries." The medical faculty accompanied the prize with a lengthy explanation of the peculiar merits of Dr. Tscherning's work. "It is a work of wide range," says the faculty, "to which we call special attention of the learned world."

LET'S PLANT A TREE.

In a former paper I attempted to point out the relationship between forests and the water supply of Utah. While it is probable that the most important use of our forests is connected with the conservation of our water supply, it is by no means their only use. I have called recently on most of the leading retail fruit dealers in this city and made careful inquiries of them, in regard to the apple trade. I found that Utah apples retail for from fifty cents to one dollar and fifty cents a bushel less than the California and Oregon apples. And yet without exception they pronounced the Utah apples superior in flavor to the California apples and fully equal to the Oregon apples. The only reason given for Utah apples bearing a less price than imported apples was the fact that our apples are infested with worms, while the imported apples are comparatively free from them.

It is impossible to determine with any great exactness the percentage of Utah apples which are wormy. Apples from different localities differ widely in this respect. From my own observation, as well as from the statements of dealers, I think that the infested apples vary from 35 to 95 per cent. In one box of 256 apples, I found only 9 which were free from worms, but this was said to be an unusually bad lot. I can find no statistics which give, even approximately, the apple crop of Utah, but it is certain that a loss of from fifty cents to one dollar and fifty cents on every bushel of Utah apples is a very heavy tax on the Utah fruit grower.

Perhaps at this point some one who fully agrees with me in the above stated conclusion, asks what the connection is between Forestry and apple culture. The connection is a little roundabout but yet perfectly clear. Birds are the natural enemies of insects. At least this is true of almost all our song birds, and these birds find their only homes in the trees. Hence where there are few or no trees song birds are few or entirely absent. Utah has a sad lack of insect-eating birds, and this lack can never be fully supplied until the forest area is greatly increased. It is probably true that some of our injurious insects are night flyers and hence would escape destruction from most song birds, but there are a few night-flying insect-eating birds which would probably thrive here, did we have forests and they were once imported.

I have no desire to represent forests as a universal panacea, but I feel quite sure that the experience of other sections of our country justifies the belief that insect ravages are greatly checked by the presence of birds. Insects multiply so rapidly that unless they are held in some restraint, there is grave danger that they will menace the interests of the farmer as well as those of the fruit grower. At the risk of repeating some thoughts advanced in a former article, I am going to condense some recent statements made by the eminent French geographer Elisee Reclus. Although his remarks refer to France, almost every word is applicable to Utah. Few countries are being devastated more rapidly than the French Alps. The mountains of this region are in general composed of very hard rock which alternate with other beds which readily give way to the action of water. The marls and the other friable matter are gradually washed away, and their fall precipitates that of the compact layers at the summit, which suddenly fall down, or glide slowly into the valleys. It is, however, the improvidence of the inhabitants, and not so much the geologic constitution of the soil, which is the principal cause of the devastating action of the streams. In the mountains of Dauphin and Provence, the slopes, most of which are now bare, were once covered with trees and various plants which kept back the surface water, which resulted from the rain or the melting of the snow, by absorbing a great part of it, and thus retaining the coating of vegetable earth over the beds of crumbling rock.

During the course of centuries the trees have been cut down by greedy speculators, and by unwise farmers who wish to add some little strips of land to the fields in the valleys and to the pastures on the summits, not knowing that when they destroy mountain forests they also destroy the land on which they stood. The rain or snow being now no longer kept back upon the slopes by the trees and under shrubs, descends rapidly into the valley, driving before it all of the debris torn away from the sides of the mountain. The tooth of the goat and the sheep helps to lay bare the roots of the herbaceous plants and brushwood; until bit by bit the whole of the thin coating of earth is removed, the bare rock is exposed, and deep ravines are hollowed out in the cliffs, and are traversed in the rainy season or in the spring by furious torrents which once did not exist.

The water which once slowly penetrated the earth, conveying fertilizing salts to the roots of the trees, now serves no other purpose than that of devastation. In some localities there is not a single green bush over a space of several leagues in extent. The stream in the valley is generally nothing but a scanty rill of water winding among the heaps of stones which have been carried down by the torrent itself in the days of its fury.

The devastating action of the streams in the French Alps is interesting from a historical standpoint, for it explains why so many of the districts of Syria, Greece, Asia Minor, Africa and Spain have been forsaken by their inhabitants. The men have disappeared along with the trees; the axe of the woodman, no less than the sword of the conqueror, has put an end to or transplanted entire populations. At the present time the valleys of the southern Alps are becoming more and more deserted, and the time may yet come when the departments of the Upper and Lower Alps will no longer have any homeborn inhabitants.

During the three centuries that have elapsed between 1471 and 1776 the vignerics of these mountain regions have lost a third, a half, or even as much as three-quarters of their cultivated ground, and the men have disappeared from the impoverished soil in the same proportion. From 1836 to 1866 the Upper and Lower Alps have lost 25,000 inhabitants, or nearly one-tenth of their population. At the present time in an area of 3,860 square miles, embraced between Mont Thabor and the Alps of Nice, there is not a single group of inhabitants which exceeds the number of 2,000 individuals. Barcelonnette, the largest place, has more than once been in danger of being carried away by a flood.

It is the mountaineers themselves who have made and are seeking to extend this desert which separates the tributary valleys of the Rhone from the populous plains of Piedmont. If some modern Attila, traversing the Alps, made it his business to desolate those valleys for ever, the first thing he would do would be to deoress their slopes. Shall we, in our blindness, do the same thing in Utah, or shall we at once call a halt and begin earnestly to undo the mistakes of the past?

None too soon can we organize forestry associations and begin to collect information relating to trees and their relation to the various industries of Utah. By careful study we may save ourselves from some very serious mistakes, and by reforesting our mountain slopes we may make land productive which, in some cases, is now worse than useless.

C. A. WHITING,
University of Utah.

OUR VIEWS TOO.

SYRACUSE, Davis County, Utah,
January 30, 1894.

In the SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS of Jan. 30 I see a statement that the closing of artesian wells in the fall has not injured them in Davis county. This may be the case in some parts of the county, but it is not the result in this place. We have tried it and our wells have caved in and stopped, and on being re-opened have been in some cases useless on account of constantly stopping off and at other times throwing clay. We do not find that our wells have any effect on the wells on the bench in drawing off their waters. I am informed that West Bountiful can obtain water at less than fifty feet, while in this locality the wells are from 140 to 300 feet. During the winter we have to depend entirely upon our wells for water for house and farm purposes, as the water in dug wells is too full of salt to drink. While in some cases the shutting off of the wells might prove a benefit, in others it would prove an injury. Yours truly,
J. H. COLES.

An exchange states that a resident of Sheridan, Or., has made an umbrella with a window in the top.

OBITUARY NOTES.

MRS. VIOLA E. STEWART.

Mrs. Viola E. Stewart, wife of W. W. Stewart, died at the family residence, No. 439 west Sixth South street yesterday (Monday) afternoon at 2:35 o'clock. The deceased was afflicted with a tumor of extraordinary size and was a sufferer for years. She recently underwent an operation at the hands of skilled surgeons with a view to getting permanent relief, but all the indications pointed to the near approach of death. The deceased was 48 years of age and leaves a husband and one son to mourn her demise. She has relatives living in Chicago and was married there many years ago.

JANE MITTON-RYDALCH.

Jane Mitton Rydalch, wife of Hon. William Rydalch, of Grantsville, Tooele county, died at her home at that place yesterday afternoon, in the 75th year of her age. The deceased was an estimable woman and was well and widely known. She was born in Lingill, near Fettel, Horton Park, Yorkshire, England, November 23, 1819, and came to Utah with her husband and three children in 1853. The family immediately located in Grantsville and has lived there ever since. The lady's demise was caused by heart failure superinduced by exhaustion and bronchitis. She was the mother of eight children, had fifteen grand children and one great grand child.

DAVID D. REESE.

ADAMSVILLE, Beaver county, Utah, January 25, 1894.—Permit me to inform your many readers of the death of Brother David A. Reese of this place. He died on the 19th inst., after an illness of over two months, during which time he suffered very much. He at times threw up great quantities of blood, until poor nature could no longer endure.

He was born at Bradlay, Carmarthen, shire, Wales, October 19, 1828, which made him 65 years and 3 months old. He embraced the Gospel at Blairstown, Monmouthshire, being baptized in 1861; he emigrated to Utah in 1862 with his family and settled in Greenville, Beaver county, where he buried his wife Catharine in 1867. In 1868 he was called upon to go across the Plains to help the emigration companies, and in 1869 he moved to Adamsville and married Elizabeth Grimshaw. Here he was ordained a High Priest under the hands of Daniel Tyler. In 1886 he was chosen as first counselor to Bishop Gunn, of this place, which position he held until his death. He was also first assistant superintendent of the Sunday school of this ward, a position he filled with great zeal, always being at his post on time.

He leaves a wife, six children and ten grandchildren and many friends and relatives to mourn his loss.

The funeral services took place at the Adamsville meetinghouse on Sunday, the 21st, and consoling remarks were made by Elders M. L. Shepherd, D. Grimshaw, J. J. Griffiths, W. Reese, B. Griffiths and F. T. Gunn. The body was taken to the Beaver cemetery for burial; a large cortege, consisting of 26 vehicles, followed the remains to their final resting place.

J. J. GRIFFITHS.

LEVI ROBERTS.

At Kaysville, on the 22nd day of January, there passed from this sphere of action, at the ripe age of 79, Levi Roberts, whose name has gone into history as one of that noble band of heroes—the Mormon Battalion.

He was born in Apperly, Gloucestershire, England, Feb. 26, 1815, where he was brought up in the trade of basket making. He was one of those to whom President Woodruff carried the Gospel, and in 1840 he yielded obedience and was baptized. In 1841 he with his family emigrated to America, being one of the second company that gathered to Zion. In his trade he had accumulated some means which he freely spent in assisting poorer families to come out, and when he reached Nauvoo he found himself but poorly provided to meet the great change in his life and circumstances. Not having been accustomed to rough manual labor, the hardships incidental to frontier life told heavily upon him, but he persevered with an energy and faith that won for him the confidence and respect of those who knew him. He worked much of the time while in Nauvoo for the Prophet Joseph and was entrusted with the responsibility of being one of his body guard during the troublous times immediately preceding his death. With his family he shared in the sufferings and sorrows of that memorable exodus, and finally reached Mount Pisgah, where he commenced clearing land for the purpose of farming. It was here, while working for the necessities of life for his little ones and invalid wife, that the call came for volunteers for the Mexican war. He was a loving husband and deeply devoted to his family, and the riches of the world would not have tempted him to leave them in distress, but with his characteristic faith and willingness, he entrusted them to the hands of God and gave his services to his country.

The history of the Battalion is now his history, as he marched, suffered, struggled and endured with its bravest and best until the final discharge in July, 1847.

His service in the Battalion had been brightened by no tidings from his family during his long absence and in mingled fear and hope he pushed back to Winter Quarters where he was reunited with his loved ones, his wife having been miraculously restored to health. He remained there until 1850, when he came through and settled in Kaysville where he has since resided.

He has been a great sufferer for a number of years and his going was a happy release. His life has been an exemplification of faith, humility and energy in the cause of God. Honor to his name!
W.

THE DEAD.

Peaceful be their Rest.

REESE.—In this city, Jan. 30, of convulsions, Carl E., infant son of John H. and Nora Reese.

ORSTAD.—At Union, Utah, January 30, 1891, at 7 p.m., at the residence of his son-in-law, Wm. A. Boggess, of paralysis, Ole Engelsen Orstad, aged 78 years. Deceased was born September 2, 1810, in Opdal, Norway; arrived in Salt Lake in 1863. He was for twenty years postmaster of Union.

SANDERS.—On Sunday, Feb. 4, 1894, of old age at the residence of her daughter, Sister W. D. Owen, 130 I street, Twenty-first ward, Francis Sanders, aged 84 years, 11 months and 10 days. She was baptized in Bishop Stortford, England, in 1860; emigrated to Utah in 1864. She died as she lived, a true and faithful Latter-day Saint, with the hope of a glorious resurrection.

CORNELL.—At Salt Lake City, at 1:40 p.m., February 2, 1894, of pneumonia, Thomas Cornell, born at London, England, December 23, 1834. He joined the Church in 1849, and died as he had lived, a faithful Latter-day Saint. Brother Cornell was president of the North London Branch for eight years. He emigrated to Utah in 1867.

Millennial Star, please copy.

ATKIN.—At St. George, Utah, January 27th, 1894, John Peter, son of Wm. and Rachel Thompson Atkins. Deceased was born March 18th, 1877, in Salt Lake City, Utah, and leaves a wife and two children, as well as father, mother, brothers and sisters and a large circle of friends to mourn his departure. But all are consoled by knowing he died firm in the faith of the Gospel.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

Truth and Liberty.

No. 9.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, FEBRUARY 17, 1894.

VOL. XLVIII.

ONE FAITH. ONE LORD. ONE BAPTISM

Discourse Delivered at the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Sunday, January 7, 1894, by

ELDER JOSEPH W. McMURRIN.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

My brethren and sisters, being unexpectedly called upon to stand before you this afternoon, I trust that you will assist me in this trying position by giving to me your faith and prayers, that our Father in heaven, in His mercy and goodness, may give me such words to speak as shall be for our good and benefit. I feel weak in standing up in the presence of so many men and women of experience, who have devoted their lives to the service of God, who have manifested through many long years their willingness to keep the commandments of God, and who have a far better comprehension of the principles of the Gospel than I can hope to have with my limited experience; nevertheless, I do feel exceedingly thankful to the Lord that I have this day a disposition to bear to you my testimony of the truth of the Gospel of Jesus Christ and to exhort you, as well as myself, to faithfulness in keeping the commandments of God. For I do believe that the Lord in this our day has spoken from heaven, that He has revealed the authority of the Holy Priesthood, that He has commanded His saints to bear testimony of the truth of this work, and to cry aloud to the people of the earth to repent, because the kingdom of heaven is at hand, and the day of the coming of our Master is drawing near, when He is to be revealed in flaming fire, as the scriptures say, taking vengeance on those who know not God and obey not the Gospel of His Son. I believe that the authority to make this proclamation to the world has been given to men in these days.

It is not a new thing for men to declare that they have received authority from God. Men in all ages of the world who have ever prophesied or spoken in the name of the Lord, or who have had the right to administer in the ordinances of the Gospel, have declared that they received the authority that they exercised from our Father in heaven. It has not been customary among the preachers of righteousness to declare that they had received authority from the governments of the earth, but that they had received it from on high. The Apostles of our Master, when He tarried in the flesh, received their authority from the Son of God, who called them from the occupations in which they were engaged and sent them forth to be ministers of salvation. He laid His hands upon them and blessed them, and ordained and set them apart to the calling whereunto He had called them, sealed the promise of the Spirit of God upon them, and commissioned them to go forth among the children of men to preach His Gospel—the Gospel that was the power of God unto salvation, that was to turn men from the error of their ways and to plant their feet in the straight and narrow path that would lead them back into the presence of God. It is that Gospel that we should be seeking after today. It was the everlasting Gospel, we are told, that they were commissioned to preach. The Apostles taught that there was but one way whereby men could enter into the kingdom of our Father, and we are told that they taught under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. The Savior himself made the promise to them that He would send them the Holy Ghost, whose office and mission was to lead and guide into all truth, bring things past to their remembrance, show them the present, and reveal unto them the future. It was not to guide them into error; it was not to cause them to preach doctrine that was not essential to the salvation of mankind; but its office and mission was to reveal eternal truth. This power was given to the Apostles of our Savior in their day, and they went forth among the children of men preaching the Gospel that had been taught to them by the Savior, declaring to the people that there was but one way, but one Lord, but one faith, but one baptism, and one God and Father of all. This is the doctrine of the Testament, the doctrine that was advocated by the Apostles of old, and it is the doctrine that is good for us today. It has come from the Founder of Christianity—from the Son of the living God. It was preached by Him who spake as man never spake, and who came according to the appointment of the Father, that He might redeem the world and work out salvation for every son and daughter of Adam who would listen to His teachings and practice the same. And when He commissioned and gave authority to His Apostles and sent them out to preach the Gospel, they taught those things which they had received from the Master. They called upon the people everywhere to repent; they bore testimony that the sayings of the prophets in relation to the coming of the Messiah had been fulfilled; that He had been in their midst, had suffered, had been crucified, had risen again, and had ascended on high to His Father in heaven. Because of this testimony which they bore they were persecuted, derided, separated from the company of their fellow men, and their names were cast out as evil. Nevertheless, they were true and faithful in bearing this testimony and in seeking to publish abroad the glad news of the Gospel.

What was the Gospel, my brethren and sisters and friends, in those times? What were the principles that were advocated by the Apostles, and that were taught by those who followed after them? We might refer to some of the principles that were advocated as being necessary to salvation in the days of our Savior. When He sent abroad the Apostles with the authority to call men to repentance He commanded them to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. A very sweeping commandment! A mighty responsibility! "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." This was the promise that was made to them; those who would believe in the testimony they had to bear should be saved through yielding obedience to the doctrines they were sent to teach, while those who would not receive these doctrines should be lost. The Apostles were commanded to go forth, baptizing all nations "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Not teaching them, as many men claim, that the only thing essential to salvation is simply to confess Christ with our lips, to acknowledge that He came upon the earth, that He suffered and died for us, and that through this acknowledgment we shall inherit eternal life. But those Apostles, who ought to have known what was necessary inasmuch as they received their teaching from the lips of the great Lawgiver himself, called upon the people to observe all things whatsoever the Master had commanded them. In addition to faith, repentance and baptism, the Savior taught the necessity of doing unto others as we would have them do unto us; He taught the principle of sobriety and of honesty, and many other precious things that were calculated to make men better and to place the feet of the human family in that straight way which would lead back into the presence of God. All these things the Apostles were commanded to teach.

It is a strange thing to me that men who believe that Jesus was the Christ, that through Him and by Him alone mankind can be saved, can deny the necessity of observing the commandments that He gave. It is popular today among Christendom to declare that these things possibly were essential before our Master suffered upon Calvary's cross, but that after He had bowed His head declared "It is finished" and gave up the ghost, then there was no longer any necessity for these things to be observed; that it was essential for men to receive the principles that I have spoken of before the great work was wrought out on Calvary, but after that had been accomplished it was not necessary for men to obey these principles, Christ having wrought out eternal life for all who would believe in His name. It is true that the scriptures declare that "God so loved the world, that he gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life!" But we are told in the same scriptures, by one of the Apostles, that it is folly for us to profess to have faith in God without works. "What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? Can faith save him? * * * For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also." We understand the condition of the body without the spirit; life has vanished. There is no light, no power, no intelligence in the body when the spirit is called away. If faith without works, therefore, is of this character, as the Apostle James has declared it to be, then those who have faith only, not adding works to their faith, are in a very sorry condition. We might also remember, my friends, that the commandment that was given to the Apostles to preach the Gospel among the children of men was given after the Savior had been nailed to the cross and endured all the pain and anguish through which He passed, and had risen from the dead. It was then that He sent His Apostles forth to preach the Gospel in all the world. After He had ascended on high, and while they were gathered together, the Holy Ghost came upon them, we are told, as a rushing, mighty wind, and under the power and inspiration of that Holy Ghost they went out among the people of Jerusalem and commenced to preach Christ and Him crucified. Peter reasoned upon that occasion from the scriptures and demonstrated by the word of God that this man who had been crucified was both Lord and Christ, until the people were converted by the power of the Holy Spirit and pricked in their hearts, and they cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" The answer given by that man, who was full of the Holy Ghost, was, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. For the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call."

Now, we are called a peculiar people. Our religion is called a very peculiar religion. Men believe that there is something about it different to all other sects of Christendom. In fact, we are generally set aside as not belonging to Christendom at all. A great many do not understand that we have a belief in the Savior of the world, and that we worship the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. There is a belief abroad to a surprising extent, that we worship Joseph Smith, that we look upon him as our god, that we expect to obtain salvation through him, and that we do not recognize the Savior of the world. But this is not true. Our peculiarity exists in holding to the doctrines of the Gospel, and in believing that those principles that were essential for the salvation of mankind eighteen hundred years ago are essential today. We believe this, for one reason, because the scriptures teach that God is the same yesterday, today and forever; that He is without the shadow of turning, that He is the same in the Gospel and in the way of salvation to us who live today as He was to those who lived eighteen hundred years ago. We go further than that: we believe that this Gospel that is taught today was taught by our Savior, and that it was received by Moses and Adam, and that it has been among the children of men from the beginning of time. We do not believe that the Gospel has been preached continuously from the creation of man, but we do declare that whenever the authority of God has been upon the earth, and a Gospel dispensation has been committed to the children of men, its laws and ordinances have been the same. The Apostle Paul testifies that the same doctrines he had received were preached before unto Abraham, and also to the Israel of God under Moses. We believe that our father Adam understood the principles of faith, repentance, baptism and the laying on of hands; that he had a perfect knowledge of the atonement that was to be wrought out by our Savior, that he taught it to his children, and that they, as they spread abroad upon the face of the earth, took this knowledge with them, and thereby was spread the belief that is held by all nations in a Supreme Being and the understanding that they have, to some extent, of the atonement. We believe that this Gospel has been preached from the beginning of time, and that it will be preached until the end of time.

We not only believe that those who live today will hear the doctrines of the Gospel, but that all who have ever lived, though they have died without hearing it, will have the Gospel preached unto them. This is in accordance with the scripture. The promise is made that as in Adam all died, so shall in Christ all be made alive. But we do not believe, as many do who profess to be followers of the Savior, that because we are made alive through the atonement we shall therefore be brought up and exalted in the presence of God. We believe that the bonds of death will be broken, and that every soul, whether good or bad, believer or unbeliever, will be brought from the grave in the due time of the Lord, through the atonement of our Savior. Then we believe that there will come a day of judgment, when the books shall be opened, and every man shall be judged according to the things that are written, whether they be good or evil. We are not to be judged according to the professions that we make; but we are to be judged according to the deeds that we perform in our lives. This is the testimony that we read in the Revelations of John. John was shown the history of the world, it may be said. He saw the time when there would be an apostasy from the things that had been introduced by the Savior and taught by the Apostles; when men would turn away from them, as the Apostles testified, and would be turned unto tables; when they would seek after men who would teach them the doctrines and commandments of men, to tickle their ears, and when their hearts would be removed far from the things of God. John saw these things, and also when death and hell should deliver up the dead that were in them, and the sea give forth the dead that were in it, and the books should be opened, and another book should be opened, called the book of life, and out of the things that were written all the dead should be judged. We believe this. The professions that we make with our mouths are nothing; it is the acts that we perform in our lives that will count in the great day of judgment. If our lives have been righteous, if we have kept our feet in the right path, if we have been valiant for the testimony of Jesus, if we have been willing to be used as God directs in the building up of His kingdom, and worn out our lives in His service, we believe that these things in the great day of judgment will bring eternal life. But if we have been neglectful and careless, and would not listen to the counsel of God, but professed great things with our mouths and did very little, this profession will not aid us, but we shall be placed among those who are spoken of as goats, whom Matthew says were upon the Savior's left hand, when He professed unto them that He never knew them, notwithstanding their professions that they had done many wonderful things in His name, and He commanded them to depart from Him. In this we are peculiar, my brethren and sisters. We believe that every man, great or small, must observe and do the things that God has commanded; that He is willing to give salvation, exaltation and glory to every son and daughter that He has created; but He will give it in the way that He has declared—through obedience to Him, and not through marking out our own path in life.

People ask what necessity should there be for revelation in these days. "Why should God speak from heaven in these latter times? We have Jesus and the Apostles; we have many of the words that they uttered; we have the principles that they advocated; we understand the things that they did and how they expected to obtain eternal life; and what necessity is there for more revelation?" Every missionary, I suppose, has had asked him, "What necessity is there for Joseph Smith? What need for any communication from heaven. We have the scriptures that testify they are able to make us wise unto salvation, and there is no need for any further revelation." We believe, as I have already intimated, that through the apostasy that was spoken of by the Apostles the authority of the Holy Priesthood was lost from among men, and we have very good evidence that this is true. Writers in ages past have borne evidence to this. From the days of our Savior down, it may be said, to our own time, evidence has accumulated mountain high to the fact that men departed from the simplicity of the Gospel as taught by the Savior; that they no longer adhered to the principles advocated by the Apostles; but that they organized societies to suit their own minds. If this is not the case, my brethren and sisters, how is it that religious communities have multiplied to such an extent among men? How is it that there are hundreds of societies, all professing to have Jesus for their guide, and all believing that they are going to obtain salvation through the doctrines that they teach? For the scriptures say that there is one Lord, one faith and one baptism. There can only be one answer to this question. If there had continued among men the doctrine of one Lord, one faith, and one baptism, how different would be the condition of the religious world today from what it is! Now there are hundreds of faiths, some professing one thing, and some another. For long ages there was but one religion among men professing to have our Master as its head, and it groped in darkness and introduced many things that were grievous and sinful and contrary to the written word of God. The result of these things was the rising up of great men like Martin Luther, contending for what they believed to be right. We are told of Martin Luther that when he commenced his opposition to the Church of Rome it was not with the expectation of establishing a new religious society, but in the hope that he might reform some of the abuses that had crept into the church. He bore record to the people that doctrines were being advocated contrary to the scriptures of divine truth, and he sought to correct these things and bring the church into what he considered to be the proper channel. The result was he was excommunicated and cast out of the Church of Rome. Then sprang up reform churches all over the face of the earth. But there is one peculiarity about all of these churches that sprang into existence—the men whom they are named after never intended to establish churches of their own. They sought to cleanse and purify the mother church, and for this they were excommunicated, and then came into existence the religious bodies that bear their names, without revelation or commandment from God, and consequently without authority. We believe that they were honest and good men, and that they were inspired to accomplish the work that they set their hands to do. The time had come when the God of heaven, in fulfilment of the promises that had been made, was about to accomplish a wonderful work, among the children of men, to establish His kingdom upon the earth, and to usher in the dispensation of the fulness of times; and it was necessary that the priestly control that then existed over the minds of men should be broken, and that religious freedom should be introduced, so that men everywhere should have the privilege of worshipping God according to the dictates of their own conscience. To bring about this condition, we believe that the reformers were inspired of God, and we enjoy today the result of their labors. Men offered their lives that they might worship as they saw fit. Martin Luther, when his life was hanging in the balance, declared before those who accused him that the stand he had taken he could not recede from, and he prayed for God to help him. He was willing to lay down his life, if need be, as many before and many since have done. We believe that all these things were wrought out by our Father in heaven, that the minds of men might be free and that they might worship as they chose. Then when this great government of America had been set up upon this promised land, in fulfilment of the promise that the Lord had made to its ancient inhabitants, men were inspired to come here when in trouble and distress, and not turn from their determination; like the discoverer of America, who persisted that he could find a new world, and no one could turn him from it. That was because he was inspired of the Lord; the Holy Ghost rested upon him and impelled him forward to the accomplishment of his work. And God raised up men in America, in His own time, fired with His Spirit, determined to establish a commonwealth that should be free, to which men of all nations might be invited, and in which they could live and worship as they saw fit. We believe God established this government. We not only believe this, but we have a knowledge of it. In a revelation given to the Prophet Joseph Smith, and recorded in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, it is said that the Saints wherein they had been wronged by their enemies should importune for redress. "According to the laws and Constitution of the people which I have suffered to be established, and should be maintained for the right and protection of all flesh according to just and holy principles. And for this purpose have I established the Constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood." Doc. and Cov. Sec. 101. 77, 80. This government was established—the freest and the best there is on the face of the earth, and then the time came for the Lord to fulfil His promise, that before the second coming of the Son of Man the Gospel of the kingdom should be preached in all the world. When He was asked by His Apostles, "What shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the world?" He answered them by portraying the great events that should precede the end, and among other things He said, "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations." This was one of the signs that should appear before His coming. John the Revelator saw "another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue and people. That was the proclamation of the angel who was to introduce the Gospel in the latter days. The way having been prepared, freedom established, that man might worship as he saw fit, that angel, we bear record, was sent from the presence of our Father with the proclamation of the everlasting Gospel. And to Joseph Smith that messenger came, delivered the Gospel to him, and gave to him the authority to preach the plan of salvation. We believe that John the Baptist came and laid hands upon the head of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery and ordained them to the Aaronic Priesthood; that he gave them the authority to baptize for the remission of sins, and with that authority came the commandment to preach the Gospel among the children of men. Then Peter, James and John came, in their time, and clothed the Prophet Joseph Smith with the authority of the Melchisedek Priesthood—that authority by which the kingdom of God can be built up and regulated in all the world. We believe these things have come to pass, that they are in fulfilment of the promises made of old, and that without they are fulfilled, without angels come from heaven and there is communication from our Father, all men are groping in the dark and will fall into the ditch together.

It seems to me, my brethren and sisters and friends, from the conditions that exist today in the religious world, that all men everywhere should be pleading with the Lord that there might come some proclamation from on high and some man who would speak in the name of the Lord, to guide the people who desire to serve God in the right way. But Joseph Smith was despised, his name was cast out as evil, and his followers were derided and separated from the company of their fellow men, who have cried out, as it were, "Away with these fellows, for they are not fit to live." Notwithstanding this opposition and this evil speaking, the proclamation of the Gospel under Joseph Smith has gone abroad among the nations of the earth; and as an evidence that men have received an understanding of its truth, this Territory is filled with people who are willing to stand up and bear record that they know that Joseph Smith was a prophet, that they know that God has spoken, and that He has set His hand in these latter times to recover Israel and to gather them from the nations of the earth and bring them together in one, according to the promises that He has made; that He has not forgotten His promises, not gone on a far journey, not gone to sleep, but that He is the living and true God, and that the day has come to fulfil and accomplish all that He has spoken.

How thankful we ought to be, my brethren and sisters, that the Gospel has found us; that our ears have been saluted with the glad message of peace on earth and goodwill among men; that we have been persuaded by the Spirit of the Lord to come out from the midst of Babylon and gather up with the Saints of God. The Gospel net has been cast into the sea of mankind and it has gathered up its thousands and tens of thousands, who are here today in these mountains. What a testimony, my brethren and sisters, that the proclamation of Joseph Smith was not in vain! What a testimony this is to the world that the martyrdom of Joseph Smith did not stop the work that he had been commanded by our Father to establish! What a testimony that the passing away of President Young did not stop the onward march of the people of God. Men believed that Brigham Young was the great controlling spirit among the Latter-day Saints, and that it was because of His wonderful wisdom that the people were made as great as they were. While we honor the name of President Young and we know that God inspired him to accomplish the work, it is not to President Young that we give the glory, my brethren and sisters, but to our Father in heaven. We know that our Father guided President Young, as He guided President Joseph Smith, as he guided President Taylor, as He guides today President Woodruff. It is our Father who has controlled the destiny of this people, and we are making the same advancement today that we did under President Brigham Young or President Joseph Smith, and we will make just as great advancement in the future under the leaders whom God will call to be at our head as we would if President Joseph Smith were with us.

This work does not depend upon any man that has ever lived, or that lives today, or that ever will live. It is the work of God. He has said that He would proceed to do a marvelous work and a wonder among the children of men, and how wonderfully He has fulfilled that promise up to the present time! And how grateful and thankful we ought to be that we have gathered from the nations of the earth; that we have been made acquainted with the principles of the Gospel, and that down in our hearts is the belief today, just as strong as it was in the hearts of the Apostles of our Savior, that there is one faith, one Lord, one baptism, and one God and Father of us all. That faith has been delivered through angels sent from heaven to people who live today, and this Gospel is being preached. Our missionaries are going to all the nations of the earth, and going gladly without money and without price, thanking God for the opportunity that they have to go out and cry repentance to mankind, to strive to lead them in the straight and narrow way. The proclamation of the Gospel has been commenced, and it will never cease until every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Jesus is the Christ, to the glory of God the Father. This is the promise that has been made. The responsibility rests upon the Elders of Israel today, to preach this Gospel everywhere and warn men of the judgments that are to come, to prepare them for the great day of the Lord, when our Savior shall be revealed in flaming fire.

May God help us to understand our calling and the responsibility that rests upon us. May He give us the courage of our convictions, and may we go forward honestly, manfully and consistently, and strive to do our duty, and let our light so shine among men that this nation and all the nations of the earth may know that we are honest, and godly, and sincere; that we love the institutions of our country as well as the institutions of heaven, and that we desire to bring an era of peace upon this earth and goodwill to all men. This is my prayer, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

Written for this Paper.

HARRISON AND GARFIELD.

President Harrison has put an immense amount of time on the lectures which he is to deliver before the Stanford University. He has devoted all of his leisure to the work and has worked the lectures out from original sources, so that they will probably be a valuable contribution to legal science. I met last night General Michener, who was to a large extent President Harrison's political manager, and who is one of his closest and most confidential friends. I asked him whether it was true that Harrison hoped to be renominated as a candidate for the presidency in 1896. He replied, "I personally know that there is nothing in that story. President Harrison does not want to be renominated, and there is no organized movement among his friends pointing toward his nomination, and in fact he has told me that he would not run. Just after the election of 1892 he began to get letters from all parts of the country proposing that he be a candidate in 1896. These letters increased as his term approached its close, and he had many callers, who urged the same thing. He discouraged them all, and he seldom discussed the matter. I remember two interviews that I had with him in the White House during February of last year. These were long and confidential, and in one of them I began to speak of the general sentiment in favor of his nomination. He shook his head positively as I mentioned the matter, and I could see from his features how much he resented the idea as I went on. But I said, 'General, however little you may care to think of another nomination it ought certainly to be a great personal gratification to you to know that the people appreciate your administration and that they are anxious to see you again in the White House.'

President Harrison replied: "As to the personal gratification, I feel that most deeply, but as to the thought of becoming again a candidate for the presidency, I do not harbor it for a moment. It is contrary to all my inclinations, and when I leave the White House I expect to say good-bye to it forever. My life in it has not been a happy one. It has been filled with care and the greatest sorrows that have come to me have fallen upon me since I entered these doors. 'My associations with it are not happy ones and I want to retire for good from its cares and worries and troubles. I have no idea that I will ever be a candidate for the presidency again, and I do not desire it.'"

"What has Gen. Harrison done since the close of his term?" said I.

"He has been practicing law. He lately argued a big case in Indianapolis, and he is doing considerable office business in the way of counselling, etc. He is one of the ablest lawyers of the country, and he is very fond of the practice. He finds the preparation of his law lectures a much bigger job than he anticipated, but he is going into the matter thoroughly, and their delivering will be quite an event in the legal world."

"How many lectures are there?"

"I do not know, and I don't know that the number was fixed, but I understand he expects to go west some time in February to deliver them."

"I suppose he gets a good price for the work?" said I.

"Yes," replied Gen. Michener, "there is no doubt about that. I do not think he would have promised to give them if he did not. He has never said anything to me, however, about his compensation for them, and I don't know what the amount is. His lectures will certainly be valuable. He is one of the ablest thinkers in the country, and I am surprised to find that his great address on labor and capital, which was delivered in Philadelphia a few days ago, was not made more of. I don't suppose people knew what it was to be. The Associated Press did not report it, and the only place where it was published in full was in one of the Philadelphia newspapers, which called upon Gen. Harrison for a copy of his manuscript. It is queer how the greatest efforts of our famous men are sometimes lost to the people."

Speaking of unknown great papers of famous men recalls a chat I had the other night with the Rev. Dr. Power, who was James A. Garfield's pastor during a great part of his congressional career, and was acting as such at the time when President Garfield was assassinated. He told me that some of the best things that Garfield ever uttered were given by him in the lecture room of his church. He once delivered a lecture on "Ruins of Ephesus," which surpasses in diction, thought and beauty the most of his public speeches. But there were no reporters present, and though Garfield had spent weeks upon it, it never got into the newspapers or into any edition of Garfield's works. "Garfield was at this time in Congress," said Dr. Power. "He had made a great study of the discoveries of Schlieman and others, and he illustrated his talk with maps which were drawn for the purpose. It was an eloquent effort full of genius."

"Was Garfield much of a student?"

"Yes, he was an indefatigable student," replied Dr. Power. "He was always adding something to his stock of knowledge, and he had his information so classified that he could lay his hands on any subject at a moment's notice. He took notes of everything he read, and filed these away in pigeon holes. He could post himself up in a short time on any subject which had interested him in times past, and his mind was such an analytic one that his thoughts came out in rounded periods and as a harmonious whole. He had always some line of study entirely apart from his work in Congress. He was fond of the classics and he kept up his studies of Greek and Latin throughout his life. He reviewed his college studies while he was in Congress, and when he got especially tired of the proceedings of the House he used to sometimes take up a Latin book and read it. I remember one day when an especially tedious debate was going on he decided to see how many verses of Horace he could write from memory. He wrote out five, and when he got home that night he compared his manuscript with the original, and he found he had not made a single mistake in writing them. He was a charming talker, was full of ideas, and was very fond of talking of literature."

"You accompanied his funeral car to Cleveland, did you not, doctor?"

"Yes," was the reply, "and it was the most affecting journey I ever made. All along the line of road we were greeted by the people, and at some of the stations parties of Grand Army men knelt along the track and lifted up their hands in prayer as the train went by."

"It is not generally known how near President Garfield came to being shot in our little church on Fourteenth street," continued Dr. Power. "He came regularly to church every Sunday, and frequently to prayer meeting. On Sundays he had a seat near the pulpit on the right as you go in. His seat was just next a window, and he usually sat in the end of the pew, so that his head leaning against the window casing extended out for some distance in front of the glass panes. This window was so located that any one going into the yard which then existed on the side of the church could come up to it and look into the church. It was not more than waist high, and it was Guiteau's intention to have slipped up to it and have shot Garfield through the window. Had he done so, nothing could have saved him. Garfield's brains would have been scattered over the church, and a revolution might have been the result. Guiteau came up to the church and looked over the situation some weeks prior to the time at which he shot the President at the Baltimore and Potomac depot. He had planned to have killed him at the church the Sunday before, but Mrs. Garfield was sick and the President wanted to get her out of the city. She was ill during the latter part of that week, and it was thought she could not be moved. She grew much better, however, Sunday morning, and the President decided to take her away. For this reason he was not at church on the following Sunday."

"The Guiteau decided to perform his bloody deed on the Sunday following."

The President came back to the White House. Toward the last of the week the report got out that he intended to leave Washington for Long Branch on Saturday. Guiteau saw that he could not reach him on Sunday and he decided to kill him at the depot. Had Garfield gone to church the first Sunday, or had Guiteau waited, I don't see how he could have helped killing Garfield instantly."

"I suppose, Dr. Power," said I, "that you were with President Garfield during a great part of his illness. You must have known him very well. Do you think he was a genuine Christian?"

"Yes, I have no doubt of that," replied Dr. Power. "He showed his faith in many ways. He often spoke at my church, and you know he preached when he was a young man. It is not true that he ever intended to devote himself to the ministry. It was always his idea to study law, and his preaching was done while he was at Hiram College. It was not with any idea of making the ministry his profession. As to his faith, I saw some evidences of this during his last days. One day at the White House the question of the efficacy of prayer came up. Garfield had been in great pain and he was talking of this with Mrs. Garfield. He asked her whether she believed in prayer, and he then went on to say that the night before when he was in terrible pain and could not sleep, he had prayed to the Lord to either relieve him from the pain or to give him the fortitude to bear it better. 'At the moment I uttered the prayer,' said he, 'my pain left me, and shortly after that I fell into a sleep.'"

The conversation here turned to Judge Jeremiah Black of Pennsylvania, who was also one of Dr. Power's parishioners. Dr. Powers said:

"I regard Jeremiah Black as one of the greatest men who ever lived. He was a man of wonderful information and great brain power. He was a thoroughly well read man, and he quoted a great deal from Shakespeare and the Bible. He seemed to know these two books by heart, and his contact with them formed a large part of his intellectual life. Judge Black was a most charming talker, and he could entertain you for hours in telling his experiences with public men and matters. He had ideas of his own, and he was never anything but interesting. He was one of the most absent-minded men I have ever known. One story Mrs. Judge Black vouches for as authentic in regard to him. She said that she was in the custom of putting up Judge Black's clothes for him whenever he went away. In fact, she attended to his clothes entirely, buying new ones when the old ones began to grow shabby, and replacing the old suit with a new one, while the judge was in bed. She said the judge did not seem to realize when he changed his clothes, and that on a certain campaign tour which he took she put up a bag for him in which there were a half dozen new shirts. When he had returned from the trip she examined the bag and found it empty. She said, 'Why, judge, where are your shirts?'"

"He replied, 'I don't know; aren't they there?'"

"No," she said. "Your valise has none in it, and when you left here you had half a dozen."

"I don't know what became of them," said Judge Black. "But that night when upon his disrobing for bed she found that the whole six shirts were on the judge's person. This is a most remarkable story," concluded the parson, "but I have no doubt of its truth, as it was, as I told you, Mrs. Black herself who gave it to me. It is evident that the honorable judge did not wear night shirts, or he must have put them on over the ones he used during the day."

Speaking of Garfield, the question as to whether he was true or false to Sherman at the convention which nominated him is yet unsettled in many minds. I interviewed Gen. Garfield the night before he was nominated. The rumor of his possible choice was then in the air. I was correspondent of his chief newspaper organ, the Cleveland Leader, and I asked him if it was true that the Ohio vote might leave Sherman and come to him on the day following. He put his arm around my neck and said in emphatic tones: "My boy, that question is almost an impertinent one, but I have heard of the rumor before and I assure you it is false. I will be a villain if I prove false to Sherman, whom I have come here to support, and you can report to your people that there is nothing in the story and that we are for Sherman to the last." Gov. Foster who slept with Gen. Garfield, says that he was true to John Sherman, and I had an interview the other day with Col. W. C. Cooper of Mount Vernon, Ohio, who was six years in Congress and who was one of the chief friends and workers of Senator Sherman at the convention of 1880. During the talk the subject of Garfield's fidelity came up and Col. Cooper said:

"I know that the nomination came to Gen. Garfield without his seeking. He voted for Sherman to the last and he labored for him until he became convinced that either Grant or Blaine would be nominated. He did not think that Grant could be elected for a third term, and when he saw there was no chance for Sherman he was anxious to see Blaine chosen. It was his feeling on Friday morning when he went to the convention from which he came as a nominee for the presidency, that the Sherman men should go to Blaine, and I had a talk with him just before he started for the convention, which may be an important contribution to the unwritten history of that time."

"What was that, general?" said I.

"It was at the Grand Pacific hotel. I was just starting for the hall when Garfield came up to me, and laying his hand on my shoulder asked me what I thought of the situation. I replied that I could see nothing in it for us, and I feared Grant would be nominated before the night of the morrow."

"Yes," replied Gen. Garfield, "you are right; unless we do something, unless we quit our foolish wasting of our votes upon our candidate, whose nomination we can now see impossible, I predict that Grant will be nominated, not to-morrow, but before sundown today."

"Well said I, 'what can we do? I don't see how we can leave Sherman. What would you suggest, Senator Garfield?'"

"Gen. Garfield replied: 'I think the Ohio delegation should meet and agree to say to Mr. Sherman that his nomination is impossible, ask him to instruct us to withdraw his name, and then we should work and vote for Blaine. This nomination lies between Grant and Blaine, and as between them I believe three-fourths of the Republicans of Ohio prefer Blaine, and I feel it is our duty to represent them in voting for Blaine's nomination.'

"Well, Mr. Senator," said I, "who will inaugurate such a movement in our delegation? I am sure our chairman, Governor Dennison, will not."

"I presume not," he replied, "but Cooper, you could and ought to do it; you are the Ohio member of the national committee and Sherman's neighbor."

I quickly responded, "I do not feel authorized to do anything of the kind, and surely will not undertake it, but you as Sherman's representative in the convention can do it."

Garfield shook his head and answered, "No, I can't; I am handicapped, I ought not to be here and said so to Mr. Sherman, but he insisted on my coming and presenting his name, so I came and did that, which was all that I was to do."

"And which you did most magnificently," I interrupted. "Thank you," said he, tipping his hat, and continued, "but since I have been here there has been just enough of this foolish talk about my nomination, which never was anything but nonsense, that I have become a subject of criticism and suspicion, and much as I would like to, I can do nothing."

"Well," said I, "even if Sherman should withdraw, we cannot cast the vote of Ohio solidly for Blaine. Governor Dennison repeatedly said to me that when it came to a choice between Grant and Blaine; he was for Grant, and there are others of the same mind."

"I know it," said Garfield. "Warner Bateman said this morning with a great oath that he would never vote for Blaine."

By this time we had reached the building in which the convention met, and as we entered the door Garfield drew a long breath and said, "Here we are, and unless I am mistaken, Grant will be nominated before we adjourn, and we will lose the state election in Ohio."

I am certain that at that time Garfield was not even thinking of his own nomination, that he believed that either Grant or Blaine would be nominated, and was exceedingly anxious for Blaine's nomination and desired to vote for it, although he was himself nominated within less than two hours from that time.

FRANK G. CARPENTER.

IN MEMORY OF A MARTYR.

Elder Edward Stevenson handed in the following article for publication:

"Friday evening intimate friends of the Patriarch Hyrum Smith met at the residence of Sister Elizabeth Davis, in the Sixteenth ward, to commemorate the martyred Patriarch's birthday. Singing, recitations, music and addresses in memory of one who still lives in the hearts of many were enjoyed. Refreshments were served and happy hours glided pleasantly away. One half of a century has passed away since the terrible martyrdom by wicked men of two of God's servants. Only six of the whole company present had ever beheld in the flesh the faces of the two martyrs Joseph and Hyrum, viz., Joseph F. Smith, John Salth, Bishop F. Kesler, his wife, Jane M. Kesler, Edward Stevenson and Sister Helen Smith."

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

SUCCESSION IN THE PRESIDENCY.

"Succession in the Presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints" is the title of a pamphlet from the able pen of Elder B. H. Roberts, of the presidency of the Seventies, and just published by the DESERET NEWS Publishing company. The aim of the author is to throw the search light of history and logic as well as revelation on the controversy for which the "Reorganized Church," commonly known as the "Josephites," is responsible. He treats the subject exhaustively and establishes his conclusions with irrefutable arguments, presented in clear and vigorous language. In the first sections the various claims to the succession of the Presidency of Joseph the Prophet are dealt with. Sidney Rigdon's rejection by the Church as a guardian receives special attention and the pretenses of William Smith, Miller and Strang are shown in their true character. Then a sketch of the birth of the "Reorganized church" is given and the claims of "young Joseph" considered. The author further shows that with the death of Joseph and Hyrum and the rejection of Sidney Rigdon, the First Presidency was removed and the succession in the Presidency went to the Twelve, in accordance with the teaching of the Doctrine and Covenants, the testimony of Joseph himself, and the expressed views of the Josephites themselves upon the order of Presidency in the Church. In proof that the Almighty has sustained the Church, Elder Roberts points to the work accomplished under the faithful leadership first of the Twelve and then under Presidents Brigham Young, John Taylor and Wilford Woodruff. The little work closes with a testimony of President Woodruff on the subject discussed, delivered in the Assembly Hall, this city, February 8, 1892.

For the valuable Church historical data, gathered from many sources, as well as for the convincing clearness with which the theme is treated, the pamphlet will be read and reread with great interest by the Saints. Its tone is free from bitterness and the points are made with accuracy and impartiality. It can be recommended to the careful perusal of members of the Reorganized church as well as to all who are interested in the subject of which it treats. To those who look for truth it cannot fail to be a welcome and helpful guide.

BE EXEMPLARY.

The influence wielded by example is the most potent that a person can exercise for good or ill. Whether the field of operations be among the youthful or the aged, in public or private life, the estimate placed upon an individual is based on his conduct rather than on his professions, and his influence receives its force from his actions rather than from any theoretical standard he may raise. The rule expressed by the Savior, "By their fruits ye shall know them," is that which men apply, consciously or unconsciously, to their fellow beings, and then direct relations with them in accord with that judgment. Upon this rule, people who so give themselves up to evil as to malign and afflict those who walk in a higher and nobler path, yet have a measure of admiration for an upright, consistent man, and feel and recognize his superiority.

Not only are the associates of an individual affected by his method in life, but his own character is formed or changed thereby. For instance, frivolous conduct and thoughtlessness wield a baneful influence, and to the extent that a person submits himself thereto does he become frivolous and thoughtless, and his life's superstructure is weakened. His offense in this line is made more serious according as others may be led away by his bad example. It is a universal law that an account will be rendered of the works of all men. Each act that is not inspired by a desire for righteousness will bring its condemnation; while each kind and thoughtful expression, each loving and noble deed, will lay claim to blessings that cannot be refused.

The great Exemplar of Christian doctrine taught: "Every idle word that men shall speak they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment." This is a declaration of the principle that the future of man is affected by his present deportment. He must at some time answer for every idle word. Shall it be said that such words include only foolish or ill-advised expressions that come from a spirit of recklessness or a neglect of the proper amenities of life and of the dignity of manhood or womanhood? or do they also embrace professions that are made idle words by being disregarded in conduct—words that shall stand at the great day against those who uttered them and shall judge them for their hypocrisy? Folly and heedlessness have an ill effect upon those who submit to them, but how much more serious is the injury wrought by the vain professions which make hypocrites!

The matter of being exemplary in their habits ought to receive careful attention from those who have received the light of the Gospel. They should seek to conform to the truths they have accepted, not only in word but in every thought and deed. Their example should be worthy of emulation, in that it is harmonious with the Gospel, the fruits of which are love, peace, faith, virtue, charity, knowledge, temperance, patience, diligence, brotherly kindness, humility, godliness. The responsibility of all Saints is to make their lives consistent with their profession of being followers of the Divine Master.

The more prominent a person is before the people, the broader will be the effect of his example. He who is called to be a servant of the Lord is appointed a messenger of salvation to the people. If his practice does not harmonize with the principles he is ordained to promulgate, he becomes by his example a messenger of destruction. This is not because of the principles, but the result of violating them in the deeds performed. For instance, the Lord forbids the use of strong drink, and enjoins temperance. Suppose one called to the ministry should indulge in intoxicants. He not only brings scandal on the Church thereby, but in so doing becomes a servant of the evil one, and a messenger of destruction to himself and those influenced by his example. Instead of being true to his calling as an ambassador of the Lord, he betrays the One in whose service he has enlisted, to the extent of his wrongful action and its effects, because his influence and strength are used to aid the enemy.

Those who have received the sacred office of Elders in Israel are called to be preachers of righteousness. If they were to make this merely a profession of the lips, and their example be evil, they would become preachers of unrighteousness through that misconduct, and would be unworthy their calling. If, however, they continue in their lives to show forth brotherly kindness, love, and faith, they are teaching principles that lead men to God; if they remain diligent, patient and humble, the door of inspiration is open to them in their holy office; while they seek virtue, temperance, knowledge and truth they proclaim the power of godliness to save and exalt. The fruit they bear is to the glory of God and the blessing of themselves and those influenced by them.

All members of the Church are under sacred obligations to be exemplars of the will of the Lord. They are under covenant to remember Him and to keep the commandments which He has given them. In fulfilling these duties is the source of their strength and salvation. Availing themselves of this position, though they may be called to pass through affliction, the burden is lightened by the spirit and power of the Holy One, which is always to them a rift in the clouds, a light in the darkness, that illumines the pathway to the heavenly kingdom. They are observing the command, "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven." As true Saints, bearers of the word and doers of it also, they become models of righteous conduct in all the affairs of life, because of their exemplary habits, attained to through knowledge of and obedience to Gospel truths.

TOLSTOY'S VIEWS ON PRAYER.

During a recently published interview with Count Tolstol, the Russian author, philosopher, philanthropist and nobleman, the conversation drifted to religious topics. The count asserted that the early Christians met in meeting together for worship, since Christ taught that prayer was a private devotion and not for the purpose of public exhibition.

The following is that part of the interview:

"Do you go to church?" the reporter was asked by the count.

"Yes, sometimes," was his cautious reply.

"Why do you?" he asked.

"Because, I think I receive spiritual benefit from public worship, and that it is a pleasant feeling to sing and pray in the company of fellow creatures."

"Can you not get as much benefit by staying at home or praying to God in your garden?"

"I suppose I can, but still I like to go to church, and I believe public worship is recognized and enjoined in the Scriptures."

"Where do you find that?" insisted the count.

"In the Acts of the Apostles and in the Epistles."

"Christ says: 'When you pray pray in secret, and not in the public haunts of men;' their very presence distracts your mind from holy thoughts, and if we wish to pray rightly we must pray alone."

"But the early Christians," I urged, "met together for prayer and worship."

"The early Christians erred in so doing," he answered slowly and emphatically. "Christ never meant people to make a show of praying as they now do in our churches."

The views here expressed may be relied upon as being a true reflex of the religious make up of the famous author of Kreutzer Sonata. He evidently acknowledges Christ's authority as a teacher but is unable to comprehend more than one side of the subject under consideration. Else he would have noticed that the same high authority, which he quotes for secret prayer, enjoins united worship and emphasizes its efficacy. Prayer in general has great promises and united prayer especially so. The nature of the teachings of the great Master is to unite His followers. And their common interests and common views, and above all the true sympathy and brotherly love which result from the real acceptance of the Gospel, necessitate union in prayer as in all other efforts for the propagation of the truth. Some human natures there may be that are almost incapable of the sentimental, even that of the most sanctifying character. They are enough in themselves and need no sympathy, no love—as little as they are capable of giving any. Their highest ideal of human attainment seems to be the isolated existence of a hermit. Possibly Tolstoi is inclined to this view, and probably the peculiarities of his works depend thereon.

THE GAMBLERS' TRADE.

"A subscriber" submits for our inspection a letter from a firm in Chicago, soliciting an examination of certain parts of a catalogue inclosed in the letter. The goods named in the letter, the firm modestly says it has made a most wonderful success of; and they consist of loaded dice warranted perfect and sure of winning four times out of five or better; marked back playing cards, so perfect in finish that none but the initiated can distinguish them from the ordinary card; a hold-out, at cheap price, and such other paraphernalia as would be necessary "to rig out a shrewd customer for sure and easy money." No attention would be paid to replies, the letter continues, unless "this offer be sent back to us (this letter)," presumably as a guarantee of good faith. As the letter was not sent back, it is fair to assume that the person receiving it here entered into no business relations with his alluring correspondents.

When one considers the strictness of the laws with reference to such matters and the usual vigilance of the postal secret service officials and others charged with the detection of these high crimes, it is hard to understand how the scoundrels operating in the lines alluded to are able to enjoy the immunity that their continued boldness gives evidence of. It is not so hard to believe that they find many willing correspondents, and that their rascally wares are freely used in circles where such things are the implements of trade. Nor is it difficult to find at last the proof that gudgeons enough exist to make profitable not only the business of manufacturing swindling devices but also the business of using them. As for the followers of the two last-named pursuits, the law and the public should hound them without mercy. As for those who walk into the snare and then whine when they are fleeced, the community should scorn them without pity. Gambling is a crime in any country where law and civilization have any weight; and in savage and uncouth sections one who not only follows the trade, but makes a success of it by cheating, is summarily killed. While every officer of law should use the utmost zeal in ferreting out and bringing to punishment those who engage in the disreputable and proscribed business, the fact remains that the surest safeguard against the evil is a moral sense so highly developed that the gaming table has no attractions for any member of the community. Among a people where there are no "suckers," there will be few gamblers, and such as there are will only prey upon each other. The more eagerly they bite at such baits as this letter holds out, and the more recklessly they use the fraudulent weapons described, the sooner will they be killed off, and the fair earth rid of their foul presence.

IMMENSE PROFITS.

It is generally understood that the American Bell Telephone company has been making extraordinary profits on its principal patents, which expired January 30th. The Boston Herald has compiled a history of the company, showing what it has earned for its stockholders. From this it appears that when the present company was organized it was with an authorized capital of $10,000,000, and an issued capital of $6,500,000. This was increased to $7,350,000 by giving a right to the National Bell Telephone company's shareholders to subscribe for $850,000 stock at par. From that day until recently subscription privileges at par have been issued, and sundry extra and valuable rights have been given to shareholders. None of these are included in the computation given here.

The National Bell Telephone company had a capital stock of $700,000. When it concluded to reorganize as the American Bell it sold 500 shares in its treasury for $600 per share to meet its "immediate wants," presumably floating debt. It then gave each shareholder six shares for one and turned the property over to the new company for $6,500,000, taking pay in stock at par. The first year ended February 28, 1880, and included two months of the National Bell year. In 1884 the fiscal year was changed to the calendar year and covered but ten months. The total dividend payments and capital at the end of each year have been:

	Dividends.	Capital.
1880-81 .....	$ 178,500	$ 7,350,000
1881-82 .....	416,500	7,350,000
1882-83 .....	595,000	7,350,000
1883-84 .....	1,051,479	9,602,000
1884 .....	1,440,815	9,602,000
1885 .....	1,562,236	9,802,100
1886 .....	1,568,336	9,802,100
1887 .....	1,568,336	9,802,100
1888 .....	1,789,878	9,962,100
1889 .....	1,898,813	11,303,000
1890 .....	2,218,913	12,500,000
1891 .....	2,625,000	15,000,000
1892 .....	2,919,080	17,500,000
1893 Estimated...	3,337,500	20,000,000

Total ..... $23,106,096
Average per year 1,600,435

Large as are these dividends they do not represent the full earnings of the company. In 1884 the company began paying extra dividends and continued these up to the present. They brought the earnings on the capital stock to sums varying in different years from 18 to 27 per cent. The highest dividend was in 1889, when $2,661,888.89 was paid. The company ought to be able to stand a little competition and still pay handsome dividends.

THE YAQUI INDIANS.

The announcement made in the dispatches that General Louis Torres, governor of Sonora, Mexico, had decided upon a war of extermination against the Yaqui Indians is not anything particularly new. Governor Torres has made many attempts of that nature, costing a great deal of blood and treasure, and the Yaquis are still unexterminated. A great many of them, however, have been put to death in the frequent wars with the Mexicans, whose forces greatly outnumber those of the savages.

It is not to the credit of the Sonora authorities that this warfare continues to be waged. A proper respect for Yaqui rights would have produced very different results, and the tribe, uncivilized though it be, receives much sympathy for its determined attitude. The Yaquis are virtually fighting for their independence as a people, though they are being gradually driven to the wall. The Spaniards could not subdue them, and thus far the Mexicans have failed. They insist that the latter have no governmental authority over them, but that it is their right to rule themselves, and they seem to be determined to a man to die rather than have it otherwise. When there is no interference with their lands they are easy enough to get along with. They are the hewers of wood and drawers of water for the inhabitants of Sonora, and are willing to perform hard labor for a mere pittance. But when the government attempts to exercise any control over the affairs of the tribe or the country it claims, they are ready for fight.

The long standing conflict has led the Yaquis to engage in depredations upon the Mexicans even when the latter have not been at war. But in general, from the Yaqui standpoint, the cause of hostilities has been similar to that which brought about the trouble of 1885. Of that, one of the chiefs of the tribe said: "The Mexican government sold a large tract of our land to a German company which made arrangements to bring in immigrants to establish colonies near to us. The Germans are a wealthier and more intelligent people than the Yacuis. We feared that if they were established we should in time become peons (debtor-slaves) to them. We prefer to defend our rights, and would rather die in battle than lose our liberty and be peons to any people. The country belonged to us before the Mexicans came to claim it, and we will not give it up while we can prevent it."

The Yaqui Indians are fine specimens of their race. A few years ago Hon. Brigham Young paid a visit to them, and thus describes his meeting with one of their chiefs or generals, Ignacio Levis: "About 4 o'clock p.m. the chief, followed by his body guard of twelve men, who were well armed with improved rifles and also carried swords, marched into the village. All were dressed in white, which contrasted strangely with their swarthy visages and bare lower extremities. The general carried a silver-mounted staff. He was immediately preceded by his musician, who vigorously pounded a large bass drum. Taken altogether the party made quite an imposing appearance. Personally, Gen. Ignacio Levis is a noble specimen of a man; tall, straight and portly; black hair falling over a lofty brow and a well developed head; large, clear black eyes, and a perfect nose; large mouth, evenly full of strong, even white teeth; heavy jaws, large hands and feet, the latter unusually broad; is about six feet tall and weighs perhaps 210 pounds. The expression of his countenance is pleasant. Especially do his eyes denote a man with a kind heart as well as a keen intellect. His dress consisted of a white shirt, well laundered, and short muslin trousers extending below the knee. His clothing was neatly fashioned, being made by some person skilful with the needle."

It would be a pity to have this courageous tribe of aborigines exterminated; on the other hand it would be a lasting honor to the Mexican official who could effect a just and satisfactory arrangement with the tribe whereby the oft recurring conflicts might be effectively stopped.

THE SUPREME COURT VACANCY.

The Supreme Court of the United States has adjourned until the 5th of March. Before that time it is truly to be hoped that the President and Senate will have become so well acquainted and so friendly disposed toward each other that the vacancy on the bench can have been filled.

It is evident that the objectors who compassed the defeat of Judge Hornblower's confirmation have lost none of their animus or their determination to prepare the same fate for Judge Peckham; and the prospects are that he will be rejected. It is an anomalous and an unhappy situation throughout, and, we are forced to say, not without its discreditable features on both sides. Personal dislike of the candidate on the part of the New York senators should have had no power to defeat the former nomination—such misuse of the senatorial dignity ought to have been rebuked by the other senators and condemned by the press everywhere. But the stubborn determination of President Cleveland to force upon the co-ordinate body the same kind of a candidate again, and apparently for the chief reason that he is particularly obnoxious to the senators from his state, puts him at once on a plane with them. His course amounts to an implied admission that if they can afford to carry partisanship into so high a matter, he can afford to do the same thing. Just how long the influence of Senators Hill and Murphy will be adequate to the defeat of anti-Tammany nominees remains to be seen. Just how long the President will be able to prevail upon respectable "anti-snapper" candidates to consent to be thus made the football of party kicks and spite, is equally uncertain. As long as Hill and Murphy are content to pose as Tammanyites rather than as Democrats and honorable senators, he seems to feel that he can be content to force them into that attitude and keep them there. But there is no virtue in such obstinacy; no more credit for him than for them. He has already compelled them to an unsavory record, and having accomplished that in the former instance, the advantage would have been all with him if he had gone outside of New York for his next selection. His opponents would then have been properly and sufficiently rebuked. To persist in deliberately antagonizing them is undignified in him and an exposure of his official party friends one after another to the risk of needless humiliation through continued defeat.

SLEEPS NEAR HAWARDEN.

The recent intimations that Premier Gladstone would soon retire from public life bring with them the suggestion that in the inevitable course of events the "sage of Hawarden" will ere long "rest the rest that knows no breaking" in mortality. This thought recalls the fact that within a short distance of the quiet home of the Grand Old Man in North Wales rests the body of one whose name is firmly established on the educational interests and institutions of the United States. The tomb of Elihu Yale, who founded the great college in New Haven, is about ten miles distant from Hawarden castle, where Mr. Gladstone lives and reads his prayers in the church over which his son is rector.

Mr. Yale used to spell his name Eliugh, instead of the modern style Elihu. He sleeps in the churchyard at Wrexham, North Wales, his grave being in front of the church door. The town contains nearly 12,000 inhabitants, and the Wrexham church is one of the oldest in Wales. It was built of stone in 1472. Among the old customs yet observed there is the ringing of the curfew bell every night. The tombstone over Elihu Yale's grave bears this inscription:

Born in America, in Europe bred,
In Africa traveled, in Asia wed,
Where long he lived and thrived; in London dead.

Much good, some ill he did, so hope all's even,
And that his soul thro' mercy's gone to heaven.

As with Mr. Yale, so will it be with Mr. Gladstone; his life's work will leave an impress on succeeding generations. "Much good, some ill,"—but integrity and nobleness of purpose will not be cast lightly in weighing even the mistakes of judgment in the great day when all men shall be judged by their deeds and according to the intent of their hearts.

A PLEA FOR STATESMANSHIP.

An alternative opportunity is presented to the Legislature now in session, the like of which never confronted any previous Assembly in this Territory, and has seldom, if ever, been offered to the Legislature of any state or territory in the Union. We make this declaration in all soberness and earnestness, and with no purpose of exaggerating existing conditions. If the present Assembly shall determine so to do, it has the opportunity to enact legislation that will bring disaster and calamity beyond computation upon our fair commonwealth, by impairing our credit abroad, and prostrating our interests and industries at home; or it has the alternative of pursuing a course that will do more for the pecuniary benefit of the people of the Territory as a whole, than can be estimated in advance. The Governor is here included with the Legislature.

There are over a hundred and fifty million dollars of idle capital in the New York banks, and the vaults of savings institutions in large cities of the East are full to bursting. These vast aggregations of idle wealth are rapidly increasing in the money centers, while commercial enterprise and creative industries everywhere are starving for the lack of it. Why is capital being thus hoarded? Because its owners find no place in which they can invest it with confidence that it will be safe and earn an increment. Once show them a place in which they can safely put their wealth, and they will eagerly seek investment there.

Utah today has a credit and standing in the commercial world which are grand. So far her banks and business houses, with few exceptions, have stood the strain magnificently. While Kansas, Colorado and other portions of the West have utterly defaulted in the payment to eastern lenders of both interest and principal, Utah has retained the confidence of her creditors, and her old-time reputation for honestly meeting her obligations. The crisis has also proven that the resources we have boasted of actually exist, and are sources from which may be drawn means with which to pay our debts.

Now, what must result if we will but have a little patience and maintain our reputation for stability? As surely as cause follows effect in the due order of nature, we shall soon be relieved of all necessity to seek for capital. It will seek us, and when once the tide turns towards us, it will flow deep, swift and strong. Confidence, like distrust, is contagious; and when one capitalist shows his confidence in Utah by placing his wealth here, his example will be followed again and again. This is a day of quick communication, and the financiers of Wall street watch, like hawks, the developments that are taking place in every portion of the Union. No event can happen in the most remote corner of the United States, materially affecting any financial interest, that is not known within a few hours after its occurrence, in all the money centers of this country. Even the bills bearing upon any phase of finance, introduced in the Utah Legislature, are forthwith reported by telegraph to the financial centers, where the strain is so intense that a strong vibration is started with a touch.

To the candor, intelligence and patriotism of the members of the Legislature, we appeal with the question: Is not the foregoing true? And being true, how should it affect your votes? It ought to inspire you with a firm resolve to vote down, with a majority so strong as to be a notice to all the world, any proposition calculated or likely to unfavorably affect Utah's credit, and any assault, direct or indirect, upon capital will have that result.

The bill to tax debts secured by mortgages or trust deeds, is a bill to discourage the investment of capital in Utah. It gives evidence that our financial policy is not stable, and that the same is subject to change without notice. It is at variance with that reputation for solidity and conservatism which we must continue to maintain, if we are to hold the increasing confidence of capital. The local lenders fix the rate of interest. If they have to pay a tax on the debts due to them from borrowers, they will indemnify themselves by raising the rate of interest. The eastern lender will ask the rate of interest which the local lenders fix. The borrower is thus made to pay the tax on home capital, which tax the public treasuries in Utah receive, and also a like tax on foreign capital which the owners of the latter receive. The borrower is discouraged with the burdens he is obliged to assume, the enterprise he contemplates is abandoned, home labor is not employed, additional wealth and improvements are not brought into existence, the amount of taxable property is not increased, and our commonwealth ceases to grow, which means that it retrogrades.

The strongest argument in favor of the bill referred to, while it was under discussion in the lower house of the Legislature, was that the subject of it "should be viewed from the standpoint of the state." Viewing it from that standpoint, what course does the highest statesmanship demand of the Utah Legislature? It demands that they take a course to encourage the influx of capital, that they make as light as possible the burdens of the borrower, and as strong as possible the confidence of the lender. If the Legislature desires to relieve the poor and unemployed; if it desires the development of our resources, the increase of public and private wealth, the enhancement of our prestige as a commonwealth, and the welfare of all our interests, it should remember that cheap and abundant capital is the one thing needed.

BETTER THAN BOUNTIES.

There are several measures pending in the Legislature for the giving of bounties to different industries. It is not the purpose of the News at this time to either favor or combat any of these bounty bills, as they are political issues that will doubtless be determined on party lines, and this paper is not in the lists as a party champion. While neither affirming nor denying that a bounty for the encouragement of an industry may be a good thing, we think there is something better and more effective in the way of an impetus to industries of all kinds here in Utah, than any bounties in the power of the Legislature to confer.

The potent force that would make the wheels of our factories hum, cause a forest of smoke-stacks to spring up in our midst, transform into created wealth the vast possibilities of our magnificent resources, and confer upon our citizens all the blessings that would flow from such results, is cheap and abundant capital. A legislative policy that will succeed in persuading capital to come to Utah, either by encouraging progressive citizens to borrow it for active investment in manufacturing or other beneficent enterprises, or in so strengthening the confidence of foreign lenders that they will let their money come to Utah, will accomplish more for home industry, and the employment of our working people, than all the bounties which our Legislature could vote to the most meritorious of our industries.

It is not here intended to discuss the mathematics or metaphysics of taxation. To do this would make it necessary to enter upon the intricacies of a very profound subject. But a surface truth is often as important as any that can be found deeper down, and there is certainly substance in the argument of a gentleman of this city, well known for his ability as a financier, from which it is made to appear that, should the pending bill to tax debts secured by mortgages and trust deeds become a law, the result will be many cases of triple taxation. A man buys a vacant lot and builds upon it an expensive structure. To do this he borrows money. The land, now that the building stands on it, is worth a great deal more than when it was vacant, and the increase in its value increases the tax upon it. The building is taxed at what it cost, or at its value, and the debt secured by a mortgage on the land is also taxed. The financier referred to holds this to be triple taxation, and a great discouragement to would-be improvers of real estate. If the premises be granted, the conclusion is that relief from this discouragement would be as good as, or better than, a bounty.

The points made in the interview with Colonel T. G. Webber, which appeared in the News last Saturday, are well worth the candid consideration of the Legislature. Zion's Benefit Building society, of which Colonel Webber is president, while not claiming to be eleemosynary in character, nor [to dispense charity, is yet a most beneficent institution. It has been the means of creating many comfortable homes in this city, and of conferring upon the community at large all the benefits that have inevitably followed the results it has accomplished. If the bill to tax debts secured by mortgages and trust deeds becomes a law, the result may be to throw this institution out of business, as the stockholders may, and probably will, so vote, in preference to assuming the burdens the law will place upon them.

The gentleman who is the author of the bill, which, should it become law, is likely to destroy this institution, and the industry of home-creating which it has been the means of carrying on so successfully for many years, is an ardent advocate of a bounty for each of several industries that are asking legislative aid. Now would it not be as well to foster such enterprises as Zion's Benefit Building society by declining to tax them to death, as to give a bounty to some other industry?

Perhaps it is true that revenue laws are necessarily harsh, and that it is impracticable to place their burdens where the same would appear, in the light of equity and justice, to belong. But to tax one industry or enterprise out of existence in order to raise funds with which to pay a bounty on another, is certainly not in accordance with enlightened statesmanship. While again disclaiming either favor or opposition to the bounty bills pending in the Assembly, we have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that a bountiful brain is better than a bountiful hand in a Legislature.

UTAH A BEACON LIGHT.

Appearing under the above caption is an interesting subdivision of the department headed "The Progress of Western America," in the Irrigation Age for February. As a tribute which it has only lately been deemed popular to pay to the early settlers of Utah, yet which the Age and all fair-minded practical irrigators and state-builders have ever been ready to recognize as their due, we think the extract is well worth reproduction. Here it is:

Every dog has his day—every country its opportunity. The day of fate is at hand for the Greater West. If it shall prove to be the outlet for surplus people and capital at this critical time in our national history, then its development along conservative lines will soon begin, and the movement must prove enduring. What are its capacities for meeting this supreme test? The foundation industry or man is agriculture, using the term in its broadest sense. The Greater West will furnish the most marvelous field for the various forms of diversified agriculture that has ever been opened to enterprise. Major Powell, who will be accepted as very conservative authority, asserts elsewhere in this number of the Age that the arid regions will support a population as great as the present total of the entire United States. There is not space in this department to prove by elaborate argument that the agriculture of arid America is peculiar to its promise of almost absolute independence, when considered in connection with the home-markets with which it is everywhere surrounded. But the proposition may be proven in a dozen lines by reference to a single example, the truth of which is beyond dispute. Utah presents a fair average of the conditions existing in the arid West. In altitude it is the mean between extremes. Less than fifty years ago it was colonized by a people who had no assets except the brain of a masterful leader of men. Under the guidance of this leader a certain industrial policy was applied. The farm unit was placed at twenty acres. Each family was taught to produce first of all what it consumed, and second, a surplus convertible into some other form of property. This was accomplished by diversified production and intensive scientific cultivation. Upon the public range adjoining the cultivated valleys flocks of sheep and herds of cattle and horses were sustained. This experiment in colonization was carried to success without original capital. The people lived; they multiplied and prospered; they wrung from unpromising soil the capital for cooperative stores, for factories, for banks. And after paying for all this, they had an ample surplus to carry on costly church enterprises, building massive temples and sending their missionaries to the uttermost parts of the earth. Are the valleys hidden among the mountains of Utah any more productive than the irrigable lands of Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana on the north, Colorado and Wyoming on the east, New Mexico, Arizona, California and Nevada on the south and west? Are the unprosperous millions of the old world and old states less capable of conquest over nature than the simple folk who compose the mass of the Mormon people? Is capital distrustful of its ability to find security and create values in conjunction with enlightened labor in a field where labor unaided by capital has alone created enormous values?

AS TO STATEHOOD.

Concerning the mass of confusing and contradictory reports upon the question of Utah's admission to statehood, a bill for which is now pending in the United States Senate, the NEWS has wished to have very little to say. This reticence, however, must not be construed either as indifference on our part to that great and important issue proposed to be conferred, or as ignorance concerning the various interests and aspects of the case and the attitude of leading men in Washington concerning it. Our special correspondence has given, we believe, true statements of the matter from time to time, and other information from sources of unquestioned reliability have but confirmed and made more explicit the suggestions and explanations our correspondent has given. It would doubtless surprise local readers to be told that among those who have contributed most to the delay which has overtaken the measure, are men who here at home prate and declaim most loudly against others for fear and dilatoriness; that we have citizens among us who here blow hot for statehood and in Washington blow hot against it. The NEWS is in a position to say that such is the fact. We record it with regret, because while all honorable people can respect a man who honestly differs with their views and stubbornly defends his side of any controversy, they have nothing but contempt for a treacherous friend or for a man who while pretending to favor them seeks in a dissembling way to multiply obstacles and pile up embarrassments for their cause.

The attitude of the NEWS on the statehood question has all the time been one of patience and resignation. As long as objection could be urged on reasonable grounds and from reputable sources, we were content to wait—the people for whom we speak have become used to that sort of thing. But we cannot feel to have patience with any cuttle-fish methods of politics—attempts to blame others for results which have been largely promoted by the evasive and unscrupulous complainants themselves. Hence we have said, and again say, it will be well for local readers to take with many grains of allowance the charges bandied back and forth hereabouts that this or that party, or this or that element or person in either party, is at the bottom of the existing delay and must be regarded as the cause of our disappointment.

This much by way of warning. Now a word from the Senate itself. We quote the exact language of a well-known senator, a neighbor of Utah's and a friend to her interests. He gave the following over his own signature for such use as the NEWS might choose to make of it. There is nothing very exhilarating about it, but it is not without its measure of comfort:

"There appears no real opposition to the admission of Utah as a state. Both sides of the Senate chamber, so far as surface indications are concerned, appear to be favorable. I think the real danger lies in delay. It is understood that the Wilson bill will be reported very soon to the Senate, when a debate will open which will probably last for months. This may be preceded or followed by long debate on the various financial questions that are from day to day being presented. When the tariff bill is disposed of it is understood that most of the appropriation bills will be ready for consideration by the Senate. I think, therefore, the real danger lies in delay. The bill which passed the House is in the hands of a sub-committee. As soon as they report I presume the committee as a whole will report upon the measure."

TERRITORIAL FINANCES.

At length the people, and their agents in the Legislature, are squarely confronted with the figures which tell us, as a commonwealth, "where we are at" financially. The report of the House ways and means committee, which appears in full in another column, contains these figures. There are two views that may be taken of most events, conditions and disappointments which are met with in this life, a cheerful and a gloomy one; and the proposition to increase the Territorial tax from two mills to three and three-fourths mills, is a matter which will test the capacity for cheerfulness of taxpayers generally, and tend to inspire them with the other view. That a deficit, created when money was abundant, and a period of unexampled prosperity was upon us, must be made good by an increase in the burden of taxation at a time like the present, is not a thing to create hilarity among property owners.

But an examination of the figures given by the ways and means committee will show that a heavy increase in the Territorial tax must be had, if no more bonds are to be issued, and warrants are to be kept at par. Even with the increase proposed, the resources will but barely offset the liabilities, at the close of 1895, assuming that property valuations will remain as high as they were during 1892 and 1893, an assumption which all the evidence goes to show will not be realized. Values are falling all over the Territory, and the assessment rolls of most, if not all, of the counties will foot up considerably less for 1894 than they have for the last two years. Taking the resources and liabilities as the committee give them, and allowing for the decreased valuation, there will be a deficit of serious dimensions for the next Assembly to provide for.

All this means a demand for retrenchment. It means that Utah cannot afford to even contemplate the support of two separate institutions for higher education; that salaries must be cut down; that unnecessary expenses must be cut off; that Warner's revenue bill ought to pass if it will save $50,000 to the Territory, as its author predicts, and that J. E. Booth's bill to revise and cut down the fees and perquisites of public officers ought also to pass, if it is found to be so framed as to accomplish its ostensible purpose.

It will seem to many people that $95,000 is a large sum to give to the Insane asylum, and that $90,000 and $40,000 for the University and Agricultural College respectively, do not have that appearance of economy which ought to characterize all appropriations of public funds, at least until times improve. Yet these are the allowances made by the committee, in connection with a recommendation that the rate of tax be increased sixty-two and a half per cent.

While the showing is one that calls for economy, it is not one to create discouragement. Utah is all right. There is widely prevailing among her level-headed and far-sighted men a profound conviction that hard times will not and cannot last long in this Territory; and business men are adjusting and conducting their affairs in accordance with this expectation. But it should not be forgotten by either legislator or taxpayer that retrenchment and economy can be made to hasten the desired prosperity.

THE BEET SUGAR INDUSTRY.

It appears probable that within the next few years there will be a considerable increase in the number of sugar factories in the United States. One cause of this is the determination of the fact that in certain soils, particularly west of the Missouri river, the quality of sugar beets that can be raised will enable the large manufacturers to produce an article that equals in quality and competes in price with the best product of the sugar cane. Another feature that encourages the investment of capital in this business is that the market is yet largely supplied from the outside, and that as sugar can be obtained from beets as cheaply in this country as it can be made from cane and beets elsewhere, the nearness of market for the home product offers an advantage to the local manufacturer over the foreign producer.

These facts already have attracted the attention of foreign capitalists familiar with the sugar industry, and several projects have been set on foot for the investment of money in this business in the West. One of these is the proposition just laid before W. H. Mills, land commissioner for the Central Pacific lands, by a wealthy German who has made a specialty of sugar beet culture in his native land. He proposes to take 10,000 acres of land near Lake Yosemite, California, put the entire acreage into beets, and locate a sugar factory there, to be run by water power from the lake. Half a million dollars is to be put in the factory alone, and it is to have a capacity of 120,000,000 pounds of sugar each season—thirty times as much as was made at the Lehi factory last year—making it the largest producer in the United States. There is to be half a million dollars in addition to this as a working capital, and it is expected that this amount of stock will be taken by Americans.

In this Territory there is considerable effort being put forth to establish a sugar factory at Richfield or some suitable point in Sevier county. There is no question of there being room in Utah for another factory such as that at Lehi, so far as the quantity of sugar consumed here is concerned; there may be room for two more factories to supply the local market, though that is doubtful, as the capacity of the Lehi works could be largely increased, and so could that of a second factory, if built, and these could supply the home demand for years to come.

But the investment of such a large amount of money as is necessary to the operation of an enterprise of this kind requires that all the conditions surrounding the industry should be carefully considered. There are several important features connected with this matter. Although the Lehi factory has been very successful under the circumstances, it has been so only through the most careful and economical management. It should be also remembered that success under the circumstances referred to—in a year of financial depression like 1893—means the making of both ends meet in current expenses with little to spare for wear on plant—a result that would be hardly satisfactory in a season of general business prosperity. It might be suggested in this connection that while the Lehi factory is on the road to prosperity through the energy of its promoters and the encouragement received from the people, as a financial investment it is not yet out of the woods. Had it not been that there were good transportation facilities to the Lehi works and that a large section of the country close by was such that it became tributary through the ability of the farmers to get their beets to market cheaply and thus secure for themselves good returns—the necessary element to induce them to raise sugar beets—the factory would have proved a failure.

At some time in the future, a new sugar factory might be successfully conducted, say in Davis county, close to this city or Ogden, or in some similar location near centers of business and population, where the soil is suitable to sugar beet culture and the farms are so situated that it is only a short distance to the railways, and where the haul on these is short and competition sufficiently close to bring the cost of transportation to a low figure. These conditions certainly do not exist at present in the Sevier valley. They may do so some time, but the probability of its being in the near future is hardly sufficient to warrant the outlay of much capital on the prospect. The News has no inclination to discourage the people on the Sevier in the matter of home industries; our sincere desire is to do the opposite. In this situation we would feel that we were derelict in our duty were we to fail to point out the fact that an attempt to establish a sugar factory on the Sevier at the present time would probably result in failure, loss of confidence in the promoters of the scheme, and consequent discouragement in and injury to the cause of home industry. The good people of that ambitious county can do much better by coming forward and buying some of the stock of the Lehi factory, which is still in need of aid.

Among the attributes that can be observed in communities is one frequently and markedly exhibited by the actions of a flock of sheep—when one jumps in a certain direction there is a general inclination to go the same way. This feature is one that under many circumstances deserves encouragement, as it indicates a unanimity that is valuable and commendable. But it does not do to become intemperate in this respect, nor when there seems to be a success made in any particular line of business or manufacture, for people to rush into that branch till it is overdone and made a failure all around. Instances of this kind, of which there have been a number in Utah, should serve as warnings for the future. There are plenty of home industries which can be yet successfully started in Utah, and which could be inaugurated under present conditions, with ample support from the start. Some of these are eminently suited to the Sevier valley and the situation of its people. We suggest in all kindness that the present movement for a new sugar factory be promptly dropped.

BOREAS IN A RAGE.

The dispatches for the past few days have brought reports of disasters on land and sea caused by the worst storm on record in years. And the details are probably not all in. At Chicago, the wind last Monday swept down with the violence of a hurricane carrying pedestrians off their feet, overturning carriages and hurling immense waves against the shores of the lake. Business was paralyzed and traffic all but suspended. Similar reports come from Nebraska, Kansas, Ohio, Wisconsin, Texas, Kentucky, New York and several other states. Everywhere the dense clouds of snow buried by a piercing wind impeded or suspended the traffic, and resulted in loss of life and property.

The most appalling reports come from Oklahoma, where many persons froze to death. The condition of the settlers, some of whom live in tents and are short of provisions, may be imagined. In several places whole families have been found huddled together and dead. The sufferings of one, Herman Stone, became too intense. His provisions had given out. The fire in the stove was extinguished. One member of the family froze to death and the remainder were slowly being wrapped in the icy mantle of the grim visitor. It was too much to bear. The distracted husband precipitated the end by killing his family first and then plunging the blood-stained steel into his own throat. "God have mercy on us," was the prayer with which he had finished a note found in his hut and conveying to the world the intelligence of his awful condition before death.

The dispatches from Europe also tell of damage to property and numerous wrecks, particularly in the English channel. The gale swept the British Islands, Holland and various parts of the German empire.

Compared to the severity of the weather as reported from all these places, the slight taste of winter experienced in this region is a mild zephyr. Well may the people living in these valleys with gratitude contemplate the providence that led their noble fathers to select these mountain fastnesses for an abode, and by their skill, diligence and perseverance make them what they are today. It has been, and still is, the firm belief of this people that vast multitudes will yet look to this intermountain region as the most desirable spot on God's earth. And as time goes on this belief is seen to have a firm, rational foundation. When all the facts are known; when people realize the possibilities of these valleys—the fertility of the soil, the wealth of the mountains, the mildness of the climate, the purity of the air and, more than all, the sterling qualities of the people, all of which is already being lauded abroad by thousands of visitors, many will wend their way to these mountains to share with us the blessings of peace and health and comfort.

TWO INTERESTING industrial items from the February number of the Irrigation Market, New York:

The Arid West is increasing in the possibilities of wealth making. "Canagire" or sour dock weed, a product of aridity, is in active demand for the tannic acid its roots produce. Like all indigenous arid region plants, it runs to roots. Tannic acid is an article of commerce and manufactures; it is of more value on the world's balance sheet than all the products of iron ore.

President William Palmer of the Rio Grande Western road says that 80,000 acres of Utah land laid down in sugar beet would, in proceeds, with the proper mills to handle, bring as much as the silver product of Utah last year, which amounted to 7,700,000 ounces.

ROBERT LINCOLN thinks the next candidate of the Republicans for the Presidency will be ex-Speaker Reed, ex-President Harrison or ex-Representative McKinley. A good many Republicans are inclined to add to these three possibilities a fourth—ex-Minister Lincoln himself.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SALT LAKE TO SANTA FE.

SANTA FE, New Mexico, Feb. 8, 1894.—Starting out on a trip to Arizona and Mexico, I left Salt Lake City on the evening of Saturday, the 3rd inst. From Grand Junction I took the Colorado Midland railway to Colorado Springs. The mountain scenery along this road is grand beyond description, at least a part of the way. From Grand Junction the road bed follows up Grand river to the point where Roaring Fork puts into said river. At the confluence of the two streams, in a picturesque valley surrounded on the north, east and west by timber-clad hills, are the celebrated Glenwood Springs, where a large hotel has recently been erected and where the tourist can enjoy a hot salt water bath in the heart of the Rockies. From that interesting point the railroad follows the Roaring Fork to Aspen, thence up to Red canyon, along the Frying Pan river, circling the so-called "hell gate," and up over the Saguache range or Continental Divide, where the road, at an altitude of 11,528 feet, passes through the Hagerman tunnel. This, I believe, at present the highest operating railroad point in the United States, being 676 feet higher than Marshall pass, the altitude of which is 10,852 feet. From the Hagerman pass it is down hill to Leadville, one of Colorado's chief mining towns, and, after following the general course of the Arkansas river, the road turns to the left over Trout Creek pass, across South Park, up Granite canyon and east over the Hayden divide to the Ute pass, which is celebrated throughout the land for its beautiful scenery and interesting natural parks. From Woodland park, at the head of Ute pass, a good view is obtained of Pike's Peak, at the base of which the traveler passes through the celebrated Cascade canyon. Manitou, a romantic city nestling at the east base of Pike's Peak, possesses a great number of novelties and attractions; and its mineral waters have gained a world-wide fame.

At Colorado Springs, 601 miles by rail from Salt Lake City, I changed cars, taking the A. T. & S. F. railway via Pueblo to La Junta, a town situated away out on the plains in a southeasterly direction from Pueblo; thence the course is changed to a southwesterly direction and the mountains are again reached at the growing city of Trinidad. Then we traveled up through the celebrated Raton pass, through which the old Santa Fe trail led the numerous caravans that before the advent of the railroad brought goods from the Missouri river—principally from Westport, Jackson County, Missouri—to Santa Fe.

The Mormon Battalion, on its famous march in 1846, also entered the mountains at this point. While the Union Pacific railway follows the old Mormon wagon road up the Platte valley for several hundred miles, it is also a matter of interest to know that the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe railway follows the old Santa Fe trail for several hundred miles—or from the Raton Pass to Goriotta.

Though I have only spent a few hours in this historic place, Santa Fe, I have already become deeply interested in it. This morning early I walked out to and climbed the hill on which old Fort Marcor once stood. The trenches and earth works thrown up by General Kearney's troops in 1846 are still seen, and from the top of the hill I obtained a fine view of the old town. Situated on both sides of the Santa Fe creek, a tributary of the Rio Grande, the city is almost encircled by bluffs. The higher mountains lie eastward about three miles distant. Cedar covered bluffs protect the Santa valley proper from the north and west winds, while the adjacent country on the south is lower and quite flat, sloping gently toward the Rio Grande on the southwest. The river is about 18 miles distant from Santa Fe.

To observe the stately modern buildings, such as the Palace hotel, the courthouse, the Federal building, the high school, rising tall and grand in the midst of the numerous low flat-roofed one-story buildings of the Mexicans, including the hundred year old Palace, which is only one story high, the visitor naturally becomes possessed of strange feelings. Here truly the improvements of ages past are, figuratively speaking, shaking hands with the most improved architecture of the nineteenth century, thus forming one of the most unique and interesting pictures that any one can desire to gaze upon. Then there are the original narrow road ways, some of them scarcely a rod wide, intermixed with streets laid out according to American taste from four to six rods wide; and while the latter are straight and aim to follow the cardinal points of the compass at considerable regularity, the old streets are crooked and winding, and allowed to run in all directions.

Of historic buildings in Santa Fe the St. Miguel church is the oldest church edifice in the United States. The usher, who has charge of the building and who shows visitors through it, asserts emphatically that it was erected between the years 1582 and 1597, but from more reliable sources the year 1680 seems to be nearer the fact. This old adobe structure stands on the south side of the Santa Fe creek in the midst of a cluster of old Mexican dwellings. The interior length of the church is 70 feet, the width 24 feet and the height from floor to ceiling 25 feet. The walls are from 2½ to 5 feet thick. The altar is supposed to be even older than the church itself, and was probably imported from Spain by the missionaries who accompanied Antonio de Espejo to America in 1582. A very old bell and other relics are also shown, to see all of which the visitor pays 25 cents. Regular services are still held in this old church, and that too three times a week.

The central town of Santa Fe I should judge covers about a mile square, and is built compact only in places. The principal thoroughfare is St. Francisco street, a narrow lane running nearly east and west, and terminating on the east against the raised ground on which the unfinished Catholic cathedral is situated. By permission of a jolly old Catholic priest, who seemed to enjoy his long pipe hugely, I was permitted to look through the cathedral and also through an interesting museum connected therewith. I have also visited the splendid collection of Indian relics, etc., in charge of the "Historical Society of New Mexico." Three large apartments in the old "palace" are occupied by this museum. In this same old building are the offices of the governor, secretary and other territorial officers; the postoffice is also there.

I have been introduced to the secretary of the territory, ex-Governor Prince, who is the author of a history of New Mexico; Max Frost, Esq., and other leading men of the city, who have kindly furnished me with much valuable information. Gov. Frost has a very fine private collection of Indian relics, old maps and a splendid library.

About one hundred and twenty soldiers, comprising companies B and D of the Tenth infantry, are stationed in Santa Fe. Their quarters are near the center of the city. On making inquiry as to why they were there, I was frankly answered: "To help drink whisky and keep business alive in town." It was asserted by others that this was as near the truth as anything could be.

One of the peculiarities of Santa Fe life is the Mexican mode of importing fuel into town. Burros are employed for this purpose. The owners take these tough little animals into the timber in the mountains or on the lower hills from five to fifteen miles away; then cut the timber in proper lengths to be used in the fire place or stove, and load the burros with all they can carry to town, the packs being securely lashed to their backs. Saturdays thousands of animals, in droves ranging from two or three up to twenty or more, are seen approaching the city with these odd looking packs, which the owners then hawk through the town and dispose of at prices ranging from 15 to 25 cents per pack, according to size, and also according to the status of supply and demand.

Historically speaking Santa Fe is one of the most interesting old things on the western continent. Go back as far as manuscripts and semi-authenticated traditions have blazed the path, and in the unpenetrated jungle of doubts and fairy tales that darken the early days of North America, some hint or trace of early settlements in New Mexico always eludes our sight. Says a recent writer: "To most of us it is wholly new. Until the railroad (the modern Aladdin) came the 'Land of Sunshine' (a favorite term for New Mexico) was essentially foreign; a fragment of the Latin empire stranded among the silent mountains after the northward-rolling wave of conquest had receded. There remain many quaint villages of adobe huts, in quiet sunshine valleys, unstirred by the echoes of the locomotive whistle, where people are uniformly polite, and indifferent to the tomorrow—where the noon siesta is prolonged until the shadows have appreciably lengthened on the eastern slopes, and where Time seems to have hung up his sickle and hour glass. Perhaps this is the most sensible way to live. It is a matter of opinion, at the best, but the American spirit of restlessness has now crept in almost everywhere, and modern methods of business have driven out or modified the old ways of farming and trading.

Santa Fe is considered a very healthy place; the altitude is about 7,000 feet above the level of the sea. Fruit, especially the hardier kinds, does well, and there are some fine apple and peach orchards here. Fruit is exported to Colorado, principally to Denver, while breadstuffs are imported from Kansas and other states, the amount raised here, through scarcity of water for irrigation purposes, not being sufficient to feed the people. Santa Fe has a good waterworks system, reservoirs, good schools, electric lights, and a number of other modern improvements. The population is about 6,000.

ANDREW JENSON.

THE MISSIONARY FIELD.

LONDON, England, Jan. 24, 1894.—The past twenty months have been the most pleasant part of my life. During this time I have devoted my entire attention to the work of the Lord. Still, at the same time, we do not find the returns of our labor as encouraging as our fathers did some few years back, when one Gospel sermon would convert one hundred; now we are thankful if by one hundred sermons we can start one to investigate. How thankful we are to see a stranger come in to our meetings! But when we declare unto them that we have the only true Gospel, we soon find ourselves against a stumbling block. Those who profess to be Christians flatter themselves with the idea that they are members of the true Christian church. They suppose that a true Christian ministry and the institutions and blessings of Christianity have been perpetuated. It is very difficult for the great mass of mankind to free themselves from their false traditions and averse from the old path which has been so long trod by their forefathers. We find today that it requires an honest heart, an independent mind and a firm reliance on Jehovah to embrace an unpopular truth and stand up boldly and fight against the mighty torrent of lies and persecutions which continually threaten to overwhelm and destroy. But we are thankful to say that we are finding a few who have integrity and moral courage enough to detect the errors of ages and expose the religions of priestcraft which are so falsely called Christianity; and we find that those who are ready and willing to sacrifice all (if need be) for the Gospel's sake, and whose character is well known among their respective neighborhoods, can do more in allaying prejudice and finding investigators than the traveling Elders, for we find it a very difficult matter to make acquaintances.

I am now stationed in connection with Brother H. C. Overson, from Arizona, some thirty miles from London, at New Brompton, which is situated on the Midway river, near the Chatham dock yards, which is one of the largest plants in the world. There are some ten thousand people employed here; besides this there is a government port, and so the people whom we are laboring with are soldiers, dock men and sailors. The majority of these people do not seem to be overly religious, and it seems like labor in vain to preach to them. But as we are told to cast our bread upon the waters, we cast a few crumbs upon these stagnant ponds and live in hopes of their being seen after many days. At least there will be this comfort about it, if those among whom we labor grow no better from our efforts, we shall at least be none the worse for having warned them; if they will not take cheap advice, they will have to buy dear repentance and thus we will keep on pounding on the rock realizing that our reward will be the same whether we break it or not.

During my labors while in the Nottingham conference, I met with a host of friends both in and out of the Church, and the experience which I have gained is well worth the price paid for it. While I was laboring in connection with two other Elders at Leicester we found that the hard times at home had its effect upon us here and at the same time one of my co-laborers received a card from the president of the conference to come in and take up his labors in another district. At this time we were unable to assist him only by our faith and prayers. The brother felt rather downcast, realizing that he was penniless and unable to walk a distance of twenty-five miles and carry his grip. But just as we were about to partake of breakfast a knock was heard and a strange gentleman came in. He desired to have a conversation and the brother (who was fasting) took him in the room and entertained him. He did not stay but a few minutes but on leaving he placed a half-sovereign in the brother's hand and thus caused him to go on his way rejoicing, at the same time praising God for sending an immediate answer to prayer. We realize that the hand of God is stretched out over His people and those who will may partake of His blessings.

I find during my travels among the Saints that probably through thoughtlessness some injury is being done. We as Elders soon gain the confidence of the people and partake of their hospitality, and they place such confidence in us that they would stake upon our word all that they possess. Now sometimes there are promises made on leaving them, which seem by many Elders to be forgotten—when their release comes, they seem to think that they are also released from their promises made to their friends in these lands. If those who have made these promises could but realize now a few comforting lines would buoy the people up, I am sure they would not begrudge the time and few cents spent in sending them. No offense is meant, but if anything in these lines should come home to any reader let him not send it to the next door, but get pen and ink and relieve his own conscience of the promises made and thus regain the confidence once delivered to the Saints.

There are now fourteen Elders in this conference, all of whom are well in body and spirit. The weather is very mild and pleasant and everything has the appearance of spring. England is indeed a nice country—the only objection is that it is over-populated.

C. W. WRIGHT.

OUR POULTRY DEPARTMENT.

Questions Answered.

MILL CREEK, Feb. 9, 1894.

Mr. G. H. C.:

Dear Sir—After reading your article "On Poultry" I am desirous of having a little more information on the subject. (1) I should like to know your plan of feeding chickens in order to have them lay in winter. (2) Also your plan or coop for warmth and ventilation. (3) I am thinking strongly of having an incubator. Have you one? If so, would you give some information concerning them, and oblige one interested in poultry?

In answer to your first question, read "Fowls," published in the DESERET NEWS February 6, which will give you an idea; but there are many details that you must work out yourself. Watch your birds in the summer and supply their wants in winter as if it were summer, which you can if you only will think.

To your question No. 2: My present coop is 56 feet long by 14 feet wide, facing south; 4 feet high in front and 8 feet high at back or north having an uneven roof of 5½ feet to north and 11½ to south, roof covered with shingles, coop built of common lumber, lined with adobe with two ventilators in ridge. But the ventilators were a mistake—no need of them and I have to stop them up. Keep your fowls clean and in a coop from 30 to 100 feet long and there will be plenty of fresh air. My thermometer has registered 4 and 6 below freezing several times this winter and that is fresh enough; in the summer time I take the glass windows out altogether and leave the door open. Ventilators are, as I view it, the prime cause of swelled heads and roup by having cold drafts blow down upon the fowls. For the inside arrangements, I have a four foot walk the whole length of my coop, so that I can walk in and feed and see every fowl without disturbing them. The other part is divided into pens 8x10, into which I put from 8 to 15 hens and a rooster.

So to your third question, I would say, go slow on an incubator. Have you hatched by the natural method 80 to 90 per cent of all fertile eggs? and when hatched have you raised 90 to 95 per cent of the chicks? Or has it been half of the fertile eggs only brought out, and of those hatched only one-third raised? The hen and the incubator produce the same results, but the manipulation is entirely different, and you must have experience with the natural method to succeed with the artificial. I am now starting with one and will tell of it later. I have over 100 fine Plymouth Rock eggs to give to the wooden hen.

G. H. C.

Fowls, No. 2.

In my last on this subject I spoke of those having fowls and wishing to utilize them. Now there will be some who desire to change what they have, and others wishing to make a start. To such I would say, procure barred Plymouth Rock, or silver laced Wyandotte, or white Plymouth Rock or White Wyandotte whichever way your fancy runs, either for dark or light-colored fowls, but take one of these to make your foundation stock, because for the farmer and a ver-age poulterer we shall have to cross to obtain the best result, as eggs are wanted and the best marketable bird when fattened. When you have decided as to color, you can procure two or three settings of eggs of either variety named for about $1 per setting of (thirteen, of fair average stock, probably not of the very best where they have been bred for fancy, but if not bred for fancy you will be more liable to procure the business hen who will be an egg-layer and not a fancy feather or comb-grower. You will want some early setters. Now this is often the trouble—she won't sit but you can help make her sit. You will have some motherly hens who were among the early layers (not in your breeding pens, these we must feed so as to put off this incubation as long as possible) when they have laid say about twelve to fifteen eggs. Feed them a little more of that morning mash, and to start with make one of their grain feeds whole corn, and in a few days two meals of whole corn and don't bury it quite so deep in their litter; they will become fat and then bloody will want to sit. But in doing this you must watch your fowls very close for you are forcing Dame Nature, and if you crowd too much, instead of sitting hens you will have dead ones, as they will fall off the roost with apoplexy. You see this means observations and work, work.

Set as many hens at one time as you can, even if you have to wait with some of them on the nest a week. Whitewash those nest boxes with lime slaked and mixed with tobacco water; grease and dust your hens when you set them, and dust hen and nest twice more, once at half her time and once a day or two before the hatch comes off.

Now if you set 6 to 12 at a time when they have set eight days make yourselves a good egg-tester. Go to your coop at dark and have an attendant with you. Let him or her hold the hen as quietly as possible while you test each egg; the eggs that look black when held before the light are the ones as a rule that contain the chickens; the clear ones are not fertile and should be taken away. By this means each hen should come off with a good hatch. Of course fill up your nests from the others and when you are through testing you will have several hens without eggs. You can then put fresh ones under them and by this means will not lose their valuable time.

Don't worry about feeding your young chicks from 12 to 24 hours after hatching. Give them comfortable quarters, and move the coop often to fresh ground. After the first day or two your chicks should be fed every two hours, but no more than they will eat up clean. Put them where they can procure green food at their will or else see that you give it to them, and don't forget the grit, which should be good sharp coarse sand. Make your mash for your growing chicks a little richer in animal material. Don't feed the mash sloppy; you can add a small amount of corn meal to it; feed good sound grain and keep them busy—if you have no scratching material, scatter your grain far and wide, to make them exercise, which they will do by running after it. If you feed them food too concentrated and give them little or no exercise they will have what is known as leg weakness, and if one should fall down upon its back or knees don't get alarmed, but look well after your chickens and upon the first symptom catch the bird and rub with turpentine or if none, with coal oil; don't rub into their feathers, it irritates the same as it would if rubbed into the hair of your head. These chickens will grow very fast. Look out for lice, they are voracious eaters and they eat the blood of the chick; and though the latter eats food, it don't grow. These chickens should be hatched from April 1st to May 1st—the nearer April 10th to 15th the better. One-half of them will probably be cockerels, and it will be better that you divide the pullets from the cockerels as soon as you can tell them. The latter you can feed a little more fattening food to crowd them along for the market and they will pay all the expenses, and your pullets will be clear profit.

You must not use any of those cockerels for breeding purposes and your pullets should be fed for eggs in much the same way as those selected progenitors before referred to. Now don't let the bars down and relax your exertions, but provide suitable quarters or house for the pullets and they will be paying you in eggs on November 1st that will make you smile as you have never done before if your chicken practice has been other than this. Again, this means work, work! Put them into their winter quarters just as soon as cool nights make their approach because they must be housed weeks before they will lay, so don't defer.

It is a well known law with fanciers that when they wish to exhibit birds, that they show to better advantage before they have laid and they resort to moving their birds from one pen to another to break up the laying desire. You wait to increase that desire, hence you must practice the opposite by having your birds quiet and docile and domiciled in permanent quarters. Do not crowd 50 fowls in room enough for 20; you would not think of building a stable large enough for two horses or cows and because you had four or six, crowd them into said stable. If you did you would suffer loss, and you will arrive at the same results with your chickens; they will eat lots of food but will lay no eggs; their vitality will be reduced.

Now don't hatch chicks in May, June or July and expect results in winter eggs, because if you do you will meet treacherous Disappointment and he will laugh you to scorn for defying Dame Nature.

In my next I will speak of crosses or grades, suitable for our markets.

G. H. C.

CHURCH THEOLOGY CLASS.

The sixteenth session of this class was held at the Assembly Hall, 12:30 p. m., nearly 1200 students being present. Leaflets containing a synopsis of the lecture were distributed at the door. After the opening prayer by Elder H. P. Richards, two incidental questions were considered at some length. The instructor, Dr. J. E. Talmage took special pains to explain every point bearing upon the topics in question and as a true teacher assisted the mind with many apt comparisons. With words of gratitude to God for the success attending this theology class, the audience was assured of the appreciation felt by the instructor of the interest taken as shown in the attendance and preparation. Yet owing to the fact that answers given from the auditorium of the large hall could only with difficulty be heard by few and not at all by many hundreds, it was announced that the review of lessons in form of oral catechization would be discontinued until further notice. This should not be understood to do away with, but rather to encourage incidental questions, which would best be submitted in writing on subjects under consideration in the class.

The sixth article of Faith, the great topic of which is the Church organization, was then taken up by the lecturer. It reads as follows:

We believe in the same organization that existed in the primitive church, viz., apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, evangelists, etc.

The primitive church as established by Christ and continued by His Apostles, first received attention. Scriptural proof was referred to verifying the existence of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, high priests, seventies, elders, priests, teachers, deacons, and special officers as helps in the government of the Church of Christ. The beautiful comparison to a perfect body made by Paul was dwelled upon in detail, showing the adaptation of each part for its mission and without either of which there is no symmetry. The existence of those officers constituted a crucial test of the Church of Christ.

The apostacy of the church and the restoration of divine authority were then considered, many passages being quoted and conclusive proof furnished in prophecy as well as actual history.

Lastly the general presiding quorums, and local quorums with their various degrees of powers, orders of organization, etc., were briefly defined, as also the helps in government: Primary associations, Mutual Improvement Associations, Sunday Schools, Relief Societies, etc., as found today existing in the organization known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. After benediction by Elder Geo. Goddard the class adjourned for one week.

A NEW ELDERS' QUORUM.

The Presidency of the Stake met with the Fourth quorum of Elders Feb. 12, in the Sixth ward meeting house. The Fourth quorum, which comprised the Elders of the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Seventh and Farmers wards had grown to such proportions that it became necessary to divide it and this was attended to last evening. The Fourth now comprises the Sixth and Seventh with Chas. H. Hyde as president and T. E. Jacobsen and J. C. Poulton as his counselors, the last named being selected to fill the vacancy through Elder E. H. Callister being chosen to preside over the new quorum, the Twenty-third. The newly organized quorum comprises the Fourth, Fifth and Farmers wards. As counselors to Elder Callister, Elders J. H. Burton and A. G. Wagstaff were chosen.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

Charles Crane, of Utah, is one of the vice presidents of the interstate convention of wool growers at Denver.

Olaf Cederstrom has presented the Utah University with a number of superior specimens of onyx from his quarries.

It is reported on good authority that certain lightning rod agents are working Logan, with a strong probability of swindling their victims, as they have elsewhere, by raising the amount of the original note.

The Sanpete Valley road, says the Ephraim Register, will begin carrying the mails on February 12th. They will also change time on the same date, getting here from the north early in the afternoon.

Thursday, Feb. 8 Mr. Penhale, agent for E. H. Rollins & Co., made a purchase of $3,000 of the bonds of school district No. 3, Tooele county. These obligations are for twenty years, and bear six per cent interest.

The public will be pained to learn that Colonel Lett, member of the Utah Commission, is lying at his room in this city very ill. Every attention possible is being given him and his rapid and permanent recovery is anxiously hoped for.

The NEWS both rejoices and condole with its friends P. W. and Keziah L. Cheney, of Pinedale, Arizona, to whom was born on December 18th, twins, a boy and a girl. The boy died but the other infant, is alive and thriving nicely.

The board of commissioners to locate University lands has sold 120 acres of land in Cache county, receiving therefor $640.25. The public sale of unsold lands in Cache county will take place tomorrow at the county court house at Logan.

Hon. Franklin S. Richards has presented a petition in the Third district court for the reinstatement of Aurelius Miner as a member of the bar and submitted a motion in accordance therewith. Mr. Miner was disbarred in 1885 because of conviction for the offense of unlawful cohabitation.

Richfield Advocate: Mr. Hess, the general manager and superintendent of the Robert E. Lee mine, informed Mr. J. M. Bollino that he had a man or two working on the above mine bringing out very fine samples of gold-bearing rock. In the spring a mill will be put in and run to its full capacity.

A mass meeting of the citizens of Fillmore, Scipio, Holden, Meadow and Kanosh, Millard county, has been called for Saturday, February 10th, in the court house at Fillmore. The purpose of the meeting is to organize a chamber of commerce, the specially defined object of which is to foster home industries.

Mrs. Fanny M., wife of John W. Scott, of Millville, died very suddenly last Wednesday evening. While eating supper the lady complained of feeling faint, and in a very few seconds was dead. Dropsy of the heart was pronounced the cause of death. The lady left a husband, a large family and a wide circle of friends to mourn her sudden departure.

Mr. Bailey, United States Marshal Brigham's private secretary, has in his possession a curiosity in the shape of a U. S. horse pistol, bearing date 1853. This is the class of weapon with which the United States formerly armed its cavalry regiments and this particular one has seen "active service." It was given to Mr. Bailey by an old college chum some time ago.

On Saturday afternoon a locomotive on the Salt Lake and Western went into a snow bank near Eureka, in the hope of clearing the track. But the snow was too much for the iron horse, which was turned over on its side. A wrecking crew was sent down and today is engaged in getting the locomotive on the track and drawing the train out of the snowdrift.

Several days ago Elder Henry T. Burton, bishop of Farmers ward, was kicked by a horse and injured below the knee. He did not think the affair serious, but it grew worse, and has now resulted in blood poisoning. Two operations have been performed by surgeons, the last occurring February 7th. The patient is yet in a serious condition, but is improving as well as could be expected under the circumstances.

H. Warshauer, of the White House, brought back with him from his trip to Baker City, Oregon, says this morning's Ogden Standard, where he and his brother have extensive interests, a lump of ore from the White Swan mine, situated about eight miles from that city. The rock is literally crusted with gold, and is valued at $87. This mine was sold a few days ago by Colonel Swan for $250,000 to Chicago capitalists.

A select party of local attorneys met last night at the law office of Sheppard, Cherry & Sheppard and discussed the question of establishing a "court" or debating club in connection with the legal profession. A constitution was drafted and J. W. Cherry was elected president, August B. Edler vice president, C. D. Savory secretary, and Messrs. T. Marrioneaux, F. W. Milverton and Shoup executive committee. The name of the organization is to be "The Coke club."

Provo citizens are holding meetings and making arrangements preparatory to the removal of the Territorial capital to Provo. Capitol grounds, consisting of some fourteen acres owned by the city, is located in the northeastern part of the city on a commanding eminence, which gives a magnificent and entrancing bird's-eye view of the whole valley. Surrounding property can be obtained, giving ample room for the capitol buildings. The city will provide water.

Laramie, Wyoming, Boomerang: The big mill at the rolling mill was started this morning and will be kept in operation for the next five months if nothing happens. The plates which they are making are for the big order of rails which the Union Pacific has placed with the rolling mill at Pueblo. They have not begun work on the rails there yet, but will do so at once. The starting of the big mill will increase the pay roll to $12,000 or $15,000 per month.

Walter Lamoreaux, of Logan, received the sorrowful intelligence on Monday afternoon, that his young wife, who was visiting her parents at Pocatello, was very ill. This painful intelligence was succeeded a short time afterward by a telegram telling of her death. Walter took the first train for the north, but could only view the remains of his wife and infant child. He took the remains to Kaysville for burial, as that was formerly the home of his wife.

The Blanquest brothers of Coalville, Summit county, says the (Deseret) Millard County Blade, came in on Friday with supplies on the way to their herds, which are located in the Confusian range.

Sidney Nichols, of American Fork, came in from his herd which is now in the sand hills twelve or fifteen miles northeast of Deseret. There are several herds in the vicinity, and while the boys are all well some pretty heavy losses among the flocks are reported.

At the sugar convention held in Richfield last Saturday, says the Advocate, the name of John Gardner was added to the committee, which now stands as follows: Simon Christensen, chairman; George W. Bean, John Kirkman, John Dastrop and John Gardner. These gentlemen were instructed to procure all the information they could in relation to the planting and cultivating of beets, to procure beet seeds or attend to any other business which would have a tendency to help the matter along.

A. M. Gelsinger was found in an unconscious condition in his bed at his residence, 865 Twenty-second street, Ogden, about 10 o'clock February 7th. Medical aid was summoned and every effort made to save his life, but he was beyond help and breathed his last yesterday afternoon. Deceased was about 43 years of age, unmarried, and had no relatives here. His remains were taken to Richey's undertaking parlors and a telegram sent to his brother in Toledo, Kansas, for instructions as to their disposition. No inquest was held, he physicians finding that death was caused by diabetes.

When Chief Justice Merritt took his seat on the bench in the Third district court February 12, and before proceeding with the ordinary daily business, he said: Mr. McMillan having some few days ago tendered his resignation as clerk of this court, I have appointed Mr. David C. Dunbar as his successor, and he will take office as soon as he can qualify.

The new clerk qualified in the afternoon and forthwith entered upon his duties. The amount of the bond is $20,000, and his sureties are Messrs. R. C. Chambers, A. W. McCune and Frank W. Jennings.

The trial of Sergeant Frederick Linse on a charge of murder in the first degree, viz., the killing of Joseph W. Leonard, at Fort Douglas, on June 12th, 1898, was resumed February 13, in Chief Justice Merritt's court. The prosecution is represented by Assistant District Attorney Howat; Attorneys C. S. Varian and Richard W. Young appear for the defendant.

It was nearly four o'clock yesterday afternoon when a jury had been secured, as follows: Robert Watters, A. B. Porter, R. T. Venable, David Pack, John Duncan, H. A. Ferguson, Geo. S. Bailey, P. J. Johnson, A. C. Boyle, John Lees, Willard Allen and John Burt.

Mr. Robt. Smith, of Payson, says the Richfield Advocate, whose troupe performed here last week, showed us several ancient coins which he had collected; one was a copper coin as big as a nickel, but quite thin, which came from South America, and said to be used by the Nephites; on one side was a face very much of a Jewish caste, on the other side was a troop of horses; also a coin made of lead and silver with a face very much resembling that on the former coin, with some inscriptions on reverse side. The latter was found in Bingham canyon, Salt Lake county. How it came there is a question, but it is probable that it was made from Bingham bullion many, many years ago.

There was an accident on the track of the Salt Lake City railway on Second South street Sunday afternoon that resulted in the killing of a horse and the severe shaking up of an employe of the Salt Lake City Brewing company.

The man was riding in a road cart, and when between Sixth and Seventh East attempted to drive the animal across the track in front of a rapidly approaching car. The poor beast, however, simply got his fore feet over the rail when it was struck by the car and knocked to the ground. An instant later the horse was dead. Death is believed to have been due to an electric shock. The driver sustained a number of scalp wounds and was considerably shaken up besides.

In the Third district court James B. Fishleigh has filed a damage suit in the round sum of $10,000, making as defendants John L. Snow, Henry Mason, Chief of Police Pratt, Captain J. J. Donovan, et al. The suit arises out of the recent arrest of Fishleigh at the Union Pacific depot, when about to take the evening train for Ogden. He alleges unlawful arrest and also that he was treated in a brutal manner while under detention in a cell at the city jail. Plaintiff says his arrest was the result of false and malicious statements made to the police. He was discharged from custody by the police justice the following day on motion of the prosecution. Fishleigh is an attorney by profession and hails from Minnesota.

A private telegram received at the President's Office in this city Tuesday morning conveys the comforting intelligence that the steamship Dubbedam, bound from New York to Rotterdam, and which sailed on February 1st with a number of Utah Elders on board bound for the continent on missions, had passed the Isle of Wight yesterday. A second dispatch, received late Tuesday afternoon, brought the further intelligence that the good ship had reached her port in safety to day.

The Elders on board were William McEwan, A. Owen Woodruff, C. D. Schettler, J. M. Welier and R. Gygi, of Salt Lake City, C. D. Hahn of West Jordan, and Geo. C. Naegle and wife of Mexico.

Readers of the News will remember the published statement a short time since to the effect that Mr. Thomas Cahoon, a well known Ogden resident, had committed suicide by taking morphine. Mr. Cahoon, however, did not die at that time, though he was dangerously near death's door. He was addicted to the morphine habit and it was claimed by his friends that he had accidentally swallowed an overdose.

February 7 he was found in his bed at his home in an unconscious condition. A physician was summoned and endeavored to resuscitate him but was unable to do so. He was well known in Ogden and had many friends.

His death, it is claimed, was caused by an overdose of morphine.

The commissioner of the land office has handed down an interesting opinion, especially to the mining fraternity. Several years ago Wm. H. Hooper, Wm. Jennings and Lafayette Granger owned a mining claim in Ophir district. The two former made application for a patent, while Granger did not want one, and to prevent it refused to make his affidavit of citizenship. Affidavits of Granger's citizenship were made by parties knowing him. The matter was dragged along until both Hooper and Jennings are dead, and now the commissioner has notified the register and receiver of the land office to call on Granger for an affidavit of citizenship or that his interest in the property will be ignored and a patent issued to Jennings and Hooper. The property involved is the Magnolia East and West claims.

Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, of Freiburg University, Germany, has been visiting the Utah University this week, with a view of studying higher education in the Territory. The distinguished gentleman has been granted a leave of absence for a period of three years, during which time he will prepare by request from German authorities a report of the system of higher education in the United States. In the meantime, he is acting as professor of psychology in Harvard University. Prof. Munsterberg is considered very high authority on this subject, and is a noted author. It is said that his laboratory at Harvard is the most perfectly equipped in the world for experimental psychology. A year was consumed in making the apparatus, much of it being of entirely new design.

The fire loss on the Brigham City Mercantile and Manufacturing association was amicably settled this week by Mr. Salinger of Oakland, Cal., who represented the Insurance Combine, and H. W. Naisbitt Esq., of this city, who acted for the insured. Mr. Alex. Cohn of this city was umpire on disputed estimates, and cleverly decided between the appraisers.

The fire was an unusually favorable one. It originated in the cellar of a new building, and there was no draught, or most likely the loss would have been a very serious one. As it was, a compromise was concluded by the acceptance of $3,280 on stock and $440 assessed by M. F. Foulger of Ogden on the premises; a wonderful escape.

Mr. St. Clair, the "combine's" adjuster, and Mr. Goddard of Ogden, representing the Home company, seemed equally satisfied with the appraisers and the insured parties.

Hon. L. J. Nuttall, of this city, returned a day or two ago from an extended visit among the Mormon colonies in Mexico. He enjoyed his experiences with the people and had the best of health. He saw much that caused him to believe that there was a bright and prosperous future before the people who had left this and the surrounding country to make their homes in that section.

He stopped over in Southern California on the way home and while in Los Angeles enjoyed the novel and pleasing experience of eating oranges plucked by himself from the trees on the big plantation of Hon. James Jack, his old Salt Lake friend and associate.

He also spent some time in San Francisco and while there of course visited the Midwinter Fair, which was then in a much more chaotic condition than at the present. He looked for the Utah exhibit, but looked in vain. No one there that he met had so much as heard of a display being made by this Territory.

It was not until 8 o'clock on Saturday night that the jury into whose hands was entrusted the fate of George Gaylor returned into court, after being out since 10:20 a. m. When asked if they had agreed upon a verdict the foreman stated they had not, and that he saw no chance of their doing so. The jurors were polled by Clerk McMillan, at the request of Judge Merritt, and each one confessed that an agreement was out of the question. Consequently they were discharged.

The jury stood, at the finish, seven for acquittal and five for a conviction.

When court opened this morning Judge Powers made an application that the defendant be admitted to bail, and this was not opposed by the prosecution; but Judge Howat desired that the court would make the amount of bail "adequate to the offense charged."

Judge Howat said that a bond of $4,000 would be acceptable to the prosecution, and at that sum the court fixed it.

It transpired Feb. 13 that the recent arrest of ex-Detective Joe O'Brien by the police on a charge of vagrancy will probably be ventilated in the district court and that City Marshal Pratt and aids will be made defendants in a case for heavy damages.

O'Brien claims that his arrest was plain a violation of law as was ever committed by a police officer in taking a prisoner into custody. Joe says he doesn't pretend to be a very good man, but that when it comes to comparing records with some of the policemen, who he claims have conspired to injure him, he is prepared to publicly prove that he will not be placed at a disadvantage. He says that he has employed Judge Powers as his attorney and that he will file suit for damages within the next two or three days. False imprisonment and cruel treatment will be leading features of the complaint. Joesays that he was thrown into a dark, cold room filled with vermin which have since made his life miserable.

Mr. W. J. Paul Sr., of Cleveland, Emery county, gives some interesting items relative to that part of the country. He says work on the Deseret Lake reservoir is progressing rapidly. The dam is at present 23 feet high but will, when completed, have another 12 feet added thereto. The lake covers an area of 715 acres and by it from six to ten thousand acres of land can be irrigated, all consisting of good, fertile soil. The reservoir is about eight miles from the R. G. W. track.

The land is said to be admirably well adapted for the growing of fruit and vegetables of various kinds as well as grain, and the climate is described as most delightful.

Settlers are wanted to help build up the country. There is a comfortable place at present for about fifty families and desirable parties will have every facility for making homes for themselves.

By corresponding with Mr. W. J. Paul Jr., Cleveland, Emery county, full particulars may be obtained.

A couple of young men, one about 18 years of age, and the other 20 were seen begging on the streets Feb. 13 and Officer Carey informed them that unless they desisted he would arrest them and lock them up. They replied that that was precisely what they wished him to do as they had not had a square meal for several days and they were very hungry. They were further informed that if they were sent to jail that they would be compelled to work hard at breaking rock to which they responded that they were perfectly willing to work providing they had a place to sleep and something to eat.

The young men were taken to the police station and fed and locked up for the night. Next morning they were taken before Justice Smith on a charge of vagrancy. They gave their names as E. L. Warden and Eugene Peters and told their story to the court and were discharged, a fact which they seemed to sincerely regret. The officers predict that the boys will be back again before morning unless they will be able to board a train unseen and continue their journey on towards the Midwinter Fair from the East.

There was an unusual scene on the business and more centrally located streets of this city Tuesday and one that would have enlisted more sympathy for those who participated in it had it not been for the fact that the movement was inaugurated and carried on principally, according to the statement of Captain Donovan, through the efforts of a couple of half-drunken individuals who have done time in the city jail.

The disturbance was caused by about two hundred and fifty or three hundred men who marched along the sidewalks, shouting, "Give us work; bread or blood. Work we will have if we must fight for it."

There was one very noticeable and gratifying feature about the affair and that was that so far as known not one old, real resident of Utah could be seen in the ranks of the malcontents. On the contrary, there were many recognized transients, idlers and saloon bums. And these as well as most of the others were closely watched by the police, who refrained from making arrests, preferring to wait developments for the purpose of seeing whether or not the men would become violent in their demonstrations.

It appears that Salt Lake's municipal family is not dwelling as harmoniously together as its numerous admirers, friends and constituents would desire.

At a committee meeting Feb. 12 a sort of sensation—mild in its character yet disagreeable to some people—was sprung. It involved the name of City Marshal Pratt, and had its origin in a receipt given to William Gilbert, the leader of the city prisoners, by the head of the police department. The receipt in question was for $50 and represented the percentage that was to go to the chief of police for the month of January. It has been the custom heretofore for the city to let the contract for feeding prisoners to that official for 15 cents a meal. It has also been the harmless and business-like custom for that official to make a little something out of the contract if he could. All this the head of the police department has claimed to be legitimate and has said that if the City Council did not want him to exercise that privilege they ought not to have allowed it, and ought to have fed their own prisoners.

It is this percentage over which the present trouble has arisen and which may lead to an investigation by the city fathers. Marshal Pratt avers, and his receipt and general conduct show it, that so far as he was concerned there was no effort at secrecy and he wanted none. He will now ask for the fullest investigation. He thinks, as do his friends, that it was hardly just to him to give the matter to the public before notifying him of the charge against him. Finally, in the whole affair there seems to be much more smoke than fire.

Dr. Jabez W. Taylor was found guilty by a jury in Commissioner Pratt's court at 8:45 February 7th of practicing medicine without a license from the board of medical examiners for Utah. The verdict was accompanied by a "recommendation to mercy" and was not arrived at until after nearly three hours' deliberation.

When asked if he wished to say anything, the defendant stated that he did. Dr. Taylor then assured the court that, as far as possible, he had complied with the law. When he first made application to the medical board for a license he presented the diploma which he had received from the American Health College of Cincinnati, Ohio—an institution legally chartered by that state, and empowered to grant degrees and issue diplomas to its graduates. When he applied for a license here he paid to the secretary the sum of $5 and received a receipt for the same, but instead of a license reaching him he some time later received a note stating the medical board would not accept his credentials, no reason for this action being, however, assigned. He had been practicing in this Territory, he said, for a period of twenty years and he believed there were many hundreds of persons in this city who could thank God that Jabez W. Taylor went into the practice of medicine. He had been instrumental in saving a good many lives among the public, and that gratuitously. It had always been his endeavor to conduct himself in a way becoming a good citizen and a gentleman. Although now technically guilty of breaking the law, he still thought he had a legal right to practice his profession here, because the system under which he did so was a copy-righted system.

Commissioner Pratt said it appeared from the doctor's statement that he made application to the medical board and presented his credentials. That board, under the law, was invested with certain discretionary power in regard to the admission of practitioners. If they exercised that discretion arbitrarily or wrongfully the defendant had a remedy; he might appeal to the courts in the proper way to compel the members of the board to do their duty. As to whether the board had or had not wrongfully deprived Dr. Taylor of the right to practice it was not for this court to pass upon. The jury, after due consideration, had found him guilty and the court had no option but to impose a penalty for violation of the law. As he (the commissioner) had remarked in other cases of this kind, this law, in some respects, worked a little hardship; but it was the duty of every citizen, when a law was passed to meet certain provisions, to obey it until it had been repealed or the courts had decided as to its legality. In this instance the court had decided that the law was constitutional. The jury having recommended the exercise of leniency in this case, he should now take that into consideration. The costs were heavy (about $35), and he would take that fact into consideration also. Heretofore he had imposed a penalty of $50 and costs; in Dr. Taylor's case he would fix it at $10.

Attorney Cochran gave notice of appeal.

PEON WEDDINGS IN GUATEMALA.

They have a queer bethrothal custom among the common natives or peons of Guatemala, which is scarcely romantic for the girl. I was passing the hut of a native on a finca or coffee plantation one day, when I saw an old woman belaboring her daughter with a good-sized stick, which she applied vigorously across the shoulders and body of her beloved offspring, who set up a wail of woe and pain, though I fancied her tears were quickly dried, for it was a significant event for her.

This is the way the old lady gave her consent to the marriage of her daughter. The natives receive but little cash during the year. The priests charge what is there considered a good sum for performing a marriage ceremony, and the natives of the lower classes dispense with it. The mother beats the daughter, there is a feast of frijoles and tortilla cakes and the dispensation of unlimited quantities of native whisky, everybody is happy and drunk, and that constitutes the marriage, which, singular as it may appear, is regarded and observed, as a rule, faithfully.—Ex.

THE LEGISLATURE.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

Nearly the whole of yesterday afternoon was consumed by the Council in discussing the eight hour bill. It will be remembered that this bill makes eight hours a day's work on all public works, and had passed the House. Williams led the opposition to the measure, and among the arguments which he advanced against it were the proposition that it interfered with the right of private contract, favored the class of laborers who were employed on public works as against those who were not, and could not be enforced because no penalty was provided for its violation. Taylor and H. E. Booth favored the bill, and advanced in support of it the usual arguments. For a time it looked like the final vote on the bill would be a party one, with the Republicans in the affirmative and the Democrats in the negative. But Lund, a Democrat, made a speech in favor of the bill, and when the final vote was taken it was found that only two had voted against it—Hart and Williams. The Council adjourned immediately after the final vote on the bill was taken.

The House and House lobby listened about an hour, yesterday afternoon, to Allen's speech in advocacy of his bill providing for free public libraries in cities of the first and second class. It was an interesting address, and was replete with information and arguments calculated to show why free public libraries should be established, and the benefits accruing from them in cities where they existed. Not a word was said in opposition to the bill; in fact no one spoke upon it except Allen, and it passed by a unanimous vote. The bill provides for the appointment, by the president of the board of education, by and with the advice and consent of the board, of seven library directors, a minority of whom shall be women, and who shall serve without pay. This board of seven library directors control the disbursement of all library funds, employ a librarian, etc., and establish rules for the government of the library. A tax not exceeding one-fifth of one mill on the dollar, on all the taxable property in the city, is required to be collected each year for the maintenance and enlargement of the library. The collecting of this tax, and the establishment of a free public library, is mandatory upon each city of the first and second class, and any city of the third class may be brought under the law by appropriate action on the part of its mayor and city council.

With a haste bordering on precipitancy, the House yesterday afternoon passed a very important bill. It was not read by sections at all. The clerk read it through once in his usual and necessarily rapid style, and two or three amendments were made, when the final vote was called. Then several members seemed to regret that the bill had not received more deliberate consideration, and Johnson and Ivins both gave notice that they would move reconsideration of the vote by which the House passed it. The bill makes it a misdemeanor to drive stock off its range without returning it within twenty-four hours, without consent of the owner; requires all persons except licensed butchers to expose for ten days the hide of any animal slaughtered; forbids any person save the owner or his agent to skin any animal found dead; authorizes the county court to appoint detectives to discover violations of the stock law; makes it a felony to mark or brand an animal with intent to deprive the owner of his property; makes it unlawful for any railroad to ship live stock before the same are inspected; requires the county court of each county containing a railroad station to appoint an inspector, whose duty it is to inspect and record all live stock shipped by rail out of his county. All shippers of stock must give the inspector at least two days' notice of any shipment they intend to make, and he is allowed $3 per day, or fraction thereof, and twenty cents mileage one way, for his services, to be paid out of the county treasury. The bill is designed to check stock dealing.

The House killed two drastic bills yesterday. One provided that no personal property should be exempt as against a claim for wages due a servant or employee, and the other allowed the property of a debtor to be attached if he undertook to remove from the county. Varian pointed out the radical and very objectionable character of these bills, especially the first named; and the credit of killing them is largely due to him.

THURSDAY.

Yesterday afternoon in connection with H. B. 30, Varian's bill to tax debts secured by mortgages and trust deeds, which came up as special order, resolutions upon the subject, adopted by the Chamber of Commerce, were read. The clerk read the bill at length, when Sears began a speech in opposition to it. He thought if he had Varian's eloquence and his own facts, he could convert the majority of the House to his view. It was a bad time to swap horses when crossing a stream, and it is a bad time now to revise our financial laws. It is the duty of the state to pass such financial legislation as will enable the people to borrow money at the lowest rate of interest. Utah is the best off of any commonwealth in the Union, financially, and her credit is of the highest. This condition is largely due to the character of our financial laws. The law passed at the last session, now sought to be repealed, was not hasty legislation. It was favored by our best financiers, who foretold its beneficent effects. Were it not that I am speaking for ten thousand men whose homes are mortgaged, I would not take the stand I do on this bill. Utah owes less per capita than almost any state in the Union, and with our financial laws as they are, we shall soon be relieved of financial stringency. The argument that California has a law taxing debts secured by mortgages is not valid. The speaker read from the report of the California state board of equalization, showing that the law was unenforced in its effects, and was a concession to a certain class or agitators, who were arrayed in opposition to capital. The quotation showed how the mortgagor actually paid more tax than he would if the mortgage had not been taxed as part of the property.

The bill says to home money lenders, you can't live in Utah and loan your money here. Home money lenders, in order to make loans here, must do so under color of the name of some person residing elsewhere. The Legislature should encourage capital to come here. Then we would have manufactures that would be tangible property which the tax collector could find without a candle. The speaker held up a copy of a Denver paper containing nine solid pages of advertisements of trust deed sales, brought on by attempted or proposed financial legislation of a bad character. Is it a healthy condition to have $150,000,000 in the New York banks over and above legal requirements, or to have so much money in the savings banks of Illinois that their vaults cannot contain it, while the people are suffering for lack of funds with which to do business? This condition is due to distrust, and such proposed legislation as this bill adds to the distrust. The speaker gave comparative statistics showing the per capita indebtedness of ten states, and the increase of debt and taxable property in them. The debt per capita in Utah is not heavy in proportion to her wealth, and it could be increased without disadvantage if there could be a proportionate increase in the area of cultivated lands. In Illinois the ground is taken that the state has not the right to tax the note the merchant takes for goods.

Ivins said consideration of this bill had been postponed in order to give opportunity to get statistics showing why it should not pass, but they had not been presented. Sears had made a strong plea for the moneyed interest, but had not touched upon the principle of right which was involved. For forty years we had a revenue law which provided that property other than money should be taxed at a fair valuation. This was really a bill to tax money, and the question is: Shall we tax money or not? Of all kinds of property, money is best able to bear the burdens of taxation. The speaker read the statute passed at the last session of the Assembly, exempting from taxation notes and debts secured by mortgage and showed that the money which formerly paid a tax by being loaned, escapes that burden, provided it is secured by real estate. The public revenue was thus cut down, and the lender who had no real estate security paid a tax, while the lender who had such security did not. All money invested in this Territory, ought to be taxed, but as a matter of public policy, at the present time, it is best to exempt foreign capital from taxation. The people never asked for the law passed at the last session exempting secured debts from taxation. The people demand its repeal, and if this Assembly don't repeal it, the people will send a Legislature here that will. There have been protests in the papers, and from other sources, against this bill, but no such protests come from, or represent, the people. They come from capitalists.

Allen said he had no quarrel with capital, nor was he the special advocate of the man who had none. The question involved in this bill is a phase of the great subject that underlies all our financial distress. The men who own the money have destroyed half the wealth of the world, and now they seek to evade the taxation of the other half. The fundamental proposition is that every dollar of property in the commonwealth must bear its share of the public burdens, and no class or kind of property should be exempt. The first question the lender naturally asks is, What security have you? The next is, What rate of interest will you pay? Matters of taxation are not considered in actual practice. Allen read from an editorial in a Chicago paper, to show that credits are taxed in that state, and claimed that they were in all, or nearly all, the states. Such a law had not driven out capital from any state. Capital comes or goes according to the security and interest it can get. Idaho had enacted a law similar to that passed by this Assembly in 1892, but it had not attracted capital there. In one county of this Territory there is a million dollars' worth of property that escapes taxation. The speaker read from a brief in the case of Zion's Savings Bank & Trust Co. vs. L. G. Hardy, collector, to show that the bank had a vast amount of capital, owned by itself and its depositors, which entirely escaped taxation. The speaker insisted that there was nothing in the plea that foreclosure suits would follow the passage of this bill, nor the plea that home capital would evade the law. We have heard from the newspapers and the bankers on this question, but we have not heard from the masses of the people. They demand justice between man and man.

Stanford thought misrepresentation had come from both sides of this question. The question is: Is it good policy to disturb, at such a time as this, existing conditions? I claim it is not. The bill passed last session was not a partisan measure. It has not been detrimental to our revenue to the extent represented. In support of this assertion the speaker read from the report of the Territorial board of equalization. He also read a communication from citizens in Sevier county, which represented that its authors were very much in need of money, but that, on account of pending legislation, loans were not being made. The speaker thought it bad politics and bad policy to change existing laws, or agitate such change. If foreign capital is not taxed directly, it is indirectly, for it is invested in tangible property which pays taxes, and until foreign capital came in, we had to pay a much higher rate of interest than since. This bill if passed will give employment to the courts, and aid in ruining many men who are doing business upon borrowed capital.

Johnson explained statements made by him in committee, which had been referred to, and claimed that in Sanpete county there were mortgages amounting to half a million dollars, owned in Utah, which ought to pay taxes, but were exempt under the present law. He made an argument in favor of the bill, and dwelt on the injustice of exempting a note which was secured, and taxing one that was not. He hoped the time had not arrived when the capitalists of New York could dictate, by telegraph, the legislation to be passed by this Assembly.

Varian closed the debate. He criticized the character of the arguments offered against the bill. When he read an opinion in a newspaper, he would ask, who wrote it? What are the writer's qualifications to express a valuable opinion? The speaker had the clerk read an editorial in the News of February 5th headed, "Kill That Bill," and then asked who sent the telegram therein quoted, and what were his opportunities for learning in advance what the effect of this bill would be? In reference to the Chamber of Commerce, he declared it had sanctioned propositions that would shock the common sense of a fourteen-year-old school boy. Why did not the Chamber of Commerce, by its committee, come before the committee of this House in a proper and dignified way, and with argument, reason and statistics, oppose the bill. He called on members to vote the bill down, because they wanted to, and could if they saw fit to do so, but he begged them not to give such false reasons as double taxation, and danger of the withdrawal of capital, for their votes.

The bill passed by a vote of 18 to 11. The vote was as follows:

Ayes—Allen, Clark, Dougall, Hatch, Ivins, Johnson, McBride, McKay, Parsons, Pigman, Varian, Warner, Wines—18.

Noes—Hubbard, Mason, Monson, Moore, Nebeker, Powers, Sears, Stanford, Stoker, Tolton, Mr. Speaker—11.

Last evening the House committee on manufactures and commerce, of which Varian is chairman, held a meeting which was a decidedly interesting affair. The measure under consideration was H. B. 93, to pay a bounty of 50 cents per pound on first-class silk cocoons. A bevy of ladies took the committee by storm with a series of speeches which were replete with information and arguments, going to show the necessity for encouraging the silk industry, and the benefits that would accrue from so doing. Among the speakers were Mrs. E. B. Wells, Mrs. Z. D. H. Young, Mrs. Caine, Mrs. Judge Bennett, Mrs. O. J. Salisbury, Mrs. C. E. Allen and Mrs. Varian. Among members of the Assembly other than the committee that were present were Ivins, Allen, Stanford and Hubbard. A number of prominent gentlemen not members, were also present, among whom were Judge Bennett and O. J. Salisbury, Esq. The effects of the speeches made by the ladies was marked, one or more Democratic members of the Legislature present having been heard to remark that they could vote for the bill. The Republicans on the committee favor it, and it will no doubt be reported favorably.

FRIDAY.

As will be seen from the report of the debate which occurred in the House yesterday, and the final vote on Johnson's bill, given below, one question that has been a subject of agitation and uneasiness in financial circles ever since the session of the present Legislature opened, the taxation of foreign capital, has been definitely settled. The House, by a strong majority, rejected Johnson's bill, which was a proposition to tax all mortgage and trust deeds of record in this Territory, as a part of the realty. This vote will, according to the representations of eastern lenders, impart a better tone to the loan business.

Allen spoke more warmly in support of this bill than he has upon any other subject during the session and some of the sentiments he expressed verged closely upon the views of Populists.

The House committee on ways and means this morning completed the reading and amending of Warner's revenue bill. The committee has adopted so many amendments to it that a substitute, embodying the changes, will be offered with a recommendation that it be printed, with a view to saving expense in assessing the original bill provided, that realty should be assessed biennially; but the committee think a yearly assessment ought to be made. This is about the most important change in the bill. Judge Bishop, probate judge of Weber county, who was the collaborator of Warner in the preparation of the bill, was present when the committee was in session this forenoon.

It is understood that the committee on education, to whom was referred the bill to provide for the education of blind children, will recommend the bill favorably, with an amendment to the effect that the expense shall be borne by the respective counties from which the children come. The bill appropriates $200 per annum out of the Territorial treasury for the purpose. The blind school is to be established in connection with the institute for deaf mutes.

In the Council this afternoon the following bill, recognizing, for certain purposes, private and denominational schools, was introduced:

A bill authorizing the awarding of diplomas and other certificates of learning, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah:

Section 1. That any private or denominational school is hereby authorized to issue to its students diplomas and grade certificates, where said schools teach, and said students are taught successfully, parallel courses with those taught in the University of Utah, and under such further rules and regulations as said private or denominational schools shall prescribe.

Sec. 2. That said diplomas and grade certificates, when issued under the seal of said private or denominational schools (if it have one), and signed by its president, the president of the faculty thereof, the department teacher and the superintendent of schools of the county where such private or denominational school is located, shall be prima facie evidence of the qualifications recited in said diploma or grade certificate, of the holder thereof.

Sec. 3. That persons to whom are issued such diploma or certificate from a qualified normal department of any such private or denominational school may be employed as teachers in the district schools of this Territory without further examination, provided said diploma or certificate shall state specifically that said holder thereof has successfully passed in all the branches required by law for qualifying teachers of the grade named in said diploma or certificate.

Sec. 4. No holder of any third grade certificate issued by any such private or denominational school shall be eligible to employment as teacher in any of the district schools of this Territory for more than one year.

H. B. 14, Johnson's bill to tax mortgages and trust deeds, came up as special order at 3 o'clock. The author explained that the bill did not provide for double taxation, as the encumbrance was deemed a part of the realty

He further explained the provisions of the bill, but said he would not discuss at length the policy of passing such legislation. The House, by passing a similar bill yesterday, had defined its position on the question of policy. All property in the commonwealth should be taxed to support the government. He denied that the bill, if passed, would either prevent foreign capital from coming here or scare out what was already here. He also denied that the enactment of the law of 1892, excluding mortgages from taxation, had been followed by an influx of foreign capital as great as that which came here in the two years previous while mortgages were taxed. Neither had the rate of interest been increased.

The speaker made a lengthy argument in favor of the bill, when Stanford moved the previous question, which was put and lost, the House being evidently desirous of having the measure fully considered.

Hubbard thought it singular that the judiciary committee should have favorably reported two bills on the subject of taxing mortgages or debts secured by them. He criticised the provisions of the bill and its general object.

Allen said the principles underlying the question to which this bill relates had been fully discussed in the House. He showed from the assessments of several years past that the amount of personal property assessed in this Territory had dropped about ten million dollars since the law of 1870 was passed, exempting from taxation notes secured by real estate. He opposed the clause deducting the amount of realty from the assessed value of the property. The injustice of exempting capital from taxation goes to the hearts of the people, and is a great cause of the prevailing distrust. There was nothing in the cry that capital would be frightened by the passage of this bill. He deprecated the idea that the present was not an opportune time for such legislation, and spoke with much warmth in advocacy of the bill.

Tolton criticised the action of the judiciary committee, in its manipulation of the two bills relating to taxing mortgage debts. All the property owned by a poor man was easily found by the assessor, and taxed; but the property of the rich man could be invested in such a form as to be screened from taxation. All property should be taxed alike. The bill that was passed yesterday was half a loaf. If we can make a law of this, we shall have a whole loaf.

Warner said that four or five years ago Utah became a heavy borrower of eastern money, and it was not now an opportune time to tax the mortgages given for it. He would discriminate in favor of eastern capital that far.

Clark made a speech in favor of the bill, and urged that the present law was unjust. He favored Johnson's bill rather than Varian's, and believed the present was an opportune time to pass it.

Moore argued briefly against the bill, and Ivins followed in opposition to it. The latter thought it would be unwise, under the critical financial conditions now prevailing, to pass a sweeping law taxing all mortgages on record in this Territory. He voted for Varian's bill, but thought that measure was a happy medium and went far enough. He should vote against this bill.

Johnson closed the debate in a brief argument, when the friends of the bill, led by Allen, foreseeing its defeat if pressed to a final vote, precipitated a parliamentary fight for the purpose of postponing the final vote. They were unsuccessful, however, as the opponents of the bill insisted on disposing of it immediately. It was lost by a vote of 14 to 9.

SATURDAY.

The matter of placing an appropriation of $1000 at the disposal of the relief committee of this city, to furnish employment for the poor, occasioned an interesting discussion in the House. It was expected that the money would be spent on the boulevard, as there was no other public work under way on which it could be used. The happy thought of Ivins to amend the bill so as to expend the money in improving the Capitol grounds, disarmed opposition to it and it passed by an almost unanimous vote.

The bill which provided for the veterinary inspection of livestock and animals before being slaughtered for food, and also for the inspection of meats exported for sale as food, was reported adversely by the livestock committee, on account of the expense that it would involve. The bill was killed.

The G. A. R. badge question seems to be agitating the Council considerably. There is pending in that body a bill forbidding the use of those and other society badges, by persons not entitled to them, and this afternoon the subject was under discussion.

H. B. 33, appropriating $1,000 for the employment of needy persons on public works, under a board of relief created by the bill, came up on third reading. The appropriations committee reported adversely on the bill. Varian spoke in favor of it, citing existing conditions of distress among the poor. Tolton opposed the bill. The Assembly should be just before it is generous. Many just claims against the Territory can not be paid because of the condition of the treasury. He was opposed to such a precedent. Sears pleaded for the bill in behalf of the hungry poor, and Stanford favored it. Hubbard thought the public moneys ought not to be used for such a purpose as that of this bill. Ivins thought the money to relieve the poor in Salt Lake City and county ought to come out of the treasuries of the city and county. Warner said Ogden and Weber county were taking care of their poor, and he did not think it would be right to appropriate Territorial funds to build a boulevard in Salt Lake City. Moore gave reasons why he thought the bill ought not to pass.

Varian regretted that a spirit of jealousy against this city should appear in the discussion. He cited the fact that this city pays far more taxes than she gets the benefit of, and helps to educate the children and build roads and bridges in the counties of the gentlemen who opposed the bill. It was not the purpose of the bill to build a boulevard, but to relieve suffering.

Ivins said if Varian would amend the bill so as to provide that the money should be spent in improving the Capitol grounds he would vote for it, even if the amount should be doubled.

Varian offered an amendment, making the amount $2000, to be expended on the Capitol grounds. Parsons earnestly favored the bill as amended. The question was asked by Hatch if the title was clear to the Capitol grounds, and Stoker moved to make the bill special order for Monday to give time to find out the facts. Lost. The bill passed by a vote of 17 to 2.

MONDAY.

The "printing muddle," as it will be known to history, prevented the reports of the auditor and treasurer from being printed and thereby made accessible to members of the Legislature. The consequence has been that the Assembly has gone on legislating and appropriating public money in ignorance of the condition of Territorial finances. This afternoon, however, the House committee on ways and means rendered a report, one effect of which will doubtless be to impress the solons with the necessity for retrenchment. The report is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 12, 1894.

Mr. Speaker—Your committee on ways and means respectfully represents that a similar condition financially confronts the present Legislature to that which has attended the last four sessions.

In January, 1888, the appropriation bill provided for an expenditure for the two years ensuing in excess of revenue to the amount of—

	$177,775 31
In January, 1890, for.....	303,760 80
In January, 1892, for.....	238,343 67

Making a total of.....$740,099 04

To meet these deficits, bonds were issued in 1893, First series, for.....	$150,000 00

1890, Second series, for.....	300,000 00
1892, Third series, for.....	250,000 00

Total amount of bonds issued...$700,000 00

This entire amount has been absorbed in meeting the biennial deficits herein enumerated, leaving a balance for the present Legislature to provide for of $40,099.04. Your committee have carefully considered every item of expenditure necessary to be made, based upon reports received, for the ensuing two years ending Dec. 31st, 1895, a detailed statement of which is hereto attached. These items represent the amounts necessary for the maintenance of the Territorial public institutions, the payment of salaries of officers, jurors, witnesses, interest on bonds, contingent expenses, World's Fair commission exhibits, etc., and to meet claims now being considered by the committee on claims and public accounts. In this statement your committee have deemed it absolutely necessary to provide that certain salaries should be reduced, and appropriations to counties be limited to about $15,000, about half the amount appropriated to counties in 1892. In the estimate submitted your committee have not provided for the appropriation of any sums for the erection or repair of public buildings, University supplies, bounties, militia, etc., and in anticipating that the revenue from all sources will be the same as last year, there will then be a deficit of about $295,000. Your committee do not think it would be good policy or correct business finance to follow the example of our predecessors, to meet this deficit by the issuance of bonds. Where such a policy would lead to, if continued, is apparent to all. Your committee therefore recommend that the general tax be increased from two to three and one-fourth mills on the dollar on all the taxable property of the Territory. Your committee having under consideration the new bill providing for revenue will suggest this amendment in reporting said revenue bill to the House, when the propriety of adopting said amendment can be debated and passed upon.

AMOUNTS PROPOSED FOR COUNTIES.

Garfield .....	$1,000 00
Iron .....	1,000 00
San Juan .....	1,000 00
Plute .....	1,000 00
Kane .....	1,000 00
Morgan .....	500 00
Milard .....	1,000 00
Beaver .....	1,000 00
Emery .....	1,000 00
Wasatch .....	500 00
Utah .....	1,000 00
Washington .....	1,000 00
Rice .....	500 00
Sevier .....	1,000 00
Tooele .....	1,000 00
Grand .....	1,000 00
Wayne .....	1,000 00
Sanpete .....	500 00

Total..... $18,000 00

Reductions proposed in salaries of Territorial officers for the two years 1894 and 1895:

Auditor.....	$800
Treasurer.....	400
Private secretary of the Governor.....	400
School Commissioner.....	600
Fish Commissioner.....	400
Territorial Board of Equalization, less than the years 1893 and 1894.....	1500
Rent of offices, less about.....	400
Amount less for Territorial proportion to be paid assessors and collectors than amount paid in the years '92 and '93.....	5674

Total..... $10,074

Your committee further recommend, in view of early statehood, the Territory having no capital building in which to transact public business and having to pay out annually large sums of money for the rental of offices, courtrooms and halls for legislative purposes, and for other reasons in part referred to in the message of his excellency, Governor Caleb W. West, that this Legislative Assembly provide for the issuing of bonds to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, one hundred and twenty-five thousand of which shall be expended in the erection of one wing of a capital building, the remainder to be placed in the territorial treasury so that the treasurer can meet the auditor's warrants provided to be issued in the appropriation bill and not have to await the returns on taxes for six months or more before such warrants can be cashed and thus save to the Territory several thousand dollars annually, which for many years past has been paid in discounts or interest or both on said warrants issued for the maintenance of Territorial institutions, the advantage to the Territory being in the difference in the rates of interest as between money obtained on bonds at the rate of five per cent per annum and that paid to banks which has not been less than ten and more frequently twelve per cent per annum.

STANFORD, chairman.

Estimated expenditures for the years 1894 and 1895—

1894, December 31st, deficit as per auditor's report.....	$ 40,069 04
Maintenance of Insane Asylum.....	95,000 00
Maintenance of Agricultural College.....	40,000 00
Maintenance Reform School.....	32,000 00
Maintenance University of Utah.....	9,000 00
Expense World's Fair exhibit.....	59,567 25
Court commissioners, jurors and witnesses.....	80,000 00
Outstanding certificates of jurors, etc.....	20,000 00
Appropriation to counties, roads, bridges.....	16,000 00
D. A. & M. Society deficit.....	2,939 75
D. A. & M. Society expenses and premiums, 1894.....	15,000 00
Territorial Board of Equalization deficit.....	617 07
Territorial Board of Equalization expenses for 1894 and 1895.....	4,500 00
Capitol grounds expenses for 1894 and 1895.....	5,000 00

Capitol grounds, to complete improvements.....	12,000 00
Salary of Territorial auditor.....	4,000 00
Salary of Territorial treasurer.....	2,000 00
Salary of private secretary of Governor.....	2,000 00
Salary of school commissioner.....	2,400 00
Traveling expenses of school commissioner.....	1,000 00
Printing, etc., for public schools.....	800 00
Salary of Territorial librarian.....	1,000 00
Salary of fish commissioner.....	600 00
Salary of district court judges.....	8 00
Salary of clerk of district court.....	4,000 00
Salary of chair of mineralogy.....	2,500 00
Books and stationery.....	8,000 00
Rent of office of auditor and recorder M and B.....	1,000 00
Auditor's contingent expense account.....	500 00
Sealer of weights and measures office.....	300 00
Contingent expenses, Legislature.....	8,000 00
Printing for Legislature.....	2,000 00
Fugitives from justice.....	2,500 00
District courts.....	8,000 00
To meet claims now being considered by committee on claims.....	90,000 00
Interest on bonds for 1894 and 1895.....	70,000 00
Expenses of treasurer's office.....	500 00
Expenses of school commissioner's office.....	200 00
Publishing marks and brands.....	400 00
Territorial proportion of salaries of assessors and collectors.....	40,000 00

Total..... $ 757,493 11

RESOURCES.

General tax for 1892 and 1893, and which will probably be decreased for 1894 and 1895, derived from assessed valuation of property of $15,114,842 at 3½ mills on the dollar for two years equals.....	$ 748,246 47
Fines and forfeitures.....	2,500 00
Jury fund.....	10,000 00

Total..... $760 746 47

On motion of Stanford 250 copies of the report were ordered printed for the use of the members.

The committee on judiciary in the Council yesterday, rendered the following report on a measure which has provoked more discussion than any other introduced at the present session of the Legislature, and of which Varian is the author:

COMMITTEE ROOM, Feb. 12, 1894.

Mr. President—Your committee on judiciary, to whom was referred H. B. No. 30, a bill for an act providing for the taxation of debts secured by mortgages and trust deeds, beg leave to report that we have had the same under consideration and unanimously recommend that the bill should not pass.

H. E. BOOTH, Chairman.

The committee on judiciary, whose unanimous opinion of the bill is thus expressed, consists of H. E. Booth, Williams, Hague, Taylor and Hart. It thus appears that at least five members of the Council are fully committed to the defeat of the bill, and it is known that at least one or two, and perhaps several, others look upon it with disfavor.

A PLEA FOR UTAH.

The manufacturers' bureau of the Salt Lake Chamber of Commerce is hard at work for this city and Territory. The bureau is made up of the following well known citizens: W. H. Rowe, ex-officio chairman; B. F. Grant, H. L. A. Culmer, A. M. Grant, executive committee; A. Hirsching, Elias Morris, A. H. Cannon, John C. Cutler, John H. White, F. W. Jennings, Jacob Moritz; Sam Levy, W. S. Simkins. The address which has been prepared is an earnest appeal to the people and worthy their serious consideration. The full text is as follows: (In the awful crisis now upon us we appeal to you in behalf of a cause which if properly appreciated and supported, will prove to be the greatest factor in the transformation of this long neglected Territory into a great and prosperous community—the creditor state of the New West.

Two hundred and fifty thousand patient, industrious and enterprising people in a country long settled, a land-locked empire—blessed with a glorious climate, rich valleys, minerals of all kinds in the hills, and cattle and sheep on the ranges, certainly ought to be independent of the world. Surely, such a section ought to be exporting, and not importing, food and other products. Its people ought to be lenders, not borrowers; they ought to own the bonds issued by its counties and cities, and keep the interest at home. Its wool and other raw materials ought to be worked up for home use and for export. Diversified industries make rich communities—the operation of factories creates demands for the products of the farm and range, and the home market is the best, as it best establishes wealth.

Such a community ought to be free from debt, instead of owing $30,000,000 to outsiders. Its factories ought to be so firmly established and so loyally sustained that its banks would prefer industrial securities to land or other creditors as they do elsewhere, and proprietors of home factories ought not to be turned down when applying for assistance to local capitalists, because their products (although superior in price and quality) do not bear a foreign brand. Money ought to be cheap in such a favored region, regardless of panics to the east or west. Is this overdrawn?

Would not our present condition be such, if during the past five years the millions brought into Utah for land investments and the profits on the gold, silver, lead, wool, grain and cattle exported had been used in the development of industrial interests at home? Instead of this we find that the prosperity of recent years has been accompanied by a spirit of extravagance and neglect of home interests that has brought us to a condition which threatens to absorb and turn over to strangers the hard-earned homes and business enterprises of many of our bravest and most progressive people.

Their all is tied up in wealth-producing enterprises, and patronage is refused by their friends and neighbors.

Factories closing through lack of support, land values falling and in this time of contraction millions are held in banks or hidden away in vaults, and not a dollar available for the support or extension of factory interests.

The people taught well from childhood, as well as the strangers who have come to us, are alike shunning Utah-made goods and sending their money away to support and sustain the very people who, through ignorance or wilful acts, have stricken down our chief industries. Silver, lead, cattle and wool depressed, home factories neglected, Salt Lake City's only woolen mills closed and Provo's mills kept running on work for California, make a reproach which the common sense of the people ought to tell them must be removed.

Our mines, farms, ranges and factories have been producing about $30,000,000 annually, or about $150 for each man, woman and child in the Territory. The economies of the people cannot offset the sudden decrease in the value of our leading industries, and the balance of trade is now running on a basis of about $10,000,000 per annum against us.

To meet the deficiency we borrow, but to continue borrowing will put us under bondage of debt which cannot be endured by a brave and patriotic people. Utah cannot stand the strain. Gold will not give relief promptly. Nothing but proper development of factory interests can give the relief needed. Home goods must be used and our laborers kept at work, instead of being forced to accept a morsel from the hand of charity.

Five thousand men and women are seeking employment now. About 5,000 are now employed in our factories; $5,000,000 is our annual manufactured product, while goods worth $20,000,000 are bought in a great proportion of which could just as well be produced at home.

Increase the factory production by increasing the demand to a point where our present factories will be working to their full capacity and the problem of the unemployed will be solved. Will not this be true charity? A persistent demand for home-made goods will insure solid factory interests, and a part of the millions now withheld will be turned into industrial channels. What must be done to open the eyes of the people? Home industry has a disagreeable sound to man. It ought to be a bugle-call to duty now. Talk will not answer any longer. Give us your sympathy and support, and we will rouse the people from their apathy and indifference. Honor the founders and pioneers by supporting the industries they established. Give proper encouragement to the present movement to revive a loyalty and patriotism to home interests and we will have prosperous cities. Support the efforts of the Manufacturers' bureau and we will carry out a movement in the cities and towns throughout Utah which will be felt from Helena to St. George, and to the East and West.

The intermountain region once thoroughly aroused to the importance of supporting and protecting its own, will push to success an industrial revolution, and establish such reciprocal trade between the intermountain towns as will transform the now discouraged and dependent people to rich and prosperous communities.

We want your suggestions and we must have your assistance. We ask you to carefully consider the present situation, and do everything in your power to promote the interests of Utah's factories. Use home-made goods yourself and in your families, and see that your friends and neighbors are alive to the importance of this work.

THE MANUFACTURING BUREAU.

By C. E. Wantland, Secretary.

The Manufacturers' Bureau, Salt Lake Chamber of Commerce.

THE COUNTRY would willingly stand a heavier tax on some things if their lawmakers wouldn't insist on taxing patience so heavily.

IT IS a strange and uncommon freak of statesmanship and patriotism and affection for "home industry," that one day manifests itself in continuing to exempt all mortgages from taxation, and another day concludes to continue the exemption only on mortgages held by outside capitalists. The title of the bill that passed the lower house ought to be changed so that it would read: "a bill to invite local capitalists to seek homes in some other state, but to encourage them to leave their money here."

NOT WITH any notion of its direct local applicability, but rather with a view to emphasizing a comparison, we note the fact that in the Connecticut legislature just lately a law came very near being enacted providing that any dog accustomed to growl, snap or bite should be fined $7 or be imprisoned ten days, or both, and there is a law actually on the statute books that punishes wild duck, wild geese, quail and woodcock for the crime of being killed out of season.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., Feb. 5.—George N. Henson, president of the Citizens' Bank & Trust company of this city, this afternoon shot and killed Colonel J. B. Wert, until recently a man of the highest standing in every respect in this city. Lavans Thomas, a young lawyer, who was a bystander, was struck in the arm by a shot accidentally and painfully wounded.

After the tragedy Henson coolly proceeded to the law office of Pritchard, Sizer & Bible, whom he engaged as counsel, and then telephoned to the sheriff.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5.—The bill by Senator Dubois of Idaho, to give several Western states one-fourth of the money received from them by the government for mineral lands to support schools of mines has been adversely reported by the House committee on public lands.

TANGIERS, Feb. 6.—General Campos has been received by the Sultan of Morocco, who in a public speech, declared his intention of administering exemplary punishment on the Rif. This is the first time in centuries that the sultan of Morocco has spoken in public.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6.—The Democratic members of the Senate committee on finance have decided to grant no hearings on the tariff bill. Voorhees was authorized to prepare a statement of the reasons actuating the committee. It is understood he will say that in the present condition of the business of the country, time is an essential element in the settlement of the tariff question and the committee could not allow the hearings to go on indefinitely and could not cut them off in the middle without doing an injustice to some interests.

The Republicans will probably make a vigorous protest and will likely ask to have the bill recommitted.

HERMOSILLO, Mexico, Feb. 6.—A campaign against the rebellious Yaqui Indians of northern Mexico is being organized by General Loise Torres, which, it is hoped, will be effectual in completely breaking the power of this troublesome tribe. A campaign to the death will be inaugurated. It is intended that it shall not come to a close until the Yaquis are exterminated, if that is the only way they can be subdued. If escape is attempted across the border to the United States to form a union with their cousins, the Apaches, McCook of Denver, a close friend of General Torres, will co-operate with his troops in Arizona and New Mexico in bringing the Indians to surrender.

DENVER, Feb. 6.—Mrs. Carr, wife of Harvey L. Carr, the attorney murdered at his home Sunday night by supposed burglars, was arrested this afternoon, charged with complicity in the crime. Bessie Therwood, Jim Tracy, a gambler, and Ted Doleon, friends of Mrs. Carr's, were also taken into custody.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 6.—The war department this year has reports of the militia from the adjutants-general in every state. The reports show 9,270 commissioned officers, 102,912 enlisted men in the national guard, and about 9,000,000 men in the unorganized militia.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., Feb. 6.—G. W. Schofield, the first man to make railroad and bar iron in the South, died, aged 80. He went to Atlanta in 1859 and during the war made armor for confederate vessels.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7.—Indications at the opening were that a Democratic quorum would be secured to pass the McCreary resolution condemning Minister Stevens and approving the course of Cleveland; declaring against the annexation or assumption of a protectorate over Hawaii, but Reed renewed filibustering by making the point of order that the adjournment last night did not vacate the proceedings under the call of the House to enforce attendance and that the only thing in order was the report of the sergeant-at-arms; or, if the Chair held that all proceedings terminated by the adjournment it also vacated the order revoking the leaves of absence. The Speaker overruled the point of order holding that all proceedings under the call terminated with the adjournment and that the order revoking the leaves of absence executed itself. The roll was then called on the passage of the McCreary resolution. The Republicans refrained from voting and the Democrats failed to muster a quorum, the vote being 174 to 8.

Springer made the point of order that as there were four vacant seats 177 instead of 179 should constitute a quorum. After some debate the point of order was sustained and the resolution was declared passed.

After some sharp sparring between Reed and the Speaker on points of order, it was by unanimous consent decided to have another roll call and the Speaker withdrew his former decision. When it became apparent on the second roll call that the Democrats would have a quorum, the Republicans voted against the resolution. It passed, 177 to 75.

BARBOURSVILLE, Ky., Feb. 7.—News comes from Mount Pleasant that Dr. Wm. Nolin, a prominent physician, entered a barber shop in which was John Turner, leader of the Turner side of the famous Howard-Turner feud in Harlan county. Both began shooting and Turner fell dead. Then Will Turner, uncle of John, appeared and he and Nolin worked their way into the street fighting with knives. After a desperate struggle Turner was killed. Hill Howard, leader of the Howard faction, was hanged in Missouri last month.

ROCK SPRINGS, Wyo., Feb. 7.—The Rock Springs Miner, heretofore a staunch Democratic newspaper, has made the announcement that it will hereafter espouse the cause of Republicanism.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 7.—The plan of inspecting immigrants at foreign ports before their embarkation for this country, provided in the bill of Stone of Pennsylvania, has been approved by the House committee on judiciary.

PERM, Russia, Feb. 7.—A riot occurred at the large iron works at Nishnee Taghask, in the Ural mountains, participated in by 5,000 workmen, on account of the low wages and the nihilistic propaganda. The local authorities were unable to cope with the disturbance and a large force of troops was sent to the scene.

A pitched battle ensued in which many rioters were killed and a number of soldiers shot or stoned to death. The troops were finally repulsed and forced to fortify themselves while reinforcements were sent for. When these arrived the attack was renewed and the rioters were driven off after killing many more. It is said the nihilists are urging their propaganda in many parts of the empire and the government is compelled to take energetic measures to suppress it.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7.—The treasury balance today is stated to be $117,115,325, the first time it has been above the hundred million dollar mark for several months. This is accounted for solely by the payment of subscriptions for the new 5 percent bonds. Of this increase, $28,656,294 is in gold, and $58,631,140 in currency.

NEW YORK, Feb. 7.—His imperial majesty, the czar of all the Russian colonies, Alexander III, is plaintiff in a libel case on trial today before Judge Addison Brown, in the United States district court in admiralty. The Russian sovereign claims $8000 damages against the owners of two steam tugs.

The papers in the case state that during the recent naval celebration in New York harbor the Russian man-of-war Dimitri Douski was anchored off Forty-eighth street. Alexander claims that the vessel was properly manned and officered, anchor lights were displayed and alongside the man-of-war was her steam launch, in which was one of Russia's sailor boys. He further asserts that the two tugs came down the river at midnight June 12, 1893, lashed together, and having in tow a fleet of canal boats and coal barges. According to the libel the steam launch was struck by the canal boats and capsized, the man on board being thrown into the water and the launch sunk. It is also alleged that the boom and tackle of the Dimitri Douski were badly damaged. The tugs passed on, it is alleged, without paying any attention to the accident.

RIO DE JANEIRO, Feb. 7.—The comparative quiet which has prevailed here for ten days was interrupted yesterday by an encounter between the Aquidaban and the forte, followed by an attack by the rebel fleet and batteries upon the shore defenses of the city. Later in the day another fight took place at Santa Anna and Porta da Areia. All the fighting, however, only resulted in the killing of four men and mortally wounding a fifth. The loss the rebels sustained is not known.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 8.—The navy department received a dispatch today from Colon, sent by Lieutenant Brainard of the United States steamer Kearsage, saying that the vessel was wrecked on the Ronclore reef, Feb. 1. The officers and crew were saved. The Kearsage, by the last report sailed from Hayti for Bluefield, Nicaragua, to look after the American interests in connection with the trouble between Nicaragua and Honduras. It is supposed the vessel is a total wreck. The vessel is one of the oldest in the navy and had a splendid history.

Ronclore reef is about 200 miles from Mosquito Coast of Central America, well known to mariners as a dangerous impediment to navigation surrounded by swift and dangerous tides. It is not known how Lieutenant Brainard reached Colon, but it is presumed the ship-wrecked crew may have reached Old Providence Island some 75 miles to leeward of the reef.

FRESNO, Calif., Feb. 9.—Word has been received from the mountains in Tulare county that a sheriff's posse came upon a cabin in a dense chaparral, surprising the bandit, Chris Evans, and his companion, Morell. They scoured away in their shirt-sleeves, leaving an abundance of supplies and 500 rounds of ammunition behind them.

The posse is in hot pursuit, and it is believed that they will soon be captured.

HOUSTON, Tex., Feb. 8.—Tonight at High Bridge, over White Oak Bayou, train wreckers removed the rails and fish plates on the Missouri, Kansas & Texas railway. When the passenger train came along the engine passed safely over, but the baggage and mail coaches jumped the track and rolled down the bank, followed by the smoker, which landed on top of them.

Joe Elliott, a brakeman, was sent back to flag a freight train soon due. He had not proceeded a hundred yards when a volley from ambush was fired upon him. Four bullets took effect in his body.

The crew, in the meantime, aided by the passengers, were at work extricating the men buried in the wrecked cars and feared to go to the flagman's rescue. He, however, crawled, bleeding and wounded, back to the train.

A relief train was made up here and sent to the scene. The wounded were brought in and are in the hospital. Poses are on the scene and great excitement prevails.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 8.—President Cleveland this evening signed the federal elections repeal bill and it is now a law. Representative Tucker, of Virginia, brought with him to the White House a gold pen, especially purchased for use in signing the bill. It had already been used by the Vice President and Speaker Crisp in signing the bill and after the President had used it, it became the property of Tucker. Representative Pearson, of Ohio, carried the bill from the capitol.

PARIS, Feb. 8.—The Society of Daughters of the American Republic of San Francisco recently asked the French government, through the French consul at San Francisco, for a few ounces of earth from the grave of General Lafayette, in which they intended to plant a tree of liberty. The French government has acceded to the request, and the minister of the interior, M. Reynal, today had a box filled with earth from the grave of Lafayette, in Pichus Cemetery. The box was sealed with the arms of the city of Paris and will be immediately forwarded to San Francisco.

HALIFAX, Feb. 8.—There is trouble amounting almost to mutiny on the British warship Canada, now in the West Indies. It has manifested itself since the ship was recommissioned.

The matter has been kept as quiet as possible to prevent it getting into the newspapers.

The admiral visited every ship of the squadron on Christmas day and was received on all the ships in a hearty manner by the men, with the exception of the crew of the Canada. On board that ship there were no decorations or anything to indicate the festive season. On each mess table there was a tin of water and a plate of ship's biscuit. The admiral was received in silence by the men.

December 16th the royal naval sports took place, and not one of the crew of the Canada entered any of the contests.

It is rumored the admiral has asked the admiralty to order the Canada home.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9.—The President has acted on the following applications for pardons:

S. C. Snedaker, Utah, polygamy; granted.

John O. Ostler, Utah, polygamy; granted.

S. F. Longborough, New Mexico, violation of postal laws; granted.

RIO DE JANEIRO, Feb. 8.—Peixoto gave a big reception to United States Minister Thompson and Rear-Admiral Benham today. The general belief is that the rebellion is practically at an end and that there is not likely to be any more fighting of importance, as the presidential election will now take up the attention of both parties.

BARBOURVILLE, Ky., Feb. 9.—Gillan Johnson of Bell county, a desperado, swears he will kill the man who hanged his brother-in-law Bob Marley today.

CHICAGO, Feb. 9.—Wheat made another sensational break today. For several days it has been weak and yesterday scored a new low record for May, that of option standing at 62½ at the close, after having touched 61½, the lowest figure ever recorded in the history of this trade.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9.—The naval department got word from Lieutenant Brainard this afternoon that he sailed this morning with the City of Para from Colon for the relief of the shipwrecked crew of the Kearsage. The steamship will return to Colon with all hands. The agent of the steamship informed the naval department that when they applied for the use of her she had not finished taking on cargo, and would have to return to Colon for that purpose.

The North Atlantic squadron, of which the Kearsage was the flagship, is now reduced to the Miantomah and Vesuvius. This depleted condition is due to the large force ordered to Rio and the absence of other vessels on their way to the Pacific to take part in the Bering sea patrol.

The last naval disaster suffered by the United States was the loss of the Dispatch off Asateque shoals, Va., October 10, 1891. No lives were lost that time, in fact, the United States has been remarkably free of disasters involving great loss of life, compared with other navies of the world. The Huron went to pieces off Organ inlet, N. C., in a terrible hurricane, November 18, 1870, and seventy-four lives were lost.

The most notable disaster in which the United States has been involved, was the hurricane at Samoa, in which the Trenton, Vandalia and Nipelic were wrecked and 145 lives in all lost. This includes the loss from all the vessels at Apia. The disaster occurred March 15, 1889, and three German ships also were lost. February 18, 1883, the Ashuelot went ashore on a rock off the coast of China, and eleven men were lost.

It is expected the loss of the Kearsarge will result in placing a light on Roncador bank, a result the United States naval department has earnestly sought to bring about for several years but without result, owing to the wish of this government that other nations bear a share in the expense.

RALEIGH, N. C., Feb. 9.—Near Winston in the presence of 10,000 people, Peter DeGraff was hanged for the murder of his paramour, Ellen Smith.

LONDON, Feb. 9.—A dispatch to the Standard from St. Petersburg says: The government commission appointed to investigate the alleged scandals in the convict prison at Onor, on the island of Sakhalien, has issued a report, which unfolds a terrible tale of suffering and crime. It shows that in this prison there have been many instances of merciless beating and lopping off of fingers and arms by saber strokes, while cannibalism, under the stress of famine, has been of common occurrence. Murder, followed by cannibalism, is frequent, with the sole object of ending a miserable existence.

During 1892 there was almost a continuous string of convicts carrying corpses of convicts from Onor to Rikovsky. In nearly every case the bodies were so mutilated that they presented a pitiful spectacle. The bodies were interred without the slightest inquiry as to how the wounds were inflicted. No doctor ever visited the prison, and the convicts who were unable to perform the work on account of sickness, were placed on half diet, and when it became apparent that they would be unable to perform further duty they were dispatched with a revolver by the inspector, and registered on the books as having died from disease.

The principal author of the atrocities, it is asserted, is a former convict named Shakoff, who was a favorite of the district commandant, and promoted to the position of inspector.

PARIS, Feb. 9.—The secretary of the colonial department this afternoon received a telegram from St. Louis, Senegal, stating that Colonel Bonnier and eleven other officers and 250 privates were massacred by Taureges. Another account puts the loss at sixty-seven.

The Taureges, armed with lances and knives, made the first attack upon the leading division of the French column. The attack was so desperate and well sustained that the first division was apparently cut to pieces. The news of the disaster was brought to the second portion of the column by Capt. Nugette, who, badly wounded, managed to escape.

The second division was encamped a few miles to the rear of the advance guard, which was surprised during the darkness of early morning. The officer in command of the rear guard immediately commenced a retreat upon Timbuctoo, leaving the vanguard, commanded by Bonnier, to its fate.

Unofficial reports, emanating from the war department and colonial office, say the loss in killed and captured was at least 800.

The rear guard reached Timbuctoo December 17th, carrying a number of wounded. Several men in addition to those admitted to have been killed when the vanguard was cut to pieces, are said to have been either killed or left dying along the route during the retreat to Timbuctoo.

KANSAS CITY, Feb. 11.—The great New York blizzard was almost outdone in the West today. It began snowing in this city about noon, and has continued ever since. The snow is coming down so thick that it looks like a fog. Up to 8 o'clock tonight the precipitation was fully one foot and it is still falling, accompanied by a high wind. The street car lines were compelled to abandon business at 4 o'clock.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9.—The House committee on judiciary has rejected the bill by Bell of Colorado for a constitutional amendment permitting woman suffrage.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9.—Representative George W. Houk of Ohio died suddenly this afternoon.

BERLIN, Feb. 10.—The Russo-German treaty has been signed by both countries.

CHICAGO, Feb. 10.—Charles and Ellen Smith and Richard Johnson, connected with the local office of the Montana Mining and Loan and Investment Co., were arrested, charged with selling lottery tickets. The concern was a large one, with headquarters at Butte city, Mont., and branch offices in all the leading cities of the country and hundreds of agents employed selling certificates. The scheme of the company was unique prize, or lucky numbers, in loans not gifts. A certificate sells for $1. Each is numbered. On the 20th of each month the drawing is conducted at Butte city. The prizes range from $8,000 to $10,000 loan. No security is asked when the loan is made. The borrower is given nineteen years and five months to pay. It is represented by the agent that in case the person buys a certificate each month for ten years and obtains no prize, the investment will be fully refunded in Montana mining stocks. Thousands of tickets were sold each month.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 10.—H. C. Ricker, the Chicago man who put in bids for the $50,000,000 bonds called for by Secretary Carlisle, this afternoon filed a petition in the supreme court of the district seeking mandamus to compel Carlisle to issue $50,000,000 in bonds to him according to the terms of his bid. The secretary upon receiving Ricker's proposals investigated his financial status and ignored his proposals.

HONG KONG, Feb. 10.—The steamer Hong Chow, from Samarang for Sourabaya, collided with an unknown vessel which immediately disappeared. It is supposed she sank with all on board. The British steamer Asaph sailed from Hong Kong, December 31st and may be the missing vessel. She registered 1,200 tons.

CAPETOWN, Feb. 10.—It is rumored that King Lobenguela is dead.

KANSAS CITY, Feb. 10.—The populist, J. A. Smith, arrested last night on a charge of criminal libel, was released on $1,000 bonds today. He has retained Mrs. Mary Lease to defend him.

LINCOLN, Ill., Feb. 10.—Late this evening great excitement was caused by news of an unsuccessful plot to blow up the jail of Logan county, for the purpose of liberating a notorious local criminal, under sentence of six years at Joliet prison. The parties implicated in the plot are Arthur Goodpasture, Ida Shells and Georgia Williams.

Late last night three sticks of dynamite, with fuse and caps, were purchased, with the intention of being passed into the jail by the Shells woman to Goodpasture, who repeatedly declared that he would die before he went to the penitentiary. The jail premises were visited at midnight last night, but the arrangement to pass out through the window a string to which the dynamite would be attached and hauled up, failed. A daylight investigation showed woman's tracks around the jail and a ladder ready for use. During the afternoon a young man in the company of the girls ascertained their plans and told the police.

The arrest of the girls followed. The dynamite was found at the home of one, and when the prisoners were locked up the Williams girl confessed her complicity in the plot, and added further, that another attempt would have been made tonight, and had it failed then, the Shells girl was to explode a cartridge from the outside and run the chances of being successful.

LONDON, Feb. 12.—The channel and British coast have again been swept by a heavy storm. A number of wrecks are reported, but so far no loss of life. Telegraph poles are down and communication is interrupted.

Reports hourly from west and north tell of great damage to houses, churches and factories last night. It is estimated that a dozen people were killed.

VICTORIA, Feb. 12.—Late news from Samoa is to the effect that rumors of disaffection have become rife over the proposed disarmament of the natives. As soon as the British warships left, the natives, except those in the Mamasaga district, declare they will fight rather than allow the war implements to be impounded by the treaty powers.

The consuls have warned them that no nonsense will be tolerated, but the situation is believed to be serious.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Feb. 12.—United States Minister Terrill, after taking a vigorous stand in the matter has succeeded in obtaining the release of one of the two naturalized Americans imprisoned at Iskanderum, northern Syria. The porte contended that they are Turkish subjects and announced its determination to maintain its right to keep them in prison pending the trial for high treason. Terrill replied that if they were not released in a given time he would ask the United States to send two warships to Iskanderum to compel their release.

LONDON, Feb. 11.—The Times says it is estimated the goods engaged for shipment to India the next six months have an aggregate value of £15,000,000 sterling. It is alleged that nearly the whole of this stupendous total has been contracted for on a basis of the rupee being worth 1s. 8d. India exchange has recently dropped 8 per cent below this price and the loss therefore will amount to £1,200,000.

GAVOYERE OR PALMER.

A letter has been received by Mr. James Dwyer, of this city, from a gentleman in the Isle of Jersey, making inquiries for relatives. As Mr. Dwyer is not acquainted with the persons whose names are given and therefore could not furnish the desired information, the letter was handed in to the NEWS. If any of the parties sought still live in this locality, it is hoped they will communicate with Mr. Le Feuore; or if any one has information regarding them we will give it place. About three years ago a Mr. William Palmer, from the Channel Islands, died in this city, but whether or not he is one of the persons inquired for we do not know. The letter reads as follows:

EUPATORIA COTTAGE, Brighton Road, Jersey, Jan. 6, 1894.—Dear Sir: I had an album of yours in hand today that I had not seen for over seven years, and which was given me by a Mr. Carlisle who was on a Mormon mission in Europe, and who was recommended to call on me and whom I received with a hearty welcome. He gave me some information of Salt Lake valley. That I hope I shall see some day if the Lord will spare me. But since Mr. Carlisle's departure I have not had any news from him.

Now I take the liberty to ask you a favor, and i. e., that I have a sister in Salt Lake City, her maiden name being Jane Ann Le Feuore, married to Pierre Gavoyere, a Frenchman, who emigrated to America about twenty years ago. He is a blacksmith by trade, but what he is doing at present I do not know. On the other hand, my father emigrated in 1872 to Salt Lake City, and about one month after his arrival he died, and was buried in plot H, block 10, lot 1. I do not know if a tombstone has been fixed to mark his resting-place by his second wife, for my mother died in Rennes, France.

My sister Jane is, I presume, still in Salt Lake City, but I have not heard of her since she left Europe, and I should be very pleased if I could have some news from them. If you know them, kindly communicate with her and give her my address, and I should be pleased to have some news from her and would give her plenty of news, for there have been great changes since she left Europe.

I have also my wife who has had four of her brothers, who left Germany some thirty-eight years ago. Their names are respectively William, Thomas, George and Edward Palmers. All four hail from Germany. If you should hear of any of the above name, kindly communicate to my address. I must inform you that I married their sister, Marina Ann Palmer, born on the 22nd of September, 1835, in Guernsey; issue of marriage six sons and two daughters, but four dead; four sons still alive, two in Paris and two in Jersey.

I can assure you, dear Sir, I should be only too thankful if I could trace out my sisters' address, or if any of my brothers-in-law are still alive. I have been an agent for the Prudential Assurance company of Holborn Bars, London, now fifteen years, on the 30th inst.

In conclusion, I hope I am not intruding on your valuable time, and should you at any time require any information from Jersey, I should only be too happy to be of some service to you. Wishing you the compliments of the season, I beg to remain, Yours truly, W. P. LE FEUORE.

THE FARMERS' SIDE OF IT.

MORGAN, Feb. 6, 1894.—We notice in House bill No. 80, "A bill to provide for the protection of fish and game," etc., in sections 7 and 14, an effort to revive the old and non-enforced law of requiring farmers and others to "erect and maintain fishways;" also the placing of screens or gates "across the heads of canals and ditches" wherein water is taken out of any "stream or lake in the Territory that contains fish."

The great agricultural interests of our fair Territory should not be burdened in order to protect or foster the less important fish interests. The farmer is not a fisherman. He has little inclination, less ability, and no time at all to fish. One "sport" will catch more fish in a day than ten farmers could in a week. Fishing is a business that is followed by men of leisure or idleness. The men that manipulate giant powder and other explosives, probably obtain more fish than all others. Then why put the farmer to all this expense when he has so little interest in it?

We believe that the fish interests should be protected, but not at the expense of any other industry. What the people want, let the people pay for. What individuals and corporations want, let them pay for. This bill proposes to take two thousand dollars from the public monies and pay to a fish and game commission. If the executive ability of one man is worth so much to the public in the interest of fish, the the man that put in by labor these fishways and screens ought to be of some value to them. How would it do for a farm and stock commission to be appointed in the interest of these industries, and fine all the "sports" and others that do damage by tramping up and down the streams and through the fields after fish and game.

A legislature composed of farmers would be more likely to make laws to protect farm products than fish. We say, protect the fish, but make the law just and practicable by causing the counties and Territory to pay the entire expense of such protection.

J. R. PORTER.

ANOTHER HONEST MAN VICTIMIZED.

In your Thursday's issue of the NEWS I was grieved to read that my old friend and neighbor, Dr. Jabez W. Taylor, had been found guilty by a jury in Commissioner Pratt's court, of practicing medicine without a license, or in other words, of trying to get an honest living, and thereby subjected to fine, if not imprisonment.

It seems to me an unfortunate stretch of authority for one portion of the community of a certain calling to be upheld by law, to sit as a board of critical examiners of another portion of like calling, viz. professional healers of the sick.

Doctors Taylor, Gardner, Newton, Booth and others who have been peremptorily ostracized from their profession, and thus deprived of earning a livelihood for their families, call loudly upon our present legislators to at once abolish such a law from our statute books, and allow the community the privilege of calling upon any medical man they prefer and have the most confidence in.

Members of the "old school practice of medicine" appear to predominate in the "board of medical examiners," and it is but natural that more or less prejudice should exist toward those whose mode of practice differs so widely from their own. Whether this is the case or not, most of those named above have been engaged in the healing art most of their lifetime, and are equally capable of coping with sickness in its various forms as are any of the old school practice. But they are now being persecuted, as viewed by a discerning public, and our present Legislature will confer a blessing on the whole community by the abolishment of said board, and give everyone possessed of good sound sense the privilege of practicing the healing art who chooses.

We live in an age of progression. Seventy years ago I well remember the steel and the tinder box, the first time a police force was organized, and many other things, I need not name here. But changes are continually going on, and the time is not far distant when the use of drugs (such as are usually found on the shelves of druggists) as remedial agents in the cure of disease will be entirely discarded, and the period in which they flourished will be regarded as a time when ignorance of the laws of life was most dense.

The oldest bishop in the city bore the testimony to me that twenty-seven cases of diphtheria in his ward had proved fatal, twenty-five of these died where doctors were called in, two where no doctor had been, but no death where both parents had observed the "Word of Wisdom." I therefore declare to all people of every creed, that the entire disuse of tea, coffee, tobacco, and all intoxicating drinks, will do more to preserve health than all the doctors in the world can possibly do.

GEORGE GODDARD.

SILK CULTURE IN DESERET.

The culture of silk and its manufacture into various useful and ornamental fabrics says the Millard county Blade, has been growing so slowly and quietly in Utah as to be almost unnoticed. Through the efforts of a coterie of men and women, the possibility of making the production of silk profitable has been demonstrated.

The one great requisite to the success of silk culture is a warm, dry climate, and minimum fall of dew; for where the silk worms are allowed to feed on damp leaves, they contract a kind of dysentery which speedily destroys them.

The mulberry will grow in Deseret to perfection, and as to climate, it is the finest in the world for silk worms, the fall of moisture being less here than in any other portion of the West.

It is an industry that can be engaged in by women and children. The time occupied in caring for the worms, from hatching to the cocoon, is little more than a month. The product is cash. There is not one natural obstacle in the way of making the industry a great success. The Blade believes that if the ladies of the Relief Society will but inaugurate the enterprise the men will be on hand to assist the industry along.

Let there be a few acres of land, of a sandy nature, selected at once, and berry cuttings or seed planted this coming spring, and in three or four years the industry will be fairly launched.

It is high time that the people of Deseret strike out into some of the various industries that are attracting attention in the more progressive northern towns.

A SUCCESSFUL FARMER.

RICHFIELD, Utah, Feb. 6th, 1894.

I have been a reader of the News for many years, and I am pleased to say I like the spirit of it today as well as I ever did. In reading the discourse delivered by Apostle Moses Thatcher published in a late number of the News, it caused me to think and reflect upon our situation and circumstances as a people—that it takes the resources of one of our best counties to pay the interest on our indebtedness as a people. And will it stop there? No, it will continue to grow unless we change our tactics. On that subject I would like to give you a few of my ideas and a little of my experience.

For the past forty years I have farmed extensively in Utah Territory and have raised abundant crops of grain, and the Lord has blessed me in all that pertains to material wealth. Yet I have never found it so hard to meet my obligations as it is at present. Now, I would suggest a remedy. Our agricultural implements, the way and manner we get them, and the way we use them when we have got them—that's the way the money goes, and we all know it. We buy many machines that are not the best in the market, that are not suitable for us.

Let us have the University, Agricultural College and Experimental station located on the Camp Douglas reservation. That is central for the Territory and their experiments would be valuable to us. President Cleveland has wisely recommended that all the seeds sent from the agricultural department be tested there. Why not have all our agricultural machinery and implements tested there, the faculty of the College and the board of directors of our farmers union be the judges. We can see that organization and centralization is the spirit of the times. As farmers let us be up with the spirit of the times. Sevier county is leading out in the matter.

At a recent meeting it was suggested that mass meetings be held in all the settlements of the county, to choose delegates to a county convention to be held in Richfield, to work up a sugar plant. We have sent in a petition to the Legislature. At our meeting last Saturday it was decided to have a permanent county organization, to be called the Sevier county branch of the Farmer's union. We would respectfully invite all of our sister counties to do the same. Then let each county send a delegate to a state convention and let them proceed to organize a farmer's union that will redeem us from debt and bondage. We will have no salaried officers. We will labor as we do in the missionary field, for it certainly is a mission and a great one. We will build up and sustain home industry. As farmers we have furnished the bone and muscle to make the country what it is and with the help of the Lord we can furnish the brains too. If you wish, I would like to ventilate the subject a little more and have abler minds and pens than mine take hold of it.

Respectfully,

JOHN GARDNER.

HARD ON THE STOCK.

PABOWAN, Feb. 7, 1894.—Since the middle of December last there has been a good deal of snow here, and the weather has been very cold up to the present. The poor cattle are dying fast on the range—it is reported by men riding over the range that knots of cattle at different points from ten to as high as forty head have been found lying dead. Men largely engaged in the cattle business report that the people of this section will lose at least 50 per cent of their stock this winter; the causes are, cold and mainly starvation. Iron county has been boomed as having an extensive range, and sheep herds have flocked in from many parts of the Territory until the range is entirely overstocked with sheep. So close are they compelled to range together that they often get mixed, causing unpleasant feelings now and again with the herdmen. The sheep are also dying, many herds losing largely. Two or three herds perhaps that are well located are getting along all right.

A small number of young married men and single men wound up a rabbit hunt last night with a nice, pleasant party. They killed 995 rabbits. The single men won, having killed 180 more than the married men had done. The married men say they will have another big hunt and teach these young chaps something. The young chaps are equally anxious to be put to the test.

Respectfully,

WM. C. MCGREGOR.

EMERY STAKE CONFERENCE.

The regular quarterly conference of the Emery Stake convened at Orangeville Sunday and Monday, the 4th and 5th inst.

Present on the stand Elder C. G. Larsen and most of the leading Priesthood of the Stake.

Conference was opened at 10 a.m. with singing by the Orangeville choir and prayer by Elder John Zwhalen.

President Larsen then announced that the conference would apparently be home-made, as he did not expect any of the general authorities to visit us this time. He said that since the last conference the presidency of the Stake had visited all the wards in the Stake except one, and found the Saints in a satisfactory condition. There seemed to be a silent reformation going on among the people; still a few were in transgression. The Bishops were sustained by the officers and members of their wards as they led out in good works and asked the Saints to follow. The speaker gave excellent advice on economy and encouraged the Saints to remember their tithes and offerings, admonishing the Bishops to take proper care of the same.

All the wards except one were reported by their respective Bishops, who said that in most cases meetings were better attended than formerly and a spirit of brotherly love prevailed.

Besides those already mentioned, the speakers were A. E. Wall, Don C. Woodward, J. W. Nixon, Uriah Curtis, superintendent of the Stake Sabbath schools; Wm. Taylor, president of the High Priests' quorum; Erastus Curtis, Alex. Jameson and Samuel Jewks. The leading topics spoken upon were tithes and offerings, Sabbath school and education.

The statistical report was read, showing that out of 4088 total of souls, 1349 were children. "Utah's best crop" is surely flourishing here.

General and Stake authorities were unanimously sustained.

A good spirit prevailed and the meetings were crowded both days, notwithstanding the very cold weather. Excellent singing was furnished by the Orangeville choir, for which just praise was given. The health of the people is very good.

Yours respectfully,

A. E. WALL, Stake Clerk

COLORADO'S MAGNANIMITY.

Concerning the dumping of the Colorado Utes onto Utah, the Denver Republican of yesterday has the following charitable statement to make:

Chief Ignacio of the Southern Utes made a very plain talk to Indian Commissioner Browning in regard to the agreement for the removal of his people from Colorado to Utah. He is so strongly in favor of removal that he says that the Indians who are not on the new reservation already will go there in the spring, whether the government consent or not. Of course if they were to go without the approval of the government they could be sent back; but that would cause much ill-feeling, and it might result in a conflict with the whites. There has been enough nonsense about this Southern Ute matter, and it is time that Congress were coming to its senses. The Indians want to go, and the whites wish them to depart. It would be better for both them and the white people if their reservation in this state was abandoned for the one in Utah. Some of the alleged friends of the Indians have caused too much trouble in this connection already.

ITS OWN SHARP MORAL.

RIVERTON, Salt Lake County.—Will you please insert the following in your valuable paper and at the same time give warning to the young men?

An accident happened at above-named place Sunday, February 4th, 1894. The oldest son of N. J. Christiansen, a boy of about 15, was sent on an errand by his father. Before he started off his father gave him warning not to go too fast as the road was not very safe on account of snow and ice. But somehow the boy seems to have forgotten all about the advice given, and coming back at a break-neck speed the horse struck a glassy place and the consequence was, a fall for the horse, a broken leg for the boy and a doctor's bill to the father, besides pain and sorrow to himself and the whole family.

N. J. C.

WESTERN NEWS ITEMS.

Smallpox is prevalent in Vera Cruz, Mexico.

Rico, Colo., Odd Fellows will build a hall to cost about $20,000.

Nevada's penitentiary cost the people of that state $65,000 for 1893-94.

Delta county, Colo., farmers are preparing their land for spring planting.

Meeker, Colo., flour mill has had to suspend operations for the want of grain.

Nevada is shipping some immense blocks of silicon from American flats to the San Francisco fair.

Eureka, Nev., offers $50 reward for the detection of indiscriminate dog poisoners.

Old Fort McDowell, on the Verde river Arizona, has become a frontier pleasure resort.

The Fort Morgan, Colo., irrigating canal is causing the farmers both trouble and expense.

Evans, Colo., is agitating the question of establishment of electric light and waterworks in that town.

California has paid out $187,000 in bounties for coyote scalps and still has 117,000 claims of the same kind against it.

At Ridgeway, Colo., for the first time in several years the Uncompahgre river has been frozen over for several days.

La Mesa, N.M., Mercantile company, engaged in the manufacture of brooms, has sold this year its entire product in California.

Mancos, Col., has a boom coming. The La Platas are attracting a concentrated interest of gold hunters from all over the state.

Washington county, Colo., will receive an addition of fifty families this spring through the Burlington railroad agencies.

A Jefferson county (Colo.) diaryman named Q. T. Felch, reports his cows as yielding a revenue of $93 each during the last year.

Near Hailey, Idaho, the snow on the Sawtooth mountains is five feet deep on the level and forty to fifty feet deep in the gulches.

The Pacific Coast Association of Fire Chiefs closed its convention on Friday, adjourning finally without day to meet in Los Angeles next year.

Grant county, New Mexico, cattle sales in 1893 amounted to $250,000, and did not perceptibly diminish the number of cattle in that county.

The Great Northern railroad has made a contract with Washington men for 250,000 cedar ties, to be used in Montana and North Dakota.

The Theater Comique, a notorious resort of Tacoma, Wash., has been leased by the Salvation Army and will be used for their religious services.

Florence, Colo., will not permit Chinamen to locate there. A citizens' committee calls upon them when they arrive and escorts them to the depot.

In Costilla and Conejos counties, Colorado, more grain is being held over by farmers for next year's market than has ever been known before.

An enterprising thief at Los Angeles has entered an optician's establishment and carried off something like $500 worth of gold-rimmed eyeglasses.

The Trinidad anti-gambling crusade has struck the church socials. No more lotteries, ring cakes, raffles or prize gambling will be permitted in Trinidad.

Idaho live stock men report a splendid winter. On Lost river only eight inches of snow has fallen in the valley and live stock is wintering without feeding.

Conejos and Costilla counties, Colo., export large quantities of field peas. It is a very profitable crop and is used when crushed to feed hogs, horses and cattle.

W. H. Duboise, a soldier in the Fort McKinney, Wyo., hospital corps, took poison on Wednesday evening in the room of his innamorata. Jealousy was the cause.

At Virginia City, Nev., people have to take in their thermometers at night to keep them from being frozen and burst by frost, at least an exchange declares so.

Steamboat Springs, Colo., will this year become the center of a creamery business. Grand county ranchmen are going into the dairying business on a large scale.

San Luis valley, Colo., farmers feed their wheat to hogs and realize $1.25 a hundred on it by selling the pork at $4 a hundred. They boil the wheat and mix with field peas.

In Stevensville, Ravalli county, Mont., a man has recently been convicted of stealing a car load of hogs and getting away with the proceeds before detection.

At Rico, Colo., last month the pay rolls for three silver mines amounted to a total of $89,800, and the Rico Sun wants to know what's the matter with hard times in the San Juan.

Captain Jones of the Selma Salvation Army was placed in jail at Fresno, Cal., on Wednesday evening, having defaulted in paying a fine of $75 for beating a drum on the streets of Selma.

California prospers apace. At the close of last year, it is said, the state had a population of 1,500,000, and since 1880 the assessed value of property has just doubled.

Sandy Peterson of Great Falls, Mont., has brought suit for $20,000 damages against George Hinds because the latter threw around his neck a lariat, causing him severe injuries.

The right of the Southern Pacific Railway company to collect fare for local travel within the limits of the city of Oakland, Cal., is likely to be brought to a test in the courts at last.

There have been a good many persons vaccinated in Laramie, Wyo., during the past few weeks, the result largely of the rage of smallpox and other contagious diseases in the east.

Dillon, Mont., has let its waterworks contract to a Butte firm of contractors for the sum of $46,500. Work is to begin in February, and the water is to be let into the mains before the end of June.

Near Virginia City, Nev., in Six Mile canyon, milling operations at the mines have been stopped by severe weather. The sun never shines in Six Mile canyon during the winter, says an exchange.

Lovelock, Nev., challenges the world at the Midwinter Fair. It will have on exhibit iron, lead, copper, bismuth, antimony, nickel, cobalt, borax, silver and gold, all produced at Lovelock or its vicinity.

The Gunnison State, Colo., fish hatchery is reported in fine condition. Millions of young trout in all stages, from the eggs to six inches in length, are on hand preparing for next spring distribution.

On Rock creek, Wyoming, a herd of cattle was observed from the Union Pacific trains storm bound for about thirty days. They are reported by the Laramie Boomerang as having slowly starved to death.

At Grangeville, Idaho, four girls sleeping on the floor of a cabin while two strangers occupied the girls' rooms above, have been crushed to death in their sleep by a snowslide which came upon the cabin during the night.

Fresno has come to the front once more with a "rapid transit divorce," says the San Francisco Chronicle. The decree was granted in an hour and twenty minutes after the complaint was filed.

A serious defect has been found in the Riverside (Cal.) county prohibition ordinance. Nothing is said in the law about forbidding the "barter" of liquor. It will be amended soon to remedy the blunder.

Arizona bee men in the Salt river and Gila valleys are very active this year, and the prospect for an immense crop of honey was never better before than it is this spring in the vicinity of Phoenix.

Berthoud, Colo., makes the best record on a hog feeding experiment wheat and barley chop feed. Twenty-nine young shoats and one large old hog realized G. F. and J. F. Welty $507 at $4-60 a hundred pounds.

A falling cottonwood tree, which was being cut down by some Mexicans at Phoenix, Ariz., fell upon a carriage containing Mrs. E. Ganz, two children and a servant. All were more or less injured and the carriage demolished.

Near Summerville, Colo., one night last week Charles Donath, a miner ran a race for life with a mountain lion which disputed his passage over the snow. As Donath had snow shoes and the lion had none, Donath reached town first.

A Butte, Mont., convict released from the penitentiary was arrested within twelve hours after his release, tried for forgery, committed within thirty-six hours, and was back in the penitentiary within three days of his release.

At Fruita in the lower Grand valley, Colorado, last week, a new Methodist church was dedicated. After the sermon the bishop appealed to the congregation for $700 to pay off the church debt and $710 was promptly subscribed.

The Silver State says a gentleman of Winnemucca wrote to San Francisco to secure rooms during the Midwinter Fair and was offered two bedrooms and a parlor on Van Ness avenue for $350 per month. He has concluded not to attend the fair.

Reports from Wyoming cattle ranges, received at New Castle, indicate hard times and severe losses for range cattle owners. Cold weather and deep snow are killing off the poor cattle which arrived from Texas late last fall.

Two watchmen were hired to guard a market at Hailer City, Wash. The other night they both fell asleep, and upon awakening in the morning, found that not only had the market been robbed, but that they were minus their firearms.

A. N. Towne owns 1,280 acres of land in the Weed Patch, Kern county, Cal. A large force of men has been employed during the fall and winter in preparing an elaborate system of ditches for irrigating the land. The work is now about completed.

A Gilpin county, Colo., miner is credited with the invention of a new hand drill which will drive a hole through the hardest rock five times as fast as two men can do it at double work. The drill is operated by turning a crank and is sold at $75.

J. M. Jeffreys, a well-to-do farmer residing near Palouse City, Idaho, has been found hanging to a rafter in his barn. He had been dead for some time. Financial troubles worked upon his mind and it is supposed that he hung himself while temporarily insane.

In Cheyenne, Wyo., a few days ago, the engineer of the Union Pacific yards blew the noon signal at 11 o'clock by mistake and sent some of the men home to dinner an hour too soon. His mistake caused the engineer a lay-off for two weeks.

Meeker advises are to the effect that those who have ridden over the ranges of northwestern Colorado during the past two weeks find the cattle in fine condition. The next five weeks will determine the fate of many cattle herds on the range.

Spokane, Wash., has a thief of splendid nerve. He was sentenced to prison for ten days and was made a "trusty." While in this capacity he stole from a police officer several articles of his uniform and was trying to sell them when arrested.

The Oregon Improvement company has presented a claim for $40,000 to the San Francisco board of supervisors. The claim is presented on the supposition that the supervisors will order a change of grades at the crossings of various streets.

Judge Virden, of Mono county, decided that sheep may not be watered in a creek which has been used for irrigating purposes by a rancher near Bridgeport. His decision was sustained by the supreme court. The injunction against the sheep men was made perpetual.

F. L. Leonard, a young man mining four miles east of Leland, Or., has brought in a nugget of gold covered with quicksilver. The value of the lump is about $35. It resembles a piece of amalgam, though he insists the nugget is just as he picked it out of the ledge.

Says the Evanston News-Register: Mr. E. S. Crocker has a letter from Thomas Spackman, of Farmington, Utah, asking if there is still any reward offered for the finding of William Crawford. He represents that if there is any such inducement, Crawford can soon be produced.

Cassia county, Idaho, has a curious rock quarry. The rock is unlimited in quantity and very fine grain. It comes out of the quarry nicely cut and dressed in square shafts or columns from six to twenty inches thick and about six feet long. It is ready for use without the labor of stone cutters.

Salvador Pagano, after having been twice sentenced to death at Tacoma, Wash., and spending more than two years in prison, has been set at liberty by the supreme court of the state. He has had the privilege of reading the invitation to his own execution. He will return to his home in Sicily.

At Phoenix, Ariz., C. J. Dyer has accumulated a vast store of Toltec relics and curios from prehistoric ruins. These treasures consist of metates (vessels for grinding corn,) pestles, ollas, obsidian and shell ornaments, axes of stone for war and for peaceful use, door weights, plumb bobs, flint and slate knives, etc.

Marshall pass snow sheds have been drifted full of snow in places and rotary plows from Salida have been kept busy lately keeping the Rio Grande narrow gauge open to Gunnison. North park, Colo., reports little snow on the divides between Yampa and Grand rivers. Stage and mail routes remain open all winter this season, something very unusual for that country.

E. B. Waggy, one of the syndicate interested in the San Marcial coal fields of Sonora, has recently returned to Tucson, Ariz. He states that two shafts have been sunk, one to the depth of ninety feet penetrating a six-foot stratum of pure anthracite coal, another to a depth of thirty-five feet penetrating a seven-foot stratum. The coal is of very high grade.

The Meeker, Colo., Herald has obtained reliable reports from all the region of North and Middle parks and these reports show that while the lower cattle ranges and divides between streams are uncovered by deep snow the snow in the mountains is very deep, and the water will be plentiful next season for irrigators.

Miss Johanna Albertson has been awarded $5,000 damages by a jury in a Sacramento, Cal., court against Joseph S. Calderon for breach of promise of marriage. The jury was only ten minutes deliberating upon the case when they came to an agreement. All voted in favor of the woman on the first ballot, but some of them wanted to give her $20,000, the amount she sued for.

John Barrett was killed by his team dragging him to death, a few days ago, on the southeast part of Traumer ranch in the upper end of the basin, about six miles southwest of Albion, Idaho. He lived only thirty minutes, but never spoke. His skull was fractured and was otherwise badly bruised. Deceased was upwards of 63 years old, and has two sons. One lives in Pocatello and the other in Bear Lake county.

In 1842, says the Gering Neb., News, John C. Fremont, the famous explorer, camped near the present site of the town of Fairbury, Nebraska. He forwarded dispatches from this point to Washington and among his statements are to be found these words: "It never rains in Nebraska; this is the great American desert." The eighty acre lot where he camped sold, last month, for $3,500 and is reported cheap for the money.

Judge Beatry, United States judge for Idaho, has issued an order restraining the interior department from ejecting the heirs of Colonel Craig from the Nez Perces Indian reservation. Craig settled on the reserve near Lapwai, under the Oregon donation act of 1845, and applied for patent in 1869. The Indian treaty recognizes his right to the land, but patent has never issued, and the government tried to eject him.

As the winter advances wolves are becoming very troublesome in the northern part of the state, says the Sherman (Wyo.) Enterprise. The whole country has been covered with poisoned meat, but the animals have learned to avoid it. They will not eat anything unless they kill it fresh themselves. All the northern counties have stopped paying the bounty and there is no inducement for hunters to wage war on the pestiferous beast.

W. T. Richardson, of Prescott, Arizona, who has a big cattle range in the Verde country, was in town last week, seeing to the shipment of about 700 cattle consigned to Kansas City, in charge of Frank Wallace, says the Phoenix Gazette. He shipped between 400 and 500 head last month, and expects to make large consignments through the season. He reports that prices are somewhat better and that the cattle business is picking up.

Minnie, daughter of M. Shields, living near Glendale, Nevada, was riding on horseback the other day, when her horse became unmanageable and threw the young lady into a pile of rocks. She suffered a severe fracture of the skull, the bone being broken just above the eye. Drs. Phillips and Lewis were at once summoned and performed the delicate operation of raising the fractured bone from the brain, on which it was pressing. The doctors report the case as very serious, but hope for the best.

The Sacramento (Cal.) Bee's Folsom correspondent says that Folsom bids fair to again experience the golden bustling days of '49. As an adjunct to the renewed interest excited by the many rich strikes made by our miners, the merchants have engaged four-horse freight teams for the purpose of bringing their store supplies from Sacramento, as they claim that during the present hard times freight rates have been increased to such an extent that cheaper transportation can be had by team.

A Montana man has invented a boat for navigation on the Missoula and other mountain rivers. The boat is seventeen feet long and four feet in the beam. Attached to the stern is a paddle wheel, hung from a frame which can be raised and lowered, as the boat is in deep or shallow water.

The wheel is revolved by an endless chain which passes over a crank in the center of the boat, moved by an arrangement similar to that used in propelling hand cars.

George F. Bliss slaughtered a ten-weeks-old calf that had three eyes, the third one being a little to the left of the forehead, midway between the other eyes, says the Reno (Nevada) Journal. The calf was healthy and well developed. It was half Jersey and half Holstein. Dr. Leek, veterinary surgeon, and Dr. Phillips examined the head and say the eye in the forehead was almost perfect, the optic nerve and pigment being well developed. Dr. Leek will prepare the head and keep it for inspection at his office.

Los Angeles, Cal., was the first city to adopt cremation in the state of California, and for a time the bodies of those who preferred burning to burying were sent from that city to the south for cremation. Last fall a crematory was built by the San Francisco Cremation society at Cypress Lawn cemetery, and more recently a columbarium was added. Now Oakland is to have a crematory. The Alameda County Cremation association was incorporated last month and has adopted the plans for its building, to be erected close to Mountain View cemetery.

The Oakland, Cal., city council is determined, if possible, to crush out the Chinese lottery, which has made such rapid strides during the past year. For months the police have been somewhat handicapped by the ordinances of the city because they are not far-reaching enough, and it has been a hard matter to obtain a conviction under them. This state of things will be changed in the near future, says the San Francisco Chronicle, for the reason that the council has taken hold of the question in earnest and will put through such ordinances as will make it a very hard matter to run a lottery agency in this city.

Eugene Croughwell, a harnessmaker, was arrested on Monday night for assault to commit murder at Sacramento, Cal. His victim was his daughter, Miss Annie T. Croughwell, a teacher in the Hearst Grammar school. With a large pruning-knife he slashed her across the forehead, the right cheek and right hand, inflicting three very ugly wounds. Croughwell, who does not live with his family, went to their house and was thrown out by an adult son. While the father and son were scuffling on the sidewalk the daughter went out and was cut. Her injuries are not dangerous.

Information has been received in Prescott, Arizona, that at Williams, Mrs. Joseph shot her husband through the brain and heart while he was asleep. Joseph was an Atlantic & Pacific conductor, running from Williams to Peach Springs. The trouble is said to have grown out of a visit to a saloon by Joseph, where his wife and two children followed him, and where the wife was abused and insulted by a female singer, a colored woman employed in the saloon. From accounts at hand the affair looks very much like a cold-blooded murder, says the Prescott Courier.

The state supreme court of Idaho has handed down an important decision in a case involving many prominent and wealthy citizens against certain county officials who are charged with taking fees in excess of the entitled amounts. Suit was brought to have the commissioners removed summarily for allowing the practice. Judge Nugent, of the district court, dismissed the case on the ground that the section of the statute under which it was brought is unconstitutional. The decision of the supreme court reverses that of Judge Nugent on every point, and remands the case to him for immediate action. Civil proceedings will be heard at once, and criminal proceedings will probably follow.

Laborers engaged in excavating for building purposes in San Francisco have unearthed a quantity of human bones and skulls at some depth below the street surface. The remains were carefully gathered together and removed to the morgue. Later the coroner notified the health office authorities, who will take charge of any further remains which may be found. The bones were probably the remains of pioneers that had found a last resting place in some old burying ground which existed years ago in the early days. The location of the find was in the early fifties a portion of "Happy Valley," where old-timers narrate that a sort of cemetery was located in that part of the peninsula.

For the past week, remarks the Cheyenne Sun, there has been going on a quiet little war in this city. The Continental people are firmly entrenched here, and as a matter of course do not wish to have a competitor. The Florence company decided to put in an agent here and had some oil shipped. Then the fun began. Oil has been as low as 8 cents a gallon, and today you can get all the oil you want for 10 cents a gallon. At present the two companies have agreed to hold the price at this point pending a conference looking to the fixing of the price at 15 cents. If this should be agreed upon, it would be a saving to the consumer of 5 cents a gallon, for oil has been selling, ever since the Rocky Mountain people left the market, at 20 cents.

A letter has been received in this city says the Laramie (Wyo.) Boomerang, addressed to "The Humane society." It is from Albert May of Denver, who says he is 17 years of age. Albert is looking for his three lost brothers. He says that his father was, about five years ago, a section foreman at Colorado Junction on the Union Pacific and that his mother died and the children were brought to Laramie, and finally according to the letter, were taken in charge by some organization, which he calls a humane society. No such society is known to have been in existence here at that time except it may have been an adjunct of some of the churches. He says there were three boys, Eddie, Joseph and Frank, besides himself. His father is now dead and he feels that he is alone in the world.

Mrs. Dell Hogan Herschfield, the wife of Banker Aaron Herschfield, has begun suit for $75,000 damages against her brother-in-law and sister-in-law, Louis and Mary Herschfield, at Helena, Mont. She claims that they have alienated her husband's affections and deprived her of his society, support and protection, and persuaded him to abandon the plaintiff and leave the state, in consequence of which her happiness has been destroyed and her health impaired, and she is left without the necessities of life. The case is the outcome of the unexpected and rather sensational marriage in Chicago in November of Aaron Herschfield, a banker worth nearly a million and fifty years of age, to Miss Dell Hogan, a working girl of about twenty. Herschfield soon after left the state, and is supposed to be waiting for his brother here to effect a settlement of some kind with his wife.

On Wednesday, says the Coeur d'Alene (Idaho) Miner, D. V. Beck went up on the hill back of his house and cut down a tree for fuel. After denuding the log of its branches he started to slide it down towards the house. It soon got beyond his control, however, and shot down with fearful velocity. It was headed for the house and right through the house it went, demolishing a number of articles of furniture and among other things the bed on which their year old boy was sleeping. For a few moments the agonized parents gazed upon the wreck, almost afraid to search for the little child, which they felt sure was killed and mangled. A healthy scream emanating from the mass of broken furniture mingled with snow immediately resulted in a vigorous search for the buried infant, which was not only found alive but entirely uninjured, greatly to the surprise and delight of its anxious parents.

County Surveyor George E. Metlen has escaped death by so narrow a margin, says the Dillon, Mont., Tribune, that the adventure will probably be the most memorable experience of his life. The young man was out, in company with his father, driving some stock. He threw his lariat and caught a calf. The other end of the rope was tied to the horn of his saddle and in some way, as the horse jumped, the rope took a half hitch around his arm and dragged him off the saddle. Just enough of the rope was between him and the saddle to throw him at the horse's heels, and there he dragged as the animal dashed toward the stable. It was impossible to reach him and the father expected nothing else but to see him dashed to death. But the horse rounded the corner of the big barn in such a way that the rope caught in the logs. This threw the horse and before he could rise the unconscious form of the young man was released. He regained consciousness slowly, but it was hours before there was any feeling in his arm which had stood the terrible tug when the horse was thrown. Perhaps the heavy fur coat which he wore saved his life, it certainly saved his arm from being wrenched to pieces. He remembers nothing except that he drew his pistol to try to shoot the horse when it was kicked out of his hands. It was a thrilling adventure and a most remarkable escape.

R. A. Kirker, of Cisco, recently spent the day in the University museum with Prof. Montgomery, and was greatly interested. He presented some specimens from the placer gold deposits in Salt Creek canyon, east of Nephi.

THE SCANDINAVIAN FATHERLAND.

Prepared from Special Cablegrams.

SWEDEN.

During 1893, 4,215 people emigrated to America by way of Malmo.

Ornskoldsvik is now the youngest town in Sweden.

A new Sweden borgan church will be built in Stockholm some time next summer.

Emperor William has declared his intention of visiting Sweden again next summer.

Mrs. Sofia Fahlborg, a well-known lady of Upsala, died, at the advanced age of 97 years.

Fredrick Deland, the greatest comical actor Sweden has ever produced died in Stockholm at the age of 82 years.

Minister of war, Rappe, will resign and be appointed commander-in chief of the Norrland division of the Swedish army.

King Oscar has left for Norway on a special train. A large crowd has gathered at the depot to bid his majesty good-bye.

The bears are rapidly disappearing from the province of Vermland but seem to be increasing in Dalecarlia and Norrland.

The winter is very severe in the utmost northern part of the country, and a famine is threatening the population in some districts.

The Greek newspaper the Akropolis, of Athens, published recently a very flattering article on King Oscar and Sweden. The paper styled Oscar "the most gifted and educated monarch in the world."

Members of the nobility are shocked because the name of a negress has been inregistered in the catalogue of the Swedish nobility. The nobleman Captain af Uhr married namely some time ago, a negress in Southern Africa, where he is living.

Wool is imported in increasing quantities, the country not being able to produce the amount required for its own wants. At the Merinto sheep farms still existing in Sweden, an exceedingly fine wool was produced, which for instance received several first prizes at the London exposition in 1855, and was mentioned by the jury in very complimentary terms. The import of wool has increased proportionately to the industry based on it, and amounts at present to about 4,500,000 per annum. The export is not worth mentioning.

Among the first-class temperance institutions may be mentioned the Scandinavian Sailors' Home in London under the protection of the queen of Sweden and Norway, the princess of Wales, and the crown princess of Denmark. One of the most devoted laborers in the missionary field is a Swedish woman, Mrs. Agnes Hedensstrom Welin. She began her work among Scandinavian sailors in London, in 1878, in Miss McPherson's Mission Home called "Strangers' Rest," situated near the London docks in one of the lowest parts of London.

Laws concerning useful game were published in Sweden at an early date. The first game laws were issued in 1647.

Those at present valid date from 1864, and prescribe a close time for all those animals whose exemption from extermination may be considered of weight for the nation. The most important of these animals is the elk, which is chiefly found in the wooded tracts of Central Sweden, and of late years has considerably increased in number. Stags are only found in circumscribed tracts of Southern Sweden, whereas roedeer occur as far north as Ostergothland. The wild reindeer is met with, though not to any great extent, up in the fjell districts, but is not largely hunted.

As early as 1857 the Finspong Gun foundry, "the Essen of Sweden," obtained its first charter for casting cannons, and this foundry still continues to be the foremost in the industry. With Finspong now-a-days competes Bofors-Gullspang. Both factories produce heavy guns from Martin steel, which is cast to a block afterwards hammered, bored, turned and hardened. King Gustavus II Adolphus can be said to have reformed the gun manufacture of his time, as he changed the then used metal cannons for short cast iron guns, and introduced the cartridge which was an important improvement. The first breech loading gun is generally supposed to have been constructed by Wharen-driff, a Swede, in 1840.

Albeit Sweden has no peculiar naval importance or colonial mercantile intercourse to any large degree, still the country's interest in the conditions of culture in other European countries has been so great that a very large ethnographical collection has been brought together. Thus Baron Nordenskiold brought home a valuable collection from his celebrated journey round the world by the north-east passage; in 1883 Prince Oscar Bernadotte undertook a cruise round the globe, accompanied by Dr. Hj. Stolpe, in order to collect ethnographical objects. It is principally owing to these two collections that the ethnographical division of the state museum has such scientific value. During the past five years the collection has been increased by 88,675 objects.

The native breed of horses is supposed to be of Tartar origin and to have been introduced by immigrants from the east. The small pony still to be found in Scotland may be considered a descendent of this breed. It has grown larger on the main land by plenteous feeding but at present it will hardly be found pure in any place. Proportionally to its bulk, the energy and perseverance shown by the native horse were indeed wonderful. As one of the last known representatives of this native unmixed breed of horses we may mention the "Brandklippen," famous in history, originally a country nag from Smoland. He commenced his glorious career at five years of age in the battle of Lund in 1676, where he was given to Charles XI by a Smoland trooper, the horse of the former being shot, and afterwards he was frequently used by the king. In 1700 he followed Charles XII to Lifland, and at the battle of Pultava in 1709 he is said to have saved the king's life. Later he was brought to Turkey. In Bender he was captured and afterwards redeemed. He then carried the king on his famous ride to Stralsund, was again captured but was restored in 1715, returned to Sweden, and died at Lund in 1718, 47 years of age.

NORWAY.

A moderate conservative society has been organized in Bergen.

Bishop Bugge was installed as bishop of the Christiania diocese.

Norby was visited by a heavy earthquake, which scared the inhabitants.

King Oscar has bought twenty-four pair of Norwegian snow shoes ("skis").

▲The large merchant house of Nielsen, Mathiesen & Co. of Fredrikstad, has made an assignment.

Captain Marcus Rosenkrantz, of the Norwegian army, died at Fredrikshald at the age of 83 years.

The large wholesale firm Sandbak & Co., of Christiania, has been forced to make an assignment.

The large and well-known Klingenberg exporting firm of Trondhjem has been forced to make an assignment.

Nordahl Grieg and Hans Hille, two young popular men of Bergen, were drowned while skating the other day.

Dr. P. Munch Sorgard has left for Congo, where he has been offered a very good position by the government.

The Gudbrandsdalen is the name of a new radical paper, which is being issued from Lillehammer. Editor and publisher is Mr. Johan Filseth.

The superior education of women the Norwegian government has seen to by the foundation of special female training colleges and by conferring upon women the same rights as upon men for studying at the Christiania university.

Sunday schools, amounting to many thousands, are to be found both in towns and in the country. To the Sunday schools are often attached lending libraries for the children. The poorest receive clothes, and gifts for the foreign mission are collected.

The Norwegian vice consulate in Newcastle, England, sent home sixty-five Norwegian sailors, who were rescued during the terrible storms off the coast of England a few weeks ago, when many Norwegian ships were lost. Never before have so many rescued sailors been sent home to Norway at one time.

Shooting and hunting, in the general sense of the term, are old and, of course, fully national sports in Norway. Clubs and associations for their advancement are universal. The pursuit of game is in fact the oldest of all Norwegian sports and has always flourished in the forest, on the mountain, and on the shores of lake and sea.

The preservation of game in Norway is greatly aided and encouraged by a large number of sporting clubs and similar associations spread over the whole country. There being no figures concerning proceeds of game killed it is impossible to state any decided sum, but it must represent a very large amount of money.

The Norwegian Section of the British and General Federation has not—as the great international movement itself—been started by a woman. But being essentially a woman question as it aims at the abolishing of the most cruel injustice towards the whole sex, this movement has from the beginning counted its most zealous as well as its greatest adherents amongst women.

Sport in Norway is of old descent. As is well known, the warlike, rapacious vikings were the greatest sportsmen of their day, and there are some sports and national games, which have been handed down by them, and have never died out. Modern sports on the other hand are of very young growth in Norway, though, as late years prove their youth is the youth of vigor. A large number of clubs of all conceivable characters have been established and show undoubted signs of life and strength.

DENMARK.

Rev. J. S. Jacobsen, of Bjergby and Mygdal, is dead.

Anker Heegaard, the multimillionaire of Copenhagen, is dead.

The czar and czarina will again visit Copenhagen early next summer.

A Workmen's Home will soon be built in Copenhagen.

Mrs. Carlsen, a well-known lady of Randers, celebrated her 102nd birthday.

A steamship line has been organized between Copenhagen and Manchester.

The postmaster-general N. H. H. Lund died at Copenhagen at the age of 66 years.

A new novel by Herman Bang, the Zola of Denmark, will soon be published.

Jens Peter Christensen's large farm in Noerhaa was burned down. The loss is total.

Diphtheria and scarlet fever are raging epidemically in many parishes on the island of Fyen.

King Christian is still suffering from influenza and not allowed by the court physicians to leave his rooms.

The duke and duchess of Chartres have left Denmark, after having spent several weeks in Copenhagen.

Their diamond wedding was celebrated by Erik Hansen, a well-known citizen of Roeskilde, and his wife.

The post office department has just published its annual report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1893. The number of persons employed was 4,779; numbers of letters carried within the country, 41,471,458; from foreign countries, 6,831,478; to foreign countries, 7,110,140; total, 62,413,076 letters. About $90,000,000 were sent in different forms through 744,905 letters. Number of packages, 2,500,043, valued at $17,000,000, and weighing 10,200,000 pounds. Number of postal money orders issued, 1,694,229, amounting to $11,000,000. Whole number of copies of newspapers, 59,210,562. Number of letters sent to the dead letter office, 50,982, of which 15,623 were returned to the senders.

Mr. Nelleman, the minister of Justice, coolly and deliberately expressed himself as follows before the Lower house of the Diet: "I do not know what is meant by 'public opinion'. In fact I do not believe there is such a thing as 'public opinion' any longer, that is, provided 'public opinion' is to signify certain principle on which all agree with respect to the question of rights and morals. There was a time when one could say that people agreed that one ought not to steal or kill; but I really doubt whether we can say that there is a 'public opinion' in favor of this now, or whether many circles have come to the opinion that such acts may be committed. Our body social is so torn up, so split up, that I for one really doubt whether I can confidently take it for granted that there is a 'public opinion' in the sense that there is something which is acknowledged by everybody, or with but few exceptions. Neither do I, on that account, believe very firmly in the formation of a public opinion which might become a power strong enough to coerce any one."

LETTER FROM DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, Jan. 19, 1894.

It may be interesting to some of the many readers of the NEWS to hear from this part of the Lord's vineyard, and ascertain what progress the Gospel is making. I therefore take the liberty of giving you a brief outline of the condition of the Copenhagen conference.

On my arrival to this little kingdom I was appointed to labor in this conference, and with the exception of two or three months, my labors have been confined to the Copenhagen branch.

My health has been excellent. The twenty months I have been absent from my happy home have passed like a dream, and in looking back I can hardly account for the time gone. I am sure I have profited by what I have seen and learned since I left my mountain home.

I have had the privilege of visiting the greater part of Scandinavia, and have taken great delight in seeing all that was praiseworthy and interesting.

I have found the majority of the people to be kind, polite, honest and industrious, as well as God-fearing in their way, but through the influence of priesthood have been kept in darkness concerning the will of God. However, the influence of the priests is gradually diminishing and prejudice and tradition are vanishing from the minds of the people.

Especially is this the case in the larger cities. Here in Copenhagen the people, as a rule, are very liberal-minded. Many are investigating the principles of the Gospel and attending our meetings, of which we hold from four to seven weekly. There are 325 members in this branch, the majority of them being good, faithful Latter-day Saints.

Our Sunday school is in an excellent condition. The children take great interest in it, and quite a number of strangers send their children to the school, where they can be taught of the ways of the Lord.

The members of the Relief Society association are doing a splendid work in the way of comforting and assisting the poor and needy, the widows and the fatherless, and those who may be depressed in spirit. Our choir does much to attract the attention of strangers and draw them to our place of worship, and consequently we get the principles of the Gospel before them. I have visited all the branches in this conference but one, and I find the prospects very encouraging, even though but few are embracing the Gospel. We meet with less opposition, and are being respected and looked up to, as a people, more than ever before. In this conference there are six branches, in which fourteen missionaries are laboring. Of the local Priesthood we have 40 Elders, 7 Priests, 20 Teachers and 11 Deacons; 868 members; making a total of 448 souls. At the last yearly report, ending November, 1893, there had been 40 baptized, 7 received from other conferences, 16 excommunicated, 2 removed, 2 died, and 27 emigrated. There are 192 subscribers for the Scandinavian Skjærne, and 147 members who pay their tithes and offerings. Since the yearly report a few have been added to the fold, and we expect others to see the necessity of complying with the ordinances of the Gospel in the near future.

We have had the pleasure of holding special meetings at Holbaek, Helsingor, Hilleroe and Slagelse, where large and elegant halls have been hired. The meetings were thoroughly advertised in the different newspapers and we had large attendance, and all seemed interested in the remarks that were made. Some were quite surprised to hear that our doctrines were founded on the Bible. Many tracts were distributed, and we trust that the seed sown will take root, grow and bear fruit in the Lord's own due time.

I have never been interested in any work that has given me as much joy and satisfaction as that of laboring for the promulgation of these glorious truths. I am exceedingly thankful to my heavenly Father for the many blessings I enjoy, and I am willing to sacrifice anything I possess for the furtherance of His cause.

With kind regards to all my friends, I remain, your brother in the Gospel, ADAM PETERSEN.

THE EUROPEAN MISSION.

[Millennial Star, Jan. 29.]

ARRIVALS.—The following missionaries arrived in Liverpool per Cunard steamer Servia, January 22, 1894: For Great Britain: Geo. F. Wright, of Hyrum, Cache county; Alfred Gadd, Joseph R. Price and John W. Ord, of Nephi, Juab county; Robert Blain, of Spring City, Sanpete county. For Scandinavia: Rasmus Rasmussen and Martin Olson, of Millville, Cache county; Peter C. Jensen, Bear River City, Box Elder county.

RELEASES AND APPOINTMENTS.—Elder B. M. Blackhurst has been released from his labors as traveling Elder in the Manchester conference, and has been appointed to labor in the Liverpool conference.

Elder H. M. McCune has been released from his labors as traveling Elder in the Sheffield conference, and has been appointed to labor in the Liverpool conference.

Elder Geo. F. Wright has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Leeds conference.

Elder Alfred Gadd has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Norwich conference.

Elder Robert Blain has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Newcastle conference.

Elder Joseph R. Price has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Sheffield conference.

Elder John W. Ord has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Nottingham conference.

OBITUARY NOTES.

ALBERT F. DAVIES.

The announcement in another column of the death of Albert F. Davies, is a sad blow to his relatives in this city, and to all who were acquainted with him. He was an exemplary young man, studious, affable and conscientious. In his trade, as plasterer, he had few equals. He was the son of William Davies, and nephew of our esteemed townsman J. E. Evans, and did considerable of the fine work of that class in the Temples of Logan and Salt Lake City.

ANN PEARSON.

Died at Pleasant Grove, Feb. 6, 1894, Ann Pearson, after a lingering illness. She was born in Pennsylvania, May 21st, 1826, and was the daughter of the late Bishop Foutz and his wife Margaret. The deceased gathered to Missouri with her father's family and was with them at the Haun's Mill massacre when her father was wounded and left by the mob for dead. He recovered, however, and died in the "Old Fort," Salt Lake City, in the winter of 1847. Mrs. Pearson's husband was a volunteer in the Mormon Battalion and she, in common with other women, suffered many trials incident to those being left without a protector. She leaves four sons and two daughters. She has been a widow for thirty years. Her mother survives her, being in her 94th year, still hale and healthy.—[Com.]

THOMAS EMMETT.

Ogden City, Feb. 7, 1894.—The ink is scarcely dry upon the paper on which we write the demise of one life long loved friend than we are requested to record the death of another veteran who has spent his life in the service of human redemption. We are now called upon to write the death of Elder Thomas Emmett, a man widely and well known in this Territory generally, and in Weber county in particular. If not one of the founders he certainly was one of the builders of Ogden city, and was always ready to sustain any and every enterprise which had for its object the enhancement of the material interests of his town and fellow citizens; and his exertions for their good were fully appreciated by his fellow citizens of all classes in this community.

Deceased was the son of John Emmett and Sarah Boothman. He was born at Downan, Lancashire, England, the 19th of September, 1827. In the year 1840 he was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints by Stephen Langstroff. On November 21, 1857, he was ordained a member of the Seventy-sixth quorum of Seventies, under the hands of President Joseph Young. He was also about three years since ordained a High Priest.

On February 24, 1850, he took to himself as wife, Miss Nancy Hitcher. The fruits of this union were seven sons and six daughters, of which two boys and two girls preceded him to the spirit world.

On January 1, 1851, he emigrated en route to Utah, sailing from Liverpool on the ship Ellen. On March 25, he landed at New Orleans, from which place he went to St. Louis, and on the 2nd of May moved forward to Fort Leavenworth, and after two weeks there he started for Salt Lake City, which place they reached September 19, 1854. Two weeks later they came north and settled in Ogden city. His public labors here began with helping to build the Spanish mud wall around this city—a good portion of which was assigned him, and which he faithfully performed. He also aided materially to build the Ogden canal, the Weber canal and the Hooper canal, in each of which he put considerable means. His name is also found upon the roll of the builders and openers of the Strong's canyon road, the Ogden canyon road, besides which he labored generally on other water ditches, streets and roads in this city. Few names are more favorably known than his. During the "hard winter" and succeeding year, he with his family, were common sufferers from the grasshopper wars upon the creps of the community.

When the brass band was organized he was elected captain, and he continued to promote its interest for many years, until through failing health he was compelled to retire from his position; his son Robert William is the present leader of that justly celebrated musical institution.

Thomas Emmett participated in the "Mormon war," the "move south," and all the popular moves of the people in this place. On September 11, 1882, he left home on a mission to England. He had, however, been absent scarcely a year when, through failing health, he was released and compelled to return home. Something over two years since he had an attack of paralysis from which he never fully recovered, but has gradually declined until his demise, February 1st, 1894.

ELIZABETH I. P. WILLIAMS.

OGDEN, Feb. 3, 1894.—Grandma P. Williams, one of the most venerable and venerated mothers in Israel, after a long, useful and honorable life has passed away to the spirit world, and she left a record which is worthy of the emulation of all who knew her.

Elizabeth Ivans Phillips Williams was the daughter of Robert Ivans and Sarah Taylor. Her parents were English, but after their marriage they removed to South Wales and made that principality their permanent home. They became inmates of Founon castle in the parish of Penmark, Glamorganshire. In that ancient mansion their daughter Elizabeth was born December 2, 1809. Her father was steward and her mother was lady's maid to the owners of the castle. She spent ten years of her early life in her castle-lated home. She and her parents were members of the Episcopal church in which she continued until she grew to womanhood.

On May 26th, 1833, she was married to Edward Phillips, by whom she had five daughters, four of whom survive her. She and her husband had now become members of the Baptist church, in which they continued till 1847. In the fall of that year they heard, for the first time, the Gospel preached by the Elders of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. They investigated the doctrines carefully and became convinced they were the same as those taught by Jesus Christ and His Apostles, and which, as the Elders testified, had been restored through the Prophet Joseph Smith. On Jan. 14, 1848, her husband was baptized, and on March 25th of the same year, she also. They continued to sustain the servants of God, and help to spread the Gospel in their native land until April 18, 1856, when they took passage on the ship Sanders Curling, and sailed for the United States. After a rough and stormy voyage they reached Boston, Mass., on May 23rd. On the 26th they started for Iowa city, which was the first outfitting point for the handcart companies. They rested there for a few days.

On June 18th the third company of handcarts was organized, which numbered about three hundred souls. On June 23rd the company broke camp and commenced their toilsome march across the great western plains. Sister Phillips was a true helpmeet to her husband. She assisted him to haul the handcarts containing their tent, cooking utensils, bedding, provisions and a sick and lame child. They also had in their family their nephew, Jacob Phillips. They tugged along joyfully over sandy plains, rough, rocky roads, and rushing rivers until they reached the Big mountain where her husband met with an accident and sprained his ankle. He had previously suffered from sunstroke on the Plains, which increased the labor and toil of his wife. But she did not murmur. They arrived in Salt Lake City October 2nd, 1856.

On October 7th, while en route for Brigham City, her husband, who had never recovered from the effects of the sunstroke, died at Farmington, Davis county, and was buried there. Sister Phillips was thus left a widow with four daughters—all small—and her nephew to provide for. She, however, put her trust in God, and He provided for her. She came north and settled in Ogden City. She had for a number of years practiced midwifery in her native land. She was eminent in her profession, and received her diploma while in Great Britain. After settling in Ogden she was introduced to the public in her professional character by the late Bishop C. W. West, and her reputation for ability, prudence and safety speedily became established, and thenceforward her services were sought after day and night. Her labors in that capacity never ceased until a short time previous to her demise.

On July 18, 1863, she was married to John R. Williams, and from this time she was always known as Grandma P. Williams. He was a feeble man and required much nursing and attention which he secured at the hands of his wife. He was a great sufferer, but he lingered along until August 25, 1874, when he died, and for the second time Grandma became a widow. She continued from that time to travel life's journey alone until her end came.

She died January 27th at the ripe age of 84 years. JOSEPH HALL.

THE DEAD.

Peaceful be their Rest.

MILLER.—At his residence, No. 1058 east, Fifth South, Feb. 2nd, of rupture of the heart, Eben Miller, aged 67 years, 8 months.

WILSON.—At Midway, Wasatch county, Jan. 19th, Ruth, infant daughter of James T., and Annie Wilson, born Jan. 13th, 1894. Aged 6 days.

DAVIES.—On February 8, 1894, at 8 a. m., of rheumatism and dropsy, in Samaria, Malad valley, Albert F., son of William and Amelia Davies; aged 24 years, 8 months and 21 days.

BENNETT.—At Southey, Norfolk, England, December 31st, 1893, of heart disease and consumption, Harry Ernest, son of Daniel S. and Hannah Bennett, aged 14 years, 6 months and 26 days.—Millennial Star.

LLOYD.—On February 7th, 1894, at Riverton, Salt Lake County, Utah, of cancer of the stomach, John Milton, infant son of John J. and Sadie Lloyd. Deceased was born October 4th, 1892, in Pleasant Green, Salt Lake County, Utah.

LEESON.—In Doncaster, England, January 7, 1894, at 6:10 a. m., of consumption of the bowels, Mary Leeson, aged 51 years, 6 months and 19 days. Deceased had been a patient sufferer for a long time. Her death was peaceful, and she never wavered in her testimony to the divinity of the Gospel. The interment took place at Doncaster, January 8, 1894.—Millennial Star.

MITCHELL.—On February 2, 1894, at Wilford, Fremont county, Idaho, from hemorrhage, Ellen Ann Swift Mitchell, wife of Heber D. Mitchell. Deceased was the daughter of John Dean and Elizabeth Herford Swift, and was born at Upholland, Lancashire, England, August 17, 1867; aged 26 years. She was the mother of four children, three of whom are living. She was a faithful Latter-day Saint and died in hope of a glorious resurrection.

LLOYD.—On February 1st, 1894, at Riverton, Salt Lake county, Sister Mary Elizabeth Kaezer Lloyd, wife of Gilbert Lloyd, in the 37th year of her age.

Deceased was born June 21st, 1858, in Allegheny City, Pa. She joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints with her husband November 10th, 1887, and emigrated to Salt Lake valley in March, 1890. She leaves a husband and seven children to mourn the loss of a loving wife and a kind and affectionate mother.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

Truth and Liberty.

No. 10.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, FEBRUARY 24, 1894.

VOL. XLVIII.

TALKS TO THE SISTERS.

Discourses delivered at Ogden, December 13, 1893, at a Conjoint Meeting of Relief Society and Young Ladies' Association of Weber Stake, by
PREST. WILFORD WOODRUFF.

Forenoon Session.

Brethren and sisters, good morning. God bless you. I am happy to meet so many of the Latter-day Saints upon an occasion of this kind. What I may say to you this morning will, of course, be very limited, compared to what I feel in my reflections concerning ourselves and the Church and Zion of God with which we all stand connected.

Sixty years ago this month I listened to the first sermon in this Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints that I ever heard in my life. At the close of the meeting I invited the Elders home to my house, and I read the Book of Mormon all that night, and the next morning went down with the Elders to a stream of water and was baptized.

In embracing the Gospel I had the consolation that the Lord had preserved me from my boyhood up and given me a realization of my hopes and prayers to see an Apostle of Christ, an Elder, a man of God, who could teach me the Gospel that I had read of in the Scriptures in my boyhood. In the Sabbath schools I had read of the Gospel of Christ, and reflected on the kind of religion the Savior and His Apostles taught, and what the fruits of that religion were as manifested by every Apostle and by the Savior Himself. And though a very young boy, I had a strong desire to hear some man teach the same Gospel that I read of in the New Testament. I could hear of no man who did this. Said they, "we live in the blaze of the light of Christ's Gospel," and with the next breath declared, that "we do not need those gifts and graces which characterized the ancient Gospel in those dark ages." Then, said I, give me the dark ages of the world if this religion will give me power to unlock the gates of Heaven and converse with angels, and enjoy the gifts of healing and the powers and blessings that I saw by the Scriptures were manifested in the Apostolic Church. And I prayed the Lord to allow me to live on the earth to see an Apostle and Prophet who would teach me the same Gospel. With the feelings I then had I would have gone a thousand miles to see an Apostle.

After much prayer and anxiety the Lord promised me that I should live to see a Prophet, and live to hear the Gospel, and live to embrace it and preach it to the children of men. The fulfilment of these promises is what makes me thankful when I meet, as I do this morning, with so many Latter-day Saints under such favorable circumstances.

I commenced my missionary labors soon after I was baptized; went up with the Prophet Joseph to Zion's Camp to visit our brethren in tribulation; and from that hour until this it has been my lot and privilege to stand with the Saints of God and bear my testimony to the Gospel of Christ. I traveled something over 175,000 miles, and without purse and scrip a good deal of the time, and preached the Gospel; waded swamps, swam rivers, enduring many privations and hardships. I went to Missouri holding the office of a Teacher, and held meetings with the Teachers' quorum, and was afterwards ordained a Priest, and started out on my mission.

On my late visit to Jackson County I was struck with the comparison between the past and the present. Now the Mayor of Independence, with a fine carriage comes out to meet us and give us a cordial welcome; while on my mission in 1834, to escape the violence of mobs, we took refuge in the cornfields, and appeased our hunger with the growing corn. I was struck with the marvelous change we now found in our favor. The Lord hath in His own time and way for the accomplishment of His purposes wrought this great change concerning Zion, the Prophets and the Saints in the day in which we live.

I have been through all these things in my day, and through the history of Mormonism; traveled hundreds of miles with the Prophet Joseph; been forty years with the Prophet Brigham Young, and nearly the same time with the Prophet John Taylor, and remain until today. I have seen the progress of the work of God. I have never lost any faith with regard to the final consummation of the Zion of God, the work of God. For the Lord has set his hand to the fulfilment of His divine word written in these sacred books—the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and Doctrine and Covenants. All will be fulfilled in the earth, and that too in our generation or in the generation of our children who are rising up. The great work that is being performed today is marvelous in the eyes of the inhabitants of the earth and of the Heavenly hosts. The word of God is true, and He means what He says, and there is nothing that has been written by inspired men but what will come to pass.

Now I am meeting with the sisters of the Relief Societies. Many of these sisters are aged. I want to say a few words to you in regard to your position, in regard to these various organizations.

They are all of God. Your Primary Associations are in the right direction. Our sisters go forth and take our little children, and gather them together in these Primary Associations. There they are taught of the Lord. They are taught to pray. They are taught righteous principles and purity and virtue. The minds of these little children are imbued with the principles of the Gospel, and they are taught to carry out in their day the principles that the Lord has revealed for the salvation of man.

And then come our Sunday schools. We have some seventy thousand children in the Sabbath schools. It is a joy to see the progress of the work of God upon the earth; and these institutions are glorious to me, and we feel pleasure in these labors to prepare the rising generation for the work of God upon the earth.

The Young Men's and Young Ladies' Mutual Improvement Associations are filling important missions in preparing the youth of Zion for usefulness in their future respective spheres as Elders of Israel and mothers of Israel, and to carry out the work of God.

The last mission that President Joseph Smith, the Prophet, gave to me and to my brethren the Twelve Apostles was, that we should round up our shoulders and bear off this work "or you will be damned," and he spoke the truth in the power of God. I bear my testimony of these things because they are true. The Lord has shown where His power is and where His spirit dwells. Read the signs of the times. Our Prophets who laid the foundation of this Church have sealed their testimony with their blood; and some of the Apostles have laid down their lives for the testimony of God to this generation.

President Young led us here by the power of revelation, and he remained in the flesh until he had finished his mission. He laid the foundations of the Temples here, and filled the valleys of these mountains for many miles with cities, towns and villages and dedicated the foundation of our Temple.

President John Taylor followed him, until he filled his mission. Finally the Presidency rested upon your humble servant.

I marvel that I am here. I know that the Lord has preserved my life. Two powers have been at work with me, one to kill me and the other to save my life; and the Lord has preserved me in the midst of all the difficulties that I have passed through until the present time.

I realized this until the dedication of the Salt Lake Temple; and when that work was passed through, I felt that my mission was ended. I anticipated the dedication of that Temple for fifty years; for I attended the dedication of that Temple fifty years ago in a vision, and when I got through that work, I felt that I had arrived at the end of my work in the flesh. The Lord gave me power and strength of lungs to fulfil my mission there, until we nearly got through. But one day I staid there some six hours and I heard all the speeches of the presidents of Stakes. I staid too long and that prostrated me, and I went down apparently to the gates of death. The Twelve and my family were there; and no one expected me to live. But what was the fact? There were many thousands of Latter-day Saints calling upon God to save my life; and that is the reason that I am here today. And I thank God that I am here, and that I enjoy good health, and feel much better than I did before I was sick. Now why has it been thus? I have had a mission to perform; and I feel as though I had got through that mission. But while I do live, I want to do what good I can.

Now I want to say to these societies and to these aged sisters, you, with myself, will pass from our missions, and go in our day and time behind the veil; and the children will follow us in the labors of mortality. Who is going to build up Zion when we pass away? Our young sons and daughters who are growing up here; in the midst of these societies is where instructions should be given them to prepare them and qualify them for this great work.

Here are your Relief Societies. The Prophet Joseph Smith organized them; and they have been a great help to the Church. They have had a great deal to do, and will continue to be helps to the Zion of God until Christ comes.

Now, brethren and sisters, that is about all I want to say to you this morning. May God bless you. I am glad to see you, and so many of you, on an occasion of this kind. Do not be discouraged in relation to anything pertaining to this work.

The labors of the sisters have been very heavy and onerous in many respects. They have been laying up wheat; and some men feel and say to themselves, "We have no famine." But then, I tell you, we will have famine; and the people of the earth will be visited with every affliction that the Lord has said should be poured out upon this generation. Not only famine, but sickness and storms and the flames of devouring fire, and cyclones and whirlwinds and the sea heaving itself beyond its bounds. And the world do not understand the cause of these things. The blood of the martyrs of all dispensations will be avenged upon the earth, and the messengers of God have been standing in the Temple in Heaven before the Lord crying to God saying, Let us go down and reap down the earth. These personages are messengers, and have a mission to perform on the earth. They are commanded to with hold their hands until the Saints of God are gathered in Zion, and stand in holy places; then may they go forth and perform their work.

Now, as an individual, I believe that some of these messengers have come to the earth and are fulfilling their missions, and the rest will come, until every calamity that we read of in the Revelations of St. John will be carried out, and all will be fulfilled in the earth.

And I am thankful that we have a place here in these valleys of the mountains, that God gave to the Prophet

Jacob; and we are here in fulfilment of this promise.

Let your hearts be comforted. This people never were so well off as they are now. Go to your houses, and you have plenty to eat; and you are certainly well dressed; and you are not called to pass through the sufferings and drivings that your fathers were. You ought to be thankful for all of these things.

I pray the Lord to bless us in our labors on the earth; and when we come to the resurrection, you and I and every other man and woman who behave themselves, will have the privilege to be organized with our fathers and mothers, our wives and our children in the family organization, to remain forever and forever. Which may God grant for Christ's sake. Amen.

Afternoon Session.

Now I have asked Sister Jane S. Richards a question—"what does she think I can do in addressing a congregation of this kind." If I were to talk hour after hour it would be a hard matter for me to answer my mind, and express my feelings concerning those before me. When I contemplate what has brought you to the position which you occupy today, and also what lies before you hereafter, both in this world and in the world to come, about all I can do is to look at you, shake hands with you and say a little about many things; but then these things do not answer my mind. In mortality I never expect to be able to answer my mind concerning eternal things. Perhaps I may in immortality, and begin to comprehend in eternity, things that we cannot fully understand here. Certainly, I am pleased to have the privilege of meeting with so many of my brethren and sisters, and I realize in a small measure, the position we occupy, the responsibilities we are under, and the blessings that the Lord has been pleased to bestow upon us.

When I look upon the Latter-day Saints in these mountains, I look upon men and women who are chosen out of the fourteen hundred millions of all who dwell in the flesh, to build up Zion, to preach the Gospel, to warn the world of judgments to come, to establish the Church of God, to carry out His work on the earth, while many hundreds of years have passed and gone since the days of Christ and His Apostles, without a prophet, without inspired men tabernacled in the flesh, who had power to preach the Gospel and minister in the ordinances of life and salvation to the inhabitants of the earth. These are truths that the world did not comprehend, until Joseph Smith, called of God and ordained of Him, to stand in the flesh and organize this Church and Kingdom on the earth. Since the days of the Apostles, who were put to death for the testimony of Jesus Christ, and ascended into heaven, until the days of Joseph Smith, the earth has been without the organization of the Church of Christ in its full organization.

Can you and I comprehend the whole truth of these things—that we have been chosen and raised up in these latter days to build up the Church and Kingdom of God upon the earth? That the spirits of Presidents Joseph Smith, Brigham Young, John Taylor, and others, have been kept in the spirit world for thousands of years to be born in the flesh in the last days, and stand in the flesh to establish His Church and build up the Zion of God on the earth? Nevertheless these things are true. And while we look upon a large congregation of this people, yet our numbers are small compared with the numbers of the inhabitants of earth. But the Lord has set His hand to work a marvelous work and a wonder, in the eyes of all people, as declared in these sacred books, and prepare the way for the coming of the Son of Man in power and great glory. We have been organized over sixty-three years. The Lord raised up a Prophet and organized His Church exactly as it was in the days of Christ and the Apostles, with Prophets, Apostles, Pastors, Teachers, Deacons, helps and governments, to prepare the way for the establishment of His Kingdom and the coming of Christ.

These things are all proclaimed in these sacred books by the Patriarchs and Prophets who were moved upon by the Holy Ghost, and their words are true, and we are fulfilling them today. Therefore, I say it is an impossibility for me or any man in the flesh to lay before the Latter-day Saints, the fullness of these great and glorious truths and blessings.

Over sixty-three years have passed away since God commenced to carry out the plan of salvation for the children of men upon the earth, in this dispensation. I think we do not realize the magnitude of this work. It is a hard matter for us to comprehend the responsibility that we are under to God, to the heavens, to the dead, as well as the living of our fellow men.

Now, when I look at these things, I also look at what there is before us. The organizations, which have been established in this Church from the beginning, are all helps and governments, and are associated together to carry out this great work. The eyes of the heavens are over us. The Son of God and all the Prophets and Patriarchs that have lived upon the earth are watching over this great work—this great organization preparing for the coming of the Son of Man.

Then what manner of men and women and children ought we to be in our time and generation? These things are of great importance, and of heavy weight for us to consider. I have said to our young men that if their eyes were opened to see and comprehend their work, their responsibilities and the numbers that are connected with them and looking to them, you could not get a boy to smoke a cigar, or a young man to enter a liquor saloon. But the enemy is in our midst, and seeks to lead astray the Latter-day Saints. There are no persons upon the earth that the evil spirits labor so hard with as with men bearing the Holy Priesthood—men, women and children under the covenant. These are the people whom they labor to destroy.

Even the Savior Himself was not free from contact with the powers of evil. He was tempted forty days of the devil. And when He went into the mountains to pray, Satan met Him there and urged Him to cast Himself down upon the rocks, and to make bread out of stones. The devil is working all the time to lead men from the work of God in which they are engaged.

Now, when I look at these things I rejoice in everything that tends to life and salvation. I rejoice in all the organizations that are in this Church to promote the principles of life and salvation.

I believe some of the children now born among this people will stand in the flesh when Christ comes in the clouds of heaven. The days are at hand when Christ will come; and the Lord will cut His work short in righteousness upon the earth.

We are here in these valleys of the mountains. I came here with the pioneers. I came with President Young. I brought him sick in my carriage, into the valleys of the Great Salt Lake. When we entered the valley he turned around in my carriage and sat up and looked upon the valleys westward, and he was wrapped in vision there when he saw in reality what he had before seen in vision. And he said—"Now drive down, this is the place for us to stop, I have seen this place before."

When we came here we found the Great American Desert. All the maps and charts in our schools have counted this region the greatest American Desert.

We were driven here by our enemies, and a good many felt bad that they had to leave our beautiful Nauvoo. But the hand of the Almighty was in it. He ordained this. The whole record of the Bible would not have been fulfilled, and the blessings of Jacob would not have been fulfilled without it. It was the will of God.

But thank God, there has a change come over the world and over this nation. The office of the President of this Church has been visited within the last few years by more people from all nations than ever before visited us since the organization of this Church. They have come out here, and found that there are no horns upon our heads, and see that we have been misrepresented. And there is a meaning in all this. There has a change taken place. And I rejoice in these things. Men come and talk to us, and they are interested in our position here, and they do not understand why these things are so. But certain things have been suffered to be.

Zion must arise and shine, for the glory of God must rest upon her, and this prophecy must come to pass; and here is Zion in the Rocky mountains. And the blessings given to the seed of Jacob, shall be upon the head of Joseph, and upon the heads of his posterity. We are the descendants of Joseph. Ninety-nine out of every hundred of this people are the descendants of Ephraim, that have been scattered among the nations.

Now this is our position today. We are here raised up of the Lord, and the Lord is with us, and the power of God is manifested according to our faith and patience before Him, and has been the case since the organization of this Church.

Here are aged sisters whom I used to shake hands with when they were young women in the old country, in the county of Herefordshire. How came you here? How came any of you from the nations of the earth where the Elders visited you; and many of them went out as boys to preach the Gospel, and they came there because they were sent. Many of our boys go now and they call on the people to gather; and they tell them, "we have the Gospel to preach to you. If you will receive our testimony and obey the Gospel you shall be saved. We offer you the only Gospel that was preached and practiced by the Apostles and Prophets." They offer the people these principles, and what is the result? All of you who come from abroad heard these Elders' testimony, and the Spirit of God bore record to you that it was true, and you went and were baptized, and had hands laid upon you, and you received the Holy Ghost. Now had not the Spirit of God been given to you you would have stayed at home. Utah would have been as barren today as when we first found it, unless the Lord had given His spirit to the people. Here you have this testimony and you have come from the nations to fulfill those things pertaining to the Gospel of Christ and the building up of the Church and Kingdom of God.

This is the condition today. Our numbers are but few compared to the nations of the earth. But we are not going to fail. Zion will remain here, and it will be a safe place for any person who gathers to it from the nations of the earth.

What is the matter in the earth? Do any of you read the signs of the times? Why, I was twenty years old before I heard of a murder anywhere in the vicinity where I lived. One murder was committed in the New England States. One man named Long cut his wife's throat, and the people felt as though a great calamity had come upon New England. How is it today? It takes several columns of a newspaper to tell you of the murders and suicides that are committed in the United States in one day. Who ever, in past days, heard of such cyclones, killing thousands of people! The angry waters washing whole towns into the sea! Where is there a man in the earth, who confesses or acknowledges the hand of God in these things?

We as Latter-day Saints ought to observe these things. There is a meaning to them. The Lord is visiting the earth with His judgments, and it will continue until all that you read in the Bible, the Book of Mormon and the book of Doctrine and Covenants, has its fulfillment in the earth.

These organizations here were given by the Prophets of God. We have our Relief Societies, our Young Ladies' Societies and others. These were organized for a purpose. The Sabbath Schools, Mutual Improvement Associations; all organizations of the young in the community, open the way whereby you can all exercise your rights and privileges, your gifts and graces together; and which will save our sons and daughters, our families and friends, and unite them to us in the Kingdom of God.

Now I want to say a few words concerning our Relief Societies. They were organized by the Prophet Joseph Smith, in Nauvoo, at an early day; and he took great interest in the organization of that society. And he knew by the spirit of inspiration, what result that organization would have in the Church, and he saw by the spirit of inspiration the necessity of that society. And now they are all through these mountains, in every ward. Now I want to talk a little upon this subject.

These societies are assistants to the presidents of Stakes, and to the bishops of wards; and I want to give a little counsel to the presidents of our stakes, and to the bishops. You call upon these relief societies that are in your midst, to build temples, tithing offices, and to give of their substance for one thing and another. Now I want to give a little counsel, and tell you how I feel. We as authorities of the Church should look upon them in the position they occupy as having some rights.

Now about wheat. They have been called upon a long time ago to save wheat. And if we should have a famine, we would have to call upon our wives to feed us. Now I am opposed to throwing anything in the way of our sisters in laying up wheat. As President of the Church, I have no right to go and take that wheat from them. Why? Because they have rights as well as ourselves, and we should sustain them in those rights. Now I do not know about your stake here, but there has been a feeling by the bishops in some places, that they have a right to go and take that wheat without giving any receipts for it, and that it was not necessary for these societies to lay up wheat. But it is necessary and we should sustain them in it. And while the sisters are helping us to build our temples and tithing offices, we should assist them. The sisters ought to have the right to lay up something for themselves, to build granaries and save this wheat. It is true the wheat may get weevils in it; but these things we have to prepare for and guard against; and I feel as though the sisters ought to have these rights, and have some assistance in the various wards. And go to work and help them, and have a suitable place fixed to preserve their wheat in. Now in some places, in Salt Lake City, they have done that, and the sisters have laid up considerable wheat. And there have been times there when the sisters have felt that they were willing to loan that wheat to the bishops if they could have the assurance that they could get it back when they wanted it. Well, they loaned it to Bishop Preston, with the assurance that they would get it when called for. Now, that is all right.

Now, brethren and sisters, that is how Brother Woodruff feels about relief societies. I think they have rights and we should sustain them in those rights. They have done a great deal in assisting to build up this Church; done a great deal on the Temple, and in the tithing, and in the work of feeding the poor.

Now in regard to our tithing, we have been called upon to feed the poor out of the tithing, and now fifty per cent of the tithing has been returned to the poor to feed them. We have so many calls to support the Church, that we think we should have the tithing to assist in these matters; I do not want any person to neglect the poor. Presidents of stakes and bishops, I do not want them to neglect the poor. The poor we always have with us, more or less, but not so much as in other parts of the earth. Now, I want you to remember this.

There should be some place prepared in all stakes and wards where our sisters can have a place to put their grain, as far as it can be accomplished. Not having an available elevator, this should be done. I thank the Lord for these organizations, and for all the organizations of this Church.

Now there is the Young Men's M. I. A., which is good, and much good is growing out of it. Our young men are called upon to go abroad in the ministry, and preach the Gospel to the world, and the knowledge they have acquired in these societies is invaluable to them in their labors.

As was said this morning, the Primary associations are of great importance. Our sisters have taken hold of the young children and taught them the Gospel of Christ. When grown up your children could not be converted to other religion than that of their fathers, because these principles of Christ's Gospel have been instilled into their minds when young. Therefore, the Lord is pleased for us to carry out these organizations in the Church and Kingdom of God. And I hope we will pursue a proper course in these things, that we may be justified before the Lord.

I meditate a great deal upon these matters; and I think that every man in Israel should understand we are here on a mission, and that we have been preserved for the work of the last days, to be born in the flesh, men and women to raise up a posterity, and prepare for the great work that has to be performed in the earth. Now there is a great responsibility resting upon us in the flesh. And when I look forward, I find that our mission does not end with this mortal life. When I go into the spirit world, I shall find my record there. A record of each of us is written, and in the great future you will find the history of your lives.

I have kept a record of my life, and have made a minute of what is passing around me. I never heard the Prophet Joseph Smith deliver a sermon but what I wrote it down and all his prophecies as far as I could obtain them and had an opportunity. I have many of the discourses of President Young, delivered in this country and abroad. I felt it my duty to write, and I continued to write a little every day. But we have now our ready writers to take minutes of proceedings and work, and to keep a record of the same.

I feel to rejoice before the Lord that we are here. We ought to try and improve our time as best we can. I want our young men to realize these things, and pursue a course wherein you may be justified before the Lord. The enemy seeks to draw away our young men, and others; and some of our young men have been drawn away. They leave the Church and stop praying, and go into bad habits. These things ought to be stopped as much as possible. I rejoice in my posterity, in my sons and daughters. We are calling quite a number of the young men to go to Germany and other nations of the earth, where the Gospel has to be preached. And there will be no stopping. We shall call upon the world so long as there is any door open before us.

There seems to be a change of affairs in our Territory. When I read of the passage of our State bill through the House of Congress with only five opposing votes, I acknowledge the hand of God in it. I do not know that there is on record an instance of any bill of admission of a new State into the Union, passing with less opposition than did the bill to admit Utah. I can but thank God for these things; because He intends that Zion shall arise and shine and have equal rights with other people. I believe the American government is the best and freest government upon the earth. And the men were inspired to establish it. Look at the Constitution of the United States, one of the best documents ever given to any people or any government!

I rejoice in these things. I feel to say to my brethren and sisters, may God bless you; and I want you to labor and to be faithful. And I want every sister in Zion to maintain virtue and righteousness and truth, and prepare herself to become an honorable mother in Israel. And I want our young men to practice the principles of right and righteousness.

Now we have four Temples built here in the mountains of Israel; and the Saints of God go into these Temples and redeem their dead—their fathers and mothers, and others who are in the spirit world. The world do not comprehend these principles. When I heard of this revelation concerning the redemption of the dead, from the lips of Joseph Smith, whereby we could go into the waters of baptism and be baptized for the dead, I thought it was the most glorious revelation that ever saluted my ears in the flesh. The first thing I thought of was my mother. My father was living and could be baptized for himself. I went and visited my father's family, and baptized all who were living in Connecticut, my father, step-mother, my sister and other relatives; my oldest brother was baptized when I was. My father was brought to Salt Lake City and died. I had my mother sealed to him; and she will have a part in the first resurrection; and this alone would pay me for all the labors of my life. I have had the blessing and privilege of redeeming in the Temple of our God some four thousand of my father's and my mother's kindred. I speak of this because it is one of our blessings, the fullness and glory of which we will never know until the veil is opened.

The Prophet saw the time when the Lord would raise up saviors on Mount Zion. Every man and woman upon the face of the earth who attends to these ordinances will do a great work for their father's house. We ought to realize all these things, and use an influence, so far as we can, to carry out these principles.

Now I rejoice in these principles, and I am looking forward to the result. This is not our home. We are upon a mission to this world; but, of course, we cleave to the earth, and we should do the best we can while we are here. But do not forget that we are here to labor for the salvation of the living and the dead. And when the resurrection comes, we shall come forth clothed with immortal bodies; and the persecutions, suffering, sorrow, pain and death, incident to mortality, will be done away forever.

I say to our aged sisters, labor while the day lasts, and trust in God; and then you will rejoice throughout the ages of eternity, reaping the reward that God has promised to the righteous.

You all have my prayers and faith and blessings and good will, and will have after I have gone to the other side of the veil. May God bless you. Amen.

Written for this Paper.

A GREAT CANAIGRE.

RAMAH, New Mexico.

February 12, 1894.

Will you kindly allow space in the NEWS for a communication on a comparatively new subject but one which may soon become of some importance to the industries of Utah, and one which the citizens of Ramah have become very much interested in?

The last few years have brought to light the high tannic properties of a hardy little plant grown only in America and quite abundantly in some of the territories, called canaigre root. The Mexicans have been using it, after their crude fashion, for the last hundred years. But not until recent scientific experiments, made at London and Vienna, have its high tannic properties become known to the leading tanners of Europe and America.

Prof. W. Eitner, who stands at the head of "The Vienna Research Station for Leather Industry," a practical tanner and "recognized authority in Europe in such matters," after elaborate experiments, has published an article entitled, "Canaigre, a New Tanning Process," in which appears the following statement: "I consider this article especially adapted for tanning uppers, fine saddlery, and fancy leathers." He further recommends it for "its quickness in tanning, its filling qualities and its beautiful color."

As a result of the London and Vienna experiments the tanners of Europe are now demanding the article in greater quantities than it is being supplied, though it is shipped in such quantities as will exhaust the supply, says Governor Hughes, of Arizona, in the last territorial report, in about two years.

The root may be prepared for shipment in three ways: by chopping into small bits and drying, in which condition it contains from 25 to 30 per cent of tannic acid; by extracting the acid in a liquid form, in which there is from 35 to 45 per cent; and by extracting the acid dry, which contains from 60 to 65 per cent of tanning properties. The present price in Vienna is $65 per ton for the dried root and proportionately more for the extracts.

That the plant can be cultivated in the West, where it grows so prolific in the wild state, has been fully demonstrated. The Arizona government experiment station has been making extensive experiments upon this point. The wild root has been collected from every direction and carefully cultivated in the various soils and temperatures of the territory. A recent bulletin published by the station declares, as a result of these experiments, that it can be readily cultivated and that nearly all the lands of southern Arizona are adapted to its culture. On the Rio Pecos in New Mexico a farm of 300 acres has already been planted in canaigre. It not only grows in warm southern Arizona but flourishes in the vicinity of Ramah, New Mexico, from whence this communication is sent, where it is common to see the thermometer 10 degrees below zero and occasionally as low as 15. It is a very hardy plant and is never injured by the cold winters of this elevated section, but increases from year to year, spreading into thousands and tens of thousands of acres.

It is a tuberous plant, growing from the root like the potato, and is shaped something like the parsnip, spreading out from the seed root into large bunches fastened at the top and readily removed from the ground. Like the parsnip it is brittle and tender, though possessing the economic and convenient property of preserving best in the ground where it grows. Its season of growth is from October to May, while during the hotter part of the year it lays dormant. Through its dormant period it is perfectly preserved on account of the acid it contains, and, without being cultivated, begins a vigorous growth at each recurring fall. The longer it remains in the ground the stronger the tannic properties it contains. Hence, when grown in the vicinity of a tannery it may be removed from the earth as wanted, requiring no storage and improving by time.

It may be cultivated in sandy or clay soil and on high or low ground. Indeed, take it all in all, few plants cultivated by human hands will thrive with so little care. The yield when cultivated is from 10 to 15 tons per acre, which is worth on the market when green about $10 per ton, and when dried, from $25 to $30.

It requires three tons of the green roots to make one ton of dry, and has usually been dried for shipment, both on account of the saving of freight and because when shipped green it is liable to heat and lose its tannic properties. More recently, however, resort has been made to extracting the acid for shipment. For this purpose a plant has lately been established at Deming, New Mexico.

The tannic properties of the root are greater than those of any tanning material now in use unless an exception is made of gambler, which is shipped all the way from the East Indies in limited quantities at great expense for special use. But the canaigre root is pronounced even 20 per cent stronger and better than this article and will, it is claimed, entirely supplant it.

The process of tanning with the acid of canaigre is said to be quite simple and very rapid. The root may be put into water and boiled down, when cooled, a hide immersed. If a goat skin, it will be beautifully tanned in forty-eight hours. Other hides in proportionate time. The best and most economic process, however, is more complicated than this, and, of course, needs experience.

Canaigre root is to be the tanning material of the future. It has passed far beyond the stage of experimentation, and because of its hardy character, its economic production and its powerful tanning properties, its future is guaranteed.

Will industrious Utah reach out after the canaigre root? It will doubtless grow anywhere in the Territory south of Salt Lake City. It will grow with little care in prolific quantities. There is no tanning material in the world to excel it. If the tanning industry of Utah has languished because the importation of tannin has been unprofitable, canaigre root is the saving material that will revive it. The enterprising citizens of Utah will fall short of a manifest duty if some steps are not taken to introduce the plant into the Territory as is being done elsewhere.

More money is spent annually in Utah for leather than for sugar. If the sugar factory is a profitable institution because it keeps money at home, furnishes employment and adds to the profitable products of the farmer, the introduction of canaigre will do all these in far greater proportion. It will stop the exportation of raw hides and the importation of leathers, saving the transportation on both and the profits of outside tanners. It will stimulate the manufacturing of boots and shoes and harness, and in short place the Territory upon an independent commercial footing as to all the staple articles manufactured from leather.

The people of Utah use, it is said, some 10,000,000 pounds of sugar annually, costing them more than half a million dollars. To stimulate its manufacture at home and save the out-pouring of so much commercial life blood and vitality, and looking toward the commercial independence of Utah, an intelligent Legislature offered a bounty for its manufacture. A great sugar factory was established, but it does not retain in the Territory one-third of the large sum annually spent for sugar. Yet it is a great institution, for which the outlay of half a million was in the highest sense a good one. But the hardy little root of which we are writing will do far more for Utah with far less concentration of capital than the sugar factory has done or can ever do.

The revival of the tanning industry will need no legislation for parties to contend over; no careful and scientific farming as the sugar beet requires; tanneries will not be dependent upon the uncertainties of crops and the varying moods of farmers to the extent the sugar factory is. Canaigre can be raised almost anywhere, harvested at pleasure and the tanneries of Utah will have the best tannic acid in the world at their very doors at the lowest market price. And of the $1,500,000 spent annually in the Territory for boots and shoes, the half that goes for the leather can be kept at home, and in time that vast sum may be greatly augmented by working up the leather at home, until, perhaps, Utah may be able to manufacture all her own raw hide product and walk in her own shoes the year round.

There are, as has been stated, large quantities of the root in the vicinity of Ramah, New Mexico, and it can be shipped to Utah at a moderate price. Tanners should avail themselves of the opportunity without delay, both to test its tannic properties for themselves and to introduce it into the soil of the Territory.

H. E. BAKER.
RAMAH, New Mexico,
February 8, 1894.

Written for this Paper.

FOR ORGANIZED FORESTRY.

I take the liberty of presenting to the readers of the NEWS a form of constitution for the Utah Forestry Association. The constitution was drawn up by a gentleman deeply interested in the movement, and it is hoped that it will receive the critical attention of all who are interested in the formation of a forestry association. Any suggestions or changes which may be sent to the News office will be brought before the first meeting, which, it is hoped, will be held in the latter part of the present month or early in March.

C. A. WHITING.

Constitution and By-Laws of the Utah Forestry Association:

1—The name of this organization shall be the Utah Forestry Association.

2—Its object shall be the promotion of all forestry interests of Utah. This may include the careful study of existing forest area, the effect of timber on water supply, the best means of reforesting old lands, the best means of foresting new lands, the best trees for profit, shelter and ornamentation, the relation of forests—including insects and birds—to the fruit grower, and such other subjects as may relate directly to the practical development of Utah through her timber forests, and to secure such national and state legislation as may be deemed necessary to its purpose.

3—The signing of these articles of organization and payment of all dues regularly assessed shall be the full requirements for membership. Honorary members may be elected in the manner prescribed, for the election of officers of the association.

4—Its officers shall consist of a president, vice presidents, secretary and treasurer, elected biennially, to hold office until their successors are elected and qualified.

5—The president of any local state organization of five or more members may be a vice-president of this association.

6—The affairs of the association shall be conducted by a board of managers, consisting of the afore-mentioned officers—exclusive of the vice-presidents—and four other members, elected at the same time and governed by the same rules. The board shall have the power to fill any vacancy occurring in its membership between the regular biennial meetings of the association.

7—The board of managers may appoint from its number an executive committee of three with such powers as the board shall direct.

8—Each of the officers shall perform the duties usually devolving upon such officers in similar organizations.

9—It shall be the duty of a vice-president, on motion of any member of the organization, to preside at the meetings of the association during the absence of the president.

10—If the president is absent from any board meeting the members may choose a president pro tem. The same rule shall apply to the secretary.

11—A resolution signed by a majority of the board shall be as valid as though passed at one of its meetings.

12—This constitution may be amended by a two-thirds majority of the members present at any regular meeting of the association.

13—A fee of $1 per year may be assessed against each member of the association by a two-thirds vote of the board of managers; but such assessment shall be solely to meet expense of stationery for official correspondence, and to aid in publishing such bulletins of information as the association may issue from time to time.

Laramie Boomerang: Ed. Kelly, who is in the city from the La Plata, says they have struck an immense lead in the New York. The shaft has been sunk forty-eight feet. From this they run a cross-cut thirteen feet and struck an immense body of galena. It is eight feet wide and it is estimated that it will run 75 per cent lead. The New York is owned by August Nogselsang, John Huempfer, William Burke and Dan Schalkley. They have been at work there for some time. This claim adjoins the Brooklyn, owned by the Lucky Six company.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

SPECULATIONS AS TO THE FUTURE.

Probably never before has the subject of eschatology—a theological term for the doctrine of a future state—claimed the attention of intelligent men and women more earnestly than at the present time. As the feeling becomes more and more general that the world is approaching a crisis, the interest in all that pertains to the last things becomes more intense, and greater light is sought for and obtained. When revelations on these matters were first given to Joseph the Prophet, they were accompanied by an admonition not to show "these things unto the world until it is wisdom in Me," on the same ground that Jesus at first enjoined the Twelve from proclaiming the fact that He was the Messiah. This precaution is no longer needed. The inquiry has been started and the honest in "the world" demand the truth on the subject. Philosophers and scientists are equally concerned, for it is clear enough, if there is an "unseen universe," a world whose phenomena are above and beyond the powers of perception as exercised through the five human senses, no philosophic system is complete as long as it does not recognize this all important fact.

The doctrine of "eternal" damnation has of late years been reviewed by theologians, and although many have taken a firm stand amid the burning and smoking sulphur and brimstone of orthodoxy, yet others have not hesitated to pronounce in favor of reason and revelation. The truth has gained ground all the time. This was seen when, some time ago, the question came up for discussion in the regular council of the Swedish Lutheran church. Not less than twenty votes were raised against the term "eternal." Nine more votes would have erased the doctrine from the confession of that church. Among those who protested were ex-Minister of State Gunnar Wennerberg and ex-Governor Treffenberg, the latter declaring that if he were compelled to believe that Christianity really teaches infinite torment for finite crimes, he would feel under obligation to turn away from Christ and try to get along in the light of reason alone. The mere fact that a discussion of this character could take place in so stubbornly conservative a body as the council of that Lutheran church, is sufficient evidence of the power with which the subject at present penetrates the Christian world.

Three great currents of thought concerning the future may be traced back to the early centuries of our era. One, with Augustine at the head, condemns the vast majority of mankind to everlasting perdition. They were preordained to never-ending torment, "for the glory of the Creator." Revolted as this idea is, it forms the basis for the orthodox view that still stands in the old creeds of the world, with various modifications. It denies the saving power of God. It overestimates the influence of the Evil one and it perpetuates the notion of the Greek Tartarus instead of the doctrines of Christ. Another doctrine is that all are to be restored after having been sufficiently purified. Origen is the great expounder of this view, and his reasonings come much nearer the truth. The third view looks upon immortality as a gift of God, bestowed upon man as a reward for his belief in Christ. According to this, the unbeliever has not the immortality which everlasting torment presupposes. He is simply annihilated as to his consciousness. With death his fate is settled. The advocates of this doctrine claim on their side Justin Martyr and Irenæus and also writers of such fame as Locke and Whateley.

To those who are familiar with these different attempts at solving a great problem and the insurmountable difficulties involved in each, the clear statements made by the inspired servants of God in this dispensation ought to bring conviction. The light thrown on the subject in the Doctrine and Covenants and the verbal teachings of Joseph the Prophet and his successors is, when contrasted with the speculations of the theologians, as the glorious rays of the mid-day sun compared to the dim luminations of the early dawn. These teachings comprise all that is true in each system. They harmonize with the doctrine preached by Jesus as understood by His Apostles and explained in their writings, and prove that the same divine Spirit inspired them. Only by accepting them is the veil drawn that hides the view of the future. To him that believes them, death has nothing, nor the grave any victory; for as the mercy of God endureth forever, it will follow His children beyond the grave, in the very shadows of death.

TEMPLE LOT SUIT.

The following will be of interest to many local readers, especially to Church veterans of Missouri and Illinois days. It is taken from The Saint's Herald, the organ of the "Reorganized Church," published at Lamoni, Iowa: "The Temple Lot case was opened in the United States circuit court at Kansas City, Missouri, February 7, before Judge Phillips. The judge directed counsel for complainant and respondents to file their evidence, which he would go through at his leisure. It is not likely that a decision will be reached for several months. This we glean from a lengthy statement of the suit published in the Kansas City Journal, of February 7. "The Journal article also contains these statements:—

"The main point at issue in the present legal fight is the determination as to which of the contending branches is the real church, and upon that point alone hinges the ownership of the property in question.

The whole question hinges upon which branch of the church is the genuine one. The lot is now held by the Hedrickite branch, and the Iowa, or Josephite, branch is seeking to get possession of it. The question for Judge Phillips to decide is which is the original church of the Latter-day Saints. The entire day yesterday was devoted to arguments of counsel in the case. It is not likely that a decision will be reached for several months, for there are many intricate points to be weighed and determined."

THE FIRST UTAH BOY.

When the News about ten days ago asked for information as to the name of the first white male child born in Utah after the arrival of the Pioneers, it was in error in stating that whereas Whitney's History gave the date of the birth and the name of the first child—a girl—it omitted any mention of the first boy. A correspondent has since called our attention to the mistake, and cites us to page 367, Vol. I of the History, where, in connection with a dramatic Indian experience of one of the Pioneer women, Harriet Page Wheeler Young, appears the following footnote concerning her baby: "Lorenzo Dow Young, junior, born September 20th, 1847—the first white male child born in Utah." This would seem to be an authentic statement, not only by reason of the fact that no earlier date has been given as the birth of any boy baby, but also because there is on record a poem addressed to the young pioneer by "Aunt" Eliza Snow, who hailed him in appropriate terms as Utah's young prince, and who could scarcely at that time have been mistaken in the identity of the one entitled to such distinction.

In this same connection we publish the following, not that it controverts the foregoing—s will be seen by a comparison of the dates—but because it contains an interesting item of history that may not be generally known:

TAYLORSVILLE, Salt Lake County,
February 10, 1894.

Editor Deseret News:

I see in the News a question asking who was the first son born in Utah Territory after the Mormon immigration. I have previously reported, both to Bishop Whitney and to Andrew Jenson, that William H. Harker, son of Joseph and Susannah Harker, was born September 26, 1847, in Weber canyon, at 2 o'clock in the morning.

I also built the first log cabin on the west side of Jordan river, in November, 1848. Please publish and oblige, JOSEPH HARKER.

From Brother Harker's own date it will be seen that his son was six days younger than "Uncle Lorenzo's." Furthermore, we are inclined to think the question originally referred only to the first white male child born in the Valley—that is, the final stopping place of the Pioneers and the following immigration. There may, or may not, have been boys born en route during the exodus, earlier than either of these mentioned, but the birth of such children, if there were any, would hardly be deemed as answering our correspondent's query. Again, the boundaries of Utah were immensely different in those days to what they are now; the Saints traveled many weary days after entering the Territory before they reached their destination here.

Summing up, we are accordingly able now to state that L. D. Young, jun., was the first white male child born in the Valley. The fact has not been successfully disputed.

THE WAR AGAINST ANARCHY.

One of the gravest questions of the day is the increasing boldness of anarchists. With the ferocity of wild beasts, members of that organization revel in scenes of carnage, and, as some of them at least seem to be utterly indifferent to their fate as well as that of their fellow men, the punishment of one has apparently no effect upon the others. The execution of Valliant did not deter Breton from wrecking the Terminus hotel, causing the death of two persons and wounding a large number of others. With demoniac glee he contemplates his work and defies the whole world. And wild threats are already made by reds that a fearful revenge will be taken for the death of Breton, when that wretch shall have been guillotined. The probability is that more outrages will be committed. It looks as if the existing laws were insufficient to check this crime and that new measures must be adopted.

Anarchy ought to be suppressed, however, at any cost. And it is evident that the present condition of affairs requires speedy action. The danger is that, unless the guardians of law and order find an efficient remedy against the growing evil, it will acquire such proportions as to be beyond control. Some concerted international action would seem to be called for by the emergency.

The anarchistic leaders are mostly persons with confused ideas of right and wrong. They have that little education which is said to be a dangerous thing, combined with a desire to prey upon society, which is still more dangerous. They hold society responsible for all their misfortunes, real and imaginary, and hate it. They are the real enemies of law and order. But fortunately these are comparatively few and would as such be powerless. There exists, however, a large class of people who are honest enough at heart but who, under the existing conditions, are unable to make much material progress. They toil, toil, toil and yet never come near many of the comforts of life which others seem to have thrust upon them without effort. They look upon their own lot in life as one of wretchedness. Among such the anarchist preachers find ready disciples and adherents. These look upon such doctrines as a true gospel and the advocates of it as martyrs. They are deluded and nothing more. It has been observed that few anarchist leaders have been brought to justice. It is always some wretch that is caught, who will rather die than divulge the names of accomplices, while the real plotter hid somewhere in a dark cellar, or perhaps lives as a gentleman at a fine hotel, where the police never dream of looking for a villain of that type.

In the war against anarchy these facts must be considered. Let the governments of the world and the representatives and the nations make it clear to the ranks of the toiling masses that their condition is a matter of concern to them; that they are endeavoring to ameliorate their condition and help them along; let the rulers, in brief, be in harmony with the majority of the people they represent rather than with the money gatherers—and anarchy will be no more. That will be its death blow. The soil in which it has grown will then no longer receive it. And as for those who would still be endeavoring to sow the weeds, they could easily be sent to a place where no harm could be done by them.

This is probably the only way to stamp out anarchism. History points to this lesson, that whenever the masses feel that the authorities placed over them are their true friends, they in turn will uphold the latter in their efforts to build up society on the foundations of law and order.

PREFERRED CREDITORS.

In pursuance of a long established custom, a bill has been introduced in the present Legislature to prohibit bankrupt assignors from making preferred creditors. In support of this proposed legislation is the one plea to the effect that it is unjust for some of the creditors of the assignor to be paid in full, or nearly so, while others get little or nothing. In reply, it is urged that a debtor has a natural right to choose which creditor he will favor first, this right being, from an ethical point of view, governed in its exercise by the attending circumstances. It is further insisted that a law which would prevent provision being made for preferred creditors would have the effect to precipitate assignments which, but for such a law, would be avoided. For example, a merchant who is perfectly solvent if given time to make collections or realize on assets, being pressed by his creditors applies to a banker, states his condition and secures a loan on the promise that, should the worst happen, the banker will be made a preferred creditor. If there is a law prohibiting the merchant from doing this, the banker will not accommodate him, and he is forced to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors.

An assignment hurts everybody connected with it, in most cases. It results in a sacrifice of assets which, if judiciously handled and free from pressure, would produce sufficient to pay a much heavier percentage to creditors than the latter are often compelled to accept. It ruins the assignor, impairs the credit of his neighbors who are in no way associated with him in business, disturbs the market, creates distrust, and in other ways does harm in the community. The higher statesmanship is that which will so frame the laws as to cause them to obviate, rather than precipitate, bankruptcy assignments.

In addition to the usual and staple arguments against a proposition to prevent the making of preferred creditors, there is another which can be urged at the present time, and which is perhaps stronger than them all. At a time when the relations between debtor and creditor are so strained as they are now in so many cases, it would be the height of folly to enact a law preventing the designation of preferred creditors, because such a law would hasten, if it did not actually cause, commercial catastrophes which all good citizens would deplore.

Again the News utters a protest and warning against attempts on the part of the Legislature to remodel our financial laws at such a time as this. Arguments that might be entitled to weight, and even to victory, in a time of prosperity and confidence, ought not to be deemed worthy of consideration now. The bill now pending in the Council "to regulate voluntary assignments for the benefit of creditors," ought to be radically amended, if it is to pass at all; better than this, it ought to be killed.

RECLAIMING THE WAIFS.

In most civilized countries there are institutions for providing for and reclaiming destitute and homeless children and starting them in the way of becoming respectable members of society. A report has been received from one of the organizations of this nature, "Dr. Barnardo's Homes," the principal office of which is on Stepney Causeway, London, but which has many branch homes throughout the kingdom, in which about 5,000 children receive shelter and training. These "homes" have more direct association with "the slums" than does any other charitable organization in Britain, their work being among the lowest of the lowly, where ordinarily it is anticipated that few beside natural criminals will be found.

Since their organization, Dr. Barnardo's "homes" have reclaimed and started on the road to success in honest lives, more than 25,000 of the waifs and strays of Great Britain—the children of the gutters and of homes more degraded and destitute than can be imagined by people of this part of the country who never viewed anything approaching the lamentable scenes so common to some parts of the Old World. These "homes" are sustained chiefly by voluntary contributions from philanthropic people. The policy of their management at present is to find homes in Canada for such of the children as they consider have been redeemed from their ways of crime, and judging by the report this plan is proving eminently successful.

The work of Barnardo's "homes" has been chiefly among those children of the slums for whom there was absolutely no outlook except a vicious life, only by the children being removed from their evil surroundings—the latter being the special work of the institutions. The most potent factor in placing the children in their unfortunate situation, Dr. Barnardo says—and his knowledge is gained by long and practical observation—is the use of intoxicating liquors. Ale and beer drinking contribute more than all other causes. "Through drink," he says, "we see, first the fall of parents, a descent involving the loss of character, of home, of clothing. Then ensues all disregard of respectable appearance; and on the heels of that quickly and surely follows a deeper degradation still, until the case might well appear, to even the most sympathetic human eyes, hopeless. But even such a dismal fall is not the worst. Dragged down in that perilous descent are the children who, though they have been born in respectability, find themselves involved in conditions which lead only to a degradation worse than that in which their parents are plunged. Under such circumstances crime, vice and degradation follow with the certainty of a law of nature."

In the report referred to there are given portraits of a number of children gathered from different parts of Great Britain during the past year, and placed in the "homes" for reclamation, if possible. One of these illustrations is that of a face quite familiar to those Utah people who have spent some time at 42 Islington, Liverpool, during the past three years. The little wail is Ernest McCall, a boy six or seven years of age who often came begging for food or money to "42," his home being not a great distance away. He was small for his age, his growth being stunted and his body ill-shapen. He wore no shirt, and his ragged trousers, cast off by some older boy, were held up by strips of cloth, which came over his shoulders, crossing his body both back and front, and tied to the waistband. There was also a remnant of a coat too large for him. Generally he wore an old cloth cap, and sometimes, though not always, he had an old pair of shoes. His dirt-begrimed face and body gave no indication of the remotest acquaintance with soap, and with water only during rainstorms or when the tears, forced from his eyes by hardship and suffering, would stream down his cheeks.

It is stated in the report, that this child and an older and crippled sister bid fair to be saved from degradation and become respectable. Following is the description given of their former home, and the picture is not overdrawn: "The parents had been prosecuted under a local act for sending the children out systematically to beg in the streets. When the abode in which they dwelt came to be visited, the state of things revealed was enough to awaken not merely indignation but wide-spread alarm. The father and mother, it appeared, were continually drunk. Clad in the filthiest rags and habitually using foul language, they lived on the proceeds of the children's earnings, whom they sent out daily and nightly to exploit the streets. The den that they called home was in a horrible state of filth: a hotbed of dirt and disease. There was absolutely no furniture. The father, mother, two girls (one a baby) and the brother, all slept on dirty and ragged sacking on the floor. There was no food or firing, and no means of washing. The place was encrusted with filth and infested with vermin, and the stench was intolerable. I am informed that the whole house, let out among similar tenants, was in a like condition."

The scene is not a pleasant one to contemplate, and it is hoped our fair Utah will never see its like. The experience of Dr. Barnardo is a lesson, however, to all who have the care of children devolving upon them, for his success in reclaiming little unfortunates from their awful state is strong and unmistakable evidence of the inestimable value and lasting effect of correct training upon children in their tender years.

THE MORTALITY IN GREAT CITIES.

Mr. Carter, secretary of the Maryland sanitary commission, has gathered statistics showing the mortality in a number of the largest cities on both continents, as recorded during the first half of the year 1893. According to his figures the greatest number of deaths occur in New Orleans where the death rate is 28.72 for each one thousand inhabitants. Close to this city comes Reims in France with 28.62. Minneapolis has the lowest record, only 9.60, and St. Paul 9.61 deaths for each thousand. The figures stand as follows:

	Popu- lation.	Deaths.	Number of Deaths per 1,000.
London.....	5,849,104	55,995	19.11
Paris.....	2,424,704	28,675	23.61
New York.....	1,801,739	23,356	26.47
Berlin.....	1,669,124	17,181	20.58
Chicago.....	1,458,000	13,590	18.95
Vienna.....	1,435,981	18,065	25.07
Philadelphia.....	1,115,562	12,249	21.95
Brocklyn.....	978,394	10,682	21.84
St. Louis.....	620,000	4,802	18.47
Brussels.....	488,188	4,359	17.86
Boston.....	467,897	5,618	23.88
Baltimore.....	455,427	4,806	21.10
Dublin.....	349,594	4,735	27.05
San Francisco.....	330,000	3,066	18.21
Cincinnati.....	305,000	3,000	19.67
Cleveland.....	290,000	2,585	18.19
Buffalo.....	290,000	2,361	18.28
Pittsburg.....	255,000	2,923	22.92
New Orleans.....	254,000	3,588	28.72
Edinburgh.....	267,000	2,573	19.22
Milwaukee.....	260,000	2,000	16.00
Louisville.....	197,000	1,630	14.80
Minneapolis.....	209,000	1,004	9.60
Christiania, Norway.....	158,500	1,385	17.75
St. Paul.....	155,001	745	9.61
Denver, Colo.....	150,000	871	11.61
Rochester.....	144,884	1,291	17.87
Reims, France.....	108,408	1,563	28.62

NECESSARY AMUSEMENT.

A certain amount of relaxation and amusement is required for the proper development and care of the human organism. It does not follow from this, however, that sluggishness and giddiness should be allowed to control, for if they were to do so, mental and physical deterioration would be the result. That which calls into action the best energies of the mind, and develops the physical and mental being most beneficially, is the maintenance of a proper equilibrium between flightiness and excessive solemnity, thus securing an active, steady, cheerful, temperate life. If a person be wrapped constantly in sorrow and gloom, or given persistently to frivolity and gaiety, thorough inquiry would reveal the cause to be in an abnormal complexion of the mind. An undue inclination to one side is a source of danger, either from a possible rebound to the other direction, as when a bent spring is suddenly liberated, or from a certainty of being weakened, as a straight spring gradually assumes a curved shape and becomes sluggish and unserviceable by constant bending. In the properly balanced individual the gay and the serious are so harmoniously blended that the extremes of hopelessness despair and vulgar hilarity are never reached.

In a well organized community, recreation and amusement should be provided in legitimate form, especially for the benefit of the young and inexperienced, lest these should seek therefor in improper or even ruinous channels, as has been instanced by many lamentable examples. The Latter-day Saints should give particular attention to this matter, as it is the province of true religion, which possesses the quality of discrimination between good and evil, to indicate such recreations as are healthful, enlivening and needful to refresh both mind and body. There are many people in the world whose ideas of religious propriety are such that they would not entertain a thought of witnessing a theatrical performance or even of associating in social parties such as are usual in conservative society in this part of the country. That this is restricting Christian conduct to less than its legitimate sphere is evidenced by the fact that these amusements are thereby too often formed into calamitous passage-ways for the young, instead of their being kept under proper control, and instruction being given as to how and when they can be indulged in with propriety and be productive of good.

The Latter-day Saints, however, have received judicious instruction pertaining to matters of recreation, and through the voice of revelation are left without doubt. With an understanding of this principle, agreeable and appropriate recreative and entertaining parties are provided and encouraged among the Saints. By this means any temptation to seek pleasure in outside channels is minimized, because opportunity is given for proper diversion and relaxation from the ordinary toils and austerities of life. Experience has shown that the beneficial tendency of these social gatherings is beyond question. On such occasions as those referred to the world and its jarring and darkened spirit are excluded from the presence of the Saints, who mingle together in that spirit of peace and friendship that is known only where brethren and sisters meet together in sweet and cheerful communion.

Social parties are sometimes considered unnecessary by those who have no particular inclination to participate therein. To take this view of things that are general in their character would be, to say the least, contracted. It might be admissible and proper where only the tastes and necessities of such individuals are concerned, but when anything of a public nature is considered, the interests of all involved should receive attention. In the endeavor to enhance the general good, properly conducted parties serve to bind the people in closer union because of the enjoyable influence which pervades those gatherings.

Such assemblages are appropriate at holiday times or on special occasions and with such frequency as will reasonably remove a liability of people seeking pleasure in other ways. To make them times of "joy and rejoicing, and thanksgiving to the Lord," they must be conducted with a view to the rigid exclusion of everything of an improper character, both in the way of persons and practices, and should be under the supervision of proper authority. In the program there should be no feature that is not in strict harmony with the characteristics of a Saint; the manifestations of enjoyment ought not to partake of the rude and boisterous.

It should be fully and distinctly understood that, while the Latter-day Saints are in favor of proper recreation for old and young, all amusements should be confined within the limits of moderation and good judgment. A healthy condition—physically, mentally and morally—is aimed at. When indulgence in amusements passes beyond these bounds it is religiously wrong. It is also sinful for persons to spend in pleasure-seeking means that they can ill afford to have go in that direction, or that would be better appropriated to other purposes. Suitable relaxation and diversion do not necessarily entail heavy expense; and in such times as these especially is it a virtue to apply economic rules strictly in such matters, rather than otherwise, as is too often done. There should be also careful provision against making the gratification of personal appetites paramount, that a desire for frivolity may not be imbibed to the lessening of an inclination for the solid and responsible duties of life. The general good of young, and middle-aged, and old, of both sexes and of every grade of prosperity, should be earnestly and unitedly sought for, that all may engage in life's work "with glad hearts and cheerful countenances."

DIED IN THE HARNESS.

The sad news has just been received in this city that Elder Walter Herbert Barton, a missionary of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, laboring in the Southern States, succumbed to an attack of pneumonia and died yesterday, February 18, 1894, at McComb, Mississippi.

Elder Barton was born at Kaysville, Davis county, April 15, 1869, and was the son of John and Sarah Flint Barton. He was unmarried, and started on his mission December 16, 1893, being previously ordained a Seventy. His labors have been characterized by zeal and energy, and he has been faithful in the fulfillment of the exalted calling whereunto he was chosen.

The News sympathizes deeply with his relatives in Utah and with his bereaved associates in the Southern States. But there is joy to all these in the fact that he went down in valiant battle against error and darkness, and that his name will be enrolled among those honorable ones who died in the harness and in the Master's service. Verily he will in no wise lose his reward!

The body starts home today (Monday) in charge of an Elder.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

It is claimed that the first public celebration of the birthday of George Washington occurred in 1779, the "father of his country" then being 47 years old, and that the day has been observed annually ever since. A country can do no greater honor to itself than by honoring the memory of its great and good men, and as long as excellence of character is regarded with feelings of admiration and approbation, so long will the first President of this great Republic, "first in peace, first in war," also be "first in the hearts of his countrymen."

George Washington, even when regarded only in the light of historical facts, was a most remarkable person. The majesty of his bearing inspired even his nearest surroundings with awe. His extraordinary bodily strength endowed him with powers of endurance almost incredible. The seriousness of the time of which he was the hero had pressed its stamp on his noble mind and classical features. Seldom, if ever, did he indulge in a joke, although he often appreciated a humorous remark or situation. His intellect was probably not as brilliant as that of some of his successors; he was not one of the philosophers whose thoughts soar above the visible world, struggling with the incomprehensible; but he grasped the situation immediately present and interpreted correctly its meanings and purports, and with a will of iron he conquered all difficulties. He was the right man for the great work he was called to perform.

Probably the most marvelous fact about his character and one which ought to carry a much needed lesson to succeeding ages, was the integrity of all his acts. His love for his country was patriotism indeed. He even refused to take pay for his invaluable services during the war, beyond the reimbursement of his own actual, personal expenses. From him corruption fled and hid its face in shame. His public career was as honest as it was brilliant.

It is not out of place to note that some of the men who have stamped their names in indelible characters on the pages of the history of the world have been men with but limited means of theoretical education. George Washington is one of them. Reading, writing, arithmetic, book-keeping and land surveying comprised about all his studies at school. Abraham Lincoln is another prominent illustration of that truth. And yet, who has done more for the creation and preservation of this, the greatest Republic on earth, than these two men? Great men are not made, it seems, by theoretical training. They are great, because within them dwells a personality which knows how to accomplish the mission for the performance of which they were sent to this earth.

It has sometimes been scornfully remarked that the founders of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints were unlettered men. Perhaps so. But the fact that they, in this respect, are in no less noble company than the men just mentioned, and a host of others, should silence that objection forever.

A LITTLE HISTORY.

There are a good many people in Southern California who have little or no realization of the part the Mormon people took in settling that section of the country. There are now a number of missionaries from Utah laboring in California, two of the number, Elders Lyman and Roberts, being located at San Bernardino. The Courier of that city, in its issue of Thursday last, February 15th, brings up a bit of interesting history, which it prefaces by the explanation that, "knowing that the rancho and city of San Bernardino were laid out by Lyman, Rich and Hanks, a reporter visited Mr. Lyman and interviewed him as to his previous and present visit. Mr. Lyman is a very pleasant gentleman, and says that he finds much improvement in the whole valley." The Courier then proceeds to give the following account of the interview:

Mr. Lyman, it is said that you are one of the old settlers in San Bernardino?

Yes sir, cheerily replied that gentleman. My father, Amasa Lyman, and Charles C. Rich, were the original purchasers of the San Bernardino ranch in the summer of 1851.

How did they come to purchase the ranch, Mr. Lyman?

My father and Mr. Rich, both members of the quorum of the Twelve Apostles in the Mormon Church, were appointed by President Brigham Young to come into Southern California and establish an outfitting post where the Mormons en route from Australia, other countries in the Pacific and California could have a place where they might make the necessary preparations for the journey across the mountains and deserts to Salt Lake City. They had discretionary powers as to where they should establish the aforesaid post, and they selected this location, thinking that the journey from this point could be made in the winter season as well as in the summer, and thus be of greater advantage to the traveling Mormons than from a point where travel could only go on during the summer season.

Was it your father, Mr. Lyman, who laid out the city of San Bernardino?

Yes, sir; it was done under his direction, and I think at that time the city plot was one mile square. My father's residence stood on what is now called C street, between Third and Fourth streets; but the old homestead was burned down in January, 1865.

Do you find any old landmarks, Mr. Lyman?

Not very many. I can locate most of the lots where our neighbors lived and find a few of the old houses standing, but not many. Most of the old houses are gone and new ones have taken their places. While one cannot help regretting to see the old landmarks he knew in boyhood removed, he cannot help but admire the energy which in a single generation erects splendid cities on ranches where one herded cattle in boyhood—a wonderful age, this, for push and progress. When our company from Utah arrived here in 1851 it numbered about 100 families, and there was nothing on the present site of San Bernardino but a few tumble-down Mexican houses, which our people fitted up and surrounded with a stockade for protection against the Indians. Afterward crops were planted, roads opened into the mountains, sawmills established and the work of redeeming the country commenced in earnest.

What was the original price paid for the San Bernardino ranch?

Our people agreed to pay $77,500, paying about $5,000 down; we were given time on the balance at 1 per cent per month—rather a high rate of interest to pay.

How did your people come to leave these parts?

Well, you see, through misrepresentations on the part of the United States officials at Salt Lake the administration at Washington was made to believe that the Mormon people in Utah were in rebellion against the government, and under the leadership of Albert Sidney Johnston an army was sent out to quell a rebellion that had no existence save in the fevered imaginations of those who misrepresented the Mormon people. It was reported among other things not only that the Mormon people were in rebellion against the United States officials, but that they had burned the court records, etc. Of course the untruth of all these reports was found out upon investigation, but the government had before instituting that investigation unwisely started an army for Utah. Mr. Ebenezer Hanks, who came into San Bernardino before "the war," and became an equal partner with my father and Elder Rich in their purchase of the ranch, was left as an agent to wind up the company's affairs. He disposed of the unsold parts of the original purchase for enough to settle the claims against the company, and himself joined his people in Utah. A few Mormon families remained and afterwards others that were attached to the San Bernardino country returned and made their homes here, but the Church never attempted afterwards to colonize in this country.

What is the present purpose of your visit, Mr. Lyman?

I have two purposes. One is to complete a wedding tour, which I began from here thirty-six years ago. I married in San Bernardino about the time of "the move" from this place, and have brought my wife back with me to where we began life together to look over the old ground and to renew old acquaintances. The second and more serious purpose of my visit is to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ as a Mormon Elder understands it. Myself and Elder Roberts, who is with me, have engaged the Reorganized church's chapel and will give a course of lectures there, the first of which was delivered last night.

By the way, Mr. Lyman, we thought out here that Mormonism was about dead?

Mormonism is a pretty lively corpse, (said the Elder, apparently amused at the suggestion of his Church being dead.) No, sir; Mormonism is not dead, but is actively pushing its work in all the world. It has a message to deliver to mankind, viz: "That a new dispensation of the Gospel has been committed to man, and cries repentance to all the world."

How about polygamy in Utah, Mr. Lyman?

Polygamy in Utah has been abolished by enactment of Congress. The Mormon people accepted that doctrine as a revelation from God and in all good faith and honor sought to practice it. It was part of their religion and they believed that under the guarantee in the Constitution of the United States of freedom in belief and practice of religions they had a right to live in harmony with what to them was in accordance with the word of God. When the government enacted laws against their marriage system they contested under the law, and in no other way, the constitutionality of the law until every phase of the question was tried. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States going against our contention in the case, and our religion requiring us to be subject to governments, to honor and sustain the law, the President of the Church, acting as we believe under the inspiration of Almighty God, proclaimed the discontinuance of plural marriage, the proclamation being sustained by the Church in solemn conference assembled.

But what of polygamous wives, Mr. Lyman?

They are the subjects of the care and protection of their husbands, the courts of Utah holding that while they cannot live with them as their wives, it is their right and their duty to be in care for the children and provide for their wives and this the Mormon men are doing. Meantime the Mormon people and Utah affairs are becoming better known throughout the country and much of the old time prejudice, which was the result of ignorance, is rapidly dying out.

The course of lectures the Elder announces is as follows, beginning with the second in the course tonight:

1. The Gospel of Jesus Christ.
2. The Gifts, Powers and Blessings of the Gospel.
3. Divine Authority and its Necessity in Effectually Administering the Ordinances of the Gospel.
4. The History of the Gospel and of the Church of Christ—the Apostasy.
5. The Restoration of the Gospel—the Visions and Revelations to Joseph Smith.
6. The Book of Mormon—Its Divine Authority.
7. History and Present Status of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.
8. Mormonism.

In this same connection the following from the San Francisco Chronicle will be of interest:

SAN BERNARDINO, February 16.—Elder Roberts, of the Mormon Church, has challenged Rev. Martin, of the Christian church, to engage in a debate on the respective merits of the creeds of the two churches. It is said that Martin will decline.

AN EXCELLENT JOB.

It is a long while since anything more hopeful for American politics has happened than the conviction and sentence two days ago of Boss McKane, the New York election bully, to a good stiff term in Sing Sing prison. That there may be no delay in getting him behind the bars, and no pardon for him when he is once there, ought to be the earnest hope of every right-minded American citizen.

The country badly needs a few examples of just this kind, for partisan scoundrels of various political creeds and in many parts of the land have brought our election methods into disrepute and dragged the highest and noblest of our institutions into the mire. It is time that Tammany thuggism received a sharp lesson from the swift indignation of an outraged people. It is time that fraud, bribery, intimidation and election rascality of every kind, whether Republican or Democratic, be pilloried and punished. The continuance of such crimes as have marked past elections in some cities and states of the Union, north and south, could not but be a dreadful menace to the perpetuation of a free government. But let the warning go forth that infamous bossism and defiance of law in Chicago or San Francisco or anywhere else under the starry flag will receive the same sort of treatment that has just been extended to this bombastic autocrat of Coney Island, and a healthier spirit will flow through our body politic, and honest men will not regard with such dismay each recurring election day.

The New York prosecutor and jury and judge have done well—they have earned a nation's thanks. Now let the law take its further course—see the malefactor safely and swiftly to his cell, there to remain till his punishment and humiliation have made a better man of him! If there are at large any further specimens of the same scum, serve them with the same medicine! Scour the political platter clean! The proceeding will evoke the applause of every voter who himself is not already "fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils!"

CANAIGRE.

It is quite probable that the interesting communication from New Mexico, published by the News a few days ago, on the tanning qualities of the canaigre root and the ease with which it may be cultivated in portions of the Rocky Mountain region, will awaken considerable further interest in the question of its introduction and use here. As to the usefulness of the wild plant, that has been fully demonstrated in the Old World, where for some classes of leather manufacture it has succeeded all other materials where it is obtainable. The principal difficulty is that it cannot be guaranteed in sufficient quantities, because heretofore it has been gathered from where it grew in the wild state, and only recently its cultivation has been proceeded with to supply the market.

It would be unwise to suppose that canaigre root can be applied in the tanning process without a considerable outlay of money. The methods for small experiments would give anything but satisfactory financial results. The machinery and apparatus for its economic use are costly, and a large regular output of leather is essential to commercial success. In the present development of utilizing canaigre root only the finer and lighter qualities of leather are tanned. The old process has not been superseded for heavy leathers. Perhaps it would be in a tannery which could be assured of the full supply necessary for the work.

The cultivation of canaigre root in Utah needs to be thoroughly tested before being entered upon on a large scale. The prospects for its being a valuable acquisition to the industries of the Territory are such as to justify a reasonable outlay to ascertain what can be done. There are some portions of the Territory which no doubt would be highly suited to the growth of canaigre, as in some of the mountain valleys it grows wild, but in limited quantities. Yet there are some sections where its cultivation would be likely to prove a failure, because of the quality of the soil. The basic mineral which exists in some soils is such as to preclude any possibility of the root gathering tannic acid; the plant might flourish, but its transfer from hill to valley, or from one soil to another, or the application of current methods of cultivation, might neutralize its ordinary product or so modify its nature as to entirely change its adaptability. This has been a common experience with wild plants. The determination of these matters must be left to actual experiment. As the belief that the sugar beet could be grown successfully in Utah was confirmed by actual tests, so the idea that canaigre with its highly tannic qualities can be profitably cultivated in this Territory should be conclusively demonstrated by experiments in different parts of the country. Will some of the friends and advocates of the root kindly furnish the public through the News some details of the propagation and cultivation of the plant, and how it can be procured? When this is done we can look for public spirited farmers in various parts of the Territory who are willing to make the required tests of growth and to forward the root for chemical analysis. There has been some talk on the subject, all of which was necessary, and much more may be; let us also get down to work, that we may have some practical knowledge of what can be done in the way of tanning with the plant in Utah.

BISMARCK'S FALL.

Another link in the chain of reconciliation between the German emperor and ex-chancellor, says a dispatch from Friedrichsruhe, has been forged amid the almost frantic cheers of an enthusiastic crowd. Yesterday, February 19, the kaiser paid Prince Bismarck a visit and was received with the greatest loyalty and cordiality, and it became apparent once more that the rays of the imperial sun were much enjoyed by the aged statesman, who has so long languished in the chilling shades of displeasure, at the very close of a stormy life.

The circumstances that led to the fall of Bismarck may be traced back to his contest, over twenty years ago, with Count Armin, one of the most influential diplomats at that time and the special protege of Empress Augusta. Bismarck was then in the zenith of his glory and, suspecting Armin of plotting against him, resolved to overthrow him. The count, who was the German ambassador to France, was accused of having stolen certain official documents and published their contents, and also of having delayed the negotiations with the French government for the payment of the last instalment of the war indemnity. It was generally considered, however, that his greatest offense was his independence of and opposition to the chancellor.

Bismarck's persistent efforts resulted finally in the old emperor giving his consent to the arrest of the count, which speedily followed. He was placed on the bench of the accused in a common criminal court and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment. He fled to Austria, where his continued intrigues against Bismarck brought him another sentence by a German court to five years' penal servitude; but as he remained outside the boundaries of Germany, the sentence was never enforced. He died in exile.

But Count Armin had many friends. They formed a combination for the evident purpose of overthrowing Bismarck. The empress secretly encouraged the movement and the Catholics, socialists and Poles combined on that issue, each for reasons of their own. A special organ, Die Reichsglocke, was started for the purpose of slandering the chancellor and other party organs joined in, being subsidized by his powerful antagonists. As long as the old emperor lived, however, Bismarck's position was impregnable. Once he left Berlin and remained away for ten months, but he was recalled and found himself again in a position to shape the fate of the empire.

The change came with the accession of the present emperor to the throne. He lent a willing ear to the enemies of the "man of iron," and took from the first a firm stand. Waldersee and Boetticher, both men in trusted positions, openly counseled his majesty to break with Bismarck. It was then that the much worried statesman conceived the idea of proposing that no minister should be allowed to communicate with the emperor officially except through the chancellor. The constitution, he said, supported this rule, but the emperor refused to consider the proposition. Bismarck then entered into secret negotiations with Windthorst, the leader of the clerical party, probably promising that group certain concessions in exchange for their support. The emperor grew suspicious and demanded to know the object of the negotiations. He also demanded that Bismarck notify him whenever he intended to discuss politics with party leaders. To all of this Bismarck contemptuously replied that the commands of the emperor ceased to be binding at the threshold of his wife; he himself was the only master in his own house. He would, however, be willing to resign his office at the pleasure of the sovereign. William accepted this answer without objection, but Bismarck then refused to resign. His refusal was followed by a command to do so, which, of course, he obeyed. On March 8, 1890, Bismarck wrote an autograph letter to his young master, requesting to be retired, but at the same time setting forth the political reasons why his retirement would be almost disastrous to the German state. It is thought that William sent his chancellor the papers of dismissal before he had had time to read the remarkable document.

Bismarck at once left the capital, but has spared no effort to obstruct the policy of the new regime. He must at last have been led to acknowledge that the fate of the empire he was instrumental in building up rests in stronger hands than those of mortal man. He has, at all events, grasped the hand stretched out to him in a spirit of reconciliation, and his final exit from the stage of life will be in splendor, as his part all through has been one of remarkable attractiveness.

PAUL AND SUFFRAGE.

The woman suffrage question is one of the many questions that claim the attention of our progressing age. It must be settled one way or another, and many clear seeing men and women think every indication goes to show that the ladies will before long emerge from the struggle triumphant.

In the heated discussion on the question the opponents of suffrage have often appealed to holy writ, quoting the passages which seem to subordinate woman to man; which argument has sometimes been met by the statement that such rules were never framed by the great Originator of our religion, but by Paul, "a man as liable to err as any man of the present day." Both these positions are untenable, and to defend them is to injure the cause in favor of which they are held.

If Christianity is represented as hostile to apparently good, social reforms, those who are on the line of progress will turn away from the whole system. If, on the other hand, the advocates of reform must belittle the men who lived and died for the cause of Christ, their efforts will be in vain as far as the believers in Christianity are concerned. Fortunately, no such conflict exists between that religion and progress in the direction of anything that is good.

As for woman suffrage and Paul, it must be remembered that the great preacher never was called upon to discuss that question. The writers of the New Testament do not deal in a direct way with any political questions and with but few social problems. They enjoin loyalty to the existing government, even though the emperor be a Nero; in the same way they exhort the Christians, both men and women, to conduct themselves in a way so as not to give unnecessary offense to their adversaries. In other words, they were to consider themselves under obligation to accept the political and social conditions as they existed and to submit to them as long as they legally existed, but this did not mean that they were prohibited from laboring for reforms. On the contrary it was clearly understood that Christianity would bring about a complete revolution. This was preached in clear terms in the meetings of the Christians and alluded to in prophetic writings, the meaning of which was for prudential reasons hidden to the outsiders. But the members of the Church understood them, in the main. They looked for a coming universal change of conditions and labored to that end. Only they were not revolutionary in their work. Their means were those of peace.

While the first writers of the Church do not discuss such questions in direct terms they often lay down broad principles covering the ground completely, and so far the system of Christianity as built on those great principles has proven itself fully competent to comprise within its limits every beneficent political and social reform. Paul, for instance, lays down the great principle that membership in the Church is without regard to nationality, social status or sex. "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus," seems to involve as strong an argument in favor of the cause of the ladies as could be advanced at that remote age. The same may be said of the injunction given by the same authority to husbands to love their wives as they love themselves and as Christ loved the Church. Paul in these views is in full harmony with the Master, and it may safely be emphasized that on this question he did not err, as little as on any other subject on which he wrote while under the influence of that Spirit which was given to lead into all truth and to reveal the mind and will of the Father.

In Nevada, Bernard Arntzen, government allotting agent, has been assigning lands to Indians in the more desirable valleys. The Indians are assigned 100 acres each and the government will assist in constructing irrigation ditches in the Indian settlements.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Written for this Paper.
IN THE SAMOAN MISSION.

FAGALII, Samoa, Jan. 25, 1894.—On the morning of the 5th inst., Elders Low, Beck, Hilton and Sears together with the writer, left the mission home; the first two named on their way across the island southward, going to their fields of labor; Elders Hilton and Sears bound for their field of labor at the western extremity of Upolu, while I had in view a two or three weeks' tour of the same.

On arriving at the municipality of Apia we parted for our respective destinations. Elder Hilton's horse now became our pack animal, and the way we looked as we went marching along reminded one of a party of prospectors—minus picks and shovels. As we passed along the one street of Apia, there being no other way of getting through the town, the eyes of the people were turned upon us and for a few moments we were the observed of all observers. Soon, however, we were beyond their gaze and enjoyed the pleasure of traveling as we pleased, which was not very fast; for when old Sol sends forth his heated rays one is reminded that slow traveling is preferable, especially here in Samoa.

A walk of about thirty miles, the most of which was through rain and mud, brought us to Lalovi. Along the way the people, contrary to the usual custom, failed to show any "alofo" for us by calling us in their houses to "malolo," we being asked to do so but once. The Saints at L. received us very kindly, and the manner in which they entertained us for the next few days was deserving of much praise. It fills one's heart with joy and gratitude to the great Giver of all good, when he feels that his efforts, though feeble they may be, are appreciated by those who have taken upon themselves the name of the Lord.

On Sunday, the 7th, three well attended meetings were held. Sacrament meeting was specially enjoyed. A good spirit prevailed and a number of Saints spoke very touchingly about the necessity of partaking of the Lord's supper with clean hands and pure hearts. Arrangements were completed for holding our next conference at this place. The branch of the Church located at this end of the island is presided over by Elder Thos. H. Hilton.

I had made up my mind to stop at every house where people asked me to come in; so after parting with the Elders and Saints at L., I traveled along very slowly, stopping to talk wherever opportunity afforded. Thus the week passed till Friday, when Simm was reached. Here Elder J. Beck has charge. For the present, he is alone, there being insufficient Elders to supply the demands. In this field of labor, the writer spent about seventeen months, having crossed the island, which at this point is about twenty miles wide, over thirty times. The Saints here were also feeling well in the work of the Lord as was shown by their attendance at the two meetings which were held on the following Sunday. Monday morning the journey around the island was continued and Sinpapa was reached on the 16th. Elders Wm. Low and T. S. Court are stationed here, the former presiding.

He had just returned from a visit to the east end of the island, for which part he and the writer left about noon of the 17th, arriving at a good, old brother's home shortly before night. Many of the Elders who have been on Samoa will remember Ifopo, for he has been like a real brother to them. He is the same old Ifopo, and as faithful as ever. We held a meeting in his house on the evening of our arrival.

In this district some historic places were visited, among which were the former home of Mataafa, the rebel king, and of his ancestors.

The tide being well in, we borrowed a boat of some natives and visited a small island about half a mile out. The island is called Namua, and about three miles in circumference. It is owned by Peter Laban, a Swede, who has lived here for over twenty-five years. He is a hermit of the first order, preferring to live in solitude rather than keep company with even his own family. His plantation, consisting of about fifty acres, has been cleared and planted by himself, in doing which he has performed much hard labor. While showing the writer around the place the old man became very enthusiastic and said, holding out his bare arms, "These hands have done all this."

Returning, we made for Sinpapa. As we were passing through one of the villages we observed that meeting was being held by some of the followers of Luther, so decided to attend. The preacher gave the privilege for any one to speak. One having spoken, the writer arose to say a few words. Another person arose at the same time, and as he turned to speak, saw that I had come near the pulpit, too. The teacher, for such their ministers are called, told him to proceed, so I sat down again. After he was through the teacher arose, and after passing a few insinuating remarks about us, closed the meeting.

We then asked for the privilege of holding services in the church, but were refused. In the meantime, some of those who had a desire to hear us speak had arranged for meeting to be held in a native house near by. In a very short time more than fifty had come together and the writer spoke to them on the restoration of the Gospel, warning them to repent of their sins that they may escape the impending calamities which are about to come upon those who obey not the Gospel. Meeting over, we went to see Mr. Frazer, a half-caste, who assisted Elder Dean in getting out his Samoan tract. The next day we returned to Sinpapa, where two meetings were held. Monday evening, the 22nd, found me at Fagalii again, feeling quite tired and foot-sore, having walked about forty-five miles and that, too, over very rough roads.

While going around the island, the young people would often run towards or from the path, crying at the passer-by: "Ose Mamona, se Mamona," or in their peculiar way of mocking, sing out at the top of their voices: "Mamona e, Mamona e," this being their pet name for a Mormon. Whilst the unthinking youth delights in flinging such expressions of hatred at us, the older people are more considerate; but even they, in many instances, show a very disrespectful spirit towards the humble servants of the Lord. Surely the words of the Master, "And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake," have had a literal fulfillment in this our day. The minds of this people are filled with all manner of false notions regarding us and our labors here. Some of the white missionaries of other denominations have been so kind as to inform the natives that we have been expelled from our own country for crime committed there, and have come to these far-off isles for the purpose of making a living by depending upon the hospitality of the people, pretending to be ministers of the Gospel in order that we might the more easily obtain their sympathy and receive the necessary food and shelter. Such foolish ideas are, however, gradually giving way to the better judgment of the majority of the people, and they are beginning to discover that we are indeed what we profess to be—the humble followers of the meek and lowly Nazarene, and that the Gospel which we preach is the power of God unto salvation to every one that will believe and obey the same.

The work of the Lord is going steadily forward in this part of His vineyard, and the seeds of righteousness which are being patiently sown will ere long spring forth and yield an abundant harvest. All is well with us here, and we feel to rejoice in the good work in which we are engaged, believing that we are laying up in store a good foundation against the time to come, that we, with all the faithful in Zion, may lay hold on eternal life.

Respectfully,
SETEFANO.

Written for this Paper.
WHITHER DRIFT WE?

HARRISVILLE, Weber Co., Feb. 17.—I notice in reading the statistics of the United States department of agriculture, that there is a falling off in the land productions throughout the several states of the Union, which is arousing quite an anxiety in the breasts of our national fathers. Especially is this the case with the wheat product.

The total national estimate for 1893 is about 400,000,000 bushels, being 85,000,000 bushels less than the average crop from 1880 to 1893 inclusive. Notwithstanding this remarkable falling off, there has been a fall in the price per bushel; so that the farm value of the crop is estimated at the comparatively low amount of $218,171,881. The average farm price per bushel is estimated at about 54 cents, which is believed to be the lowest ever recorded, making the average farm price or returns about $6 per acre, being about half the farm value of the last two decades. The above ratio is applicable to all other farm cereals, thus making it impracticable for the farmer to hire farm help, for the wage-worker would soon be farming the farmer.

Our families will surely have to return to their primitive knitting and other domestic industries, as President Joseph F. Smith put it at the last October conference, for I find our Territory in the same category as the states of the Union. I concluded the other day to satisfy my inquisitiveness by obtaining the status (from McIntyre Bros., Mr. Richard Hayes, and the Later threshing company who had done the threshing in Harrisville, which now comprises Harrisville and Farr West precincts, which I had done since 1887, omitting only 1892). The following are the results:

	Wheat Bus	Oats Bus	Barley Bus	Rye Bus	Total
1887	12,745	5445	938		18,128
1888	13,912	6330	449		20,744
1889	12,883	3594	56		16,533
1890	11,555	3147	355	107	15,372
1891	10,565	6233	499	8	17,235
1892	om't'd
1893	8,743	3764	386	200	13,093

From the above the reader will note the great falling off since 1888. This is not attributed to a less population, for the school census develops an increase in mouths to be supplied. Nor can it be imputed to a less area of cultivation. It must be ascribed to a sluggishness of our emulations.

I have a recollection of helping Daniel Carn, of Sugar House ward, Salt Lake county, in 1864, 5 and 6, to thresh out an average of sixty bushels of grain to the acre. Also Wm. Staker and the Woodruff farms of the same place were noted for their prodigious crops.

It was no uncommon thing for the Harrisville pioneer, the late much respected Martin H. Harris, to raise from forty-five to fifty bushels of grain to the acre. But take the farms of today and I question whether they return half their former yields. This is a fact so far as farms here are concerned. Those veterans that had such good yields did not confine themselves to any ten hours a day; in irrigation times they often put in twenty-four-hour shifts. Viewing their career, we must conclude that fortune is on the side of the industrious, as the winds and waves are on the side of the best navigator. Perseverance, and up like a lark in the morning, is what carries the laurels in a farm life, and catches the early worm. As Father Carn told me: "Up early in the morning, say your prayers, and pay your tithing—that is the secret of raising good crops in our mountain home."

No wonder President B. Young put up the Beehive as a symbol of industry! No wonder the same great pioneer advised the Relief Societies to store up wheat! For if the present falling off continues the states of the Union which now furnish fully 75 per cent of the nation's exports from their farms, may have to depend on imports to save a bread riot; in which event, when the supplies may hang on a single thread, they may look for another Joseph to step forth and save the nation from its threatened destruction. F. L.

STAR VALLEY STAKE CONFERENCE.

The sixth quarterly conference of the Star Valley Stake of Zion convened in the Afton ward meeting house on Feb. 10th and 11th, 1894.

After the usual opening exercises the reports of the Bishops were asked for. The wards were all represented by the Bishops or their counsel, the reports being good, the Saints generally striving to live in accordance with the principles of the Gospel. The health of the people in this Stake is very good, with the exception of two or three small children, who are suffering from cold.

The instructions given by the speakers were of such a nature as to encourage the Saints to live their religion and do all in their power for the advancement of the work of God. The general authorities of the Church as well as those of the Stake were sustained by the Saints in conference.

Superintendent E. McLatchie gave an excellent account of the progress of the various Sunday schools of this Stake of Zion, which was gratifying to those connected with the watchcare of the youth of Zion.

Elder Geo. Osmond felt to encourage the Saints in all good works; rejoiced to see the work of God spreading throughout the land, also spoke on the order of the House of God.

The large meeting house of Afton was filled during Sunday and a general good spirit prevailed during the conference.

WM. H. KENNINGTON, Stake Clerk.

THE QUESTION OF TAXATION.

There is no question before the people today requiring deeper thought and meditation than the subject of taxation. Though it may not occupy the same space in the public press as does the tariff and other questions, yet it is widespread and on an under current is permeating the minds of the people throughout the land. The warfare has begun—it is useless to hide it—and unless a little more wisdom and the spirit of justice are injected into our legislative bodies, national, state and territorial, the result may shake the very foundations of the nation.

Taxation is the tyrant's rod—and that it can be wielded with despotic power even in a great Republic, we have ample proof. It is this that has made the landlord and tenantism of the old world, and is fast fastening its clutches on the homes of the poor in this land. Hon. Chauncey F. Black, in a speech at Ogden 8th of October, 1891, said: "The most terrible power ever given to any nation is that of taxation. When unjustly levied it becomes an unbearable burden. There is no authority bestowed to tax one individual or class to enrich another. But this wrong is inflicted all the time."

This is true. Wealth, with its millions in stock and bonds hidden from sight, can afford to have taxed what it has in sight, in order to absorb the homes of the poor, and then in turn make them pay tribute for the shelter over their heads, in perhaps what was once their own home. Wealth today locks up in its coffers the gold and the silver, the circulating medium—no money to be had; homes are sold, two years only to redeem them in; 18 per cent interest and all other costs to pay, or to avoid this, a heavy mortgage, and then soon follows the result—a foreclosure. When the home, or small farm is thus wrested from the aged or the infirm or the man of large family depending on him, and no income, but for his labor on that bit of ground, or in order to meet the taxation the family suffers for the proper food to nourish them, or proper clothing to protect them from the cold. Such is oppression, and where taxation is oppression there is something radically wrong in government. In order to maintain our homes, I can see but little difference between a Missouri mob and the powers thus exercised by taxation.

Secretary Carlisle says he would tax "according to the ability to pay." The income principle is now before the nation. This seemingly is the only just measure. If I have surplus lands or income from any source other than the home alluded to, tax that income—10 per cent if need be instead of the 2 per cent now pending; 10 per cent of the increase is the great law of the Great Law-giver.

Now as to the present system—its consistency. A certain business block in this city rents for seven hundred and fifty per month, or nine thousand dollars per year. This is income. An aged party has a five-acre lot outside of the city. A farmer will give but sixty dollars for the lot per year. He rents it for that sum—such is the income. The taxes are sixty dollars and seventy cents—seventy cents more than the income. Will any one tell me that the taxes on the business block is nine thousand dollars, or exceeds the income on it? Here is another: An aged lady of eighty years, and forty years a widow, has five acres of land—no other income whatever; too feeble herself, she meets the iron clad board of equalization, presents the tax notice and her situation, through another; a glance at it and it is thrust back at her by the judge, saying: "Can't do anything for that—no one is poor owning such property as that. Sell it!" Such is the fact.

I am no lawyer, Mr. Editor, but at times have looked within the lids of that great law book, from which our Cokes and Blackstones, it is said, "have drawn their inspiration," and have come to this conclusion: That all law should be based upon justice, and when a law intentionally or otherwise comes in contact with that principle, it is better that the law should stand aside than that justice should be trampled upon; for there is a Supreme Court of all courts, where all wrongs must be righted—where even "mercy cannot cheat justice."

Then let the people speak out, and let them be heard. The fathers of our nation, in their inspiration, foresaw this day, and wisely established the rights of the people to give expression to their grievances.

A short time ago, through a test oath, certain parties were denied their right of franchise. They sued the framers of the oath for damages. The case went to the Supreme Court of the nation and was decided in their favor, with this exception: they must recover their damages from those who enforced the oath instead of the commissioners who framed it. I looked upon this as an unjust decision, but after more mature thought concluded it was sound. An unjust law, unenforced, can do no harm, and no law can compel me, against my will, as a court or juror, to enforce an unjust measure. The door, my right to resign, is always open. But if I choose to fear my conscience rather than to surrender my official position, or the money there may be it, then let me before that higher court meet the responsibility.

JUSTICE TO THE LINE.

ELDER'S REPORT FROM OKLAHOMA.

COLUMBIA, O. T., Feb. 15, 1894.

The heaviest snowstorm of the season visited this part of Oklahoma on the 13th inst., accompanied by a blizzard from the north, which acquired a velocity of over thirty miles an hour, and brought the temperature down to 10 above zero. The storm commenced before day break and the fall of snow and temperature and the increase of wind became more emphatic as the day advanced. From 4 a.m. until night there has been no cessation. Great suffering is feared, as few of the settlers, whether new or old, are prepared for storms of this magnitude, while many have scarcely protection against moderate weather. Railroad traffic was suspended and the snow drifted in places six feet deep. The blizzard came up very suddenly and many are suffering from exposure in the Cherokee Strip, the report is that there have been over twenty-five poor settlers frozen to death. The thermometer stands two below zero, and the wind is blowing sixty miles per hour.

Brother R. M. Harper and I left our good headquarters at Brother David Holt's on the 8th of this month, traveling southwest, holding meetings in every schoolhouse we came to. Brother G. S. Ashton left for Orlando to meet Elder McArthur of St. George, who was to be there on the 4th inst. Brother Harper and I will return to Marshall on the 22nd and commence our Oklahoma conference on the 24th.

This letter leaves the mission in a prosperous condition and all the Saints and Elders feeling well.

ARTHUR W. WALLACE.

CHURCH THEOLOGY CLASS.

The class held its regular session at the Assembly Hall, Sunday, commencing at 12:30 p. m. The students were all provided with leaflets containing an outline of the work in hand. After prayer by Elder Crawford, Dr. J. E. Talmage, instructor of the class, first answered several written questions, bearing upon subjects discussed at the previous session. The seventh article of faith of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was then taken up for study. It reads: "We believe in the gift of tongues, revelation, visions, healing, interpretation of tongues, etc."

The lecturer stated that spiritual gifts, which are characteristics of the work of God, were possessed by the Church to show forth the power of God among His children and to testify of the divine commission under which the servants of God operate. Unless withdrawn through their unbelief, these gifts will ever remain among men. Through many passages it was shown that promises of these blessings were made in former days as well as in our own time. The signs were not given to gratify sinful curiosity or morbid cravings for wonders but to benefit those who obey the commandments of the Lord.

Regarding miracles it was said that while they do not take place contrary to laws of nature they were wrought through powers superior to those most common to men. Miracles are performed through faith, not to induce faith. Reference was made to instances where the powers of evil made use of wonders imitating the power of God.

The diversity of gifts as enumerated by Paul, by Moroni and through modern revelation then received attention. Although special gifts, such as wisdom, knowledge, faith, power to heal, etc., were enjoyed by many, some gift was bestowed on every man, each one being responsible what use he made of the talent thus placed in his charge.

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

The following interview of Senator Allen was given in answer to questions which have been furnished to a number of members of Congress, all of whom have promised to respond at their earliest convenience.

Question—"What is the outlook in politics, the trend of party doctrine and organization? Will the coming century work over the issues of the past hundred years, or will a new field of political, social and economical effort be occupied? What is the coming issue?"

Answer—"The political outlook from a Populist standpoint is very flattering indeed. The old parties are becoming disorganized, and will become more so as time advances, and the people learn that they have been and are being deceived by the attitude of these parties on the money question. The antagonism of the old parties to silver is not because silver is not adapted to money purposes, but because it is becoming so plentiful that a few men and corporations can no longer corner it, and by that means control the prices of property and labor. These men and corporations have been able to control the action of every branch of the government heretofore in their own interest. The time is speedily coming when the people will realize fully that the master question of the hour is the money question, and when they do so the Populist party will come into power. The issues of the past one hundred years will be valuable and referred to principally as showing the possibilities of the race and the obstacles that organized society can successfully meet and overcome, and retain its organization. An entirely new field in political, social and economic life will be occupied in the future; greater attention will be given to the fitness and patriotism of men chosen for public positions; greater jealousy will be exhibited by the people of a recreant performance of public duty; higher and better social conditions will be demanded for all classes; special privileges, incompatible with public safety and the general welfare, will be taken away; and there will be a general upward movement of the people for a better and higher life.

The coming issue is the money question, its issuance and control, its use and abuse. The people will not cease to agitate this question, until it is finally and justly settled in the interests of all.

Q.—"What is to be the outcome of tariff agitation? Will it be protection, free trade, or a compromise and a drawn battle? Is there any probability that the question will be lifted out of politics, and put into the hands of a non partisan commission?"

A.—It is hard to tell what will be the outcome of the tariff agitation. The old parties have been fighting the tariff battle for years. The Republican party stands for what it is pleased to call a protective, but what is in fact, a prohibitory tariff, destroying the competitive market. The Democratic party stands for what is commonly known as free trade. I do not look for any compromise or drawn battle between these parties so long as they can keep the question before the people to deceive and mislead them by making them believe that it is the main issue. As long as they can they will do this. The tariff is thrown, every four years to the people, as a string is thrown to a kitten, simply to engage their attention and induce them to believe that it is a blessing on the one hand, and a serious evil on the other. Of course the tariff is an important question, but it is subordinate in every conceivable point to the money question. A scientific and just settlement of the latter question will dissipate nine-tenths of the evils afflicting society. It would set industry in motion and put every man to work. There is no probability that the tariff question will be taken out of politics, or be placed in the hands of a non-partisan commission, as long as politicians can keep it in politics, and make it the subject of repeated sham battles.

Q.—"What is the outlook in politics, the coming political creed, and what is the result of tariff agitation?"

A.—I have given you my answer to the question on tariff agitation. The outlook in politics in my judgment, is hopeful. The American people move very slowly; they are loath to believe their public servants recreant to duty, and they more are inclined to bear evils, if they are not too heavy than to make a change in their political action, but when they do become convinced that things are going from bad to worse and that there is no remedy but by a change in political parties, they do not hesitate to move quickly and effectually. In my judgment a political party counts for nothing when it ceases to act in the interest of the people. A political party at best is a means to an end, the end being good government; and whenever it ceases to serve this useful end, it should be thrown aside as we cast aside a worn out garment that has served its day of usefulness. Patriotism and loyalty to one's country, to the people and their institutions, and a sincere desire to see every one amply protected, in person, property and other rights, by the laws of the country, in my judgment constitute the highest ideals of a true statesman.

The Populist party is in the line of promotion; it may be subjected to much criticism, and ridiculed by a partisan or venal press before it succeeds; it may be scoffed at and spit upon by those who least understand its lofty purposes, or by those who are interested in special legal privileges, and who can only retain their unjust power by the success of a political party under their control; but the people will sooner or later give us power. They are bound sooner or later to learn that the old parties are wedded to the monetary and corporation interests of the country, and have not the slightest concern for the welfare of the humble and poor.

C. R.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

Daniel Gapin, supposed to be in Utah, will receive information greatly to his benefit by addressing J. M. Hamilton, attorney at law, this city.

A little son of Policeman Crockett's of Logan was so badly scalded on the feet and legs by a pan of scalding hot bran that he accidentally tipped over on himself.

Mr. Thomas Marrioneaux, who is a member of the Salt Lake bar, has been declared by the examining committee to be "the winner" in the contest for the position of official stenographer of the Third district court.

A letter written by Elder Moses Thatcher to his relatives at Logan, conveys the cheering intelligence that his health has greatly improved during his short sojourn in California, he having gained six pounds in weight.

The Utah Central, owing to the heavy fall of snow and high winds has been blockaded for several days and as a result all passenger and freight traffic between here and Park City is for the present, at least, entrusted to the hands of the Union Pacific.

Work was commenced on a coal prospect about two and a half miles east of the city this week, says the Ephraim Enterprise. It looks very promising and it pans out as well as the owners anticipate the citizens of this place will soon get their coal at a reasonable figure.

The severity of the blizzard experienced here on Saturday last, is seldom equaled in this locality. Huge snowdrifts were piled on the sidewalks, signs were blown down, and on the bench several window lights were blown out and chimneys razed to the level of the roof.

On Monday Dr. Ormsby removed a needle from just back of the shoulder of an infant daughter of John Bradley of Paradise. How or when it got there is a mystery, but as the little one had been fretful for about two weeks it is supposed the needle had been troubling it about that length of time.

There is but one place in the Territory, says the Brigham Bugler, where the state capitol should be built and that is the magnificent city of Salt Lake. Scatter the public buildings too much and our whilom fair Territory would soon present a less attractive appearance than a flock of sheep in the midst of which a wolf had just sprung.

A Wardner, Idaho, special says: Italian miners, becoming frightened at rumors of intended violence, are quietly leaving town, and the procession of blankets down the gulch is quite steady. The people of Wardner, while not sorry to see the Italians go, are indignant over the reports sent out that miners were organizing to eject Italians and say they are as safe in Wardner as anywhere.

The Boise Statesman says that on Saturday last George Cooper, a well-to-do lumberman, while riding with a young lady nine miles from Cottonwood, Washington state, was shot in the back by some person concealed in the brush on the side of the road. Cooper and another man were rivals for the affections of the young lady and the assassination is said to be on that account. The murderer has not been arrested.

News from Kendrick, Idaho, says that Edward Oyler and two companions were hunting deer on the Clearwater, ten miles east, on the 13th. A deer sprang up ahead, and Oyler, who was in front, fired and missed. His companion in the rear, Ernest Cooper, then fired, but just as he pressed the trigger Oyler slipped, and in falling, his head came in the range of Cooper's gun and the bullet passed through his skull killing him instantly.

FILLMORE, Feb. 14, 1894.—Arthur Day and his father tracked a mountain lion for about two miles up Maple Hollow near this city, when Arthur suddenly came within fifteen steps of the animal lying down. He shot it through the heart. It weighs over 160 pounds.

Mrs. Margaret Wade, wife of Geo. Wade, slipped, fell and broke her arm yesterday. The limb was set by Jos. E. Ray.

Another old timer, John Jenkins of Logan, has departed. He died on Monday, at the ripe age of 82 years and nearly nine months. He was born in Caermarthanshire, South Wales, May 20th, 1811; joined the Church in 1856, emigrated to America the same year. He came to Utah in 1880 and has lived in Logan ever since. He leaves a wife who occupied that relation to him for 57 years, five sons and one daughter to mourn his loss.

Miss Annie Foulk, daughter of F. Foulk, died at Pleasant Grove; aged 20 years. Miss Fowlk received a fright about Christmas time from a fire that broke out on the premises of her father. Some mischievous boys fired off a pistol and made some fiendish screams, which aroused the household. Through the exposure the young lady took cold, which, coupled with the fright, doubtless caused her untimely death. She was greatly respected by her associates.

On Sunday morning during the time the freight train was switching in the Logan yard, brakeman H. E. Geller, of Ogden, received a painful injury that might have resulted fatally. He was making a coupling when the pin broke, one piece of it striking him on the forehead. He was knocked senseless, but fortunately fell outside of the track, or he would have been run over. An angular gash, four inches in length, was cut, which was sewed up Dr. Parkinson.

There is a petition going round town, says the Richfield Advocate, asking the Legislature to attach Sevier county to the Second judicial district, and quite a number of names were signed, but some of our representative men were not in favor of the measure as it was more convenient and cheaper to go to Provo than to Beaver. We have not given the matter sufficient consideration to say which would be the best, but it seems that the trip to Provo on the cars is more comfortable than in a vehicle to Beaver.

Wednesday, E. A. Box of Brigham City, was arrested by Deputy Marshal Davis, charged with embezzlement. The complaint was made by J. C. Nielsen, manager of the Box Elder Building and Loan association, a local organization of which Box was secretary and treasurer for some eight years. Crookedness was detected in the books and accounts last year, when Box was relieved of his position. The defendant was brought before United States Commissioner Coomb; on Wednesday. The hearing was postponed until February.

"A Bird" writes from Fillmore, Millard county, Feb. 10th, 1894, that the organization of a chamber of commerce was effected in that city that day with the following officers: Alma Greenwood, president; Jos. E. Ray, vice-president; J. L. Melville, O. C. Holbrook, Jos. A. Greenwood, John T. Ashman and J. P. Jacobson, directors; J. P. Jacobson, secretary; George C. Viele, treasurer; and Joseph S. Giles, corresponding secretary.

The same day Fillmore was having the worst snowstorm of the winter.

Elder Frederick W. Schoenfeld Bishop of Brighton, was yesterday the 14th, the happy recipient of many warm birthday congratulations from the members of his ward. There was a choir practice last evening, and the choir leader, George M. Jones, invited the Bishop to attend and note the progress that had been made. He was greatly surprised when he saw the house filled with friends who received him most cordially and congratulated him on the occasion of his sixty-third birthday. The evening was pleasantly spent, an interesting program being rendered.

Thursday evening says the Manti Sentinel: David Whitmer, 7 years old, was kicked by a horse and his leg was broken in two places. It appears that another boy named Leon Bemus was riding a horse near the tinner's shop and some conversation passed between them. Just now it happened is not exactly known as the two boys tell different stories about it. The boy was kicked a few feet and when picked up was found to be seriously injured. Dr. E. T. Hosford attended the wounded boy, and he is doing as well as could be expected, although it is learned that he is permanently crippled.

George, John and Henry Wood, who live between College ward and Wellsville, had quite an exciting chase after a mountain lioness one day last week near the banks of the muddy river. The animal's tracks had been previously observed, and armed by rifles and accompanied by dogs, the boys concluded to trace it to its lair. After following the trail for some time, the lioness was driven from a small patch of brush by the dogs, and sought safety by running toward another brush. One of the boys ended the animal's career at the first shot. It was found to weigh about 175 pounds. An industrious search will now be made for its mate.

On Tuesday a son of Joseph College came nearly passing to the great beyond. In trying to capture a duck on Jordan river, says the Lehi Banner he fell in and had it not been for Frank Beckstead he would have been drowned. Mr. Beckstead came to his aid as quickly as possible, but in the meantime the boy had drifted down the river some distance and was under the water, only the back of his head showing. He waded out as far as possible and with the aid of a fish line drew the boy to the shore more dead than alive. Dr. Hoshaw succeeded in restoring him to consciousness, but it will be a few days before he is all right again.

The many friends of the late President Heber C. Kimball have expressed a desire to see the prophecies and remarkable sayings of this eminent Apostle in print. A work is being prepared which will contain a selection of his sayings, prophecies and gems. The publishers invite President Kimball's many friends to write up in concise form what they can remember of his predictions, etc., and forward the same to Brother Joseph Hyrum Parry, who has the consent of the family to collate and publish these gems. Before their publication they will be submitted to proper authorities for approval. The work when complete promises to be a valuable collection.

PARK CITY, Feb. 15.—The community was greatly shocked and surprised here today on account of the suicide of W. W. Kennedy, an old and respected resident of the Park and for twelve years a blacksmith at the Ontario mine.

The fatal act was committed at nine o'clock and was wholly unexpected. As a favorable opportunity presented itself at that time Kennedy placed a revolver against his head and blew out his brains. Death was instantaneous. The cause of the rash deed arose from a variety of troubles which recently developed and which are believed to have made him temporarily insane. He was 55 years of age and leaves a wife and four children.

We are glad to know that we have a large herd of goats in our county now located in the Cedar mountains says the Eastern Utah Telegraph. Goats are very hardy animals and are more profitable than sheep. The length of their wool is about twelve inches long and brings a very large price in the market. A goat will shear four grades of wool; the highest grade will probably bring 75 cents and the lowest 35, making an average of 55 cents. In an ordinary climate they can be shorn twice a year, with an average of about five pounds of wool to the clip. Besides the fine wool they produce they are also very valuable for the fine butter and milk they produce. Mr. Bromly, the owner of the herd is now located in our town (Castle Dale) for a time.

There was a serious accident at the Knutsford hotel Tuesday, February 13. The victim was a German employed as engineer at the Sanitarium resort on Third South street. His name is Leo Bannenbelsor.

It appears that he had gone over to the hotel of the upper floors mistook the elevator shaft for the stairway and unconsciously stepped into the opening and fell one story. When taken up of the shaft he presented a ghastly sight and appeared to be more dead than alive. The bridge of his nose was badly broken, his right arm and wrist fractured and severe abrasions covered his body, while he sustained internal injuries. He was cared for by a physician and is in a critical condition today, though his recovery is hoped for.

What might have been a railroad wreck was averted by the prompt action of the engineer one evening last week, at the Hyde Park crossing. By the glare of the headlight the engineer saw some object directly on the track, and by prompt application of the brakes, stopped his train before reaching it. Investigation disclosed the fact that it was a horse attached to a cutter in which was a man who, for the time being, was dead to the world—dead drunk. The horse had stepped into the cattle pit. The animal was lifted out and started upon its journey once more against the drunken protests of its owner who did not wish to be disturbed, and the train proceeded on its way. Some time later the mail carrier on that route picked the man up, took him to his home and cared for him until morning or he would have been frozen.

About half-past nine Mrs. Markinson, a lady about 78 years of age, met with a very severe accident by falling down a flight of stairs, at her residence, at the rear of No. 642 east First South street. She was carrying a pitcher of cream to her room, when by some means she slipped and fell to the bottom of the stairs, inflicting a scalp wound extending from just above the right ear round the back of the head to near the left ear, laying bare quite a piece of the skull. She apparently struck her head on the edge of a bucket on the landing, and was otherwise severely bruised about the body, but no bones were broken. Dr. Jabez W. Taylor was at once called in and sewed up the gaping wound, putting in over twenty stitches, and otherwise making her as comfortable as possible. The patient was resting easily.

Mr. George K. Reese, a well known Salt Lake wheelwright, who lives in the Second ward, brought to the News office today one of the most unique parlor tables ever exhibited in this city. It is the result of his own handiwork and reflects great credit on him and proves him to be an artist both in execution and design.

The table is made of scraps of wood which fell from pieces used in finishing the various rooms of the Temple. There are fourteen kinds in all and the number of pieces falls less than a score below one thousand. The face of the table is all inlaid work and the grain and different colors of the various kinds of wood and the novel figures, flowers and designs are very pretty.

There is one piece of wood—a very small one—in the table that was taken from a twig cut from a tree on the Temple block at Independence, Missouri. In the center of these inlaid designs is a picture of the Salt Lake Temple covered by a small and beautiful piece of glass that was once a part of one of the magnificent mirrors of that building.

Isaac A. Allred of Fairview was one of the many callers who came into the Pyramid office last week, says that paper, to look at the mysterious rock recently taken from Ellisha Braddon's well. Mr. Allred reports that he has just finished a well on Joseph Briggs' place near Milburn, the depth being 150 feet. At 120 feet he encountered a two or three foot layer of cement and gravel in which was imbedded a number of pieces of limbs of trees, small sticks, bark, etc., some of the pieces being four and five inches long, and in a perfect condition, but somewhat solidified, as though passing into a petrified or carbon state. The full depth of the well continued through the same character of ground, which evidently had been washed down from the mountain sides during ages past. All the ground on the west side of Sanpete valley is of the same character, and wells in this city to the depth of 100 feet have not reached the limit of the washed gravel, sandstone boulders and cement. What process of nature has created the soil directly underneath many of our Sanpete towns is one of those unexplained mysteries, the study of which will perhaps always continue to baffle a successful solution.

The most plausible theory is that floods have from time to time carried heavy eastern deposits from the mountain sides, and with them whatever of plant life may have been within its path. These have gradually piled up until a depth of a hundred feet or more has been accumulated.

At the regular Sunday evening meeting of the Saints of the Twenty-first ward, Salt Lake City, held February 18th, 1894, the following named brethren were unanimously sustained by the large congregation of people as their bishopric, and the brethren were installed in their high calling in the order named: Elder Marcellus S. Woolley was ordained Bishop of the Twenty-first ward, and Elders Herbert J. Foulger and James Maxwell (the last named being ordained a High Priest) were set apart as Counselors to Bishop Woolley, President George Q. Cannon and the Presidency of the Stake officiating in the ordinations.

The change in the bishopric was occasioned by the death of the late esteemed Bishop, Brother William L. N. Allen, which occurred some time ago.

Elder Josiah Burrows was set apart as superintendent of the Sabbath school of the ward by the visiting brethren. Brother Maxwell, the former superintendent, having been called to the Bishopric, was the case for this change.

President George Q. Cannon addressed the Saints for a short time concerning the present depressing condition of affairs, the cultivation of the spirit of hope and faith when despondent through any cause, duty of the whole people as individuals, obedience to the commandments of the Lord as regards each other and the doing good to all mankind.

A very pleasing feature of the meeting was the excellent singing of the ward choir under their efficient leader, Elder Thomas McIntyre.

Bonanza, Wyo., and vicinity is overrun by vast herds of game from the mountains, principally elk. The deep snow in the mountains has driven the starving animals out upon the adjacent plains.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Written for this Paper.

THEOLOGY AND MEDICAL BOTANY.

My thoughts of late have turned upon the harmony of the healing art with medicine. I start out with the proposition that all true science reverts back to this science of sciences, theology. If we penetrate the realm of astronomy, and cast our eyes to and even beyond the confines of our own universe to that vast galaxy of stars shining in the Milky Way, and seek for an answer to the question, Who constructed this practically infinite system of revolving worlds, compared with which our earth is but an atom? The only reliable answer is to be found in theology. All the structure, contrivance, magnitude, distance, motion, of those wonderfully revolving spheres is accounted for in that central science. In vain may we look into the mud for the source of power which gave motion and form to those vast systems. Think of it! As a single drop of water is to the earth, so is our earth to the Milky Way! Not only is the true answer to the infinite contrivance that planned these systems to be found in this master science, but mathematics, chemistry, botany, geology, etc., all had their origin here. The imperfections to be found in chemistry, geology, and botany, cannot be referred to any errors in the sciences themselves, but in the lack of understanding them.

A century ago the medical faculty claimed that they had found the system in which was contained the panacea for all the ills to which flesh is heir. This century repudiates very largely the remedies of the past century. If the doctors of this century are right, the doctors who sneer at the eighteenth century remedies are wrong. Talk about a system of medicine! The greatest medical lights admit that there is no such thing. Doctor-craft has entrenched itself within walls, legal walls so high, please allow me, that nobody dare think outside of them, without fine and imprisonment. An old grandmother must, I suppose, in order to administer a cup of catnip tea, consult some learned head, as to whether catnip is good for a cold or not. When will doctor-craft cease and the good old time return when people can live out all their days?

The means appointed of Jehovah for the healing of the sick, are firstly, the anointing of oil in the name of Jesus and the laying on of hands. When the person thus administered fails of faith in this divine ordinance, then herbs and mild food are to be administered—mark the language—herbs, not minerals, not medicines so highly concentrated as to destroy vital energy and render the system like a barometer, an indicator of every coming change of atmosphere as many are who are the victims of this pernicious system. Allow me to repeat the language of revelation: "All useful herbs God hath ordained for the nature, use, and constitution of man." John Wesley said, in a work he wrote on primitive physic: "It is probable physic, as well as religion, was in the first ages chiefly traditional, every father delivering down to his sons what he had in like manner received, concerning the manner of healing both outward hurts and the diseases incident to the climate, and the medicines which were of the greatest efficacy for the cure of each disorder. It is certain that this is the method wherein the art of healing is preserved among the American Indians to this day. Their diseases, indeed, are exceedingly few. Nor do they often occur, by reason of their continued exercise, and, till at late, universal temperance." He says also, that experience and physic grew up together. "The European, as well as American, said to his neighbor, Are you sick? Drink the juice of this herb and it will cure you. Thus ancient men, having a little experience, joined with common sense and humanity, cured both themselves and neighbors of most of the distempers, to which every nation was subject." He further says: "Physicians now became subjects of admiration, as persons who were something more than human, and profit as well as honor attended their employment."

Dr. Skelton says: "Healthy life is determined by the capacity to sustain the normal or natural temperate, and that where there is disease there is a loss in the balance of the vital forces, and that in order to restore the body it is first necessary to equalize the circulation, upon which health depends." He also says: "Disease is nothing more than obstruction. Remove it and all will go well, and here let me say, it is neither the dress, carriage, position or equipage that make the doctor, but simply the knowledge how to cure disease and the capacity or power to do it, and they who can best accomplish the same, whether rich or poor, Jew or Turk, infidel or Christian, savage or civilized, are doctors, and they who cannot are quacks, no matter if educated in a college for the expressed study of the profession or not."

Dr. Gunn says: "I respect the faculty, but that they should have an exclusive control I cannot admit. I must honestly say, for the preservation of health and life private individuals have often contributed information of the most valuable character, solely derived from un-studied, or at least from unprofessional experience. No knowledge is worth anything unless founded on truth and experience, and a long practice in my profession has fully convinced me that more favorable results take place from simple remedies and good nursing than from eminent physicians who quarrel with each other for preeminence in fame, instead of endeavoring to enlighten and advance the happiness of the human family."

Influence of the Passions in Disease—Physical and mental suffering often leads to a virtuous life. The unvirtuous should complain of their own unlawful indulgences and not charge the Creator with being the author of disease incurred by a life of excesses. When life is buoyant with hope, and the cup of our enjoyment is full to the brim, we sometimes forget the Author of life and its attendant blessings. Hence chastisement softens and subdues the grosser passions and refines and exalts feeling.

But afflictions are not always the result of our own folly. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth." Job's afflictions were not induced by a vicious course, but they were the means of producing those lofty and sublime conceptions of the wonder-working providences of an all-wise Creator that have, but in few cases, ever been equalled. The furnace of affliction is unpleasant, but its results are pure and exalting. Paul says: "Our light afflictions are but for a moment and they work out for us a far more and exceeding weight of glory." The drunkard, the glutton, and the libertine are never truly happy. Indulgence over, and remorse seizes upon them. Millions fall, annually, through the demon of strong drink, whose haggard faces, ere they found a grave, foretold their end. The record of man's frailties, in the coming day, when opened and read to him, will be far more appalling than the loss of wife and children or of all earthly possessions.

It is the duty of man to make progress—progress should be his watchword. Idleness is the bane of the mind. Labor, intellectual and physical, should be provided for all, and that government or society which does not provide labor for its members or citizens is in danger of revolution and overthrow. The development of the sublime art of music would have been far in advance of what it now is among us if singers and performers could have been provided with labor and thus kept at home rather than scattered in search of it. The influence of cheerfulness in disease casts a charm over the entire life. I once saw a friend in Salt Lake City who was drawn out of shape, indeed to all appearances a perfect wreck from rheumatism, joking like a man in vigorous health. This emotion in perfect health adds elasticity to the step. Says one writer: "I would rather possess a cheerful disposition, inclined to always look upon the bright side, than with a gloomy mind be master of an estate worth ten thousand a year."

Anger disarranges the entire vital economy. Its terrible effects are like the raging sea. The Bible says, "Be not given to anger." All may by prayer and watching gain the victory over this passion. Hope lifts the veil and out of the slough of despond points us upward to heaven and God. Time would fail me to write on all the passions, I therefore close.

THOMAS CHILD.
Prof. of Medical Botany.

Written for this Paper.

THE NEW LIBRARY.

I spent an afternoon this week in going through the new National Library building. I can't begin to describe it. It will be the finest public building in the United States, and it will be the most beautiful library in the world. It covers nearly four acres, and it is already under roof. Its walls are as high as those of the tallest New York flat, and you can lose yourself in its long corridors and winding passages. It has a dome plated with the purest of gold, larger than the largest circus tent, and the golden torch which flames over its top, though it looks not bigger around than your fist as viewed from the capitol, is in reality as big as a hoghead, and it may be seen from Alexandria and far down the Potomac. This new library building is a work of wonderful art. Its exterior is made of drab granite cut in places so smooth that it looks like marble and ornamented here and there with wonderful carvings. The building has about 1,800 windows, and the four sides of the main gallery have thirty-three great arches, the keystones of which are images representing the heads of all the races of the world. Every type of man known to ethnology has a place in one of these arches, and the faces are marvelous in their execution and character. Over the main entrance are the types of the highest order of men, such as the Greek and Latin and the Saxon, while at the back of the building you find the lowest types, such as you find in Africa and in the South Sea Islands. I can't describe the wonderful execution of these figures. They are the most lifelike pictures in stone I have ever seen, and they seem to almost talk to you as their stern, stony eyes look down at you from over the windows.

This building covers nearly as much space as the Capitol. Its dome is not so large, but its plate of gold makes it infinitely more conspicuous. If you will take five city lots and carpet them with 24-carat gold you will get an idea of the golden quilt which covers this immense dome. There is no room in the United States so large that it would fit this great golden carpet, and it is the largest golden dome in the United States. It has been called the largest golden dome in the world. But this is a mistake. The dome of St. Isaac's in St. Petersburg has a smaller diameter, but it covers more space and it cost infinitely more than this. It took 200 pounds of solid gold to cover it, and when you remember that gold at the mints is worth $17 an ounce you will see, that even at that low rate the St. Petersburg dome cost $40,000 to gild.

The gold on the dome at Washington did not cost one-tenth of that amount. I was put on in little sheets, each of which was about four inches square and one hundred and fifty-thousandths of an inch thick. It takes two thousand such sheets to make one ounce of gold, and this amount will cover a space about as large as that of the average hall vestibule. The gold made in that form costs $27 dollars an ounce, and at that rate it must have cost over $60,000 to gild St. Isaac's. Russia has many cathedral domes plated with gold, and the gold-plated temples of the world are many. In Burmah and Siam there are pagodas and temples covered with gold, and at Rangoon I saw a pagoda about two-thirds as high as the Washington monument which is a great round mountain just plastered with gold leaf. The dome of the capitol at Boston is gold-plated, as are also those of the Connecticut state house at Hartford and the Hotel Des Invalids at Paris. I went up to the top of this golden dome yesterday and took a look at it. The gold is laid upon copper, and it is polished so that it is as bright as a new wedding ring. It is said to be very durable, and is on the whole, I doubt not, cheaper than the white lead with which the Capital dome is painted nearly every year. The gold was put on by specialists, who worked under canvas, and one of whom nearly lost his life at the work. The top of the dome is, I judge, about one-third the height of the Washington monument from the earth. This man was working on the smooth surface, when his foot slipped, and he slid it as though it were a mountain of ice. He came to the edge at a flying velocity and shot over it on to the railing of the granite fence, which runs around its base. His foot fortunately caught on the inside of this railing and he tumbled down in a heap on the iron pavement, which runs around the dome. Had he struck the top of the railing half an inch higher he would have slid over and would have fallen a sheer 150 feet onto the granite lying in the court below. This is the only really dangerous accident that has occurred in the building, and though hundreds of men have been employed upon it for several years, no lives have been lost.

I can't describe the wonders of the interior of the National Library. My head buzzed as I walked through the many rooms and tried to understand it all. You could lose yourself in its basement as in the catacombs of Rome and wander for hours trying to find your way out. The grand staircase, which takes up a space equal almost to that of a quarter of an acre, to be finished in white marble and the great marble columns which rise one above another are already in place and surrounded with wooden boards to keep them from in jury. The reading room will be in the rotunda in the center of the building and it will be covered with the dome. This room will be as large as the rotunda of the Capitol and its area will be about a quarter of an acre. It will have seats for 300 readers and the desks of these run in concentric rows around the central desk in which the manager of the reading room will sit and from which he will have connections with all parts of the library by pneumatic tubes or other modern inventions, which will enable him to send a message in the twinkling of an eye to any part of this great book palace, and by the touching of a button bring back the book he wants. Electricity and everything that the modern mind can think of has come to the aid in adding to the conveniences of the library, and it is now thought that an electric railroad will be built to carry the books from the old library of Congress in the Capitol over to this new building.

From this great central dome run out like arms massive buildings in which are to be housed our national library of the future. These are known as book sacks, but the word conveys no idea of their character. Imagine a great, long warehouse with glass walls as high as one of the largest New York flats and hundreds of feet in length. Let the sides of these be walled with glass set into square columns of white enameled brick and have the plate glass wedged into these columns without framework, as is the case in windows. Make the interior to consist of one mass of iron network running from the floor to the roof, so that when you stand within it you see nothing but iron frames rising one above the other and filling the whole vast high room. This may give you some idea of the book stack. The iron network consists of book shelves, and these are reached by stairs which run from one tier of iron to another and by walks of iron paved with marble, which are suspended between the tiers at regular intervals from the floor to the roof. There are several of these vast book warehouses in the building. The one I have just described will contain 800,000 books, or more than are now in the National Library. The walls of glass give perfect light and the books are so arranged that the greatest numbers can be packed into the smallest compass, making every pamphlet thoroughly accessible.

I have spoken of the 1800 windows of this building. Those of the interior and of these stacks are set into the walls, great, massive pieces of plate glass, as large as goodsized store fronts. It is not possible to raise or lower them, and they are made so for the protection of the books, in order that no dust may enter. The ventilation is all done from the roof, and these windows are washed on the outside by means of a little railroad which runs around them from story to story, on which the washers can stand and scrub them clean. The acres of floor in this great book palace will be of marble. The walls of the rotunda are of colored marbles from all parts of the United States, and in the whole vast, high, four acres of wonderful rooms not a splinter of wood has been used. All is composed of iron, stone, cement and glass, and, as Mr. Green, the engineer in charge, told me, there will not be enough wood in the building when it is completed to make a match.

This building is to cost $6,000,000. The State, War and Navy cost $10,000,000, and upon the Capitol has been expended, all told, something like $18,000,000. Uncle Sam will get more for his money out of this than out of either of the others. All of the work is being done under the government, and everything is built to outlast the ages, and of the very best material. In one of the rooms I found an army of carvers at work making wonderful decorations which are to adorn the exterior, and throughout the whole building everything went on like the work of an army under perfect control and in perfect order. The building will be completed in about two years, and within two years and a half the new library will be in thorough operation.

From here I walked over to the Capitol and took a stroll through the library of Congress. Every available room in the building is packed with books, and the library proper is so full that you have to march through single file in order to get from one part of it to the other. I pushed my way past a mountain of bound newspapers up to the main desk, and asked Mr. Spofford, the librarian, to tell me something about the condition of the library today, and as to how the great American brain was acting. Every one at Washington knows Mr. Spofford. He has been with the library for more than a generation, and he knows more about books and their contents than any other man in the United States.

There are in the National Library nearly 700,000 volumes, and in addition to this there are over 200,000 pamphlets. Mr. Spofford's brain is such that he knows just where each one of the 700,000 volumes stands, and he can tell you in an instant just which of them ought to help you on any subject you are studying. It is the same with the pamphlets, and the wonder is how one little iron-gray head can hold it all. He is a curious-looking man, as dark as a Spaniard. He has black hair and whiskers, now mixed with gray. His eyes are bright. His frame is short, lithe and wiry, and every atom of it is made up of muscle. He is the busiest man in the Capitol building and he knows how to do work quickly. He dictates all of his correspondence, and his ordinary conversation, which is clean cut and exact, is as classic as the mass of books which surround him. I always feel afraid to report him. He says just what he means and if you misplace a word or a figure you feel that it will cause his black hair to stand on end in indignation when he reads it. He is with all this a very accessible man, and to people who have business with him there is no one more ready to talk. I told him what I wanted and he took me into a little cubby hole in one corner of the library and then rattled off answers to my questions at the rate of 100 words a minute.

I asked him as to the story of the library and as to the new building. He said: "Before Congress came to Washington it had access for a time to the books in the Logan Library in Philadelphia. The little city contained a number of scholars and there was not much trouble in getting information. When the capital was moved to Washington, however, Congress found itself in the woods and there were no books of reference or general libraries. When Jefferson became President, the library was first established and an appropriation of $1,000 a year was devoted to it. In 1814 we had here about 3,000 volumes. Then the British came and burned the Capitol and the books went up in smoke. A short time after this, President Jefferson, who had gotten into financial straits at Monticello, offered his library for sale to Congress. He had, all told; between six and seven thousand volumes, many of which were valuable and rare. Congress paid him $23,000 for them, which was, it is said, just about half of what they cost him, and they were hauled in wagons from Monticello to Washington. Parton, Jefferson's biographer, says they made sixteen wagon loads of books and that Jefferson was very sorry to lose them. In 1851 the library had increased to 55,000 volumes. Then another fire occurred and 35,000 of these were burned, including many of the most valuable. The fire took place from defective flues, and only 20,000 volumes were saved from the ruins. By this time Congress thoroughly appreciated the need of a good library and the year following $72,000 were appropriated for new books, and the appropriations have gone on from that time to this until we now have 680,000 volumes and 220,000 pamphlets. Last year we added about 18,000 volumes to the library and the copyrights are now increasing our stock at the rate of 50,000 and upward per year."

"Tell me something about the new library."

"It will be one of the finest libraries of the world, and it will be as perfect as modern invention and modern science can make it. The three great enemies of books are dust, heat and moisture. As to heat and fire, we have prevented this by putting the heating arrangements away from the main structure and there will be no possible chance for anything to catch fire. There will be nothing in the building that would burn except the books, and I hope to have the heat so arranged that the whole building will never be at a higher temperature than 68. The windows are so fixed that the building will be dust proof. It is situated in a park and surrounded by streets which are not much used. The windows, save those of the top, will never be opened, and it will be one of the cleanest buildings in the world. As to moisture, we went down fifty feet to get the foundations in order that there might be no dampness connected with them, and our heating arrangements are such that there will be no possible danger from dampness. Another great advantage will be the having of all the work connected with the library under one roof. As it is now we send valuable books every day from here to the government printing office to be bound. The danger of loss is in many ways great, and I tremble when I let them go."

"How about the binding of books, Mr. Spofford?"

"It is a science in itself, and all librarians should watch very carefully the binding of their volumes. It is only a man of books who knows how a book should be bound. I examine and pass upon every book that comes from the bindery, and this is now a great task. I began it when the library was small and keep it up today. There is great danger that a title will be misspelled or that the book will be improperly stitched or covered. I am strongly in favor of the binding of books in leather rather than calf and it pays to use the best of materials. Leather bound books are first laced to the boards by twine or cords, to which the leaves are sewn. The leather is pasted over this and it makes a strong and durable covering. There is a vast difference in the qualities of leather, and the best covering is a genuine Levant morocco. I do not like calfskin. It is too brittle and it breaks at the joints. The average morocco is often colored sheepskin. This is soft and easily worn out. Russia leather also breaks at the joints, while as for the shoddy substitutes for leather and calf, they ought never to be used in a public library. As to color, I am strongly in favor of red. It does not fade and it livens up the dark colored books. This question of binding books, however, is one that will admit of a great deal of discussion. As for myself, I believe that the very best binding is the cheapest in the end. I think that magazines ought always to be bound with the covers and advertisements, as these are sometimes very valuable as historical material, giving the date and price of each number, and as time goes on matter which becomes very interesting."

FRANK G. CARPENTER.

THE LEGISLATURE.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

One of the most perplexing subjects now engaging the attention of the Legislature is the payment of the costs of criminal prosecutions. For many years the Territory has practically been without a law regulating this matter, and it has come before each succeeding session of the Assembly in a more or less vexatious form, for many years. In 1874 Congress passed what has since been known as the Poland law, one provision of which expressly states that the costs of criminal prosecutions in this Territory shall be paid out of the territorial treasury. But the justices' criminal practice act makes such costs, in justices' courts, a charge against the county, while the general government has right along been paying costs in many cases of criminal prosecutions had in the district courts. The Territory has also paid for a portion of such costs, and there appears to have never been an established rule for determining what costs in district court criminal cases should be paid by the Territory, and which should be paid by the general government. It is understood that the general government has charged up to the Territory all amounts paid by the former for criminal prosecutions had under the laws of the Territory since the passage of the Poland law, and that in this way has accrued the account for about three-quarters of a million which is being made to figure as a bar to statehood for Utah.

In the various counties of the Territory, costs of justices' courts, sitting as trial courts or committing magistrates, in criminal cases, have sometimes been paid out of the county treasury and sometimes they have not. There appears to have been no established rule governing the matter save the caprice of the selectmen; consequently constables, sheriffs, justices of the peace and jurors and witnesses in the courts of the latter, have received their fees, and sometimes they have not.

Sanpete is one of the counties that have regularly paid their constables, sheriffs and justices, and the costs of criminal cases in the justices' courts, ever since the Poland law was passed; and the total amount thus expended is $12,262.70. On the 12th inst. Johnson presented in the House, a claim against the Territory for that sum. Doubtless there are other counties that could present similar or larger claims, and the question is, what is the Legislature going to do about it? A law of Congress makes criminal costs a charge against the Territory, but territorial law has provided for payment out of the territorial treasury. The officers in the several counties have, in many cases, refused to act unless the county authorities would guarantee their fees, and there the matter stands.

What is to be done in respect to the past is uncertain, but it is thought the Legislature will repudiate all state claims of this kind. But a memorial to Congress is pending in the House, asking for such a modification of the Poland law as will provide for the payment of costs in felony cases out of the Territorial treasury, and of all prosecutions for offenses less than felony, out of the county treasury.

The usual bill, which has been introduced in one house or the other of the Utah Legislature, for many successive sessions, prohibiting an insolvent assignor from designating preferred creditors, is now engaging the attention of the Council. The arguments that have killed it at one session have not been sufficient to prevent its resurrection at the next, and there is no telling where this routine will end. It is uncertain what fate the Council will decree for it.

At least one member of the House, and he is one of the ablest men in that body, is not at all satisfied with the financial showing made by the reform school. The last report of that institution shows that it costs $807.65 apiece per annum for each inmate. Of this amount $135.84 is for salaries and $29.75 for "general maintenance," mainly expenses allied to salaries, while $120.08 is expended for food, and $21.98 for clothing. The member referred to says the Territory would make money by closing the reform school and boarding the inmates at the Knutsford. He thinks that something is wrong when it costs as much for the salaries of the officials connected with the institution as it does to feed and clothe the inmates.

The bill in reference to the powers of mayors is exciting much debate in the Council. Some of the Salt Lake members are insisting that the power of the mayor, particularly in respect to removals and appointments, should be restricted within narrower limits than some of the country members are willing to agree to. The measure is awaiting the drawing of the compromise line.

THURSDAY.

At least one member of the Assembly knows how the people of his district feel in relation to the proposed financial legislation now pending. Nebeker, of Rich county, returned yesterday from a visit of several days among his constituents. A News representative met him this morning and asked: "Well, how is Rich county? Is she Democratic yet?" "Yes," answered Nebeker with emphasis, "she's Democratic yet, and she's against the mortgage tax bill too." "Why," he continued, "it was astonishing to see how the people went for me about the bills to tax mortgages, and debts secured by mortgages. 'What does the Legislature mean by tinkering with financial laws at this stage of the game, when we're just hanging on by our eyebrows?' You fellows must be a set of fools, is the way they talked to me."

It was evident that Nebeker had been given to distinctly understand how to vote on the bills of the kind referred to, should any more of them come within his reach.

In connection with this subject it may be as well to state, as a cold business fact, that one loan agent in this city now holds in his hands contracts for several loans, which have been agreed to in every respect, the only condition remaining to be determined before the money is paid over, being that the present laws affecting loans shall remain undisturbed. It is safe to say that the several parties concerned in those pending loans are awaiting, on the ragged edge of anxious solicitude, the arrival of the 60th day of the session of the present Legislature, that they may rejoice in its death.

The bill creating Carbon county has been amended in the Council by striking out the sections which provide that the county seat shall be at Price, and name the officers. The sections that remain merely provide that such a county shall be created, and define its boundaries. The bill as thus amended has been favorably reported. In connection with the subject to which this bill relates, another of a general character has been introduced in the Council, which provides that when a new county is created, the people in it shall hold an election to determine where the county seat shall be, and who shall hold the elective offices in the new county. The people of Price and Helper, the rival towns for county seat, have agreed on these two bills, and they will probably be passed.

It is becoming a matter of more uncertainty whether or not a bill creating a militia will be passed and approved at the present session. Early in the session a bill upon the subject was introduced in each house. The House militia committee some time ago introduced a substitute for both bills, but the military ardor of such members as had any seems to have cooled, and but little is heard of the subject among them. There is a spreading impression that a militia is not urgently needed in Utah just now, and that the expense of creating and maintaining it can be better borne by the people when times are better.

The claims committees of both houses are the busiest of all the committees. They are simply overcrowded with work, and more of it piles in on them every day. Bears, chairman of the House committee works like a beaver, and shows a determination to uncover any jobs that may be attempted by claimants. In this he has an able and diligent co-worker in Eldredge, chairman of the Council claims committee.

FRIDAY.

Following is the full text of the memorial introduced in the Council by Eldredge yesterday, and passed unanimously:

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:—Your memorialists, the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, respectfully petition you to repeal, modify and amend an act passed by your honorable body and approved June 23, 1874, entitled "An act relating to courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah," and known as the Poland bill, and also an act entitled "An act to amend section 25052 of the Revised Statutes of the United States," approved March 22, 1882, and also an act of Congress commonly called the Edmunds-Tucker act, which went into effect March 3, 1887, in the following respects:

First—Amend section 1 of said first mentioned act, so as to relieve the United States marshal and his deputies from the duty of attending all sessions of the Supreme Court and the district courts of said Territory, and from serving and executing all processes, writs, orders judgments and decrees, except when said courts are engaged in United States business, and in cases where the United States is a party.

Second—Amend section 2 of said first mentioned act so as to relieve the United States attorney and his assistants from appearing in the courts of said Territory, except in cases where the United States is a party.

Third—Amend section 6 of said first mentioned act so as to abrogate and take away the authority of the commissioners therein mentioned as examining and committing magistrates in all cases arising under the laws of said Territory and restore the said jurisdiction to the justices of the peace elected by the people.

Fourth—Amend section 7 of the last mentioned act, known as the Edmunds-

Tucker act, so as to abrogate and withdraw from the commissioners therein mentioned all jurisdiction in civil matters, and all jurisdiction as examining and committing magistrates, arising under the laws of said Territory.

Fifth—Repeal section 8 of said last mentioned act so as to confine the United States marshal and his deputies to the execution of the laws of the United States.

Sixth—Repeal section 12 of the said act that the people of the various counties of said Territory may be restored to their right to elect their probate judges.

Seventh—Repeal section 25 of the said last mentioned act, so as to restore to the people the right to elect a Territorial superintendent of public schools.

Eighth—The repeal, amendment and modification of the said acts and parts of acts would place the judicial department of the said Territory of Utah in harmony with that of the other territories of the United States, and greatly lessen the expense of litigation in this territory, and would in a great measure stop the constant accumulation of charges on the books of the treasury department of the United States against this Territory.

And your memorialists represent that the causes giving rise to the enactment of the said laws and parts of laws have ceased to exist, and we submit with all candor that it is a maxim of law coming down from our forefathers that when the reasons of a law ceases, the law itself should cease.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

It is not believed that any extensive changes will be made in the present school laws at this session of the Legislature, unless a change in the time and nature of school elections can be so called. The Council yesterday indicated a disposition to this effect by killing the bill known as Dr. Park's school bill. The House committee on education is considering a number of amendments to the school laws, most of which are of minor importance. One of them, however, cannot be classed as such, as it is a proposition to change the time, and probably the character, of school elections. For many years the school election was held early in July, and a few days after the close of the school year, June 30th. At such election only one out of the board of three trustees, was chosen annually, making the tenure three years. At the last session of the Legislature, a law was passed providing that the election for school trustees should be held on the same day in November as the general election, that a full board should be chosen biennially and that the newly elected trustees assume the duties of the office January 1st. The principal objections to this are that the new board takes the office in the middle of the school year, which makes the report of the year's business cover the doings of two sets of officers; the school election is not held at the same polling place as the general election, and many voters cannot vote at both on the same day; it is detrimental to school interests to put in a full board of "green" trustees. It is probable that the House committee on education will bring in a bill to make the amendments to the existing laws necessary to meet these points.

Warner's revenue bill has been thoroughly considered by the ways and means committee of the House, has been amended by that committee, and, as so amended, comprises the substitute offered yesterday. It is the most important measure pending in the Assembly, and will probably be passed.

SATURDAY.

This morning Hatch introduced in the House the resolution subjoined. Stanford is chairman of the Capitol grounds commission, and his face was a study while the resolution was being read. At the conclusion of the reading he instantly arose and said: "Mr. Speaker, I move that that resolution be tabled indefinitely!" The motion was carried by a roll call vote of 11 to 10, some of the members evidently thinking that the resolution ought to go to the Capitol grounds committee. It is as follows:

A RESOLUTION.

Abandoning the Capitol Grounds in Salt Lake City.

Whereas, the Territory of Utah is not the owner of the grounds on "Arsenal Hill," but the title is conditioned that in case of any future removal of the seat of government, the grounds, with all buildings erected thereon, will revert to Salt Lake City, and any and all monies expended in improvements will be a total loss to the people of the Territory, and

Whereas, said grounds are located three-quarters of a mile up an alley, over and beyond a hill, and on the side of a mountain that slopes in such a direction, and at such an angle, that said grounds are not visible to any inhabitant of the Territory, unless, perhaps, to a chance hunter shooting ducks on Warm Springs lake, and

Whereas, on account of the excessive altitude and the irregular conformation and perpendicularity of the said grounds, the cost of construction of any buildings will be from twenty-five to fifty per cent greater than on any suitable site, and

Whereas, owing to the natural obstacles of the location, the board of commissioners on Capitol grounds, using the utmost wisdom and economy, have been unable to make any improvements commensurate with the money appropriated and expended for such purpose; and

Whereas, The topography of the immediate vicinity and the scarcity of water, will prevent the settlement and improvement of the adjoining mountains, thereby leaving the Capitol building of the Territory remote and isolated from the Territory itself:

Resolved, by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, That the present site for the Capitol grounds is unsuitable, inadequate and unworthy;

That the further improvement of said grounds will be an extravagant, reckless and dangerous use of public money, and That said grounds should be and are hereby abandoned.

The slick bounty debate in the House yesterday afternoon was listened to by a large audience of ladies, who were ranged on either side of the Speaker's desk, and who came out in force evidently for the purpose of exerting, by their presence, a silent but potent influence in favor of the measure. For a time it was wondered whether any Democratic member would have the courage to make a speech in opposition to the bill, in the face of such an audience. But Tolton courageously led off, and after him came several other Democrats. Party lines were sharply drawn and the final vote was strictly partisan.

While Tolton's bill, H. B. 7, appropriating $300 for the redemption of court scrip in the Second district, was under consideration, the whole matter of court expenses was gone into, to some extent. Tolton showed the injustice to which jurors and witnesses were subjected in the Second district by the practical repudiation by the Territory of court scrip. Powers said in his opinion, every such promise to pay, issued by authority of the Territory, ought to be, and some time would be, redeemed. It was a shame that persons holding the Territory's obligations should be defrauded out of their pay. Ivins made remarks in the same line and Varian agreed with these gentlemen, and thought the Territory could not afford to repudiate these obligations. Allen thought a special law ought not to be passed for the relief of only one district. The debate did not produce any tangible result other than the appropriation of the small amount asked for in the bill.

The Assembly seems to have inaugurated morning sessions in earnest. It met at 10 o'clock today, and the House adjourned until that hour on Monday after a session of nearly three hours. The Council adjourned at about 12:30 today until 2 p.m., Monday; but it will doubtless commence morning sessions next week.

In explanation of his concurrent resolution which the House adopted this forenoon, authorizing the joint claims committee to employ an accountant to assist them, Sears stated that that committee was so crowded with work that it could not possibly check up certain matters without expert assistance, and that the services of a good accountant would save large sums to the Territory.

One of the bills passed by the House today, H. B. 121, is of special interest to farmers and livestock owners, living near railroads. It requires the railroad company to post up, at the first station each side of the point at which the killing occurs, a full description of animals killed by trains. Agriculturists who miss an animal can thus ascertain whether or not it has been killed on the track.

MONDAY.

One of the first items of business considered in the House was H. B. 84, Allen's bill to restore the control of elections to the county courts, which came up on minor amendments made by the Council. These were concurred in without debate, and the bill was sent to the enrollment committee. It will be engrossed and sent to the Governor as soon as practicable. It will be remembered that this bill aims to do away with the Utah Commission, but of course it will go into effect only with the consent of Congress. On approval of the bill by Congress, it will go into effect, but without such approval it will be nugatory. The question is, will Congress approve this bill, and if so, when?

The matter of leasing school lands, treated of in the report of the House committee on ways and means, given in full below, is an important one, which has not heretofore received the attention it merits. Should the House judiciary committee report in favor of the proposition that the Legislature may control the matter it is a foregone conclusion that a law will be passed providing for a generous revenue from that source, which will materially lessen the burden of taxation for the support of schools. Whether the Territory on the respective counties will have the full benefit of this revenue, or whether it will be divided, is a matter that will have to be fought out in the Assembly. Salt Lake county members will probably insist that the receipts on leases of school lands shall come to the Territorial treasury, while at least some of the country members will contend for it to go to the county treasuries.

H. B. 118, substitute for H. B. 74, Warner's general revenue bill, came up in the House as special order at 10:30 a.m. today. The first section provides a tax of three and one-fourth mills for Territorial purposes; three mills for district school purposes, to create the Territorial school fund; a county school tax not exceeding two mills, to be fixed by the county court; a general county tax not to exceed three mills, also to be fixed by county court; and a special tax for county purposes not exceeding two mills, to be levied only after an election shall be held at which a majority of the votes shall be in favor of it. Varian moved to make the Territorial school tax two mills instead of three. Without debate the motion prevailed. Hatch then moved to increase the county school tax from two to five mills, and in support of his motion said that many of the outlying counties could not maintain a free school system without a county school tax of more than two mills. The debate on Hatch's motion led some of the members to see the result of Varian's amendment and Nebeker moved to reconsider it. A debate ensued which gradually took in a wider scope, until the whole fiscal and educational policy of the Territory were under discussion. The Salt Lake county members held to the old position that the Territorial school tax resulted in injustice to the city and county, because it compelled them to help educate the children of the outlying counties, and they contended for a reduction of the rate, so as to thereby reduce that injustice. Several country members cited the fact that this city enjoyed the advantages of the University, the support of which laid a heavy burden on the whole Territory, which was an offset to any injustice Salt Lake City and county may suffer under the Territorial tax. Incidental to this issue was discussed the propriety of the state providing free higher education for its children. Ivins was opposed to its doing so. Varian agreed with him as to principle, but said the University existed and must be maintained. Nearly every member who referred to this phase of the question agreed with Ivins. Several country members insisted that the territorial school tax must not be made less than three mills, for if it were, many counties could not maintain free schools more than two terms in the year. Allen said it was unusual for a state tax to be levied for the support of schools, and held that each county should sustain its own schools, though he would favor a small territorial tax to assist them. Parsons took a similar position. Hubbard thought the strong should aid the weak and the country members generally were with him. Nebeker's motion to reconsider the vote by which Varian's amendment was carried, making the territorial school tax two instead of three mills, prevailed by a vote of 16 to 7. This means the House is determined to keep up the rate of the territorial school tax, that the weaker counties may derive help from Salt Lake county for school purposes.

Names of counties and amounts received from the leasing of school lands:

Box Elder, 1892 and 1893.....	$ 664 00
Davis, 1893.....	765 00
Piute, 1893.....	38 00
Tooele, 1893.....	162 00
Utah, 1892 and 1893.....	1,802 00
Sanpete, 1892, $1,884.65; 1893, $1,410.61.....	2,795 25
Sevier, 1893.....	405 20
Salt Lake, 1893.....	366 00
Rich, 1893.....	188 80
Wayne, 1893.....	47 75
Weber, 1893.....	1 20
Emery, 1892, $215.26; 1893, $94 17.....	340 43
Total.....	$7,526 23

TUESDAY.

The mutterings of discontent in regard to the reform school become more pronounced among members of the Legislature as the financial condition of the Territory and the extent of the demands upon its treasury become better understood. The almost universal feeling in the Assembly is that the cost of the institution is out of proportion to the benefits derived from it. It is stated as a fact that a measure will be introduced into the Council shortly, providing for the removal of the inmates of the reform school to the insane asylum at Provo, where plenty of room can be made for them, and the closing of the former institution. It is argued that both the boys and the girls could be profitably employed in and about the asylum, the former on the farm and the latter in the kitchen, laundry, etc.; and that such an arrangement would redound to their benefit and to that of the asylum, and make a great saving to the Territory.

Powers's bill to place the police and fire departments of cities on a non-partisan basis was considered in the House yesterday, amended and passed. One of the amendments provided that one member of the board, appointed by the mayor, should serve till Jan. 1, 1896, and the other till Jan. 1, 1896, and that they should draw lots for the long and short terms; and so with the two chosen by the city council. Another amendment provided that there should at no time be on said board more than two members of the same political party. Still another amendment exempts from the removal powers of the board present incumbents of the offices of chief of police and chief engineer of the fire department, until the expiration of their terms. Wines offered an amendment, which was adopted, excluding cities having less than 12,000 inhabitants from the operations of the bill. Powers opposed the amendment, declaring that Logan wanted the bill to apply to her, but Wines said Provo did not. There was no opposition to the bill, and not a vote was cast against it in the House. It remains to be seen what the Council will do with it.

The militia bill, which was read at length in the House yesterday afternoon, appears to have been modeled after the accepted form of the military code in other states. It provides that all males, subject to military duty, shall be enrolled by the county assessor, and that the Governor, who is made commander-in-chief, may, by proclamation, require such a portion of the enrollment to be organized for active duty, as he may see fit. In practice, however, the militia would be a volunteer organization, except in time of trouble. The organized militia is to be known as the Utah National Guard, and in time of peace and until Jan. 1, 1896, shall consist of not more than three regiments of infantry of twelve companies each, two of cavalry, and two batteries of light artillery, "all of which shall be organized under the direction of the commander-in-chief." "Field officers of battalions and regiments shall be elected by ballot by the commissioned officers" by the various regiments and batteries, "and line officers shall be elected in like manner by the members of their respective companies," etc. The term of enlistment is three years, and an annual training of eight days is required. It is claimed that the expense to the territorial treasury of organizing the militia will not exceed $3000. The fact is not generally known that the government will provide the arms, ammunition, etc. Up to 1889 there had been placed to the credit of Utah, by successive congressional appropriations, the sum of $75,057.05, to be used for supplying the militia of the Territory, when it should be organized, with ordnance and quartermaster's stores, etc., and it is thought the necessary books, records, stationery, blanks, etc., can be obtained from the general government. Each militiaman would have to pay for his own uniform, and the Territory would have to bear the expenses of the annual training, such as transportation, subsistence and the per diem of officers and men, which would amount to a large sum. Omitting the annual training, and the militia would not be a heavy tax on the public treasury. The bill is now lying on the table subject to being called up at any time.

The Council has under consideration several bills changing the present laws relating to real estate. One is to extend the time of redemption under mortgage sale, another is to prevent a mortgage from being deemed a conveyance regardless of its terms, etc. The introduction and consideration of this class of bills adds to the unrest and distrust in financial circles, the almost universal opinion in those circles being that such legislation should not be attempted nor agitated at the present time.

A UTAH DELEGATE SPEAKS.

The San Francisco Chronicle of Saturday last, in giving an account of the proceedings of the Trans-mississippi congress in that city the day before shows that Hon. Moses Thatcher took a prominent part in the discussion as a delegate from this Territory. On the Nicaragua canal resolution he is reported as follows: "Delegate Thatcher of Utah briefly stated his opposition to corporate control or government partnership in corporate control. Utah's vote would be cast for the amendment.

"It was late when the Utah gentleman ceased speaking, but so great was the interest in the debate that the congress took a recess until 2 o'clock instead of until 2 o'clock."

He also took a bold stand against a slight opposition to the admission of Utah as a state and when resolutions condemning the action of President Cleveland on the Hawaiian question were introduced he was again heard from as the following extract: "These resolutions brought Shanahan of Shasta to his feet in condemnation of them as partisan. He defended the action of President Cleveland as did also Delegate Thatcher of Utah."

ARRESTED FOR EMBEZZLEMENT.

There was a sensational and unexpected arrest made at the door of one of the Territorial Legislative committee rooms in the Wasatch building in this city February 16. The arresting officer was Captain John J. Donovan of the city police force, and the individual taken into custody was Councilor Hague, cashier of the First National Bank of Nephi.

The arrest was made on a charge of embezzlement preferred by Zeph T. Hill, national bank examiner, whose investigations into the accounts of the bank of which Mr. Hague was cashier, caused him to take that step.

It was recently discovered that Mr. Hague was short in his accounts to the amount, it is said, of $28,000. A meeting of the directors was held and Mr. Hague turned over 12,000 head of sheep and a large amount of other property and it was thought the adjustment would prove satisfactory, but it appears that such was not the case and the arrest followed.

Bondsmen were secured February 17th in the persons of Theodore Bruback, of the Sanpete Valley railway, and A. W. McCune and W. P. Read, of the Salt Lake City Railway company. The bond was for $15,000 and was executed in time to allow Mr. Hague to take his seat in the Council February 17. His friends say that the crisis is passed, that everything has been made good and developments will disclose the fact that the whole affair has been greatly magnified and that the arrest was unnecessary.

RUSHING MATTERS.

The eagerness of the Colorado people to grab the Indian lands and force the aborigines remaining in that state over into Utah, regardless of the rights and feelings of the people of this Territory, is shown by the following from the Denver News of yesterday:

A Colorado Topolobampo was ushered into existence yesterday through the agency of the secretary of state's office. The organization is baptized "The Colorado Co-operative company." Its object is to effect a permanent lodgment on the Ute lands in the southern part of the state and there found an asylum for a community in which all shall be upon an equality and landlords and money lenders will be unknown. The company is capitalized at $100,000. Its franchise is as broad as the franchise the Tramway company is contending for in the supreme court. The objects are "to attend to production, distribution, construction, sanitation, commerce, exchange, education and entertainment."

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13.—The problem of settling the Uintah and Uncompaghe Indians of Utah has engaged the attention of the House committee on Indian affairs for some time.

Rawlins, Utah, has a bill before the committee by which the Indians will be given lands in severalty, eighty acres for each head of family, and forty acres each for the others. He proposes that the remainder of the land be thrown open to settlement, the settler to be allowed 160 acres at $1.25. Mineral lands and lands containing timber of commercial value, will be excluded from the plan and governed by existing laws. The Uintahs hold 2,300,000 acres, and the Uncompaghees 1,700,000, or 2,800 acres for each Indian.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 13.—On March 1st Harvard College observatory will start an expedition to Arizona to locate a new observatory station. A. E. Douglas, assistant in the Cambridge observatory, will leave before the other members of the expedition, in order to make experiments. It will first stop at Prescott and at Phoenix. The station will be for a visional investigation.

CHICAGO, Feb. 12.—A genuine blizzard set in here last night and continues unabated. A fierce gale sweeps from the northeast, accompanied by wet, blinding snow, which is piling up in drifts in the streets, delaying the incoming trains and blocking the street car traffic. It is the worst of the winter and is steadily increasing in violence.

At Hammond, Ind., the snow is two feet deep, and still falling, and drifting badly. The street cars are tied up. At Ottumwa, Iowa, the heaviest blizzard of the season is reported. The snow is fifteen inches deep, and drifting badly. The temperature is at zero.

At Rockford, Ill., the blizzard has raged all day.

Emporia, Kan.—Reports come of the worst storm ever known. The snow is two feet deep and has drifted to twenty feet in places. Railroad traffic is stopped. Trains are snowed in in various places. Thousands of head of cattle were exposed and a great portion of them will die of hunger and exposure. At Marshalltown, Iowa, it has been snowing and drifting since early last night and there is no abatement. At Burlington, Iowa, it began last night, and continues still. There are immense snow drifts. All trains are delayed; it is the worst storm in years. At Keokuk, Iowa, the blizzard has been raging since last night and the snow is badly drifted.

ROME, Feb. 12.—The pope has issued a decree beatifying Joan of Arc.

ATCHISON, Kas., Feb. 12.—The police today took Mrs. Franklin out of a car of household goods billed to Omaha, in which she had been beating her way from Decatur, Ill. She had $25, and had been put on the car by her husband, who did not want to pay car fare. She had been in the car three days and was nearly frozen.

LONDON, Feb. 13.—The house of commons was thronged today in anticipation of an important movement against the house of lords.

Harcourt, replying to a question by Goschen, said there was no intention of reopening the Indian mints or returning to the minimum rate for council bills. There was also no intention to place a tax on the importation of silver—no change in the present Indian policy was contemplated.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 12.—A special to the Republic from Guthrie, O. T., says: The snow is two feet deep. Reports of suffering and death come in from all parts of the territory. Mrs. Fanny C. Spencer, a homesteader near Cross, was found frozen stiff. Many are living in tents and their condition is awful. James Milligan, near Perry was found frozen to death and his partner, Harvey Newcomb, died from exposure.

At Ponca Mr. Cramer and two children were found frozen stiff in coyote's burrows, ten yards from their abode.

At Anadarko, two Indian pupils were found yesterday buried under a snow bank. Upon being taken to a house one of the children immediately expired. The other shows signs of recovery.

Word comes from Cross that Sherman Stone and family, consisting of wife and five children, were found sitting around the stove with their throats cut from ear to ear. The following note, on the table near Stone gives the horrible story of murder and suicide in connection with the storm:

"Wood all gone; Mollie frozen to death; the rest of us freezing; I have killed my family and now kill myself to prevent further suffering. God have mercy on us."

Dispatches from Niagara announce an ice bridge formed and solidified. In the passage of the ice down the river a great amount of timber is brought down and is frozen tight in the bridge. It is unusual to have a bridge form in February.

PARIS, Feb. 12.—A young man, acting from motives of revenge, exploded a bomb at 9 o'clock tonight in a cafe beneath the Terminus hotel, opposite the St. Lazare railroad station. The place was full of people at the time.

A man who had dined in the cafe was seen to raise his arm and throw something into the middle of the room. A terrific explosion followed. The cafe was filled with smoke, and lying on the floor were a number of persons wounded. The bomb had landed upon a table, around which a party had been sitting. The persons grouped at this table suffered the most. The injured numbered fifteen. Nearly all were wounded in the legs.

Meantime the man responsible for the cowardly act had not been allowed to escape. As soon as he had thrown the bomb he ran out of the place and darted away. The alarm was given and a number of policemen joined in the chase.

The fugitive drew a revolver and fired several shots, killing a woman and wounding a number of persons. One man struck was a policeman and the wound is considered fatal.

The man was captured when 150 yards from the cafe. His name is Leon Breton. He had been employed in the cafe as a waiter, but had been discharged for misconduct.

The sufferers from the explosion and Breton's revolver shots number twenty-eight. An inquiry was begun by the militia and magistrates and continued till 1:15 o'clock this morning.

LONDON, Feb. 12.—A dangerous "crank," Harry Carter, was remanded at Bow street charged with writing a letter threatening to kill the queen. Carter has already spent nine years in a lunatic asylum.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 13.—Dr. Arthur Duestrow walked into the police station shortly before 7 o'clock this evening and surrendered himself, stating he had accidentally shot his wife. Duestrow was locked up, and it was learned later that the doctor had shot both his wife and five-year-old boy. The child was killed, but the wife is still alive.

CHICAGO, Feb. 11.—Miss Myra Bradwell, the first woman to be admitted to the bar in the United States, is dying. Her attending physicians declare that she cannot live more than a few hours.

KOKOMO, Ind., Feb. 13.—Calvin Armstrong, the Tipton county deputy treasurer, convicted of embezzling $43,000 of the county's funds, escaped jail here last night. He was not missed till this morning. He was to have been taken to the penitentiary this morning. He had accomplices outside.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14.—The secretary of the interior has issued instructions to the commissioner of the general land office concerning the latter's recommendation that the re-survey of the Las Vegas grant in New Mexico be rejected. He has directed that a final, complete survey of the grant be made in accordance with a recent departmental decision, as speedily as may be, that the so long delayed matter may be closed.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 14.—A frightful affair occurred last night at Col. Daniel Boone's wild animal show at the Midwinter Fair. Carlo Hieman, an attendant, had taken three large, trained lions into a cage in the center of the arena, when suddenly the electric lights went out, followed by screams of agony from the cage, and sounds of horrible crunching of the beasts' jaws. The audience became panic-stricken, women screamed and fainted. Finally lights were secured and the dreadful sight was revealed of three lions gnawing at the prostrate form of Hieman. Col. Boone snatched up an iron bar and with rare intrepidity entered the cage, beat the beasts off, and rescued the keeper. Hieman was found to have forty wounds, some of which came perilously near a vital spot. His scalp was torn entirely off, and he had deep wounds under the arms and on the legs and body where the animals' teeth had lacerated him. In spite of all this the physicians think that, unless blood poisoning sets in, he may recover.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 14.—The returns received at the treasury department indicate that the gold output for 1893 in the United States will reach the almost unprecedented amount of $37,000,000, an increase over 1892 of $4,000,000. In Colorado the output has increased from $3,000,000 in 1892 to $5,000,000 in 1893, while the grains in gold-producing sections are unusually large. The Australian production will carry the production of the world, it is thought, to $150,000,000, which is $12,000,000 more than the previous year. With one or two exceptions this is the largest output ever known.

ST. PETERSBURG, Feb. 14.—The editorial staff of the Warsaw newspaper Glos and the staff of another newspaper have been arrested. There have been numerous domiciliary visits at Warsaw during the last few days, owing to the discovery of an extensive nihilist society. A number of Catholic priests have been arrested on a charge of conducting an agitation for liberation of the Poles. The bishop of Kallinski has been deprived of his sinend.

NEW YORK, Feb. 15.—The jury in the case of John Y. McKane, the Gravesend political boss, charged with violation of the election laws, frauds in registration and at the election, and defying the court's orders intended to prevent frauds in the conduct of polling, returned into court this morning with a verdict of guilty.

WASHINGTON, D.C., Feb. 15.—Judge Bradley of the district supreme court has refused to grant the petition of L. Riker, Chicago, for a mandamus to compel the secretary of the treasury to award him the fifty thousand bond issue on his bid.

RIO JANEIRO, Feb. 15.—Minister of War Galvao has resigned on account of differences with Peixoto on the treatment of political prisoners. Col. Macedoe, commander at Fort Santa Cruz, has been arrested as a spy of Admiral Mello. The rebels have possession of the state of Parana. San Paulo, the capital of the state of that name, against which the rebels have been marching, is reported ready to join the insurgents, and the garrison there has been replaced by reliable troops. So the rebel advance has changed and they are now said to be marching directly on Rio Janeiro. The government has sent troops to meet them and a battle is imminent. It is reported that the state of Alagoas has joined the rebels. Mello is said to have recovered and is now in active command, preparing an attack on Santos.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 15.—The twenty-sixth annual convention of the National Woman's Suffrage association assembled here today. Only seventeen states were represented, but many delegates who are snowbound will come later.

LOS ANGELES, Cal., Feb. 16.—The Southern Pacific train was robbed this morning at Roscoe Sliding, where the train was held up six weeks ago. The robbers misplaced a switch and ditched the engine and two cars with fruit. The engineer and fireman went down with the engine and were badly hurt. Three robbers sprang out of the bushes and began a fusillade of shots. The express messenger refused to open the car and the robbers blew the whole side off with bombs. Brakeman Foster ran to a neighboring ranch and got a team. He drove five miles to Burbank, and gave the alarm. A posse is in pursuit.

CHICOPEE, Mass., Feb. 16.—J. and F. Dubuque, descendants of a Frenchman who settled in Iowa in 1758 where the city of Dubuque now stands, have engaged lawyers to look up their interests in his estate, which they claim is worth $48,000,000. It is asserted that he left no will. There are about thirty relatives who would share in the estate.

PARIS, Feb. 16.—Ex-Minister Waldeck Rousseau and Count Frisch De Fels, fought a duel with swords this morning as the result of a slighting remark by the former in regard to Countess De Fels. The ex-minister was slightly wounded in the arm.

LONDON, Feb. 15.—A Frenchman, supposed to have been an anarchist, was blown almost to pieces tonight in Greenwich park. Near by were found fragments of a bottle that evidently had contained explosive material. The park-keeper heard the report, and, hastening thither, found the man kneeling on the floor, covered by blood. His hand and wrist had been blown away. His face and body were covered with wounds, and there was a gaping wound in the stomach, a portion of the intestines protruding. He was only able to say: "Take me home." Where his home was could not be learned from the papers found in his pockets, and he was therefore conveyed to the seamen's hospital. He died half an hour after reaching there.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 16.—Peckham's nomination was rejected, 31 to 40.

LANCASTER, Pa., Feb. 16.—Ex-Congressman A. Horr Smith died today, aged 79 years. He served from the 43rd to the 48th Congress.

KIEL, Feb. 16.—A terrible disaster occurred here today through the explosion of a steam pipe on the iron clad Brandenburg. Many of the crew are said to have been killed and a large number of them wounded. Many are missing.

CAPTOWN, Feb. 16.—The death of King Lobengula is confirmed.

QUEENSTOWN, Feb. 16.—The American line steamship Paris, which sailed from Southampton on Feb. 10th for New York, was seen in a disabled condition off Daunt's Rock. All were well on board. There was no danger. A pilot and tug have gone for her assistance.

PARIS, Feb. 16.—Rothschild's bank in this city is guarded by an extra police force as the result of anarchist placards posted up on the door of the bank announcing that a meeting of the society will be held inside the building and requesting the brethren skilful in the blacksmith trade to bring skeleton keys and crowbars in case the safes be locked.

RIO JANEIRO, Feb. 16.—The yellow fever increases. There were sixty deaths yesterday in addition to fifteen from other fevers.

The captain of the Austrian warship in these waters died today and there are a number of other cases on board. The Portuguese warship here is also infected. The situation is growing serious for foreigners.

NEBRASKA CITY, Neb., Feb. 16.—J. Sterling Morton, secretary of agriculture, and his youngest son, Carl, were hanged in effigy last night in the city park, and this morning the figures whirled about before the strong north wind. The stuffed clothing bore a placard which stated, in effect, that the figures represented the remains of the Nebraska City Democratic marching club. The city has been greatly excited all day over the affair, and strenuous efforts are being made to discover the guilty parties.

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 16.—A bold robbery was committed early this morning at Carroll's gambling house. The place was deserted, with the exception of two attendants, when the door was flung open by two masked men, who compelled the men at the point of pistols to hold up their hands while the robbers opened the safe and secured $4,000 in coin, which they placed in a canvas sack and made off. The attendants went to a window and called lustily for help and two police on the sidewalk grappled with one of the robbers. In the scuffle which ensued the gold coin flew in all directions and the crowd drawn to the scene by the noise reaped a rich harvest. One robber was arrested and the other escaped.

CHICAGO, Feb. 16.—Judge Brentano, who tried Prendergast, Mayor Harrison's assassin, has received a letter threatening his life, unless he is lenient with the prisoner. The officers guarded him today while hearing the arguments for a new trial.

PITTSBURG, Feb. 17.—The jury in the cases of the Mansfield Valley miners, charged with riot, who retired to consider a verdict last night, came into court this morning finding 37 guilty and 21 innocent.

BUFFALO, Feb. 17.—Leroy Harris, alias John H. Heart, accused of post-office robbery, performed a remarkable feat this afternoon, holding up the whole court room. Heart asked permission to retire to the lavatory and returning, electrified the commission and all in the room by leveling a revolver and crying: "Hands up!" Everybody put up his hands. Heart walked to the door keeping the gun pointed toward the astonished court and passed out, locking the door and taking the key. Marshal Watts jumped to the window and fired three shots to attract attention. Others were yelling lustily. Finally the janitor was aroused who opened the door and released the captives. The prisoner was out of sight.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 17.—John W. Hayes, general secretary and treasurer of the Knights of Labor, today issued the following notice to the order:

"T. D. Powderly, past general master workman, A. W. Wright and John Devlin, late general executive board, have entered suit against the order for balances of salary which they claim is due them. Notice is published to prevent any credence being given unreliable statements that may be made in the public press. If by decree of the court it is learned that the order is indebted in any way to these claimants the order is and will be fully able to meet any just claims.

JOHN W. HAYES,

General Secretary and Treasurer."

TUCSON, Ariz., Feb. 16.—Governor Hughes yesterday offered a reward of $5,000 for Kid, the renegade Apache, dead or alive. The governor, for the last three months, has been devising means by which he could be taken.

Mrs. Annie Larsen, the stewardess at the Oakland, Cal., receiving hospital, died on Friday from the effects of poison taken by accident. She was sick but a few hours before she passed away.

CONFERENCES OF THE CHURCH.

MORGAN STAKE.

The quarterly conference of Morgan Stake convened Sunday and Monday the 11th and 12th of this month, commencing Sunday morning at 10:30, Elder Fry presiding.

After the usual exercises, Elder Samuel Francis reported the condition of the Stake. The report showed the Stake to be in a much better condition than when last reported, and that the Priesthood as well as the Saints had been more energetic during the past three months. There is more unity and less difficulty existing in the Stake than usual.

The following Elders who had been called on missions to preach the Gospel to the world, being called on, stated their feelings in regard to the same: Joseph S. Porter, James Tucker, Lyman O. Porter, Alonzo Francis and William T. Ogden. The Elders all expressed themselves as being pleased to be considered worthy of such an important calling. They felt to respond to the call and would try by the help of the Lord to be faithful workers in the ministry.

The remaining time of the conference was occupied by the Stake presidency, Elders Croft and Condie, returned missionaries, and others of the local Priesthood.

The counsel given was very timely and instructive. The young especially received good counsel, in which they were advised to be more prudent in their course of life, to spend less time in pleasure and amusement and to labor and study more to prepare themselves for future usefulness.

The following Elders for various callings were sustained by the conference: James W. Stewart and Robert Hogg Jr. as High Counselors; Frank L. Little as second counselor to Bishop Giles, of Milton, and Samuel Francis, Thomas R. Condie, Chas. A. Wilcox, Alonzo Francis, Wm. G. Brough, S. R. Brough, Joseph R. Porter, Jesse Haven and Gibson A. Condie to travel and lecture in the interest of the Y. M. M. I. A. of the Stake.

All the meetings of the conference were well attended and a good spirit and feeling prevailed.

Conference adjourned for three months. ALONZO FRANCIS, Clerk.

BANNOCK STAKE.

On Sunday, February 11th, the quarterly conference of the Bannock Stake convened at Louisville. There were present of the Stake presidency, President T. E. Ricks and Counselor James E. Steele, also some of the members of the High Council and most of the Bishops.

In consideration of the severe weather, President Ricks was pleased with the attendance, and trusted all would be fully repaid for attending.

During the forenoon several of the Bishops reported their wards, all of which are in a healthy condition and the people endeavoring to live their religion. Owing to a heavy falling off in the crops last fall, some few families short of breadstuff, but the most of the people have plenty, and those who do not will be provided for.

During the afternoon Elders Ben E. Rich, C. N. Watkins, Henry Boyce and Jonathan Love addressed the Saints on the duties and calling of the ward Teachers, also on educating our children in the principles of the Gospel.

The afternoon was occupied by Elder J. E. Steele on the subject of the present financial troubles and the introduction of the law of consecration. Patriarchs A. E. Hinckley and John R. Poole occupied the remainder of the time, teaching the people on their every day duties.

In the evening the general Priesthood meeting was held, at which the Stake presidency, instructed the Bishops to discountenance all manner of amusements that had a tendency to lead the youth into evil and temptations; also gave much counsel specially suited to the wants of the people.

On Monday morning Elder Heber J. Grant, of the council of the Apostles, arrived. Owing to a snow blockade on the railroad he had been prevented from being present the day previous. He occupied most of the forenoon, speaking on the general good desires of the Latter-day Saints, and that when mistakes were made they were often of the head and not of the heart; he presented the matter of sustaining home industries and the great saving the people would experience in price and quality; warned the people against being self-righteous because of being able to live up to one law while they neglected others equally important; cited several instances of brethren who, through inherited appetites, were unable to fully live certain laws, yet had the full power and authority of God with them.

During the afternoon he dwelt on the marvelous manner in which the Lord, in answer to prayer and the promises of His servants, had opened up the way for His people to free themselves from their difficulties, and told of his own experiences.

Elder T. E. Ricks spoke on the great labors performed by the fathers of the people in settling these valleys and of the honorable lineage and names they had bequeathed to their posterity.

Conference adjourned for three months.

Benediction by Patriarch A. E. Hinckley.

JAMES GILLESPIE, Stake Clerk.

SANPETE STAKE.

The Conference of the Sanpete Stake of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was held in Ephraim on the 10th and 11th of February, 1894, President Canute Peterson presiding. The Stake presidency were present, most of the High Councilors, the Bishops of wards were well represented and the attendance was quite large, the Ephraim tabernacle being well filled the first meeting, the interest visibly increasing as conference proceeded.

Opened at 10 a. m. on the 10th by singing and prayer.

President Peterson reported the condition of the Stake as being good; peace and good health generally prevail.

There have been quite a few deaths of aged people, but he thought it no cause for excessive mourning when the aged pass away after a life of toil, especially those who have been faithful till death. The several quorums of the Priesthood and the societies in the Stake are properly organized.

The Bishops of Manti, south Mayfield, Fountain Green and Fairview wards made reports corroborating the president's report. Elder W. S. Snow, of the presidency of the High Priests' quorum gave a brief report of the same. Elder John F. Allred gave a very good report of the young men's associations; and Elder Newton Noyes, principal of the Sanpete Stake Academy, spoke in behalf of that institution, and of the efficient work being done therein, although not very numerously attended. Recess till 2 p.m.

2 p.m. Elder McAllister, President of the Manti Temple, gave a very interesting and instructive discourse upon the labors developing upon the Saints in relation to the dead, also of the living receiving ordinances for themselves and the young of marriageable age to marry, and the necessity of marrying right according to the law of God; that of marriages performed outside the law of God there is no record kept in heaven.

Eighteen Seventies and seven Elders, whose names were presented, were sustained to be ordained High priests.

Adjourned to 10 a.m. Sunday.

7 p.m.—Priesthood meeting. Elder Henry Beal, President Peterson, Bishop Madsen and Elder C. C. A. Christensen addressed the meeting upon the advisability of providing for our own necessities.

Sunday, 10 a. m.—The Saints met at the appointed time. Having made the appointment to dedicate the Ephraim Tabernacle during the forenoon services it was thought best to proceed with the dedication although it had been expected and announced that some of the First Presidency would be present.

Opened by singing the hymn commencing "The morning breaks, the shadows flee."

President Canute Peterson offered the dedicatory prayer.

Singing.

Elder John B. Maiben, of the Stake Presidency, discoursed upon the blessings the people of this stake enjoy. He had felt some disappointment in not being blessed with the promised visit, but was singularly impressed by the appropriateness of the dedicatory prayer offered by President Peterson. He said this people are blessed of the Lord. The presidency of this Stake, from its first organization until today, remained intact. The Lord has surely blessed Bro. Peterson both as Bishop of the Ephraim ward and as President of the Sanpete Stake.

Elders F. Farnsworth, Peter Madsen, John D. Chase and Henry Beal each gave short and spirited addresses.

Recess to 2 p.m.

2 p.m. Opened by singing and prayer.

Sacrament administered.

Elder J. B. Maiben presented the general and stake authorities. All were sustained unanimously.

President Peterson thanked the con gregation for their vote; called on those present who had been sustained to manifest their willingness to serve the people by rising and raising their right hands; cheerfully responded to.

Elder Maiben expressed his appreciation of the labors of President McAllister in the Temple; urged the Saints to show their appreciation by putting in an appearance there as often as possible.

Bishop Peterson made remarks, appreciative of the blessings enjoyed.

Elder Henry Beal was pleased to meet with the Saints in conference and to speak to them; thought the influence prevailing most heavenly.

Elder Peterson made closing remarks. He had enjoyed the conference the Spirit of the Lord had been abundantly poured out upon the people, though none of the general authorities had been present, he hoped we would be amply rewarded for the disappointment at our next conference; exhorted the Saints to take the spirit of the conference home with them and endeavor to live according to it, and for all, young, middle-aged and those more advanced, to preserve their bodies that they may live long on the earth. Our bodies are of great worth to us. The Lord prepared this earth so we might come here and receive bodies; hence we may rightly infer He considers our bodies of great consequence to us. Advised the Saints not to cry hard times too much, but live near to the Lord and all will be well.

After singing on page 268, benediction was pronounced by Elder McAllister.

Conference adjourned for three months to meet in Mantl.

GEORGE TAYLOR, Clerk.

BEAR LAKE STAKE.

Bear Lake Stake conference convened as per appointment at Paris, Idaho, on Saturday and Sunday, Feb. 3, and 4, 1894; Elder Wm. Budge, Stake president, presiding.

SATURDAY, AT 10 A. M.

Meeting opened with the customary devotional exercises. Elder Budge expressed his pleasure at meeting with the Saints and elaborated upon the objects of and benefits accruing from these conferences. He spoke of the autonomy and independence within themselves of the organizations of the Church.

Elder Wm. Hyman, of Liberty, remarked in substance that as the Saints had been so imbued with God's Spirit, it was very necessary that the Elders instructing them should speak under its influence. Rejoiced at being here. True, it was a sacrifice to come quite a distance through the cold, but he expected to be more than rewarded before the close of the conference. Knew that God had blessed these assemblies. The influence of His Spirit he had, for himself, enjoyed. God had always justified the confidence and reliance reposed in Him by His people.

Bishop Elder McKimmins of Randolph said he felt that God's Spirit had dictated the previous speakers' remarks and that the hearts of the people had been lighted thereby. Thanked God for living in the day of the restoration of the Gospel and its gifts, blessings and Priesthood. God's servants were never more deeply impressed with their high and holy calling than now. Thanked God for being gathered to Zion. Could not recount their manifold goodness to him. Felt that his every effort should be exerted to repay, in his weak way, the loving kindness of the Author of our being.

While all men desire to worship some greater power, we know that God lives and has revealed His plan for the salvation and exaltation of mankind—those who now live, have lived, or may live to the end of time and worlds without end. Prayed God to bless all and cause all to be thankful for their attendance at this conference.

A hymn, "O, Jesus the Giver, etc.," was rendered by the Stake choir.

Bishop Robert Price, of Paris Second ward, said the Saints do not meet to be taught of man except so far as they act by the authority imposed upon them by God. By this authority only should those who essay to teach the people operate. But for this divine authority we would have no gospel, no priesthood, no ordinances. God has prospered us, he said, in these mountains, changed our climate and helped us in the reclamation of the soil from its sterility. Many of us have brought with us the follies and traditions of Babylon, and, like the ancient Israelites, we long for the fleshpots of Egypt. We cherish too much the things which lead to death. Our youth, and, alas! some of our older people, fall into various pitfalls and snares. The clear duty of the Elder of Israel is to labor for the dignity and righteousness of Zion.

Elder Jos. R. Shepherd, of Paris, observed that the absentees of this morning had missed much valuable instruction. Regretted that some of the local brethren were negligent of their opportunity.

After Elder Budge had given a few suitable remarks regarding order in public associations, the choir sang:

O ye mountains high,

Elder Wm. Greenhaigh, of Bountiful, pronounced the benediction.

SATURDAY, 2 P. M.

The choir and congregation sang:

Come let us anew.

Then the divine blessings were supplicated for by Bishop Wm. West, of Paris.

Following a choral exercise Elder Samuel Weston, of Lake Town, related some of his experiences gained during his labors recently performed in the British mission.

Elder John U. Stuckie reported the quorum of High Priests in good working order. Meetings are held monthly at headquarters and also in the districts. Nearly all are in active service as High Councilors, Bishops, Councilors and missionaries in the Stake.

The First quorum of Elders was reported by their President, Elder Geo. Perret.

Elder Wm. L. Rich, of the Stake presidency, said we should appreciate the spirit prevailing in this conference. He reminded the Saints that, in answer to their fasting and prayers, God had softened men's hearts, and their rights and property had to a very great extent been restored. If we continue to be faithful He will help us to bear the burdens of life and to maintain our honor and dignity unsullied before all men.

Elder George Osmond, president of the Star Valley Stake, then addressed the conference.

Elder James H. Hart, of the Stake presidency, followed with a brief address.

The choir sang "Watch and Pray" and Elder Andrew Galloway pronounced the benediction.

SUNDAY, 10 A. M.

The choir sang:

Thou earth wast once a glorious sphere.

Prayer was offered by Elder Joseph Irwin.

The choir sang:

Come, come ye Saints.

Elder William Budge addressed the Saints. He remarked that we are not so much in the habit now as formerly of preaching doctrinal discourses. Especially is this the case with those who are directly connected with the local government of the Saints. Our older people are tolerably well informed as a rule and the young people have very many opportunities in the several organizations to acquire knowledge regarding the fundamental principles of the Gospel. Our teaching tends now to inform us how to live as individuals, families and neighbors, and how to remove any obstacles that may impede that excellent progress and fellowship that should characterize communities of Saints. There is an ideal life prescribed in the Gospel to which we should all aspire.

Speaking of the political situation, he said he had favored the proper education of the people in the political principles of the several parties. Had told the Bishops in the several wards to accord for the benefit of the political parties, without asking whether they be Democrats or Republicans, the free use of their meeting house whenever they would desire an evening meeting. But as a father of the people he must insist that all engaged in such labors cease from talking against their brethren and creating strife. So long as these meetings are carried on decently and in order, he advised the people to attend. But if this is not the case, they had better not go. So far as his influence goes, he desired no repetition of the troubles that have ensued from political dissensions elsewhere to find place in any of the wards of this Stake. We must keep in mind that we are Latter-day Saints, and required to be such, in political controversy as in other things.

Our religion teaches us to be loyal to the government under which we live. Our loyalty is stronger for the government because of our religion.

The choir sang the anthem:

Praise ye the Father.

Elder Wm. L. Rich pronounced the benediction.

AT 2 P. M.,

After the choir and congregation had sang,

O God, our help in ages past,

Counselor James H. Hart offered prayer.

The choir sang,

Stars of morning, shout for joy.

The sacrament was administered by the Priesthood of Paris First and Second wards.

Elder M. D. Wells, of Montpelier, made a brief address, treating upon the benefits and privileges enjoyed by our young people in the several organizations of the Church, and bearing testimony to the saving efficacy of the principles that are enunciated and espoused by the Latter-day Saints.

Elder Seymour B. Young, of the Council of the Seventies, next addressed the conference. Quoted Isaiah 2nd chapter, and showed that the prophecy contained therein had been fulfilled by the gathering of the Saints to these intermountain states and territories. He also commented on the life of our Lord and Savior and gave an exposition of the principles of the Gospel as contained in the Scriptures. He gave much good, old-time practical counsel to the Saints.

After a few concluding remarks by Elder William Budge the choir sang,

In Jewry is God known.

Patriarch Hugh Findlay pronounced the benediction.

Written for this Paper.

THE ETHICS OF TRADE.

Owing to the almost bewildering conditions now generally prevailing, everyone is scanning the horizon of observation and experience for a rift or change. The past is considered, its mistakes and errors, its methods and results, as if wisdom might be reaped from these and avoidance in the future. The present is so absorbing with others that the past is ignored—the question is how shall we extricate ourselves now, how save our reputation, our means, or shall we be entirely stripped after years of toil?

Quite a few have so earnestly looked at both past and present, that the future alone is worth considering. Every indication, legislative, industrial, commercial or speculative, commands attention. Things abroad, things national and local, possess a weight and importance never before awarded. A cloud is magnified, a gleam of sunshine is cherished as a miser does his gold. More is made of both than experience would suggest. But some are hopeful, some dependent and the spectacle men are wearing individually have very much to do with their conclusions.

Every organization also has its say, and most of them a panacea for the conditions. But boards of trade, chambers of commerce, merchants' associations, have as yet really presented nothing particularly new. The conclusions of some master-mind of years ago is their ideal and authority, and while original methods find little place in the superficial man, it is easy to believe that the defunct leader would have been as prolific in suggestion and as original now as in days or years gone by.

That the people of Utah are great consumers of merchandise goes without saying, and that far too much of this consumption is imported, our mammoth stores and retail distributors testify on every street. But in this popular buying and selling there are anomalies which surprise, mainly because they evidence an ignorant or unappreciative spirit which is in nowise being restrained, but rather is on the increase beyond all precedent. While it is true that there is a public demand for goods; while it is true that stores in number beyond necessity, it is true that neither storekeepers nor consumers are as discriminating in their relations as they ought to be. The stranger—the enemy even, secures patronage as rapidly as does the friend; the drummer a thousand miles from home probably more readily than the drummer from a leading town. Hence this Territory, as a rule, swarms with men selling specialties for firms or houses who have no interest in this Territory save for what they can take out of it, and spend elsewhere.

It is true these representative men are affable, pushing, accommodating, and genial, as men courting trade are apt to be; that in some cases they represent firms of standing and reputation. But it hardly seems reasonable that first-class firms who have a business at home should credit every little paltry store in a country village so far from their own legitimate fields of trade. These firms (if first-class) surely do not want to burden their books with this kind of accounts. Nor can they at such a distance watch these credits as can the jobbing house close by. The risk is not worth the profit. And yet there are hundreds of just such buyers in this Territory, and of course hundreds of credits. Besides, many of these small buyers are injured in this, that buying from every drummer, their strength and credit cover so large a surface, that unless extra vigilant, as has been proven many a time, they never know where they stand, and collapse is more often prevented by sheer luck than by business ability and control.

Of course this is claimed to be a land of liberty. Men go and do where and what they choose. But has it ever occurred to traders or organizations that obligations and responsibilities rest upon the home merchant and jobber that are totally unshared by the transient man and distant firm? And that the local jobber can and does sell just as cheap, and he is just as much entitled to the trade of this Territory, if not as anxious, as any outsider can be? We know of one house in Salt Lake City, which has paid over fifty thousand dollars in local taxes during the past three years, or over sixteen thousand dollars per annum, to make this city, county and Territory what it is; and this and similar firms think that the trade of this Territory legitimately belongs to them; that they should have the preference, and that drummers fitting from point to point, without license or poll tax even, should not have the preference they appear to have; that men a step higher, agents, who simply rent an office and board, should not have that trade which the man who builds, raises a family and pays the taxes should assuredly have. Neither does it seem fair that eastern or western manufacturers and dealers should create these agencies outside of jobbing firms, and insist that the latter should buy from them when they want to trade direct! What character, what credit, does a man or firm acquire when he is not in touch with the firm in whose goods he deals? The transient agent has the credit, the buyer is almost unknown.

Now if our trade organizations would endeavor to remedy this condition, if the merchants who belong to them would agitate this question, it surely would not be long before all agencies would be vested in responsible houses, and the swarms of foreign drummers now filling the Territory would be denied this field of action and placed elsewhere. Surely if manufacturers have a good thing, some local man or firm would buy and push it, whether that be spool cotton, overalls, gloves, coal oil, coffee, tea, cigars, or other single article or general stock which is now so fully and persistently represented.

Then every dealer should conclude, first, that it is somewhat of an injustice to ignore the home jobber at all. Second, that in doing this he should not pay the distant jobber first and let the local jobber wait. Third, that just as good prices, as excellent goods, and as long time can be had at home as abroad. Last, the local house is less liable to distress a debtor, and that he at least by enterprise and the payment of taxes is building up the country, while the outsider has "neither part nor lot in the matter."

Now this is all said without prejudice; for we are familiar with many estimable men who are thus engaged, and who represent firms that are above suspicion. The anomalies come home to the local trade, and it may not care to be thus voiced by one uninterested, as the writer is save in that general prosperity which every citizen is under obligation to encourage and sustain. The remedy is within the power of the trade. A little more confidence in the home jobber would do what the pressure of the times here and elsewhere must eventually do if continued; but the roundabout method will involve that disaster and regret which timely action and local understanding of men and things would assuredly prevent.

SUGAR BEET CONTRACTS.

Just about 800 contracts, aggregating 3,300 acres to be planted in beets and raised, have been returned to the Lehi Sugar company, says the Springville Independent, and are now locked up in their safe. This insures plenty of work for the factory during the usual time for it to run fall and winter. The farmers have found that beet raising brings money and that the labor is the most profitable of any that they can do. The days of experiment lasting three years, have passed, and now the most important question is not the number of tons of beets which can be raised on an acre, but the per cent of sugar the beets carry. Each year this per cent is increased, so that last season there was an average product over 140 pounds of sugar per ton, and must be 180 pounds per ton to make the business pay, should the bounty on sugar be repealed.

A decision holding the ordinance closing ordinary business houses on Sundays unconstitutional, followed by agitation of the question of opening saloons on Sunday as well, has caused the better class of the people of San Bernardino, Cal., to circulate and sign a petition asking the passage of a sweeping Sunday-closing ordinance, which will not be open to the objection of special legislation. It is proposed to close everything but drug stores and livery stables.

WESTERN NEWS ITEMS.

Flagstaff, Arizona, claims to have shipped 1000 car loads of building stone during the present year.

Pagosa Springs, Colo., is happy over the discovery near there of $12 a ton gold ore in unlimited quantities.

There are in Arizona 12,000,000 acres of surveyed land and 34,000,000 acres of unsurveyed land still open to settlement.

Nevada has at least one female tramp. She walked from Wadsworth to Hot Springs, a distance of twenty miles, in one day.

Saturday last a grand strike was made in the Nugget mine at Gila City, A. T. The ore, it is said, glistens with free gold.

Last week two feet of snow fell at Truckee, and the railroad was busy with plows and shovelers keeping the track clear.

A potato growers' convention has been called to meet in Fort Collins on February 21 and 22 to discuss the potato business.

At Greeley, Colo., contracts are being made now for cucumbers and tomatoes by the Denver canners and pickle makers.

Near Eaton, Col., a Denver colony is being located upon 23,000 acres of first class potato and wheat land under irrigation canal.

The British Columbia parliament has passed an act permitting members of the Salvation Army to perform marriage ceremonies.

A colored man living in Tacoma, Wash., has asked Congress to furnish him transportation to Africa, the home of his forefathers.

Farmers in Lassen county want the supervisors to assist them in exterminating the rabbits, which are doing great damage to crops.

A creamery is to be established on San Antonio creek, near Petaluma, California, with a capacity of using the milk of 1000 cows.

County commissioners of Washington county, Colo., have arranged for the distribution of seed oats and barley to impecunious farmers.

Pueblo people propose to organize a mutual co-operation insurance movement and to put a stop to foreign insurance company extortion.

Monte Vista, Col., has shipped 552 carloads of produce since December 1, and the Journal proudly asks, "What valley town can beat this?"

Middle Park, Colorado, sled drivers use a "drag" which plows and clears the snow from the roads. It keeps the roads in fine order for sledding.

Laborers at work on the Rose canyon road, near San Diego, have uncovered a body of what is believed to be gypsum, also a vein resembling coal.

Longmont, Colo., has developed a new industry. It is the raising of canary seed, which is said to be of superior quality and quite profitable.

James Raft, an employe of the race track at San Jose, Cal., has had an interesting experience of being held up by footpads three times in succession.

John K. Baldwin, a young farmer on the Calaveras river, has found a ledge of disintegrated, high grade quartz on his place near Bear mountain.

A Cresswell, Or., woman tied her child up near the grate and went out. When she came back it had fallen across the hot irons and was severely burned.

In Hell canyon near Albuquerque, N. M., Denver parties are preparing to develop a ledge of low grade ore seventy feet wide which can be mined for 50 cents a ton.

Workmen at a limekiln near Gila City, A. T., while prospecting for limestone have found a vein of marble forty feet wide and equal to the best that Vermont produces.

The report that smallpox had broken out in Virginia City, Nevada, was untrue. The health officers say there has not been a case of that disease for six years.

Colorado ranchmen join in the universal report that an abundance of snow assures increased crop acreage. Preparations for getting in large crops are reported all over the state.

Tramps are a costly addition to a county. The fees of justices and constables of San Diego county last year amounted to $14,5000, most of which was for the arrest and trial of tramps.

A new telephone company has been incorporated at San Diego, and a petition has been presented asking for a franchise. It is promised that instruments will be rented at $2.50 per month.

In Albuquerque a recently discharged convict from the Colorado penitentiary returned home after six years' absence to find his wife married a third time and living with her third husband.

The Florence, Colo., Rapid Transit company has surveyed a line from Florence to Coal creek and will soon be operating a transportation and rapid transit line between the coal mines and the oil city.

On Washoe lake, Nevada, a large ark has been built as a pleasure resort for the summer fishing season. People will live in a floating hotel and communicate with the shore by means of small boats.

The Denver county detectives played a hand in rounding up hobos and vags Monday night and as a result of their efforts about twenty choice petty larceny experts are sojourning in the county jail.

La Plata City, Colo., only a few weeks old, has two stores, two saloons, blacksmith shop, a newspaper, a restaurant, a lodging house, a daily stage line to Hesperus and thirty actual residents within the townsite.

The United States district judge of Portland, Or., has sentenced William Dunbar, recently convicted of smuggling opium, to two years' imprisonment in the county jail and to pay a fine of $1,000.

The Santa Fe railroad surveyors are starting out to survey a branch line between Hillsboro and Lake Valley, N. M. This is to develop the newly discovered gold fields in that region. The road will be built at once.

The Le Garde, Wyo., gold placer diggings are attracting a large number of miners who reach the mines on snow shoes from the Laramie trail. The snow is from two to five feet deep but claim staking still goes on.

Wyoming is said to have about $5,000,000 in sheep and $25,000,000 in cattle. In the irrepressible conflict now on between sheep and cattle interests the survival of the fittest will determine the contest.

Sixteen acres of the McCrary ranch, eighteen miles west of Laramie, Wyoming, have been sold by John McCrary to Mike Coughlin for $20,000. It is conceded to be one of the finest ranches in the state. The stock was not sold with it.

Montana will have a series of fairs this year. The plan is for a circuit including all of eastern Montana, beginning with Gallatin, Custer and Meagher counties and ending with Yellowstone. Horse races are on the program.

Six boys in Seattle broke into a bonded warehouse and stole thirteen cases of imported champagne, valued at $600. The police recovered part of the liquor and the boys consumed a large amount, but eleven cases are still missing.

The land company at Arizola, A. T., offered a lot in the center of the town for the first child born in the village. Recently twins were born to a couple who had shortly before arrived. Two lots were claimed, and the courts must decide the question.

On the north fork of the Cache la Poudre, Col., William Compton has constructed and filled a menagerie with bears, wild cats, mountain lions, deer, elk, wolves and other wild animals. It is the largest wild animal collection in existence.

Thursday evening a timberman at the Standard mine at Burke, Mont., named John Sullivan, lost his footing and fell about 120 feet. Upon examination it was discovered that no serious injuries beyond the fracture of one arm was received by him.

A quarter of a million acres of railroad land in Stevens county, Wash., are soon to be put in the market. Some is fine farming land, while much is covered with valuable forests. The price will range from $1.50 to $9 per acre, the average being $3.50.

Marshal Dana of Colorado Springs has received from the United States court at Fort Smith, Ark., the sum of $600 as part of the amount of the money captured by the police there last summer from the Starr gang. It comes in the nature of a reward.

A centenarian died a few days ago out on the Mission road near San Diego. He was a pioneer miner named D. Burchard, and he reached the great age of 103 years and five months. He was a native of New York and had been in California forty-three years.

Laramie City, Wyo., is excited over the discovery that sick and crippled hogs and cattle are sold from overland cattle trains and dealt out by butchers to consumers. Diseased pork is poisonous and pork eaters in Laramie are alarmed over the disgusting discovery.

Farmington, N. M., in the heart of the forthcoming fruit producing region of the San Juan, is manifesting more activity in irrigating enterprises than most any other section in the west, except the Pecos valley. Four irrigating canals are being built or enlarged near Farmington.

According to the Virginia (Nev.) Enterprise, Captain Sam, who has been to San Francisco and the Midwinter Fair, says the Plutes in the Wild West show only get two pieces of bread and a piece of meat for a meal, and the fare is not up to expectations in quantity or quality.

Gas has been struck at Pueblo, Colo., at a depth of 1,500 feet. The Pueblo Oil and Gas company, which is boring for oil, owns about 18,000 acres of land near Pueblo, and is endeavoring to strike the same oil deposits which flow so abundantly at Florence, thirty miles above Pueblo.

Mrs. Pendleton, who has a ranch a short distance below Coquille City, Or., had a band of sheep badly demoralized by a dog last week. The worthless cur got away with thirty head and was then shot. A number of little lambs were afterwards found starving by the side of their dead mothers.

The one-year-old child of Frank Davis, a farmer of Union Flat, Wash., found some strychnine intended for squirrel poison and swallowed a portion. The baby went into convulsions. The father tasted the stuff to discover what it was. When the doctor arrived the child was dead and the father in a critical condition. Davis recovered.

Willie Bowden, a fourteen-year old boy of Centerville, Mont., has started out to make a record for himself. A few weeks ago he began carrying a revolver. Last week, without any provocation, he fired a shot at another boy, which took effect in the eye, passing through the orbital cavity into the head.

The Santa Fe (N. M.) Water and Irrigating company has just completed the construction of a reservoir for supplying the city proper and suburbs, and decided to commence at once the construction of another reservoir of a capacity for storing 600,000,000 cubic feet of water for the irrigation of valley lands.

Three black bears were recently seen by miners in Arizona. The appearance of bears at this time of the year is something unheard of for this part of the country, for they are supposed to be hibernating. Old timers and trappers claim that their appearance is owing to the fact that the winter is nearly over.

An Arizona exchange says that smuggling is extensively carried on from Mexico into the United States. The point on the line most favorable for this traffic is between Nogales and Buenos Ayres, where there is no customs officers located. There is a stretch of 200 miles which is unguarded.

The Pagosa News reminds its readers that ten years ago this week a snow blockade commenced on the Conejos range which continued seventy-two days, and four and three years ago a month's blockade was not unusual. Since the advent of the rotary plow the snow has not blockaded the railroad more than two days at a time.

Charles Elwine, employed on the ranch of P. Fannensmidt, in Tennessee park, near Leadville, Colo., got lost in a snow storm and was exposed to the terrible cold all night. He was found next day in a most pitiable condition and brought here. Upon examination it was found he was so badly frozen that it became necessary to amputate both feet.

Montana people, says the Helena Independent, were prompt to see the great advantage of buying home products, and in consequence there have been fewer shut-downs of manufacturing plants in this state than in other regions of the country. The result is that there are fewer people needing the kind offices of the charitable.

Rainbow trout from California, placed in the north Platte river about two years ago, are said to have done well. Trout weighing from two to ten pounds may be seen in shoals at the head of the Platte in the North park. The fish commissioner of Wyoming has arranged for placing 40,000 more Rainbow trout in the north Platte river.

A man named McDermott, who was beating his way from Mobile, Ala., to San Francisco on a freight train met a terrible death fifteen miles east of Casa Grande on Tuesday night. He fell from the brakebeam on which he was riding and some time later was struck by the eastbound overland. Small pieces of his body were strewn along the road for several hundred feet.

The late convictions at Portland, Or., for smuggling opium have not put a stop to the business, as the customs officers on Tuesday evening captured two lots on the way to the depot to be shipped to Chinese firms in Sacramento and Walla Walla. The shipper is not known, but the officers are keeping a lookout on one firm, which is suspected of doing an extensive business in un-stamped opium.

A dispatch says: "The elaborate collection of astronomical photographs of the Lick observatory, which was on exhibition at the World's Fair at Chicago, has been sent to San Francisco to be placed in the Santa Clara building at the Midwinter Fair. The photographs are printed on glass and are neatly framed. They comprise pictures of the great work of the observatory."

The seizure of forty five-tael cans of opium was made at the Southern Pacific on Saturday by the Collector of Customs at Los Angeles, California, amounting in value to about $850. The package was shipped from Portland, Oregon, to Tsue Chung Yuen & Co., of Los Angeles. The boxes were stamped with sweated stamps. Tsue Chung Yuen denied all knowledge of the shipment and declared that some enemy had used the name of his firm.

A horrible accident occurred at Ryan's grading camp on the Florence and Cripple Creek railroad at Canon City, Colo., on Monday afternoon. One of the laborers was engaged thawing out giant powder and had piled it around him. He was in the center of the powder and the fire near by. In some way one of the sticks was ignited, which in turn set off the rest and the unfortunate man was blown to atoms. Some of the pieces of his body were carried a distance of 100 yards.

Three Atlantic and Pacific trainmen are in the hospital at Albuquerque, N. M., having been brought in on Monday night. A fast Eastbound freight train ran into an open switch and the engine, with half a dozen cars loaded with fruit, were ditched. The engineer, was badly hurt about the body and his right leg was broken above the knee. The fireman escaped with a sprained back and both hips dislocated. The head brakeman received several serious gashes on the head and was badly hurt about the hips and back.

Considerable excitement has been created by an assault at Albuquerque, N. M., made upon the editor of the Democrat by a man named Foote, from Silver City. The Democrat had a local sensation a few days before which reflected upon two or three married women, among them the wife of Foote, who was at Albuquerque visiting her sister, one of the other women referred to. The male relatives of the women living there made no attempt to resent the charge, but when Foote read the paper at Silver City he took the next train and his gun and started for Albuquerque. He found the editor of the Democrat and, coming up unawares, compelled him to sign a retraction at the point of a revolver.

On Monday a man named Robert Burns, the owner of several houses in Missoula, Montana, was awakened by a loud report and violent shock. Investigation showed that the rear end of the building next to the one he occupied had been destroyed by a heavy explosion. Portions of the house were scattered for many feet over the snow. A tin pan which had been in the house had lodged in the top of a tall tree sixty feet away. The windows of the room occupied by Mr. Burns were shattered and some of the planks torn loose. The two houses were nearly alike, and there appears to be no doubt that the fiend perpetrating the outrage intended the destruction of Mr. Burns and his property by dynamite, but made the mistake of putting the powerful explosive under an unoccupied house. No clue to the man or men who committed the outrage has been discovered.

Billy Deutsche, one of the most "famous" gamblers of the world, died of heart failure at St. Joseph's hospital at Denver on Monday night. For the past few months he had made Denver his home, hoping to recuperate his wasted vitality; but he died after a delirium of four days' duration. The deceased had a reputation as a plunger and "high roller" borne by but few characters in sporting history. His gains and his losses were alike of the first magnitude. Ten thousand francs was but a bagatelle for him at baccarat, while at roulette his winnings often exceeded 50,000 francs at a single sitting. But his was always the typical gambler's fortune—today a prince with a quarter of a million; tomorrow posting letters in all directions to raise a few hundred for the bare necessities of life. Drink hastened the end, and at the last—money, health and almost his mind gone—he sank to the gambler's grave.

THE SCANDINAVIAN FATHERLAND.

Prepared from Special Cablegrams.

SWEDEN.

Small-pox is raging in Linköping, Östergötland.

The largest village in Sweden is Trollhättan, which has 5,600 inhabitants.

Sweden has 93 cities with a combined population of about 900,000 inhabitants.

The government has asked the riksdag to grant an appropriation of 375,000 kronor for the building of railroads.

The population in southern Dal is still decreasing because of the large emigration to the United States.

Two large wood pulp factories will be built on opposite sides of the Hissma Falls, near Krokom, Jemtland.

During 1893 31,822 people emigrated from Sweden to America, as compared with 33,240 in 1892.

The expenses of the Swedish state, according to the budget for 1895, will amount to 101,539,000 kronor.

At the funeral of the hotel owner, Kramer, of Malmö, the wreaths on the coffin represented a value of 6,000 kronor.

C. J. Akerman, the mayor of Trelleborg, died at the age of 68 years. He had been mayor of the city all the time from 1868.

The messenger boys of Stockholm will be furnished with bicycles for the purpose of being able to deliver quicker their telegrams.

The steamer "Christina" from Gothenburg, was lost during the last storm off the coast of England. The whole crew was drowned.

H. Grenander the champion skater of Stockholm, has taken the first prize at the international skating contest at Berlin, Germany.

John Thomson, a Swedish-American, who returned to Gothenburg the other day, was found to be insane, and was taken to an asylum.

Large numbers of Siberian wolves are said to have immigrated to northern Sweden from the utmost northern part of Finland.

The government will ask the riksdag to grant an appropriation for meeting the expenses of an industrial exposition to be held in Stockholm in 1897.

Swedish telephones, manufactured by M. Ericsson & Co., of Stockholm, are in large numbers being exported to Yokohama, Bombay and Shanghai.

Ex-minister von Ehrenheim has been elected speaker in the Upper house of the Swedish Diet, and Governor De la Gardie speaker in the Lower house.

The Congo state in Africa has offered still more Swedish and Norwegian officers good and paying positions in the Army of Congo. The government is very satisfied with the Scandinavian officers, who are at present serving in its army.

Crown Princess Victoria, who has again left Sweden for countries with a warmer climate, is a very sick woman. Information as to the true condition of the princess is, of course, not given to the public, but it is a public secret that she is suffering from consumption.

The Working Home at Falun, founded by a ladies' society, is one of the best institutions of its kind in Sweden. It brings up poor young girls into useful servants. The Home, established in a house of its own, is maintained by gifts, among which are fixed annual contributions, the profits of the Associations of Brandy Retailers.

Preparations are being made for a large shooting tournament, which will take place at Stockholm this fall, and in which only pupils of the high colleges will participate. Such tournaments have been held once every year during the two last decades, but the one announced for next fall will be held on a larger and grander scale than ever before.

There are at present in Sweden a great number of Societies for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The object of these societies is to effect a kinder treatment of the domestic animals and also to inspire the growing up generation with interest in animals, and to make them care for their good usage. The societies have also been solicitous to introduce improvements in the mode of killing, and, to gain this object, special instructive courses on new methods in this have been given free of charge, and a great number of papers on the same subject have been distributed.

Some novels by Mrs. Victoria Benedictsson, who died in 1888, will be translated into English. She was perhaps, the most original and most gifted among the female realistic writers of Sweden. Her "non de plume" was Ernst Ahlgren. There is something of George Eliot's deep insight into human nature and sympathy with mankind in her tales, especially in those of present life in Sköne, with their under-current of humor. In contrast to modern pessimism, her writings bear the stamp of love to and confidence in life. "Mrs. Marianne," her last work of greater latitude which caused much sensation, is all through a eulogy of labor as the true joy of life. The great expectations she had raised make her untimely end still more tragical; an intense suffering made her commit suicide.

Veterinary surgery is supported by the Swedish government through a large veterinary institute situated in Stockholm, and by the appointment of a veterinary surgeon in each province. The provinces are divided into several districts, each one with a district veterinary surgeon, who is paid by the Agricultural Society and the Provincial Council. The agricultural societies chiefly busy themselves with the development of those branches of live stock breeding of vital importance to each separate province, and consequently worthy of encouragement. This is effected by the purchase and sale of breeds, suitable for the province, by contributions to prize competitions, by the arrangement of smaller district meetings, exhibitions of fatted cattle, horse fairs and exhibitions of dairy products, etc.

NORWAY.

Electric works will be built at Kongsberg.

The fishing of stock fish was very large in 1893.

A national fishery exhibition will be held at Bergen in 1896.

A new landslide is reported from Vaerdalen. No lives were lost.

Light earthquakes are reported from a great many places in Norway.

Faabergh was visited by two big fires. The loss of property is considerable.

Congressman Rev. Thorleif Fretheim died at Christiania, only 43 years old.

The Total Abstinence Association of Christiansand numbers now 900 members.

Diphtheria is raging epidemically in some of the parishes in the Trondhjem diocese.

King Oscar has donated several thousand crowns to charitable institutions in Christiania.

Johan Thorsen, the prominent ship-owner, has donated nearly 70,000 kroner to the Skaare county.

Their golden-wedding was celebrated by Emil Nielsen, a well known citizen of Beraas, and his wife.

The Norwegian Missionary Society which has head quarters in Stavanger, celebrated its 50th anniversary.

Their golden wedding was celebrated by Olaf Nielsen, a prominent ship-owner of Throddhjem and his wife.

Mrs. Ingeborg Tannes, the oldest inhabitant of Roras, died at the advanced age of 102 years and 2 months.

Harald Hagen, the famous skater, has departed for Zwolle, Holland, where he will compete with the Dutch skaters.

The number of members of the conservative clubs of Christiania has materially increased during the last ten months.

Mrs. Eina Oselio-Bjornson, the songstress, has not met with much favor in Rome. The Italian papers criticize her very severely.

The Norwegian bark "Ran" collided with a steamer in the British channel and went to the bottom. Seven people were drowned.

The second edition of Jonas Lie's novel "Niobe" has been issued. The first 10,000 copies of the book were sold in a few days.

Only male assistants were employed in the printing offices 30 years ago, but at present several such establishments are superintended or owned by women.

Many of the largest young Ladies' Colleges in Norway are founded and chiefly managed by ladies, and the number of lady teachers increase with every year.

The bark "P. M. Petersen" from Porsgrund is supposed to be lost, as nothing has been heard of the ship since last summer. Her crew numbered twenty-one men.

All the employes of the late banker, N. A. Andresen, have received one year's extra salary by order of consul general Aug. Andresen, only son of the deceased.

The population of Norway belongs, with very few exceptions, to the Lutheran church, although a number of dissenting sects have arisen, as Methodists, Baptists, etc.

General Nyquist, who visited Chicago and Metropolis in 1887, then only a Lieutenant Colonel, has been appointed chief of the staff of generals in the Norwegian army.

It has gone so far now, that some of the most radical papers cannot stand Bjornson's abuse of Sweden and the Swedes any longer, but find it necessary to protest against the so-called speeches of the demagogue.

Several "people's kitchens," which have been established at different places in Norway for the purpose of providing the working class with cheap and wholesome food, have not met with any decided success.

Parks and public gardens are now not unusual in Norwegian towns, being generally well kept. In this respect the capital ranks first, as it can bear comparison with many other larger towns, situated in more favorable latitudes.

The designs in the old Norwegian weaving resemble those of the so well known oriental works, and are executed partly on horizontal and partly on vertical warp. Generally the designs are geometric and are based on the lines of the square.

DENMARK.

Small-pox is raging in Copenhagen.

Holger Drachmann has written a new three acts drama.

Many officers in the Danish army have emigrated to Siam.

Grain is at present being sold cheaper in Denmark than for many years.

Prince Valdemar and Princess Marie are both suffering from influenza.

The Slagelse Lanbo Bank has declared a dividend of five per cent.

The large real estate owner Darling, of Horsens, died at the age of 87 years.

During 1893, 10,052 people emigrated from Denmark as compared with 18,642 in 1892.

"Cousin Jacques," Ernst Lundquist's great comedy, has met with great success in Copenhagen.

J. Jensen, the candidate of the moderate left, has been elected congressman from the Aarhus district.

Their diamond-wedding was celebrated by Prof. George Stephens, of Copenhagen, and his wife.

Captain Carl Emil Hedeman has been appointed governor of the Danish West India possessions. The salary of this dignitary is nearly $10,000, and this, added to other expenses without any corresponding revenues, makes these possessions a heavy and continual drain on the national treasury.

The medium aid given by the city of Copenhagen to the poor in 1893 was $80 for husband and wife, and $55 for a single person. But very few received that much, the average being $45 for husband and wife, and $29 for single persons. About four fifths of those receiving aid were over 65 years old.

It is said that Jews began to emigrate to Denmark in the middle of the 17th century, Portugal and Germany being the birth places of the earliest arrivals. In 1726 the Jewish congregation at Copenhagen numbered about 65 families, and the whole number perhaps was about 2000 at the close of the 18th century. The first correct enumeration was made in 1834, showing a total Jewish population of 4,064. From 1834 to 1890, a period of 56 years, the increase was exactly 16 persons. This small growth is due to conversions to Christianity and to mixed marriages.

The title of George Brandes's latest book is "Foreign Places and Persons." In the preface the author says: "One tires of always talking about books. Even he whose specialty is to express himself about black and white, has eyes as well as others, by which he observes the variegated visible world in landscapes, cities, plain and fine people, plastic art. Even to him nature exists; he is moved at the sight of the simplest phenomenon, such as the falling of the leaves in October, even he is impressed by the sight of a water fall, a mountain range, glaciers in the sunlight, a Holland lake or an Italian orange grove. He, too has been in Arcadia."

The "household stores" movement which was completely buried last fall under the very weight of the mass of common people, again shows signs of life. The first movement was started in an ostentatious manner, and its originators were by no means loath to have the matter aired in the press. Not so now. The revival of the movement cannot be called a still hunt; but it is engineered by personal canvass. The capital stock is put at $135,000, and no single person shall be allowed to own more than $540 stock. The goods to be handled by the stores will be farm products, and if the venture proves a success the business will be extended indefinitely. The names of the real backers of the scheme are kept secret, but it is known that several rich land owners are in it. The following features of the plan appeal to the people: The new stores will reduce the cost of exchange of goods very materially so that those who sell to the stores get more, and those who buy from them get their goods cheaper than under existing conditions; the stockholders will receive reasonable interest on their investment; and the buyers will receive a part of the profits.

FINLAND.

During 1893, 11,000 people emigrated from Finland by way of Hango and Vasa.

Written for this Paper.

THE CALIFORNIA REDWOOD.

Almost everyone is interested in the redwood trees or the "big trees" of California. The lumberman stands before them and estimates his profits in converting them into lumber from which our beautiful redwood floors, doors and in some cases book-shelves are made. The tourist admires their gigantic size and feels that he has neglected a part of his duty if he fails to record the fact that one of the "big-trees" is 325 feet high; one that has fallen had a girth of nearly seventy feet, and its rings of growth indicate an age of about 1300 years. These and a few other like entries attest the nature of his interest.

Unlike the lumberman and tourist, who think only of the present, the botanist and geologist, standing before these trees, allow their minds to contemplate the past history of them, as well as to dwell on their present condition. In the Tertiary age, the geological age immediately preceding the age in which we live, the redwood trees and trees closely related to them grew in almost all parts of the world. Remains of them have been found in Greenland as far north as 70°. Indeed vast forests of them were found within the Arctic zone. In Spitzbergen they flourished up to 78° north latitude. In Asia the redwoods ranged from the extreme north to the Himalaya mountains on the south, and from the Caspian sea on the west to the sea of Japan on the east. It seems to have grown in most parts of Europe and probably Africa. In North America remains have been found in several parts of Canada and from there south to southern Mexico. Even in far off Australia it is known to have grown, but it became extinct there, for some unknown reason, early in the Tertiary period. In Asia, Europe and North America the twenty-six species of redwood persisted until the Glacial period when all but two species became extinct, and these two are stranded on our Pacific coast. The two species are known to botanists as the Sequoia sempervirens and the Sequoia gigantea. The first still forms extensive forests and is the source of our redwood lumber, while the latter is distinctively known as the "big-tree."

The Sequoia gigantea was not recognized as a separate species until 1853. It grows in isolated clumps on some of the mountains of California, at an elevation of from 5,000 to 7,000 feet above sea level.

There is some interesting history connected with the botanical name of these trees, Sequoia. Se-Quo-Yah was the Indian name of John Guss, a half-breed Cherokee Indian, born in Alabama in 1770. With no aid whatever he invented an alphabet for his people, and taught it, to such as he could persuade to learn it by writing it on leaves. Before Se-Quo-Yah and his people were banished to New Mexico and Indian Territory in 1828, some missionaries to the Cherokees published a periodical in this alphabet and translated a part of the Bible, using this character. The Cherokees now have a considerable literature written in their own language. Se-Quo-Yah died in New Mexico in 1843.

When the botanist Endlicher prepared his synopsis of the pines in 1846 he was induced to dedicate the redwood tree to the greatest literary genius the red men of America ever produced. To make the name pronounceable he softened Se-Quo-Yah to Sequoia.

C. A. WHITING.

University of Utah.

L. A. McCann and Dick Dryden, while out hunting last week about fifteen miles east of Evanston, Wyo., says the Evanston Herald, made a discovery that chilled them to the very marrow. Partly covered by the soil and partly sticking out of the ground they found two well preserved skeletons, and scattered about them old relics of warfare, flint locks, gun-barrels and an Indian pipe. The one skull, which was that of an Indian, showed a hole, undoubtedly made by a bullet. The blonde hair found on the cranium of the other skeleton indicated that its former owner had been a white man, and thus they rested side by side.

Written for this Paper.

AN OUTPOST OF ZION.

Yost, Box Elder Co., Utah,
February 8, 1894.

Perhaps a few lines would be of interest to the many readers of the NEWS about this far away burg. I will commence like the bashful lover, by saying "It is going to storm." I hope that you will be merciful in your answer and not tell me to go home until the storm is over. We are having good weather up here; not much snow, but plenty of wind and cold.

This place is at the south end of Raft river valley. We are surrounded by the Clear creek mountains on the east and the junction mountain on the west. We belong to Cassia Stake of Zion; and though not organized into a ward, we hope that that event is not far distant. There is room for a few more families to make a living in this settlement. A few good places are still to be made here. There is a controversy about the water; when that is settled there will be water to spare. This place and surrounding country has just been surveyed, so that those who settle here can locate themselves on the proper lines. There is plenty of building timber here for domestic use. We have a good saw mill just started, and that is one of the best helps to a settlement. There are two roller mills that we can go to from here—Conant's mill, at Cassia, and Tuttle's mill, at Oakley—a good road to each of them. Grain is raised to good advantage and we have a few good young orchards set out and doing well. Fruit was gathered from some of the trees last year. Shrubbery and garden products are raised with a good degree of success. A good garden is of great comfort to the housewife.

We have a good Sunday school, not very numerous as regards numbers, but though few, yet full of determination to go ahead which is so characteristic of the Latter-day Saints. It has been an up-hill struggle to bring our school to what it is at present. We are mostly all young people here, who have come out from the crowded cities, to make a home. Some have been successful, while others are still plodding along, hoping to enjoy a few more comforts in a few years. The Relief society is doing a good work of charity. They hold their meetings every two weeks. The Primary association is doing good among our children and great credit must be given President Margaret B. Yates for the able manner in which she conducts the meetings.

I cannot help but go back a few years to the time when we did not have a house to meet in. It was a day of thanksgiving to us when we could meet once more in a house of prayer, built by our own hands, to be able once more to eat of the bread and drink of the water, in remembrance of the death and suffering of our Savior. The Spirit flowed from heart to heart, and glad were the songs that were sung. It was a day of rejoicing to one and all. Since that day we have struggled onward to build up our small branch, and roll on the Kingdom of God. Our Sunday school was organized on the 3rd of August, 1890. Within the last three years we have doubled in numbers so that now we have a total of 86 souls enrolled upon our record.

There are a few families here who are not of us, and to these we have been preaching the Gospel, with good results. I can assure you it was a happy day when the writer took three of them into the waters of baptism and baptized them for the remission of sins. There have also been a few rebaptisms. A spirit of reformation is taking hold of the people here. They want to do and be better. My prayer is that God will help us to gather in the honest souls of this place.

We have just started a Young Men's association. With Elder W. Blackburn as president we hope to be able to draw the young folks to these meetings. They are needed in every settlement. We must study if we wish to keep upon the good ship Zion. A Latter-day Saint cannot stand still. If not onward, why then backward. It was a rare thing to see a person of this place a few years ago studying the plan of salvation. But that day is gone by, I hope never to return. It behoves us as Latter-day Saints to read good books and take from them words of wisdom. Every Elder in Israel should be able to give a reason for the hope that is within him.

The NEWS is a welcome messenger of good tidings, and in its quiet way is sowing the seeds of righteousness. Many read the discourses that would not come and hear them preached.

There is a heavy fall of snow while I am writing these few lines.

I remain yours, Y. W. B.

THE FIRST UTAH BOY.

The following was received just one day too late to be incorporated in our editorial on the above subject. It corroborates the statements therein contained, however, and is gladly given as additional testimony:

FREMONT, Wayne County, Utah,
February 12, 1894.

In the SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS of the 9th inst., under the heading of "Information Wanted," a correspondent asks, "Who was the first male child born in Utah after the arrival of the Pioneers in 1847, or who was the first woman to give birth to a son?" and I answer him.

Lorenzo Dow Young, born September 20, 1847, son of Lorenzo Dow and Harriet Page Wheeler Young, was the first male child born in Salt Lake valley or white parents; he only lived about six months. I cannot now give you the date of his death, but his and my father is living at 979 south Ninth East street, Salt Lake City, where the date of his little Pioneer son's death may be had, and where Brother Andrew Jensen or your representative may see a copy of a poem by Sister Eliza R. Snow in an old book, and in the handwriting of the Pioneer mother referred to, wherein the poet, at the time, gives her the credit of being the mother of the first male child, and foretells that her name and his will be held in honorable remembrance as such.

Yours truly,

FRANKLIN W. YOUNG.

Durango, Colo., is rejoicing over the possession of a paid fire department.

OBITUARY NOTES.

MARY CRIDDLE.

Died, at the house of her son-in-law, John Gull, Meadow, Millard county, Utah, February 10, 1894, Mrs. Mary Criddle, aged 80 years, 7 months, and 17 days. She was born July 23, 1813, at Bradford, Somersetshire, England. Her maiden name was Bull; she was married to Henry Criddle June 22nd, 1837, and embraced the Gospel in 1846, being baptized by Elder Wm. Jeffries. After their marriage Henry Criddle and his wife went to reside in Taunton, England, and for five years the Latter-day Saint services were held in their house at that place, while their home was always open to the Elders. She left England with her husband and four children in the ship Cornelius Grinnell, in 1866. Two children had preceded her to Utah, the others she left in England. She crossed the Plains in Captain Rawlins's train. Her husband died four miles west of Pacific Springs, and she, with her children, arrived in Salt Lake City October 1st, 1866.

She was the mother of nine children, seven of whom survive her. She leaves seventy-five grandchildren, and twenty-one great-grandchildren to mourn her loss. Six of her grandsons bore her body to its last resting place. She was for many years a teacher in the Relief society, and died, as she had lived, a faithful Latter-day Saint.

Her funeral on February 14 was numerously attended—twenty-three vehicles followed to the cemetery. The principal speakers were President Hinkley, Patriarch J. D. Smith and Bishop Bennett; their remarks were consoling and instructive.

THE DEAD.

Peaceful be their Rest.

BENSON.—In Salt Lake City, Feb. 17th, 1894, Sarah Anne, beloved wife of W. E. Benson, a native of Iowa, aged 32 years.

PRATT.—In Salt Lake City, February 19, 1894, at 7:35 a.m., Belinda Marden a wife of the late Apostle Parley P. Pratt; aged 74 years, 1 month and 25 days.

HUGHES.—In Oakland, California, February 7, 1894, Iries Fane, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Hughes; aged 8 years, 11 months and 16 days; was a native of Salt Lake City, Utah.

GUNN.—In Salt Lake City, February 16, 1894, of dropsy, Harriet Gunn, widow of the late John Gunn. The deceased was born December 31, 1819.

Idaho papers, please copy.

BETTS.—At Neph, Utah, February 9, 1894, of old age, Joseph Betts; born November 27, 1801, at Foleshill, Warwickshire, England, baptized September 16, 1847, emigrated to Utah in October, 1870. He was the father of 15 children, 53 grandchildren, 54 great-grandchildren and 2 great-great-grandchildren.

He was a faithful member of the High Priest; quorum, has always been an ardent worker for the cause of Christ, and was much beloved and respected for his integrity.

Millennial Star, please copy.

POULTER.—At Deseret, February 8, 1894, Mary Ann Poulter, wife of George Poulter. Deceased died from the effects of blood poison caused by the scratch of a bone just above the ankle about two months ago; believing it would soon heal, it was neglected until it was too late. She suffered very much for about nine weeks, but expired in peace. She was a faithful Latter-day Saint, and died in full faith of the Gospel in her sixty-seventh year. She emigrated from Redmarley, Worcestershire, England, with her husband in the fall of 1876.

Millennial Star, please copy.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

Truth and Liberty.

No. 11.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, MARCH 3, 1894.

Vol. XLVIII.

FAITHFULNESS IN THE PRIESTHOOD.

Discourse delivered at the Utah Stake Conference, Provo, Sunday Morning, January 14, 1894, by ELDER FRANCIS M. LYMAN.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

I desire an interest in the prayers of the Latter-day Saints while I attempt to speak, for without that and the presence of the Holy Spirit it would be impossible for me to edify you, or to be edified myself. I love to look upon the faces of the Latter-day Saints gathered together in the worship of the Lord. I feel that we are in the way of instruction and that the Lord is pleased with us when we meet together to worship Him and to receive His counsel; and that these gatherings may be profitable to us it is important that we meet together with prayerful hearts, with a spirit of humility, and with our hearts ready to receive instruction from the Lord. To take care of the Latter-day Saints and fully instruct them, publicly and privately, furnishes employment to a host of men—men who are endowed with authority from the Lord to officiate, to teach, and to set examples before the people. Those who speak publicly are few compared with those who visit among the people and teach them their duties in their families.

While listening last evening to instructions given by Elder B. H. Roberts to the Priesthood, I was reminded of the last circular issued by President Young and his counselors, in 1876, which ordered that men should not be taken into the quorums of the Melchisedec Priesthood only as they were needed, that time was to be given when the quorums of the Aaronic Priesthood should be filled up, and that young men should be instructed while associated with those quorums in their duties as Deacons, as Teachers, and as Priests. Latterly the door has been opened, and brethren have been taken very numerous into the High Priests' quorums from the Seventies' quorums, into the Seventies from the Elders, and into the Elders from the quorums of the Aaronic Priesthood. In some instances it has appeared that there has been a measure of pressure used to hurry the young brethren along from the quorums of the lesser Priesthood into the Elders' quorums, so that in the Elders' quorums there should be men to choose from to fill up the quorums of Seventies; and in order that there might be ample room in the quorums of Seventies to take the brethren from the Elders' quorums, numbers of brethren, especially the older ones, have been taken into the High Priests' quorums. It appears to me that it will be well for us to go a little more slowly in this regard, and to give the quorums of the Aaronic Priesthood opportunity to be full and the brethren to be so thoroughly experienced and drilled in their duties that when they are promoted they will be ripe; for I fear that brethren are being taken into the quorums of the Melchisedec Priesthood who are not ripe. Immature Deacons are made Teachers; immature Teachers are taken into the Priests' quorums, and immature Priests into the quorums of the Elders.

The custom that has obtained among us for so many years to make use of the High Priests, Seventies and Elders to serve in the capacity of Priests and Teachers is quite proper, and yet I have felt that it has been carried to the extreme. The duties of Priests and Teachers have been too generally attended to by men bearing the Melchisedec Priesthood. I have felt that the Bishops could take a little more pains to see to it that with every experienced brother there should be a Priest or a Teacher to visit from house to house, performing the duties that belong to those offices in the Aaronic Priesthood. Of course, those bearing the Melchisedec Priesthood are competent to officiate in all those positions; but there is a right and a propriety in regard to this that should be more carefully considered than in the past. The Deacons are entitled to have employment; so are the Teachers and the Priests; and I believe that they are not only entitled to that employment, but that it is for the good of the Church and for the benefit of the quorums of the Melchisedec Priesthood that the young men should have more extensive experience and practice in their callings before they are called into the Melchisedec Priesthood. Perhaps in many instances Bishops have been thoughtful and careful in regard to this matter; but I believe there could still be improvement, even with those who have done the very best that they felt they could do, by seeing to it that no man is called to be an Elder until he is worthy, until he understands something in regard to the Priesthood he holds and discharges the duties connected with that Priesthood. We have become so numerous and the quorums of the Melchisedec Priesthood are so well supplied at present that I believe we can be more careful in the future and let the duties belonging to the Aaronic Priesthood be performed more generally by that Priesthood. I believe that it is better that young men should be left as Priests and Teachers, if they are inactive, than to make them Elders, or Seventies, or High Priests. I do not see why a Priest should be promoted to the office of an Elder until he is a worthy Priest and has learned his duty as a Priest. I see no reason why a Teacher should be made a Priest until he has magnified the office of a Teacher.

I think we have come to that time in the experience and development of the Church when it is not necessary to crowd brethren into the Melchisedec Priesthood until they are thoroughly prepared and schooled as is intended in the organizations of the Priesthood. Let young men start at the first round in the ladder—at the office of a Deacon. Give them employment in this office. I believe that in this Stake, particularly in Provo, the Deacons have been pretty well supplied with employment. If you are doing as you did a few years ago, at every house on the morning of the fast day there would appear two Deacons to collect the fast offerings of the people. Their presence reminded the people of fast day. That was one good thing the Deacons did; for the people are likely to forget sometimes that it is fast day. The young men received the fast offerings and took them to the Bishop. In this way the people were stirred up and were made to remember their duties. In all these requirements of the Gospel there is a blessing to which the people are entitled, and every rule or arrangement that can be adopted in a ward whereby the attention of the people will be drawn at the proper time to their worshiping meetings, their fast meetings, their tithings and offerings, etc., is a benefit to the Latter-day Saints. We are naturally forgetful, and we ought to take every step we can to have the people reminded of their duties. That is one reason we meet together on the Sabbath day—that we may be reminded of our duties, that our memories may be stirred up, that we shall not be allowed to forget the obligations that we are under to the Lord, that we may receive the word of the Lord that is to be given on the Sabbath day, and that we may partake of the Sacrament. What a great improvement it would be if the people could be so reminded of the sacramental meetings that all the Latter-day Saints should meet together to partake of the Sacrament!

There are many ways in which Deacons may be employed among the people. They can be engaged in the house of worship, and in cutting wood and waiting upon the poor, the fatherless, the widow, and the families of missionaries. There is an abundance of employment for Deacons. Then there is plenty of employment for every Teacher and every Priest that can be had in the wards; and yet there is room to mix up with them a number of experienced brethren, that can lead them to the performance of their duties and teach them how to perform them. The Priest's duty is to teach the principles of the Gospel, to expound the scriptures, and to exhort the people to pray vocally and in secret. What a lesson that would be to the Latter-day Saints, if taught in such a manner as to bring it right home to every heart! When we talk in meeting, some people may think it is meant for them, while others may think it is not meant for them; but when Priests visit the houses of the Latter-day Saints and teach them to their faces the doctrines of the Gospel, expound the scriptures to them, and teach them to pray vocally and in secret, and not only teach them, but enquire as they go around whether their lessons are being profited by, every individual is left without excuse. Then the Teachers follow in the wake of the Priests, to see that the Latter-day Saints do their duty, to know that they are attending the house of worship, that they are not backbiting, tale-bearing or evil-speaking, and to see that there is no iniquity in the Church. Now, do you not think that there is employment for Teachers and Priests in these various lines? Certainly there is. Then the brethren of the Melchisedec Priesthood—the Elders, for instance—may be called to preside and to be local ministers, to preach and teach, publicly as well as privately, to instruct the younger brethren in the line of their duty, and to lead them by their example and presence to perform the duties that devolve upon them. The same with the High Priests; for there is a host of High Priests today in the Church, and the High Priest's quorums in the various Stakes embrace the presiding authorities of the Stake and of the Ward. The great majority of the experience of the Church is embraced in the High Priest's quorums. It is not beneath the dignity of a High Priest to labor in the calling of a Priest or Teacher, and men of age and experience carry influence with them. Their experience and wisdom should be greatly prized by the Latter-day Saints. We should appreciate the aged men and women among us, who have borne the burdens in the heat of the day, who have stood persecutions and trials, and have endured while the Church was passing through fiery trials. We may think we have had serious trials since we have been in these valleys; but the trials that the Latter-day Saints have had here have hardly produced a ripple over the surface of the people. In early times, however, they used to disturb the whole people, from their center of gathering throughout the land. We have not had such serious times as they had. We have not been mobbed, our homes have not been taken from us, and we have not been seriously disturbed in these later days. But we are measurably established, and are so thoroughly proven and trained in the Gospel of Christ that nearly every man in every place understands his duty and the responsibilities that rest upon him, and he is willing to be counseled, to be corrected and reproofed; but in early times men were not used to reproof; they could not endure it, and sometimes would rebel when the hand of reproof was necessary to be put upon them. Today, however, we know that reproof is for our profit, for our learning, and for our salvation. We want to be corrected. We would not be wrong for anything. The Latter-day Saints are so thoroughly established in the testimony of the truth of the Gospel of Jesus Christ that there is nothing that moves them or agitates them. You do not find any section or department that can be agitated or exercised in regard to doctrine and principle, because they have been taught so long and are so thoroughly informed and established.

Who are disturbed among the Latter-day Saints? Only those who neglect their duties—those who neglect their prayers, those who do not listen to the counsels of the Holy Spirit. They are the ones that weaken in the faith and part hands with us. But the training and schooling that the Church has had for the last sixty years are now showing their effects among the people, so much so that it is a rare thing to find in the wards, even in the remote ones, any one rebellious and stubborn. Men may differ in their views as to what is the best policy, etc.; but it is a rare thing to find a rebellious spirit. In early days, though, rebellion used to be manifested right in the chief quorums of the Church—among the Seventies, among [the Twelve Apostles and the Presidency of the Church. It was quite a common thing. During all the lifetime of the Prophet Joseph men who were associated with him in council were turning against him, warring upon him, questioning his authority, and holding that he was a fallen prophet. You never hear of such a thing as President Woodruff being a fallen prophet. The Church is large and numerous, but in all the borders of Zion and throughout the world where the Latter-day Saints dwell do you ever hear a whisper that Wilford Woodruff is a fallen prophet? No. But in those early times, before the timber was seasoned, the Prophet had fallen, they said; they warred against him and did everything they could to destroy him, until finally his life was taken. It is not so today, however. Of course, we have our trials and our difficulties; but one after another they pass away and there is no one seriously injured; and today brethren can be found in great plenty to perform the missionary labor that is necessary. Of course, we study more today possibly the conditions and circumstances of men than was done in former times. It was no excuse in the days of the Prophet Joseph that a man did not have any money, or that he could not leave his family comfortable, or they were sick, or anything of that kind. They never waited a moment for sickness even; they would start upon missions, taken on beds of sickness, if it were necessary. But today we wait till people are convalescent; till they are measurably independent financially and they can take care of their families, so that they will not be a burden upon the Church. It may not be necessary for brethren to take the chances that they did in early times, for aught I know; at least, they are not required to do so. The Church is so settled today that it is not easily disturbed. You never find reformers coming in among the Church that can disturb the Saints. The coming of any religious denomination in our midst makes no impression. No true Latter-day Saints was ever moved one fraction by Methodists, or Presbyterians, or Catholics, or any denomination. When a man is a Latter-day Saint you cannot move him; for he knows exactly the position he holds; he knows the truth of the Gospel, and he knows God, and His Son Jesus Christ, and the Holy Ghost. When a man knows that, can he be moved by other ideas and doctrines of men? No. And that is the condition of the Latter-day Saints today. There is not wisdom nor preachers enough in the world to convert one Latter-day Saint.

But all-important for us it is, my brethren and sisters, that we should be Latter-day Saints; that we should do the will of God, as parents and as children, as members and as officers of the Church. We ought to remember our prayers. There ought not to be a house in all Israel where prayer is not wont to be offered up every night and morning. There ought not to be one Latter-day Saint in all the world but offers up prayer morning, evening and noon. We ought to pray frequently, and ask the Lord to improve our circumstances and conditions for us, and to strengthen us in our labors in His kingdom. We want to be saved. That is the reason of all this organization and Priesthood. The preaching of the Gospel to the world and the gathering of the people are that we may be saved.

I desire to bear testimony to you, my brethren and sisters, this morning that this is the Lord's work, and that He will redeem His people. The spirit that today establishes the Church will become more abundant among the people, and the people will be more thoroughly settled and founded in the Gospel than they are today, until wherever we meet a Latter-day Saint, we shall meet not only a brother and a friend, but a devout worshiper of God and a man so true and faithful to the covenants that he has made that this work of the Lord will prosper and triumph. It will grow and increase day by day, gathering in the honest in heart from abroad and rapidly increasing at home, until it shall triumph, and Christ, our Savior, shall come to reign with us on earth a thousand years. Oh! how pleased I would be to live to see the commencement of that reign and to take part therein. That is what I labor for, among other things. I desire this, and desire it for my friends and for my kindred; for I feel that the Latter-day Saints are my kindred and my loved ones, and I want them to have the same blessing that I desire for myself. God bless you, my brethren and sisters, and all the people of this Stake of Zion. God bless the Presidency of the Stake. The Lord preserve President Smoot for a long time. He looked to me worse when we went to the funeral of President Young than he does today; I thought his chances then for life were not any better than they are today, and I see no reason why he should not be preserved unto us yet for a long time. I pray the Lord to spare his life, and to spare the life of President Woodruff and his counselors, and the chief Elders of Israel, as well as the whole Church. That He may preserve the Church and overrule all things for the final accomplishment of His work in the earth, and that we may have part therein, is my prayer, in the name of Jesus. Amen.

The skating contest held at Stockholm last Saturday and Sunday drew a large crowd. The Crown Prince and Prince Eugen were present. As none of the skaters who participated, won three races, the championship of the world is still undecided.

Written for this Paper.

RICHARD MALCOLM JOHNSTON.

I spent an afternoon last week with one of the most charming writers of the United States. I refer to Richard Malcome Johnston, who ranks with Uncle Remus and Thomas Nelson Page as among the greatest story tellers of the South, and whose dialect tales of the Georgia hills have delighted the readers of the magazines for years. It was at his home on West North avenue in Baltimore, that I called upon him. His house is a three-story red brick, which is covered with vines and looks out upon one of the widest streets of the city. The living rooms of the family are on the second floor, and it was in the parlor, furnished with antique pieces, that I met Mr. Johnston. He is not so rich today as he was before the war, when he owned a plantation in the south and possessed the luxurious surroundings of a well-to-do planter of his time. He lives very comfortably, however, and his income from his writings is enough to support well himself and his family. It is not generally known to the public that Richard Malcome Johnston is one of the best educators of the United States. He was a professor in the University of Georgia at the time the war began, and when it closed, leaving himself and all his friends poor, he opened a boarding school for boys at his home, near Sparta, in Georgia, and made here for years $20,000 and upward annually by teaching. He had about fifty boys, who paid him tuition fees of $500 a year, and the most famous families of the South sent their children to him. Very few teachers in the United States today can make as much as $20,000 a year, and the story of how Mr. Johnston gave up his school and devoted himself to writing for an income about one-tenth this size is an interesting one. He told it to me in response to my questions.

HOW CATHOLICISM MADE AN AUTHOR.

Said he: "I like the profession of teaching very much, and I looked upon it as my life work. I never thought of making money by writing for pay, and it was not until I came to Baltimore that I could write anything which had a real money value. I left Georgia on account of the death of my daughter. We loved her dearly, and I could not endure life amid the old associations without her. I gave up my school and moved to this city and began teaching here. About forty of my boys came from the South to Baltimore to enter my school, and had I not changed my religion I would probably be teaching today. Some time after I came here, however, I grew convinced that my religious ideas were wrong, and from being an Episcopalian I was converted to Catholicism and became a member of the Catholic Church. The most of my students were Episcopalians, and when their parents learned of the change in my religious belief they withdrew their sons from the school, and the result was that I eventually gave up teaching. In the meantime I had written some short stories, which were published in a Southern magazine which was then printed here in Baltimore. These now form a part of my book known as 'The Dukesborough Tales.' They attracted attention, but I never thought of their having any money value until one day Mr. Allen, the editor of Harper's Magazine, asked me what I had received for them. He was surprised when I told him that I had written them for nothing, and he said that he would be glad to have me do some writing for Harper's, and that if I could give him stories like those he would pay for them. I then wrote some stories for Harper's. They were published and paid for, and I have been writing from that time to this. My first story was published after I was fifty years of age."

HIS CHARACTERS REAL MEN AND WOMEN.

As Richard Malcome Johnston said this, I looked into his bright blue eyes and could not realize that he was more than seventy years of age. It is true that his hair and mustache are frosted silver, but his cheeks are rosy with health and his voice has the silvery ring of youth. He is a straight, fine looking man, and he is full of enthusiasm and life. He is modest in the extreme concerning himself and his work, and he told me that it was a continual surprise to him that his stories were accepted by the magazines. "I suppose," said he, "it is because they are to a large extent of historical value. They picture a people and a time which is fast passing away. They are true to life, and they are merely my remembrances of the people of my boyhood. The dialect which I use is the language of the people among whom I was raised, and my characters are real characters, with their names changed. In no place in the world will you find more individuality than among the middle class or hill people of Georgia, and my stories represent these people as they existed about fifty years ago. They are not crackers or poor white trash, but are the ordinary well-to-do middle class, types of which you may still find in some of the rural districts of my state. I love them, and they know it."

HOW HE WRITES.

I asked Mr. Johnston something as to his habits of work.

He replied that he wrote all of his stories with his own hands. Said he: "I compose very slowly, and I revise a great deal. I do not see how an author can do good work by dictation. I am sure I could not, and I think perhaps Frank Stockton and some of the other writers of the day who dictate would do better work if they wrote with their pens. As for me, I compose my stories with my pen in hand. I start them and let them shape themselves. I take up a character or an incident of my experience, and by working at it and changing it this way and that it finally comes into the finished shape in which it goes to the printer. I am very particular as to the names of my characters, and I think that a name should fit the character, just as a glove fits the hand. In writing I take the first name that comes to me. It does not perhaps suit, but I go on with the rest of the story, changing the names and rechanging them as I revise it, until the names at last seem to me to fit the characters. It is a surprise to me that the people like my writings. I am not satisfied with them myself, and I am always diffident about reading them in public. I never read them myself, and I don't like to read them to others. Still I do it, but until I find that my audience shows some interest in them I am bashful and backward. I feel very foolish when I begin reading on the platform, and this feeling does not disappear until there is some decided interest manifested by the audience."

FUN AMID GLOOM.

"Your stories are full of fun, Mr. Johnston," said I. "I have laughed a great deal over them."

"Indeed," was the reply. "Well, do you know that I seldom laugh when I am writing them, and some of my best work and that which is said by the people to be the most full of fun has been done under the saddest of circumstances. I am naturally of a melancholy temperament. I must have society, and I want to get away from myself. One of my funniest stories was composed shortly after I came here from Georgia. I was distracted at the time with grief over the death of my daughter. I feared, as to the result of my change of residence, and it is a wonder to me now that I was able to write at all at the time."

"Do you think it a mistake that you did not begin writing at a younger age?" said I.

"I don't know," was the reply, "I doubt whether I would have written any better if I had begun sooner. I feel intellectually as strong today as I ever did, and I write as easily. All of my writing has, you know, been done within the past twenty years, and during that time I have written seventy-five short stories and several books."

HOW STORY WRITING PAYS.

"How about the profits of literature?" "There is not a great deal of money in my writing for me," replied Mr. Johnston. "I mean I don't make from $15,000 to $20,000 a year by my reading and writing, as Bill Nye or James Whitcomb Riley are said to do. If I get from $1,500 to $2,000 per year I think it is more than I am worth. I receive for my work from $25 to $35 per thousand words, and a short story pays me usually $150 and upwards, according to its length and character. It seems to me a great deal for them."

"I find it more difficult to write a short story than a long one. In writing a short story you have to make every word tell. You must be very concise, and I think that conciseness is the great secret of success in good writing. I like short stories better than long ones, though I would rather turn out one long story than two short ones. I don't find, however, that I am a success as a bookmaker. My stories have been put into book shape in a number of cases, and they usually sell somewhere from 2,000 to 3,000 copies. They don't run much above this."

THE DIALECT STORY.

"What do you think of the dialect story?"

"It seems to me that the people do not care so much for it as they did in the past. My stories are in dialect, for this is needed in order to describe the people of whom I write. We people of the South are fond of our dialect, and a party of well educated Georgia men, when talking socially together, will often drop into the dialect of their boyhood. During the days when Alexander Stephens was in Congress, a number of well-known Georgians often dined with him at the National hotel. I was sometimes present with them, and any one to have heard our conversation would have put us down as ignorant and uncultured. There is a charm about the old dialect that appeals to those who used it, and it seems to me it brings my people closer to me. I sometimes use it in my family, though my wife and daughter generally object."

HOW ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS WROTE LETTERS.

The conversation here turned to Alexander Stephens. Richard Malcome Johnston was one of Alexander Stephens's closest friends. The two men were closely associated together during a great part of their lives, and one of the best of our American biographies is Mr. Johnston's life of Alexander H. Stephens. During the talk he told me how he secured some of the material for this life. Said he: "Alexander Stephens and myself corresponded together for years, and we got into a habit of writing letters to one another under assumed names. This began in 1862. I had written a bit of doggerel poetry and I sent it to Mr. Stephens with a letter signed 'Jeems Giles.' In this I pretended that I wanted to be a poet, and I asked Mr. Stephens's advice as to how I should improve my style and dispose of my poem. Mr. Stephens recognized the hand writing, and a few days later I received a letter which was signed 'Peter Finkle.' Under this signature Mr. Stephens wrote an answer to my letter. Finkle pretended that he was sort of a private secretary of Mr. Stephens, and he wrote his master's ideas on the subject of my poetry. It was, of course, Mr. Stephens himself. For some time we carried on this sort of a correspondence, my letters always being signed Jeems Giles, and Alexander H. Stephens's being signed Peter Finkle. Shortly after the correspondence began I asked Peter Finkle to give me some stories about his master, whom he called the 'Boss,' and in reply to this Alexander Stephens told me in these letters a large part of the story of his life. He described his school days, and wrote much more freely than he could have written had he been writing concerning himself in the first person. He was one of the most charming writers, and he kept during a part of his early life a sort of a diary or journal. I was visiting him at one time at his home in Georgia. I had asked him many questions about his early life, and just before we went to bed one night he asked me to come to his room. I did so, and he then showed me a dusty old manuscript which was marked 'Noli me tangere.' This was his diary. He said he had not looked at it for years, and that he often intended to destroy it. He read several pages of it to me, and finally consented that I might read the whole of it. This was before the war. I knew him intimately up to the time of his death."

HOW STEPHENS LOOKED.

"Please tell me how he looked?" said I. "He was a little bundle of skin and bones. He never weighed more than a hundred pounds, and during his youth he weighed less than seventy. In his diary I remember he rejoices at having increased his weight to ninety-four pounds. He was at this time twenty-one, and he states that when he left college at nineteen his net weight was only seventy pounds. During his whole life I venture he did not have a moment which was free from pain. He was always cold, notwithstanding the fact that he wore two suits of silk underclothes winter and summer. He generally wore gloves in the house and out, and he had the most delicate stomach of any man I have ever known. He was melancholy in his temperament, and was full of fears and anxieties about himself and his friends. He was the most tender-hearted man I have ever known, and he had the greatest sympathy for his friends and everything about him. He was sick for a week, when his favorite dog died, and he lavished more love on his dogs than many men do on their families. He was a man of many friends, and he made his friends' troubles his own. I loved him very dearly, and our relations were very close. I was living near Baltimore during his congressional career, and he wanted me to come and spend my Sundays with him. I did visit him often, but he always gave me an elaborate dinner with wines, to which he invited a number of his friends, and I knew he could not afford it. I would hardly get out of the house before he would begin to write to me, and the day after I returned home I was sure to get a letter from him saying that he wondered how I was feeling, and whether I had gotten home safely. One night I left when the weather was cold and sleety, and he wrote me a letter full of anxiety as to whether I had gotten home safely, and had not fallen or taken cold on the way. When his brother Linton died he was prostrated, and he wrote for me to come to him. He only recovered from the blow by plunging into work and by trying to forget himself in his labors."

HIS CHARACTER.

"Was he a good judge of men, Mr. Johnston?" I asked.

"Not as individuals," replied Mr. Johnston. "He had broad ideas of mankind in the aggregate and his foresight as to public questions was wonderfully accurate. But the poorest, meanest, shabbiest negro could impose upon him, and he was deceived again and again by beggars and frauds. He was the soul of generosity. He made, I venture, as much as $300,000 during his lifetime, but he died poor. He spent his money as fast as he made it and he didn't seem to appreciate its value. His law practice was large during a great part of his life, and he received a great deal of money from his books. His 'Constitutional View of the War' must have sold about 70,000 copies. It was published in two volumes. His royalty was 35 cents a volume, and his receipts from it amounted to $35,000. He kept open houses at Liberty Hall, his place in Georgia, and every train brought him guests, some of whom he had never met before. He was fond of society and was a most charming talker."

STRAWBERRIES AND DEATH.

"Referring to Alexander H. Stephens' friendships," continued Mr. Johnston, "he was to a certain extent superstitious, and one of his superstitions was that his dreaming concerning fruit indicated the sickness or death of one of his friends. He might, for instance, dream of eating strawberries. He would wake up in the morning terribly worried, and if a friend came in in the course of the day and told him that one of his acquaintances in the back districts of Georgia had died he would say emphatically that he knew something would happen and that there was the result of those strawberries."

HOW ALEXANDER STEPHENS LOVED.

"How about his love affairs? He never married. Was he an admirer of women?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Johnston. "Alexander H. Stephens had all the chivalry of a knight of the middle ages and all of the passion of an Apollo. He appreciated, however, that his physical condition would not permit him to marry, and though he fell in love once or twice during his life, he never prosed marriage to anyone and he kept his passion a secret. When he was teaching school he fell in love with one of his pupils, but he never spoke of it to her, nor to anyone else until nearly forty years later. He was also in love when he was forty, and he was always an admirer of beautiful women."

From Alexander Stephens the conversation drifted to Gen. Bob Toombs, whom Mr. Johnston called the greatest intellectuality he had ever known, and from him to other great men of the South. He said that he thought the giants of the South were not as well known as those of the North. It was only during recent years that the South had contained many literary men. The Southerners of the past were more like the Romans, in that they were men of action and not writers. The Northerners Mr. Johnston compared to the Greeks, who were poets and scholars, as well as soldiers. He said that he thought the war had changed the South in this respect, and that the present era of literary activity and of literary production in the South was largely due to this change. Throughout the whole conversation Mr. Johnston exhibited the warmest of sentiments in regard to the North, and his friendships are by no means bounded by Mason and Dixon's line.

FRANK G. CARPENTER.

THE EUROPEAN MISSION.

[Millennial Star, Feb. 12.]

ARRIVALS.—The following missionaries for Great Britain arrived in Liverpool from Utah and Idaho, per Cunard steamer Etruria, Saturday, February 3, 1894: Ira Bennion, of Taylorsville, Salt Lake county, Utah; A. P. Kesler and J. W. MacDuff, Salt Lake City; Edgar M. Lindsay, George Town, Idaho; James C. Woods, Erbe, Tooele county, Utah; John M. Dalton and George B. Houts, Springville, Utah county, Utah; Nathan Reeves, Kaysville, Davis county, Utah.

APPOINTMENTS.—Elder Ira Bennion has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Liverpool conference.

Elder A. P. Kesler has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the London conference.

Elder J. W. MacDuff has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Manchester conference.

Elder Edgar M. Lindsay has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Irish conference.

Elders James C. Woods and Nathan Reeves have been appointed to labor as traveling Elders in the Nottingham conference.

Elder John M. Dalton has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Welsh conference.

Elder George B. Houts has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Leeds conference.

They pay 25 cents each for cotton-woods at Eddy, N. M., and are planting thousands of trees this year.

Written for this Paper.

PHILOSOPHICAL PROGRESSION.

Human nature possesses its curious side as well as its admirable one, and a momentary glance is not sufficient to divide the two, or to explain always the ascendancy of one over the other. Things—good things may be done under pressure, say of counsel or circumstance; the pressure being removed there is reaction, and permanence in the best direction is not secured, because the act was not voluntary, it did not carry with it the heart.

From the time that the child is as it were compelled to go to school, secular or Sabbath, there comes a disposition to sneak, to get a holiday stealthily or on the most flimsy excuse. Children compelled to go to meeting, through the spirit of resistance and independence, often become altogether indifferent to a practice which contains within itself essential good. It was imperative on us when we were lads that we should bring home the text and know the preacher. But when other boys presented the temptation of green fields and nooks of fern, or the joyous, rippling, dancing brook, we simply got the required information and the sunny Sabbath afternoon was by stealth our very own. Not that we always felt well under practical and punishable disobedience, but this was our passive or active rebellion against what we dreamt was tyrannical interference.

Oh, how many men and women, particularly the first, are still but "children of a larger growth!" To prohibit a thing is to foster hypocrisy, and at times there is an ostentatious obedience which is suspicious at the best, and then an utter and inexcusable neglect. Was there ever a community more urged than this to learn the alphabet of political economy and industrial salvation? To create, establish and sustain home manufactures? And it was done in times of outer pressure when nothing else could be secured. Our crockery might have lacked finish; our brooms might contain material enough for two; furniture be limited in variety and commonplace in style; soap made at our own fire-side or by semi-professionals might be caustic and fail to foam; the spinning-wheel and loom might, like an incipient factory, turn out a harsh flannel or a piece of stiff sheep's gray or jeans for pants; our home-made hats (sombrero-like) might have carried in them material for half a dozen; the straw goods made by many earnest sisters might have been coarse in plait; our leather might have been half-tripey and shoes heavy; all these, with many other things, like nails, pistols, knives, tube, rope, blankets, woolen yarn might have lacked finish—but the people were in earnest mainly, improvement was the motto, and such goods when made compulsorily were yet evidences of enterprise; they filled a want; they glorified our annual fairs, and at the time pride in these products was hearty at least.

Spite of all advice, when imported goods came, past achievements dwindled, and today we have not recovered in ourselves or our posterity from those early days of enforced restraint. Then when merchandizing became fashionable and profitable, when it was mainly in stranger hands and leading men began to realize that the people were warming vipers in their bosom, the word went out, "Sustain your friends!" Who does not remember the shuffling, dodging and sneaking ways of many? For them to be so advised was to command resistance and to guarantee rebellion. Every excuse of price, quality, variety, necessity was urged by those who were discovered. Excuses were thick as snowflakes, and the outsider waxed fat and flourished, until in sheer self-defense against outside and inside dealers, co-operative merchandizing was really the necessity and salvation of that day.

This movement became almost universal for the time. It saved the people millions of dollars, and as an aid to home manufactures it took a decided stand. Factories began to grow again and co-operation designedly failed to import articles which men at home were struggling to create. Importers increased who overlooked this drift. Discontented, probably apt men began in business competition, and hundreds repudiated co-operation and its stores mainly because of the pressure of counsel in their favor.

If ever there was a community who were advised against the bondage of debt, this. Early and late the warning voice was heard. Farmers were urged to economy and combination in the purchase of machinery. The masses were begged to live within their means. But with a perversity strange but patent, debt has increased in unremitting ratio with the force or pressure exercised in the other—the opposite direction. Stores have been multiplied, credits extended, obligations increased, and personal expenditure has become so lavish that demoralization is almost universal, as if from sheer devilry and to show our independence—our ability to run our own affairs—we had run counter to those we sustain with uplifted hand in directions no more important than this. For even in religious things as in secular, some claim there is a rebound from the always present and always timely counsel of "Live your religion!" Those who assert this, point to the growing disregard for the Sabbath, to absence from meetings, to general neglect of duty, to the absorption in business, to the growth of speculation, to the increase of fashion in social life, to the decline in tithepaying, and as they assert, unmistakable loss of spirituality and reverence for authority. Now, persons of a certain temperament may lament the exhibition of all these phases of diversity and apparent instability of character. Reaction, perversity or resistance may be unexplainable to them. The philosophers may ask, however, whether this is not a more healthy and hopeful indication of progress than even unanimous action which comes of undue pressure of circumstances or authority. Surely that obedience which comes of intelligence, which springs from personal experience, and is the legitimate outgrowth of apprehended benefits, savor of advancement, tells that the restraints of childhood are being superseded by personal and spontaneous leading in the way of right, which is the highest and best condition.

Paul said: "When I was a child I spake as a child, I thought as a child, I understood as a child; but now that I am a man (or approaching thereto) I put away childish things." So that if we now as a community have resolved fully on encouraging and sustaining home industries, because of necessity, interest and unwavering assurance that this is the best for us and ours, we have advanced a mighty step. And if this is universal, our factories, foundries and all industrial organizations will feel the beneficent influence of this conclusion. If waiting for this we have concluded in the interval to stand by our friends, to prefer them, to give them support and encouragement, there is moral growth and force in this, and confidence will not only return, but abide with us and increase for ever and ever!

If after passing through the narrowness of financial embarrassment, whether consequent on thoughtlessness or speculation; if we have felt the abhorrent incubus of debt, or inability to meet our engagements; if our personal respect or private friendship has been touched or wounded; if from bitter experience old counsel has been accepted as better than gold,—economy, caution, resolve, may be to us financial salvation all our days. If anxiety in regard to worldly affairs has exercised undue influence upon us, and religious duty has been secondary; if the glow of its fires and the love of its principles have waned in our hearts; if neglect has supervened upon our hitherto devotion; if in any or all of these things we have thought that counsel was incompatible with our freedom and an infringement upon our manhood and independence, until providential circumstances and reflection have convinced us of error,—it is but saying that we are wiser today than yesterday, and good authority has asserted that there is "more joy over one sinner that repenteth, than over ninety and nine that never went astray."

Mormon human nature is essentially progressive. Its basic spirit seeks for this. But we have needed many a rude awakening, many a severe blow, many a hard lesson, many a sad experience. Its believers have expected, claimed, to be "tried in all things," which includes vastly more than our poor thoughts have indicated in this column. But manhood is becoming broader; truth is becoming sweeter, duty is less irksome, and responsibility better understood; and all life, all occupation, all experience, but rubs off the enfoldments of childhood, ignorance, weakness, tradition, and early education; it but delivers us from the feeling of restraint, of compulsion, nay of duty, for we emerge into eternal right through the love thereof, and all our inspiration is begotten from above!

If the application of John Jacob Astor, made one hundred and two years ago, for a grant of 1,200 acres of land in the province of Quebec, had not been unfavorably acted upon, the chances are that the wealth and prestige of that great financial house would have been lost to New York. It is interesting to think of the difference this might have made in the Four Hundred and in other Gothamite things.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

RESPECT FOR SACRED PLACES.

Of all people, the Latter-day Saints should be exemplars of decorous conduct in places dedicated to the service of the Lord. A spirit of contention, of disorder, or of levity, is wholly out of place in a house consecrated to the worship of the Most High. The circumstances in which the Saints have been placed have made it necessary sometimes to use their meeting houses for a variety of purposes, but in all these uses the chief feature connected with the building—its devotion to a sacred object—should be well borne in mind. It should never be forgotten that the house of God is a house of order. If this fact be impressed upon the people, in word or deed, by those who have the chief responsibility in directing affairs relating to halls for religious meetings, the effect of the example on others will be to lead them toward appropriate conduct in the sacred places.

The Saints have been controlled by circumstances in the manner and style of buildings they have constructed for houses of worship. Sometimes they have had to be content with edifices that have been far from richly furnished or elaborately decorated; at other times they have been able to erect costly and handsome structures, and both have been pleasing to the Lord. Elegant fittings and ornamentation minister to the comfort and convenience of those who assemble in a house of worship, but neither these nor bare walls and rough furniture of themselves add to the sacred character of the place. That arises from its purpose and use. As whatever is disorderly is offensive to the Lord, and therefore will not be accepted of and blessed by Him, if a room designed for meetings be untidy in its appearance by the seats being disarranged, or the walls and floor begrimed with dirt, its sanctity, if any be intended for it, is necessarily detracted from. People who assemble therein are not impressed with a respect for it, and since in the condition described it is not a house of order, it hardly can be designated as filling the requirements as a house of the Lord. But if its appearance be clean and tidy, it bears evidence of the respect in which it is held by those who occupy it, and testifies that they regard cleanliness as an element of sacredness.

We may apply the suggestions regarding the peaceful and harmonious aspect of the room and its furniture to the conduct of the people who assemble there. Those who are permitted to enter a house of worship should exhibit due reverence therein, because of the One to whose service it is set apart. Elements of a disturbing nature are not proper in a house used for the worship of God, even when divine service is not going on. The boisterous mirth, jostling, allowing of children to run noisily about or climb over seats, and other features of like character that occasionally are witnessed before the opening and at the close of meetings, are altogether inappropriate, and whenever a disposition to engage therein is manifest it should receive a prompt and effective check from those in charge.

It has been often noticed in Sabbath meetings at the Tabernacle that tourists who are visiting here, and among them many who lay claim to good standing as exemplars of Christian conduct, exhibit great lack of respect for a house that is dedicated to the worship of the Most High. By shifting from place to place and gazing about as though they were in a museum, and, when they have satisfied their curiosity, strolling out of the place, while divine service is going on, they exhibit a lamentable ignorance or disregard of the common rules of politeness that does not receive the approbation of cultured and refined people anywhere. The Saints especially should deprecate all such improper conduct by exhibiting true dignity and being models of propriety and decorum.

There is no necessity for people to display in sacred edifices an appearance of unsociability, or to draw long faces that betoken either pretense of sadness or real sorrow. This proceeding would be inappropriate, for while the house of the Lord is a house of order, it is not a place of gloom. It is emphatically the opposite of the latter—it is a house of praise, of prayer, of faith, of rejoicing. The fulness of a heart glad in the worship of the Maker is manifest in a smiling countenance and words of inspiration, comfort and good cheer. But happiness is not hilarity; cheerfulness is not levity; lightheartedness is not lightheadedness. In houses of worship we may be filled with reverence, with brotherly love, with sociability, with joyousness; and the fulness of the enjoyment of these attributes is in the exercise of dignity, gentleness and good order. The house that is dedicated to the worship of the Lord should be to Saints a place of sweet communion with and instruction through the Spirit of the Holy One.

RENOVATE THE ORCHARDS.

In former years this Territory produced, in great abundance, apples of the finest quality. The size which this fruit attained was large and the flavor was unsurpassed by any produced on the continent. It was confidently believed that the apple orchards of the Territory would become a great source of wealth to the people. But early in the seventies the codling moth made its appearance, and its ravages spread so rapidly and so extensively that a large proportion of our apple orchards ceased to yield a valuable crop, and for a dozen years or more Utah has not produced enough of this fruit to supply the home demand, by a long way, and much that our home orchardists bring to market is hardly fit for use, on account of the codling moth larvæ with which it is infested.

The course that the people who own the orchards have taken in respect to this matter has been in striking contrast with their character and conduct in the face of difficulties which they have nearly always displayed. Though noted for patient and persevering energy, they have surrendered to their insect foe without a struggle worthy to be called such. Apple orchards that would have furnished pleasant and profitable employment to women and children, as well as men, besides food and revenue to incalculable amounts, have been allowed to lapse into a condition of desolation, with scarcely an effort on the part of their owners to save them. Such orchardists as would have shown a disposition to fight the foe have been deterred by the listlessness of their neighbors, for this was a matter in which all must co-operate or no result could be accomplished.

If all the orchards but one in a town should be cleaned of the codling moth, and that one should be allowed to remain a breeding place for the insect, the labor of ridding all the rest would soon be neutralized. Under these circumstances it is hardly to be expected that the co-operation of effort sufficiently complete and effective to accomplish the result desired, can be secured, especially in the larger towns, without the aid of law. It is therefore eminently proper that the police power of the state should be invoked in aid and protection of the important industry of horticulture.

In pursuance of this idea, several bills have been introduced in the present Legislature, looking to the destruction of the codling moth and other forms of insects and plant life injurious to fruit, and the extermination of those diseases that unfavorably affect fruit vines and trees. It may be that crudities exist in some of these bills, and that they would cause unnecessary loss, expense and hardship if enacted into law. Judging by protests that have been presented against one or more of them, by persons interested in the fruit industry, such is probably the case. But this fact should not deter the Legislature from taking decisive action. A bill ought to be prepared and passed, that will compel all owners of orchards to have them thoroughly renovated. We have laws providing for the destruction of animals, bees, etc., infected with contagious diseases, and all intelligent people recognize the necessity for them. Why not deal with orchards on the same principle?

A bill might easily be drawn, in the light of modern science relating to the subject, that would make specific requirements of all persons owning or controlling orchards, as to what should be done in order to rid them of fruit pests and tree diseases. Disregard of the law should be punishable by fine and imprisonment, and, if carried too far, by the summary destruction of the orchard which is allowed to remain a source of pest or disease. The very nature of the subject demands severity, for half-way measures will inevitably result in failure to accomplish any desirable end.

The mining industry, the principal source of revenue to this Territory, has been well nigh destroyed, and, judging by appearances, if the people are to escape poverty they must have recourse to other sources of wealth. The earth is ever ready to reward the intelligent efforts of man, but it is required of him to work in harmony with correct principles, and to contend for the reward he seeks. With our soil, climate and system of irrigation, horticulture can be made to produce a vast revenue, provided the legislative authority will adopt proper measures for its protection; and all citizens should sustain their representatives in the Legislature in such proper efforts as they may put forth in this direction.

It has been fully demonstrated, in two or three settlements in counties north and west of us, that the codling moth can be exterminated by united effort. Under the leadership of the Bishops in the places referred to, the owners of orchards have unitedly adopted measures to rid them of the insect pests, and the consequence has been a good crop of apples, free from worms. We presume there are a number of other towns in the Territory that could add similar testimony; hence the Legislature need not fear that in passing a law for the destruction of this pest they are requiring the people to do the impossible. On the contrary, it is believed that the discoveries of modern science will render comparatively easy the extermination of the pest, as soon as thorough co-operation among orchardists can be secured; and this, at least, the law ought to be able to accomplish.

MEXICO'S AGILE ENEMY.

We do not know what is the underlying motive of the Mexican authorities in their announced determination to subdue or exterminate the Yaqui Indians, or how far, indeed, this program meets with favor among the intelligent people of the southern republic. We have excellent reason to believe, however, that in undertaking such a course the government will assume a very large contract, and in its fulfillment is sure to meet many huge obstacles. The chief grievance against the tribe, so far as present information gives it, is that they merely want to mind their own business, and in pursuance thereof desire no intercourse whatever with the Spanish race. Grave misdemeanors, these! Furthermore, they raise their own supplies, elect their own rulers, and have resisted the invasion of the conquerors ever since the days of Cortez. This temerity must be rebuked! Every attempt thus far made to force them to pay taxes to the Mexican government has failed, and they have stood their ground successfully against every army sent to punish them.

No doubt the latest attempt to effect their submission is and will be more imposing than any that has preceded it; but the Yaqui country is surrounded by mountains, whose few gaps have heretofore been, and still can be, successfully defended against a host by a handful. The question as to what to do with the recalcitrant natives would accordingly seem to be secondary to the greater question as to how to get at them.

An eastern authority gives the definition of the name Yaqui as "The Shouter," it being a peculiarity of these natives to shout loudly whenever they speak at all. Recent threats and boasts of the Mexican army would indicate that this shouting habit has become contagious. Good taste ought to suggest, however, that the record up to the present time leaves the inducement to that kind of conversation all on the side of the aborigines.

STUDY LANGUAGES.

Elder Charles J. Wahlquist, at present engaged in missionary labors in Copenhagen, Denmark, sends a communication to the News, in which he, among other things, touches a subject that received some attention in these columns only a few days ago, viz.: the importance of young members of the Church studying foreign languages. The writer says he has met with a great many Elders who felt the disadvantage of having to spend so much of their valuable time while abroad in studying the grammar of the people to whom they were sent as messengers of the Gospel and he strongly feels that it would be for the benefit of the Elders themselves as well as the cause in which the people is engaged, if more attention could be paid to this matter at home.

The views set forth by Brother Wahlquist need little additional comment to that made on this subject a short time since. The facilities for learning languages both for commercial and other practical purposes are most abundant in this Territory. There is scarcely a settlement in which may not be found persons competent or willing to teach at least the German and Scandinavian languages. Parents of foreign birth could deem it a duty to teach their mother tongue to their children, while of course seeking to acquire familiarity with the language of their adopted country. Then there are excellent facilities in our systems of schools, both public and denominational, and these will multiply still more as the seats of learning increase in number and efficiency.

We agree with our correspondent that the facilities within the reach of nearly everybody are not taken advantage of to the extent that the importance of the matter deserves. We regret the fact as much as he does, and hope it will receive attention and correction at the hands of leading spirits in the various localities where the Saints are established. If a good many more of our young men would make it a point to acquire some knowledge not only of the modern vernacular tongues but also of New Testament Greek and Hebrew, it would amply repay them when called to go abroad and preach the Gospel. We are essentially a missionary people, and a subject of such supreme importance as the preparation of our young men for the duties that will some time be required of them, is one that is worthy the early, earnest and thorough attention of the whole people.

IMPORTANT TO THE PEOPLE.

The biggest and weightiest question with which the present Legislature has to deal is that of revenue, and it is a pleasure to observe that most of the members are approaching the matter with an earnest realization of its importance and a patriotic determination to decide it, as near as human wisdom may, in a manner to subserve the best interests of the largest number of the people. It will be a matter of deep regret if the question shall evoke from any side a spirit of selfishness, of jealousy or of partisanship. We hope there will be no flings on the part of city members against their colleagues from the rural districts, and that the latter on their part will not indulge in sneers and aspersions against the motives of the representatives from the wealthier and more thickly populated districts. A grave financial condition confronts us; it can be met only by prudence, patience and patriotism.

The recent statements put forth by the ways and means committee received comment in these columns at the time. Those figures showed as plainly as language could that the sharp ax of retrenchment must be laid at once to the root of the tree of expenditure. It was made plain that the many channels through which the public funds have been heretofore distributed with lavish hands must be now less liberally supplied or closed altogether until a change in the financial conditions will allow of their being reopened. It is a straight business proposition that confronts the legislators, and they are expected to display business tact and courage in dealing with it. The people will be satisfied with nothing less. They are in neither the mood nor the situation to be plunged farther into debt. The demand on every hand is for retrenchment. The alternative at the present time is too dark and dangerous to be considered. That policy in which the people of the Territory will alone give support to their representatives in the legislative halls is one that will dispense with all needless expenditure, that will curtail the outlay to that which is absolutely necessary for the immediate present. Under this line of policy every appropriation of the public funds asked for and proposed will be carefully scrutinized by the Legislature and if it is not a necessity in the proper and economic business management of the Territory's affairs, it will be refused.

The fact that economy can be exercised to a very considerable extent is well understood. Salaries can be reduced, the expenses of official service be restricted, and appropriations in various directions be placed at a minimum and not be longer kept at "boom" figures. There are some features, however, that cannot bear great financial restriction without resulting in injury. These are particularly in the line of public works that give employment. Of all times this is an occasion when the people generally require assistance from the Territory in providing for them employment that they may earn a living and be able to get through to the better times that will necessarily result from wise financial legislation.

Another item of deep interest that is connected with the revenue question is that of the division of the territorial and school tax. In the issue as to whether the Territory or the schools should receive three mills out of the five mills tax, we are emphatically of the opinion that the three mills should go to the Territory. This is a demand of present conditions that cannot fail to be recognized by every fair minded person who is conversant with the situation. It is perfectly proper in flush business times to require the wealthier and more thickly populated parts of the country to aid in bearing the burdens of the other portions until such times as they have strength to go alone. But when the centers of business and population are stricken with financial paralysis such as they are at present until they are the weaker and more heavily burdened of the two, it is only the part of manhood and justice that the rural districts should make a sacrifice to carry their own loads for a while, even though they may not be in a situation to render aid to the others. It is an undeniable fact that the mass of the people, the home-owners in the thickly settled districts, are much more closely crowded by taxes today than are those in the rural districts. With a very large proportion the burdens are grievous to be borne, because of the situation in which they are necessarily placed by reason of their being taxpayers in centers of population. Would it be justice, would it be humanity to make the load heavier still? Or would it be the better course for the country school districts to make some extra effort and sacrifice at the present time in the way of local taxation for local educational needs?

The NEWS is strongly averse to going into debt, realizing that it is a burden both upon ourselves and those who succeed us; but sometimes the involving of such an obligation is a necessity. In the situation of our Territory at present, however, we believe the only wise course is to observe strict economy. The same rule should be also applied in municipal affairs. Works that are necessary for the public good should be continued and their administration carefully conducted. But because Salt Lake has had its borrowing capacity extended is no justification for involving the city in greater financial straits. The load is already too great, yet some borrowing to keep public works going will be necessary even now. But there are a good many proposed expenditures that are either wholly unnecessary now or are greatly in excess of present needs. These should be promptly checked. The present city administration was elected on a platform of reform in municipal expenditure, and the citizens expect from it, as fully as has been pointed out in the case of the Territory and its legislators, that a policy of firm, wholesome retrenchment be inaugurated and carried out until we are again on a sound financial basis.

MEDICINE AND FAITH CURE.

It is perhaps true that every well-governed commonwealth, under present conditions, needs laws regulating the practice of medicine, for the preservation of the lives of those who are afflicted with sickness; and no fault can be found if such laws are framed so as to secure to the people only the best skill obtainable. There was a time when the best thing a sick person could do was to take a prominent position in a much frequented place, where any passer-by might suggest a remedy, to be tried for better or worse. But that primitive stage of medical practice belongs to the dim past and can no longer be looked upon as the ideal. Before the physician of today lie ages of experience carefully recorded; he has access to the results of the clear observations and deep thought of thousands who have trodden the path before him. The public justly expects him to know something and it has a perfect right to guard itself as far as practicable against the imposition of the snobs of the profession. "Mistakes" of doctors are generally serious and often disastrous.

But while the necessity of a sound medical law will not be here disputed, any attempt to encroach upon a territory not properly belonging to medical practice will justly be resisted. It is proposed, we understand, to bring before the Legislature at an early date a measure stamping even healings by faith as a crime. Section eleven of the proposed bill is directed against "any person who shall practice medicine or surgery according to the theory known as 'vitalpath' or 'faith cure,'" and also against "any person or persons who shall sell or offer to sell any medicine or nostrum of any kind." That section should not be allowed to stand as it is. It may not be the intention of the framers of the law to strike at the religious observance known as the laying on of hands for the healing of the sick, but the wording of the section is such as to leave the intention at least doubtful, and an Elder who performs that sacred ordinance may as a result some day find himself under arrest for violation of the medical law. There is probably no danger that such a measure will pass the scrutiny of our lawmakers. It would be a usurpation on the part of the law of a power that does not belong to it, inasmuch as such remedies as faith and prayer evidently cannot be construed as belonging to medicine. This point was settled years ago in the Swiss courts, when the medical faculty prosecuted Dorothea Trudel for healing the sick by faith and prayer. The interpreters of the law took sides against the doctors. It is idle to revive the question in this Territory.

What the law should aim at is to prevent ignorant as well as better informed persons from experimenting with human lives. To gain this end, as far as it can be gained by law, the handling of poisonous medicines and the instruments of surgery should be restricted to those who have by study and practice acquired the knowledge necessary. To these points the law should confine itself exclusively. Medicines that are harmless should not be legislated against; nor persons who confine themselves to the use of such remedies. We believe that when a medical law is framed on this fundamental principle it will give satisfaction to all concerned and result in much good to the people. But it must be free from every suspicion of legislation in favor of a class, must not be in the interest of any or of no school, and must establish beyond reasonable question that its purpose is simply and singly to protect the people, not to restrain them in any sense in the selection of these with whom in case of disease they may wish and have the inalienable right to treat.

A CASE OF REVENUE-RAISING.

There have been some very severe remarks, and for most of them we imagine there has been plenty of foundation, concerning the exorbitant fees and expenses that the law permits the tax-collectors to extort from delinquent payers. A case was cited not long since where an extra tax (after the regular assessment had been duly paid) amounting to only a few cents, had been added to, multiplied and piled up until it aggregated more than six dollars. Many other instances, perhaps not so startling, but yet flagrant enough to suggest a thorough overhauling of the laws on the subject and a sharp rebuke to the merciless and avaricious spirit of some who act under them, will be recalled by all who have read the newspapers with attention and regularity. If out of all the ventilation the subject has received there shall come an abatement of the more grievous of the evils complained of, tax collectors may lose a little in purse but will gain in popularity, the critic's tongue will be stilled, and the public heart will be made to rejoice;—desirable objects all, and for the attainment of which the whole official family ought to be willing to labor with zeal and to promote with unanimity.

By way of another "awful example" and in order to point an effective moral and adorn an appropriate tale, we are constrained to give an instance of how they do these things in Idaho. It will immediately be seen that such information is not calculated to induce a great influx of home-makers into that ambitious state; so we shall not be accused of any speculative or improper motive in the free advertisement we are about to give.

This city is the headquarters and principal place of business of a somewhat extensive corporation which has certain small possessions in one of the southern counties of Idaho. Last year, and for several years previously, the amount of taxes on such property was between three and four dollars per annum. This year the amount was multiplied some seven times, and the collector's notice, asking for $23.83, was sent to the company's head office. Astounded at the enormous increase, and feeling certain that a mistake had been made somewhere, the manager delayed the forwarding of his check. But if he was amazed before, he was simply paralyzed later when he received an estimate, certified to by the auditor of the county, of the costs of sale of the company's property for delinquent taxes, said sale having taken place early this month. This "estimate" is so surprising a document that we give it herewith:

Amount of original taxes.....	$ 23 83
Ten per cent added.....	2 38
Penalty on personal property.....	50
Costs of advertising.....	1 00
Additional penalty 60 per cent on original tax.....	11 91
Filing and entering certificate of sale....	50
Making estimate of costs.....	2 00
Treasurer's deed.....	2 00

Total.....$ 41 12

What does the esteemed reader think of that little effort at revenue raising? What admiration must be felt for the interesting process of first adding ten per cent, and then an additional penalty of fifty per cent, on the original tax! What solemn astonishment at the item of fifty cents as penalty on personal property! And what gratitude, that after such an exhibition of ground and lofty revenue acrobatics, only the pitifully modest sum of two dollars should be asked for making the estimate of costs!

We hardly know what kind of comments to make on the incident; but we cannot restrain an expression of relief that the company has come out alive, and of hope that, since they are still alive, they will know enough to keep out forever after.

THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

The dispatches have lately brought horrible details of the raids that are still going on in Africa in the interest of the slave trade. As the "dark continent" is becoming better known to the outside world, it transpires that the revolting traffic in human beings is flourishing as bad as ever. A correspondent writing about Colonel Ellis's march against the Sofas, in Sierra Leone, says they found whole towns wiped out by the slave catchers. Among the ruins were found the mutilated bodies of old men and women, while the young ones had been captured and carried off. Like wild beasts these slave hunters steal up to the unsuspecting settlements in the night, set fire to the huts and then, in the wild confusion of the panic-stricken victims, kill whoever offers any resistance, and tie the captives together, insensible to the despair and grief and heart-rending cries of the unfortunate sufferers.

The Moors scattered throughout the continent are credited with being the most cruel slave hunters. The fleetness of their horses, which they guide with skillful hands, gives them a decided advantage over the negro, and they seldom meet the punishment they deserve, until the Europeans confront them with modern weapons. But the slave trade is still profitable, slaves being in demand throughout the Mohammedan world, and it seems that even Europeans have of late been engaged in the trade, defying all laws of civilization and morality.

In the light of the prediction of the post-deluvian progenitor of our race, the condition of the African people becomes most significant. He foretold that the descendants of Canaan should be "servants of servants," different from the children of both Shem and Japhet. And to this day the condition has continued in spite of all efforts to change it. As far back as the history of Africa is known, slavery has existed as a social condition, recognized by the people themselves as well as by their oppressors. A captive taken in war remained the slave of the captor. He could be sold or otherwise disposed of at the will of the master. Parents could mortgage their children and give them as payments for debts, and even their own persons were considered property to be disposed of, so that many sold themselves as slaves to escape death in times of famine. And criminals were sometimes sentenced to slavery. That the African soil should have been singled out above all others as the hunting ground for slaves was no doubt owing to the fact that the condition had legal force among the various tribes themselves, and it is more than probable that the curse cannot be entirely stamped out until the people shall have been educated up to the point of regarding it as an abominable institution.

THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT.

A movement is at present vigorously agitated in this country, which, on account of its great importance, deserves the careful attention of every intelligent citizen. It is proposed to amend the preamble of the Constitution so as to acknowledge by that document the supremacy of the Almighty in the affairs of the nation, express gratitude to Him for the liberty enjoyed and recognize the efficacy of prayer in the name of the Mediator Jesus Christ. In case this proposed amendment be adopted by Congress, it will be laid before the citizens of the various states for ratification.

The amended preamble is as follows, the additional clauses being in brackets:

We, the people of the United States, devoutly acknowledging the supreme authority and just government of Almighty God in all the affairs of men and nations; grateful to Him for our civil and religious liberty; and encouraged by the assurances of His Word to invoke His guidance, as a Christian nation, according to His appointed way, through Jesus Christ, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution of the United States of America.

At the convention of the National Reform association in Allegheny, Pa., November 14 to 16, it was resolved to send agents to Washington for the purpose of supporting any measure that might come before Congress in defense of our public schools, for the investigation or suppression of the traffic in drink or in criminal publications, or for divorce or any other Christian reform; and for the enactment of a national Sabbath law and "for the promotion of such an amendment to the national Constitution as will justify beyond all peradventure the declaration of our Supreme Court that 'this is a Christian nation.'" Accordingly, Dr. H. H. George was sent to the capital and the "Christian amendment" was framed. On January 25 it was introduced in the House by Congressman Morse, of Massachusetts, and in the Senate by Senator Frye, of Maine, and referred to the judiciary committees. Its promoters are elated over the success so far achieved.

On February 1st a sub-committee of the House judiciary committee heard the arguments in favor of the amendment, on which occasion Dr. McAllister explained its various points. He contended that the clauses sought to be introduced into the preamble were formulated by the three highest departments of our government on separate occasions. The first clause was taken from a resolution introduced in the Senate on March 2, 1863, and passed without a dissenting vote the following day. It was adopted when the nation, through its legislature, asked President Lincoln to appoint a day of confession of national as well as individual sins, and the President promptly responded by proclaiming April 30th as a day of fasting and prayer. The second clause was taken from the constitutions of a large number of states, including those of Arkansas, Minnesota, Illinois, Kansas and Rhode Island. The third clause, referring to this as a "Christian nation," the speaker said was according to an expression used by Justice Brewer of the Supreme Court in his decision in a case before the court in 1891. (Holy Trinity Church vs the United States U. S. Reports, Vol. 143, p. 471.) The amendment has the support of the leading men of the Christian denominations, he argued, and cannot be objected to by Unitarians, Hebrews and others who may not believe in the divinity of the great Nazarene.

The hearing for the day was then concluded and the 6th of March appointed for a continuation of the session. It is expected that the amendment will meet much opposition, but its friends are confident of being able both to carry it in Congress and to secure its adoption by the various states of the Union.

THE NEW BOND ISSUE.

As the News has pointed out already, the extension of the city's borrowing capacity by special act of Congress is not an occasion for the municipality going into debt one dollar more than is required by urgent necessity. The fact that we had to get the special permission referred to should be of itself a warning to reduce the existing indebtedness as quickly as is consistent with present conditions, lest the city be drawn further into the vortex by extravagant mismanagement of its financial affairs, and virtual bankruptcy be the result. The people desire that the municipal program should be progressive; they also have given unmistakable expression of their will that it shall be freed from extravagance and jobbery, and be conducted upon lines of strict economy.

It is quite probable, now that the city's indebtedness can be legally augmented, that the Council will give early consideration to the subject of issuing more bonds. That there must be some issue, all who are acquainted with the situation will admit. The question is, How much more must we borrow now? and it would be well if the proposition could be laid before the taxpayers and an expression obtained thereon from them, after free and fair discussion. The municipal Council needs all the light and wisdom it can get on this subject, that its acts may receive the endorsement of the people; for should it happen to go beyond what the public may regard as the proper line in the borrowing business, its members will be held up to everlasting obloquy as having been untrue to the trust reposed in them at a critical time. On the other hand, if its administration is in complete touch with the reform policy, even though it be unable to extricate the city from its financial embarrassment, its members will secure the undying gratitude of the people.

Every taxpayer has a right to inquire into the situation until it is thoroughly understood by him, and may freely discuss it and give expression to his opinions. In so doing he does not infringe upon any official prerogative, for officers are but representatives of the people, to do the will of the latter in legal form and order. It is proper, therefore, in a time like the present, that suggestions upon an absorbing topic should be offered and considered without prejudice, oversensitiveness or ill-will. No particular individual in the community possesses all the good ideas or human wisdom that may be brought to bear upon the subject, but by careful procedure the best may be gathered, and harmonious action result.

With the extended borrowing capacity of the city, bonds could be issued to more than $860,000 above those out at present, but to do so would be extreme folly, and in a short time would leave the municipality in a perfectly helpless condition. The only proper course is to reduce the issue to a minimum consistent with the city's needs. What these are can be easily determined, and it is doubtful whether there is necessity of borrowing, at present at any rate, more than to one-third of the full limit, or about $300,000 at the outside.

It may be suggested that an official estimate for the year has been made already, and that it indicates a necessity for going nearly to the full extent of the law. There can be, and is, a great difference of opinion from that view without questioning or assailing the integrity of the official estimate in slightest degree. For instance, the income from license is there estimated at $115,000—an amount larger than any previous year. But after proceeding two months farther into 1894 and getting a closer view of the business outlook, what clear-headed business man, whose vision has not been obscured by "boom" ideas, will venture to place the figure at present prospects above $75,000 to $85,000? The lapse of one-sixth of the year easily puts a new phase on affairs.

Then it is stated also that $228,000 is needed for the gravity sewer—$20,000 of this for land for the outlet. The $20,000 for that purpose may have been all right some time back, but to propose such a sum today for the required acreage would be immediately suggestive of a "job;" to pay half that amount would be regarded as recklessness. Going a step farther into the gravity sewer item, what is the necessity for completing it this year? In other places an undertaking of that nature frequently extends over a period of several years, and it wouldn't hurt Salt Lake to take their experience into consideration with a view to profiting thereby. Besides, what is the use of rushing the matter now, and tending to produce another collapse in the demand for labor at the close of the present season, thereby injuring the home workmen? Why not proceed at a uniform rate with this and other public improvements, so that home workmen can be given employment as steadily and for as long a time as possible, and no special inducement be offered for the unemployed of other sections to rush in here and reap the benefits of a crowded program? The Mayor did a proper thing in pointing out the items named in his report, and in presenting in the most striking manner the questions that must be solved by the new administration. But it is the Council that must determine the methods of procedure and the measure of caution and celerity with which the solution shall be worked out.

There has been a good deal of discussion the last two months of economic measures, and new light has been thereby thrown on the subjects. The legislative proceedings have contributed largely toward producing a better understanding of local financial needs, and people generally are in a better position to judge of these matters than they were ten, eight or even six weeks ago. The lesson of this increasing knowledge is to every faithful conservator of the people's interests an inspiration to conservative action in matters of finance. It is better to take two steps by using the rock in the middle of the stream than to fall in by a jump that won't reach the other side.

THE ENGLISH IN AFRICA.

Further details of the disastrous encounter between a detachment of British soldiers and natives on the west coast of Africa are contained in a dispatch from Batourst. It seems that the company, 220 strong, had already destroyed two villages and was returning to the coast when, suddenly attacked from all sides, it barely escaped a general massacre by breaking through the ranks of the enemy and seeking safety in flight; and so precipitate was the retreat that the bodies of some of the fallen comrades were left behind. A second force landed from the ships was also beaten back, and reinforcements were sent for. When these arrive, the operations are to commence again, and it is evident that more lives are to be sacrificed in the effort to push European civilization into the African continent.

The ostensible purpose of this expedition is to check the slave trade, but it will undoubtedly end, as so many similar exploits, in the acquisition of more territory. The European countries are supposed to be greatly over-populated and the stronger powers have found it necessary to look about for more room. Africa, with its vast resources and tropical climate, and with a population unable to defend its native soil, offers the opportunity desired. The continent is being slowly but systematically sliced up between the aggressive civilizers, who push forward with the Bible in one hand and the sword in the other. For as all roads somehow lead to Rome, so all measures for the benefit of the dusky sons of Ham, culminate in their subjection. Missionaries convert a few natives. Mission stations are established and must be protected. Soldiers are needed for the protection, and the missionary enterprise is soon followed by a permanent protectorate. Precisely the same result follows the establishment of industrial or mercantile institutions. The protecting armed forces get into a scrape with the natives. Blood is shed. More soldiers are sent to revenge their comrades and to keep the savages in awe, which always means the desolation of the country and its subjection to the conquerors. This has been the policy followed so successfully in Asia and is now repeated in Africa.

Moralists may feel the disgrace of this mode of proceeding ever so keenly, and they may even thunder against it with all the force that the late Metropolitan Tabernacle orator, Mr. Spurgeon, used to bring to bear against it, but it is going on all the same. It seems to be inevitable. The struggle for room on our little planet always results in the destruction of the weaker races by the stronger. Just at present Europe finds it more convenient to annihilate the savages of Africa than to plunge their own continent in a war that would exterminate a million or so of their citizens. But can it then be, that the existence of the human race is only made possible by the constant and wholesale shedding of blood? Is that supposition consistent with the teachings of the Redeemer of mankind?

THE MISSOURI EXPULSION.

On Sunday, the 18th inst., the St. Louis Republic contained a very erroneous and misleading article concerning the Mormon expulsion from Missouri and Illinois. The St. Joseph Daily News reproduced the article, but omitted by mistake the name of the writer and the paper from which the clipping was taken. In the next issue of the News appeared a sharp letter from a correspondent signing himself "Observer," criticizing the first article and pointing out many of its inaccuracies and inconsistencies. The writer of this letter reveals himself to the editor of the DESERET NEWS as Mr. E. T. Dobeon, who is quite well known in this locality from a former residence in Ogden. He says: "The article I reply to proves to have been written by Col. William F. Switzer, of Columbia, Mo., one of the oldest editors in the state. I of course answer from the standpoint of the Reorganization, which, however, in this case would, I presume, be common ground. I have many friends and relatives among the Utah people who may be interested in my communication. If you can use it do so."

We are sure the letter will be read with interest, and we use it with pleasure. Here it is:

To the Daily News: In the issue of your paper for yesterday appears an article under the heading the "Mormon Hoax," which is a burlesque on the true facts of history as they appear as matters of record concerning the people known as Latter-day Saints, many of whom in this city are readers of your valuable paper, and some of whom are children or near relatives of some of the unfortunate victims of that bitterly cruel and relentless persecution.

The writer is acquainted with quite a number of reputable people who were eye witnesses of and subjected to those outrageous and terrible deeds of an irresponsible, red-handed mob, now condemned alike by all good men of any or no creed. The statement of facts relative to that cruelly enforced exodus is now a matter of authentic history. Generals Atchison and Doniphan themselves being among the chief writers who unreservedly lay the blame where it justly belongs, exonerating the Saints and convicting their oppressors of high-handed bigotry and intolerance.

In the article, containing, as it does, five grains of falsehood to one of truth, you have (unintentionally I am willing to believe) outraged the feelings of thousands who are now numbered among the best and most highly respected citizens of Missouri, Iowa and Illinois, who know the statements contained in the article to be largely, almost wholly, false in fact, erroneous in conclusions and mischievous in their tendencies.

The leading papers of the country, including those of New York, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Des Moines and other metropolitan dailies, have repeatedly during the past twenty years published the facts of this sad history of fifty years ago, gleaned by their own representatives, and in doing so have made the vindication of the Latter-day Saints (derisively termed "Mormons" by some) so complete that it is a matter of considerable surprise at this late day that an article like the one referred to should find place in your columns. There are really but two statements in the whole article worthy of notice. One is that the Latter-day Saints were expelled from the state of Missouri by a cruel mob, and the other, suggested by one of your readers, is that "Joseph Smith was born." This latter fact will hardly be denied by any candid person; but on the contrary is susceptible of proof by probably scores of individuals, any one of whom is at least as reliable as the writer of the article in question.

Well informed people will not be influenced by such articles, because they are self-refuting. But there is a class of over-credulous persons who are always ready to accept such statements as true, because directed against what is to some extent an unpopular cause, but whose adherents are rapidly gaining proper recognition as exemplars of the true Christian religion.

I suggest, therefore, if the Daily News desires to publish the true history of that disgraceful expulsion that Mr. J. M. Terry, pastor of the Latter-day Saints' church in this city, be asked to furnish reliable data for such publication.

DON'T KILL TOO MUCH.

There seems to be quite an agitation in some quarters over the report that a number of mountain lions have been seen during the past few days in City Creek canyon. Some parties are eager to have these monarchs of forest and glen exterminated at once, lest perchance they should engage in depredatory incursions upon our fair city and carry off, banditti fashion, some of our valued townsmen. The fear has been even expressed that children who venture far up the canyon might be seized by the wild beasts. As the little tots, however, are not likely to wander a dozen miles into rugged, snow-covered mountains, and search in the caves and thickets for the carnivorous brutes, it is highly probable that the expressed fear is merely an ambush of eager sportsmen, who are anxious for permission to shoot in the canyon, that they may kill a few of the deer that are reported as appearing in large numbers near the head of City Creek.

There is one thing that Salt Lake's citizens do not care to have lost sight of; that is that City Creek canyon has been set apart as a park, and in time it can be made one of the most beautiful in the world, affording as it does an unsurpassed arrangement of mountain, forest, dell and stream. An element that materially enhances public grounds of that character is the variety of animals to be found therein, in what appear to be their native haunts. The value of such a collection as might be made in City Creek canyon for such a purpose is beyond price in money; but in time and by care it can be accomplished there at comparatively small outlay. When the wild game is in safer mountain fastnesses in summer, the canyon can be surveyed off, certain portions being reserved, prepared, and partially enclosed as preserves for different kinds of wild game. Then when a suitable time came, desirable varieties could be secured as necessary and the actual native animals, to a limited extent at least, could be preserved. The interest in such a collection, albeit there were one or two mountain lions included, would be by no means small. In Europe there are parks where even the tiger can be occasionally seen prowling in the jungle, but safely guarded from the visitor by a strong iron fence beyond which he cannot pass.

We have no special protest, however, to enter against shooting a few mountain lions; there is an exceedingly small number up City Creek. What is objected to is the allowing in the canyon of any shooting at all that is not a necessity. The rule once established should be maintained, and sportsmen be given to understand that there is one place in the Territory where game hunting cannot be carried on unless the public good requires it. Many animals and birds that are far from dangerous but are exceedingly interesting in city parks, have come into the canyon during late years, instinctively feeling that they are safe there. Hunters going in will not miss an opportunity to bag some of this kind of game. To slay any of them would be to kill too much. To allow hunting at all in the canyon now would be to undo a good work of years, and drive off or destroy valuable game, both beast and fowl, that have found a haven of peace and security in what yet may be the most beautiful and interesting city park on the continent.

JAPANESE ADVANCEMENT.

It is interesting to note the material advancement in modern civilization made by the empire of Japan, its development in that regard affording strong contrast to that of other oriental nations. The cause of human liberty and enlightenment is making rapid headway among the Japanese, and this mainly through the agency of the government itself, which seems to be guided by an inspiration in that direction. American officials who spend some time in Japan return with only words of praise for its people. The latest government officer to express himself in this line is W. D. Tillotson, of the state of Washington, who arrived from the land of the Mikado on Thursday. He has been there for nearly four years as United States consul-general, and is now superseded by N. W. McIvor, of Iowa. Mr. Tillotson says of the Japanese: "They are reaching out for commerce, and their Diet has been working toward that end for several years past. At present they have some very fine steamers which ply coastwise and even to Honolulu. Three of these steamers are equal to the best vessels on our Pacific coast. I apprehend that they will ere long have their vessels running to our ports. The people are naturally a progressive people, and there is a general desire that their country should take a high place among the more advanced nations. The government also is progressive." Not only do the Japanese have fine steamers, fitted with electric light plants and all modern improvements, built in Europe, but they have inaugurated ship-building to a large extent on their own account. One vessel which is being constructed at the imperial dockyards is a large cruiser which is expected to take its place in the first rank of modern warships.

One feature that is regarded as a sign of inferiority is now sought to be thrown off by Japan, and its government is making strenuous efforts to that end. Under the treaties with several of the larger nations, the latter's consuls were given the right to try offenders of their own nationalities. Japan is now asking to have these treaties remodeled on the form which exists between America and European governments. Because of this extraterritoriality privilege allowed to foreign consuls, the Japanese refuse to permit foreigners to reside in any but their own settlements in the treaty towns. They are likewise prohibited from going to the interior except by special permission, and this is usually granted only for health or scientific research. These barriers are to be thrown down to all citizens of the nations who relinquish the extraterritoriality privilege. The Japanese say they will repose confidence in the nations that give them confidence in their relationships.

A notable feature that has characterized the policy of Japan is that the government itself prefers to civilize its people, develop its country, and build up its commercial relations with foreigners, rather than permit foreigners to come in and take leadership in such matters among the people. These methods give evidence in their results of true patriotism and wise statesmanship. All foreigners who conduct themselves properly are well-treated throughout the nation, and the probability is that ere long people from other countries will be accorded freedom to travel and mingle with the Japanese people as they please so long as they observe the laws of the land, and that they will have greater liberty in this respect than is now accorded them by any nations except the United States and Great Britain. This is virtually the proposition that is made by the Japanese government, whose ministry believe their proposals to revise treaties will be accepted without hesitation, as they will be of advantage to all parties concerned.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Written for this Paper.

FROM NEW MEXICO.

ALBUQUERQUE, New Mexico, Feb. 7, 1894. During my brief stay in Santa Fe I was busily engaged visiting museums, old buildings, and conversing with old residents of this old and exceedingly interesting town, but I have been somewhat disappointed in not being able to obtain accurate dates in regard to its early history.

A Spanish Friar by the name of Marcos de Niza and Francisco Vasquez Coronado are generally supposed to have been the first Europeans to tread the soil of what is now the territory of New Mexico. The first named visited the Zuni Pueblos in June, 1689; the latter, guarded by Friar Marcus and followed by 250 men at arms, came in 1640 and occupied several Indian pueblos, going as far north as the present site of Albuquerque, on the Rio Grande. A permanent settlement was made by the Spaniards late in the sixteenth century; but the exact year in which Santa Fe was first occupied by the Spaniards no one seems to know. This much may be said that Santa Fe, in New Mexico, and St. Augustine, Florida, were peopled by the followers of the cross about the same time. Santa Fe is considered by many to be the oldest city in the United States. This is certainly correct, if we be permitted to reckon the time it was occupied by the Lamanites before the Spaniards came. Max Frost, Esq., secretary of the bureau of Immigration of the territory of New Mexico, has just published a book of 344 pages, on the resources of New Mexico, in which also he presents a condensed historical sketch of the territory. Alluding to the founding of Santa Fe he says:

"In 1597, after many vexatious delays, Don Juan de Onate entered New Mexico with 700 soldiers and 180 families for colonization. On September 7, 1598, he founded a town at Chamita, opposite the pueblo of San Juan in Santa Fe county, known as San Gabriel de los Espanoles, which was abandoned in 1605 and the colony transferred to Santa Fe. The Pueblo Indians with the exception of the Acomans submitted peaceably. These latter made several attempts to entrap and kill Onate, but failed. After a struggle in which the Spaniards displayed all the romantic bravery of the conquistadores, entrance was gained to the city over a terrible chasm by means of a beam thrown across it. After the Spanish victory, these Indians became very peaceable. From this period until 1680, Santa Fe was the only European settlement of note in New Mexico, but the Spaniards had spread out and established towns for miners and settlements of families in every direction."

How long Santa Fe had existed as an Indian pueblo (village) will perhaps never be known, until the contents of the records which the angels are making will be revealed to mankind. It may have been founded by the Nephites for aught we know.

In 1680 the Pueblo Indians rebelled against the Spaniards, who had oppressed them in various ways. One, Otermín, was Spanish governor at the time. When the outbreak occurred the outlying ranches were ravaged with fire and violence. Governor Otermín, with his soldiers and one thousand women and children, were besieged in the old "Palace," a building still standing on the north side of the plaza or public square, in Santa Fe. On August 21, 1680, the garrison found the place cut off from food and water. A vigorous sortie was made, the natives routed, and glad of the opportunity, the beleaguered Spaniards took up their sorrowful retreat. In October of the same year they entered El Paso, on the Rio Grande, now in Texas, a sorry-looking crowd numbering 1,946 souls including 800 friendly Pueblo Indians—all that were left of the Spanish colonies. In the rebellion 401 persons, including 78 soldiers and 21 Catholic priests were killed.

The Pueblo Indians retained control of New Mexico from 1683 to 1692, during which time many valuable records were ruthlessly destroyed; the Spanish language and the planting of such grains and seeds as the Spaniards had introduced were prohibited. In the spring of 1692 Don Diego de Vargas Zapata Lujan was appointed governor of the low province. Quickly assembling an army of 800 Spaniards and 100 Indians, he invaded, overran and conquered the territory during that year (1692), and returned to El Paso to bring back the families who had been so summarily evicted by the Pueblos. He again entered the province in 1693, but the Indians now being aroused to offer all possible resistance it required all the bravery, talent and generalship on the part of the Spaniards to make the expedition successful. After a two day's battle, however, the new governor reduced the Pueblo that the Tanos Indians had established on the ruins of Santa Fe and by rapid, well-timed incursions into the surrounding country brought something like order out of the reigning chaos.

In 1804 and 1805 the first Americans, traders, entered Santa Fe. Soon afterwards Captain Zebulon M. Pike visited New Mexico. He accomplished nothing of great importance, but left an enduring monument of frontier pluck and courage on the lofty Colorado peak commemorative of his name.—Pike's Peak. Unwittingly he erected a fort in the San Luis valley and raised the American flag on Mexican soil. For this he was placed under arrest, brought to Santa Fe in 1806, and forwarded to the City of Mexico.

In 1812 a party of St. Louis, Mo., merchants entered New Mexico from the Northwest. They were arrested as spies, their goods confiscated, sent to follow Pike, and were held as prisoners until Mexico was liberated from the Spanish crown. The next adventurous leader was a Mr. Glenn who brought a small caravan to Santa Fe. His cheap calicoes and plain cottons brought as high as $2 and $3 per yard. When these prices were reported in Missouri, the "commerce of the prairies" was opened. From then on commenced an era of romance and adventure. Westport, in Jackson county, Mo., was the outpost of American and Santa Fe of Spanish civilization, and between these points the celebrated Santa Fe trail, which was permanently opened in 1822, became the great connecting link. From that date until 1843, the trade increased until 350 men and 230 wagons, loaded with $450,000 worth of goods at first cost, were transported to this El Dorado of western trade in one caravan.

In 1846, after the war between the United States and Mexico had been declared, General S. W. Kearney, with a small army came down from the north, quietly captured Las Vegas and then pushed on to Santa Fe. Considerable force was sent out to intercept his march, but he eluded it and appeared on a hill overlooking Santa Fe and within 200 yards of the palace of the Spanish governor—the same hill on which he soon afterwards built Fort Marcy. The town surrendered at discretion, and General Kearney, on August 22, 1846, raised the "stars and stripes" on the plaza (or public square of Santa Fe) and declared New Mexico to be part of the United States. All this was done without a shot being fired or a drop of blood being spilled.

On the 9th of October following the first detachment of the Mormon Battalion, consisting of the strongest and most able-bodied men belonging to that organization marched into Santa Fe, followed on the 12th by the sick and those of the women who had not already started for Pueblo. The following day (Oct. 18th) Capt. P. St. George Cook assumed command of the Mormon Battalion at Santa Fe, agreeable to orders left by Gen. Kearney, who before the arrival of the Mormon boys had left the New Mexican capital and continued his march toward California. On the 18th of October the sick detachment of the Mormon Battalion, consisting of about ninety men, left Santa Fe for Pueblo, under command of Capt. James Brown, and the next day (19th) the main body of the battalion resumed the journey from Santa Fe to California.

Since that time the name of Santa Fe has been familiar to the Saints in the Rocky mountains. Most of these 500 men besides the woman who passed through Santa Fe in 1846, soon afterwards became some of the first settlers of Salt Lake City, Ogden and many other flourishing settlements in the valleys of Utah, and it is likely that what they saw in New Mexico in the shape of primitive irrigation had something to do with the imminent success which followed the pioneers of Utah in raising grain by watering their fields. And it is no wonder, after members of the Battalion had seen in Santa Fe such adobe buildings as the "Palace," then already nearly 250 years old, that they used their influence with their coreligionists in the valley of the Great Salt Lake, to imitate the Spaniards in building adobe houses; even to this day they rank among the most healthy and comfortable dwellings in Utah. In the construction of roofs, however, our pioneers seem to have been less successful than the Mexicans. The flat roofs which are still in vogue here and which are used almost exclusively by Mexicans, did not prove adequate to keep out the rain and snow water in the primitive houses erected in the "old fort" in Great Salt Lake valley—something the Pioneers soon learned from unpleasant experience. Perhaps some of our Pioneers can explain why this is so. The Mexicans here seldom complain of leaky roofs—though it is said by some that they really do leak sometimes.

I left Santa Fe this evening and am now waiting for a train on the Atlantic and Pacific railway to take me to Holbrook, in Apache county, Arizona, where I expect to commence my historical labors in the Snowflake Stake of Zion.

ANDREW JENSON.

Written for this Paper.

AN INTERESTING BIOGRAPHY.

CENTREVILLE, Davis Co., Utah, Feb. 8th, 1894.—Noticing in the DESERET NEWS some time ago an invitation to the veterans of the early rise of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and also the early Pioneers of this Territory to give an account of things which happened in those times, I thought I would give a brief sketch of my day according to my memory. I will begin with my parents.

My father, Elijah Cheney, was born in the town of Barington, Berkshire county, Massachusetts, on the 14th of September, 1785. My mother was born in the town of Pellham in 1791, same county and state. Their parents moved and settled in the state of New York. My father served one year in the war of 1812; was in the battle of Bladensburg and saw Buffalo burned in 1832. Jared Carter preached and baptized and organized a branch of the Church in Onondaga county, New York, my father being one of the number. He was ordained an Elder by Jared Carter in 1833, and he and Zerah Pulsipher went north on a preaching mission into Richland county and were the first that introduced the Gospel to President Woodruff, who was baptized by Zerah Pulsipher.]

In 1835 my father moved his family to Kirtland, Ohio, where I first saw the Prophet Joseph. The walls of the Temple were finished and they were putting on the roof. I worked several days on the Temple and helped excavate the foundation for a grist mill, and was paid in Kirtland money, of which I have a one dollar bill in my possession at the present time. In 1838 I attended the Hebrew school held in the attic rooms of the Temple and taught by Professor Sexlax of New York City. In 1839 my Father started with his family for Far West, Missouri, with the Kirtland camp. Arriving at Coles county, Illinois, we were obliged to remain there through the winter on account of sickness. In 1843 we settled at Camp creek, Hancock county.

At the time when the printing press and type of the Expositor was destroyed I belonged to the Nauvoo Legion under Captain Lucius Bingham. We were called to go to Nauvoo under the orders of Colonel Markham, and were there three weeks under arms expecting an attack by the mob when we were discharged by Gen. Joseph Smith. Soon afterwards he gave himself up a prisoner to Gov. Ford. Joseph and his brother Hyrum Smith, John Taylor and Willard Richards were confined in Carthage jail when a mob with blackened faces attacked and murdered Joseph and Hyrum and severely wounded John Taylor, Willard Richards escaping unharmcd. The grand jury indicted Sharp and Williams for being accessory to the murder of Joseph and Hyrum Smith. I was one of the petit jury when the case was tried, and after considerable talk by the lawyers the judge ordered the indictment quashed; that ended the trial.

I was in Nauvoo when the first company crossed the Mississippi river on the ice and soon after Nauvoo was nearly evacuated. I crossed the river at Ft. Madison the 3rd of May, 1846, overtook the company at Mount Pisgah and traveled with Brigham and Heber's company to the Missouri river. We had been but a short time in camp when Captain Allen appeared in our midst and made a requisition in the name of the United States for five hundred young men to enlist in the war with Mexico. There were many speeches made urging us to volunteer. President Young said it was necessary that we should comply with the requisition, even if it took the Twelve to make up the number.

The company was soon made up and organized, the day soon arrived for our departure, which was the 16th of July, 1846. That was a day of sadness, of mourning and a day of parting; fathers and mothers parting from their sons; brothers from their sisters; husbands from their wives, and maidens from their lovers. I tell you, on that day the tears fell like rain drops; on that day we commenced our march for Fort Leavenworth and on our arrival there we received our arms and equipments and started for Santa Fe, a distance of over 700 miles. Soon after leaving the fort we were apprised of Colonel Allen's death, which was sad news to us. Soon after that Lieutenant Smith took the command and marched us to Santa Fe. From there Colonel Cooke took the command and we marched 250 miles down the Rio Grande. When we left the river we were put on half rations—one-half pound of flour and one pound of beef. Our pilots wanted us to go down to the city of Sonora and winter there, as they knew of no other route. The colonel called the commissioned officers of the Battalion to hold a council, and they decided to go by way of Sonora. We started the next morning in regular order with music to "The Girl I Left Behind Me." The boys felt disheartened and could not keep step; they did not want to go that route. The colonel called a halt and with an oath he said, "I started for California and I am a-going," and ordered us to march. Then our step was quick and lively.

We traveled over a country that was unexplored about 500 miles and came to a Spanish town called Tujon. It contained about 500 inhabitants and 200 regular soldiers and a large amount of government stores. The soldiers all fled on our approach and we raised the American flag. We then marched over an 80 mile desert and arrived at the Pemo Indian village, situated on the Gila river. We traveled down to the mouth of the Gila and crossed the Colorado. We then had a 95 mile desert to cross where we were required to dig wells to obtain water. We were put on one-fourth rations of flour and very poor beef, but we soon arrived at Warner's ranch, where we got plenty of beef, and at San Diego we rested for a short time. We then marched to San Luis Rey mission, and remained there about one month. Company B, to which I belonged, under command of Captain Jesse D. Hunter, were sent back to San Diego to take charge of that place, the other companies being sent to Los Angeles. We had to live on beef and mustard greens until a vessel was sent to the Sandwich Islands and returned with provisions, which was more than three months.

Our Battalion was a very poor lot of boys when we arrived at San Diego. We had passed through the extremes of hunger, of thirst and fatigue, and nearly without clothes. I have seen boys so nearly exhausted with fatigue and famished that they wanted to be left by the roadside to die, but the rear guard would bring them along. Company B was ordered to Los Angeles, where all the companies were discharged by Colonel Cook on the 16th day of July, 1847. The majority of the men left for Utah, about sixty went up the coast, some stopped at Monterey, some at Santa Cruz, some went to Sutter's Fort, and some to San Francisco. I was one that stopped at San Francisco.

In the spring of 1848 James Balie and myself made and burned a brick kiln of about 50,000, which was the first brick made in San Francisco. I was one of the first company that left San Francisco for the gold mines on the south fork of the American river at Mormon Island, where we arrived on the 18th of May, 1848. There I was married to Mary Ann Fisher, daughter of Adam Fisher, of Chester county, Pennsylvania, on the 11th day of July, 1848; returned to San Francisco and lived there till the spring of 1850, when we moved to Alameda county on our farm.

My wife gave birth to a daughter on the 25th of December, and on the 1st day of January she died and was buried near San Jose mission. I was married again to Amanda M. Evans on the 10th day of January, 1853. I was ordained and set apart to preside over the San Francisco branch by Hosea Stout, James Lewis and Chapman Duncan. I moved to Alameda county the same year and lived on my farm. In 1856 I was set apart by George Q. Cannon to preside over the Centerville branch, members of which in 1857 formed a company to go to Utah, and I was appointed captain. We arrived in Utah on the 3rd of November, 1857.

I was born in the town of Sempronius, Cayuga county, New York, on the 22nd day of April, 1818; was baptized in May, 1834, in Cortland county, New York, and have resided here in Centerville over thirty-six years.

Very respectfully,
ZACHERY CHENEY,

SOUTHERN UTAH.

KANAB, Kane Co., Feb. 14, 1894.—The usual monotony of dry weather and sand was fairly broken last Saturday when six or eight inches of snow fall, and cleared off with a drifting blizzard from the northeast.

The merry jingle of sleigh bells have been heard in our town, which is rather unusual for Kanab, and our prospect for water to irrigate our lands with next season is very fair.

A new reservoir covering about 15 acres is nearing completion from which the lower part of our farming lands can be watered. Twenty teams and scrapers have been working steadily for several weeks. Our main ditch is enlarged and a good deal of work has also been done on our dam, in widening out the spill, preparing for spring freshets and early use of all the water in Kanab creek. Our reservoir, constructed last winter at the upper part of our field has proven very successful and we feel much encouraged in such enterprises. We have more natural sites for reservoirs and expect to utilize them in the near future.

A welcome-home reception was given last evening to our returned missionaries from New Zealand, Elders Wm. T. and David B. Stewart. About 300 adults sat down to picnic at 5 p. m., and to see the abundance of good, wholesome food prepared by the sisters, would indicate there was no scarcity in the land and that "hard times had come again no more." A program was rendered during the evening, consisting of speeches of welcome home to the missionaries by Elder E. D. Woolley, president of the Stake, and Elder Johnson, Bishop of the ward; also an original address written by Sister M. Elizabeth Little, which were responded to by the brethren, who appeared to lack for nothing but for words to express their appreciation. Songs, recitations, select readings, music by the choir and by the brass band, and were interspersed with dancing till 12 o'clock. I ought to say all this took place in our new social hall erected last summer and fall and was so far completed as to be used during the holidays for meetings and other sociables; it is the only building we have had that was large enough to hold the people. J. L. B.

AN OGDEN FESTIVAL.

OGDEN, Feb. 20.—Last Friday evening will long be remembered by the Bishop and Saints of the First ward, Ogden, the event being a party and supper gotten up by the Relief society, the Sunday school, the choir, the Y. L. and Y. M. M. I. and the Primary associations in honor of Bishop Brown, whose failing health became an object of solicitude to every member of the ward. The doctor had advised a trip to the coast as the best remedy for rest and recuperation. To aid him in defraying the expenses, every heart responded with loving emotion in the above event, to make it a financial success.

Long before eight o'clock, smiling faces were seen wending their way toward the meeting house with baskets swung from arms laden with goodies from hearth and farm, which, with dainty hands, were soon spread upon spacious tables—"a feast for all." The large hall was crowded to a jam and among the vast throng were noticed familiar faces from all parts of Ogden, showing that the Bishop's circle of friends was not limited to the First ward alone. Notwithstanding the crowd, there was dancing, and the climax was reached when the Old Folks arranged themselves, quadrille order, "to teach the young ideas how to shoot" (across and on the glassy floor, which proved rather too slippery for some of the veterans.) After supper, which was in every way a success, doubly so because of the sweet hands, sweet faces and sweet meats which graced the sumptuous board; the assembly was called to order and Elder Franklin D. Richards, of the Council of the Apostles, in his usual fatherly style, spoke a few words complimentary of the occasion and in sympathy of the delicate state of Bishop Brown's health. He was followed by Elder C. F. Middleton, of the Stake presidency, who briefly touched upon the history of the worthy Bishop, relating instances illustrative of the life which subsequently led to such noble distinctions of character.

Next came a poem, composed by Mrs. L. F. Moench for the occasion in behalf of the Relief society of the ward. A comic song followed, after which the young and gay were wafted away with the sweet strains of music, interspersed now and then with another comic song, till the midnight hour tolled the parting sound.

Bishop Brown thanked the assembled many for the interest manifested in his behalf, assuring all that their kindness found a responsive echo in his heart, and that he would ever hold in sacred remembrance the acts of friendship extended to him in the hour of affliction. He had but one desire, and that was to serve his God and his people. This he felt he could do better in good health, hence the proposed trip to the coast, that he might again be better prepared to fill the mission to which God had called him.

After benediction all returned to their homes satisfied that their efforts had been crowned with complete success, for a nice sum had been realized as a substantial token of friendship to their beloved Bishop.

Where all do well it is hard to make distinctions, yet we cannot help give an extra word of praise to the ladies whose willing hands and loving hearts knew no bounds in showing their tender feelings to the father of their ward in time of affliction. M.

ELDER BARTON'S DEATH.

Elder George A. Smith, who came home in charge of the body of Elder Walter H. Barton, whose death near McComb City, Mississippi, occurred on the 18th inst., as heretofore chronicled in these columns, called at the News office Saturday morning and related the particulars of the sad event.

Elder Barton, he said, arrived at Chattanooga on the 22nd of December and was assigned to Pike county, Mississippi, with Elder J. M. Phelps, of Idaho. For the next two weeks immediately following he appeared to be in the best of health and numerous remarks were made concerning his robust condition. There was one extraordinary circumstance, however, in connection with his condition and that was that he was gaining in flesh at an unusual rate. His rapid increase to corpulency was the occasion of numerous good-natured remarks and jokes at his expense, and he was frequently heard to state that unless there was a change his clothes would all be too small for him.

One day he stepped on to a pair of scales and made the rather astonishing discovery that he had not increased in weight. That disclosure was the occasion of apprehension on the part of his friends and he was asked if he was not ill and he repeatedly replied in the negative. But the swelling of his body continued and dropsical symptoms developed. Finally he complained of not being well and was obliged to take to his bed at the residence of John Crane, a member of the Church. There he received every possible attention. On the 8th inst. a letter reached the Chattanooga office announcing his illness. Particulars were immediately telegraphed for and on the 10th a dispatch was received conveying the alarming information: "We fear he will not improve." Elder Smith then took the next train from Chattanooga to McComb City, a distance of 450 miles, arriving at the bedside of the sick Elder the day following. He thought he found him improving, as he was assured by the attending physician, Dr. Gattin, that he had passed the danger line and that all that was necessary to his complete and speedy recovery was careful nursing.

The following Elders contributed to the comfort of the sick missionary and had kept vigilant watch at his couch of illness: Phelps, of Idaho, Holt of Sandy, Utah; Lechtenstein, Logan; Doxie, Ogden, Haycock, Kanab. On the 18th Elder Smith returned to Chattanooga, the doctor again informing him that the patient would recover unless he should become the victim of a relapse. At noon on the 18th he received a telegram to the effect that Elder Barton had died that morning at eight o'clock. He immediately wired to have the body embalmed, a process that was promptly attended to by a competent undertaker, and forwarded in an airtight casket.

The preliminary arrangements were all attended to and the body brought home in charge of Elder Smith, who says that he was shown ever courtesy possible by the railway officials of the various roads over which he traveled.

Much praise, he adds, is due to the families of John Crane, G. W. Woodward and Wm. Ward, all of whom proved their devotion and kindness to the Elders in their sad hour of trial and bereavement.

UTAH SHEEP IN WYOMING.

Thinking it would prove of interest to the readers of your worthy paper to hear how Utah sheep are faring out here, I send you the following for publication: Since January 23rd the ground has been covered with snow from four to six inches deep, and the weather has been cold ever since. The last few days we have been visited by heavy winds and snow which has been very hard on the sheep, and owing to the scarcity of feed this winter the sheep are getting very poor. If spring don't come soon, losses will be quite heavy; but on the whole I don't think it will exceed 15 or 20 per cent.

GRANGER, Wyo. C. W. OLSON.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

The last edition of the Tooele Times has been issued, the plant sold and shipped, being sent from this city to Eureka. The purchaser is Mr. B. B. Clark. What he intends doing with it he has not announced.

When Chief Justice Merritt took his seat in the Third district court Monday morning he announced that, on the recommendation of the examining committee, he had decided to appoint I. C. Falconer as assistant court stenographer.

Parley Young, of Fairview, arraigned on a charge of unlawful cohabitation, alleged to have been committed with Louisa Briggs in January of 1893, entered a plea of guilty and was sentenced to fifty days' imprisonment.

It was ten years ago since Granger was organized into an ecclesiastical ward. In view of that event the ward Relief Society Feb. 23rd presented Bishop McRae and his counselors, John C. Mackey and John H. Bawden, with a handsome chair each.

A private letter was received in this city from Hon. Moses Thatcher now in San Francisco. It conveyed the welcome information that Mr. Thatcher's health was improving and that he felt better now than at any time for the past two years.

Colonel Lett's condition Tuesday, was considered very critical and grave doubts as to his recovery are now entertained. A consultation of a number of leading physicians was called to take place at the residence of the patient this evening.

Hank Mikesell was tried on a charge of fornication, alleged to have been committed with Stella Pueblo, near Thistle. He was found guilty and sentenced to fifty days in the penitentiary. The trial was held with closed doors. The woman recently gave birth to a child.

The Mexican Onyx company celebrated Washington's birthday by the receipt of a carload of onyx from its quarry in Utah county. This is the first shipment of onyx ever received in Salt Lake City for commercial purposes. It will be sawn and polished by Watson and used in the city and county building.

Albert Whipple's residence and granary on Provo bench were on Saturday night destroyed by fire. The loss is $2,000; insurance, $500. The fire was caused by the explosion of a lamp. Mrs. Whipple was walking across the floor with the lamp when her toe caught in a crack. She fell and the lamp was dashed on the floor and exploded.

In the case of Nellie Ogden, the slayer of "Kid" Mason, wherein the indictment charged voluntary manslaughter. District Attorney Judd said he had agreed to accept a plea of guilty to involuntary manslaughter. The defendant plead guilty to this charge, whereupon Judge Merritt sentenced her to three months' imprisonment only in the county jail.

TUBA CITY, Feb. 18, 1894.—According to our family record my brother Lehi was born November 3rd, 1847, in Salt Lake City and has always claimed the honor of being the first white boy born in Utah; but he admits that the girl was ahead of him. He and his mother are alive and can be found at Thurber, Wayne county, Utah.

D. BRINKERHOFF.

Professor Brimhall, of the B. Y. Academy at Provo, announces that the final arrangements for holding the summer normal training school at that place have been made and that some of the most noted educators of the country have been secured for the full course. The school opens in the latter part of June and will extend through a period of six weeks.

Wm. Sears, a traveling representative of Salt Lake Z. C. M. I., says the Iron county Record, was in Cedar City the first of the week interviewing our merchants. Mr. Sears was caught out in the blizzard a week ago Saturday between Milford and Minersville. During the storm he was dumped into Beaver river, going in up to his waist. Before finding shelter he froze both his feet.

Mr. S. L. Boggs, of Pennsylvania, writes to the Chamber of Commerce, acknowledging the receipt of a sample of Gilsontite, and stating that his attention had been attracted to some pieces of sheet iron coated on both sides, in the Utah exhibit at the Midwinter Fair. He desired to obtain a sample of this kind, and Judge Colborn has directed Mr. McGuire, who is at the fair, to forward the said sample.

The names of the six miners killed at Raton, New Mexico, on Washington's Birthday are Joseph Fotheringill, Richard Thornton, Robert Penman, Albert Snyder, Ed Hogan and Samuel Wells; the latter was 13 years of age. There were three men injured, Wm. Graham, August Heinquest and Harry Wells, but they will recover. The disaster was caused by an explosion in Blossburg coal mines.

About a week ago that dreadful disease diphtheria entered the family circle of William McLachlan, and on Wednesday last his son James N., aged 8 years, succumbed to its ravages. On Thursday another son, Robert B., also passed away. The latter was in his twelfth year. The remains of both were interred in the Taylorville cemetery yesterday afternoon, Feb. 24. Two other children are suffering from the same disease.

Elder Jessie M. Baker, of Teton, Fremont county, Idaho, returned from a mission to the Northwestern states for which part of the country he left his home on February 3rd, 1892. He labored in Indiana at different times aggregating in all sixteen months and in Ohio for the remainder of his absence from the West. He reports having had good health and that the mission is in a promising condition.

The aged sister Foss, of Bountiful, who is within a few months of 94 years of age, is reported as being very low and nearing her end in mortality. President Woodruff visited his aged friend and sister-in-law Sunday, and found her condition exceedingly precarious. He was the means of bringing almost the entire family into the Church, having baptized them in Maine; and he brought them with him to the valley in 1850. The father of Sister Foss was 90 years old when he died.

In the Third district court February 21st Dr. O. H. Dogge brought suit against Drs. Allen Fowler, F. S. Bascom, J. M. Dart, J. S. Richards, S. L. Brick and M. N. Graves, comprising the board of medical examiners of Utah Territory, claiming damages in the sum of $25,000 for having "wickedly and maliciously combined and contrived to deprive him of a license to practice his profession."

Miss Annie Nichols entered suit in the Fourth district court on Saturday against D. C. Hersbie, for breach of promise of marriage. Miss Nichols claims that on September 4, 1892, in this city, defendant promised to marry her on the 18th day of the same month, and that he has not kept his promise though she is ready, and has been since the time said promise was made, to fulfil her part of the bargain. The lady now sues Mr. Hersbie for the sum of $5,000 for failure in keeping his bargain.

At the meeting of the Logan city council held last Wednesday evening a communication was received from the mayor, calling attention to the fact that the city had exceeded its borrowing capacity by about $8,000, and as the amount to be received during the next two years from all sources would be consumed in the necessary expenses of the bonded indebtedness, he suggested as a remedy that Congress be petitioned to extend the limit a small percentage, so that Logan's creditors may be paid and saved any uneasiness.

A telegraphic dispatch to the President's office in this city from Tempe, Arizona, February 25th, and signed by Elders H. C. Rogers and C. R. Hakes, of the Maricopa Stake presidency, conveyed the sad news that Elder C. I. Robson, president of the Stake, died the night previous, Saturday, at 10 o'clock. No particulars were given, but it is understood that the deceased has been ill for five or six months, in fact ever since he sustained an injury from being kicked in the face by a horse.

A Spanish Fork correspondent to the Provo Dispatch, under date of Feb. 19th, says: Last Monday evening young Schuyler Brown, while holding to a horse's tail which another boy was riding was kicked in the face, knocking out several teeth and cutting and bruising his face and chin considerably. At present writing he is improving rapidly. Many boys here have a habit of holding to a horse's tail, and sliding on their skates, while the rider urges his pony to a dangerous speed. It is a wonder that many accidents have not occurred.

Tuesday night a change that has been expected for some time, as the result of the legal dispute between Mr. Beck and Mr. Hyde, was carried into effect at a meeting of the board of directors of the Buillon-Beck Mining company. The president of the company, Mr. Thatcher, is now in California, and John Beck, vice president, presided at the meeting. The directors voted to remove A. E. Hyde from the position of manager for the company, and P. T. Farnsworth, who is also manager of the Horn Silver, was appointed to take charge of the company's mines until the regular election next month.

Up to and including Feb. 26, Joseph Lippman, treasurer of the Press club, had deposited to the credit of the Young Ladies' Aid society $428, which represents the net receipts of the three lectures given under the auspices of the Press club. There are some outstanding accounts from the sale of season tickets that will probably swell the total up to $450. All expenses have been paid, and up to date have only reached $75.75. The total receipts are $501.75. This latter amount at 25 cents a head represents 2007 people, an average attendance of 670 at each lecture.

About 4 o'clock Feb. 20 the people of Ogden were startled by the news that Dr. G. V. Ewing had dropped dead. The deceased was on his way to the home of Mrs. Ed. Hoffer, his daughter, at 2308 Harrison avenue, and had stepped from the car, on which he had been riding. He went two or three steps when he fell and expired almost immediately. A delivery wagon happened by just as Mr. Ewing fell, and the teamster, with the aid of others, lifted him into the wagon and conveyed him to his daughter's home. Dr. Gordon was at once summoned but found that medical aid could do nothing.

Friday evening in the Sugar House Ward Assembly room there was a large gathering to do honor to Elder Peter Swenson prior to his departure for a foreign mission. The excellent program throughout and especially the violin solo by Prof. W. C. Olive, accompanied by Miss Maggie Taylor was much appreciated. Recitations were given by Miss Belle Salmon and others. The addresses, selections by the mandolin and guitar club were also of a high order—in fact every part was excellently performed. The kind feeling manifested and the handsome purse tendered Elder Swenson will cause him to long remember the occasion.

The board of directors of the First National bank of Nephi has selected a cashier to succeed Alma Hague, deposed on account of the recent developments which caused such a sensation in business circles. The gentleman who will hereafter have charge of the affairs of the bank, under the supervision of the board, is W. W. Armstrong, formerly in the employ of Geo. A. Lowe, of Salt Lake City. Mr. Armstrong has already assumed the duties of his new office and is giving the best of satisfaction to the members of the board and the customers of the institution. He presented himself to the board with the best of recommendations, that of Mr. Lowe being especially flattering.—Provo Dispatch.

William H. Farnsworth, says the Beaver Usonian, has been engaged to conduct the business of the Beaver woolen mills as its superintendent.

The board we believe has made a wise choice, and one that will receive the hearty approval of all the stockholders. Mr. Farnsworth has proven himself a capable business man and we anticipate good results from his engagement. Arrangements are being made to begin operations about the last of April or beginning of May this year. Repairs on the machinery, and getting it in running order will commence at once. Mr. John Robinson has been engaged to superintend the machinery and looms in the lower room, and Richard Curfew will take charge of the cards, etc., in the upper room, and W. H. Farnsworth will superintend the entire business.

News was received on Tuesday, February 20th to the effect that Mrs. Woodbury, of St. George, had broken her arm, which was a mistake. A letter received by Elder Angus M. Cannon, President of Salt Lake Stake, from his brother David H. Cannon, under date of Feb. 18, gives the following particulars of the accident:

"Last evening as I sat down to supper a young man came into my house, all excitement, stating that Sister Woodbury had put her ankle out of place and wanted me to come over. I sent him for a doctor and went over to see our sister Ann, who I found suffering intense agony from pain in the ankle. The doctor soon arrived and pronounced it a bad fracture of the small bone of the leg. In a short time he had her left limb in splints and bandages. The fracture is three or four inches above the ankle. She was alone at the time of the accident and was found by a child who came on an errand."

Mr. Thomas, an employee of the waterworks department, who keeps watch of the interests of the municipality in City Creek canyon, reports that there are more mountain lions prowling about in the brush and ravines and on the hillsides up there. On the night following the killing of the lioness by Hunter Rognon and John Boez, Mr. Thomas said the mate of the slaughtered animal made the darkness hideous by its moans and savage growls and that these grating sounds have been kept up ever since.

Several other mountain lions are reported to have been seen in the canyon the last few days and Councilman Newell is greatly exercised over the fact and is said to be willing to introduce a resolution at the session of the city fathers tonight allowing every man and boy in the county who is old enough to carry a gun, including the United States troops at Fort Douglas to go into the canyon and kill off the man eaters.

Mr. Rye Mikesell, civil engineer, late of Salt Lake, says the Richfield Advocate, has been in Richfield for several days drawing up plans and plats of a reservoir that will be constructed a short distance southwest of Joseph City, the probable cost of which will be $6,000. This reservoir will cover about 148 acres, with an average depth of 22½ feet; the dam will be 50 feet high and 175 feet thick at the base and 25 at the top. The pipe through which the water will flow will be made of wood staves bound with iron bands. The staves of this pipe will be made in such a way that the internal pressure of the water will force the staves closer together instead of opening them. The pipe will be laid in masonwork and cement. The overflow will be through a natural gap some distance away from the dam. This will be the beginning of a number of reservoirs that must be constructed in the near future in this and Piute counties, and we watch its success with a good deal of interest.

H. C. James, of James-Spencer-Bateman company, of Salt Lake, and T. F. Mahoney, accompanied by their engineer, W. F. Shelton, says the Iron county Record, were in Cedar two or three days of last week looking over the city with a view of putting in a system of waterworks here, and will, within a month, submit a proposition to that end to our city council. They were well pleased with the progressive spirit manifested by our people, and the future prospects of Cedar, and believe that the ultimate growth of Cedar will justify the expense of putting in a waterworks system should the city give such an enterprise the encouragement they expect at its hands. The necessity of such a system has long been felt by our people, who know and feel the need of securing a supply of pure water for culinary and other purposes, and we believe that if a fair and reasonable proposition is made by these gentlemen that it will receive the hearty endorsement of every resident of our progressive city.

On Wednesday a frightful accident occurred at Lehi Junction, resulting in the death of a fourteen-year-old boy named William Pullen. His step-father, Jonathan Chatterton, is an employee of the Union Pacific Railway company, and formerly a resident of this city. But on Wednesday he was removing with his family to Lehi Junction to take charge of the engine there. It appears that his stepson left the train and proceeded up the track in the direction of the house in which the family expected to take up their abode. At the same time a train was backing down the track, which, however, he was prevented from observing on account of a blinding storm which was then in progress. The boy was run down by the train, which passed over the lower parts of his body, crushing his limbs in a fearful manner. He was not discovered for some ten or twelve minutes, when his cries attracted the attention of a lady living near by, and later of the men at the depot. When found he held a basket and a parcel under his arm, and was lying close by the track. A physician at Lehi was immediately sent for, as was also the company's surgeon at Provo, but on their arrival pronounced his case hopeless. All was done that could be to alleviate his suffering, but he died at 5 o'clock in the evening.

Fremont county, Colorado, fruit prospects are excellent in the vicinity of Canon city, where the mercury has run down and stopped at ten below zero and plenty of snow to protect tree roots.

Poultry raising in the Grand valley Colo., seems to be profitable. Mrs. L. W. Austin, of Rifle, produced from 86 Plymouth Rock hens in 1893, 822 eggs and 225 chicks, and by actual cash record realized $191.50 over and above expenses.

87 AND 56

Anniversary Exercises in Honor of President Wilford Woodruff and his Wife Emma.

BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY.

You are cordially invited to attend
A Social Gathering, to celebrate the 87th Anniversary of my Birthday, and the 56th of my wife, Emma,

to be held in the Annex of the Salt Lake Temple,
Monday, Feb. 26, 1894,
at 1 p. m.

(Signed) WILFORD WOODRUFF.

W. Woodruff, born March 1, 1807.
E. Woodruff, born March 1, 1838.

Such was the invitation which drew somewhat more than two hundred people—relatives, co-laborers and friends of the esteemed couple—to the precincts of the beautiful Temple yesterday afternoon. It is needless to say that few who received it failed in its acceptance—or that, had it been issued to a hundred times as many, there would not have been many vacant places. Room was the only limit to the hospitality of the aged President, who pleasantly remarked that whereas he had previously found his own home totally inadequate to the accommodation of those whom he wished to see on such occasions, he now was convinced that at least a five-acre lot would be necessary, if he invited all whom he desired to welcome.

The feature of the event was the entire absence of formality; all were urged to feel free and were made to rejoice in the hearty cordiality and warm friendship that prevailed. The honored host was full of vivacity and blessings, and through all the addresses there ran a spirit of the most unstilted congratulation, comfort and good cheer.

Shortly after one o'clock President Woodruff called the assembly to order, extended greetings and welcome, thanked his friends for their presence and hoped for their enjoyment during the exercises about to begin. Music was sweetly furnished by the Temple choir, after which President George Q. Cannon offered prayer. More singing followed, and then came brief addresses by Presidents Lorenzo Snow and Joseph F. Smith. Allusion was made to the almost miraculous preservation of President Woodruff's life through various accidents and dangers, to his restoration from his latest severe sickness when all human hope of his recovery seemed to have fled, to his blameless life, his integrity for truth, his untiring labors in the cause of righteousness.

The following song written by Elder H. W. Nalabitt was then given by the veteran songster, Elder William C.

Dunbar, to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne," the audience joining in the chorus:

When pure affection stirs the heart
And wakes its brightest thought;
When righteous impulse bids us start,
We tender then unsought—
Our hands to greet, our lips to speak,
Our words as seals of fire,
Prayer soars beyond the mountain peak,
Love doth the soul inspire.

CHORUS:—
Then sing with right good will,
Our hearty welcome here;
God bless our aged President,
To live for many a year.

Today this thought reigns here, while we
In friendship meet as one,
To greet our President, that he Hath one more birthday won!
That as a Patriarch he stands
And bears his weight of years;
While Israel with uplifted hands
Before the Lord appears;

To supplicate for length of days,
While peace shall spread its wings,
And bless the wife whose pleasant ways
Her warm attachment brings.
Bless Thou, O Lord, Thy servant still,
Whose history links the past,
With all that makes the present thrill.
Then crown him Thine at last!

A feeling address by Elder Franklin D. Richards upon the themes already alluded to, and in gentle and affectionate phrase, was followed by the reading, by Sister Emmeline B. Wells, of the following poem composed by Sister Emily Hill Woodmansee:

EXPRESSION OF ESTEEM.

'Tis fit that loving friends should bring,
Sweet floral offerings fresh and gay;
'Tis fit that Zion's bards should sing,
A jubilant and festive lay
On Wilford Woodruff's natal day.

Or rich, or poor, whate'er their sphere—
Honor to whom is honor due;
Honor to God's anointed seer!
Honor to Zion's chieftain true!
May gracious heaven his strength renew.

"An Israelite devoid of guile,"
To honesty itself akin;
Noble his record, clear and clean
Through many long decades of trial,
Through many a soul-appalling scene.

Born in a most important time,
Number'd amongst a chosen few—
Sent down to fill a role sublime—
A glorious, marvellous work to do;
Pertaining to an era new.

A dispensation long desired,
And waited for by seers of old;
A dispensation that required
The noblest spirits brave and bold,
To storm Tradition's powerful hold.

Joseph, the youthful Prophet, had Sore need of heroes in the field;
Who in the Gospel armor clad,
Inspired with faith and light revealed,
Fought for the Truth, and would not yield.

Faith, steadfast faith, was unsubdued—
Unconquered and unterrified,
When howling mobs, the Saints pursued,
And dealt distress on ev'ry side
And drove them to these valleys wide.

These shelter'd valleys fair and broad,
That ne'er shall be the foeman's spoil,
Here in this refuge, long untrod—
Our Hero first upturn'd the sod—
And planted seed in virgin soil.

The wilderness is nowhere seen,
The desert is redeemed from drought,
Her summer robes of emerald green
Are rich and beautiful throughout;
The source of blessings, who can doubt?

Oppression's hand so oft upraised
To vex or put the Saints to flight,
Is turn'd aside, the Lord be praised,
Who from the gloom evolveth light
And ordereth everything aright.

"Amid the mountain tops" behold!
The Temple towers salute the sky;
The angel lifts his trumpet of gold,
And sends afar the warning cry—
"Repent, the judgment hour is nigh."

'Tis written, "judgment shall begin,
At God's own sacred house," and hence
A part of Babylon's strife and din,

Trouble and woe and dire suspense,
E'en Zion's children needs must sense.

The prophecies we see fulfilled.
The long predicted woes appear;
The stoutest hearts, the strongest willed,
And mightiest nations quake for fear;
Zion's redemption draweth near.

All Zion's friends should now rejoice,
So softened are her waning tocs,
Hosanna sing with heart and voice,
For favors that the Lord bestows
Upon the people of His choice.

Peace shall descend like heavenly dew,
And on our host and hostess rest:
Forever shall their joys accrue.
Yea, for the good they've done, and do,
Truly they are and shall be blest.

Oh, may we all, as in the past,
However tried by needful cares,
Cling to the truth and holiness,
Lest peradventure, unawares,
We'll lose "the priceless pearl" at last.

Narrow "the way" and strait indeed,
Yet wherefore should we be cast down?
"God is our help in times of need,"
And fittingly 'tis thus decreed—
Endurance wins the promised crown.

President George Q. Cannon was the next speaker. He referred to the depth of the love that existed between President Woodruff and all who had ever been called to associate with him, to his guilelessness, his honesty, his consideration for others' feelings and views, and to the great blessings that had come to Israel through his ministrations and preservation.

President Woodruff himself followed. He observed that his brethren had said a great deal about his virtues but not one word as to his imperfections—which he knew he had, like all other mortals. From one part of their testimony, however, he felt that he might not deviate in the slightest degree, and that was their allusion to the power of God that had preserved and sustained him. To Him he felt to give the glory; and as to whether his remaining time on earth should be brief or extended, he had no desires save that all of it should be employed in God's service. His remarks were full of promise and inspiration, and they were listened to with the profoundest interest.

Sister Bathsheba W. Smith called attention to the historical incident, and testified of it, that so far as she knew President Woodruff and herself were the only living persons who had received their endowments under the personal authority and administration of the Prophet Joseph Smith in Nauvoo.

In announcing intermission for refreshments, President Cannon requested more music, after which Bishop John R. Winder led the way to the dining room. The arrangements for this part of the program were effectively planned and splendidly carried out. The food and fruit were abundant and in variety and excellence all that the most exacting taste could ask. The lunch was served to the guests by about a score of young men and women without the least confusion and with admirable celerity. These and all the other arrangements of the occasion were under the direct supervision of Bishop Winder.

Leaving the refreshment hall, the party reassembled in the lower room to listen to further music and speeches. Elders Heber J. Grant, George Goddard, M. W. Merrill, Ezra T. Clark and A. H. Cannon made brief remarks, Elder Clark's testimony being particularly impressive from the fact that he was present at the meeting after the death of the Prophet Joseph when Sidney Rigdon and others aspired to the leadership, but when it was made plain to the assembled Saints that the spirit of Joseph, nay even his voice and very gesture, had fallen upon Brigham.

Sister Zina D. H. Young testified impressively to the same historic incident, declaring that if she as a listener had closed her eyes she would have felt positive it was Joseph who was talking.

The following poem, written by Elder H. W. Naisbitt, was eloquently read by Elder David McKenzie:

THE VETERANS OF OUR CAUSE.

Affectionately to President Woodruff on his 87th birthday, March 1st, 1894.

The veterans of our Zion now, are few and far between;
One now and then with silver hair, and faltering step is seen,
Then memory's tide comes rushing in, to lave our weary feet,
For we too feel the load of years, and think rest will be sweet.

Who now can tell the story conned near by the eastern sea?
Who from the consecrated land of Kirtland had to flee?

Ah, few of all those favored ones, who had the heavens unveiled,
Have stood the test of life and faith, when earth and hell assailed?

From mad Missouri's blood-stained soil, far from its precious sod;
We hail a veteran now and then true to his faith and God.
His quivering lip the story tells of carnage, fire and loss;
And yet the Centre Stake he claims his crown despite the cross.

From out Nauvoo—the beautiful—what veterans led the way,
Forsaking all when Joseph fell that dark historic day!
A weary pilgrimage they had, a grave-marked route, 'tis said;
For many a weary soul went out, the martyr's grave their bed.

Since those wild, stormy days of yore, our God gave Israel peace,
Yet hundreds of those valiant ones since then have found release!
Their bodies rest on fair hillsides, beneath the mountains grand,
Their works are seen in Utah's vales, for ages yet to stand!

'Twas Brigham, Heber, Willard, Grant—'twas Taylor, Pratt, the crows!
'Tis Woodruff, Cannon, Richards, Smith, all known by friends and foes;
All links in that eternal chain of priesthood, history too;
Grand veterans in the glorious cause of Zion, tried and true!

Their lives we honor by our own; their days of birth we keep;
And when they pass the great divide, in tears our souls we steep!
They are beloved for counsel given, beloved for mighty deeds;
In faith sustained as those inspired, for all that Israel needs.

This day we greet our President, preserved by power divine;
A veteran of the noblest type, in this last age to shine;
True from the first, true to the last, in every land the same,
God grant him birthdays without stint; in heaven—immortal name.

A suggestion, prompted by Brother Clark's and Sister Young's remarks, was that all present should rise to their feet who had heard the sermon of President Young after the martyrdom of Joseph and Hyrum, on which occasion the Saints were convinced that the mantle of Joseph had truly fallen upon Brigham. The following responded:

Wilford Woodruff,
George Q. Cannon,
Zina D. H. Young,
Bathsheba W. Smith,
Rachel Grant,

Jane S. Richards,
Ezra T. Clark,
Lucy Walker Kimball Smith,
Jane S. Farnsworth,
Margaret Pierce Young,
Maria W. Wilcox,
John McDonald,
H. B. Clawson,
Ellen C. Clawson,
Joseph Horne,
M. Isabella Horne,
Samuel W. Richards,
Emmeline B. Wells.

Those present who knew the Prophet Joseph in Kirtland were asked to rise, and the following seven responded:

Wilford Woodruff,
Lorenzo Snow,
Joseph Horne,
M. Isabella Horne,
Sarah M. Kimball,
Laura Miner,
Zina D. H. Young.

Then there was a request for the names of those present who knew the Prophet Joseph Smith in his lifetime. There were responses from the following:

Wilford Woodruff,
Lorenzo Snow,
Franklin D. Richards,
George Q. Cannon,
Joseph F. Smith,
Wilford Woodruff, Jr.,
Emma Woodruff,
Bathsheba W. Smith,
Zina D. H. Young,
Jane S. Richards,
Priscilla C. Saines,
Ezra T. Clark,
Mary S. Clark,
Rachel Grant,
Lucy Walker Kimball Smith,
Joseph Horne,
M. Isabella Horne,
Sarah M. Kimball,
Emmeline B. Wells,
John Miller,
Samuel W. Richards,
A. M. Musser,
Elijah F. Sheets,
Seymour B. Young,
Laura Miner,
Brigham Y. Hampton,
Angus M. Cannon,
Jane S. Farnsworth,
Mary Alice Lambert,
H. B. Clawson,
Ellen C. Clawson,
Lucy B. Young,
John McDonald,
Mary Jane Thompson,
Samuel Bateman,
Maria W. Wilcox,
Susan E. Smith,
Hannah C. Wells,
Margaret Pierce Young.

It was then announced that inasmuch as all present would doubtless be pleased to clasp the hands of the beloved couple in whose honor the exercises, now concluded, had been held, the assemblage might pass around in order and, after shaking hands, could retire. The program terminated with the singing of the Doxology, after which, for half an hour, President and Sister Woodruff stood receiving the personal greetings and congratulations of their friends.

It was a delightful occasion in every respect. Nothing occurred to mar its harmony or disturb its pleasure. All the arrangements were perfect, and they were perfectly carried out. Bishop Winder and his assistants deserve great credit for the smoothness and thoroughness with which every detail was attended to, and Prof. Thomas and his sweet-voiced associates contributed not a little by their melody to the pleasure of the event.

The NEWS need not consume space in passing eulogies upon the venerable man whose name was on every one's lips. Wilford Woodruff's long life is before the Saints and before the world. The earth is better for his having lived. To no person has he done an injury, and we pity the soul that can find occasion for the least feeling of enmity toward him. In the hearts of the Latter-day Saints his place is well-assured, his name will ever be held in loving remembrance. We congratulate him on having lived so usefully and so long beyond the allotted span, and echo the sentiments expressed by the speakers above-named, that he and Sister Emma may both continue in mortality as long as life shall be desirable to them. These, we feel sure, are the sentiments of all the Latter-day Saints near and far, and we deem it opportune, in view of the anniversary already celebrated, to express them now, although the actual birthday is still two days in future. May God's choicest blessings attend our beloved and honored President!

WHIRLED BY THE ELEMENTS.

Logan Journal, February 21st gives the details of two accidents, one caused by the wind and the other by a snowslide, in which the victims escaped death, but two of them received severe injuries. One of the occurrences was at Smithfield, where the house of March O. Peterson was blown in by the hurricane which prevailed on Saturday night. A large quantity of bricks and other material crashed in upon the family while they were in bed. Mrs. Peterson was badly bruised and skinned about the head and shoulders, and her right arm was broken near the wrist. Her baby was saved from death by the woman's arm being around and over it, as the blow which broke her arm would otherwise have fallen on the little one's head. Mr. Peterson escaped with a few slight bruises. In the darkness and confusion of the wreck nothing in the shape of clothing could be found, and the entire family had to make their way in dishabille and barefoot to a neighbor's.

The other instance was in Logan canyon on Saturday night. Albert Hugi, of Logan, was working along with his father, brother and brother-in-law about three or four miles up the canyon, where are located some very high cliffs. Above those the men were at work, when a snowslide came sweeping along, narrowly missing two of the men, and carrying Albert over the almost perpendicular cliff at least 175 feet high, and further down the ravine some two or three hundred yards below, where the slide came to a stop and Albert found himself with his head protruding out of the snow. He worked loose and called for his father, who found his son in a pool of blood which issued from a very large wound in his head. The other men repaired to the scene and the young man was relieved from his position. He was taken to Logan and Dr. Ormsby summoned. He found a large scalp wound on the top of the head, besides which the young man had one rib broken, and was otherwise badly shaken up internally.

THE LEGISLATURE.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

Yesterday afternoon Sears, chairman of the House committee on claims, submitted the following report:

Your committee on claims and public accounts, acting jointly with the committee on claims and public accounts of the Council, to whom was referred House Claim No. 24, of Garfield county, of $1,571.19; H. C. No. 6, of H. W. Hawley, of $377.50; H. C. No. 51, of Grand county, of $1,011.36; H. C. No. 47, of Sanpete county, $12,262.70; H. C. No. 84, of Sevier county, of $2,536.76; H. C. No. 82, of Millard county, for $538.85; H. C. No. 8, of B. B. Quinn, of $402.85; H. C. No. 36, of J. H. Tipton, for $190.65, respectfully submit the following: Said committees, acting jointly, as aforesaid, and after spending considerable time in the consideration of the respective claims adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That no claim incurred by the respective counties or by any county officer for criminal expenses in justices' courts, including the fees of witnesses, jurors, stenographers, constables, sheriffs, justices and commissioners, be allowed, but that the same be rejected.

And, whereas, The above mentioned claims come within the said resolution we recommend that said claims be rejected.

All of the claims disallowed by the committee were for costs of criminal prosecutions, and the discussion of the report opened up the whole subject. Varian asked by what right the claims committee rejected claims that were, by a law of Congress, made a charge against the Territory. Sears promptly replied that the committee were governed by a law of the Territory, which provided that costs of criminal prosecutions in certain cases were a charge against the county. Varian deprecated the intelligence of any man who would give a law of the Territory preference to one of Congress, and Sears promptly replied that, so far as he was concerned, he would obey the law of the Territory until the Territorial Supreme court should pass upon the question.

Varian remarked that he desired the gentleman (Sears) to place himself on record, which the latter promptly did. Later Varian supported the action of the committee, in rejecting this class of claims, in view of all the circumstances, and voted to adopt the report, including the resolution. In fact the report to adopt was unanimous, and the House has thus made an explicit record of its position in respect to this class of claims. Sears has been carrying the brunt of this fight, with Stanford, who is chairman of the ways and means committee, a close and able ally. These gentlemen have had to contend with the very disagreeable features connected with this question, and the action of the House, especially its unanimous character, is both a victory for and a vindication of them.

Yesterday afternoon while the revenue bill was under consideration in the House, the motion to strike out the clause exempting from taxation, mortgages and trust deeds, and the notes and debts secured by them, gave rise to a debate of a character precisely similar to that which was had on Varian's bill to tax debts secured by mortgages and trust deeds, except that it was briefer. The same denunciations of capital, and the legislation favoring it, were reiterated, and the motion was carried by the same vote, viz., 12 to 11, by which Varian's bill passed the House. Johnson, who made the motion, expressed defiance of the press and its opinions and influence, and predicted a revolutionary uprising of the people, if the injustice of existing tax laws is not remedied, and Allen spoke in a similar strain. A marked flavor of Populism characterized the remarks and sentiments of these two gentlemen.

Three of the bills "to regulate the practice of medicine," which have been in the hands of the House committee on public health, were adversely reported yesterday, by Chairman Wine. The report was adopted and the bills were killed. The bill "to advance the science of medicine and surgery," by providing bodies of persons dying under certain circumstances, in public institutions, for dissection, was included in the slaughter. A day or two ago, a physician representing the interests and wishes of the "regular" physicians, took occasion to expostulate with a member of the health committee of one of the houses on account of the delay of the committee in reporting the amendments to the present law which the "regulars" had recommended, and intimated that it was evidently the intention of the committee to delay action until it would be too late for the Assembly to do anything but repeal the present law. The legislator thus addressed replied to the effect that the health committee had its own ideas of its duty, and intended to perform it.

This afternoon Stoker, of the House committee on public health, presented a bundle of petitions asking for the passage of a bill amending the present medical law, which had been prepared under the auspices of the so-called regular physicians. The petitions and the accompanying bill were referred to the health committee. It is said of this bill that it is as objectionable in many respects as is the present law, and it is not believed that the health committee will favorably report it.

After a long and wearisome discussion, the Council yesterday passed H. B. 87, creating Carbon county. The bill has been amended, since the House passed it, by eliminating all provisions specifying who shall be the officers, and where shall be the seat of the new county. This was done mainly for constitutional reasons. It is thought the bill will readily pass the House as amended. An election will determine the county seat and officers.

FRIDAY.

In the House this forenoon Parsons, chairman of the committee on appropriations, introduced H. B. 189 (substitute for a bill previously introduced), which is designed to create a fund for the employment of the poor. There was an attempt to pass the bill under a suspension of the rules, but Allen pointed out reasons why it should be printed and considered by the committee on ways and means, and the House so ordered. The bill is as follows:

A Bill for an Act to Provide Labor for the Destitute Poor of Utah Territory..

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah:

Sec. 1. That the several counties of this Territory may and they are hereby authorized and empowered to issue warrants to the amount of one-fourth of one mill for each dollar in value of the taxable property situated in the county, said value to be computed from the assessed value of property within the respective counties, according to the issue of the assessment roll of A. D. 1893, said warrants to bear interest at the rate of five per cent per annum from the date of issue until called in for payment; provided that such warrants shall not be issued for any other purpose than in payment for labor performed upon the public roads within the county issuing them.

Sec. 2. Said warrants shall be redeemable one or two years from the date of issue, at the option of the county issuing them.

Sec. 3. Any county issuing warrants as is herein provided, may levy and collect a special tax, not to exceed three-eighths of one mill on each dollar of the taxable property within the county, for the purpose of redeeming said warrants, and the funds so collected shall be applied, first to the redemption of said warrants, and the surplus, if there be any, shall be covered into the poor fund of the county.

Sec. 4. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Whether or not a sensation is produced by the following resolution remains to be seen:

Resolved, That the ways and means committee is hereby authorized to summon and administer oaths to witnesses in matters of public interest pending before said committee; and the sergeant-at-arms is hereby directed to serve subpoenas signed by the Speaker upon request of the said committee.

In support of the resolution, Sears said that parties who had been called upon for information, had ignored the request of the committee. The resolution was unanimously adopted, and it is probable that the sergeant-at-arms will next be waiting upon individuals who know something about public accounts and finances.

Party politics were actively employed in the House today. While H. B. 117, providing for the payment of jurors and witnesses, and appointing court commissioners, was under consideration, it became necessary to choose a court commissioner for each judicial district and insert his name in the bill. The Republican nominees, which had been agreed on in caucus, were presented by Varian, and were as follows:

First district, Benjamin Bachman; second district, James Lowe; third district, L. M. Earl; fourth district, T. J. Stevens.

The Democratic nominees, presented by Powers, were as follows: First district, John Turner; second district, W. H. Baker; third district, G. D. Pyper; fourth district, H. H. Rollap.

By a strict party vote, the Republican nominees were chosen.

The next measure called up was H. B. 99, offering a bounty of 50 cents per ton on sugar beet, and the Democrats indulged in jocularly and burlesque while it was under consideration. Hubbard offered an amendment, paying a bounty on wheat, potatoes, barley, etc. Ivins offered another providing that the compensation of the chemist, on whose report the beet bounty is to be paid, be paid out of the treasury of the company using the beets. Nebeker offered several additional sections, appropriating $100,000 to encourage the raising of bananas, and containing a number offjokes. Powers made a semi-comic speech in support of Nebeker's proposition, and Hatch replied in Bill Nye style. The proceedings were more diverting than dignified. Pending action on the bill, the House took a recess till 2 p. m., when the revenue bill was to come up as special order.

But little of interest transpired in the Council after the close of the News report Wednesday. A bill for an attorneys' lien, drawn by the Bar association and introduced by H. E. Booth, was rejected on the technical ground that its subject matter could not be again considered at this session of the Legislature, action having been taken thereon by the rejection of a bill covering the same ground. The bill to give mayors an unqualified power of removal was also killed. C. B. 78, providing for the abolishment of the office of collector and imposing its duties on the treasurer in third class cities, was passed, when the Council adjourned till 2 p. m. today.

SATURDAY.

It is a fact that a bill is being drawn today preparatory to being introduced Monday, "to regulate the practice of medicine." The bill will embrace features that have been insisted upon by the "regular" physicians, will be generous to the "irregulars," and will aim to guard the rights and interests of the people at large. It will provide for a board of medical examiners of which the Governor will be chairman. Any graduate of any medical college of any school, on proof of such graduation, shall receive a license, provided he shall pass a satisfactory examination; the board may refuse to issue a license if the applicant has been guilty of criminal, immoral and dishonorable conduct during three years next preceding the filing of his application. If the license be refused on such ground, the medical board must, within sixty days of their refusal of the application for a license, prepare and file with the clerk of the district court of the district where the applicant resides, a written statement of the facts, or alleged facts, on which the refusal is based. Such statement then becomes the complaint in a civil action, the issues in which shall be determined by the court, which shall order the license to be issued or withheld according to the result of the trial. This provision is designed to meet the constitutional objection to judicial functions being exercised by the board. The bill defines medical practitioners as those who "for a fee, treat, operate upon or prescribe for any physical ailment of another," and does not apply to persons doing those things free of charge. Neither does the bill apply to the use of family remedies. Non-graduates may receive a license if twenty-five legal voters of the county sign a petition so requesting, and persons who have practiced obstetrics for five years are permitted to continue. It is thought the bill will contain proper safeguards against quacks, and yet meet objections to the present law.

The attitude which Allen has taken on the floor of the House on several occasions and in respect to several different measures, particularly the revenue bill, has roused the resentment of some of the Republicans, a number of whom feel that he has purposely sought to belittle their efforts and measures from motives other than a desire to subvert the public welfare. Allen and Varian have been recognized to a greater or less extent as the leaders of the Republican side of the House, but they are not preserving harmony among their following. This morning the Republicans held a caucus on the revenue bill, but Stanford, chairman of the ways and means committee, who is, in parliamentary comity, deemed to be in charge of the bill, and Warner, who is virtually its author, absented themselves from the caucus. The treatment these gentlemen had received in regard to the bill, was the cause of their refusal to attend the caucus. Allen had openly charged, on the floor of the House, that one object of the bill was to transfer a fight which Weber county was having with some of its officials, to the Legislature, a declaration which was regarded as an affront by the Weber county delegation, who have certainly labored patiently in the preparation of a revenue code designed to correct evils and defects in the present one. A number of other instances are cited in which Allen is charged by other Republicans with showing a lack of respect to other members of his party, some of whom have signified their determination to make an independent fight on the floor of the House for what they believe to be the best good of the Territory, regardless of party leadership.

Today the following report was rendered in the House on Varian's bill (H. B. 180) appropriating $30,000 for the redemption of outstanding court scrip, without regard to the date of issue:

Mr. Speaker: Your committee on ways and means having had under consideration H. B. 180, we the undersigned beg leave to submit the following minority report:

That to provide for the payment of these old outstanding certificates of jurors' and witnesses fees, many of which date back as far as the year 1870, and all of them between that date and 1888; and which have been passed upon and in one instance at least repudiated by adverse territorial legislation; and further to our knowledge and belief a great portion of these certificates are held by brokers who have bought them for a mere nominal amount, we believe it would be unjust to the taxpayers of the Territory to pay the same at the present time, considering the depleted condition of its finances, and the large expenditure of money necessary to be expended for the maintenance of our public institutions, being in excess of our revenues, so that it is probable that our taxation will have to be increased.

While we recognize the fact that all just debts should be paid, we are opposed to this appropriation of $30,000 for the redemption of such certificates at the present time, and under these conditions report adversely to the passage of this bill.

STANFORD.

It was understood that Dougall would sign the above. Following is the majority report:

Mr. Speaker: A majority of your committee on ways and means, having duly considered H. B. 180, entitled, "An act to provide for the payment of jurors and witnesses and making appropriations therefor," respectfully report the same favorably, and recommend that it be placed upon its passage.

McBRIDE,
MASON,
TOLTON.

Sears introduced a bill this afternoon, authorizing the Secretary of the Territory to lease offices for the auditor, treasurer and recorder of marks and brands. The Secretary shall determine what and how many office rooms are needed, and shall procure bids from owners of suitable buildings, offering leases on such office rooms. The leases must not extend beyond a term of one month after the opening of the first session of the Legislature after they are executed. The officers named are also required to furnish the Secretary with an estimate of what stationery, office supplies, etc., they will require during the year, and that officer will purchase the same. The object of the bill is to place under proper supervision the office expenses of the public officials named.

The Republicans spent a long time in caucus this forenoon. The revenue bill was considered, but two or three members who were present denied that the questions of the rate of Territorial and Territorial school taxes were considered at all. The members spoken to declined to state what features of the bill were considered. The bill giving a bounty on sugar beets was also considered, and it is understood that an amendment reducing at first, but providing for a gradual rise in, the per cent of sucrose required in order to claim the bounty, was agreed to. The per cent at first is to be 12.

MONDAY.

J. E. Booth's fee bill created a furor among office holders all over the Territory. From Cache county in the north, and a long distance on the south, they flocked in, while the measure was pending in the Council, and protested against its passage. The Council yielded to the pressure and killed the bill last Saturday. Hence the office holders will be permitted to continue taxing the public. In order to reach this evil in another way, and at the same time accomplish other desirable results, Booth has introduced in the Council a bill to classify counties into three classes, and to authorize the county courts to fix the compensation of all county officers. Counties of the three classes must not pay more than 40, 50 and 60 per cent, respectively, of their revenues for salaries.

It will be remembered that the provision exempting from taxation mortgages and trust deeds, and the notes and debts secured thereby, was stricken out of the revenue bill the first day it was considered in the House. On Saturday afternoon last, after a great deal of time had been spent in the preparation and consideration of the bill, the enacting clause was stricken out, on motion of Sears, by a vote of 15 to 7. It is believed that most of those who voted to kill the bill did so for the reason that the previous action, making mortgages and trust deeds taxable, would, in the opinion of members, effect a change in our present law that would produce deplorable results. Hence they deemed it better to forego any needed revision of the present revenue laws, than to make such a change. Parsons gave notice that he would move reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was killed. In explanation he today informed a News representative that he gave the notice in order to save such portions of the bill as might, on further consideration, be deemed desirable.

After today no bills can be introduced in either house without a three-fourths vote of the members, and it is reasonably certain that this restriction will check the flood of bills that have been pouring in of late. Many of the bills that have been introduced will doubtless be allowed to die in committee. Many others will be adversely reported, probably, on the stereotyped ground of a lack of time to give them due consideration. Others will be favorably reported because the committees deem them meritorious, and a few in comparison with the number introduced will be passed. Legally the session will terminate at midnight Wednesday, March 7th; but it may continue, if no adjournment is taken, for an indefinite length of time thereafter, possibly until Saturday March 10. Several all night sessions will probably be held.

There are about half a dozen or more bills pending in the Assembly, which relate to horticulture, and have for their object the encouragement of that industry, or the destruction of animal, insect and vegetable life inimical to it. It is sincerely to be hoped that material will be found in these bills, or obtained from other sources, out of which a good measure can be constructed that will infuse new life and vitality into the important and lucrative industry of fruit raising. Failure to pass such a law at this session will be a public misfortune, and a disappointment to thousands of citizens who feel the need of provision for additional employment. Without such a law, horticulture, in many parts of this Territory, must labor under discouraging disadvantages.

After the close of this report on Saturday, J. E. Booth introduced in the Council a bill (C. B. 109) providing for endowing the University of Utah. The bill provides that any person endowing a professorship in the University, in a sum not less than $10,000, may have the same named for him, or as he may desire, and may also nominate the first incumbent, subject to the approval of the board of regents. The object of the bill seems to be to induce wealthy persons to aid the University.

The following bills were rejected: C. B. 88, Booth's fee bill; H. B. 108, to prevent policemen from holding other offices; C. B. 77, providing for the office of attorney general; C. B. 3, relating to cruelty to animals; H. B. 75, providing for the appointment of women on certain boards. The Council seemed to be in a bill-killing mood. C. B. 91, amending the present law relating to special verdicts, was passed. This measure is "lawyer's law," and, like many others of similar character now pending, has little interest for the general public.

H. E. Booth introduced a bill relating to tax sales.

In the House on Saturday afternoon but little business of importance was transacted after the killing of the revenue bill, as narrated above. The bill to allow this city to increase its indebtedness, in conformity with the act of Congress which Mayor Baskin had succeeded in having rushed through that body, and which was passed by the Council on Saturday, was also passed by the House. A party debate was had on H. B. 98, paying a bounty of 50 cents per ton on sugar beets, and the measure passed by a party vote. Then the House adjourned until 2 p. m. today.

Allen, chairman of the House committee on education, informed a News representative that his committee had taken no action in regard to the University question. The phase of this subject which has been disclosed in the shape of a proposition to transfer the inmates of the deaf mute department of the University to the reform school at Ogden, will shock the feelings of the parents and friends of the unfortunates in the former institution. The idea that they are to be sheltered under the same roof with the prisoners of the reform school, is repugnant to all sense of propriety. No matter though all practicable provisions be made to keep the two classes of inmates separate, the fact remains that the reform school is a penal institution, and that a prison taint attaches to its denizens.

TUESDAY.

The reform school question, with all its difficulties and complications, is assuming a more and more urgent form before the Assembly. One proposition is to transfer the inmates of the reform school to the insane asylum at Provo, where they could be provided with employment, the boys on the farm and the girls in the kitchen, laundry, etc., and to close the reform institution. This means to retire to a condition of "innocuous desultude" property worth nearly a quarter of a million dollars, though it would save a large sum to the Territory each year. The committee appointed by a citizens' meeting, held recently in Ogden, to collect data relative to the reform school, have rendered their report, which is addressed "To the mayor and city council and citizens' meeting of Ogden city," and has been printed in the form of a circular. This morning copies of this report were laid on the desks of members of the Assembly. It describes in detail the buildings of the Reform school, and gives their cost at about $150,000. There are 57 acres of land valued at $50,000, exclusive of improvements. There are two buildings on the grounds, about 100 feet apart, one erected in 1888 and known as the "old building," and one erected and completed in 1893, and known as the "new building." The old building is designed to accommodate 100 children. The report sets forth that the new building contains thirty large sized rooms, which will amply accommodate the inmates of the reform school, and that the old building, which is the larger, is well adapted for use as a refuge for the deaf mutes and blind. The report further represents that the two structures can be completely isolated from each other by means of a high fence, and that all intermingling of the inmates of the two buildings can be prevented. The report suggests that the old building containing the deaf, dumb and blind be named "The School of Charities." This report is endorsed by E. M. Allison and L. Taylor, superintendent and assistant superintendent of the reform school.

But since it was rendered, the fact has been made fully apparent that the parents and friends of the deaf, dumb and blind charges of the Territory would not consent to have them removed to one of the buildings of the Reform school if the other building is to continue to be occupied by the present inmates of that institution. To meet this objection the plan has been formulated to tender to the Territory the Military academy, situated in the northern suburbs of Ogden, to be used as a reform school, while both of the buildings now so used be named "The School of Charities," and devoted as a home and school for the deaf, dumb and blind.

Immediately after the noon recess taken by the House today, a delegation of Ogden citizens headed by Mayor Brough, met with the House committee on penitentiary and reform school, and submitted the latter proposition. The Military academy can be had by the Territory if it will pay the interest on the debt attaching to the institution, which amounts to about $17,000. The biennial appropriation for interest would be about $2,700. The academy cost about $42,000, for the buildings and about $8,000 for the furniture, the whole of which would be turned over to the Territory. Mayor Brough, E. M. Allison, Nathan Tauner, Jr., F. J. Kiesel, and other gentlemen of the Ogden delegation addressed the committee in support of the plan they had been authorized to submit. These gentlemen insisted that the Military academy was well adapted to the purposes of a reform school, and that the present reform school would very comfortably accommodate the deaf mutes and blind. Connected with the Military academy is a tract of ten acres of land, with reservoir, water power, etc. The meeting of the Ogden gentlemen and the committee was a very interesting one.

The debate on the bill appropriating $30,000 for the redemption of old court scrip, no matter how old, a synopsis of which is given below, was an interesting one. There were strong arguments on both sides, but the prevailing sentiment of the House was emphatically in favor of paying this class of claims in full. The bill requires the scrip to be presented to the court commissioner of the district within nine months of its passage.

The report of the House judiciary committee, rendered yesterday afternoon, in relation to the leasing of university lands, discusses the legal phases of the subject at length, and reaches the conclusion that, as the title to such lands will continue to vest in the United States until Congress shall specifically vest the same in the Territory, the Legislature has no right to provide for leasing them. The report takes the position that the general government has merely reserved such lands from sale, but has not, in any legal sense, parted with the title thereto. The committee recommend the passage of a bill providing for the leasing of such lands, when the title shall be acquired by the Territory.

Laramie City, Wyo., is to have a new locomotive round house built of Laramie stone, to cost $65,000, and to contain twenty stalls for machines.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

BANGOR, Me., Feb. 18.—Charles D. French, a peddler and hermit, blew the top of his head off today. He left the following letter:

"To the Curious:—Feb. 18, 1894.—In two hours I shall be dead, shot through the head with a big charge of lead (no poetry intended) and be on the spook route to the kingdom of come. Disease and poverty are the causes. However, no one knows that I am in a destitute condition, but I am, just the same. Burn, boil, bake, bury or send my carcass to the phosphate factory, just as the humor strikes you. I am weak, faint and hungry, but I know how to cancel all my engagements with Mr. Trouble and Mr. Misery.

Yours respectfully.

CHARLES D. FRENCH."

DURANGO, Colo., Feb. 17.—A letter dated Farmington, February 16th, says: Manuelito, chief of all the Navajos, died five days ago, and his wife a day later. His successor will not be known for several days yet.

KNOXVILLE, Feb. 18.—For months past there has been an aerial cable car line across the Tennessee river at this place, and hundreds continually flocked there, a ride at a distance of 2000 feet above the river being a particularly exhilarating one. This afternoon, without a moment's warning, while the cage with eight occupants was near the bluff on the opposite side of the river, the cable broke and the car dashed down the incline at a frightful speed.

ROME, Feb. 18.—The closing ceremony in connection with Pope Leo XIII jubilee took place today, and consisted of mass, celebrated by him in St. Peter's, followed by a "Te Deum."

The mass was celebrated at the papal altar. Leo was borne into the basilica at 9:40 o'clock, preceded by a cortege of cardinals and bishops.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19.—Senator White (La.) has been nominated by the President for associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. The nomination was a complete surprise to everyone. Hill and the Republican members who have been questioned say little about White's confirmation.

HOUSTON, Feb. 19.—Tonight at 10 o'clock there was committed at the Grand Central depot one of the most horrible crimes in the history of Texas. Jim Mitchell of Richmond, a man long known for his desperate character, shot to death three men and one little child and wounded a woman.

Mitchell had been in the city all day and had imbibed more or less intoxicants. As near as can be learned the men, not knowing the desperate character of Mitchell, attempted to remonstrate with him for his boisterous and ungentelemanly conduct in the station, and he resented the remonstrance, when others joined the first to remonstrate with Mitchell.

The desperado pulled his revolver and began shooting. The station was crowded and when the shooting began there was a rush for the doors. The crowd were panic stricken with the exception of a few brave men and many were badly hurt in the crush.

YANKTON, S. D., Feb. 19.—Mrs.

Chaaska, nee Cora Bell Fellows, who was married at the Cheyenne river agency three years ago to a Santee Sioux named Chaaska, has found life with her dusky spouse unbearable and is now living apart from him. He is a Santee Indian and in company with children receives a fat government subsidy every three months. After two months of life on the reservation Chaaska suddenly eloped with a young and buxom squaw.

Mrs. Chaaska, after waiting for his return for a week, left the reservation with her half bred children, vowing that she would never live with Chaaska again, and two weeks after she left, Chaaska returned to the agency and is now living there with the woman who accompanied him in elopement. He is happy and wants no more to do with a white wife.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 19.—A suit filed in the circuit court this afternoon is the greatest sensation in real estate circles experienced for years. The action was brought by the Beorultt Property company against Mary E. Patterson, and is the first of a series of suits which will involve titles to all the property on one side of Olive street, from Third to Twenty-first, aggregating in value nearly $50,000,000. Over forty heirs are interested in the common litigation, and in all sixty suits will be brought.

NEW YORK, Feb. 19.—Joseph Keppler, the caricaturist, editor and proprietor of Puck, died tonight at his residence, aged 59 years. The immediate cause of death was heart failure, resulting from a complication of spinal and lung troubles.

CHICAGO, Feb. 19.—Miss Nannie Cook, aged 60, a cousin of Jefferson Davis, died in want in a room on Wells street this morning of paralysis. She worked in Chicago as a seamstress in a corset factory, arriving here eighteen months ago from her mother's home, Plainfield, Ind.

NEW YORK, Feb. 19.—A special to the World from New Orleans: The rumor published a few days ago to the effect that the tug Millard was wrecked off the Nicaragua coast has been confirmed. Sixty-two lives were lost.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 19.—The youngest child of the President was christened Esther Cleveland yesterday afternoon in the blue room of the White House. Only members of the family and a few intimate friends were present.

VISALIA, Calif., Feb. 19.—A sheriff's posse surrounded Chris Evans' house at 2 o'clock this morning, having information that Evans and Morrell were inside. His children were there and a young man named Beeson was paid to go in and get the children out, preparatory to a general attack on the place. As soon as he reached the door he was pulled inside and kept there. A strong cordon was drawn around the house and half the town gathered at a respectful distance. Word was sent to Fresno for reinforcements and every avenue of escape was guarded. Finally, seeing there was no hope of getting away, the bandits surrendered.

Evans and Morrell are now behind the bars of the county jail. Negotiations with the bandits were carried on by letters through Evans' young son.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 19.—The House bill limiting the indebtedness of Salt Lake City, Utah, has passed the Senate.

LONDON, Feb. 20.—A correspondent describing the march of Col. Ellis's column against the Soias in Sierra Leone, gives horrible details of the Soia slave raids. Entire towns have been wiped out. The thriving town of Tokivama, with 8,000 inhabitants, is in ashes. The mutilated trunks of men, women and children are heaped up and putrifying amid the ruins. The absence of the bodies of young men and women indicates that they were spared to be sold into slavery. Col. Ellis freed hundreds of slaves.

HOUSTON, Texas, Feb. 20.—Last night a horrible tragedy was enacted here as a sequel of the famous Fort Bend feud, known as the Jay Bird-Woodpecker quarrel. James R. Mitchell, the quadruple murderer, was the central figure in that affair. Milton, Sparks and D. J. Sutton, the constable of Eagle Lake, were in the city as attached witnesses in the Fort Bend feud murder case and Mrs. Sparks accompanied her husband. This engendered bad blood and last night Mitchell, who was waiting for his father and brother from Richmond, called Sutton. He opened fire which was promptly returned, Sutton falling after firing a second shot. Mitchell kept up the murderous fusillade until he had fired six shots. The result was, in addition to Sutton being killed, that Milton Sparks was shot to death. Dan Gleason, an omnibus driver, also lies dead. Mrs. Sparks, the wife of the murdered man, was badly wounded, as was also the child she carried. A brother of Sparks was mortally wounded, and Mrs. McDowell, an aged lady, received one of the bullets, and her chances of recovery are slim.

ITHACA, N. Y., Feb. 21.—As a supplement to the regular annual class riot between the Freshmen and Sophomores of Cornell, the Sophomores perpetrated a dastardly and dangerous trick by generating chlorine gas in the hall where the Freshmen were holding their banquet. Several Freshmen were carried out insensible from the fumes. A corps of physicians were summoned, and prompt efforts made to resuscitate the asphyxiated students by the application of ammonia and stimulants.

CLEVELAND, Feb. 20.—The property of Governor and Mrs. McKinley, conveyed to trustees last summer when the governor was forced to make an assignment, has been transferred back to them. This result is due to the effort of the trustees, H. H. Kohlsaat of the Chicago Inter-Ocean, Colonel Myron T. Herrick of Cleveland and Judge William R. Day of Canton.

FRESNO, Cal., Feb. 20.—After a night spent within his old quarters at the jail, where he was safely landed at 1:30, Chris Evans was brought into court at 10 o'clock this morning, and after a consultation with his attorneys, sentenced to imprisonment for life at Folsom, by Judge Harris. Evans was taken on the noon train to prison by Sheriff Short and Kay and deputies. He seemed cheerful, and greeted all who spoke to him pleasantly. The motion for a new trial made by his attorneys was denied. He denies the story that he abused Mrs. Brighton.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 21.—Pennsylvania, with ten counties to hear from, give Galusha A. Grow, Republican, for Congressman at large, 140,478 plurality.

Republican State Chairman Juilker-son claims the state by 175,000. In the cities the local Republican ticket was elected in most every instance. Such Democratic strongholds as Reading, York, Allentown, Altoona, Sunburg and Easton were swept into the Republican column.

NEW YORK, Feb. 21.—The earnings of the Union Pacific system for the year ending December 31st, were, gross, $37,447,416, a decrease of $7,579,750; net, $11,795,952, a decrease of $4,714,823.

NEW YORK, Feb. 21.—The steamer City of Paris arrived here this morning from Colon bringing the officers and crew of the warship Kearsarge, wrecked on Roncador reef.

NEW YORK, Feb. 22.—Erastus Wiman, the well known capitalist and railroad magnate, was arrested on a bench warrant this afternoon on two charges of forgery. He was brought into the judge's chambers in the General Sessions building at 5 o'clock, and in default of $25,000 bail was committed to the Tombs by Judge Martine.

Two indictments were found against Wiman by the grand jury today. They are for forgery and uttering fraudulent checks. Each indictment contains two counts. The total amount involved in Wiman's alleged irregularities is $229,000. The complainant against him is R. G. Dun, president of the Mercantile Agency association.

DURANGO, Mex., Feb. 22.—James Crandall and W. Parker, American prospectors, have arrived here and announced that they have discovered the long lost Spanish mine of fabulous richness in the mountains near the village of Pernado, in a remote part of the Sierra Madres, by accident.

CHICAGO, Feb. 21.—Wallace, the 500-pound lion on exhibition at a dime museum here, escaped from his keeper this afternoon and bounded among the crowded audience. He completely cleared the stage and landed in the aisle fully twenty feet from the cage.

Wallace had just reached the open exit to the street when Boccacio overtook him. He gave the brute a slash across the face with a whip, and finally the trainer succeeded in forcing the lion back toward the stage. The cage was got in readiness, and after a struggle with the brute, he was once more put behind the bars. Fortunately nobody was injured in the mad rush for liberty, but the museum people tonight are possessed of about 200 hats and various other wearing apparel.

MEXICO CITY, Feb. 22.—A syndicate of capitalists interested in the Salvation Army, have concluded a purchase from the Mexican government of 200,000 acres of land in Chiapas, southern Mexico. Plans will be perfected by which 500 families from England and the United States will be put on the tract.

CITY OF MEXICO, Feb. 22.—General Aureliano Riveria, who discovered the famous jicma root, for the cure of typhus, and has been distributing it gratuitously to the poor, has made the discovery that the same root will cure the smallpox. The discovery was made accidentally. A preparation had been given to a patient, who supposed he had typhus, but it proved to be smallpox. The root worked like a charm, however, in rapidly curing the man.

General Riveria believes it will cure yellow fever and has sent a package to Vera Cruz for trial there by physicians at the next appearance of the epidemic.

TOLEDO, O., Feb. 23.—Perhaps the most sensational turn in the all-absorbing A. P. A. case today was a notice of appeal by the attorney for the defendant in the case of Rummell against Ostrander, as treasurer of Council No. 2, for the payment for ten rifles, which was tried in Justice Seagrave's court Wednesday.

Ostrander was highly incensed at the verdict, and makes many charges against the members of the order, whom he claims deserted him and worked against him in the lawsuit. He says the justice before whom the case was argued had the charge to the jury all written out before a word of evidence had been taken.

Ostrander has been talking freely since the suit was declared against him, and not only revealed the number of rifles purchased to resist the Labor Day massacre, but has given out the names of those who purchased them, among which are several prominent business men, politicians and city officials. The mayor, who is the avowed candidate of the association for governor, and has announced himself as a congressional aspirant, is among the number charged with having purchased rifles.

LONDON, Feb. 23.—This day was fixed for the funeral of Bourdin the anarchist, who was fatally injured by the explosion of his own bomb on Feb. 15th. Riotous demonstrations were anticipated and the police made preparations to prevent them. The shops in the neighborhood of the undertaker's establishment in Chapel street where the remains lay, were shut and barricaded. Crowds of excited spectators, including many anarchists, gathered in the neighborhood in the early morning hours. They were watched by a strong force of police and detectives.

VIENNA, Feb. 23.—The court before which the twelve anarchists accused of conspiring against the life of the emperor have been on trial, sentenced Franz Haspen to ten years' imprisonment and Hofan Hahnel to eight years. The other conspirators were sentenced to from two to four years, and six were acquitted.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 24.—The Indian bureau has received a dispatch from Agent Powell at Leah Bay, Indian agency, Washington, announcing the total destruction of the main agency building and contents by fire.

CHICAGO, Feb. 24.—Another incendiary fire occurred at the World's Fair grounds this morning and as a result the magnificent agricultural building, pronounced by many good judges the most sumptuous and beautiful of the World's Fair structures is practically a heap of ruins. The flames were first discovered in the great dome. A large number of fire engines were at once summoned to the scene, but the inflammable nature of the structure caused the fire to spread with great rapidity under the influence of a stiff breeze and it was about all the department could do to prevent its spread to the other structures. This they succeeded in doing, but the agricultural building was ruined.

The famous prize statue of Diana by Sculptor P. Gaudens, which ornamented the dome of the building during the Fair, was, fortunately, removed some days ago and was set up in the Columbian Museum.

LONDON, Feb. 24.—A dispatch from Port Louis, Mauritius, reports that a cyclone swept the island yesterday, doing almost incalculable damage to property and killing many. A railway train was blown from the track down an embankment, killing and injuring many.

CHICAGO, Feb. 24.—Judge Brentano, who presided at the trial of Fren-dergast, the man who assassinated Mayor Carter H. Harrison, after listening to the arguments for the motion for a new trial, today rendered his decision, overruling the motion, and sentenced him to be hung on March 23.

LONDON, Feb. 24.—A report was circulated last night that a disaster of some sort had occurred to the crew of the gunboat Widgeon, on the west coast of Africa. The story was confirmed this morning by dispatches to the admiralty. The dispatches come from Bathurst, the capital of the British west coast of the African colony of Gambia, at which point the cruiser Raleigh, flagship of the British squadron on that coast, and the gunboat Widgeon, had arrived. The story is to the effect that parties of British marines were landed from these vessels near Bathurst to punish Fodislah, a notorious slave trader, who had been carrying off into bondage and cruelly ill-treated the helpless natives of the villages along that part of the coast. The parties went ashore with provisions for four days and a plentiful supply of ammunition. A reserve force was left on the shore at the landing place under the protection of the vessels' guns. The remainder of the column began the march inland through a difficult country, the land being swampy and covered with thick brushwood and forest. They were accompanied by natives, carrying the spare ammunition, provisions and water. The march continued a long distance without any signs of the slave traders' bands. The country was apparently deserted. Then the native carriers began to desert with the extra ammunition and provisions, and the column was finally alone. The going was so bad that the flanking parties were finally forced back on the column, which, however, continued to advance till it came upon two villages, which the British attacked and captured. These villages were surrounded by stockades and served well as defenses, the British planting machine guns at points of vantage. The force remained there the following night, but the loss of the ammunition and water made Captain Gamble, in command of the force, to decide to return to the shore. This movement was commenced early next morning. After proceeding a short distance, and when surrounded by rising ground, the party was attacked from ambush, on all sides. The attack was very severe and the blue jackets fell on all sides. The column retreated as hastily as possible, carrying the wounded as far as possible, but the shore was not reached till three officers and ten men had been killed and forty wounded.

The latest dispatch from Bathurst says the marines landed from the warship and a detachment from the West India regiment are still missing and fears are entertained for their safety.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Feb. 25.—In a sermon on the "Catholic Church in America" at the Cathedral today, Archbishop Ireland said the church under the Constitution had all the rights and privileges she desired. The anti-Catholic agitation, the archbishop said, would soon die out if not noticed. He strongly deprecated mixing the church with politics, and said it would be a great misfortune if the church were to be the ally of one special party.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 25.—The following telegram was received at the department of state this afternoon:

"CITY OF MEXICO, Feb. 24.—Congressman Wilson has developed marked typhoid fever. His general condition is grave, though the fever is yet a mild type."

DES MOINES, Feb. 24.—The general executive committee of the Knights of Labor today made a public statement that they intended to investigate the record of P. M. Arthur, of the Locomotive Engineers' Brotherhood. They charge Arthur with being responsible for the failure of all their strikes since 1884, when they won the Union Pacific strike.

PARIS, Feb. 25.—The police today raided the lodgings of a number of anarchists, two of whom were arrested. A quantity of chlorate powder and documents were seized.

VIENNA, Feb. 26.—After an absence of nearly two years, spent in exploring northeast Africa, Lieutenant Ludwig Ritter Von Hohnell, of the Austrian navy, has returned to Vienna.

The explorer gives an account of his exploring expedition in Africa with the Chanler party, which started September 16, 1892, with 185 men, and told of the ill-luck and hardships which beset the expedition. They fought one whole day with a hostile tribe of Wameara and with Maunlecher and Werndt guns inflicted great loss upon the natives.

August 22nd, 1893, Hohnell was badly wounded in an encounter with a cow rhinoceros, and only within a few days has recovered from his injuries. This episode compelled him to part the company with Chanler.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26.—Morgan, chairman of the Senate committee on foreign relations, today presented the report of the investigations of that committee made under the resolution requiring it to report "whether any and if so what irregularities had occurred in the diplomatic or other intercourse between the United States and Hawaii, in relation to the recent political revolution of Hawaii." The report is prepared by Morgan and concurred in by Frye, Dolph and Davis, the Republican members of the committee, who make also a supplemental report. Butler, Turple, Daniel and Gray, Democrats, submit a minority report. These reports together with the mass of evidence taken by the committee is very voluminous.

The committee finds the treaty not negotiated too hastily, as charged, because both parties considered its speedy conclusion desirable in the interests of good government. Moreover, the danger of the islands falling into the hands of a European power made prompt action necessary.

The report finds that Stevens's earnest advocacy of annexation is not open to criticism, being in line with Marcey and nearly all his successors as secretary of state and with many of Stevens's predecessors in Hawaii. It declares: "His dealings with the Hawaiian government is characterized by becoming dignity and reserve, and not in any way harsh or offensive. The only substantial irregularity in the conduct of any officer of the United States was the declaration of the protectorate by Stevens, though no actual harm resulted from this act which merely required to be disavowed as a precedent.

The Republican members in their supplemental report express accord with the essential findings of the main report, but declare that Blount's appointment was unconstitutional, and the placing of the naval force at Honolulu under his orders illegal; the hauling down of the American flag at Honolulu by Blount's orders was unwarranted, because it created public excitement and distrust; the President had no authority to re-open the question of the legality of the provisional government or attempt to restore the monarchy. He could not act without the joint consent of both parties.

GEORGETOWN, Colo., Feb. 28.—A petition is being circulated which calls upon the silver states to secede and join the republic of Mexico. Mayor Parker, whose name heads the petition, says it will be circulated in every mining camp in the West.

CHURCH THEOLOGY CLASS.

At the usual time and place about 1,200 students assembled to listen to Dr. Jas. E. Talmage in his lecture on the thirteen articles of faith. Leaflets containing a synopsis of the subjects considered were distributed among the audience.

After the opening prayer by Bishop Preston, incidental questions relating to miracles and the laws of nature received attention. The lecturer then finished the consideration of the seventh and proceeded to the eighth article of faith, which reads as follows: "We believe the Bible to be the word of God as far as it is translated correctly; we also believe the Book of Mormon to be the word of God."

Defining the word "bible," it was stated that the Greek Bible should be translated "books" or "a collection of holy books," and not "a book" as given by some biblical scholars. Although a record of God's dealings with His people, the account in the Bible for all periods after the deluge was confined to the eastern hemisphere. The instructor here gave a careful analysis of the Bible, discussing the divisions and books in a detailed yet concise and brief manner. He spoke also of the numerous versions, explaining the merits of the principal ones from the Septuagint (Greek) to the Revised Version of 1885. The Bible was then considered as an authentic record and attention drawn to the individuality of each writer, which, it was stated, appeared as marked to the earnest student as their uniformity in spirit and devotion. Comparisons between the records of the holy scriptures and profane history were made, showing that no important features of difference between the two had yet been pointed out. When the many "uninspired translations" of these wonderful and prophetic records were considered, the student might well wonder that not more errors could be detected. Such errors in the text were the fault of other men, not of the authors themselves.

The Book of Mormon was then introduced and its claims fully defined. It was an abridgment of the record of a remnant of the house of Israel who lived on this continent, also a record of the people of Jared, who were scattered at the time the Lord confounded the language of men at the tower of Babel. There were fifteen books contained in this important record the arrangement of which was considered at some length. Instructor Talmage announced that this subject would be concluded at the next session and asked the students to prepare by studying the authenticity of the Book of Mormon together with its title page and the testimony of the three witnesses. After benediction by Elder H. P. Freese, the class adjourned for two weeks.

MARCH WEATHER.

The chief of the weather bureau directs the publication of the following data, compiled from the records of observations for the month of March, taken at this station for a period of twenty years.

It is believed that the facts thus set forth will prove of interest to the public, as well as the special student, showing as they do the average and extreme conditions of the more important meteorological elements and the range within which such variations may be expected to keep during any corresponding month.

Mean or normal temperature, 42 degrees; the warmest March was that of 1879, with an average of 50 degrees; the coldest March was that of 1875, with an average of 35 degrees; the highest temperature during any March was 77 degrees on March 30th, 1879; the lowest temperature during any March was zero on March 1st, 1890; average date on which last "killing" frost occurred (in spring), April 1st.

Average for the month, 2.01; average number of days with .01 of an inch or more, 10; the greatest precipitation was 4.66 inches in 1891; the least monthly precipitation was .35 inches in 1887; the greatest amount of precipitation recorded in any twenty-four consecutive hours was 1.17 inches on March 30th, 1874; the greatest amount of snowfall recorded in twenty-four consecutive hours (record extending to winter of 1884-5 only) was 8 inches on March 20th, 1884.

Average number of cloudless days, 11; average number of partly cloudy days, 11; average number of cloudy days, 9.

The prevailing winds have been from the northwest. The highest velocity of the wind during any March was 48 miles on March 7th, 1877.

GEO. N. SALISBURY,
Observer, Weather Bureau.

OUR POULTRY DEPARTMENT.

Fowls No. 3.

We now want to cross that foundation stock with some blood that will give vigor and increase the egg yield. We have the size. All practical market poultry growers concede that Plymouth Rock and Leghorn cross give the quickest growing cockerels and the best laying of pullets. Our market (outside of spring chicken) requires fowls of 5 to 7 months old weighing 3 to 5 pounds dressed. There are other breeds that can be crossed with good results, but not as profitably. Our market demands that all poultry dressed shall be minus head and legs, hence they must be raised with the smallest amount of offal possible, and the cross I recommend will give you that. Those pullets if fed right will be prolific layers and good sized birds—birds to sell in almost 18 months from the time they are hatched. This is the routine for profit: Hatch your chicks out in April; market your cockerels in June, July and August; have your pullets laying in November, December, January, February, March and April; fatten your pullets for May and early June; keep none of them over after the first year as they will at no time lay like they will the first year of their lives. When you wish to fatten feed a little heavier, by adding more shorts or corn meal, which will stop egg-production (when twelve and a half cents per dozen,) and you will have fine fat and young fowls for sale when the market is practically bare, which will mean increase in price. This can all be done by intelligent feeding and care. In this business, as in all others, if you do nothing, nothing will be the result.

You see by this cross that you will have to procure a thoroughbred Brown Leghorn rooster to put with that Plymouth Rock stock; and try and procure one from an egg-laying strain. While I recommend this cross, don't you make the Leghorn your foundation; if you do you will have small hens and when you put in a Plymouth cockerel he will be too heavy for them and will break down the wings and you will have crippled fowls, and instead of their laying eggs, nature will be trying to replace short wings.

If you will read close you will see that in case your stock was light colored and you wished to improve them, to put a Wyandotte male with them. I have noticed that where the fowls are of light color they run to Leghorn, but the selected would be of course the larger ones, and the Wyandoth, being a larger bird than the Plymouth Rock, would bring your birds up to the standard size the first year.

Now, this fall buy or raise your leg-horn rooster—brown or white which ever way your color runs. Don't put white with your colored, or brown with your white stock. If you do your colors will not be uniform. Keep that young rooster from the other sex till February 1st. Look well after those pullets; and if you have fed for eggs, by February they will have thrown off their chickenhood and assumed the ways of good-built hens and by this time you will have become acquainted with them and will know about twelve to fifteen that are prolific layers. They are the birds to breed from. Put them into their breeding quarters with that vigorous young rooster and you will have young chicks that will make you jump around to keep them fed, they will grow so fast and will always be hungry. It is a good sign of thrift when every time the attendant comes in sight to see the chickens run to see if there is anything around to eat. Force and crowd them along for growth. It will be argued by some—yes, but in this cross you increase the size of the comb and that is a drawback in hardiness. I want to say right here, you had no business to put fowls into quarters where their large combs would be a detriment to them by being frozen. My mind reverts to a pen of seven single comb brown Leghorns that were hatched out in May last and began to lay in November; they had exceedingly large combs that fell over before they began to lay, and their combs were not touched by the frost; but they paid the owners for the good care, for they laid over an average of 80 per cent of the total number each day. This was done by work, work! But you must breed those combs down, and the third year of your cross in selecting your breeding birds, other things being equal, select those with lowest combs, not from a hardy standpoint particularly, but from an offal one—you cannot sell combs. But keep the egg yield in view, as the eggs from such a grown fowl, laying good for six months, should be worth at the least $2, but it would be more; and her dressed carcass 50 cents; it would cost (to buy food) to keep, not to exceed 75 cents for those cockerels—would pay all expenses up to laying maturity; but it would not cost the farmer that much; he would not have to use such heavy teams to carry his eggs and poultry to market as he would to haul his grain, and the manure from his fowls would be worth as much as guano if kept dry and pulverized.

I often hear the remark, "We have some fowls in our flock as good as any thoroughbreds I have seen;" and they should have, for oftentimes they have one to two hundred but only a very few laying. If these few are selected each year and bred as I have laid down, it will be only a few years before very near all of them will be good layers; but you must select and that close. The fact that parties have blooded fowls does not give them layers. I have seen thoroughbreds that were the varlest scrubs and the barnyard hen was worth 100 per cent more for practical purposes.

The third year do the same as before—sell the cockerels and that Leghorn rooster and in the month of February put in a Plymouth Rock rooster and so alternate each year; but you will not notice such good results as the first cross and hence if you can, it will be better to start a new foundation every third year.

While I have talked about crosses, don't for one moment think that I would speak disparagingly of thorough bred fowls, for I just love to see them, and especially well bred and taken good care of.

I said, don't feed corn; but there are times when I would feed corn in the winter if I found the thermometer (I keep them in my coops) was running down to zero; I should feed my hens last feed at night corn made warm by placing in an oven.

If by some chance I should over-feed, and the fowls became too fat, I should put them upon water alone for a few days or just give them their morning mash and withhold their grain and make them do extra work scratching. For scratching material there is nothing better than leaves, and there are thousands of loads going to waste every year; give your fowls four inches of sand and six inches of leaves and bury the grain in it, and see how they will enjoy it, the fowls will think it is summer and they will sing and lay eggs to order. If you have an old cow and she don't pay to fatten, kill her and feed her flesh and bones to the hens, and likewise feed the hay you would have fed to your old cow to the hens and you will find it will give you a great deal more profit.

This summer see that you provide plenty of vegetables for your flocks—cabbage especially. If you want to see some fun, with money in it, hang a cabbage in your coop just high enough for your fowls to reach and see how they will enjoy it, when everything is frozen up. Procure for them carrots, beets, potatoes, celery, watercress, onions—in fact there is nothing that comes amiss or need be wasted. I even take the cabbage stalks and grind them up. My hens tumble over one another to procure some when put into their morning mash. In the spring and summer time you can take the weeds and green lucern and put it through a chaff cutting machine and mix with your morning feed, and they will devour enormous quantities—saving your grain—and your chicks will be healthier for it. In fact, as one writer tersely puts it, "We must feed more grass and less grain to procure eggs and healthy fowls."

Don't forget that in winter you must supply those bugs and worms that Biddy picks up in the summer time. Now, you can't catch these and preserve them for winter; so give them that old cow or old sheep; do away with so many dogs and feed the bones and scraps you give them to your hens. Give the hen her teeth (grit) or else her digestive organs will soon cease to operate and she will die in the midst of plenty. G. H. C.

I enclose you a clipping from Farm Poultry—written by Editor Hunter, who is not only an editor but one of the best poultry men in the United States—entitled, "4,000 eggs in December," also "The Captain Beats Our Record." I do this to show that I have not been telling your readers any Arabian Nights tales, but that I have kept a long way inside of the line of the money there is to be made in poultry. But it must be worked for. G. H. C.

FOUR THOUSAND EGGS IN DECEMBER.

We didn't quite do it—the exact figures being 3,957—but we expected to pass the 4,000 mark, and up to Christmas day there was every indication that we would do so; but, our young man went home for a week's vacation, and the eggs dropped off a little—one here, another there, possibly owing to slight difference in quantity of food, and we were 43 eggs short of our ambition.

The record is perfectly satisfactory as

It is: we have no hard feelings towards the bird that gave us $130 worth of eggs in thirty-one days, and we feel very sure not many readers of Farm-Poultry can beat that record.

We have 90 year-old fowls, and 290 pullets, and their total egg-yield for each day was:

Dec. 1.....	111	Dec. 17.....	116
2.....	105	18.....	142
3.....	112	19.....	142
4.....	127	20.....	120
5.....	117	21.....	147
6.....	124	22.....	120
7.....	123	23.....	152
8.....	111	24.....	140
9.....	120	25.....	132
10.....	143	26.....	186
11.....	109	27.....	150
12.....	125	28.....	136
13.....	132	29.....	118
14.....	17	30.....	125
15.....	129	31.....	136
16.....	126	Total.....	3,967

That is an average of ten and one-half eggs per hen for the month, and quite as much as can reasonably be expected. If one is getting one-third (33 1-3 per cent) egg yield in December, he is doing all that he has a right to expect. Many of the old hens haven't fully recovered from the drain of the moult; and pullets do not (as a rule) produce an egg every other day in early winter. We have one pen of pullets that did. One pen of Leghorn-Light Brahma cross, laid an average of 15½ eggs apiece—exactly 50 per cent egg yield; and a pen of White Wyandotte pullets laid an average of 14½ eggs apiece, a very close second.

It is easily apparent that it is the pullets that produce this highly satisfactory egg-yield. The 290 pullets laid 3,373 eggs, an average of (practically) 11 2-3 eggs apiece; while the 90 year-old hens laid but 584 eggs (practically) 6½ eggs apiece, a difference of about 90 per cent in favor of the pullets.

The price of the eggs has been forty cents a dozen for most of the month, and the market value of those eggs is $130. It costs us about $1.35 to feed a fowl a year, which is 11½ cents a month, making the cost of feeding these 380 fowls for that month, $42.75, leaving as a profit of $87.25—a pretty fair return for one month's work, and that the dull month of December. The profit, however, is really greater than that. These fowls have got to be fed, whether or not they are laying. A certain quantity of food has got to be fed them to repair waste and furnish fuel for necessary warmth; those animal economies must be met first, and it is only when there is a surplus over and above these calls that there are eggs produced. It is usually estimated that it costs $1 a year to feed a fowl, which is 81-3 cents a month, making $31.67 for a month's food for 380 fowls, and that allows $11.08 for the surplus—the meat-meal, green food, etc., which induced the egg-yield.

There was no "happen so" about these eggs. They were planned for long ago. The pullets that laid them were hatched early, were fed for growth, as told in "How We Hatch and Raise Chickens," March last, so that a good many were laying in October, and since November let they have been fed for eggs, as told in "Feeding Fowls for Eggs," December, '92; they have also been kept at work, as advised in "Keep Them Busy," January number. In fact, the whole story of those "Four Thousand Eggs in December," has been told over and over again in these pages!

THE CAPTAIN BEATS OUR RECORD.

Just after our "Four Thousand Eggs in December" story had gone to the printer, a note from Captain Holmes of Kingston, Mass., comes to hand telling us that he got 168 eggs from a pen of nine pullets in this same month of December. This is eighteen and two-thirds eggs per hen, and beats our record of fifteen and one-half eggs per hen from our best pen. The joke of this lies in the fact that they were the same Leghorn-Brahma cross pullets, and were hatched and raised here on our farm. We sold the captain a pen of them in November, and here he's gone and beaten us with birds of our raising!

Well, the birds were bred for layers, and fed for layers—and it seems they "got there."

Now, Mr. Editor, I think this will close my scribble (methinks I hear you say, let us be thankful for that); not because there is no more poultry lore, but because I think if your subscribers digest what I have written it will probably be all they will want of me, and my time I can find ample use for.

Respectfully, G. H. C.

TAXATION.

A correspondent signing as "Justice to the Line" consumes considerable space in your paper of the 19th inst., in treating of the all important subject of taxation. With your permission I would like to make a few observations on the same question.

Your correspondent seems to think that warfare has begun and that possibly "the result may shake the very foundations of the nation;" that "taxation is the tyrant's rod," etc.

For my part I do not apprehend a result so fatal as the above. True, there is always complaint by some one—often justly, no doubt—as to oppressive or unequal taxation, and perhaps such will continue to be the case; but to charge tyranny upon the law makers would be unreasonable as well as unjust.

The question in the communication referred to, from Hon. Chauncey Black, contains very good doctrine, or it would be with an amendment substituting the word important in lieu of "terrible." The power to levy taxes is one of importance but not necessarily one of terror.

It takes money to carry on national, state, territorial, county and municipal governments. This money has to be raised by some legal means. How this shall be done is the question to be solved by the governments interested.

The United States government proposes to carry on its business through the effects of a tariff and an income tax. The states, territories and municipal corporations propose to tax the property within their respective limits. In the latter cases I respectfully submit to your correspondent the query: Is it not justice that the property within each shall be subject to taxation in order to support said corporations? Would it be just to tax the property of one man or one woman and fail to tax the property of others?

Your correspondent supposes three cases. In the case of the city property he assumes an income of nine thousand dollars per year. In this case if the bill now pending should become a law, the owner would have to pay an income tax to the United States and a tax to the city, county and territory on the assessed value of the property. This, it occurs to me, would be just, and if honestly appraised no one ought to complain.

The next case—that of "an aged party owning a five acre lot outside of the city," for which he receives a rental of sixty dollars only. In this case the aged party will not have any income tax to pay, but must pay a tax on the land and improvements only.

The third case, an "aged lady of eighty years has five acres of land, no other income whatever." The income on this land is not stated; if it is less than $4,000 the old lady will not have to pay an income tax, but must pay a city, county, territorial and school tax on the land. The amount so assessed would depend of course upon the appraisalment.

In all these supposed cases there would appear to be a remedy, should the owners be dissatisfied with the taxation and not succeed in procuring reductions through a board of equalization; that is, by selling out and letting some other persons pay the taxes. It is true that many people do not care to sell their property, but unless they are able and willing to pay the taxes, I am inclined to think, with the board of equalization, that they had better "sell it."

Your correspondent, "Justice to the Line," is no doubt an earnest reader of and believer in "that great law book" to which he refers, and that is all right; but I would caution him not to carry his reverence for that book so far as to lead him to believe in a "higher law" governing the people in the United States than the Constitution and laws sanctioned by the Supreme court from which there is no appeal not even to that "supreme court of all courts."

JUSTICE AND LAW.

"In poets as true genius is but rare,
True taste as seldom is the critic's share;
Authors are partial to their wit 'tis true,
But are not critics to their judgment too."

Unintentionally, if not unexpectedly, I have run against a critic, or it may be a hornet nest. If so, excuse me if I should without stopping to think, suddenly make a dive for the brush. Here accept my thanks for the "considerable space" consumed by my article and so grudgingly alluded to my opponent while he consumes near the same space in his extended or brief reply.

"Justice and Law" says: "Your correspondent seems to think that warfare has begun and that possibly the result may shake the nation, that taxation is the tyrant's rod, etc." That I am not alone in this view, without quoting the press of the nation, let me refer him to your correspondent "Novus Homo" in the daily of the 17th, also, Orten, Homer and other correspondents, and lastly to one of our legislators in the same issue, the 21st, containing his reply. From Associated Press dispatches to the NEWS, some time back, I quote: "In many villages the peasants have nailed up their huts and are scouring the country in search of work. Hundreds of them have failed in their search, and are begging along the roadside. Notwithstanding the terrible condition, taxes continue to be extorted from the starving people. Everything is taken from them to satisfy the demands of the tax-gatherers. Where they display any unwillingness to pay, the collectors resort to physical means to extort the money from them." This from the famine districts of the domain of the Russian autocrat. If this does not sustain my assertion that "taxation is the tyrant's rod," then in that realm let the cries be heard of Judah's afflicted sons and daughters.

His amendment to my quotation from Mr. Black would read, [no doubt, very nice to him. Let us see—"The most [important—[instead of the most terrible] power ever given to any nation is that of taxation." But I am not disposed to surrender one letter of the quotation. If it is terrible to be robbed by a mob, it is equally terrible to be robbed by an oppressive and unjust law.

Next comes my three "supposed cases"—the business block, the aged party's five acre lot, and the aged lady's five acres of ground. In all these supposed cases there would appear to be a remedy, says "Justice and Law," and this is the remedy: "Unless they are able and willing to pay the taxes, let them sell out and some other persons pay the taxes." Here the gentleman sustains my assertions and puts himself on record as one who would force the poor, the aged and the infirm from their homes, possessed ever since the white man set foot within these valleys. Here his "Law" swallows up his "Justice," while justice should stand clothed in a robe covering all law. As to the three "supposed cases" let me here correct my friend. There is no supposition in the matter—three facts given by way of illustration of the inconsistency of the present system.

"Justice and Law" would have me appear as opposed to taxation in its entirety. Not so. If income is the law, let it be income only on property bringing income, but never more than 10 per cent, and taxation on all surplus property, excepting the homes of the class of poor alluded to. He says the income of the aged lady's ground is not stated. Here it is, the same as the aged party's 5-acre lot—sixty dollars, or one-third of the crop; the same in either case. If income was the law, the widow's mite would not all be swallowed up by taxation.

Finally, "Justice and Law" does not like my belief in the "great law book" referred to, and cautions me not to carry my reverence for that book so far as to lead me to believe in a higher law governing the people in the United States than the Constitution and laws sustained by the Supreme Court, from which there is no appeal, not even to that "Supreme Court of all Courts." Now, because the gentleman does not believe in any "hereafter" I am not disposed to force my belief upon him—nor do I feel like being badly scared out of my own convictions.

In short, and in accord with your correspondent "Novus Homo," purge all legislative bodies of all selfish, partisan, wealth-bought legislators! In the language of one greater than I: "Hurl the miserable sycophants from their exaltations as God did Nebuchadnezzar!" Hunt up wise men; men clothed upon with the spirit of justice, God-fearing men, if I may use the term, even if we have to go to the plow, the anvil, and the bench to find them.

I am done, and leave the question in the hands of the readers of the NEWS, also "Justice and Law."

Yours truly, again,
JUSTICE TO THE LINE.
SALT LAKE CITY, Feb. 22, 1894.

UINTAH STAKE CONFERENCE.

The quarterly conference of Uintah Stake was held February 4th and 5th, and was one of the most largely attended conferences ever held here. We did not expect visitors from the outside, which by the way, we have not had—at least so far as Apostles are concerned—for two or three years. We would rejoice greatly at a visit from them. The reports of the Bishops and the officers of the various organizations of the Stake were of a very pleasing character, as showing a decided improvement in the spiritual condition of the people. The addresses of the speakers were spirited and impressive, and everyone rejoiced at the good spirit made manifest.

A Sunday school union meeting was held on Sunday evening which was largely attended. One of the pleasing features of the conference was the singing, which was rendered by the ward choirs of Vernal (formerly Ashley ward) Mill Merrill's and Glina's ward, separately, and not as heretofore, as one choir. We think the change a decidedly good one, it having a tendency to develop more of the musical talent of the Stake than heretofore. Monday night, the 5th, the Vernal choir under the leadership of Brother Beuler, recently of your city, gave a very creditable concert, which was greatly enjoyed by all present. Card parties and mask balls are gaining much favor among many who profess to be Latter-day Saints. In the conference President Collett took occasion to refer to them as pleasures that are prohibited by the counsels of the Church.

While the present health of the people is quite good many are still feeling the lingering effects of la grippe, which is constant in its attendance on the people. I have not heard of any one carrying in their thermometers to keep them from freezing, but I did hear that one man's thermometer was frozen upon one recently very cold morning. I did not verify the report by going to see, but was willing to believe it true, as the morning in question was in my experience the coldest of the season. The snow at this date is the deepest since the settlement of the valley, 15 years ago, being 16 inches on the level near Vernal. It is claimed, however, by men working on the mountain, that the snow is not so deep but they can drive anywhere through the timber with their teams. Many of our district schools will have to close within a few weeks or run by private tuition. As our schools are all full or nearly so, and the teachers quite energetic, we all feel bad about it. What is the matter?

Respectfully,
C. C. BARTLET.

FROM RIVERDALE.

RIVERSIDE, Bingham Co., Idaho,
February 17th, 1894.

After leaving the railroad town of Blackfoot and traveling about a mile west we come to a good bridge 290 feet long which spans the fine stream of Snake river, and four miles further on down on the north side of the river is situated the settlement of Riverside, where some of the Saints are locating. Scattered here and there over the level country may be seen good houses, fine barns, and windmills, owned by California ranchmen who own on an average probably 800 acres of land each. I am told a number of these men want to sell out. The soil is of a fertile sandy loam (wouldn't this suit the sugar beet?) Wells of good water can be obtained, the young orchards planted out are doing well, hives of bees have done well for several years. Our Bishop's name is Chas. Liljenquist. It is the calculation to lay out a town-site in the spring. The winter so far has been an exceptionally fine one, there is only three inches of snow on the level and that came on the 30th of Jan. On the 29th the ground was bare and some of the farmers were grubbing sage. For the last two weeks it has been cold and frosty and pretty good sleighing.

Lucky is the sheep man who has his sheep near here this winter, as they are doing first rate on the range. There is good feed and plenty of room, but the sheep men generally buy hay enough in the fall to feed their sheep three months, and if they don't need it they can either sell it in the spring or hold it over. Hay has been selling all winter for $3 per ton. It seems strange to read of so much snow and such cold weather three or four hundred miles south of us and we invite the people to come up to a "more congenial climate," we have plenty of room, it is cheaper to buy a farm than to make one. I think it a good plan for two to unite and buy a claim of 180 acres and have 80 each, as it is easier to furnish $400 than it is $800, and part of that in trade. We have miles of red cedar on the lava beds north of us. I think you have had some reports this winter from near here that are "slightly inaccurate." The statements I have made here I am prepared to prove. I don't claim that this place has no disadvantages, but in my opinion it is as good a place to make homes in as I know of.

Respectfully,
PHILIP PACKETT.

EMERY NOTES.

SPRING GLENN, Emery County,
February 27, 1894.

We have had two cases of diphtheria in this place, one a young man of about 23 years of age, Wm. Ewell. Brother C. H. Cook went and examined his throat and then took down with the same disease, he being some 50 years of age. Both are getting better now. We had to stop the school.

We are bringing our canal near completion, and we expect to get water on our land and townsite this spring, then we look for better times in this part of the Lord's vineyard.

WILLIAM MILLER.

Evanston, (Wyo.) News-Register: Commercial drummers state that Wyoming people know nothing whatever of the hard times. They say there is no comparison at all between Wyoming and Nebraska and the States further east. Their trade has fallen off here of course as all over the country, but there are no signs of poverty, distress and suffering so plainly to be seen to the east of Cheyenne.

WESTERN NEWS ITEMS.

Albuquerque, N. M., is to have a tannery.

Mancos, Colo., is steadily developing its coal mining resources.

At Meeker, Colo., coal sells at $2 a ton delivered.

Arkansas valley bee men will export bees by the car load this winter.

Florence, Colo., is said to have coal for heating purposes at 55 cents per ton.

At Florence, Col., more than fifty residences are heated and lighted by natural gas.

Near Spar, Colo., a band of twelve or fifteen elk have been roaming about the settlements.

Casper, Wyoming, will have an electric light plant in operation this year.

Montrose, Colo., will run a swimming bath as a result of the development of artesian water at that place.

Lamar, Col., reports a constantly increasing demand for irrigated farms. The supply is exhausted and still the cry is for more.

Rocky Ford, Col., melon growers will reduce their melon acreage this year and go into alfalfa and hog raising on a larger scale.

Near Rifle, Col., Charles and George Mullen have killed a mountain lion which measured nearly eight feet from tip to tip.

Lithographic stone has been discovered in the western portion of Fremont county, Col. It is said to be as fine as the foreign importation.

It is announced on good authority that $50,000 will be appropriated by Congress for building irrigation ditches for the Navajo Indians in western New Mexico.

D. Curtis, a highway robber of 16 years, at Denver, knocked out a small-sized "scab" newsboy and tore up his newspapers. He was bound over by a police justice in the sum of $300.

A plucky young woman from Iowa has located near Spokane, Wash., for the purpose of establishing a poultry ranch. She will start in with 1200 or 1500 pullets.

Dyspeptic people at Pomona, Cal., says the Los Angeles Express, put red pepper on their strawberries. It does not destroy the flavor, and assists digestion.

The Kit Carson county (Nevada) Banner records the pleasant prospect for good crops in that county and says the average for grain has been largely increased.

Lincoln county, Colo., records an abundance of snow for spring moisture on the plains, and sheep and cattle are in good condition. Few or no losses from winter storms.

Navajo Indians in western New Mexico own 1,000,000 sheep, 250,000 goats, 10,000 cattle and about 100,000 ponies. It is said they marketed 1,000,000 pounds of wool last year.

Phoenix, Ariz., has had only four light snow storms during twelve years and the mercury has never dropped below 45 degrees. Last week, however, they had snowballing in Phoenix.

Tracklaying on the Cripple Creek, Colo., railroad has reached a point five miles out of Florence and eighteen miles of grade has been completed. It is said the tunnel will be cut through within the next eight or ten days.

Ed. Roach, a Silverton, Colo., miner, started from Silverton for Ophir about a month ago. His snow shoes have been found at the edge of a snowslide and it is now conceded that he is dead beneath the snow.

Jefferson county, Colo., commissioners have been petitioned to appoint a board of horticultural inspectors. Fruit tree pests are said to have greatly damaged the orchards of Jefferson county near Wheat Ridge.

The new masonry dam across the Pecos river near Eddy, N. M., to supply water for the great Hagerman canal, will be finished this week. It means millions for the Pecos valley, says an exchange.

From Hot Sulphur Springs in the Middle park, Colo., Schuyler Button last year sold 2,794 pounds of butter in Georgetown. He says he could sell 1,000 pounds a week if he could produce it.

The Elk Mountain Pilot at Crested Butte has changed hands. Mr. J. E. Phillips, who has been proprietor of the Pilot since 1880, has sold out to enable him to engage in the more lucrative business of mining.

John D. McCullough, a well-known ranchman near Lander, Wyo., who disappeared some weeks since and was supposed to have been murdered, has unexpectedly returned. He went to Nebraska where he has been lying sick. His return has created surprise.

Antelope are numerous on the Wyoming plains, near Medicine Bow. They have been driven out of the hills by deep snow and are barely existing upon the scant herbage on the plains where the winds have uncovered a little grass.

Parkdale, Colo., kaolin and fire clay is finding a ready market in Denver and Pueblo—the kaolin at the Denver Paper mills, the clay at the Standard Fire Brick factory, which manufactures for the Colorado Fuel and Iron company.

The lower San Juan river placers are being successfully worked by the Fitzgerald machine, which saves all the fine gold. The sand and gravel pays from $5 to $200 per ton, and the San Juan placers will prove a bonanza next spring.

Garfield county, Colo., has gone into the beet sugar business right earnestly. Grand Valley farmers recently met at Glenwood and decided to organize the movement. A beet sugar convention will meet at Glenwood on February 27th.

Two Arizona stockmen recently found in their pasture a colt that had been killed by some animal. The carcass was liberally strychnined, and the next morning the stockmen found a dead mountain lion near the bait. He was a monster in size, measuring 9 feet 8 inches from tip to tip.

The fight against the Union Pacific coal combine goes merrily on, according to the Rawlins (Wyo.) Journal. Rock Springs coal, it says, has been reduced 75 cents per ton, while the home product from the Dillon mine can be purchased from $2.50 for nut to $3.50 for lump.

Juan Antonio Rael, suspected of being the murderer of ex-Sheriff John Doherty at Mora, N. M., some weeks ago was shot and killed on Tuesday night at La Cueva by officers who had a warrant for his arrest. This man Rael, who is almost a full blooded Indian, had previously killed two men.

Kinney McCoy, while engaged on Wednesday afternoon drilling out a missed hole in the Arctic mine at Central City, Colo., caused a premature explosion. His left hand was lacerated. Flying rock from the shot cut his left eye badly, but it is thought the sight can be saved. He has a wife and five children.

Camia county, Idaho, has a curious rock quarry. The rock is unlimited in quantity and very finegrain. It comes out of the quarry nicely cut and dressed in square shafts or columns from six to twenty inches thick and about six feet long. It is ready for use without the labor of stone cutters.

Coyotes are numerous on the prairie at Soldier this winter, serenading the ranchers, says the Bellevue (Idaho) Review. A few evenings since Squire Jeffries's dog Pomp took exceptions to some, went for them in war paint and he was their meat, his bones picked clean only being left to tell the tale.

A pair of deer horns hung upon a tree in the Sierra Nevada mountains by Fremont forty-five years ago, with proper record hanging upon them, have just been found in Lost canyon, Nev. The tree had grown twelve feet higher in forty-five years and the horns had been covered in some portions by the growth of the bark of the tree.

The investigation in regard to Superintendent Morris of the Industrial school at Golden, Colo., is in progress. The charges are to the effect that the superintendent took liberties about the institution that he denied to subordinates. The use of tobacco at the institution proved a strong case, the boys generally getting the tobacco second-hand or finding it about the grounds.

The friends of J. M. Kinnard, a prominent attorney and society man of Spokane, Wash., are alarmed over his mysterious disappearance. He was last seen late last Tuesday night; was then despondent, and hinted at suicide. It is feared that he may have killed himself. Kinnard has served a term as superior judge in Spokane county, and ranked as one of the leading jurists of the state.

Mrs. Chris Evans, wife of the Fresno bandit, and her daughter, Eva Evans, ran against a snag in Oakland, Cal., and their show, "Evans and Sontag Up to Date," came near being at an end. As it is now, half of the show is in the possession of the constable, and in consequence the company had a hard time to dig up the necessary firearms for the performance last Saturday night.

A party of six mountaineers, under the guidance of "Coyote Bill," started from Missoula, Mont., on Wednesday, for the upper Rattlesnake, where Bonner Newton is supposed to have been buried beneath an avalanche of snow or else met death by falling over a precipice. The party is thoroughly equipped for mountain climbing and will make a thorough search for the remains of the lost man.

John M. White, formerly proprietor of the Transcontinental hotel, at Colton, Cal., shot himself in the heart on Sunday afternoon and died instantly. On the table in the dining room he had left the following note. "Good-by; a long good-by to my own sweet wife. I have just woke up and am about as drunk as when I went to sleep. The Keely cure is not quick enough for me. Good-by to my poor little girl. JNO."

The Bell Telephone company says the Mercur Mercury, are now at work on the plans for the telephone line from that city via Lesh to Mercur and Tintic points, the construction of which will be commenced in the early spring. Mercur and Eureka are the chief points on the line, but offices will be established also at Homansville, Mammoth, Mammothville, Silver City and the Sioux mine, and probably at Fairfield or Camp Floyd.

The death of another old-timer is reported from Virginia City, Nevada. This time it is William J. Norwood, who came to Montana in 1868. He was the pioneer dramatist and theatrical manager of the territory, and few men in the state were better known or had more friends. He was born in Baltimore and came of a very prominent family. Only a short time ago he told him to about $80,000, left him by a relative.

Empire (according to the Carson, Nevada, Appeal) will soon have reason to boast of being the home of an inventor as well as that of a hero. Ed Reagan has invented a clock. A working model of it can be seen at a local saloon. He names it the mercurial alarm clock. It is so arranged that it will alarm when the temperature where the clock is placed goes above 90 degrees or below 75 degrees, or it can be set for any other range of temperature desired.

The Nelson tunnel at Creede, Colo., on Wednesday night was the scene of about 800 pounds of giant powder exploding, wiping the blacksmith shop out of existence and injuring the engineer slightly. The shock was felt for miles. The miners had left some powder near the fire to warm and it caught fire. The men were eating their midnight meal at the boarding house, and had the explosion occurred five minutes later it would have been fatal to some or all of them.

On Wednesday afternoon the men employed in Mohr & Yoerk's packing house, at Sacramento, Cal., found Jacob Meyerhofer, the engineer lying insensible on the floor of the engine room. He had been caught by a pulley while oiling the shaft sixteen feet above the floor, and whirled round till his clothes gave way, when he dropped. Both arms were broken, the skull fractured and his jaw crushed. He died in an hour. His clothes were all torn off and wound around the shaft.

It is rumored about town observes the Pocatello, Idaho, Tribune, that Mr. Collier, the Special Examiner of Surveys of the Indian department, who is now investigating the recent survey of this reservation, has intimated to several of the leading businessmen of the town that the work was so poorly done that it will never be accepted by the department. If this should prove to be true, it will be bad news for Pocatello, as it would in all probability delay the opening of the reservation until after another survey could be made.

A. P. Hood was shot and instantly killed at his ranch in the West Patch county, Cal., eighteen miles from Bakersfield on Wednesday afternoon by another farmer named Simpson in a dispute over a water ditch. Simpson and his partner wanted to build the ditch across Hood's land and the latter warned them off. They went away and after a while came back, each armed with a shotgun, and at once commenced firing, killing Hood. One shot was fired at the boy with Hood, but without effect.

A newspaper carrier, on his rounds at Oakland, Cal., on Sunday morning, discovered a black slouch hat and a cotton umbrella lying in a pool of blood near the terminus of the cable road on the San Pablo avenue. The discovery was reported at the sheriff's office and a deputy visited the scene and secured the hat and umbrella. He could learn nothing of their owner. It was suspected that some one had been stood up by footpads, but no one could be found who had heard any disturbance during the night or throw any light upon the mystery.

It is probable that practical smelting will be added to the curriculum of the School of Mines at the state university, remarks the Reno (Nevada) Journal. Professor Jackson, who has charge of that department, has had a quartz mill built, and it is now in practical operation. The mill was built by the students under Professor Jackson's supervision, and the board of regents will very likely add a smelter so that the students can be practically educated in the art of reducing and smelting ores by every process now in practical use.

Mrs. John Wright, wishing to disinfect her rooms, applied to an undertaker of Redding, Cal., for some embalming fluid. He at first refused to give it, but upon her promise to handle it carefully and allow no one else to touch it he consented. She happened to have some medicine in the same place where she put the fluid, and wishing to take a dose of her medicine she accidentally took the wrong bottle and swallowed a tablespoonful of the fluid. She immediately saw her mistake and took an emetic, and then called a doctor. They have been working with her steadily. There are but slight chances of her recovery.

Up in the Sierra Ancha mountains of Gila county, says the Phoenix Gazette, there are plenty of bear, great big bears, as big as four-year-old steers, and with claws on them that leave a mark like a butcher's cleaver in the snow. There are not many people in the Sierra Ancha. A few people go up among the pines and plant potatoes. Nobody shoots bear in that country.

Phil Askins, the famous mountain-lion hunter, with the assistance of a fine pack of hounds, managed to kill one a few years ago, but that was not in the bear region of the mountains. Bear and humans live together with mutual respect, if not amity, and neither side cares to break the truce.

N. T. Porter, of the Cascade Land company, stated to a reporter of the Great Falls, Mont., Leader, that he moved about 2,500 head of sheep, which had been pasturing about five miles down the river, on account of the smelter smoke. He says that he kept on losing sheep out of his band from some mysterious disease and was unable to find out what it was. He made several post mortems and slaughtered some of the sick ones and found that the flesh and fat had a yellow tinge. A herder who had worked near the East Helena smelter told him that a band there had been affected in the same way, so he came to the conclusion that it must be due to the arsenic in the smoke from the smelter, which became deposited on the grass.

There never has been such a season of activity in planting olive orchards in California and Arizona as this year, remarks an exchange. All the olive nurseries in Pomona have been working day and night for three weeks in filling orders for olive trees, and have more orders on hand than they can fill. Shipments are made all over the state. Thus far about 800,000 olive trees have gone out from here to points in southern and central California, and fully 100,000 more trees will be shipped before the season closes. The great financial success which has been achieved in olives in southern California orchards in the past two years has given unusual impetus to this industry. The olive crop in Pomona valley during the past season amounted to over $80,000, and it was a short crop. Seven years ago there were less than forty olive trees in the whole valley.

A well-known railroad man told the following story the other day—at least the Anaconda, Mont., Standard states so: "When I was at Mandan, N. D., we had a man whose memory of car numbers was really remarkable. When a train whistled into the yard he would step to the platform, and, without a book or pencil, would stand and watch the cars go by. If any one was standing near he would converse upon whatever subject occurred, and when the conversation was ended he would step into his office and make a complete and accurate record of the train, beginning at the first car and ending with the cabooses. Sometimes, just to test him, we would get him to begin at the cabooses and write the numbers the other way, or else begin in the middle of the train and work both ways. He never made a mistake that I remember. Car numbers, the names of the roads to which they belonged and their relative position in the train would all be recorded accurately. His was the most remarkable memory that I ever knew of."

The following is recommended as a sure cure for the tramp nuisance. It was given by a Fresno, Cal., supervisor: "Feed tramps scantily, work them hard, give them long terms and long hours and clothe them thin."

THE SCANDINAVIAN FATHERLAND.

Prepared from Special Cablegrams.

SWEDEN.

One tenth of the population of Ystad consists of goodtemplars.

King Oscar has donated 2,500 kronor to the Sailor's Home of Stockholm.

Alderman Per Cartberg, one of the most prominent citizens of Skofde, died at the age of 62 years.

The large Jungfrusund steam saw mill near Stockholm was burned to the ground.

During 1893, 202 people, committed suicide in Sweden. One hundred and fifty-six were men, and 46 women.

A railroad will be built between Skofde and Svensbro in Vestergothland.

Princes Carl and Eugen pay every day for the meals of 100 poor school children.

The Salvation army of Sweden has been incorporated with a capital stock of 300,000 kronor.

A large number of "moonshiners" is still doing business in the forests of Jemtland and Medelpad.

Colonel J. A. R. Svedenstierna, ex-commander of the famous Dragoon Regiment of Skone, died at the advanced age of 93 years.

The import of Sweden amounted to $110,000,000 in round numbers in 1893, while the export is estimated at $98,000,000.

Ex-governor, Count Gustaf Lagerbjelke is reported to be dangerously ill, and his death is expected at any moment.

The government has asked the riksdag for an appropriation of 4000 kronor for the publication of periodical pamphlets on temperance.

Only one person was present when the pastor of the Aerila parish entered his church to preach the gospel the other day. Nevertheless the sermon was held.

When Crown Princess Victoria left Stockholm for the southern part of Europe, she was so ill, that she had to be carried on a stretcher down to the railroad station.

The newly completed harbor at Helsingborg, which is considered from a Swedish point of view to be a grand piece of work, has a water area of about 21 acres, a depth of water of 23 feet and a length of quays of about 5000 feet.

The Royal Academy of Literature, of History, and Antiquities is an institution which has fame all over Europe. The academy has its headquarters in Stockholm, was founded in 1753 and has at the most ten honorary, twenty-five active, and not more than twenty foreign members.

Lieutenant Liljenstolpe, of the Swedish army, will some time in February leave his native country for Omaha, Nebraska, where he intends to found a gymnastic-orthopedical institute. Lieutenant Liljenstolpe has a brother in Omaha, who is connected with one of the railroad companies in that city.

The consumption of spirituous liquors of all kinds (not including wine or beer) is gradually decreasing, and may be calculated for the year 1892 as 8,114,000 gallons of 50 per cent. The mean consumption per individual was per annum between 1871-1875 3.12 gallons. In 1891 it was only 1.72 gallons, and last year not more than 1.58 and has thus considerably decreased since 1875.

The mission work of the Salvation Army, begun in England, was introduced into Sweden in 1882 by Miss Hanna Ouchterlony. Depots are at present established in 149 towns, boroughs, and 50 outposts in villages. Of these 145 depots, 115 are opened by women. Amongst the officers are 316 women, 194 men, soldiers and recruits are 9,400 men and women. The "slum" work of the Salvation Army, established by Mrs. Lagercrantz in 1860, with the purpose of providing practical help and nursing in sickness to the poor, is at present introduced into 9 towns.

Elise Hvasser, nee Jacobson, the greatest actress Sweden has ever produced, is dead. She was born in 1831, and left the stage in 1888, when she was granted a large pension for the rest of her life. Her parts amount to nearly a couple of hundred. The types she created were of various kinds, and the greater number of splendid effect. Amongst classical pieces may be mentioned; Mary Stuart, Ophelia, Desdemona, Clara, the Marquise of Villemer, etc. In Ibsen's plays she has created the female parts, especially as Nora in "A Doll's House" she achieved great success.

The Society in Memoriam of King Oscar and Queen Josephine was established in 1873 by the Dowager Queen Josephine for the purpose of reforming boys of a bad character. The society founded in 1876 the agricultural colony of Hall at Sodertelge. Boys between 10-15 years of age, who either have committed offences or on account of bad moral character have to be brought up at reformatories, are received from all parts of the country. The number of boys is at present not far from 250. Satisfying informations have been received of 83½ per cent. of the whole number of the boys, who have finished their course at this institution.

NORWAY.

The state debt of Norway amounts to 125,000,000 kronor.

Hundreds of people are without work in Christiania.

Consul Lysholm, of Throndhjem, died at the age of 64 years.

Several people were drowned at Aalesund.

The Conservatives are getting all the offices in the storting.

An association of seamstresses has been organized in Christiania.

The number of Methodists in Norway increased considerably during 1893.

More Norwegian ships were wrecked in 1893 than during any year before.

The Norwegian ship Norbygd was lost near Farsund, and the whole crew has probably been drowned.

A famine is threatening many fishermen's families in Vardo and Herred.

Congressman Kaxrud from the Akershus district died at the age of 71 years.

A German paper styles the Throndhjem cathedral as the finest in Europe.

Wahl, a stone-cutter, has been elected president of the labor unions of Christiania.

Dr. Schreiner, of Drammen, has been appointed rector of the Christiania Cathedral School.

The bark Anna was wrecked near Lofoten. The bark was owned by a merchant of Christianssand.

Of the total imports of the country about 60 per cent falls on Christiania, Christianssand and Bergen.

The steamer Izaro from Christiania was wrecked in the North Sea. The crew was picked up by a fishing-smack.

Many American tourists have made arrangements with a tourist bureau in Paris for the purpose of visiting Norway next summer.

Their diamond-wedding was celebrated by L. N. Christensen, a well-known pilot of Kragero, and his wife. The old couple is in the best of health.

Thomas Olsen and Ole Kristensen Sandy, two prominent citizens of Throndhjem, were drowned while fishing near Hoibakken.

Women take a prominent part in the temperance work amongst children, both in the Good Templar Orders and in the Blue Band Societies.

Several Norwegian letter carriers have emigrated to Cape Town in southern Africa, where they have succeeded in getting employment at the post offices in that city.

During 1893 27,023 people emigrated to the United States from Norway. Of these 3000 were Swedes. Only 300 persons left Norway for the special purpose of visiting the World's Fair.

It goes without saying that it has been the women of the people who have in Norway first taken up the struggle against the vicious habit of drinking, and devoted their few spare hours to the work, as well as a portion of their hardly saved earnings.

DENMARK.

A sugar refinery will be built at Vejle. Several fishermen were drowned off Kjertermind.

The number of Swedish residents in Copenhagen has considerably increased during the last six months.

Building master J. Kohler, a prominent citizen of Copenhagen, died at the age of 58 years.

The emigration from Denmark has been unusually small during the month of January.

The Althing of Iceland has passed a bill making women eligible to a number of offices.

Court Chamberlain R. Gravenhors Lovenstjerne died at Vegeholm at the age of 53 years.

Ex-postmaster general Count O. S. Danneskjold-Samsøe died at Copenhagen at the age of 90 years.

Two English barks were wrecked off the northern part of Jutland; but whether their crews succeeded in saving themselves or not, is not known.

The Copenhagen Telephone company has rented a large building at Vimmelskiftet for a period of 25 years. It is 14x40 feet, and will be used as a central station.

The Methodists of Odense have built a portable church or meeting place. It is made of iron and wood and is octangular in form. Its seating capacity is 200, and it is put together in such a manner that it may easily be taken apart, carried away and erected in a new place.

The German emperor is credited with a prettily turned complement in favor of Miss Frida Scotta, the Danish violinist. After listening attentively the emperor expressed his appreciation by saying: "If I shut my eyes when you are playing I could fancy it was Sarasatit, but I much prefer to keep them open."

A farmer near Copenhagen sold a house and lot, three chromos, a second hand stove pipe hat, three bottles of beer and a boat to a Copenhagen merchant, receiving in return 55,600 pounds of artificial manure, 350 pounds of lubricating oil and 100 pounds of wagon grease.

Emma Hodgini, a circus girl, fell in love with a Christiania policeman, and their engagement was soon announced. But the poor thing who had been loafing around all her life knew next to nothing about religion. To remedy this defect she is studying religion at Copenhagen, and will be confirmed and married at the same time.

The public was in hopes that the Copenhagen "Gold Cure" would not be able to return the fees of a patient according to a decision of the municipal court, so that the institution would be sold at public auction and thus the secret of the remedy divulged. But the money was returned in the nick of time, and the great secret will have another lease of life.

OUR STOCKHOLM LETTER.

STOCKHOLM, Feb. 4, 1894.—The letters sent by Swedish Americans to their relatives in the old country and usually containing money remittances, are conspicuous by their non-arrival just at present.

The hard times in America are, of course responsible for this. Of the people in Sweden, who are dependent on financial assistance from America for their existence most to pity, however, are the many poor wives, who are expecting their husbands to send them either money or prepaid tickets for a journey to the great Republic. Instead of money or tickets these women have in many cases received only a few lines on a postal card from their far away husbands, telling them of his being without work and himself in need of assistance. Often the husband and father has undoubtedly concealed the true state of how things have run bad, having written on the contrary, words of encouragement to his family, but there are other examples of the writer having told the people at home that he must sweep the streets of Chicago in order to obtain food and lodging.

Under those circumstances and with information to the above effect, it is no wonder that the emigration to America has considerably decreased during the first month of 1894. This is the more true in regard to the emigration from the southern part of Sweden.

I take the liberty to quote the following glowing description of Norrland (the northern part of Sweden) from "Sweden, Some Hints For Visitors," a pamphlet recently published by the Swedish Tourist Society of Stockholm: Norrland is at its best either in the middle of the summer, when the rivers are swollen by the melting snow that still lies on the mountains, and the long daylight enlivens the traveler's stay; or in midwinter when the forests lie half-buried in snow, and the icy mantle of the lakes glitter in the sunshine, blue shadows marking the tracks left by the sledges, reddens in the sunset glow tor gleams with a play of colors as he northern lights, flash across the midwinter sky. The leafless trees, hoary with inches of rime resemble forests of pantcoral. The roads are alive with a merry train of sledges, drawn by small but speedy horses, and full of passengers wrapped in his shaggy fur-coat, the sledger defying the cold, enjoys to the full the beauty of nature, and draws deep breaths of invigorating oxygen. Here you meet a company of wagoners on their way to the market with their load of grain, there you see an endless line of timber carts. On his long snowshoes (skis) the woodman darts across the white expanse, and in the depths of the forest the charcoal burner tends his crackling and smoking pile, versed in the lore of goblin and fay. In a word, if you wish to see varied and cheerful scenes of winter life, take a trip to Norrland, you will be surprised how little the cold affects you in these regions. It is not the gray, piercing, chill of a winter day in the Boulevard des Italiens or the Avenue de l'Opera. No, it is the brawny cold of Sweden, with pure fresh air to exhilarate the spirits and quicken the pulses.

None who has not spent a winter day or two in the North can picture to himself the beauty of this season. But he who has once had this experience, will certainly agree with us when we say that a short winter excursion to Norrland, before the commencement of the spring season in the Riviera, is highly piquant in affect, and is refreshing as an ice before the grapes at a dinner party.

In many cases hard work prevents poor parents in the capital from looking after their children, and the consequence is often that the young ones, during the time they are free from school, roam about the streets or early begin to resort to public houses and thus falling into bad habits and vice which afterwards are bringing a great number of children to the prisons and correction houses.

In order to prevent this evil, foster good habits and above all to instill into the children's minds love of work, institutions have been founded in Sweden, where such children as would otherwise roam about the streets during their leisure hours, have the opportunity to learn such handiwork that make them enjoy work and where they as a recompence for working, receive a plain but, good and substantial meal. An institution of this kind is called workshop (in Swedish; arbetsstuga.)

The first Swedish workshop was established in Stockholm in 1887 by Mrs. Anna Hierta—Retzius, and endowed by the institution, "In Memoriam of Lars Hierta," which institution with great generosity has supported every undertaking of this kind. Several workshops were soon started after the pattern of the first.

The workshops choose their pupils amongst the most destitute school children. Some children come to the workshop in the morning, when they, after finished work, have their dinner consisting of two courses; but as the plurality of them, during the morning hours, are occupied in the boardschools, they come to the workshops in the afternoon and get their evening meal before leaving.

The following occupations are the most common: For boys, netting, carpet and chip plaiting, basket making, net work, planing, sewing sacks, shoemaking etc. For girls; chip, basket and bast works, sewing, weaving, straw plaiting and manufacturing of slippers. To the mending of clothes, stockings, boots and shoes, particular attention is paid. The children also practice household duties, taking it in turn to assist in the school to do the rooms, wash up the dishes etc.

The children have generally to keep on with one kind of work, till they have attained sufficient ability to do it, without help. If the means of the workshop permit they are then allowed to take home work, for which they are paid. The money is put in the savings bank, and at the end of the term clothes are bought with it.

The children's works are either sold under hand to people interested in the institution, or at sales, and they generally sell very well.

The teaching is to a great extent carried on by voluntary help. Many young girls from the upper classes have devoted themselves to this work. Besides these there are some lady teachers who have a small salary, some shoemakers and basket makers.

The result of these workshops has proved extremely satisfactory. The children have shown a great deal of interest in their work, which is evident both from their regular attendance, and from the eager applications for admittance. The parents of the children are also interested in the workshop. The teachers at the board schools have expressed the opinion that the children from the workshops in spite of increased work always show greater industry and interest in their school work.

At present Stockholm has eight workshops with about 10,000 children. Many provincial towns have begun to follow the good example, especially Upsala, which has very excellent workshops.

OBITUARY NOTES.

SISTER BOOTH.

BRIGHAM CITY, Feb. 25, 1894.—Died in Brigham City on Sunday, February 18th, 1894, at fifteen minutes past 5 p. m., after a lingering illness of three months with capillary bronchitis, Sister Booth. Everything was done that loving and willing hands and skill could do; she was reconciled and well satisfied to be released and a few moments before the final end she bade all good bye.

She was the wife of Elder David Booth; was born in the town of Mayfield, Derbyshire, England, on the 23rd of March, 1826, joined the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and was baptized on the 29th of June, 1847. She was the mother of seven children, three boys and four girls; six of her children preceded her to the spirit world in their infancy, one of them being consigned to a watery grave while crossing the ocean. One daughter is still living who is the mother of ten children.

She came to Utah in 1862; settled in Plain City, Weber county, with her husband; lived there till they moved to Brigham City in the year 1874, where she has since resided. She was a faithful member and labored as a teacher in the Relief Society.

BELINDA MARDEN PRATT.

Belinda Marden Pratt, a wife of the late Apostle Parley P. Pratt, passed quietly away at the residence of one of her sons in this city yesterday morning, February 19th, at 7:35. She was a native of the state of New Hampshire, and embraced the Gospel when quite young. She left brothers, sisters, companions, friends and comparative wealth, and followed by the scorn of some, the grief of others, and the condemnation of all, cast her lot with the people of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, coming to Nauvoo in time to be expelled with thousands of other Saints from that city and the state of Illinois.

Taking up the line of march across the Plains with her husband's family, she reached this Territory in the fall of 1847 (immediately following the Pioneers). She suffered all the trials, exposures and privations incident to pioneer life. She went through the sore trial of famine while nursing twin babies, in the early days of our settlement here. She passed through the unspeakable grief of losing her husband by assassination while he was on a mission.

Left with a family of little children unprotected for and unprotected, she struggled through years of more than ordinary hardships and privations. She was an educated, refined and gentle woman, full of sympathy, generosity and kindness, seeking out the needy and afflicted and ministering to their wants. She was for years an active, intelligent and persistent worker for the public good, holding several positions of trust and responsibility while residing in southern Utah, her duties there being administered with scrupulous care and fidelity.

In all the incidents of her eventful life whether in joy or sorrow, she always acknowledged the hand of God, and impressed upon her children and all with whom she associated her abiding faith in the Gospel of His Son, as revealed through the Prophet Joseph Smith.

She was a faithful wife, an affectionate mother, a good and true friend, a kind and obliging neighbor, a devoted and faithful Saint of God. She died with the utmost assurance of a reunion with her husband and other dear relatives and friends in the spirit world, there to await the great day when the resurrection trumpet shall sound, calling the righteous dead from their graves, while saints and angels mingle their voices in anthems of welcome to those who put on immortality, and in everlasting praise and thanksgiving to Him who wrought out their great salvation.—[Com.]

OGDEN, Feb. 19, 1894.—Two more veteran workers in the Gospel have passed to the great beyond, to continue their labors in a higher sphere among their kindred who have preceded them to the spirit world. Thus our ranks are being thinned out and the generations now growing up will soon know them only as belonging to the historic past. The first of these two is

FATHER WILLIAM SMITH.

He was born about 1818, at Huckleeskut, Leicestershire, England. The month and day of his birth I have not been able to ascertain. When grown to manhood he removed to the old monastic town of Whitwick, Leicestershire, where, over forty years since, he heard the Gospel in its fulness preached by the Elders of Israel. He accepted their testimony, and cast in his lot with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and continued faithful to his convictions to the end of his mortality.

While in his native land he labored faithfully testifying of the great things God has done for him, and that He has revealed the true plan of salvation, and has again offered the human family an opportunity to embrace it and be saved. He was kind and generous to the Elders and assisted them to the best of his ability with his means.

In 1872 he emigrated to Utah, and finally settled in Ogden, where he became known and respected by all wherever he was known. On February 11th, after a long, lingering illness, during which he was a great but patient sufferer, he breathed his last.

SISTER ALICE HILL

Departed this life February 12, 1894. She was the daughter of James Mellor and Mary Hardman. She was born at Oldham, Lancashire, England, April 27, 1815. Her family and herself were formerly members of the old Wesleyan body of religious worshippers for many years. In the year 1849, she was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. In 1836 she was married to John Woolstenhume, by whom she had three sons and one daughter. In 1843 her husband died, leaving her with three small children to provide for.

In 1849 she married the second time, her husband being named George Rhoads. The same year they took passage on the ship Margaret and sailed for the United States.

The voyage was long, exceedingly rough, and they suffered much for the lack of bread and fresh water. They landed at St. Louis, Mo., in Feb. 1850. The issue of this marriage was one daughter who survives her parents. During the summer of 1850, her second husband was prostrated by a sunstroke which proved fatal. He survived the shock but a very short time. Alice Rhoads was thus again deprived of her natural protector, and was also for the second time left a widow, to toil for her children's subsistence in a strange land among strangers. She trusted in God and believed that He would provide for her and she was not disappointed.

On November 5, 1850, she was united to a third husband, Thomas Hill. They were married in St. Louis, Mo. By this husband she had three children, all daughters. She survived her last husband seven years.

On May 25, 1853, the family left St. Louis per steamboat for Kanesville, which place they reached in due time. After being detained one month in consequence of high water they commenced their overland journey for Utah, in Captain Moses Clawson's company. They reached Salt Lake City September 26th. They remained in the capital till 1854, then moved to Kay's Ward, Davis county, and the following year came to Ogden which place they made their permanent home. Here they shared the poverty of the hard winter and subsequent seasons. They pulled up stakes and "moved south" with the body of the Church in the eventful year of 1858. On their return they united with their co-religionists to build up the Junction city in this inter-mountain region.

As soon as the people had rested a little from their harassment, Sister Alice Hill united with a number of others here and commenced her labors as a sister of mercy, ministering to the wants of the needy. She never tired of doing good. Night and day she was always on hand to respond to calls of this kind. Many a day, and all day long, toiling beneath the melting heat of summer, or stemming the chilling blasts of the winter winds, she cheerfully prosecuted these labors of love in connection with Sisters Mary Ann Ellis and Kizra Davies—the latter now dead. The hungry, the naked, the sick and the dying experienced the benefits that were administered by these angelic ministers. This was not the work of a few days or a month; but it continued for nearly a decade and a half.

For over thirteen years Sister Hill was first counselor to Sister Ellis, president of the Second Ward Relief Society. She was constant in the discharge of her duties. She was an able counselor, a safe and wise adviser and always had a kind word for those or her sisters who were disconsolate from any cause. Her associates always experienced pleasure in her society, and strength from her conversations. She was beloved by all who knew her.

The funeral services were held on the 14th inst., in the Second ward meeting house. Bishop Robert McQuarrie presided. The attendance was very large. A new feature was introduced at the services, thus: in addition to the Elders who spoke on the occasion, the vast assembly was addressed by Sister Jane S. Richards, president of the Relief societies of the Weber stake, Sister Mary Ann Ellis, president of the Second ward society, and Sister Maria L. Newman, a co-worker with them. These ladies, who had for many years been intimately acquainted with the deceased, spoke from the fulness of their hearts of the life and labors of their beloved friend. There was nothing formal in the encomiums and high tribute paid by them to her memory.

JOSEPH HALL.

THE DEAD.

Peaceful be their Rest.

RICHARDS.—February 21, 1894, of pneumonia, Samuel Willard Richards, aged six years, at the residence of his grandfather, Mr. John Snell.

SCHULTHESS.—In the First ward, Salt Lake City, Maria Schultness, wife of Arnold Schultness. The deceased was born in Zurich, Switzerland, April 8, 1837; died of consumption, February 21, 1894.

SAVAGE.—At Marlon ward, Utah, Feb. 4th, 1894, Edward Savage, son of Mary Ward and David Savage; born Dec. 29th, 1862. The cause of death was an abscess on the liver. He leaves a wife and four small children to mourn his loss. He has been a great sufferer all his life.

ANDREW.—At Mapleton, Utah, Feb. 21, 1894, of dropsy, Elizabeth W. Andrew, relict of the late F. C. Andrew; aged 71 years, 10 months and 18 days.

Funeral services were held in the Seventh ward meeting house at 1 o'clock p. m. today. Millennial Star, please copy.

FRAMPTON.—At Fillmore, Millard county, Utah, February 21, 1894, of inflammation of the lungs, James Frampton. He was a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints forty-one years; emigrated from Hockley, Essex, England, in the fall of 1869, and died in full faith of the Gospel.

EVANS.—In this city, Sunday evening, February 25th, 1894, of dropsy, Julia Ann Evans, wife of Elder James Evans, and daughter of George and Julia Ann Reynolds. Deceased was born in London, England, December 19th, 1844. The funeral will take place at the Twentieth ward meeting house at 2 o'clock Tuesday afternoon.

LAMBORN.—At Marysville, Fremont county, Idaho, Feb. 12, 1894, Eliza Hulda Lamborn aged 10 years, 10 months and 19 days, daughter of Joseph and Emily Lamborn. Deceased was taken suddenly ill while at school and died within a few moments of her first exhibiting any signs of illness. Funeral services were held Feb. 14, 1894, in Marysville meeting house.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

Truth and Liberty.

No. 12.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, MARCH 10, 1894.

VOL. XLVIII.

BLESSINGS NOT APPRECIATED.

Discourse delivered at the Utah Stake Conference, Provo, Sunday Afternoon, January 14, 1894, by

PRESIDENT GEORGE Q. CANNON

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

We have had a great deal of excellent instruction today, and no doubt that which has been said has prompted many reflections, which will be very profitable to us if we have the Spirit of God to bring them to our remembrance after we leave here. I do not know any people upon the face of the earth who have so many privileges in this respect as the Latter-day Saints. The Gospel is preached in great simplicity, accompanied by power; and there is no subject connected with our present or our future existence that does not receive attention from the Elders who speak to us. In this respect our position is different from that of any other people. I doubt whether there ever was a people upon the face of the earth, considering the length of time that the Priesthood has been in our midst, who have had greater opportunities of learning concerning essential and important matters than the Latter-day Saints have had. There has been a continuous flood of instruction and counsel, and reproof and warning when needed. We have walked in the light, and not in the dark, and have known the mind and will of God concerning us. This is a privilege that ought to be esteemed beyond price by every one of us.

It is most delightful to be in meetings where the Spirit of God reigns, controlling the speaker and softening the hearts of the hearers. I do not take any pleasure in meetings where this is not present. It is a blessed thing to know that God is with us, and that He condescends to pour out His Spirit and give unto us a testimony that He is with us. While I was sitting here today I remembered that which occurred last Sunday in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City. One of our young men was called to speak, and of course, being unexpectedly called upon, he came up to the stand with a great deal of fear and trembling; but he spoke under the influence and power of God, to the delight of all who heard him. I do not know when I have listened to a discourse with greater pleasure than I did to his; and the cause of my rejoicing was that God was with us. This young man supplicated the prayers of the congregation in his behalf, and God heard those prayers. This is our condition. We are the people of God, acknowledged by Him. We have the testimony from Him that we are His people, and that we are doing that which He accepts. It should be our aim, when we come to conference, not to be satisfied unless we feel the baptism of the Holy Ghost and the power thereof resting down upon us. We should come with our hearts prepared for that, seeking for it in faith, our desires ascending unto our Father in heaven in the most fervent manner to soften our hearts and to give unto us His Holy Spirit. We should ask Him also to give it unto those who address us, that they may speak the words of life and salvation, that each of us may go from the meetings feeling that the Lord has been with us, and has given us bread to feed our souls and to strengthen us in the midst of our trials, our afflictions and our perplexities. One of the great blessings that we enjoy, my brethren and sisters, is that we can go unto God, and go with a knowledge that He will hear our prayers. If we are in sorrow, if we have heavy burdens, or are in any manner perplexed, He will hear us; He will lift our burdens, lighten our sorrows, dispel darkness, and fill us with light and with that heavenly feeling that comes from Him through the presence of the Holy Ghost.

In listening to the remarks that have been made concerning the Priesthood, my mind has gone back to early days. I am satisfied of one thing—we hold the Priesthood of the Son of God too lightly. President Woodruff has told us how long he labored as a Priest. Such a thing is unheard of nowadays. When a young man goes on a mission, the feeling is, both on the part of the young man and of those who send him, that he should at least be an Elder, and that his efficiency is curtailed, to some extent, if he does not possess that Priesthood. While President Woodruff was telling us about the powers of those holding the office of a Priest, I recalled my own experience. I labored as a Seventy a good many years, and I possessed as a Seventy all the authority that was necessary apparently to do all that was required at my hands. So it is with an Elder, and, to a limited extent, with a Priest. Of course, a Priest cannot confirm members of the Church and bestow upon them the Holy Ghost; but in every other respect there is scarcely a limit to his usefulness and his power. I have felt that we have made these blessings too cheap. Our young men do not seem to value the Priesthood as their fathers did. One reason of this is that when a young man wants to be married, and the young lady is a member of the Church in good standing, the natural desire of the parents of both parties, as well as themselves, is to go to the Temple and have the sealing ordinance performed. To do this the young man must have the Melchisedec Priesthood; and in some of the Stakes complaints have been made to us about the carelessness of these young men after they have been ordained. In the Salt Lake Stake they get up in the priesthood meeting and say, in response to questions propounded by the President of the Stake, that they will attend the meetings of their quorums and to the duties of the priesthood that is about to be conferred upon them; yet many fail to do so, and bring themselves under condemnation thereby.

I believe that our endowments are to be easily obtained. Men and women go to the Temple who do not understand or value the precious blessings that are bestowed upon them, and I have felt for years that something should be done to change this, so that instead of it being necessary for a man to receive the Melchisedec Priesthood, he will first manifest his efficiency in the Aaronic Priesthood and show his capabilities and good desires before receiving the higher Priesthood. I firmly believe that this will be so some time, and that men will not get the fullness of the endowment with the ease that they have done, but will receive that part which belongs to the Aaronic Priesthood. These blessings become so common that many people do not value them or know how to use them.

When the Prophet Joseph first communicated that the Lord had revealed to him the keys of the endowments, I can remember the great desire there was on every hand to understand something about them. When the Prophet would speak about his desire to complete the Temple in order that he might impart unto his fellow servants that which God had delivered to him, a thrill went through the congregation and a great desire for this filled their hearts. I can only judge as a youth, but I know that was the feeling among the adult brethren. Then when he did communicate the endowments to a few persons before the Temple was completed, the whole people were moved with desire to complete the Temple, in order that they might receive these great blessings therein. They were valued beyond price. A man that could go in and get his endowments was looked upon as though he had received some extraordinary blessing—something akin to that which the angels received—and it was estimated and valued in that way.

How is it now? There is a complete indifference, it may be said, in relation to it. Young people go there stupid, with no particular desire only to get married, without realizing the character of the obligations that they take upon themselves, or the covenants that they make, and the promises involved in the taking of these covenants. The result is, hundreds among us go to the House of the Lord and receive these blessings and come away without having any particular impression made upon them. I think that this is deplorable. When men have gifts and blessings bestowed upon them and they do not value them, they become a cause of condemnation rather than blessing. It seems to me that there should be exceeding great care taken in this respect. I would rather—though I would not like it—a son of mine be married by a Bishop than to have him go to the Temple in an unfit condition and receive these blessings. It would be far better for him.

This Priesthood that the Lord has restored is a far more important thing than even the most advanced of us can appreciate at the present time. We who bear this Priesthood act in God's stead in the midst of the people; we are the representatives of God—the ambassadors, so to speak, of the Savior, who has given us this Priesthood; and the duties of this calling are most important, because they affect the salvation of the children of men.

I have heard a great many inquiries at different times in relation to the rewards that we are to receive after we get through with this life. The Lord has told us in great plainness that "the Son of Man shall come in the glory of His Father with His angels; and then He shall reward every man according to his works." In the first section of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants the Lord makes a very impressive remark. He says: "Unto the day when the Lord shall come to recompense unto every man according to his work, and measure to every man according to the measure which he has measured to his fellow man." I have been greatly impressed with this of late, and I think it a most important announcement. We shall have to answer at the judgment seat of our God for the deeds done in the body. There will be no escape from it. We may be successful in achieving certain ends in this life, regardless of the righteousness of those ends. A great many people think if they are only successful in that which they do, the rightfulness of it does not matter much. But whoever acts with this idea in mind takes a wrong view, and some day or other will have cause to repent with great sorrow; for I say to you, as a servant of God, that you cannot do wrong without having to atone for that wrong sooner or later. There is no human being can escape the justice of our Father in heaven. Hence it is of exceeding great importance that we should obtain the forgiveness of our sins as we go along, and not let them accumulate against us. If we do wrong to a neighbor; if we do wrong to our families, or any member of them, it should be our aim not to rest until we have made that right with the one whom we have wronged, no matter how humble or how lowly the one may be. We do not know the rewards that God has in store for His faithful children. I often think of the parable which Jesus gave of the rich man and Lazarus. The rich man never suspected that the poor, wretched creature who sat and gathered the crumbs that fell from his table was a favorite of heaven. He possessed riches; all his earthly desires were gratified; and in the plenitude of his power he never thought of the poor man. But death came, and he lifted up his eyes in torment; while the poor creature that was so insignificant and contemptible in his eyes was received into Abraham's bosom, and the remark was made to the rich man, "Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivest thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented." There is many a humble and lowly man whom God loves. Many who are conspicuous, and who think in their pride that they are all right and they can do as they please, will find that there is a day when they, with all of us, will be judged for the deeds done in the body. Nothing then will escape the recollection of Jehovah; no act of our lives can be hidden; no word that we have ever spoken that has been harsh, cruel and wrong will ever be forgotten or blotted out, unless we have obtained forgiveness for it. The Presidency of the Church, standing at the head of the people, cannot be harsh or cruel; they cannot presume upon their authority, without having to answer for it. Neither can the Twelve, though they have great authority, do this; nor the Presidents of Stakes, nor High Councilors, nor Bishops. They cannot presume on their authority and do things that God will not approve. God will not sanction wrong, if it be committed by an Apostle, or by one of the First Presidency. He cannot do it, because it is contrary to His attributes. A man may in his arrogance think, "I am a great man; I hold a high position; what matters it about these lowly people?" But the moment he entertains that feeling, God leaves him to himself. Have we not seen it in this life? Have we not seen the wrongdoer, proud and lifted up, totter over, God withdrawing His Spirit from him and leaving him to himself? And will not this go on? Yes, in eternity; and we will get the measure measured to us that we measure to our fellow men, just as sure as God has spoken. If we have been merciful, kind, sympathetic, filled with charity and love, we will have these repaid to us; but if we have not exercised these heavenly qualities, we may depend upon it, unless we have repented and made atonement, they will be measured to us in the same manner that we have measured them to others. God is just, and He cannot even wink at iniquity, much less countenance it.

Therefore, if any have been oppressed, let them put their trust in God; let them bring their troubles to Him and leave their case with Him. We can all do this with perfect safety. He is not asleep; He has not gone on a journey; He is not deaf; but He is a living God, and He will hear the prayers of His children when they are offered to Him in humility and meekness. We need not quarrel, therefore, we need not find fault with the Priesthood, nor with the organization of the Church; we need not stumble because we feel we have been wronged. All we need to do is to keep straight ourselves; to walk so that we shall have the testimony of a good conscience, and have the witness that God has forgiven us and we stand without condemnation before Him. Then we can leave the rest, perfectly confident that He will take care of it, and He will vindicate us in His own due time. In the midst of trouble and affliction, in deep water or in the fiery furnace, He will be with us, on the right hand and on the left, to buoy us up, to strengthen us, and to carry us off victorious, as long as we put our trust in Him and serve Him with all our hearts. This is a glorious feature about this God of ours. This religion that He has taught us brings these hopes to us, and we know that they are not unfounded. They are hopes that are based upon eternal truth and upon eternal justice—attributes of our God.

Another thing that I have heard spoken of is that people get anxious about the glories and the exaltation they are going to receive. The teaching of theology in our Sunday schools and theological classes gives rise to many questions, some of which are simple and some have a good deal of meaning. There are a great many people who are thinking all the time about the celestial glory, and want to get there. It is a very good wish. It certainly is a most desirable blessing. But do you know that if we were in the celestial glory and were not fitted for it, we would not enjoy it? Whence comes your enjoyment? Whence come the glorious feelings that you have when you feel the best? Do they come from the outside? Do external circumstances produce real happiness, of the kind that I describe? Doubtless they contribute to happiness; but the purest joy, the greatest happiness, that which is most heavenly, proceeds from within. A man must carry the principles of happiness and the love of God in his own breast, or he will not be happy. It is not true enjoyment when it comes from any other source. Not from without, therefore, must we expect happiness and exaltation, but from within. Deity is within us, and its development brings happiness and joy inexpressible. Hence it is that when the Latter-day Saints were in their deepest sorrow and greatest privations no happier beings could be found. The same with the Elders who go out and meet with rebuff on every hand; their joy is indeed great. Why is it? It is because of their poverty, because of their hunger, because they are destitute of clothing, or because doors are closed in their faces and they are refused lodgings and food? No, it is not these external circumstances; but it is because they have within themselves a fountain of joy—the Holy Ghost. They have God with them, and therefore can rejoice with exceeding great joy. Let a man possessing that spirit be sent to hell with a mission of mercy and he will be happy. Put a man that does not have it in the society of angels and he will not be happy. Therefore, it is true, to a certain extent, that our heaven is what we ourselves contribute to make it. If you have heaven, you must make it. At the same time you must not forget to call upon God and to live so that He will bestow it upon you. Give a man a palace to live in; give him everything that human heart can desire, and that is not heaven. He must have heaven in his own bosom. I see a number in this congregation who have been imprisoned in the penitentiary for obeying a law which they considered divine. They know that prison walls and prison fare do not drive away happiness. They lived above those things,—in another atmosphere. They had enjoyment that God gave them. It was within themselves, and it was not dependent upon their treatment by others. If, brethren and sisters, you want to be happy, you must cultivate happiness within yourselves. You may say, "Well, if I can only attain the celestial glory, I think my desires will be fully gratified." There is no danger but that you will reach it, if you do right, because you are on the path of progression. You will receive that for which you are qualified and fitted, and no more. Qualify yourselves for the society of angels and of God the Eternal Father and the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will reach it just as sure as you live. You will go on from one degree to another, and you will receive all that you live for. You will receive rewards for everything that you do, no matter what it may be, if it is only in the cause of righteousness; and you will receive punishment for your evil deeds. And there is no favoritism with the Lord. He rewards every man according to his works. Your progress and advancement in the kingdom of God and towards the glory of God depend upon yourselves. Of course, when I say that, I mean with God's blessing upon you and His acceptance of your labors. I do not mean that it makes no difference whether the Lord blesses us or not. But our progress in the kingdom of God depends upon our own obedience and faithfulness in keeping the commandments of God. The man that lives up to the light that God has given to him to the very best of his ability will grow and increase, will add light to light, knowledge to knowledge, and power to power, until he will be prepared to enter into the rest of God. The woman or the child that does the same will receive a like blessing. For God is a God of justice, and He fulfills His words and promises, and we need not be afraid.

We will also receive a great amount of reward as we go along, but not a fullness. Those who do not obey Satan in this life, when they die are freed from his power. They dwell in the paradise of God, and Satan has no power over them. Those who do obey Satan and are his servants in this life will, when they leave here, still be his servants, and he will have power over them. So it will be as we go along. If one has stolen anything, the best thing he can do is to at once find the man from whom he has stolen and make it right with him. If he has injured any man, if he has trespassed upon his neighbor in any form, if he has done wrong to his family, he ought to make it right with them. I would just as soon ask my children to forgive me as I would a grown person. They are all the children of God, and I do not know what my children may be. They may be greater spirits than many who are considered very noble at the present time. The same with your children. We owe it to them, therefore, to deal justly with them. I would not offend my own child any more than I would a neighbor. Why should I? That child is the child of God just as much as it is my child—and more so.

Let us repent of our sins as we go along, and not let them accumulate against us. Let us be able to look our brethren and sisters in the face and feel that we have done them no wrong. If we have done wrong, confess that wrong and obtain forgiveness from our brethren and sisters; then we can go to God and ask Him to accept of us and blot out that transgression, that it shall not be held against us. If we live this way, our lives will be happy, peaceful and full of joy. We will diffuse happiness and good feeling all around us. Our children will feel the influence of that spirit which we carry, and they will imitate us. Develop a keen sense of justice and of righteousness in our children, and the son will say, "Why, my father would not do such a thing, and I will not do it;" or "My mother would not do such a thing, and I will not do it." I frequently quote my father and mother to my children and tell them how they did. Do you not think our children will do that about us? Certainly; and our acts will impress them, and they will quote them to their children. Thus righteousness will be perpetuated in the land. I was delighted yesterday at an incident that occurred. A man among us had got into financial trouble, where his honor was involved. His brother said, "I and my brothers and sisters will bear this if it takes the rest of our lives to do it. We will not suffer our name to be dishonored." I admired that, and I would like to see such a sense of honor developed among us and our children, that we can say, "We will not do a dishonorable thing. We come of a family that is honorable. Our father has given us an honorable name, and we will not allow that name, if we can help it, to be dishonored in the midst of Israel, and we will make every sacrifice to uphold that name and save it from disgrace." That is the feeling our children should have. I tell you whenever a boy sees his father tricky about trading horses or selling property, taking advantage of another man, he knows it; it makes an impression that that boy never forgets, and it is an example that he is apt to follow. The father goes astray; he is slack in his morals; he has a bad temper; he does this or the other, and his example has a life-long impression upon his children. So also with the mother. She has just as much influence in her sphere as the father.

• My brethren and sisters, I look upon this as practical religion, and I think that we should endeavor to carry these things out. When I talk to you in this strain, I talk to myself. I try and profit by my own remarks, because I think I need them just as much in my place as you do in yours. We are passing through very hard circumstances at the present time. Men are threatened with ruin because of the stringency of the times, and it requires a good deal of the Spirit of the Lord to keep men in that condition of feeling that is right in the sight of the Lord. I do feel to say to my brethren and sisters, do not be discouraged. Do not allow darkness and gloom to enter into your hearts. I want to give you a rule by which you may know that the spirit which you have is the right spirit. The Spirit of God produces cheerfulness, joy, light, and good feelings. Whenever you feel gloomy and despondent and are downcast, unless it be for your sins, you may know it is not the Spirit of God which you have. Fight against it and drive it out of your heart. The Spirit of God is a spirit of hope; it is not a spirit of gloom. We should pray for hope, if we do not have it. Hope is a gift from God. Faith is a gift from God. Faith, hope and charity are the gifts that we should seek for, that our minds may be filled with the radiant light of hope. God is with us, and He will not desert us. If we have not done wrong, we have nothing to be sorrowful for. Therefore, let us bear up and shoulder the burdens that may rest upon us, putting our trust in the power of God to deliver us. We are going through a trial now of a different character to that which we have gone through; but we will emerge from it just as triumphantly as we have done from the others. I promise you that. Although it may be dark, I know that God is at the helm, and He will regulate, and provide, and sustain. All that He asks us to do is that which He tells us by His Holy Spirit, and then put our trust in Him for the outcome.

I pray God to bless you, my brethren and sisters, and fill you with His Holy Spirit, with the joy, the gifts and the power thereof, that we may march on step by step until we are brought back into the presence of God and His Son Jesus Christ, which I humbly ask, in His name. Amen.

FINDING OF VINLAND.

[Translated for the DESERET News by John Thorgeirson, from an article published in Iceland by Dr. John Thorkelsson.]

The first cause that led to the discovery of the western hemisphere, was that Gunnbjorn Ulfson drifted far west of Iceland, and discovered some isles, called Gunnbjorn's Skerries. The exact time is not positively known, but it is now supposed to have been close to 877, A. D. or three years later than Ingolf settled in Iceland.

The sons of Gunnbjorn, Halldor and Gunnstein, took up land and settled on the southside of Isafjord, Iceland. The whereabouts of those skerries is at the present unknown, but they are supposed to have been somewhere between Iceland and Greenland, not very far from the east coast of the latter country; as Gunnbjorn claimed to have seen a land in a westerly direction from there. But however much might have been talked about those skerries, there is no record of any one going west to seek those lands during the landtaking period. (874-930.) But about the year 980, Snæbjorn Galti and several others went to Gunnbjorn's Skerries and staid there during a winter season.

Shortly after this, or 982, it so happened that Eirik Thorvaldson, called Eirik the Red, was by the Thorsness diet proscribed for manslaughter, for which cause he was compelled to leave his home in Jæder in Norway, and with his father to emigrate. They took up land and settled at Drangar in the district of Hornstrandir, where Eirik's father Thorvald died. Shortly after his father's death Eirik married Thjothild Jorundsdughter of the house of Keykjanness, and it is believed on fair authority that Ari the Wise (see note 1) is the author of what has been written about Eirik the Red and his son Hjorleif, better known as Leif Erikson, and that the authority of Ari was Thorkell Gellirson, they being also of the house of Reykjanness. Eirik then moved to Haukadal in the district Dalir, to an estate called Eirikstader, from him. It was from there that he was exiled for manslaughter in 982.

On leaving Iceland Eirik went to sea from Eiriksvog Oxney, Breidafjord, a few miles from Flatey, where the vellum Codex Flatoensis was afterwards found. Heading west from Snæfellsjokul he landed at Midjokull, where it is called Blaserkur. Exploring the country he called it Greenland, for, said he, it would be an inducement for people to settle there, if the country had a good name. He staid three years in Greenland, and went back to Iceland the fourth summer, staying the next winter at Holmlatur, in the district of Skogarstrond, inducing people to accompany him back to Greenland and settle that country. So favorable impression did he make regarding that country, that the coming spring the Icelanders fitted out twenty-five emigrant ships and set sail for Greenland, from Breidafjord and Borgarfjord that summer, but fourteen only reached their destination. Some drifted back to Iceland, several were never heard from.

This appears to have taken place in the year 986, as Ari the Wise says that it was fourteen or fifteen years before the establishment of Christianity in Iceland in the year 1000, but the annals claim that it happened either in the year 987 or 988.

Eirik took up land in Eirik's Fjord, about the middle of the Western Colony in Greenland, and built an estate called Brattahlid. He had three sons, Thorstein, Thorvald and Leif, the last of whom has become famous through his connection with his discovery of Vinland.

Among those who went with Eirik the Red from Iceland to Greenland in 986 was a man whose name was Herjulf Bardarson. His grandfather Herjulf was a cousin to Ingolf Arndrson, the first permanent settler of Iceland. Before going to Greenland Herjulf lived at a place called Eyraðakki, which is at this time one of the most important commercial towns in Iceland. He had a son named Bjarni, who at the time of his father's departure from Iceland was in Norway. Not knowing that his father had left till he came to Eyraðakki the next summer, he without unloading, or anything, set sail for Greenland. After three day's sailing, he was out of sight of land, and being caught in a north-east gale accompanied with a dense fog, was driven by the wind in it for many days without knowing whither (see note 2) till finally they came to a land which was level, and covered by timber. Bjarni knowing that was not Greenland "as there is no timber there," they set to sea again, leaving the land to the port side. After two day's sail, they came to another land which was also flat and covered with forest. Knowing that this could not be Greenland, they set to sea and sailed in a stiff south-western wind. After three day's sail they came under still another bend which was mountainous with glaciers, but Bjarni said that was not Greenland and would not land.

Setting to sea once more they sailed in a heavy gale from the south-west, for four days, before they reached Herjulfness in Greenland. The general opinion about Bjarni's discoveries was not to his credit. This not acquiring any practical information concerning these lands, was regarded as an unexampled neglect on his part.

In the year 1000, Olaf Tryggvason, king of Norway, was in the height of his power. Leif, the son of Eirik the Red, was with King Olaf at that time. Leif was born at the estate Eirikstad, Dalasysla, Iceland, and had while still very young, gone with his parents to Greenland. Having embraced the Christian faith in Norway, and being a zealous Christian, he at the command of King Olaf left Norway in the spring, to go to Greenland, for the purpose of Christianizing that country. (See note 3.) But due to stormy weather he lost his course, and came to some unknown land, where he found wheat fields, and grape-vines growing as also trees called "Moesur," a specimen of all of which they took with them. (See note 4.) On their voyage Leif also found some men on a wreck out in the open sea, whom he saved. This was regarded such an excellent omen that he was afterwards known as Leifur Heppni, Leif the Lucky. Reaching Eiriks Fyrth in Greenland the next fall, he remained with his father through the winter, working faithfully in the cause of Christianity, which resulted in the conversion, and baptism of many people in that country during that season. Hauksbok, and another old vellum tell about this trip, but Flateyrbok, Codex Flateensis does not, but says that the rescuing of the men took place a year later.

By this time there had been a change of rulers in Norway. King Olaf Tryggvason had been killed in the battle of Swolder in the Baltic the year before. Earl Eirik Hakonson having become the ruler of Norway, Bjarni Herjulfson, who had become one of the earl's body-guard returned to Greenland early in the summer A. D. 1001. After his arrival at Brattahlid there was a good deal talked about those lands he had seen. Leif Erikson thinking it unmanly not to find out some more about them, fitted out his ship, manning her with thirty-five young men beside himself, and went in search of those much talked of lands, setting to sea late in the summer, finding first the land Bjarni had seen last. "Inland," the annals say, "there were great glaciers, the land between them and the sea having the appearance of one solid flat rock." Exploring the land somewhat they called it Hellarland, "the land of flat rock", which—without absolute certainty—is generally regarded as Newfoundland.

Setting to sea again they soon found another land, "which land was vastly covered by dense forests, with glades of white sands here and there, and level clear down to the beach," to which they gave the name of Markland, "a land of forest." This is thought to have been what is now called Nova Scotia. Having explored this land to some extent they set sail once more and sailing for a heavy northeastern gale after two days' sail came within sight of land, landing in an island which lay north from the mainland. Reaching the summit of this island in fine and clear weather, they took a good view of the surroundings. Northward from the mainland a ness extended into the sea, west of which the water was shallow. Further inland there was a lake from which a river emptied into the sea. Getting the ship onto the lake, and crossing it they built a large house near to its edge. Salmon was there plentiful and much larger than they had seen before. (See note 5.) "The climate and country were excellent. Frosts were light, and grass plenty all the year round, so stock did not need any hay in the winter season. The days were much longer in the winter than in Iceland or Greenland." There they found wild grapes, which they gathered in large quantities, as it is said that when they went back to Greenland the next spring (1002) the ship's boat was full of grapes, and they called the land Vinland, "Wineland."

There has been some dispute since the days of Arngrim the Learned (11648) how far south Leif Erikson and his party went. But it is now regarded as settled that it could not have been farther north than 49°, but rather that it must have been a good deal farther south, but I am positively sure that it must have been greatly farther south, but how much can not be satisfactorily determined.

This trip of Leif Erikson's has been regarded as the first real discovery of the western hemisphere, as he was the first man to build houses there and give names to different portions of the land. On his return he was held in great esteem, and regarded as the foremost man in that community, causing him to gain wealth and influence on every hand.

The next winter after Leif's return from Vinland his father Eirik died, leaving all his estates to his favorite son Leif. How long Leif Erikson was the master of the estate Brattahlid in Greenland, is not positively known, but by all indications, it appears most probable that he dwelt there till his death, which took place some time between 1021 and 1026; for in the latter year his son Thorkell is master there, and his honored guest during the winter of 1026-27 is King Saint Olaf's favorite poet and courtier, Thormod Kolbrunarskald. But whether Sokki Thorirson, who was there in 1124, and his sons Einar and Orm have been Leif's descendants, is not known. Leif is described to have been large of stature, stately in deportment, a wise and good man, unpretending, and moderate in all things, having taken after his mother's kinsmen, who were noted as men of learning, justice and refinement. It is nowhere recorded that Leif has destroyed any human life, a somewhat uncommon case with men of power and influence of that age.

A brief review having been taken of the first discoveries on the western hemisphere, and the causes that led to it, the next thing is to give a short account of the travels of the Icelanders to Vinland from the time of its discovery by Leif Erikson. Thorvald Erikson, Leif's brother, considering that the country had not been sufficiently explored, went from Greenland to Vinland in the fall of 1002. He came to Leif's booths, and remained there till he was killed by the natives in the year 1004. His companions returned to Greenland and related the sad fate of their master. The next year (1005) his brother Thorstein Erikson fitted out a ship and manned her, intending to go to Vinland for the sole purpose of taking his brother's body to Greenland and bury him beside their father and mother; but being caught in a heavy southern gale accompanied by a snowstorm, he was wrecked and died on the coast of Greenland.

In the year 1007 Thorfinn Thordarson—better known as Thorfinn Karlsefni—having married Thorvald Erikson's widow, Gudrid, went to Vinland for the purpose of colonizing it, accompanied by 65 people. They came to Leif's booths, explored the country extensively, trading and bartering with the natives and dwelt there till 1011. Here in the year 1008, Snorri, the son of Thorfinn and Gudrid, was born, from whom many people in Iceland has sprung. In 1012 Freydis Eriksdotter, Leif's sister, together with two brothers, named Helgi and Finnbogi, and several more, went to Vinland, which trip was one both disastrous and disgraceful. Freydis was a brawlsome and violent character, like unto her father. Having killed and caused to be killed all the leading men and women of the company, she returned in disgrace to Greenland the next year.

From this on the travels to Vinland became less frequent, yet such trips are several times mentioned in the old vellums. Eyrbýgga Saga says that in about 1027, Gudleif, the son of Gudlaug the Rich, of Straumfirh, had been driven by a gale to some unknown land, far to the south-west from Iceland, which is thought to have been somewhere in the southern part of North America.

It is recorded in ancient annals that in the year 1121, Eirik Upsi, a bishop in Greenland, had gone in search of Vinland, but was never heard from again, which appears to have put a check to the going to Vinland for some time. However, it is recorded in the annals that in 1285, two priests, Adalbrand and Thorvald, the sons of Helgi, had come to a land far west from Iceland, which is called in the annals, sometimes Dunisles, and sometimes Newland. It is said that is 1289, Eirik the Priestthar, king of Norway, had sent a man named Hrolf, also known as Landa-Hrolf, to search for Newland, and he was in 1290 in Iceland trying to get ships and men for that purpose. He died is 1295. Some think that this Newland may possibly be the same as Newfoundland. It is certain at least that the before mentioned Helgasons got into the wild part of Greenland. The last mentioned of Vinland in the Icelandic vellums is that in 1347, a ship from Greenland came to Straumfirh in Iceland which, having gone to Markland, on her return to Greenland she was caught in a gale and was driven to Iceland.

Explanatory Notes.

[BY JOHN THORGEIRSON.]

1. Ari the Wise is the first on record to write a historical composition in the vernacular. Most of his works are, however, lost. Some authorities claim him to be the author of the greater part of that famous vellum, Codex Flatoensis. He wrote Islandingabok, "The Book of the Icelanders," a brief history of Iceland from its discovery and down to his time. He died in the year A. D. 1148.

2. The ancient Northmen used the north-star for a guide and called it Leidarstjarna, "the leading or guide star." Taking it as a base, they divided the sky into eight divisions, which they called "cykt" and each division point they called "dagsmark" or days-mark. In the east was "Midurmorgun", middle morning; southeast, "Dagmal", day-meal; south, "Hadeqi", high-day; southwest "Non", noon; west, "Midaftan", middle evening; northwest, "Nattmal", night-meal; north, "Lagnatt", low-night; northeast, "Otta", which appears to signify, the eighth. In reckoning the time they called five days a "Fimt", a fifth, and five fims one month. They knew that in the evening of about the twenty-fourth day of "Slagtamanud", slaughter-month, which corresponds to Nov. 9th, the Seven Brothers were directly opposite from the sun and gained a certain distance every week. For the day time they had some sort of a sundial.

3. Some authorities claim that Leif had a priest with him on his trip. But whether or not, it is an undoubted fact that he had full charge of the mission work, and hence must have had some kind of ecclesiastical consecration, which hardly would have been the case had he been an illiterate man. In the Icelandic sagas it is frequently mentioned that many of the Icelanders who emigrated from Norway to that country, could both read and write. Oddny, the sister of Thorkell, of Krossavik, was both deaf and dumb, but communicated with others by writing on a roll. When the famous Icelandic poet and warrior, Egill Skallagrimson, composed the funeral poem, "Sonartorrek" at the death his son, Bodvar, his daughter, Thorgerd, wrote it on a roll as fast as he composed it. Hence it is almost certain that Leif Erikson was not an illiterate man. And as the Sagas of Erik the Red and also of Thorfinn Karlsefni, who was Leif's friend and companion and married Leif's brother's widow, and went to Vinland, together with a complete history of the discovery of Vinland by the Icelanders, are to be found in three of the oldest Icelandic vellums, but nowhere is a separate saga of Leif himself, I am inclined to believe that he wrote those Sagas, and that they were preserved by the famous historian, Ari the Wise, who was a priest and a relative of Leif's.

4. Mæsur is most likely a maple, it being called in old High German "masar", middle H. G. maser, and in early English maser.

5. This place is thought by some to be Fall river in the present state of Massachusetts.

CHILDREN AND MATCHES.

The Millard county Blade of March 1st says:

On Monday afternoon two little girls belonging respectively to James H. Mace and D. M. Palmer, got into the latter's covered wagon, in which were several sacks of grain and a "grub" box containing matches. There was also some straw in the wagon.

The little tots took the matches and began to build a small fire. In a moment the interior was a mass of flame. The Palmer child escaped by way of the front. The other was not so fortunate, being penned in the back, but she managed to get through a small opening in the rear end of the cover, and with burned face and singed hair leaped to the ground, badly scared but not seriously injured.

There being no water convenient, willing hands ran the wagon across the street, and the flames were soon extinguished from Petty's flowing well.

SAN JUAN STAKE CONFERENCE.

The quarterly conference of the San Juan Stake of Zion was held at Bluff on Saturday and Sunday, Feb. 17 and 18.

There were in attendance Elder F. A. Hammond, president of the Stake, several members of the High Council, the Bishops of Bluff and Montecello wards, and representatives from all of the wards in the Stake except Moab. Owing to the inclemency of the weather the attendance from distant parts of the Stake was smaller than usual.

The usual business of sustaining the General and Stake authorities was attended to. The reports from the various wards and branches showed that the Saints generally were striving to live their religion. A good flow of the Spirit of God accompanied those who spoke during the conference, and much valuable and timely instruction was given.

On the evening of the 17th the Y. M. M. I. A., held their semi-annual Stake conference and on Sunday evening a meeting was held in the interest of the Y. L. M. I. A. Relief Society and Primary conferences were held on Monday, the 19th.

All of the meetings were well attended and all felt abundantly paid for coming.

PETER ALLAN,
Assistant Stake Clerk.

NEWS FROM PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 26, 1894.—I thought a few lines from here would not be out of place. I can say the people as a rule are feeling well in health and spirits. We had a fine time last Saturday night. The choir got up a surprise on Brother John Scheles, as he leaves to go on a mission to Germany. He has been a good worker in the choir for many years, and was alive to all the duties he was called to perform. The choir invited the bishopric and presidents and counselors of all quorums and organizations to join them, and when Brother Scheles came to practice for the last time for awhile, he found the tables spread with loads of provisions waiting for him to come and help eat them.

After supper we had songs, recitations, speeches, dancing, games, and all in good spirits. Brother Scheles had a little means given him to buy books necessary for his mission work.

I would say we have a plan in this ward which I think could be worked to by other wards, it was started here twenty years ago by Brother M. D. Hammond when he was Bishop here, and it has never been allowed to cease. It is this: When an Elder is called to go on a mission, the Bishop sends out collectors and I don't believe any one of those Elders have ever had to furnish a dollar to take them to their field of labor. We have furnished a great many missionaries in twenty years, but the people look upon it as a pleasure as well as a duty, to aid them in going to carry the Gospel to the nations who sit in darkness.

Professor Richmond will be here tonight to lecture on fruit culture, and how to care for the pests that destroy fruit. It is expected the meeting house will be crowded, as the people are alive to this industry, and it will not be long before we have a canning factory here, thus adding to the wealth of the town.

Meetings are well attended, and our Sabbath schools and association meeting are doing well. We also have a brass band started here and the boys are doing exceedingly well for the time they have been started.

We have lots of snow but we won't hear the cry of the poor this winter as they are being well cared for during the cold weather.

TRAMP.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

LEIF AND COLUMBUS.

In another part of the News will be found an interesting article by Dr. John Thorkelson concerning the early discoveries on the American coast by Northmen. It was written at the request of the Icelandic "Society of National Friends" and published at Reykjavik, Iceland. The translation is by Mr. John Thorgeirson, a native, we believe, of that historic island but now a resident of Bannack city, Montana. The author is recolector magnificus of the University of Iceland and recognized as one of the best informed antiquarians of the northern countries. The article contains about all that is positively known concerning the famous Leif Erikson and others who made voyages to this continent, and it is based on the records still found in Iceland, and more especially on the codex named after the island of Flato, which was brought from Copenhagen to the World's Fair at an enormous expense.

The doubts entertained regarding the perilous voyages of Leif Erikson and others of his countrymen in the beginning of the eleventh century and subsequently are by this time pretty generally dispelled, and it is accepted as a historical fact, that they actually landed in America and recorded the event. But it is equally certain that their discoveries did not extend far enough to excite the general attention of the world. They had no idea of the vast continent, of which they had seen but a very small part. The time was not then come for the opening up of this country for the universal benefit of mankind. That was reserved for Columbus, four centuries later. In other words, the discoveries by which this continent was made part of the civilized world, the home of human liberty, the throne of the queen of nations and the cradle of the Church of God in this dispensation, will always justly be traced to the Genoese and not to the celebrated Iclander. Whether Columbus had heard about Leif's discoveries and thereby was prompted to undertake his expedition to the western hemisphere is a question not yet settled. By some it is supposed that he visited Iceland in 1477 and there became acquainted with the records concerning Vinland. Others discard this assertion as only assumption, and contend that the discoverer might have his information of the far away country from traveling Icelanders. It cannot be denied that among the sages of the island at that time were some famous scholars, educated in Germany or France and well known in other European countries, and it is not impossible that Columbus might have met some of them. But it would seem that if he had been able to point to historical records containing accounts of voyages to the land in the west, he would have had a most powerful argument in the struggle to convince his contemporaries of the feasibility of reaching that country. The absence of any reference to such information may be taken as pretty sure evidence that he did not possess it.

Then, again, if Leif's discoveries had been the guiding star in the mind of Columbus, he would naturally have taken nearly the same course as Leif took. He would have gone by way of Greenland and reached America somewhere near Leif's booth, as others are said to have done before him. This, as is well known, he did not do, but took an entirely independent course, taking all the chances of a first discoverer. These considerations cannot be disregarded in a discussion about the possible connection between the different expeditions to the great west. The probability is that, at the time of the fifteenth century, Leif's Vinland was practically forgotten and that this country by the providence of the Almighty was again discovered by Columbus.

A "HEDRICKITE" DEFECTION.

According to a notice in Zion's Ensign, Elder C. A. Hall, president of the Hedrickite church, has severed his connection with that organization, by publicly declaring it to be without Priesthood authority and without legitimate succession to the Church founded in 1830. Mr. Hall, we understand, has been the leading spirit of that movement during the last five or six years, and his step is likely to be followed by others, who no doubt have come to the same conclusion.

Anyone who has the courage of his convictions has one great requisite for usefulness in the cause of truth, and the enlistment of such under her glorious banners deserves always to be hailed with joy. It would seem to be high time both for the Hedrickite and the Josephite organization carefully to reconsider their present status in the light of the revelations of the Almighty and the facts of Church history. By doing so sincerely and in humility, they cannot evade the recognition of that authority which alone has divine sanction; and in submitting to it, they would receive the blessings which are to be found nowhere but within the Church.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

A casual reader, perusing the special message and accompanying documents just transmitted by Governor West to the Legislature, might derive exaggerated ideas of the number of unemployed men and the amount of distress in this city. The communication of Hon. Wendell Benson, chairman of the Territorial Relief commission, gives the number of unemployed men on the list of that commission as 1,706. Hon. Arthur L. Thomas, chairman of the General Relief society, gives the number of names of unemployed men on its books as about 1,500, while Selectman Bamberger, chairman of the Salt Lake county and city relief work gives 1,141 as the number of laborers on his list who are waiting for work. The apparent aggregate is 4,347 men who are out of employment, and have listed their names in the hope of obtaining a few days' work at the small wages that are being paid by the organizations named. In other words, the showing is that there are in this city 4,347 men who are out of employment, and whose necessities are so urgent that they have sought a few days' work through one of the channels that have been established for relieving the needy and suffering.

On their face these figures convey a conviction that they exaggerate the facts. Allowing to the city a population of 55,000 and a laboring man to every six inhabitants, we have 9,166 laboring men. The latter figure is not intended to include merchants nor business nor professional men, and will probably cover all who would be commonly classed as laboring men, or even exceed the number that could properly be so classified. There are just about 8,000 registered voters in the city, and these include classes who are here excluded from the estimated number of working men. If we say that we have 9,000 of the latter we shall probably approximate the truth.

Now 4,347 is nearly half of 9,000, but it is not possible that nearly one half of the working men of this city have listed their names for a share of the employment which is specially designed for the relief of the destitute. There must have been an extensive duplication of names of applicants for work on the three lists above referred to. A gentleman who is in a position to know, informs the News that if the names on Mr. Benson's list, 1,706 in number, be thrown aside, and only those given by Messrs. Thomas and Bamberger be retained, the truth would be approximated. The gentleman explained that the organization of which Mr. Thomas as chairman had been co-operating all winter with Mr. Bamberger, and that one object of such co-operation had been to avoid duplicating relief while needy persons had received none; whereas Mr. Benson's organization, being a new one, had naturally attracted to its list a great portion and perhaps nearly all, of the waiting working men who were on the other two lists. It is known that there are many instances in which the name of the same man appears on both the latter lists, a fact which reduces, by so much, the apparent number of unemployed on them.

The number of men without work, and the amount of destitution, are great enough, without being exaggerated. We do not charge that this has been done intentionally, by any person. The documents referred to are no doubt truthful in the figures which they give, and were submitted by the Governor to the Legislature for what they are worth. They were not prepared by their authors nor submitted by the Governor, with any intention to mislead. The point we wish to make in reference to them is that the circumstances attending them require to be understood, in order that the whole truth of the subject may be.

While the situation is to be deplored, it ought not to be portrayed in colors darker than are necessary to represent the facts. The severity of winter is over, the spring is here, and there is one source of employment to which thouands of men who seek it may turn with every assurance that it will yield at least a livelihood, the soil. Newly settled localities on the east, west, north and south of this city are calling for more help in the struggle to subdue the elements and compel them to respond to the needs of man; and the response is certain if the effort is put forth. Meanwhile it is proper for the Legislature to consider, with wisdom combined with generosity, the situation, and afford what relief it can consistently.

One point rises prominently in this connection, which demands consideration. Whatever funds are provided with a view, primary or secondary, to the relief of the needy, ought to be laid out under such regulations as will insure the greatest possible amount of relief for every dollar spent. On the day succeeding that on which Governor West appointed the board of seven persons, since known as the Territorial Relief commission, to expend the $2,000 appropriated by the Legislature for improving the Capitol grounds, the News urged co-operation between that body and the General Relief society which had been rendering such excellent service all winter, and whose work was so well organized. But we have not heard that any co-operation has been attempted. It is stated, as a matter of fact, that out of the first fifty men employed by the new commission, fifteen had just been discharged by the General Relief society, as having had work to relieve their present needs. This society has a general acquaintance with the situation as it prevails, and is thoroughly representative in character. With it are closely associated the Bishops and the ministers of all denominations throughout the city, who are in the best possible position to hear of all deserving cases of need. We are sorry that there should be any diffusion of effort in the disbursement of the funds that are available for these purposes. Such diffusion makes it impossible properly to economize means, or properly to guard against the deception of barks and tramps. It is not yet too late to take steps to avoid this; at least, let it be done in any future appropriations for the benefit of the poor.

MAKING SUGAR.

Sugar is nothing more than charcoal and water. That is what the chemist says, and if you doubt it he can demonstrate the truth of his statement before your very eyes. It only requires a little moistened sugar, a few drops of sulphuric acid and the application of heat, and the sugar is separated into vapor of water, or steam, and charcoal, or carbon. There are twelve parts of charcoal to eleven of steam, or, more strictly speaking, chemical analysis shows that the best sugar (that from cane, maple and beets) consists, by weight, of twelve parts carbon, eleven parts oxygen, and twenty-two parts hydrogen. The poorer grades of sweetening substances, such as grape sugar, dextrose, glucose, honey, molasses, etc., consist of six parts each of charcoal and water; but this slight difference in composition makes considerable variance in sweetness.

Although the experimental science of chemistry has taught us of what elements various substances are composed, there are very few instances in which a method has been discovered whereby the elements may be combined to produce the desirable compounds. It is one thing to analyze a substance and determine its component parts, but it is an entirely different thing to take the elements and by imitating or duplicating the processes of nature, unite them in the proper proportions and under the particular conditions necessary to produce the substance analyzed.

Sugar is one of those substances which, while it can be easily separated into the different elements of which it is composed, is not so easily produced by a reverse process, because the particular time, temperature and method of combination which in nature are so steadily and successfully worked out, are not yet within the general knowledge of men. When they are ascertained, if ever, sugar probably will be about as cheap as salt, or cheaper, and the sugar cane, sugar maple and sugar beet will be put to other uses than sugar production; for carbon, hydrogen and oxygen can be more easily and cheaply obtained from other sources.

That time, however, is not yet; though how soon it may be here none can tell. France has held the front place in the development of processes for sugar making, and now it is announced that a Frenchman has discovered a comparatively simple and inexpensive means of making sugar from the original elements. His method is kept secret, of course, but the general description which he has made of it to scientists and government representatives is that he commences his operation on carbon, and then successively adds, at certain temperatures and pressures, the hydrogen and oxygen, the result being sugar already refined and prepared for use. He says a large profit can be made and yet the sugar be retailed at two and half centimes, or half a cent a pound. If he really has made such a discovery it will be one of the most marvelous in this age. The French chemists do not believe it, nor any others as yet for that matter, but as the alleged discoverer is to soon have an opportunity for an official demonstration of his process, it will not be long before it will be known whether his claim is a fraud or a great acquisition to human knowledge. In the meantime there need be no limitation of the beet crop in Utah for the coming season on account of any anticipated competition by the Frenchman's plan.

THE ENGLISH GAME OF POLITICS.

The British house of commons under the leadership of Mr. Gladstone has been induced to acquiesce in the amendments of the house of lords to the local government bill—a fact that, however dramatically treated by the Grand Old Man in his speech advocating concurrence, is significant of weakness in the much-vaunted plan of appealing to the country for the "mending or ending" of the legislative powers of the peers. It is less than a week since the lords themselves were humbled into a complete back-down from their amendments to the parish council bills. Had they shown equal pliability with the measure just now acted upon, the conflict before the electors which Gladstone alludes to so threateningly might have been longer postponed, but when it came it might have been easier settled. By exercising the right to amend, and by forcing the representative house to admit, even under protest, that the amendments are not unworthy, the cause of the peers before the country is materially improved. As a branch of the legislative machine they have shown that they have defined a proper powers, and that in their use of these the lower house has been compelled to acquiesce. They have, perhaps unconsciously, but still effectively, matched the liberal chief-tain in politics—and that of itself is no small achievement.

We do not see just how the radical program of extinguishing the house of lords is going to be carried out without a complete destruction and rehabilitation of the national constitution, and we do not believe this can be done while England is a monarchy. Nevertheless, the popular feeling against the peers is growing steadily and swiftly, and corrections of some of the more glaring abuses will doubtless have to be made in the near future. After laboring three months on the bill for Ireland's home rule, the house of commons had to see their work promptly and contemptuously rejected by their titled colleagues. The next measure of importance emanating from the lower house, the employers' liability bill, received more courteous treatment, but it was badly mangled and riddled by their lordships' amendments—so much so that Gladstone himself concluded to drop it. The third government measure, the parish council bill above referred to, was with the country the most popular of them all; and on this measure, as stated, the peers were adroit enough to get into harmony with the commons, rather than leave so potent a weapon unblunted against themselves as their defiance of popular will in killing the bill would have been in the hands of their arch-enemy. Last of all comes the local government bill, which though originating in the commons, goes into the statute book with the impress and distinctiveness of the lords' vital amendments. Of the four measures, the upper house has accordingly killed one and carried one; the commons killed one which the lords had badly wounded, and carried one in face of the peers' protests. Numerically the honors are easy; but while in their one great victory the commons have secured an important popular advantage, the lords have shown themselves quite as adept in finesse—that is, in flexibility where that was necessary and in obstinacy where that would be safe—as their most devoted admirer could desire.

The government's policy as announced in the "Newcastle program" is now fairly well concluded. Gladstone's promises have been carried out so far as he and his party are concerned. Whether the showing is satisfactory enough in results to embolden an appeal to the country is doubtful—the aged premier seems to hesitate. Most significant of all, is the overshadowing conjecture that his parliamentary days are ended. He is needed now as badly as ever his followers needed him—no other leader at present known can hold the discordant elements together. The prospect is not altogether rosy for the liberal party.

THE END OF A WORLD.

It is a favorite idea with a certain class of modern philosophers that the creative processes whereby the universe has attained its present forms are always slow in their operations. Between the time when our planetary system existed as a nebula, an immense cloud in space, and the day of the birth of our earth must necessarily, they reason, have elapsed millions and millions of ages, and millions more were required to cool the young world and make it a habitation for living organisms. They seem to argue from the supposition that there are no natural laws except those discovered by man and that from these there are no exceptions. That the fundamental principles underlying this mode of reasoning are wrong has been illustrated recently by a most interesting astronomical observation, an account of which was published in the Forum by Edward S. Holden of the Lick Observatory.

A new star was discovered by an amateur astronomer in Edinburgh Jan. 24, 1892. As soon as the announcement was made, telescopic photographs of the part of the sky where the heavenly body appeared were studied for the purpose of learning its first appearance. On a picture taken December 8, 1891, no trace of it could be found, but on another, dated the 10th of the same month, it appeared as a star of the sixth magnitude. In two days the luminous body must therefore have increased at least three degrees, which means that its light was sixteen times greater than two days before. At the end of the first week of March it could be seen with the naked eye, but at the end of that month it was too dim to be photographed and on April 27th, 1892, it passed out of the range of the telescope. On August 17th it was again found, but no longer as a star but a nebula. It was no longer a glowing sun with a system of worlds revolving round it; it was a gaseous mass, a cloud of atoms!

To the question, what had taken place? science answers, that a whole world had perished. It had been crushed and burnt to dust with all its contents in less than a year, in the period from December 8, 1891, to August 17, 1892. In this moment of time, brief when applied to the events of a world, the terrible catastrophe had taken place. The history of a world was finished. It perished before our eyes. That is, it was changed into material of which a new world may be made, by concentration of the atoms and their arrangement according to the plans of the Almighty Constructor of the universe.

The explanation of the wonderful phenomenon is exceedingly interesting and cannot fail to lead the thoughtful to contemplate the possible fate of our own part of the universe. It shows that the world itself is subject to eventualities and that the end may come without that process of evolution of which some have dreamt. The astronomers tell us that in space exist veritable wrecks of worlds as dangerous as rocks and reefs in the sea to the ship. They are of two kinds. Some are cold and dark planetary systems, still moving in their regular orbits. Others consist of broken fragments, immense clouds of meteors, swimming about in space. It is supposed that the star referred to came too near such an extinct world. From December till February the two sailed together and the violent revolutions which resulted in the formation of a nebula took place. There was perhaps no actual collision of the solid bodies of the two systems. The too near approach of two worlds, whereby the laws of gravitation are disturbed and the equilibrium destroyed, is enough to cause the terrible destruction. The fate that befalls this star may await our own sun with its planets and satellites and it is emphatically true that "of that day and hour knoweth no man," for the simple reason that concerning the movements of these extinct worlds science has as yet no certain calculations. But if it is possible that a whole planetary system can in the mere twinkling of an eye be transformed into a cloud of atoms, a luminous nebula, may we not reasonably hold that under certain conditions a nebula may be condensed and a world formed in less time than the countless ages of modern evolutionists?

QUARRELING ABOUT SATAN.

No doubt there are a great many things more profitable than quarreling about the devil, but there doesn't seem to be anything more interesting at present to the members of the First Baptist church at Oakland, Cal. The discussion of his satanic majesty has aroused much feeling in the congregation, some of the members thereof taking issue publicly with the teachings of their pastor, Rev. Mr. Hobart.

In order to more firmly establish himself in the position he has taken, the pastor delivered a very caustic sermon on the subject last Sunday. He declared his full belief in the personality of the devil and said: "Satan is constantly spoken of in the Bible as a person. The personal pronoun is constantly used. A physical body is not necessary to a personality. The devil comes to church as much as anybody else, and he is much better acquainted with Scripture than many Christians. There is Spiritualism, whose manifestations are those of the devil. It is not spiritualism, it is demonism. It places the devil greatly to have his personality denied."

Then he told his congregation that right in church, sitting beside them, was the devil, and he described him. This was the last straw on the camel's back on that occasion. Hugh Craig, a prominent citizen and a teacher in the Sunday school, protested against such teachings. He did not want to be informed that his satanic majesty was sitting beside him in church when it was his wife and daughter who were with him. "There is nothing in this personal devil business," said Mr. Craig, "and there should not be such teachings in the church. I have no time for his satanic majesty. When I am able to overcome my own devilish nature I will leave the parsons to teach all the devil they care for to those who live upon such miserable stuff. My object in going to church is to hear about and be told the way of redemption through Jesus Christ and to obtain the immortality which He promises to those who look to Him as the author and finisher of their faith. I think I can take the Bible and show Mr. Hobart where he is wrong. Of course there is some trash in the Bible and you have to take out the meat."

Mr. Craig was requested by the pastor to resign as Sunday school teacher but refused, and lively times are looked for, as both parties have a goodly following among the congregation.

There may be some question as to whether Mr. Hobart acted judiciously in pressing the subject so strongly upon the attention of his hearers, instead of proceeding more mildly to avoid shocking their sensibilities. But when it comes to the personality of Satan, and of other organized spiritual beings who are known in the Scriptures as devils, but who do not possess fleshly or physical tabernacles of their own, the pastor has decidedly the advantage of Mr. Craig, so far as the Bible is concerned. If the Sunday school teacher throws away as trash all scriptural statements regarding the personality of individuals who exist in the spirit world and who have given themselves over to evil influences to the extent that they become devils, he will have to abandon so much of the Bible as shows that there is a state of condemned beings from which it is desirable to be saved through the plan of redemption which he says he wants to hear about in church. As to the particular pews which the imps of darkness occupied, if any, in the Oakland church, that is an entirely different matter. It will be rather difficult also for the pastor to convince reasonable people that the particular subjects of his present investigation are they of the cloven foot, long tail, horns and fire-spitting class. The absurd views which generally prevail, as the result of teaching a false and superstitious theology, of the form, appearance and existence of beings, good and bad, in the spirit world, are not such as can be easily taken to by thoughtful persons in an age of enlightenment. Some of the Oakland Baptists, through lack of a true comprehension of the subject, are rushing from this to the other extreme of no existence at all for those who give themselves over to wickedness; and by disputing about that which they seem desirous to escape from, they drift still farther under the evil influences which mar the peace of mankind and lead mortals in a direction opposite to that which is desirable. It is just as gratifying to the adversary of the truth to have people quarreling about the personality of the devil as about anything else, for it is only an inspiration of evil that leads men and women to quarrel about anything.

THE TEMPLE LOT SUIT.

The following additional particulars in the decision of Judge Phillips of Kansas City, Missouri, regarding the Independence Temple lot suit, were received here on Saturday, March 3, but too late for publication in that day's issue:

In Judge Phillips's decision deeds, receipts and other papers are quoted to show that the Church of which Joseph Smith was the Prophet was the true Church and the owner of the Temple lot. After the killing of Smith at Carthage, Ill., in June, 1844, disintegration set in, and the Church split into factions. The true Church, under Joseph Smith, was established at Lamoni, Ia., another branch went with Brigham Young, and a third, the Hedrickites, remained at Independence.

Incidentally to the decision Judge Phillips unmercifully scored the Utah Church. He says: "Among the quorum of the Twelve, representing the Apostles, was Brigham Young, a man of intellectual power and aggressive, if not audacious. He led the greater portion of the Mormons to Salt Lake. From this settlement sprang a powerful body known as the Salt Lake, or Utah, Church."

"There can be no question that Brigham Young's assumption of the presidency was a bold usurpation. The Book of Doctrine gave Joseph Smith to be president of the Church. The book taught clearly that the succession should descend lineally, and go to the first born. Joseph Smith so taught, and before his taking off, publicly proclaimed his son his successor, and he was so announced. Young's assumption of the office was itself a departure from the law of the Church. The Book of Mormon pronounced the severest anathema against the crime of polygamy."

The Saints in these valleys have naturally taken some interest in the legal proceedings regarding the ownership of that piece of property, on account of its connection with early Church history, and they will be somewhat surprised, because the bulk of the evidence of legal possession seemed to be on the other side, that the judge should give the property to the "Josephites," holding that this organization, according to certain "deeds, receipts and other papers," are entitled thereto.

Had the judicial pronouncement been confined to this point, however, no further commentary on our part would have been called for. But the judge has gone out of his way to decide a question not understood to be at issue, and clearly not within his jurisdiction. What relevancy to the case at bar have the declarations against Brigham Young and the Saints in Utah? The question was simply as to the legal ownership of the piece of property known as the Temple lot. The Hedrickites claimed it by virtue of purchase and continued possession; and the "Josephites" as the successors of the original Church. This, at least, is the general understanding of the case. It would seem that the position of the former is the only one that had any claim to judicial recognition. If they could prove that they had legally bought the property, and had held it, it was theirs legally, whatever their status might be in the great family of religious denominations. At all events the position of the Church in these valleys was not before the court. And we need hardly say that the Saints here are not in the habit of running around seeking the opinion of courts—least of all, Missouri courts—as to the divinity of our organization and its connection with and perpetuation of the Church founded in 1830 by the martyred Prophet.

Fortunately there are other means of ascertaining this. The Saints have a more firm foundation to stand on. Anyone who will read with impartiality the revelations on the subject—which Judge Phillips evidently has not read—or listen to the evidence of those who were once the intimate friends and associates of the martyred Prophet,—which Judge Phillips evidently has also denied himself—will find that the course of Brigham Young and the brave band that followed him was marked out and guided by God Almighty. The question of succession in an office like that of Joseph Smith does not rest with any one man, not even with the incumbent himself, as the Missouri judge seems to think. In the first instance it rests with God. He alone can call and inspire and direct men and qualify them for that high office. All scripture, both ancient and modern, prove this. And in the second place, the acceptance of such men, when called of God, rests with the people. The Church of God is not theocratic but theo-democratic. On both these principles Brigham Young was the true successor of Joseph the Prophet. He was called of God, through Joseph himself, being the president of the Twelve and sustained by the Almighty throughout a most remarkable career. The power from on high rested on him in all his work, as it had rested on Joseph. The mantle of the first Prophet fell upon him as surely as the mantle of Elijah enwrapped his faithful servant Elisha; and he was accepted by the great majority of the people, who had a testimony in their hearts that he was a Prophet of God.

In the face of these facts, the statement that Joseph had appointed a successor, unknown to the people, partakes of the element of absurdity. No one knew better than Joseph that any appointment to office in the Church of God is to be accepted by the people. Besides, the claim itself was not put forth until some fifteen or sixteen years after the martyrdom. How would Judge Phillips explain the hiatus?

The Saints in Utah regard the Temple lot in Independence, as they regard in a certain sense "the earth and the fullness thereof," as the Lord's, to be disposed of as He in His providence sees fit. Certain promises apply particularly to that sacred spot, and they will all be fulfilled in the Lord's own due time, for His plans and purposes are never known to have failed. There is no likelihood that the Church will enter into any legal controversy on the subject with the "Josephites" or any one else. It has kept out of it thus far, and probably will continue to do so. But when the time comes for the building of Zion and the Temple in Jackson County, the Latter-day Saints will be ready to perform the glorious work and the Lord will open the way.

EXIT GLADSTONE, ENTER ROSE-BERRY.

With the resignation of Mr. Gladstone as the premier of the British government, one of the most remarkable men of this age passes to the back of the political stage of Europe. As his decision is more calmly considered, it becomes evident that there were reasons for it not yet known to the public. His last speech in the commons, in which he so vigorously delineated the policy of the government that even the ministers were amazed and trembled, gave no evidence of that growing infirmity, bodily or mental, which was supposed to be the real cause. Rather, the old warrior, in sheathing his sword did it in such a manner as plainly to indicate that he was still in the fight and that a change of tactics was necessary for the insurance of a more speedy victory. His farewell was a call to his party to rally and to direct a tremendous attack against the house of lords.

Archibald Philip Primrose, earl of Roseberry, the successor of Mr. Gladstone, although but 46 years old, has already had twenty-one years' experience in public life. He was born in 1847 and succeeded to the title and estates of the fifth earl of Roseberry in 1868. Since 1871 he has been before the public constantly. In 1886 with Gladstone's return to power he became chief of the foreign office and during the last term of Gladstone's premiership he was minister of foreign affairs. In 1878 he married a daughter of Baron Rothschild, an event that brought him much wealth and some unpopularity, but on the whole he has succeeded in retaining the esteem of his own class and the confidence of the laboring classes, a fact which makes him one of the most influential men in the kingdom.

The new premier is said to possess a remarkable capacity for hard work. No amount of drudging appeals him, if thereby he can augment his stock of knowledge of public affairs. While presiding over the London council for twelve months he attended forty-four public sittings, 280 regular meetings of committees and as many informal ones, or nearly two meetings every day, and he brought the municipal affairs to a high degree of perfection. As a debater he is considered a formidable opponent. The following is quoted from a dispatch to the San Francisco Chronicle, illustrating his sense of humor and skill at repartee:

In a recent campaign he said of Mr. Chamberlain: "If you could only keep his head straight he would be the horse for my money." When a conservative in the last gasp of his party pleaded that the Straits settlements were unanimously determined that Salisbury must be kept in office he replied: "As the Straits Settlements are populated by Malays and a Tory governor-general supported by British muskets, their unanimity on that point is all the more remarkable."

Mr. Gladstone has offered his successor all the aid he may see fit to ask, but it is more than likely that the new premier has already laid out a line of policy of his own, and that his premiership marks an epoch in the history of the nation. The present position has always been the goal of his ambition.

What Gladstone still has to say to the liberal party will be listened to with keen interest. A party council will probably be summoned before long, and the voice of the "grand old man" will once more be heard, indicating the course to follow. Then it will probably be made more clear what part the retiring premier proposes to take in the struggle that is still pending.

THE MEDICAL BILL.

No one subject of legislation pending in the present Assembly has attracted the personal attention and excited the personal interest of as many citizens of the Territory as has the question of a medical law. An avalanche of petitions relative to it have poured in upon the Assembly and the number of signatures attached to them aggregate many thousands. By far the greater number of the signers have asked the repeal of the present law and protested against the enactment of any similar legislation. Ever since the people of the Territory generally have realized the character of the medical law that was passed at the last session of the Legislature their indignation and resentment have steadily increased. Thousands of intelligent, solid, conservative citizens of the Territory, who are not easily swayed by any passing political breeze or subject of popular discontent, sincerely feel that the last Assembly, by passing the present medical law, committed an invasion of their rights. This sentiment has no doubt been increased by the efforts of individuals who, for personal reasons, justifiable or otherwise, have antagonized the law and exaggerated its objectionable features.

But making all just allowance for the results that have attended the efforts of interested individuals to arouse public antagonism towards the law, the statute is hostile to what has always been the prevailing public sentiment in the Territory ever since the first settlers located in it. A very large proportion of its inhabitants have always regarded with more or less distrust the teachings of schools of medicine, and the alleged skill and ability of physicians to successfully combat disease. It is not the purpose here to discuss the question whether or not such distrust is proper or justifiable. It exists as a marked public sentiment, and always has, and there ought not to be any allegation from any source that the people have not a perfect right to entertain it. Hence the objection of the people to the action of the last Assembly.

It is a matter of history that with almost unflinching regularity a coterie of physicians, at succeeding sessions of the Legislature, sought the passage of a medical law, more or less nearly in line with the existing one; but the Assembly always resisted the proposition until 1892, when success at last attended the efforts of the doctors. It is notoriously true that it has always been the doctors and not the people who have wanted a medical law, and to the legislators the question has been whether the people or the doctors should rule. At the session of 1892 a physician who had repeatedly labored for a medical law was made chairman of the public health committee in the House, and this circumstance goes far towards explaining how the law came to be passed.

There has been a general anticipation that the present Assembly would either repeal in toto the medical law, or pass another that would remove its objectionable features. Probably a dozen bills have been introduced with the latter object in view, but nearly all of them have been killed. The House committee on public health has reported adversely on most of them, but a waiting public waited in vain for it, or its Council counterpart, to offer a bill that either could support, until the 50th day of the session, when a measure was introduced in the House and after amendment has now passed that body.

The bill is quite a disappointment in every respect, and though it is amendatory of the act of two years ago in some particulars, it is essentially a reproduction of it. Unfortunately the very features of the old law that have been the cause of so much unpopularity remain largely unchanged. Two forms of certificates are provided for, but their difference is not well-defined. There is a reduction in the license fee, which was formerly deemed too high; but the same authority is left with the board to determine what is a "respectable medical college." Under one of the sections a non-graduate, who secures the endorsement of twenty-five legal voters of the "city or precinct" in which he resides, is permitted to practice medicine in such city or precinct; thus a practitioner may lawfully prescribe for a patient on one side of a precinct or corporate boundary line, but if he do the same act of benefit or mercy on the other side of that line, he is a criminal! This is a proposition that is not contained in the present law, and in this respect the bill is worse than the statute. There is room for some ambiguity as to the meaning of the term "immoral or dishonorable conduct," and for a good deal of uncertainty as to the proceedings against one charged with such conduct. Faulty and absurd construction must also be charged as to the "administration of family remedies," which is exempted from the operations of the bill. What are "family remedies?" What is the difference between "family remedies" and "drug store remedies" in general? How is it to be determined whether a practitioner, prosecuted for violating the law, did or did not confine his prescriptions for the sick to "family remedies?" A person might innocently suppose he was using a "family remedy" while the medical board might try to prove that it was some other kind of remedy. A remedy administered to a whole family would certainly be a "family remedy" under the ordinary meaning of words; but does the language of this bill imply that the dose to cure one must be given to the whole family?

It would be easy to go on and multiply instances of carelessness in preparation, and of objections in principle, but lack of space forbids. The measure evidently intends to make it easier for a non-graduate to get a license, but there appears to be a clash between sections on this point, and the result is uncertain. The worst feature is the failure to define or restrict the powers of the board in respect to the examinations it may require applicants for "certificates" to pass. It provides, in effect, that those examinations shall be such as the board may see fit to prescribe, and the result is that the board is given absolute and autocratic power to exclude any applicant, on the ground that the result of his examination was not satisfactory. When it is remembered that this examination includes the moral conduct and character of the applicant, as well as his professional qualifications, the inquisitorial character of such a law is apparent; it virtually places an applicant for the privilege of practicing medicine, on trial before a jury that may be avowedly hostile to him, and with no law to govern them in making up their verdict except their own sweet will.

The News thinks that if nothing better can be offered in the Legislature, that body would do well to simply repeal the law of 1892. For nearly half a century the Territory flourished without a medical law, and the overwhelming majority of its voters remain unconvinced to the belief that they need one; though this is not saying that the right kind of a medical law would not be a good thing in Utah.

ROSEBERRY'S VISIT TO BRIGHAM YOUNG.

"Bernard," a very good friend of the News living in Salt Lake City, calls to our notice, in connection with the elevation of Lord Roseberry to the English premiership, the fact of his having visited this city many years ago. During his visit to America in the summer of 1873, Lord Roseberry stopped off here several days while on his way west. At the time he arrived here, President Brigham Young, with most of the other prominent brethren, was absent on a visit to Provo. The Utah Southern railroad was completed only as far as Pleasant Grove, teams being used from that point south. Roseberry, who has achieved since—what he was then quite entitled to—a well-earned reputation for energy and pluck, came to Salt Lake City chiefly to see and converse with the man he had heard so much about; and when he learned that President Young was absent, he took train at once in pursuit, determined not to lose the object of his visit. On arriving at Pleasant Grove, no conveyance met the train to take him the remaining 12 miles to Provo. He immediately "hustled around" until he found a man with an ordinary lumber wagon, or as Roseberry called it, a "cart," who agreed to take him over to Provo, and in that way he got there.

Arriving at Provo he called upon and had a very enjoyable visit with President Young and those with him, and remained there one or two days, returning to the city with the President's party.

Those who met Lord Roseberry at the time were greatly taken with his unassuming manner and the evidence of marked ability which, although but a young man, was plainly given. He evidently thoroughly enjoyed his visit to Utah and with its best-known citizen, and so expressed himself; regarding the disagreeableness of the trip to Provo in the "cart" as nothing that was not thoroughly compensated for by his pleasant visit there.

THE DAY OF THE "MOSS BACK."

It is only a few years since the term "moss back" was freely applied in contemptuous udescription to a class of citizens, generally old residents, who offended the spirit of the times by advising conservatism in respect to public and private financial policy. Men who refused to fall into line under the leadership of imported "boomers," were called "moss backs." Men who expostulated against running this city into debt so deeply and the extravagant use of money obtained by selling Territorial bonds, were stigmatized as "moss backs." In the Legislative Assemblies of 1888 and 1890, it was the "moss back" members only who counseled conservatism and economy in public expenditures and in the shaping of the public financial policy.

But a little time has wrought retribution. The day of the "moss back" is here. He can now triumphantly exclaim to his erstwhile detractor, "I told you so;" while the public generally are regretting that his influence was not more potent in counteracting those that have produced existing conditions. A retrospective view of the past will often afford light for present and future guidance, and the pending perplexity of the Legislature in regard to certain matters concerning which they are compelled to take action, suggests a chapter of history connected with that body which it may not be unprofitable here to relate.

Hon. Anton H. Lund was a member of the House, from Sanpete county, in 1888, and at that session he earned and received the title, "Father of the Reform School." Realizing the necessity of having an institution to which erring boys and girls could be consigned for purposes of education and reclamation, he drew and introduced a bill providing for the erection and control of the present Reform School. On the main issue, the gentleman met with little or no opposition to his measure; but on the question of the amount to be appropriated, he had a hard and hopeless fight. The bill as he drew it appropriated $35,000 for the erection of the buildings; but the House would not listen to such a proposition. Not a dollar less than $75,000 would appease the spirit that was then predominating. In vain did the author of the bill insist that buildings of sufficient capacity to meet the wants of the Territory for many years could be erected for $35,000; in vain did he try to effect a compromise on $50,000, or $60,000; the House would hear of nothing less than $75,000, and that amount was appropriated as a starter for the Reform School.

The same spirit continued to dominate legislative action in regard to this institution, at the sessions of 1890 and 1892; and it was not until last year that a very large and costly building was finished, with the lavish appropriations that had been made for it, in addition to the $75,000 structure that had been authorized in 1888. The total cost to the Territory of the improvements on the Reform School grounds amounts to about $150,000, and now, within a few months after the completion of the second large building, the taxpayers are told that there is absolutely no need for both structures for reform school purposes, and that one of them ought to be utilized as a "School of Charities." Objection being made to such an arrangement, the taxpayers are told that a structure near Ogden, built for the purposes of a military academy, at a cost of $42,000, will afford ample and in every way desirable accommodations for the Reform School, and the Legislature is now favorably considering a proposition to remove the school to the premises named, as an alternative to closing it; for there is, in the present Assembly, a strong sentiment in favor of discontinuing it.

In this same connection rise up the immense expenditures that were made for an Agricultural College, which now presents itself to our lawmakers very much in the aspect of a white elephant, and the further fact that the Insane Asylum at Provo has room for two or three hundred more inmates than it contains. The "moss back" is fully vindicated. The perplexed condition of the Territory's finances, and the deplorable state of those of this city, when considered in connection with a number of "public improvements" which were so enthusiastically demanded two or three years ago, tell the story of his wisdom.

The moral of the story is this: The counsel of that class of old citizens who "killed the snakes and built the bridges" in these valleys, can be more safely relied upon than can the advice of late-coming speculators.

THE SILVER QUESTION.

Advices from Germany indicate that the emperor has lately taken a great deal of interest in the silver question. A commission has been appointed to look into the various points connected therewith, and in this action some have thought they were able to discern a ray of hope for the white metal.

The friends of silver in this country must not, however, be too sanguine in their expectations of permanent results from the labors of imperial commissions. If the financial salvation of this country depends on free coinage and bimetallicism, the best thing for us to do is to go to work and secure the needed legislation and then let the other countries follow, as their interests may require. It is too much to expect that the crowned heads of Europe can feel very deeply interested in questions of this kind, which touch largely the conditions of the toiling masses. Kings and emperors draw their immense salaries whether the laborers earn a bit of bread or not. And, what is to them almost as important, the appropriations for the maintenance of the vast armies have to be paid even when many of the poorer classes are on the brink of starvation. Monarchs are too often apt to consider themselves as beings of an order different from the people, moving in a different sphere, with interests sometimes conflicting with those of their subjects. What can be expected of them, under the circumstances?

The case was well illustrated a few years ago when the labor question was under discussion in Germany. The Swiss government issued an invitation to the various countries to send delegates to Switzerland to discuss the problems of the day and adopt recommendations for the benefit of the working men. The idea was seized upon by William and he issued a similar invitation for a labor congress to be held in Berlin, at the same time notifying Switzerland that a withdrawal of the invitation to meet in that country would be gracefully remembered. This was done, and the congress met at Berlin. It was a splendid affair. The delegates were mostly aristocrats with superfluous titles, who knew next to nothing about labor and the needs of the working classes. But they spent several days in the imperial capital and consumed any amount of dainty food washed down with expensive wine. There were fetes and parades and balls and music, and that was about all that was accomplished in the interest of the laboring classes.

Those well informed do not expect that the silver commission will bring better results. In some quarters it is even asserted that it has been convened only for political purposes. The bimetallic and agrarians must be appeased in some way, and an imperial commission is thought to be a convenient expedient for the purpose. The international idea may be a weighty element in questions of finance, but there is little to be hoped for on this side of the water until our country shall feel able to assert its independence of European kingdoms in such questions as it has successfully done in government and politics.

A long-lost Spanish mine of fabulous richness has been rediscovered near Durango, Mexico. An old smelter was found at the same place.

Near Trinidad, Colo., the Sunflower valley people are holding farmers' institutes for the discussion of dairying, creameries and other important topics.

The old-time telegraph operators in San Francisco are sad. John Leatch, one of the oldest operators in the state, died on Saturday morning. He was 60 years of age, and had to been actively engaged in the telegraphing business in California and on the Pacific slope for forty-two years. He was one of the first telegraph operators in San Francisco, and was engaged by the old California State Telegraph company when it started in 1852. Leatch was also the first operator in California to read by sound. For many years he was connected with the Western Union Telegraph company.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AMONG THE INDIANS.

A brief account of a visit to the Indian settlement of Washakie, in this county, may be of interest to your readers. Washakie is located on the west side of the Malad Valley, about twenty miles northwest of Collinston and sixteen miles south from Malad City.

A little over fifteen years ago the Indians composing the colony were settled a few miles north of Bear River City, but inducements offered them in the Malad Valley in the shape of an increase of water for irrigation purposes caused their removal to the present location. For the last fifteen years they have resided there and during most of this time have been presided over, as a branch of the Mormon Church, by Bishop Moroni Ward.

For a time the colony was managed on the co-operative plan, but dissatisfaction at this grew among the red men, no doubt partly caused by the accidental destruction by fire of several thousand bushels of grain, a fine saw mill in the mountains north of Malad and a store and valuable stock of goods at Washakie, the loss aggregating about $12,000, none of which was covered by insurance. These heavy losses made it a struggle to keep the colony in running order. The land and other property was divided equally among the Indians and perseverance and good management have brought wonderful results. With the exception of several "wick-i-ups," which it appears a hard matter for some of the Indians to abandon, the town has the appearance of any other settlement, containing many neat and comfortable frame residences. The population of the ward is about two hundred, mostly Shoshonee. Regular Sunday meetings are held in the large meeting house and a well attended Sunday school of which Ammon Publgee is superintendent, Don Carlon Hootchew is assistant superintendent, and Willie Ottogary, a bright looking, intelligent lad of twenty-four years of age, is secretary. A Deacon's quorum of about twenty members is one of the organizations, as is also a branch of the Elder's quorum. The district school is taught by Mr. Lewis D. Jones, of Samaria, and has an enrollment of thirty-nine. The Indian youths pay fair attention to their studies. While in some branches of learning, such as arithmetic and grammar, it is a very difficult matter to give them an insight, there are other branches in which they excel, and a specimen of penmanship from each scholar which was tendered me from Mr. Jones shows that this branch is one of them.

The inhabitants of the village dress as neatly as is usually seen among the race, and unlike many of their brethren in other localities, they appear to have a desire to earn what they need and use and to improve their condition, both financially and mentally.

They love amusements and an entertainment and dance given them one evening of this week was patronized until the meeting-house was filled to overflowing. To the serene portion of the entertainment they listened with marked attention while the comic part would convulse them with laughter. In dancing they show aptitude and when a "quadrille" was called six sets of the dusky people of all sizes and ages tripped the light fantastic to the usual American calls. A few of them can also make a fair showing in round dances.

Besides the families of Bishop Ward and Mr. Jones, the school teacher, there is only one other family of white people in the settlement, that of a Mr. Zundel, who formerly had charge of the branch. These two last named families only reside there, however, during the winter months, leaving Bishop Ward, his kind wife and interesting family as the only white inhabitants of the village during the summer months. The patience and zeal manifested by them in what to some would be an almost unbearable mission, should receive the emulation of every citizen of Utah, as it would be a hard matter to find a colony of Lamanites anywhere in the West which have been brought to a higher plane in any respect than have the inhabitants of Washakie.

J. FRANK FICKERING.
COLLINSTON, Utah, March 3, 1894.

FROM HARRISVILLE.

HARRISVILLE, Utah, March 2nd, 1894.—In my communication of Feb. 17th, I omitted to say that the low price of wheat could not be attributed to over production so far as this place is concerned; for the 8,748 bushels raised here from about 600 acres would only give (after deducting seed) about 12 bushels to each person living here, or about one pound of flour per day to each person. From an approximate of last year's wheat on hand there may be a shortage before harvest. And this, too, in a farming community, with an army of stalwart peasants. The only manufacturing industry is the Anderson Pressed Brick company. This, when in full double shift operation, employs about 70 persons, for eight months in the year. But even this industry has of late had a hard struggle, and in these depressed times has occasionally had to close down. They have now about one million of brick of all classes on hand; with three-fourths of a million in kiln ready to burn, which will take near 250 tons of P. V. lump coal.

I noticed during the past season the farmers had to resort to hog-raising to get money to pay taxes. Some few got their taxes from fruit, and others by working on the roads for county borrowed money, thus bonding, future posterity to pay it. Well might Spencer Clawson of the Salt Lake City Council have dubious omens of thus putting ourselves into bondage to tide over present issues. Better that we return to our primitive industries, and set up in our domiciles a working bee hive—or we may have to depend upon a Moses to deliver us from Egyptian bondage.

Father Burnett of this place, who was guard at the Utah Penitentiary in the sixties, has passed his 80th annual mile stone, his friends gave him a pleasant surprise. He and his good dame paddle their own canoe, running a small store without soliciting contributions from the community.

Three of Huntsville's most progressive citizens leave shortly on a missionary tour. The young folks of the place are doing a good work in getting up entertainments to assist them to their fields of labor.

I see in one of your cotemporaries a notice of the death of the president of the Maricopa Stake, resulting from the kick of a horse some months ago. But they have not got the name correct, which should be C. I. Robson. [The News had it right!] Friend Robson was well known in Salt Lake county, where your correspondent was his neighbor when he ran the paper mill in Sugar House ward for T. B. H. Stenhouse.

He was also well known in Weber county, where the family were raised. It is remarkable that he should meet his death in a like manner as his brother James P. Robson did seven years next April—from a kick of a horse—while plowing in his garden in Plain City, Weber county. This was followed by such sad circumstances that I feel assured your readers will pardon a short recital of the same. His wife, the amiable daughter of the late respected Joseph Skeen, died eight months after, leaving a babe two weeks old. This babe followed its parents just eight months after its mother's death. There were left two sons and three daughters, who were strongly attached to their uncle Charles I. Robson, and he to them. He also has three brothers, Thomas, William and Ralph who left Plain City some years ago, and settled in Idaho.

Yours,

P. L.

OKLAHOMA CONFERENCE.

Quarterly conference was held at Marshall, Oklahoma, February 24th, 25th and 26th. Traveling Elders present, Reese M. Harper, presiding Elder of the mission, John A. Lowe, in charge of the Oklahoma conference, and A. N. Wallace, Geo. S. Ashtob, John A. Stephens and E. M. McArthur and Priests David and Levi Holt. During the first two days the meetings were of a generally instructive and testimonial character. The Spirit of the Lord was greatly enjoyed, the Elders and Saints were encouraged in their labor of love, while the visitors were impressed with the truths uttered and the spirit and genius of the work. Our young Elders with but limited experience showed marked improvement, a steady development towards their important callings. Testimonies and expressions of the Saints showed that they were being benefited by the Gospel of Christ which they have embraced. The Elders were greatly benefited by their meeting together in a Priesthood meeting on Monday where they exchanged experiences and suggestions, receiving some valuable instructions from their presiding officers. In the evening a branch and Sunday school were organized. Priests David and Levi Holt were ordained Elders and placed in charge, the senior in charge of the little branch, while Levi Holt was chosen superintendent of the Sunday school, assisted by Brother A. Ward and Sister Camilla Thayer.

The Elders changed companions and set out for their various fields, Elders Harper and McArthur remaining with P. O. at Marshall, while the other four will be located at Chaddick.

Weather beautiful and springlike. All are well and enjoying the spirit of their mission. A. N. WALLACE.

EUROPEAN VS AMERICAN FORESTRY

From a late report I glean a few facts relating to European forestry.

Almost every government of Europe is now giving special attention to the subject of forestry. In fact, it could no longer be postponed; the governments have simply yielded to the demands made by their most educated and thoughtful citizens. Germany and France seem to be the leaders in this great work. Germany has built up a gigantic system of forestry by making it a department of the national government. Our own government must eventually do the same thing, or vast portions of our naturally rich territory will change into deserts.

The personal rights of the people of Germany, as owners of the forests, are not interfered with, only so far as is necessary to preserve the forests. In other words, the owners are permitted to use their forests but not to ruin them. In certain places permanent forests are set apart and must be maintained. Forest laws are very strict and are enforced by officials who have been especially educated and trained in forestry. The present area of Germany is estimated at 20,000,000 acres. One-half of this is owned by the government. From the forest area the government receives an annual income of $14,000,000; the expense of management is $7,500,000. When it is remembered that most of the forest land is unfit for agricultural purposes, and that if it was not devoted to forest productions it would be absolutely useless, it will be seen that forestry, under proper management, may be made a paying investment, even when its indirect advantages are not considered.

The direct profit derived from the sale of timber, etc., is small when compared with the advantages which accrue to agriculture and from that to all other industries. The dense woods make the air healthfully humid; they feed the springs which form the numerous streams and rivers, and aid in other ways to secure the good crops which form the basis of national prosperity. Germany is represented in government reports as being a vast and well watered garden.

All of the government forests, whether large or small, are mapped off; every tree dotted down and its location defined; its age is known, and no tree is cut until it has reached a size which makes it valuable, and as soon as it is cut a new tree is planted in its place. The government maintains forestry schools in which students are instructed in all branches relating to vegetable economy. The course includes geology, chemistry, surveying, meteorology and thorough work in botany and vegetable physiology. The whole German system is admirable and is worthy of imitation by all of the enlightened nations of the globe.

Even far off Australia is awakening to the importance of forestry work. I quote from a recent paper the following:

The total forest area of New South Wales, says the Hon. J. P. Hudson, superintendent of the exhibit from that country at the World's Fair, is estimated at about 21,000,000 acres, and 1,013 forest reserves have been proclaimed covering a total of over 5,800,000 acres, subdivided into twenty-five districts, each having resident foresters and traveling inspectors whose duty it is to safeguard these forest reserves. In 1891 the forest department expended $119,375 upon the northern reserve for the conservation of red cedar, and other purposes. As in the United States so also in New South Wales, Arbor Aay has been appointed, on which the children of all the public schools plant trees. There is also a state nursery, consisting of over 1,200,000 trees, representing over 250 kinds of timber. There are practically three classes of timber country, divided into open forest, scrub and brush; these forests producing no less than 630 different kinds of timber of economic value. The finest description of hardwood grows on the ridges and hillsides.

So much for foreign lands. What have the people of the United States accomplished? Not one forestry school in all the nation! For years the national government refused to give the subject the slightest attention and even now the forestry department is unable to carry on necessary work for lack of money. State legislatures have been even more neglectful. Forest vandalism has been allowed. Annual fires, which destroy the young trees and check the growth of the large ones, have been regarded as of no consequence, and general destruction and waste have been seen on every side, without raising a protest from the people.

Is it not time to call a halt and seriously consider the future? The experience of other nations should convince us that each year sees work done that must be undone in the future, and the sooner we awaken to this fact the better it will be for our prosperity. Utah has ever taken a leading part in everything relating to the intermountain region. Let us not be behind in this, but by our careful study and wise actions, show that we are still fit to lead in all that contributes to material prosperity.

C. A. WHITING.
Sec. Utah Forestry Association.

WELSH AT WILLARD.

WILLARD, March 1, 1894.

Since last writing to you three more children have been taken from our midst by the unrelenting hand of death:

Eva Trofina, child of Jas. E. and Elizabeth Toombs, aged 1 year and 7 months; died of meningitis. Hattie May, daughter of Geo. H. and Caroline Facer, aged 9 years and 7 months; died of diphtheria; and Clement, son of Peter and Annie Rock, of pneumonia-croup, aged about 8 years.

While sickness and death cause sadness in small communities like ours, still we have our seasons of rejoicing. Today a Welsh reunion was held here; our commodious Tabernacle was well filled with representatives of the Welsh nation, from Salt Lake to Malad. Father Titus Davis, a veteran Welshman, 88 years of age, was chosen chairman. A lengthy program was carried out in a spirited manner, occupying over five hours. The speeches, songs, recitations, dialogues, etc., were appropriate from the opening hymn, "Adreb, Adreb Saint yn Arglwydd," to the closing song, "America."

David L. Davis, of Salt Lake City, delivered an address on "Why We Celebrate St. David's Day." He showed that St. David was born in the fifth century, in Pembrokeshire, Wales, and was of royal lineage. Educated by Paulinus near Carmarthen, he afterwards founded several important seats of learning. With great eloquence he opposed the Pelagian heresy and soon became archbishop of Menevia, since called St. David's, where he died March 1, 601 A. D. St. David and contemporaries adhered to the doctrines taught by the Apostles and inspired men, as they understood them, but the object of Pope Gregory the great, head of the ambitious Church of Rome in sending St. Augustine and other monks to Great Britain, was not only to convert the heathen Saxons but to subjugate the church already in Britain to the Roman power. Many noble Welshmen fell martyrs for their religion, and the Welsh felt proud of such men as St. David and others, not because of their being canonized by the Catholic church centuries after their death, but because of their noble Christian lives.

Among the visitors were Stake President R. Clawson, Counselor Chas. Kelly, Bishop Hughes of Mendon. Ex-Governor Arthur L. Thomas, Elders Elias Morris, George G. Bywater and others sent regrets at being unavoidably absent. All seemed to feel that Welsh reunions should be more frequent, and to the proposition to have them so the spectators as well as participants responded with a unanimous "Aye."

JAMES J. CHANDLER.

THE TERRITORY'S FINANCES.

Following is the report of the Council ways and means committee on the financial condition of the Territory:

Mr. President—Your committee on ways and means respectfully represent that a financial condition confronts the present Legislature that should, in our judgment, receive our most careful attention. It is not dissimilar, however, only in increased proportions, to that which has attended the last three sessions.

January, 1888, the appropriation bill provided for an expenditure for the two years ensuing in excess of the revenue to the amount of—

Total appropriations.....	$177,795 01
In January, 1890, for.....	303,780 34
In January, 1892, for.....	258,543 69

Making a total deficit of.....$740,099 04

To meet this deficit bonds were issued as follows:

First series, in 1883, for.....	$150,000 00
Second series, in 1890, for.....	300,000 00
Third series, in 1892, for.....	250,000 00

Total amount of bonds issued...$700,000 00

The entire amount has been disbursed in meeting the deficits enumerated, and a balance remains for the present legislature to provide for of $40,099.04; add to this the amount expended by the Utah World's Fair commission, for which no appropriation was made, of $59,557.25, which leaves a deficit of $99,656.29 confronting the present Legislature.

Your committee have carefully considered the various items of sundry expenditures necessary to be made, based upon reports received for the ensuing two years, a detailed statement of which is hereto attached, marked exhibit A, and made a part of this report. These items represent the amount necessary, as stated by officers in charge, for the maintenance of the Territorial public institutions and the payment of salaries of officers, jurors, witnesses, interests on territorial bonds, contingent expenses and claims now considered and being considered before the claims committee.

Your committee in this statement have not provided for the appropriation of any sums for erection or repair of public buildings, university and agricultural supplies, counties, militia, etc. That the revenue from all sources will not exceed for the years 1894 and 1895 the revenue for the two past years seems quite conclusive, unless the general tax should be increased. Estimating from this point of view there will then be a deficit of about $267,487.39.

Your committee is of the opinion that it would be bad policy or poor financing to meet this deficit by the issuance of bonds or the increasing of the general tax. The current expenses, in our judgment, should not exceed the revenue, a policy contrary to which would in due time lead our Territory into financial ruin.

Your committee after a careful and full consideration of the question recommend that the amount as shown by exhibit B be appropriated to pay the deficits and the current expenses for the ensuing two years.

The reductions here offered from the amounts asked for by the officers of the several public institutions, and the amounts heretofore paid for salaries, are requested on account of the paralyzed condition of business, a stringency in the money market and the depression in business in general.

And your committee would further recommend that a law be passed making the territorial tax two and one-half mills on the dollar, and also two and one-half mills on the dollar for territorial school purposes, that the deficiency of $36,535.14 will be fully provided for.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

ELDRIDGE,

Chairman.

EXHIBIT A.

Estimate expenditures for the years 1894 and 1895:

Deficit as per auditor's report, Dec. 31, 1893.....	$ 40,099 04
Utah World's Fair commission.....	60,678 39
Territorial asylum for the insane.....	112,034 00
University of Utah.....	128,000 01
Agricultural College.....	46,000 00
Reform school.....	35,000 00
D. A. M. society.....	32,000 00
(counties for roads and bridges.....	30,000 00
Interest on territorial bonds.....	70,000 00
Court commissioners, jurors and witnesses.....	80,000 00
Outstanding certificates of witnesses and jurors.....	20,000 00
For territorial board of equalization.....	7,417 07
Deficit, territorial board of equalization.....	617 07
Books and stationery, territorial board of equalization.....	900 00

Salary of auditor of public accounts.....	4,000 00
Attorney fees of auditor of public accounts.....	1,000 00
Rent for auditor of public accounts.....	1,200 00
Incidental expenses of auditor.....	500 00
Territorial school commissioner, salary.....	3,000 00
Incidental expenses, territorial school commissioner.....	400 00
Territorial law librarian.....	1,000 00
Territorial library.....	6,850 00
Territorial treasurer's salary.....	2,500 00
Rent for territorial treasurer.....	600 00
Judges of the district court, salary.....	8,000 00
Salary private secretary to the Governor.....	2,400 00
Contingent expenses executive office 1894-95.....	600 00
Fish commissioner's salary.....	1,000 00
De cit commissioners to locate University lands.....	2,700 00
Incidental expenses of the treasurer's office.....	200 00
Publishing record of marks and brands.....	500 00
Contingent expenses of the Legislature.....	3,000 00
Printing for the Legislature for 1894.....	1,900 00
Clerk First district court.....	800 00
Clerk Second district court.....	400 00
Clerk Third district court.....	1,200 00
Clerk Fourth district court.....	800 00
Clerk Supreme court.....	500 00
Fugitives from justice.....	2,500 00
Gratuities to discharged convicts.....	3,000 00
Sundry claims allowed by your committee on claims, etc.....	16,000 00
Total.....	$727,396 45

EXHIBIT B.

Deficit as per auditor's report, Dec. 31, 1893.....	$ 40,099 04
For asylum for the insane.....	75,000 00
University of Utah, $45,000; deaf mutes, $15,000.....	60,000 00
Agricultural college.....	15,000 00
Reform school, $21,000; less amount on hand, $8,000.....	12,000 00
D. A. M. society.....	7,000 25
D. A. M. society deficit.....	2,959 75
Interest on territorial bonds.....	70,000 00
Court commissioners, jurors and witnesses.....	80,000 00
Outstanding certificates of witnesses and jurors.....	20,000 00
Territorial board of equalization.....	5,000 00
Deficit, territorial board of equalization.....	617 07
Book and stationery, territorial board of equalization.....	1,000 00
Salary auditor public accounts.....	4,000 00
Rent for auditor.....	600 00
Incidental expenses, stamps and stationery.....	100 00
Territorial school commissioner, salary.....	2,000 00
Incidental expenses, territorial school commissioner.....	800 00
Territorial librarian's salary.....	1,000 00
Territorial library, first to pay its just deficits or debts, the residue to be expended under the direction of the board.....	4,600 00
Territorial treasurer's salary.....	250 00
Salary private secretary to the Governor.....	1,200 00
Fish and game commissioner.....	600 00
Deficit commissioners to locate university lands.....	2,700 00
Publishing record of marks and brands.....	400 00
Legislative printing for 1894.....	1,900 00
Clerk First district court.....	800 00
Clerk Second district court.....	400 00
Clerk Third district court.....	900 00
Clerk Fourth district court.....	750 00
Clerk Supreme court.....	500 00
Fugitives from justice.....	2,500 00
Gratuities to discharged convicts.....	3,000 00
Sundry claims being considered and allowed by the committee on claims.....	16,000 00
World's Fair appropriation.....	60,678 39
Contingent expenses of the Legislature.....	3,000 00
Total.....	$496,994 50

DELEGATE RAWLINS AT HOME.

Hon. J. L. Rawlins, Utah's delegate in Congress once more surprised his constituents by unexpectedly returning to their midst February 28. The gentleman came in over the Union Pacific flyer arriving at three o'clock. After a few hours of rest he was seen about the Federal court rooms and legislative halls where his sudden appearance almost caused a sensation. He was warmly welcomed by his many friends and to a representative of the News he granted a pleasant interview.

When asked as to how he came to return so suddenly Mr. Rawlins stated that it was due to the fact that he had received a telegram from this city on Saturday last, the contents of which were such as to make it necessary for him to temporarily absent himself from the Capital. Within an hour of the receipt of the message he was on the train headed this way.

He was looking and feeling well and stated that he was in better health than for some time past. When questioned concerning the prospects of statehood for Utah, Mr. Rawlins said, "I have the promise that the bill will pass the Senate this session."

"Have you any reason to doubt the correctness of that assurance?" asked the newspaper man.

"Certainly not," was the response uttered in a tone that indicated that Mr. Rawlins would be very much surprised and disappointed in case he should be mistaken in his conclusions.

Regarding the opening of the Ute compahgre and Uintah reservation or settlement the delegate stated that the matter was still under consideration and that he apprehended no opposition whatever. There would be no further delay beyond that entailed by the arrangement of the necessary details.

As to the Ute Indian-removal question he stated that Colorado had, as was well known, been making strong final efforts to secure the approval of the treaty made several years ago. There had been hearings before the Senate committee and sub-committee of the House. He had appeared before both of them and protested against the residents of this Territory being made the victims of the great wrong that the citizens of the Centennial state was so willing to inflict upon them. The sub-committee of the House was to meet yesterday and decide on the report that was to be made to the full committee in the House. He felt certain that the efforts of Colorado would not succeed in this case and that the rights of Utah would be fully guarded.

The business that called Mr. Rawlins home at this particular time is of a legal character, and as soon as that has been attended to, which will be in a few days, he will return to Washington.

RELIEF SOCIETY REPORTS.

The Stake secretaries of the Relief Society in all the several Stakes of Zion, and in branches of the society in this and other countries where there is no Stake organized, should send in a yearly report for 1893 as soon as possible to be compiled for the coming April conference, that each society may have equal recognition. All reports to be forwarded to the office of the Woman's Exponent. ZINA D. H. YOUNG.

THE EUROPEAN MISSION.

Arrivals.—The following missionaries for Scandinavia arrived at Liverpool from Utah per Cunard steamer Aurania, Monday, January 29, 1894: William Bookholt, of Nephi, Juab county; C. P. Thompson, Levan, Juab county; James Larson, Mapleton, Utah county.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

The office of Dr. Karl G. Maeser, which formerly was at 124 Oak street, San Francisco, has been removed to 17½ Oak street.

The St. George Temple will close for ordinance work on Friday, the 23rd day of March, and will re-open on Tuesday, the 24th of April.

DAVID H. CANNON,
President of St. George Temple.

Indian Agent Ray had 300 head of cattle driven off the Shoshone reservation last week, and in driving them over the ice on Wind river the ice broke and about 100 head of cattle were drowned.

Kimball Bros. have been running a stage between Park City and Salt Lake daily during the past week and have received a very liberal patronage; every stage has had its full complement of passengers.

Joseph Kimball, of Logan, has returned from Omaha, to which place he went with seven car loads of cattle which he succeeded in disposing of to good advantage. Very little beef has been shipped from Logan by the farmers during this winter.

Information was received from Selectman Bamberger's office March 5th to the effect that a shipment of 267 rabbits had just been received from Mt. Pleasant, over the Rio Grande Western, for distribution among the poor of this city.

Farson, Leach & Company, the Chicago bond-buying firm to whom the board of education sold its last issue of bonds amounting to $225,000, paid the third installment on the same March 2nd when they telegraphed to Treasurer Duke the following sum: For bonds, $50,000; interest, $1,041.66; premium, $100; or a total of $51,141.66.

Montana and Utah, says the San Francisco Chronicle in an editorial note, are making fine exhibits at the Midwinter Exposition. That of the former is now nearly completed and is attracting a great deal of attention. The Utah exhibit will be an excellent one, which will fully display the resources of the Territory.

The B. Y. A. Summer Institute for 1894 promises to be even a greater success than that of last year. The services of Professor Hinsdale, who fills the chair of pedagogy of the University of Michigan, have been secured. Prof. B. Cluff Jr., who is now making an educational tour of the East, will secure the services of a number of other eminent professors before he returns. The institute opens in June.

The five acres of land generally known as the baseball park has been sold by auction by Sheriff McQueen for $5,000, under an execution issued by the district court for the satisfaction of a judgment secured by the Pacific Investment company against Samuel Groesbeck and wife. There were only two bidders—Herman Bamberger, who offered $4,500, and the plaintiff in the action, who secured the property upon a bid of $5,000.

March 4th a burglar entered the residence of Mrs. Sarah Dinwoodey near the corner of First South and Fourth East streets. Mrs. Dinwoodey was away from home, and on returning heard some one go out at the back of the house. The thief had broken a window in the rear through which the entrance had been effected. The only article missed was a long, double necklace. It is evident the burglar was frightened off before finishing his work.

On Saturday evening the home of A. F. Whipple, situated near the mouth of Provo canyon, was burned down, says the Lehi Banner. It appears Mrs. Whipple had just filled her lamp and as she entered one of the rooms with the lamp in her hand she caught her foot and fell, the lamp coming in contact with the stove. In an instant the whole place was in flames and nothing was saved. The damage was about $2,000 and insured for $1,000.

At the Davis Stake conference, held Saturday and Sunday, March 8th and 9th, Elders F. D. Richards and H. J. Grant, of the Council of the Apostles, were in attendance. On Sunday afternoon Elder John W. Hees, of Farmington, was set apart as President of the Stake in the place of Wm. R. Smith deceased, and Joseph Hyrum Grant of West Bountiful as first counselor. A large number of people were in attendance, and an enjoyable time was spent.

Provo, Utah, March 6.—Miss Tena Berg, 18 years of age, daughter of O. H. Berg of this city, died suddenly last night at 10 o'clock. She went to Ephraim, Sanpete, a few days ago to visit her sister and appeared as well as usual until about 9 o'clock when she was seized with vomiting. A physician was sent for, but before he arrived the young lady had expired. Heart disease is said to be the cause. Mr. Berg goes to Ephraim today and will bring the remains of his daughter back with him.

A telegram received in this city February 28 conveyed the intelligence that W. L. Dykes Sr. had been shot and killed at Flagstaff, Arizona. His son, W. L. Dykes, was formerly a deputy marshal in Idaho, but is now a resident of this city, and is engaged in mining. The deceased was one of the early prospectors in Utah, and was well known in this Territory, having lived in different parts thereof. He took part in the Buckskin mountains gold excitement, and afterwards moved to Flagstaff, where he has resided ever since.

WASHINGTON, March 1.—The Senate committee on Indian affairs today authorized a favorable report on the bill for the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from Colorado to Utah in accordance with the agreement made with the Indians. The committee recommends several amendments, one of which provides that any Indians who may elect to do so can remain upon the land at present occupied by them, taking land under Dawes's severalty act.

The committee strikes out the provision of the bill granting the proceeds of the sales of the lands of the present reservation to the Indians.

The following is a report of the public schools of this city for the month ending February 28th, 1894. Average number belonging, 8399; average daily attendance, 7724; average daily absence, 672; cases of tardiness, 1822; number not absent nor tardy, 3449; per cent of attendance, 92; per cent of punctuality, 98; visits by members of the board, 38; visits by patrons and citizens, 434; visits to patrons, 349; cases of truancy, 18; total enrollment of the month, including promotions, 9011; enrolled since September 1st, 1893, 11,006; colored pupils enrolled, 39; not absent nor tardy during the year, 538.

A dispatch was received this morning, March 5, at the President's office, from Elder Canute Petersen, president of the Sanpete Stake, announcing the death of C. C. N. Dorius, bishop of Ephraim South ward. He departed this life at 10:30 o'clock p. m. Sunday, March 4. The deceased has for years taken a prominent part in affairs connected with the advancement of the kingdom of God and has won numerous friends, by all of whom he was much esteemed. It has been known for some time that he was losing in physical strength, but the announcement of his demise will be a surprise to many outside of his immediate circle of friends.

A large number of friends of Mother Maria Chunn met at the residence of Thomas Varley in the Nineteenth ward March 1st and celebrated the 80th anniversary of that respected lady. The evening was spent in pleasant conversation, song and story. It was a matter of wonder to many of those present that the guest of honor had retained all of her faculties to the extent that she has being apparently as strong, bright and healthy as she was twenty years ago. Her friends trust that these blessings may be continued with her as long as she sojourns among them which time they are anxious to have extended as long as it shall be wise and well.

Saturday afternoon a boy named Daniel Goodfellow had his foot badly crushed by a Union Pacific coal train. It appears that a great many boys are in the habit of boarding the trains while they are switching in the vicinity of Ninth North street for the purpose of picking up the lumps of coal left in the cars. As the boy Goodfellow was attempting to do this this afternoon the train reversed and in some way his foot was caught with the result stated. Mr. T. C. Harris, who was passing in a buggy, seeing the accident, signalled the engineer, and the train was stopped. The boy was taken to his home at the glass factory.

Wellsville knows how to treat departing missionaries. Charles Lloyd, William F. Darley and James Kerr were to leave on Thursday morning, and on Wednesday evening a grand farewell party was tendered them in the large meeting house and a fine program was rendered; speeches were made by Bishops Maughan, Molen and others; a nicely prepared farewell address was delivered by Miss Annie Lloyd, after which all partook of a bounteous feast. A handsome purse was raised. The evening's amusement concluded with dancing. On Thursday a long train of teams, headed by the band, accompanied the missionaries to the train at Cache Junction.

The children, grandchildren and some of the friends of Sister Sarah Le Cheminant assembled at her home in Pleasant Green on February 24th to celebrate the eighty-first anniversary of her birth. The company assembled at noon and surrounded a table groaning under the load of the good things of the land. After dinner was over the exercises commenced, consisting of songs, recitations and speeches, which continued until supper time. After supper the company continued to enjoy themselves until midnight, none seeming to enjoy themselves more than Sister Le Cheminant herself. It was a merry gathering, and a happy time was spent, which will be long remembered by those present.

The following telegram as a part of the regular daily press report, was received at a late hour March 3rd. It will be read by Latter-day Saints in Utah and elsewhere with great interest:

KANSAS CITY, Mo., March 3.—The Temple Lot, a sacred piece of Mormon soil in Independence, for which the Re-organized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and the Independence faction of the Mormon Church have been fighting in the courts for four years, was today decided by Judge Phillips of the district court to be the property of the Reorganized Church. The Independence faction of the Mormons is by the opinion enjoined from asserting its title to the property, the cloud is removed, and full possession is allotted to the plaintiff. The successful organization has its headquarters at Lamoni, Iowa. Its following numbers 25,000 souls and its president is Joseph Smith, Jr., son of the Prophet Joseph Smith, founder of the Mormon Church.

It is time something was done to stop the dangerous sport which many boys engage in—that of carrying a gun and shooting birds within the city limits. Many accidents have resulted from such practices, and some have proved serious. The latest instance of accidental injury from this cause occurred on Wednesday evening as the laborers engaged on Capitol Hill were returning from their work. Four of the men were descending the hill and were near the residence of Dr. John R. Park, when a bullet came from their left and struck one of the number, by the name of Pearce, in the back. The leaden missile passed through his overcoat and the rest of the clothes which he wore on his back and inflicted a flesh wound about an inch in length. The bullet is supposed to have come from a 22-caliber rifle, and the force was spent by passing through the clothing; otherwise it might have resulted seriously. Mr. Pearce was taken to Dr. Richards, who dressed the wound, and the patient is getting along nicely. He is back to work again today. The shooting was done by a party of small boys who were out after birds. They were in the canyon just south of Dr. Park's residence, and it is supposed were shooting at birds in the trees just below the boulevard, where the accident occurred.

Mr. W. M. Sunderland, of Lehi, appeared at the Chamber of Commerce March 3rd with a specimen which he says is a composition of matter or alloy of metals. He claims this to be a discovery whereby a new alloy of metals is revealed, one peculiarity of which is its susceptibility of a high polish. It is about the hardness of steel. He says the cost of production is about the same as first-class brass and bronze. It is non-corrosive and is capable of standing a high degree of heat. The new alloy may also be used, he says, largely as a reagent to extract gold and silver from solutions which have been used to leach ore. It is produced from clays peculiar to Utah Territory, and particularly to Utah county. Mr. Sunderland has been working at it for the past eighteen years, and is now able to produce it in large quantities, and in such a state of perfection that he has applied for a patent under the name of the Sunderland Star metal.

The Manufacturers' Bureau and the Chamber of Commerce will give him their aid in placing it before the public, and should it prove to be all that is claimed for it, it will be given a place among Utah manufactures.

Mr. Sunderland has prepared plates of this alloy for use in the Legislature, for the Midwinter Fair, the Chamber of Commerce and for the patent office at Washington.

An interesting contest case is set down for hearing in the Probate court on the 15th inst., arising out of a petition for the revocation of probate of the will of John L. Blyth, deceased. It comes up on the application of John M. Cannon and Zane and Zane, attorneys, who have filed the petition on behalf of Charles Blyth, one of the minor heirs of the deceased, by his general guardian, Margaret McKay Blyth.

Among the provisions of the will are the following:

Out of the income and profits of my property I hereby authorize the said executors to use the sum of $100 per month for and during the period of time that this trust shall continue, which said sum shall be used and disposed of by them as follows, to wit: $10 per month of said amount to be given each month to the President of the Salt Lake Temple to aid in paying the necessary expenses in and about said premises, the balance of said sum of $100 per month to wit, $90 per month, shall be used and appropriated by the said executors and trustees in paying the necessary expenses of obtaining the genealogies of my family and the families of my two wives, Margaret Mitchell Blyth and Margaret McKay Blyth, and to do the necessary work in the Temple for any of our dead kindred. Said executors and trustees may, in their discretion, employ an experienced person to obtain these genealogies and to perform the necessary work for our dead ancestors in said Temple, as shall be necessary and proper, in harmony with the doctrine, belief and religious tenets of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; provided, however, that in case all of this fund of $90 per month shall not be used in doing such work aforesaid, or if the time shall come when all of our dead friends and dead kindred shall have had done for them all necessary and proper work in said Temple according to said religious belief, then said $90 per month shall therefore be paid to the president of said Temple for its use and benefit and for the necessary expenses and repairs in and about said Temple at Salt Lake, for and during the period of said trust. In case it shall be decided by any court of competent jurisdiction that the fund above provided to be paid to said Temple for the expenses and work therein, including the obtaining of the histories and genealogies of our families, is void for any reason, then said $100 per month shall be held, controlled and used by the trustees under this will for the use and benefit and for the improvement of my estate generally.

Among the numerous witnesses cited to appear and testify are President Willford Woodruff, President Lorenzo Snow of the Salt Lake Temple, Daniel L. Blyth, and each of the minor heirs.

It will be startling news to the social and business circles of the city to learn that Matt. C. Walker, son of the late S. Sharp Walker, was found dead at the residence of his mother shortly before seven o'clock March 5th. The discovery was made by a servant girl in the employ of the family, and a few moments later the whole household was thrown into mourning over the sad event.

It appears that he came up town for the purpose of visiting a friend, Harold Pitt, who had undergone an operation at the hands of a doctor yesterday. About 8 o'clock he left Mr. Pitt—so it is thought—to visit a young lady in the southeastern part of the city. While he was making his call on her he became ill and was seized with violent pains in the stomach. He then came up town and went to the Resort just north of the Cliff house and told Mr. Dittman, the proprietor, that he had a cramp and asked for some Jamaica ginger and brandy. This gave him no relief and shortly afterwards at his request Mr. Dittman gave him a strong dose of peppermint and hot water. Instead of getting better he got worse and said that the pain was becoming so intense that he could not endure it and that he needed a physician. The office of Dr. Worthington was only a few doors farther up the street and to that he was taken by a couple of friends, J. M. Stull and a Mr. Smith. Dr. Worthington after a few searching inquiries gave him a hypodermic injection of morphine but his agony continued and a second dose of the drug was injected into the body. In a short time he felt much easier and expressed a desire to be taken home and Messrs. Stull and Smith accompanied him.

He then took a "night key" from his pocket, unlocked the door (this was about 1:30 in the morning), said good-bye to his friends and stepped inside, locked the door, put his cane in the corner, near by, and it is supposed from the half-sitting and half-standing position in which his body was found that he turned round, sank down against a cabinet of onyx and minerals and died immediately.

SALT LAKE STAKE CONFERENCE.

The conference and priesthood meeting of the Salt Lake Stake opened in the Assembly Hall at 10 a. m. Friday morning, March 2nd, Elder Angus M. Cannon, Stake president, presiding.

Opened by singing:

Redeemer of Israel, etc.

Prayer was offered by Elder Alonzo H. Raleigh.

Singing:

How firm a foundation, etc.

Following was the attendance of officers: Elders Angus M. Cannon, Joseph E. Taylor and Charles W. Penrose, the Stake presidency; three High Councilors, five Patriarchs, seventeen presidents of Seventies, fourteen home missionaries; representatives of all wards of the Stake excepting Mountain Dell, South Cottonwood, Draper, Riverton, Bluff Dale and Herri-man; and of the First, Second, Fourth, Fifth, Seventh, Eighth, Twelfth, Thirteenth, Fifteenth, Eighteenth, Nineteenth and Twenty-second quorums of Elders; a good representation of the lesser Priesthood, and Stake officers of the Relief Society, Sabbath schools and Mutual Improvement Associations.

On the recommendation of their respective bishops, twenty-three young men received certificates recommending their ordination to the office of Elder, on condition of promising faithful performance of duties.

The following bishops presented reports of their wards: Wm. A. Billis of South Jordan; Joseph Warburton of First ward; L. G. Hardy of Second ward; and Counselor John Y. Smith of Third ward.

In general the reports of the wards and their auxiliary organizations were very favorable. Few cases of destitution were reported, and the Saints were spoken of as faithful in the performance of their duties. The Bishops expressed themselves as pleased with affairs as at present existing, and anxious to see such conditions continue. The poor are well provided for and dilatory members are being prompted to greater faithfulness.

Elders Edw. W. Davis and James Malin, presidents of the First and Second quorums of Elders respectively, reported their quorums in good condition, the members manifesting great improvement in the performance of their duties. In some instances, however, there has been a lack of faithfulness in fulfilling the obligations which the Elders have taken upon themselves.

Elder Angus M. Cannon, president of the Stake, laid great stress on the necessity of receiving all instructions through the channel of the Priesthood, according to perfect order. Confusion is bound to result from any other course than this. Elder Cannon stated that instructions had been sent to the Bishops of the wards to labor with those who had been recommended to the Temple dedication, and had not shown great faithfulness since that time; not requiring rebaptism, but permitting it if the person so desires. In the case of rebaptism, according to the instructions of President Woodruff, the regular form of the ceremony is changed by the insertion of the words "for the renewal of your covenants."

These instructions are to be followed by men officiating in the Priesthood, who are not to substitute their own interpretation of the ceremonies performed. The follies indulged in by many in the Church were spoken of and denounced by Elder Cannon, and all were exhorted to depart therefrom, and to manifest greater faithfulness in the discharge of their responsibilities. Sent from the presence of God to lead His people, men sometimes turn from their high callings and allow earthly cares and pleasures to interfere with their great responsibility.

The choir sang:

Praise ye the Lord.

Benediction was pronounced by Elder C. W. Penrose.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Singing:

Glory to God on high.

Prayer by Elder A. W. Winberg.

Singing, choir and congregation:

Our God we raise to Thee.

The report of the Stake organization of the Y. L. M. I. A., was read, and showed a marked interest in the work of this organization. Sister Mary A. Freeze, Stake president of the Y. L. M. I. A. testified to the increased faithfulness and spirituality of the young ladies, as manifested in their testimony bearing and special facts, as also the encouragement they are giving to all their associates in the performance of their labors.

Sister M. Isabella Horne, Stake president of the Relief Societies, presented an encouraging report of this organization, calling attention to the work being done in the direction of relieving the wants of the poor, especially of those who, through delicacy of feeling, do not make their wants known. The sick were spoken of as receiving great blessing through the ministrations of the sisters, who thus add to their own blessings and become valuable assistants to the ward authorities.

Bishops Harrison Sperry, of the Fourth ward; S. M. T. Seddon, of the Fifth; Wm. Thorne, of the Seventh; J. C. Watson, of the Sixth; D. B. Brinton, of Big Cottonwood; and John A. Egbert, of West Jordan, gave verbal reports of their wards, agreeing in essential points with those presented in the forenoon session, special mention being made of the efficient work of the auxiliary organizations.

Patriarch John Smith testified to his observation of a marked improvement among the people of the Church, and to the blessings attending the ministrations of the sisters among the sick by the power of faith and prayer; for the prayer of faith is always effectual. The tendency toward the procrastination of labor is marked and unfortunate; all should drive their work instead of allowing it to drive them.

Speaking of the local patriarchs, he stated that their duty is to bless the poor and their own kindred, Elders called hurriedly on missions and others who wish that administration, but each should, as a rule, confine his ministrations to his own district.

Elder C. W. Penrose expressed his gratitude for the testimonies borne regarding the equality of all in the Church of Christ. The poor and the rich need equal instruction, and in some cases the rich are in special need of this, that they may appreciate the value of the society of their faithful, humble brethren and sisters, and that pride and vain-glory in their mingling in "society" may be discouraged.

The necessity of freedom in the bestowal of patriarchal blessings received especial emphasis, as also the bestowal of suitable blessings on the patriarch by those who receive his ministrations. Each member of the Church should learn his duty and perform it, always remaining in his own sphere.

The choir sang the anthem:

Jerusalem, my glorious home.

Conference adjourned to 7:30 p. m. with benediction by Elder George Goddard.

EVENING SESSION.

The choir sang:

Lord, Thou wilt hear me when I pray.

Prayer was offered by Elder Milando Pratt.

Singing by the choir and congregation:

Hail to the brightness of Zion's glad morning.

Elder Thomas C. Griggs, Stake superintendent of Sunday schools, was the first speaker. He reported the Sunday schools of the Stake as being in excellent condition. The growth of some of the schools has necessitated the organization of three new ones in the Stake since the last report. Some few of the schools were not reported as the statistical reports had not been handed in, but would be before the close of the conference. A corps of sixteen missionaries are engaged in visiting the different schools in the Stake, and they are men of honor and integrity, as are also the officers and teachers in the various schools. Great good was being done in teaching the rising generation. A Sunday school has been organized for the benefit of the deaf mutes, and much good was being accomplished thereby. There are about 9,000 pupils enrolled in this Stake and 1,000 officers and teachers, a total of 10,000 souls.

Elder Joseph H. Felt, Stake president of the Young Men's Mutual Improvement associations, reported that there were forty-nine of these associations in the Stake. All in a prosperous condition, they have taken up the Manual in earnest, and it is proving a great benefit to the young men who take an interest therein. It provides for home reading as well as the regular lectures, and is creating a desire for learning among young people. A lecture bureau had also been established under the direction of Elder A. S. Geddes.

Elder George H. Taylor, bishop of the Fourteenth ward, reported that the different organizations in that ward over which he presided were in good condition, and particularly the Relief Society, which was doing a great deal in relieving the wants of the sick and needy.

Elder Charles H. Hyde, president of the Fourth quorum of Elders, reported marked improvement in the attendance of members. On account of the growth of the quorum it was found necessary to divide it. The Sixth and Seventh wards only are now included in the Fourth quorum. The presidency had taken up a personal labor with the ward members, which, together with the labors of a corps of visiting teachers, had been productive of great good.

Elder Andrew S. Gray, of the Fifth quorum of Elders, reported the quorum in good condition. Members are appointed to lecture on the principles of the Gospel and the meetings are thus made profitable.

Elder Abraham H. Cannon, of the Council of the Apostles, urged upon the authorities of wards and quorums the necessity of attending to their duties and being in possession of the spirit of their callings. They should lead out and set good examples, and by so doing could bring the people to a higher standard. Those who are forced to attend to their duties will not receive the benefit to be derived through the voluntary performance of those duties. Referred to the effects of good example abroad as well as among the young people at home, and said we should present before them an incentive to press forward in the performance of their duties. Bishops should direct the labors of those around them and instruct them in their duties that all might gain experience. Testified that the work of the Lord was steadily growing in the earth.

The choir sang:

Hard times come again no more,
the congregation joining in the chorus.
Benediction by Elder H. P. Richards.

SECOND DAY.

MORNING SESSION.

Singing, choir and congregation,
Now let us rejoice in the day of salvation.
Prayer by Elder Edward Stevenson.
Choir sang:

Softly beams the sacred dawning.

Elder Thomas H. Waite reported the condition of the Eighteenth quorum of Elders, his report coinciding in essential points with those before given, some personal experiences being added thereto. Similar reports were presented by Elders Samuel L. Holmes, of the Seventh quorum; Horace Eldredge, of the Seventeenth; William Gedge, of the Twentieth; Thomas Sutherland, of the Twenty-first, and George Saville, of the Thirteenth.

The following Bishops represented their wards, the reports covering the same ground as those given yesterday: J. S. Rawlins, of South Cottonwood; Albert W. Davis, of Center, to which the ward formerly known as North Point has lately been added; E. F. Sheets, of the Eighth; Samuel A. Woolley, of the Ninth, and J. A. Hamilton, of Mill Creek.

The choir sang:

Look up and put your trust in God.

Adjourned to 2 p. m.

Benediction by Elder J. E. Taylor.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Singing by the choir:

Come, dearest Lord.

Prayer by Elder E. B. Tripp.

Singing:

Earth with her ten thousand flowers.

The following Bishops gave reports of their wards:

H. B. Clawson, of the Twelfth; Robert Morris, of the Eleventh; George Romney of the Twentieth; Adam Spelra, of the Tenth, and Nelson A. Empey, of the Thirteenth.

Elder Elias Morris reported the High Priests' quorum, over which he presides. There are 475 in the quorum, all men of great experience, over whom Elder Morris expressed himself as proud to preside. Meetings are held monthly, lectures being delivered by prominent members on important subjects, testimonies following. Members of all other quorums are invited to attend the meetings.

Elder Lorenzo Snow spoke of the value of the Bishop's position in giving to its occupant experience, opportunities of doing good, and reward for self-sacrificing and well-doing. A man in this position must place himself at the disposal of his people and gain the necessary inspiration, firmness and patience for his duties. Love and long-suffering for transgressors are essential, as also, a knowledge of the nature of each one under his care, that wisdom may be exercised in dealing with individuals.

Some men rarely make mistakes, while others are continually stumbling; each of these should be treated with due regard to his peculiarities. Humility is essential on the part of those who commit wrong, whether it be of rare or of frequent occurrence.

The choir sang the anthem:

"Light and Truth."

Conference adjourned to 7:30 p.m.

Benediction was pronounced by Elder William Draper.

EVENING SESSION.

The choir sang:

Another day has fled and gone.

Prayer was offered by Elder F. B. Woodbury.

Singing:

Great God indulge my humble claim.

Elder Thomas Giffard, president of the Third quorum of Elders, gave a verbal report of that quorum, stating that it was in a similar condition to most of the quorums reported.

The following Bishops then reported their several wards: Alfred Solomon, Twenty-second; Isaac Barton, Nineteenth; Robert Daniels, Heriman; Alva Butler, Granite; James Jensen, Sandy, and George R. Jones, Twenty-third. Their reports showed that their respective wards were in good condition, and the different organizations were working harmoniously for the education and development of the young. The people were very liberal in donating for the support of the poor, so that none had suffered for anything.

Elder Levi W. Richards, president of the tenth quorum of Elders, reported the quorum in a good condition, the members being alive to their duties.

Elder Heber J. Grant, of the Council of the Apostles, then addressed the conference. He had listened with interest to the reports, and while some of the Saints felt that it was monotonous to hear them because of their sameness, he considered them essential as calculated to encourage us. The Saints had gathered here to serve God and keep His commandments, and they should not lose sight of this fact. If we devote all our time and energy to furthering our own personal interests we will make shipwreck of our faith. There has been a great deal of animosity in the world against the Latter-day Saints, but this is being removed as we are becoming better known. Referred to the great good accomplished by the visit of the First Presidency to the World's Fair, in connection with the Tabernacle choir. The world have looked upon us as being degraded and ignorant but they are beginning to learn that there is no other community with as much general information as the Latter-day Saints. The time will come when the rich will accept the Gospel as well as the poor. We should get the light and inspiration of the Holy Spirit and then follow its precepts.

The choir and congregation sang the Dology.

Benediction by Elder William L. Binder.

THIRD DAY.

MORNING SESSION.

Conference convened in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, at 10 o'clock a.m., Elder Angus M. Cannon, president of the Stake, presiding.

The choir and congregation joined in singing:

Do what is right; the day-dawn is breaking.

Prayer was offered by Elder Joseph C. Kingsbury, Patriarch.

The choir sang:

Prayer is the soul's sincere desire.

Bishop William C. Allen reported Draper ward. The general condition, he said, is somewhat like that of other wards. The Primary association has not held meetings during the winter, the ward being in a scattered condition, but the Mutual Improvement associations are doing a good work. The various quorums of the Priesthood hold their regular meetings and the Relief Society is doing much good. Some members there are in the ward who are not doing their duty, but we are laboring with them and hope that the efforts to bring them to realize their condition are not in vain.

Bishop Orson F. Whitney gave a concise report of the Eighteenth ward of this city. He had filled the position of Bishop for sixteen years and was called when still young and inexperienced. At that time the numbers of the ward were few and poor, not even having a house for meeting. This is now changed. The ward is stronger numerically and financially. He reported prosperity and a general good feeling. The Bishopric is respected by the people, most of whom are faithful Latter-day Saints, supporting the presiding brethren. They are a good people. Referring to a popular misapprehension regarding some of the Saints in the ward who are blessed with temporal means, he would say that there were many faithful servants of the Lord among the wealthy as well as among the poor. It is not money, but "the love of money" that is "the root of all evil." The various quorums are faithful in the performance of their duties, and the Mutual Improvement association is a decided success. The Sunday school is prosperous and the theology class has been attended with much interest. The so-called Christian science had made some inroad in the ward, and several members had requested to be dropped from the records of the Church. The speaker said he had replied to such requests that it was not customary in the Church of God to drop names from the records except for crimes against the laws of God, nor to give recommends to apostates. The necessity of theological classes for our young people is illustrated by the fact that such ideas can take hold of the children of prominent Church members. They are evidently ignorant of the principles of the Gospel.

Elder Joseph E. Taylor reviewed briefly the reports so far given at this conference by the Bishops and representatives of the various organizations and also spoke in high terms about the Tabernacle choir.

Elder David McKenzie presented the report of the Stake Board of Education. He referred to a resolution adopted on June 80th last year in the Assembly Hall for the raising of a certain sum of money for the support of the Church schools. It is now suggested, he said, that the Bishops take the matter in hand. Ten per cent of that sum is immediately needed on account of the present emergencies in connection with our religious educational institutions. He strongly urged the necessity of attending to the religious educational of the young and testified to the excellent spirit prevailing in the Latter-day Saints College and other Church schools.

Bishop Orson F. Whitney said it had been found impossible to open the Eighteenth ward seminary for the current year, but the institution will not be closed any longer than absolutely necessary.

Elder Angus M. Cannon requested the representatives of the various wards to respond to the call of their respective wards. Nearly every ward in the stake was represented.

Elder Charles W. Penrose said he hoped that all the Bishops and representatives of the wards now understood that ten per cent of the amounts allotted would be needed at once. He also spoke of the ward choirs as improving generally and rendering valuable services in the meetings of the Saints and read the report of the Sabbath schools of the stake.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SALT LAKE STAKE SUNDAY SCHOOLS FOR THE YEAR 1898.

Number of male officers and teachers 623; female 815, a total of 938.

Average attendance of officers and teachers 646.

Number of male pupils 5,585; female 6,041; total, 11,626, an increase of 1,278.

The number of pupils in the primary department are 5,718; first intermediate department 2,228; second intermediate department 1,648; highest department 2,037.

Average attendance of pupils 6,660, and total number of teachers and pupils 12,564.

Three new schools were established during the year.

In the libraries are 5,068 volumes and the cash collected during the year amounted to $2,479.27, of which $855.14 was on hand at the close of the year.

The choir sang the anthem:

Praise ye the Father.

Prayer by Elder Henry Tuckett.

Adjourned till 2 o'clock p.m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The choir and congregation sang:

We thank Thee, O God, for a Prophet,
To guide us in these latter days.

Prayer was offered by Elder Thos.

E. Ricks, of the Bannock (Idaho) Stake.

The choir sang:

O my Father, Thou that dwellest,
In the high and glorious place;
When shall I regain Thy presence,
And again behold Thy face?

FAST OFFERINGS.

Elder Chas. W. Penrose presented a statement showing the receipts for the support of the poor of the Stake during the six months ending December 31st, 1898. The receipts from fast offerings amounted to $6,282.71, and from the Presiding Bishop's office, $13,544.80.

STATISTICAL REPORT.

A statistical report for the six months ending Feb. 23, 1898, was read showing a Church membership in the stake as follows:

Members of the First Presidency 3, Apostles 8, Patriarchs 16, Seventies 1,337, High Priests 459, Elders 2,312, Priests 501, Teachers 431, Deacons 1,737, members 18,246, total officers and members 25,047, children under eight years of age 8,188, total number of souls 33,235.

The number of families is 6,325.

During the period embraced in the report there were 80 marriages.

The number of births of male children is given as 316 and of females 297.

There were 669 children blessed.

There were 1,109 officers and members received; 968 officers and members removed; 93 new members, and 834 children were baptized.

Four persons were excommunicated.

The number of deaths of males was 104 and of females 106.

The individuals drawing support aggregate 1,637.

The report shows a total increase in membership of 1868, a total decrease of 1,182, and a net increase of 686.

STAKE AUTHORITIES.

The general authorities of the Church as presented at the last Conference were then unanimously sustained, as were also the following Stake authorities:

Stake Presidency—Angus M. Cannon, president; Joseph E. Taylor and Charles W. Penrose, counselors.

High Councilors—Wm. Eddington, Theodore McKean, George J. Taylor, Henry Dinwoodey, Anders W. Winberg, John T. Caine, Jesse W. Fox, James P. Freeze, Milano Pratt, Henry P. Richards, Elias A. Smith, Joseph D. C. Young.

Alternate High Councilors—John Nicholson, John Clark, David L. Davis, Orson A. Woolley, William W. Riter, Edward Snelgrove, John Kirkman, Frank H. Hyde, Spencer Clawson.

Presidency of High Priests' quorum—Elias Merrill, president; George B. Wallace and Wm. C. Dunbar, counselors.

Patriarchs—Lorenzo D. Young, Wm. J. Smith, Wm. G. Young, Wm. Draper, Joseph C. Kingsbury, Alonzo H. Raleigh, Washington Lemon, Joseph Horne, Joseph Harker, Aronibald N. Hill, Samuel Friday, William H. Walker and Ezekiel Holman.

HOME MISSIONARIES.

Anderson, James H. McMurrin, Joseph W.
Anderson, Wm. N. Moyle, Oscar W.
Anderson, Olof J. Nicholson John
Bull, Joseph Jr. Nasibitt, Henry W.
Binder Wm. L. Nelson, Joseph
Bird, Henry N. Olson, Thorwald N.
Blair, Geo. E. Phillips, Wm. G.
Bean, Joshua B. Poulton, Walter J.
Barber, Horace D. Peirce, Eli H.

Bennion, Milton
Caine, John T.
Cannon, George M.
Carlson, August W.
Christenson, Joseph
Cannon, Lewis M.
Carlisle, Joseph R.
Cornwall, Samuel
Cannon, Angus J.
Clawson, Thomas A.
Cannon, John M.
Clawson, Sydney B.
Cottam, Charles S.
Cannon, Hugh J.
Davis, David L.
Dougall, Wm. B.
Done, Willard
Dean, Joseph H.
Dougall, Wm. B. Jr.
Emery, David S.
Emery, Charles F.
Flashman, Jas. T.
Ferguson, Marlow
Gregg, Wm. C.
Groesbeck, Jos. S.
Gill, David K.
Hintze, Ferdinand F.
Hansen, John E.
Hayes, John
Hanson, Wm. L.
Haslam, James N.
Hull, Thomas
Harrington, Daniel
Hillam, Rodney Jr.
Harker, Henry
Hodge, Robert H.
Jensen, Andrew
Jones, Nathaniel V.
Kimball, Solomon F.
Keddington, John W.
Kelsch, Louis A.
Lambert, George C.
Lovett, George D.
Lee, Wm. O.
Lewis, Thomas D.
Lambert, James C.
Lyman, F. M. Jr.
Lawrence, John
Lindsay, Joseph S.
McMurrin, James L.
Moyle, James H.
McKenzie, David
Mills, George B.

Parry, Henry E.
Price, James E.
Richards, Samuel W.
Ritter, Wm. W.
Richards, Franklin S.
Romney, George Jr.
Reid, John B.
Roes, Charles J.
Sjodahl, Janne M.
Summerhays, Jos. W.
Stewart, Joshua B.
Sharp, James
Saunders, John W.
Savage, Charles H.
Schofield, Nephi Y.
Sloan, Edward L.
Sharp, Joseph C.
Sanders, Sandra Jr.
Smith, Elias A.
Sandberg, John C.
Spencer, Claudius V.
Stewart, Charles B.
Schulthess, Arnold
Summerhays, Caleb E.
Savage, Ralph G.
Stauffer, Frederick
Stewart, Samuel W.
Talmage, James E.
Taylor, Robert B. T.
Tobiason, Theodore
Taylor, James A.
Tovey Wm. H.
Thorpe Joseph
Taylor, Moses W.
Timpson, John H.
Woolley, Orson A.
Wells, Joseph S.
Wood, William Jr.
Wilcken, Charles H.
Wells, Gershon B. F.
Wilcox, Charles F.
Wells, John
Wright, Elias S.
Watson, Robert S.
Wallace, Henry
Wilcken, David
West, Alma H.
Woodbury, Frank B.
Winder, Wm. C.
Young, Richard W.
Young, Willard
Young, Joseph A.
Young, Brigham S.

Clerk of the Stake and of the High Council—James D. Stirling.

Reporter—Willard Done.

Relief Societies—Mary Isabella Horne, president; Elmina S. Taylor and Helen M. Whitney, counselors.

Young Men's M. I. Associations—Joseph H. Felt, president; Royal B. Young and James W. Eardley, counselors.

Young Ladies' M. I. Associations—Mary A. Freeze, president; Mary Pratt Young and Nellie C. Taylor, counselors.

Sabbath Schools—Thomas C. Griggs, superintendent; Richard S. Horne and Willard C. Burton, assistants.

Primary Associations—Ellen C. Clawson, president, Camilla C. Cobb and Lydia Ann Wells, counselors.

Tabernacle Choir—Evan Stephens, leader; Joseph J. Daynes, organist, and all the members of the choir.

Scandinavian Meetings of Salt Lake City—Anders W. Winberg, president; S. P. Neve and Martin Christopherson, counselors.

German Meetings—Arnold H. Schulthess, president; Henry Raiser and Herman Groether, counselors.

Board of Education—Angus M. Cannon, Joseph E. Taylor, Charles W. Penrose, David McKenzie, J. M. Sjodahl, William W. Ritter, Richard K. Thomas.

It was very pleasing, said Elder Penrose, to see members of the Church dwelling together in unity. It was carrying out the will of the Lord and was a great thing for Zion. The names that he had read were not presented merely as a matter of form, but for a purpose as set forth in the laws of the Church. It was a practice among the Latter-day Saints—not exactly an election yet possessing similar elements. It gave the people an opportunity to sustain or disapprove of the officers selected by the proper authorities to minister unto them.

The speaker was thankful that he was a member of the Church of God. He knew it would fill the destiny spoken of by inspired men; that its principles would be triumphant. Every man could find ample opportunity in his sphere in the Priesthood to magnify his calling and talents. He was gratified at the reports of the Bishops of wards. They showed that the people had been generally doing their duty.

ELDER JOSEPH E. TAYLOR

stated that there were many interests that commanded the attention of the officers of wards. These were being looked after in a satisfactory manner. He noticed an increased zeal and faith among the people. Of course there were exceptions, but they were not many.

He expressed himself as greatly gratified at the magnificent work of redemption that was going on in the Temple. The Gospel comprehended every principle of spiritual being and advancement that would assure salvation in the world to come.

ELDER ANGUS H. CANNON,

President of the Salt Lake Stake, said he was pleased and satisfied with the unceasing and untiring efforts of the Bishops of the wards. These brethren were the servants of the people and were sorely tried men. Their labors were not appreciated as they should be. There were complaints in regard to the stringency of the times. He had, however, noticed that the offerings of the people compared very favorably with the gifts bestowed in times of greater plenty. The Latter-day Saints had been called to these mountains to be nourished and strengthened. They should obey the commandments of the Lord. If they did so they would be blessed.

The speaker here took occasion to refer in strong terms of condemnation of certain society fads, customs and conditions now prevalent among the people of this city. He especially disapproved some of the games played at so-called socials at the homes of prominent Elders of the Church, such as progressive euchre, high five, etc. Masked balls and round dancing should be abolished and avoided as things of evil, for evil often came from such indulgence. He did not wish to discourage social gatherings providing they were of the proper kind. These could be made intellectual, pleasant, elevating and moral in their character. He cautioned the people to be careful of themselves and their families to live their religion and receive the blessings of the Lord.

The choir sang the anthem:

Daughter of Zion.

Benediction was pronounced by Bishop W. B. Preston.

EVENING SESSION.

The choir sang:

From afar, gracious Lord.

Prayer was offered by Elder James T. Flashman.

Singing:

Hard times come again no more.

Elder Abraham H. Cannon was the speaker at the evening meeting. He referred to the reports of the Bishops which invariably indicated that there are a large number of poor people in the various wards of this Stake, but was pleased to know that the necessities of the distressed had been met through donations received from the people and from the Bishop's general storehouse. He hoped that no discrimination had been made in the dispensing of charity, but that all people who were in need, whether they were Latter-day Saints or people of other denominations, had received proper aid. A hope was expressed that the charitable feeling would continue to exist among the people, but that greater efforts should be made to furnish employment so that those who are in distress may earn that which they desire, rather than that they should be pauperized by the bestowal of free gifts.

The speaker also referred to the labors of our Church school teachers, who, as the reports indicated, are doing missionary service, and are really obtaining for their labors a less amount than they could earn by working at day's labor upon the street or farm. Some indeed are working without any remuneration whatever. He felt to encourage the people to at least pay these noble men a remuneration equal to that which we pay those who have the care of our bodies, when we entrust to these teachers the care of the souls of our children, which are much more precious than the tabernacle in which the spirit dwells.

Encouragement was also given to the youth to employ their time and talents in the acquisition of knowledge and of skilled industry. Too much indifference is manifested by young people concerning matters of education, and they are too negligent about the use of the time allotted them here upon the earth. Only those who steadily pursue the course which God would have them follow, making some little progress each day of their lives, will succeed, and such will stand at the front in the great day of Zion's future glory.

The choir sang:

Jerusalem, my glorious home.

Benediction was pronounced by Elder Heber J. Grant, and the conference adjourned.

THE LEGISLATURE.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

The Republican members of the Assembly are holding frequent caucuses. One subject that has occupied their attention when so assembled on several occasions is the general appropriation bill. A prominent Republican member of the Assembly has informed a NEWS representative that his party is trying to agree on the items of the bill, and perfect it so as to avoid all night sittings near the close of the session. The state of the Territory's finances makes it unusually difficult to agree upon the amounts which are to be given to public institutions, and there is a prevailing opinion that there will be a cutting down of the amounts proposed to be given them, and which they have asked for. If this is not done there must be an increase of taxation, or of the bonded indebtedness of the Territory, or both, and the people are averse to either.

The proposition submitted yesterday by a delegation of the citizens of Ogden, to turn over the Military academy of that city to the Territory for the purpose of a reform school, and to transfer the deaf mutes, and the blind should the Territory make provision for the latter, to what is now the reform school, is meeting with pronounced favor among members of the Assembly. It is declared to be the most feasible plan yet suggested to accomplish several desirable objects, among which are a reduction of the expense of the reform school, better provision for the deaf mutes and blind and great and much needed relief to the University, which is now so cramped for lack of room. The deaf mute institute, which is one of the University buildings, when vacated by its present inmates, can be used as class rooms, etc. The deaf mutes have petitioned the Legislature to remove them to Ogden.

The usual biennial exhibition of ignorance in regard to natural history was held in the House yesterday, when the fish and game bill was under consideration. For many years each succeeding legislature has thought it knew more about birds, fishes and animals than its predecessor, and hence has remodeled the fish and game law. Utah never had a law on this subject that was more than two years old, it is believed. Varian thought snakes ought to be protected, and Allen thought such protection unnecessary, alleging that snakes are migratory birds and do not breed in Utah. Varian insisted that they did breed here, and that he himself had followed up brood after brood of snake until he had killed them all.

The knowledge of "snipeology" which the two Republican leaders of the House possess is distrusted on the Democratic side, though Powers was shrewd enough not to disclose the extent of his, as he took no part in the debate on snipes.

A prolonged debate occurred while the fish and game bill was under consideration, and the minimum fine for using explosives for taking fish. The bill made the minimum $200, and several of the members thought such punishment too severe, but others cited the fact that vast damage was being done to the fish interests of this Territory by the use of explosives, and that severe measures should be adopted to stop it. The House finally agreed on $40 as the minimum fine for this offense, the maximum being any sum under $800.

THURSDAY.

Yesterday afternoon the House considered at length the militia bill and made numerous amendments to it. One of the most important of these was the striking out of the section which authorized the Governor to call out the militia to resist invasion, suppress riot, aid the civil officers, etc., and the one which provided per diem for officers and men while so called out and while engaged in the annual training. An amendment offered by Evans to limit the annual cost to the Territory of maintaining the militia to $3,500 was adopted, and the bill passed by a vote of 19 to 4.

A heavy day's work was done in the Council yesterday. Final action was taken on a large number of bills. Several bills relating to the vexed subfect of stray animals were considered, and all were sent to the judiciary committee, with the expectation that the committee will report an acceptable measure which will cover the subject. Among the bills passed was the one which provides a simple method for the dissolution of irrigation companies. The Australian ballot bill was postponed until Tuesday next, which action virtually kills it.

The medical bill introduced by the House committee on public health came up on third reading yesterday afternoon, but on motion of a member of that committee it was put at the foot of the calendar, in anticipation that it will come up today. It reenacts the present law, with two or three slight changes, which do not materially affect the law so far as the general public are concerned. It is a bill that the committee once decided not to introduce, but they changed their minds later.

FRIDAY.

Powers's bill providing for a further increase of the bonded indebtedness of the city provides for an issue of a quarter of a million, at five per cent, payable in twenty years. The author states that a bond buyer has already bid $1.05 in case the issue is made, and he thinks $1.07 could be obtained. It was intended that the bill should provide that $125,000 of the proceeds of the bonds should be devoted to the erection of a wing of the Capitol, in pursuance of the recommendations of the Governor's message, but legal reasons have led to an amendment of the bill so that the cost of the wing of the Capitol will be met as a deficit in the general expenditures.

The special message transmitted to the Assembly yesterday by the Governor has been meeting with severe criticism. It is held that the specifications of facts accompanying the gloomy portrayal contained in the message did not justify such a representation of existing conditions. One member pronounced it "political luncombe." Another said that an appropriation for a Capitol building, no matter how large the sum, would not afford material relief to the unemployed in this city, as only a small number of men could be employed, and those would have to be skilled mechanics. There was very little work on such a building that could be performed by common laborers. Powers is in favor of action by the Legislature in response to the special message, but Tolton is emphatically opposed to bonding the Territory for any purpose whatever. The special message has not produced the impression on the Legislature which was evidently intended by it.

The following bill was introduced by Hubbard, and passed by the House today under a suspension of the rules:

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah:

Section 1. That all school districts that failed to levy a special school tax during the year ending 1893, for the purpose of building, or other school purposes, may levy such tax for the year 1894, in the manner provided by law, if levied before the 15th day of April, 1894, and such tax shall be assessed and collected at the same time and in the same manner as if it had been levied in the year 1893.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect from and after its approval.

The following was introduced by Warner in the House this afternoon:

"Resolution authorizing the leasing of the military school property at Ogden and removing to that institution the inmates of the reform school and placing the school of the deaf mutes and blind in the building now occupied by the reform school.

"Whereas, the citizens of Ogden have made a proposal to lease to the Territory of Utah the Military academy with all its furniture and appurtenances, at an annual rental of $2,000; also giving the Territory the option to assume the encumbrance of twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars, upon which a title in fee simple (subject to said incumbrance) will be made to the Territory; also in the event of such change the city of Ogden will convey their contingent interest in the reform school grounds, to the Territory, and

Whereas, the deaf mutes petitioned the Legislature to remove them to Ogden, for sundry sufficient reasons, and

Whereas, some location is necessary for the school for the blind, under the law recently enacted, therefore

Be it resolved that the Governor of the Territory of Utah be and he is hereby authorized and empowered to contract, agree, bind and perfect all arrangements for such removal, upon the part of Utah Territory upon such conditions to be provided as he may deem just and equitable, and in the best interests of the purpose sought to be accomplished.

That when he shall have closed the contracts, received the conveyances, leases and premises as herein suggested, the said schools shall immediately be removed to the quarters herein designated; and the proportion of money provided by the general appropriation for said institutions shall be set apart to the independent use of said schools, notwithstanding it be merged with the funds of any other institution.

This resolution shall take effect on its approval.

SATURDAY.

Hatch's bill to regulate the locating and recording of mining claims, is a measure which makes some radical changes in the existing order of things in reference to those subjects. It requires mining records to be deposited with the county recorder, allows that officer to appoint deputies in the mining districts, requires a certain amount of work to be done within sixty days from the date of location, and contains other provisions that are new to the present laws regulating this subject. The bill met with determined opposition in the lobby and on the floor of the House, and it was not expected that it would pass, but it passed the House by a vote of 15 to 6, much to the surprise of its opponents.

Powers's bill creating a board of fire and police commissioners, has been pending a long time in the hands of a Council committee. It has been the subject of a good deal of lobbying, and has met with a great deal of opposition. But its author has followed it up closely, and has earnestly defended it. The result is that the Council, this forenoon, passed it, with amendments. It is thought the House will concur in these, and that the measure will be promptly forwarded to the Governor.

Immediately after the noon recess today the Council held an executive session for the purpose of acting on the nominations of the Governor for auditor and treasurer, Hon. John T. Caine and J. E. Whitehead, Esq. After a brief consultation Mr. Caine was confirmed and action on Mr. Whitehead's nomination was deferred.

MONDAY.

This forenoon a long debate occurred in the House on H. B. 15, Johnson's bill proposing radical changes in the existing system of irrigation. This subject is one which generally excites much interest among country members, and it was noticeable that, on this occasion, the Salt Lake members who generally do most of the talking remained quiet. It transpired during the discussion that the irrigating committee was contemplating the introduction of a bill upon the subject of irrigation and water rights.

H. B. 161, which the House passed this afternoon, is designed to cure ambiguities in the present law relating to assessing stock in corporations, and to specify when such stock is and is not assessable.

H. B. 125, which the House passed this forenoon, requires each city having 15,000 inhabitants or more to appoint a veterinary inspector, and to designate a place in or near the city, where all animals intended for immediate slaughter must be brought for inspection, and be inspected on the hoof. After being killed the carcasses shall be again inspected and, if found good, shall be marked with a tag. If any carcass or part thereof is found unfit for food, the inspector shall order it destroyed. The U. S. government standard and method of meat inspection are adopted.

This forenoon, while the sheep scab bill was under consideration in the House, Nebeker declared that he didn't like sheep, but that, if we must have them, we ought to have healthy ones. He predicted that the people in Utah would yet regret the extent to which the sheep were consuming the ranges, but he would support this bill.

This afternoon, in the House, Stan from the committee on Capitol grounds, rendered the following report:

Mr. Speaker—Your committee to whom was referred the report of the commission on Capitol grounds, respectfully represent that they have examined and approved said report, and recommend that the amount required for the completion of the improvements as originally surveyed, relating to said grounds, be appropriated. Also, the amount of $5,000 for caring for and keeping said grounds in proper condition, the ensuing two years, and that said commissioners' report be filed in the office of the Territorial auditor.

Your committee have also taken under advisement the recommendation of said commissioners, in connection with that part of the Governor's message dated January 8, 1894, likewise the special message of Governor West dated March 1, 1894, relating to the erection of one wing of the Capitol building, and respectfully report that the reasons assigned for the erection of such portion of a Capitol building, which will afford ample provision for all the legislative, judicial and general business purposes, meets with our approval, as in the erection of such building, the needs of the Territory or State will be provided for in this direction for many years to come.

By the erection of this building, at an estimated cost of $125,000, which amount can be obtained by issuing bonds at 5 per cent interest, it is evident by representations in figures made to your committee by the Secretary and Governor on cost of rent for halls, office rooms, etc., that the advantages in building over that of renting would not only pay the interest on the bonds but be a net saving to the Territory annually of from $3,000 to $5,000. And as suggested in the messages of Governor West, the erection of this building at the present time would give work to a large number of the unemployed working class, a subject worthy of the most earnest consideration of this Legislative Assembly, under existing distress and want among so large a number of this class of citizens. Your committee are also of the opinion that all kinds of material and labor can be obtained at greatly reduced prices at the present time; on that a saving of at least 20 per cent in the cost of such a building can be saved to the Territory. We therefore recommend the issuing of bonds and erection of one wing of a capitol building.

(Signed.)

STANFORD.
STOKER.
MASON.
POWERS.

McBride dissenting.

TUESDAY.

"What are you going to do with the University and Agricultural College?" asked a News representative of a prominent member of the House, today. "O, I don't know; give me something easy," was the verbatim reply of the legislator. The same question has been put to several other members of the Assembly within the last few days, and substantially the same reply has been received, except in one instance. Such is the situation on the 58th day of the session, with only two days remaining in which to do business. But there is one member of the Assembly who has clear cut ideas upon this and other financial questions now pending in the Assembly, and when the above interrogatory was put to him he answered it comprehensively and explicitly by giving the man of news the program which he was in favor of having carried out by the Legislature. The member referred to is Representative Stanford, chairman of the committee on ways and means, and of the committee on Capitol grounds, and his program is as follows: Purchase the Military academy at Ogden, which cost $50,000, but is offered to the Territory for $20,000, and make a reform school of it; remove the deaf mutes and blind to the present Reform school premises; remove the University to Logan; unite with the Agricultural College, and give to both $40,000 to run them for two years; appease Salt Lake by erecting a wing of the Capitol building; make no change in the present rate of Territorial tax; let the Territorial school tax remain as it now is in order to get the support of members from the weaker counties to the program as a whole; and issue bonds to meet unavoidable deficiencies, but make these as small as possible by a policy of retrenchment in all public expenditures. If the University is not sent to Logan, I should favor closing it. In my opinion it would be better to suspend it than give it a starvation appropriation."

As far as the legislative mind has thus far assumed shape on the matters included in the above program, it is believed that it reflects the views of the majority of both houses; but the amount of blankness of opinion among the legislators on the subjects named is remarkable.

The Council spent considerable time yesterday and much of its morning session today in considering Varian's mechanics' lien bill. As the measure left the House it provided that the mechanics' lien should take precedence over any other incumbrance on the property, without regard to record notice. Thus the owner of a lot might mortgage it for money to build with, and the mortgage might be on record before work on the building commenced; yet should the laborers on the building not get their pay, they could claim lien on both land and building, which would have priority of the mortgage. The doubtful constitutionality of such a provision did not deter the House from passing it, but it shocked the legal and moral sense of the Council to such an extent that they amended the section so as to provide that any mortgage or judgment lien on record prior to the creation of the mechanic's lien should have preference over the latter. The Council made numerous other amendments in the bill, some of them of a somewhat radical character. In fact, it met with a general overhauling in the upper branch. What the House will do with the amendments the Council has made in this bill remains to be seen.

The House has a habit of acting on any measure before it with a promptness which borders on rashness, and it waded through a long list of measures on third reading yesterday, passing some and killing others with remarkable dispatch. It is well up with its work, and today's session will leave not a very large number of bills awaiting final action.

The fire and police bill continues to be a remarkably fruitful subject of discussion among members and in the lobby. Today its author had a reading of it in company with a number of gentlemen who were interested in it, and it was to come up as special order at 4 p. m. today, in the House, on Council amendments.

The council held a session this morning and met again this afternoon. At the forenoon session a large amount of business was transacted, and the Council, like the House, is showing a disposition to rush through the calendar. The House, however, is more nearly up with its work than is the Council. The latter body proceeds with more deliberation than does the House.

The militia bill has passed the Council and it is a foregone conclusion that Utah is to have a military system, as the Governor is reported to be quite willing to accept the title of commander-in-chief, which office he will hold, with reference to the militia.

DAVIS STAKE CONFERENCE.

The quarterly conference of the Davis Stake of Zion was held at East Bountiful on Saturday and Sunday, March 3rd and 4th, 1894. There were present Elders F. D. Richards and H. J. Grant, of the Council of the Apostles, Elders John W. Hess and J. H. Grant, of the Stake presidency, ten members of the High Council, with one exception all the Bishops of the various wards in the Stake, and notwithstanding the bad weather and wretched roads the Tabernacle was filled to its utmost capacity all through conference.

Elders F. D. Richards and H. J. Grant in their addresses to the Saints were filled with the Spirit of God, and they gave counsel and instructions which if put into practice by the Saints will make us better men and women.

Elder John W. Hess gave a brief report of the condition of the Stake, saying the Saints generally were living their religion. Superintendent Nathan T. Porter reported the Sunday schools in the Stake as being in an excellent condition, there being a marked improvement in the year that is past. The general and Stake authorities were presented and unanimously sustained.

On Sunday afternoon Elder John W. Hess of Farmington was set apart as President of the Davis Stake of Zion (vice Wm. R. Smith deceased) and Joseph H. Grant of West Bountiful was set apart as first counselor to President Hess. These brethren were set apart under the hands of Elders Richards and Grant; also Elder James G. Wood, ordained a High Priest and set apart as first counselor to Bishop David Cook, of the South Hooper ward.

Last but not least, much praise is due to Professor Edward Thomas and the members of the East Bountiful choir for the excellent singing and music rendered by them during conference. Altogether it was a very enjoyable time, and will be long remembered by those that were present and listened to the words of encouragement and counsel given. JOHN J. SMITH, Clerk.

EAELEST NATIVE UTONIANS.

TOQUERVILLE, Washington county, Utah, February 23, 1894.

There was an inquiry put forth. Who was the first boy born in Salt Lake valley? And as I was about to answer it, I found in the News of February 20, 1894, the answer from Taylorsville of February 10 which is correct. My child, a girl, was born August 9th, 1847, on Monday, at 4 a. m., on the Temple block. There were three other girls born and then Brother Lorenzo D. Young's boy came along, being the first boy; and he has the right of precedence of all boys born in the valley.

Very respectfully yours,

JOHN STEELE.

A telephone company has been organized to connect Albuquerque, Cochiti, Cerrillos, San Pedro and Santa Fe with talking wire. The company, it is said, has ample capital for the enterprise.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

LONDON, Feb. 26.—The four hundred marines now stationed at Chatham have been ordered to be in readiness to proceed to Bathurst, West Africa, to take part in the expedition against the slave traders.

NEW YORK, Feb. 26.—A Herald special from Rio confirms the reports of the sinking of the rebel warship Jupiter in Rio bay last Thursday. A shell exploded in the boiler-room and set fire to the powder magazine, which blew up and sank her. The entire crew perished.

VIENNA, Feb. 26.—A riotous demonstration of the unemployed took place today. A meeting was held, at which about 1,000 were present. The unemployed, after listening to several riot addresses, became uproarious and many attempted to march through the streets singing revolutionary songs.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.—The remains of the Kearsarge will be raised from Roncador reef if the House committee on naval affairs has its way. Today the committee voted to report favorably the bill of Blair, of New Hampshire, but was more generous than Blair proposed. While his bill would appropriate $30,000, the committee decided to raise the sum to $45,000, with a proviso that the wrecking company shall receive not more than $10,000 if the attempt is a failure.

LONDON, Feb. 27.—The jury in the suit of Victoria Woodhall against the trustees of the British Museum for libel for keeping at the Museum two books touching on the Beecher-Tilton scandal, found the books libellous, and assessed a fine of twenty shillings.

NEBRASKA CITY, Feb. 27.—E. T. White, one of the parties who recently hanged in effigy J. Sterling Morton and son, Carl M. Morton, was today found guilty of criminal libel. The penalty is $500 fine and six months in the county jail.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 27.—Decidedly the most racy chapter in the bulky volume of Hawaiian testimony is Lieutenant Young's description of the last days of the monarchy. Lieutenant Young was an officer of the Boston, and attended the closing ceremonies of the Hawaiian parliament in his official capacity at the request of Captain Wilkes. Lieutenant Young's description of the scene is picturesque in the extreme. He said: "I was shown the seat assigned me in the legislative hall, a little to the left, and in front of the rostrum, where the speaker used to sit, and which the queen used when she read her proclamation.

"I believe it was about the funniest affair I ever saw in my life—a circus. The queen looked at me rather savagely, and did not return my salutation with any cordiality at all. I noticed that she acted in a peculiar way. First, when she was reading her proclamation I thought she had a little stage fright, but in the reception room I saw that she was under the influence of stimulants, in fact, drunk. There is no question in my mind about it at all."

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 28.—The question to open the Uintah and Uncompahgre reservations in Utah to settlement is under consideration by Acting Secretary of the Interior Sims. The amount of land involved is estimated at 4,000,000 acres. It is rich in valuable minerals. There are 400,000 acres asphaltum land.

LEICESTER, Mass., Feb. 28.—The fishing schooner Henrietta, which left for the banks of New Foundland November 3rd, is given up for lost. She has not been heard from since January 3rd. It is supposed she foundered in the gale on February 12th. She had fourteen men on board.

BALTIMORE, Feb. 28.—Joe. Donjan, who sent threatening postal cards to Vice President Stevenson, was tried in the United States district court today on a charge of violating the postal laws. The jury, after a brief consideration, returned a verdict of guilty, and Judge Morrison sentenced Donjan to the penitentiary for eighteen months.

CHARLESTON, Va., March 1.—Dispatches from the scene of last night's fight between the striking miners and non-union men in Wyant's Eagle mine, say that many of the attacking miners were drunk and clamorous. The attacked men replied with vigor to the assailants' fire. It is said that not more than a hundred yards separated them. It is said that three of Wyant's men were killed, but this is contradicted. The Fayette county sheriff was on the ground with fifty deputies but did not feel able to cope with the rioters, so he called for troops. Wyant's men are furious, it is reported, and are anxious for another battle.

OAXACA, Mexico, March 1.—News has been received from the town of Itzahuaca that bandits led by a desperado named Mortira, attacked the town for the purpose of pillaging the stores and residences. The authorities resisted. In the conflict the mayor of the town, one policeman and eight bandits were killed.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., March 1.—Early this morning Moore Baker and William Thompson, negroes, entered the home of John Baker, a wealthy farmer supposed to have a large sum of money in his house, near Franklin Park, six miles west of here, for the purpose of robbery. Being discovered by Mr. Baker, who was sitting up with a sick child, the robbers killed both her and the child with an axe. Baker, hearing the noise, sprang from his bed and shot one negro dead and fatally wounded the other with an axe, but not until the robbers sprang at him and cut his nose off his face. The news was brought here by a man who came to summon a coroner.

The negro, Baker, was only eighteen years of age and brought up in Farmer Baker's family. It was he who put up the plan of robbery.

SING SING, March 1.—A large crowd awaited the arrival of the train bearing John Y. McKane to prison, which arrived here at 3 o'clock this afternoon. McKane and his custodians walked to the prison gate, followed by reporters. McKane passed through the prison gate to the office of Warden Durston, where he was received by Assistant Clerk Westlake.

Sheriff Butler produced the commitment and handed it to Westlake, who said to McKane: "Your term is six years."

Westlake then wrote on the document, "Four years and three months," indicating the net limit of McKane's sentence, less the commutation for good conduct.

The customary questions were then put to McKane. He was then taken into the prison barber shop and his mustache and imperial quickly shaven off. He was then given a convict's suit, which he put on himself. No cell was assigned him. He will for the present be in what is known as the idle ranks.

WASHINGTON, March 1.—The last struggle in the House over the Bland bill for the coinage of the silver seigniorage and silver bullion in the treasury was ended today by the passage of the bill by a vote of 167 to 180.

An analysis of the vote by which the bill passed shows that 141 Democrats, 19 Republicans and 8 Populists, a total of 168, voted for it, and 79 Republicans and 50 Democrats, a total of 129, voted against it.

Loud cheers and hand-clapping greeted the final announcement of the victory won by the advocates of the measure.

DENVER, March 1.—The Utah & Los Angeles Air Line Construction company was incorporated today with a capital stock of $100,000, and the following incorporators: Geo. E. Hicks, of New York; George P. Evans, of Plainfield, N. J., and W. R. Preble and E. A. Lewis, of New York. The object of the company is to construct an air line from Utah to Los Angeles. The principal office of the company will be in Denver.

JACKSONVILLE, Fla., March 1.—At 3:51 this afternoon, the jury in the case against James J. Corbett, charged with violating the laws of Florida by engaging in a prize fight, retired to make up their verdict.

Sixteen minutes later the jury returned and the foreman handed the verdict to the state's attorney, who read:

"We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty."

SING SING, N. Y., March 3.—John Y. McKane was put in the tailor shop this morning to learn the trade.

CALCUTTA, March 2.—Finance Minister Westlake announced at yesterday's vice regal council that the deficit amounted to 35,000,000 rupees. The new duties proposed would leave 20,000,000 rupees unprovided for. The minister said there was some doubt as to the actual proceeds from the duties, especially on silver. The bill proposed by Westlake was referred to a select committee, which will sit daily and make report on the 10th of the month.

TACOMA, Wash., March 1.—It is claimed that smugglers are actively at work, and they have imported thousands of dollars worth of opium, and landed hundreds of coolies in the past sixty days. A local paper publishes a statement that the smugglers, when hard pressed by the custom officers, had thrown their living cargo into the sound, putting chains and balls on the coolies' legs to insure their bodies going to the bottom.

MINNEAPOLIS, March 1.—Philo Schleg, ex-teller of the Bank of Minneapolis, practically completed his confession of his gigantic steal from the bank, admitting the embezzlement of $123,000. One strange feature of the case is that he robbed the bank of $50,000 prior to January 1, 1893. The bank people discovered this, but Schleg was re-employed at an increased salary, and got away with an additional $73,000. Schleg implicates Mrs. Floyd and her son Frank, now on trial.

WASHINGTON, March 1.—The following cablegram was received at the state department this afternoon from the City of Mexico:

"Just heard from Willson; temperature normal; general condition good; convalescence sure if not imprudent, but slow; needing good nourishment and rest; out of all danger.

CRITTENDEN, Consul General."

EUGENE, Or., March 2.—Albert Moss and father, living on a farm near here, quarreled last night, and Albert Coleman, a neighbor, took sides with the father. Later young Moss went to Coleman's house and shot and killed Coleman's married daughter, wounded another daughter, fatally shot Coleman and then suicided.

BARBOURSVILLE, Ky., March 2.—It is reported from Harlan county that Len Tye, the negro who murdered Miss Bryant near Williamsburg a year ago, recently returned and kidnapped a farmer's daughter and kept her sequestered in the woods till discovered by hunters. They waited for his return and proceeded to skin him alive. Before he was dead the girl built a fire on his head and he was roasted alive. It is said he confessed the murder of Miss Bryant and the kidnapping of three other girls in Kentucky and Tennessee, keeping them sequestered till they died of ill treatment and exposure.

LONDON, March 3.—Gladstone, as the guest of the queen at Windsor Castle, rose early and took a constitutional in the grounds. He looked well and was in the highest spirits.

Later in the day the members of the privy council left for Windsor, and on the arrival of the council a meeting took place. Though no official announcement of the fact was made, it is understood Gladstone officially tendered his resignation of the premiership.

After the departure of the minister, the queen sent her private secretary to London to summon Lord Roseberry, Gladstone's probable successor, to Windsor. Roseberry left for his destination at 4 p. m.

WASHINGTON, March 3.—The number of railway accidents of late years, in which railway mail clerks have lost their lives, has given rise to many plans to provide for disabled clerks and the families of the victims of the accidents. Representative Wheeler, Ill., has introduced a bill to create a relief fund by taxing the salaries of the clerks one per cent, the sums to be retained in the treasury and placed in some depository of public money. Pensions from the fund are to be granted the disabled clerks at these rates: For the first class, $360; second class, $410; third class, $460; fourth, $500; fifth, $610. Widows or minor children of clerks who have been killed in the service are to receive a sum equal to one year's salary, and clerks retired after twenty years' service because of age or infirmities, are to be eligible for pensions.

WASHINGTON, March 3.—The annual distribution of seeds by the department of agriculture, in response to personal applications, has been discontinued for the present season. Hereafter the distribution will be made at the direction of congressmen. Secretary Morgan does not believe in the wholesale distribution of seeds and has submitted an estimate asking for an appropriation of only $35,000 against $135,000 appropriated for the current year. The amount asked is for the purchase, propagation and distribution of rare and improved seeds, buds, etc., for experimental purposes only, and the distribution is to be made by the secretary at his discretion.

ST. JOSEPH, Mo., March 2.—Engineer McKinney of the Rock Island, saved his company a heavy loss tonight. Passenger train No. 18, east-bound, Conductor J. A. Weener, left the Union Pacific depot at 7:25. As the train glided into a cut three miles east of here a red light flashed across the track.

McKinney saw several men with guns and it flashed through his mind that they were robbers. He pulled the throttle wide and jumped down into the bottom of the cab, not a minute too soon. The robbers fired a volley into the engine and cab, but hurt no one.

The train dashed through a shower of bullets, the bandits firing into the coaches as they passed. When the train reached Stockbridge it was found that over 100 bullets had hit it.

EL PASO, Tex., March 2.—Hugh Brice, who arrived from Mexico this morning, tells a great story of wrong and suffering. He says four years ago he was imprisoned for the murder of a man of whom he never heard and who died two years before he reached Mexico. He was thrown into prison and his feet chained. He was not allowed to speak to an American and could not talk Spanish. All his letters were intercepted. He was never given a trial, and secured his liberty by giving the mayor of Puebla, Mexico, where he was confined, $800, and the chief of police $1000. He is going to Washington to press his claim for damages. He claims to be a nephew of Senator Brice.

DENVER, March 2.—The legislature adjourned sine die at 11:30 tonight. The bill providing for the redemption of land sold under trust deeds was passed. The chattel mortgage amendments were defeated.

MONTEVIDEO, March 2.—The two houses of Parliament met today to elect a president to succeed Dr. Hersir Obea, whose term expired March 1st. The balloting resulted in the election of Senor Ellauri by a majority of 54 votes. Senor Ellauri was president of the republic in 1873.

Ellauri has declined to accept the presidency.

HERMOSILLO, Mex., March 2.—Forty braves of the Yaqui tribe are creating consternation among the settlers of the upper Yaqui valley. They have raided the ranches, burned buildings, destroyed crops and driven off cattle and horses. A few days ago they murdered a ranchman named Torres because he offered resistance when they attacked his ranch.

BOZEMAN, Mont., March 4.—Several gold, silver, copper and iron mines near here have just been purchased by George W. Ballou, who represents a syndicate of New York capitalists.

The price paid is $1,000,000. The mines will be extensively developed and large concentrating works erected.

LONDON, March 4.—A dispatch from Bathurst, capital of the British colony of Gambia, says that the column of the West Indian regiment has captured Dusamvalla, a stockade native village near Bathurst, after slight resistance. Later the natives returned and attacked the British and severe fighting followed. The natives were finally repulsed with heavy loss. Nine soldiers were wounded.

WASHINGTON, March 4.—Minister Mendonca has received the following cable message from the minister of the interior at Brazil:

"The elections were perfectly tranquil, and elected by a large majority Dr. Prudente De Moraes, president, and Manuel Vitorino, vice president."

RIO DE JANEIRO, Feb. 26, via Montevideo, March 4.—The reports of the loss of the rebel transport Venus have been confirmed, but the details are yet meager. On Friday morning the armed rebel transports Jupiter, Marte and Venus opened a bombardment against the government batteries and quite a lively fire was exchanged. Suddenly there was a terrific roar heard above the booming of the guns, and it was seen, as the smoke cleared away, that an explosion had occurred on the Venus. The vessel had been torn in half and almost immediately the stern half went to the bottom. The bow half was on fire, and in a few minutes the flames were raging furiously. This portion of the Venus floated for half an hour and then went down.

DENVER, March 3.—There have been stories for some time about the wholesale traffic in girls who have been sent to mining camps. Mrs. Julian White, who conducts an employment agency, has been arrested, charged with acting as agent for Doyle's dance house in Cripple Creek. One of the girls sent there says her business was to wear décolleté dresses and coax patrons to buy beer. Mrs. White denies the charges.

SAN ANTONIO, March 4.—Ben H. Sanford, a ranchman of Presidio county, arrived here today and states that there is much excitement among the people of that section over the discovery of a rich vein of gold. The find is located in the extreme lower part of the county, in a mountainous district.

LONDON, March 5.—The Queen's speech proroguing the parliament was purely formal, only fifteen lines in length. Lord Roseberry spent the morning conferring with the cabinet.

A report apparently based on this conference says that John Morley will continue as chief secretary of Ireland. It is said to be definitely settled that Earl Kimberley, secretary of state for India, will succeed Roseberry as secretary of state for foreign affairs.

DENVER, March 5.—Geo. M. Norion, one of the most prominent mining experts in the West, was found dead in bed this morning. It is attributed to a severe asthmatic attack and fatty degeneration of the heart. The deceased went from Rochester, N. Y., in 1865 to Virginia City, Nevada, where he became famous as the "boy broker." He was a protegee of John W. Mackay and at 25 years of age was made superintendent of the Comstock lode.

Written for this Paper.

WHAT IS THERE IN IT?

It is not now remembered how many schools of medicine took part in the late controversy, consequent on proposed legislation; but some seven or more (if memory serves) claimed the privilege of ministering to all "the ills that flesh is heir to." The more fierce the contention, however, the more the spirit of rivalry and professional maintenance seemed to come to the front. The idea as to who had the most knowledge of the human system; as to who knew best the nature and effect of medicines; as to what would most assuredly secure for a patient a return to health and life, was not in the question at all, apparently.

Civilized methods seem to be less like common sense than those of "the heathen Chinese," of whom it is asserted that they employ their physicians to keep them in health, and that when sickness comes remuneration suddenly ceases. By this procedure all effort is exercised in a preservative direction.

The very controversy itself demonstrates that the practice of medicine is not as yet an exact science; in other words, it is still in the experimental stages, from which it may never fully emerge.

There was no doubt as much sarcasm as truth in the saying attributed to Voltaire, that the physician's art consists "in the supplying of element of which he knows nothing, to bodies of which he knows less." But this is surely an error, for those who have made any subject a life-long study must have acquired more than an empirical acquaintance with the et ceteras of their profession. One thing, however, has often been noted by observers, that is, the frequency of change of medicine to a person who is sick. Surely the assimilating processes of the human system are not so rapid as such change (daily, sometimes more often) would seem to suggest, and where there is quite a degree of confidence in the profession, the query is not infrequent: Can the most keen observer tell the action of any drug, and under similar circumstances prescribe the same, and predict the results with the absolute certainty of applied science in all other directions? Can it be told beyond controversy whether the continued and changing drench of the allopathist, or the infinitesimal titration of the homeopathist effected the cure of any patient? Or did nature and nursing, spite of schools, by her own inherent forces of recuperation achieve the final issue—health?

There has been a way made known by which "health will come to the navel and marrow to the bone." But this did not come from the schools. No man teaching that science got his diploma from any college. The One who fashioned the body "according to His own image," prescribed the regime, and even pointed out the remedy for unwitting violations of the prescribed conditions. Yet ignorance, tradition and anxiety, with triune force, press weak, faithless humanity in its worry and fear to seek the "magicians and soothsayers," and confidence in them is paramount, while hecatombs of the human race annually demonstrate that they are not all-powerful in checking the ravages of disease, or setting at naught the claims of death, until from sheer old age and decrepitude man is wasted away! While Professor Playfair declared that an immense proportion of the diseases of humanity were preventable, he might also have declared that vast hosts have been pushed from earth's stage by the mistakes and malpractice of professionals. The basic idea of the homeopathist appears to involve a great truth, (whether established or otherwise the writer cannot say); that is, the providing of "a specific for every disease." If this is true, it but needs experience to determine that character, then apply the remedy.

Humanity is in a similar dilemma spiritually. There are conditions both of spiritual health and disease. There are professional physicians in countless numbers and of diverse schools. These acknowledge that religion is an essential element of human nature; that according to its activity or otherwise, its perversion or proper training, depends not only true religious life, but the fruits thereof as seen in the moral, social, political and financial affairs of a state or nation; that upon the education of this sentiment all other interests swing. But while acknowledging the vast importance of this cult, there is a development of schools, agreeing as to the patient and the disease, yet as to the remedy "as far apart as the poles." Each school administers its dose; each looks upon its associate laborer as more or less of a charlatan and an empiric; and just as in the medical world there are those who claim that all disease is in the blood and that their nostrum will purify the vital fluid, so in the religious world there are nostrums (we would not say quacks as well); for one prescribes antiquity, another authority, another faith, another baptism, another organization, and so on through the entire series of medicated detail, with as much rivalry and contention as can be found in politics, finance or physics.

As the body is in the express image of Deity, so is the spirit the product of the some overruling Head. As He provided for the well-being of the lower and more transitory organization, so analogy would assume—and rightfully—that He provided for the higher. But from the Divine materia medica, men in their own wisdom have selected individual element, have applied that to all conditions until "the head is sick and the whole heart faint," and "there is none that doeth good, no not one." While the parallel may not in every feature be perfect and complete, there can be no hesitancy in declaring that the Divine prescription can alone bring restoration; that even well intending so-called administrators may have said unto them, "Physician, heal thyself!"

Just as men have wondered at the rival schools of practice, and, while allotting to each a measure of truth, have believed that out of confusion and contrariety there would arise somewhere the Divine Eclectic; so in the religious world, some in all ages have believed that from "the confusion of tongues" there would yet come the pure language, or, setting figure aside, that sectarianism would prove itself unworthy and unreliable, and that then the panacea of the restored Gospel would be introduced for the full and complete salvation of the human race!

Now, men may have accomplished good who were associated with all schools of medicine, as men have done good who were not allied with any. And so in the moral and spiritual world, men have done good in connection with all organizations, as men have done good in art, science, literature and general thought, and yet belonged to none; while reason, revelation, and some school theories claim to have or look forward to that divine order which, accepted and practiced, implies inevitable regeneration.

The Divine method of securing the vigor, elasticity and ripeness of the physical man may not be accepted, or if deemed worthy of consideration, the inspirational origin thereof may be eliminated; in the same way that the Gospel may be accepted as sustained of historic books, but its re-revelation through Joseph Smith officially, may be utterly scouted and denied. But, to use a half vulgar expression, "the proof of the pudding is not in chewing the string"—not in accepting the theory, but in giving one or other the absolute vitality of practical application and life. Hearty acceptance or revealed theory as to a promise made in regard to the body, leads to obedience, more or less implicit; and the same style of acceptance of revealed religious truth is only satisfied by proof. But once proved, all forms of man's device, all organizations howsoever old or potent, all claims, whether of antiquity or other quality; all doctrines, no matter how plausible, are subjected to unfailing scrutiny, contrast and ultimate reflection if inharmonious with that already tested and established.

Some attribute this mental stability to bigotry, to an overweening confidence in leaders or self. They say that this asserted knowledge of right is in violation of all charity. But there can be no misunderstanding here; truth is eternal, truth brings its own testimony; it comes to the receptive man "in power and much assurance;" and thus it is neither bigotry nor uncharitableness to vindicate the known and reject the unknown; to prefer Divine order, Divine methods and Divine results, to uncertainty or assumption, no matter how much wealth, talent, influence, or education may be associated therewith. To be widespread and popular is not argument; to have simply been the promoter of good is not complete logic; to possess vast organization and the magic of numbers is not absolute evidence of truth or right; and to prosper and grow is not full evidence of Divine approval. In fact, this class of truth is more likely to be rejected than received. Its representatives are more likely to be contemned and despised than to be honored. For "the servant is in no wise greater than his master," though destiny will some day make Truth and all its lovers immortal and triumphant as itself!

THE OLD notion that the opal brings bad luck to its possessor has received fresh proof in the arrest of a sleek Mexican who tried to squeeze through the custom house with about a thousand of the gems hidden in the lining of his coat.

GOVERNOR WEST'S SPECIAL MESSAGE

The following plainly worded message of advice and accompanying documents were sent by Governor West to both branches of the Legislature Thursday, March 1st.

To the Legislative Assembly:

We are confronted by a very grave and important situation, calling for our earnest consideration, and imperatively demanding such immediate action as will, if possible, afford relief. Hundreds of honest and deserving working men are without work, and notwithstanding their utmost endeavors are unable to obtain employment. In many instances they and their families are suffering for want of the bare necessities of life. The conditions are such that they cannot be wholly met and provided for by individual efforts, nor those of the charitable associations. These have been invoked and have nobly responded, but their utmost efforts have proved inadequate to meet the weighty and constantly increasing demands made upon them. Their efforts have been further supplemented and assisted by those of the city and county authorities. The distress, however, is so far-reaching that the combined action has been able to relieve but a small portion of the suffering.

The conduct of the working men during the present trying period has been admirable. Orderly and quietly they have registered at the employment bureaus and patiently waited for their work. No riotous or unseemly demonstrations have been made, but they have acted wisely and well, for themselves and the community, by their peaceable bearing and moderation. There is, however, a limit to human suffering and endurance and when reached, men become desperate, and can no longer be guided by reason, or listen to the counsel of prudence and in their mad rage they sometimes sacrifice themselves to destroy others. Every effort should be made to prevent any such lamentable condition arising in our midst.

After the most earnest and serious consideration, I am of the opinion that a full and complete remedy can be had not only without injury, but with actual benefit to the Territory.

A capitol building is a necessity and must sooner or later be erected. That portion of it, commensurate with our present needs, if put under construction now, would give employment to many of the needy. It would make it necessary for the city of Salt Lake (which has already signified the purpose and willingness to do so) to grade and open all the approaches to and surrounding the Capitol; with the opening and grading of streets, the car lines would extend their tracks, and from these sources work could be furnished to all the unemployed in the city. The money for the carrying on of this work could be taken from the general revenue and the Territory issue bonds for those of its liabilities it is authorized by congressional enactment to incur.

Five per cent bonds of the Territory can be readily disposed of at a premium. The introduction of this money from the outside into the Territory would have a healthful effect in giving an impetus to a revival of business that would inure to the benefit of all.

For your consideration, I enclose herewith letters from the president of the territorial board of relief, the chairman of the General Relief society, the superintendent of the Salt Lake county and city relief work, and the secretary of the Workingmen's association, which briefly outline our pressing necessities.

The requirements of the Territory, in the near future, will demand the doing of this work, and why not undertake it now when our citizens can be so greatly benefited by it? I feel assured that the generous people of Utah will heartily approve the just exercise of the power reposed in you, in providing this necessary and beneficial work for the Territory and its needy and deserving laborers.

CALEB W. WEST.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, Salt Lake City, March 1st, 1894.

Copy of letter from the president of the board of relief. (Original sent to the Legislative Council.)

To His Excellency, Gov. Caleb W. West:

My dear sir—In answer to your inquiry of February 28th, having entered upon a systematic registration of the unemployed, bona fide residents, I beg to report 1,708 names upon our list. We are hourly adding to this number. Many gray haired men with families are pleading for days work, who have possibly been able to get along in the past without days labor; in addition to this, the relief committee has sent us calls for work for men whose families are sick and destitute, which we cannot reach. That you may more fully understand the situation, I call to your attention a case that has just come to our notice. A man is sick himself, whose family is sick and is in a destitute condition, who appears on our list as No. 1704, which we cannot hope to reach.

As far as we can judge scarcely a man has applied for work who is not deserving and in absolute need. Fully 80 per cent of those applying for work are married men with families; the amount of destitution in our midst is something appalling. The $2,000 appropriation to be expended on the Capitol grounds will not give even temporary relief to the many who are actually suffering and are willing to work.

Very truly yours,

WENDELL BENSON,
President of Board of Relief.

Copy of letter from the chairman of the General Relief society. (Original sent to the Legislative Council.)

March 1, 1894.

Governor Caleb W. West, City:

Dear Sir:—The General Relief committee has given employment to 1,304 men up to this date. It has on its books the names of about 1,500 men who are out of employment; a large majority of whom are, in my opinion married and bona fide residents of Salt Lake City. I herewith enclose the statement of the committee showing the amount of donations received and the disposition of the same up to February 13th, 1894.

I think there will be need of aid being given to the unemployed for some time to come. Our committee has about exhausted all of its resources.

Very respectfully,

ARTHUR L. THOMAS,
Chairman.

GENERAL RELIEF COMMITTEE.

Its statement of donations, cash and goods, and number employed:

Total cash donations received by the committee to February 13, 1894.....$1,381 85
(This does not include proceeds of Tabernacle concert.)
Amount of drugs received..... 35 00
Amount of flour received..... 194 50
Amount of groceries received ..... 165 00
Amount of meat received ..... 93 00
Amount of clothing received..... 100 00
Amount of general merchandise received..... 460 65
Number employed—
Men on boulevard..... 873
Women sewing..... 293
Amount paid to men..... $2,356 50
Amount paid to women..... 165 80

The committee has issued 1073 orders for coal, provisions, etc.

Yesterday the committee received $300 from the public school teachers of Salt Lake City. They have also received $120 from Mrs. George A. Lowe, the proceeds of her charity reception, and $43.50 from Captain Richards, of Fort Douglas, the contribution of Company G.

Copy of letter from the superintendent of the Salt Lake county and city relief work. (Original sent to the Legislative Council.)

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah,

February 28, 1894.

His Excellency, Caleb W. West, Salt Lake City, Utah:

Dear Sir—in reply to your inquiry of even date, I herewith hand you statement of amount of money expended; number of men and teams to date; number of loads of gravel hauled, and number of men and teams on list awaiting employment.

Amount of money expended to date (pay roll of the 27 inst., approximated) $10,611.10 for filing up Eighth Ward square.

Number of men employed up to date, 562 and 223 teams; a few of them have been working twice.

Number of loads of gravel hauled up to date, 8,253.

There are now 1,141 laborers and 100 teams on our list awaiting employment.

Hoping the above will meet with your approval, I remain,

Yours most respectfully,

HERMAN BAMBERGER.

Copy of letter from secretary of Workingmen's association (original sent to the Legislative Council.)

SALT LAKE CITY, Feb. 28, 1894.

To His Excellency Caleb W. West, Governor of Utah:

My Dear Sir—My attention has been called to Mr. Benson's letter to you. I desire to add the statements contained are substantially and wholly correct, and possibly fail to portray all.

Very respectfully,

J. B. RAWLINGS,

Secretary Workingmen's Association.
(Copy of letters attached to letter from secretary of the Workingmen's Association.)

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah,

Feb. 28th, 1894.

J. B. Rawlings, Esq.:

This is Mr. Charley Parks, he has a team, he is hard up, has had no work all winter; he has a family of five. Please see that he is put to work, and oblige. Yours, etc.,

H. E. CARTER.

W. Johnson lives on Seventh street, between I and J; is a carpenter, has a sick wife and young babe, has been out of work for months. Alfred White lives on Fifth street between K and L, has a wife and four small children. Two of the children sick. Has had only six days work since October. Both men are sober and deserving.

CORNELIA PADDOCK.

Secretary Utah Association of Charities.

HIS FATHER'S BIRTHPLACE.

PATRICROFT, England, Feb. 10, 1894.—Passing through Salford, Manchester, a few days ago, I observed placarded on a wall a large poster, the headlines of which read as follows: "Malton Steeplechase! Excursion to York and Malton." For months I have been desirous of visiting Burythorpe (near Malton), the birthplace of my father. February 1st was the day of the excursion. Early that morning I took the train at Patricroft for Manchester, and there procured a ticket for the trip, a distance of ninety miles. A good sized crowd, mostly sporting characters, gathered around on platform No. 6 at the large and spacious station, waiting for the train which would shortly arrive from the north.

Promptly at 8:50 a.m., the time advertised, all being seated, we wended our way onward. During the night snow had gently fallen, the ground being white with a thin coat, making the aspect appear to be an uninviting one, but it was not long ere the sun shone and the snow began to waste away. A considerable portion of the journey in Yorkshire, being in a hilly country, we passed through several tunnels underground, which part of the railroad must have been expensive in building. The latter half of the journey to Malton (which is situated in the eastern part of Yorkshire) is mostly level land and is sparsely settled; it is a farming district. The climate is considered to be very healthy; the atmosphere being much clearer than in other parts of England. It is free from smoke and there is but little fog.

At 11:20 we arrived at the old city of York, twenty miles from Malton, where many tourists visit to view its ancient, looking buildings and take a glimpse at the many interesting sights. A few moments later the train again started, we took a passing glance at the old York cathedral, and at 12:20 arrived at our destination.

I resided in Malton once when a boy, thirty-four years ago, but was only there for a few weeks, and have forgotten almost all I ever knew about it. Emerging from the car at the station, the first thing to do was to inquire for the road to Burythorpe. The direction being pointed out, I was informed the distance was four miles. There being neither train, street cars nor vehicles going in that direction, I took shanks's pony and was soon on my way traveling uphill and downhill on a rough, wet road, the snow having melted. It was much harder to travel than I had been used to in and around Manchester, where the streets and roads are well paved. After traveling one mile I inquired concerning my journey, and was told it was still four miles; further along I was pleased to learn it was but two miles and a half; but after proceeding a considerable distance more I received the discouraging news that it was then four miles away. Suffice it to say that after traveling at a fair speed for over an hour and a half I at last reached my father's birthplace—Burythorpe.

The country is very thinly populated, it being a farming district, with here and there a small village. Who to enquire for was the first question on my mind. I had no address, knew no one, and felt myself placed in an awkward position. Burythorpe is a very small village, containing probably three dozen houses, a church, a chapel and a schoolhouse; and I must not forget to mention that, notwithstanding the small size of the village, it contains the usual commodity for "weary" travelers—a public house. It would be something strange in England to find even a little secluded village like Burythorpe without an alehouse. I have been informed, however, that there is a town named Saltaire, near Bradford, Yorkshire, which has no house where intoxicants are sold.

The village of Burythorpe has not made much progress since the birth of my father, seventy-six years ago. A few buildings have been torn down and rebuilt and a few new ones added. Taking a glance around a thought suggested itself to ask for the oldest settler. I enquired at the small postoffice close by, and was directed to go a short distance further and call upon Wm. Pickett, an old, grey-haired gentleman of eighty-five summers. Entering the house I found him busy preparing kindling wood. He received me kindly and invited me to be seated.

"I have come to see if you were acquainted with any of my relatives who at one time resided here."

"What is the name?"

"Aveson."

"What, Samuel Aveson?"

"That was my grandfather."

"Oh, yes, I was well acquainted with him. Why he was an excellent mower. In fact he could almost turn his hand to anything. He could build a stack of hay so nice you would think it was thatched. Oh, yes, I knew him well. Poor Sammy, he was killed in a well. I have almost forgotten about your father, though. Knew your grandmother, Ann Newlove, and your great grandmother, Catherine Aveson. You see I have lived here nearly all my lifetime."

After further conversation I inquired: "Would you mind going with me to the churchyard?"

"Yes, I'll go with you."

So taking his hat and walking stick we started out. It rained a little. The distance was short. The church, which was a newly-built structure, and a very substantial one, was located in an elevated position, and a good view of the country could be had.

"Where is the old church that was here when my father resided in the village?"

"Oh, that has been pulled down long since and this one erected in its place."

The old church, which for centuries had been the most prominent landmark in this part of the country, had been supplanted by a new one.

We strolled around the churchyard a few moments. There was a large number of newly-erected tombstones, but very few old ones could be seen. Taking a glance at the inscriptions I soon learned there were no names I was familiar with. One of the grave-stones contained as part of an inscription, "The beloved wife of William Peckitt."

"This is the remains of your wife, is it not?"

"No, it is not her; it's the same name, but my wife lies yonder," pointing out her grave. "She has been dead over forty years."

The poor old man, with a sad countenance, bent down his head; it recalled to his memory reminiscences of by-gone days when he and his wife lived happily together with their family. Like many other graves there was no tombstone over his wife's remains to mark the sacred spot.

A short distance from the church is the vicar's residence. We found the vicar at home; he was of a tall, gentlemanly appearance, probably 60 years old. We received a cordial reception. Asked to look at the records for genealogical purposes, he soon produced them, and gave me what information I required, without charge.

After this interview we called upon Wm. Lovedale, another old resident, 82 years of age. He lodged in the public house, was of a pleasant appearance, rather deaf, had a strong constitution, nothing apparently ailing him. In fact he looked as though he would live at least twenty years more. Seating myself on his right and Mr. Peckitt on his left, we had a pleasant chat about my relatives. He related incidents of the past of an interesting nature, making particular mention of my father.

"And so your father is dead," said Mr. Lovedale.

"Oh, no," said I, "he is still alive, but is very feeble."

I was shown the house where my grandfather lived, and where I suppose my father and the remainder of my grandfather's family were born. I bade the old gentlemen goodbye and started on my return to Malton. It was a very lonesome, unpleasant journey, rain and snow falling, and the roads sloppy and rough. On my way I arranged for a meal, which, after such a tedious journey, was as well appreciated as any I have enjoyed in England. Despite the inclement state of the weather the Malton steeplechases took place and the prizes were awarded the winners.

We left Malton at 6 o'clock that evening, arriving at my headquarters near 11 o'clock, and, although feeling tired, I had the assurance that it was a day well spent and one long to be remembered.

Since coming to England I have been anxious to learn concerning my uncle and aunt, Thomas and Amey (Aveson) Borland, who, when last heard from, resided in Scotland, at 135 Sydney street, Glasgow. While at Middlesbrough visiting my brother, I wrote to the above address, but never received an answer.

During a visit to Scotland, Brother B. M. Blackhurst made inquiries concerning them, and the following is an extract of a letter he sent me, dated Glasgow, Sept. 20, 1893:

"Arrived in Glasgow last night and went to hunt for your relatives. Today I found the place, but learned the folks were dead. Mr. Borland died about two years ago, and his wife died last year. They are buried in the Janeville cemetery. All their children are dead but one. I could not find where he lived."

R. A.

WESTERN NEWS ITEMS.

A Los Angeles drug firm has bonded the Stevens Borax mine at Calico for $50,000.

Boise City warrants which sold last year at 85 cents are now in demand at 95 cents.

Sunflower valley people at Hoehne, near Trinidad, Colo., have excluded liquor selling by local option.

The Union Pacific company will soon build a fine stone railroad depot 100x35 feet at Sydney, Neb.

Wood is being hauled in Bent county, Colorado, for a distance of fifty miles and sold for $4 and $5 a cord.

Johnson county, Wyoming, boasts of the only empty jail in the state. It has been vacant since the last term of court.

The Laramie (Wyo.) Boomerang says there is every probability that the Union Pacific company will erect a new depot within the next six months.

Geo. Mehl, a bright boy of Coxville City, Or., has made a steam engine entirely by his own hands. It is said that the little machine runs perfectly.

A small amount of snow on the Cumbres range in southern Colorado indicates a limited supply of water for the southern portion of the San Luis valley.

Manassas, in the San Luis valley, has become an important stock feeding point. Its farmers are very anxious to have a pork packing house established at Alamosa.

A portable sawmill is being put in above Elk City, Or. Its capacity is 400 feet per day and it will fill some alder and cedar contracts already made with San Francisco yards.

Al Oakley, a noted gambler and saloon man of San Bernardino, Cal., has joined the Salvation Army and is parading the streets and joining in their religious services.

Gunnison, Colo., ladies have pledged themselves to confine their purchases to their local stores and avoid sending money away to make purchases of merchandise.

A large tree felled by William Turner, of Dryden, Or., last week was the home of a badger, several hundred bats and a swarm of bees. The latter left a generous supply of honey.

Horses which formerly sold for $50 and $60 in Harney valley, Oregon, are now being sold for $20. Recently a band was sold for $10 a head to a man without money, to be paid for in two years.

Saguache announces the survey by the Empire Canal and Land company of canals and lateral ditches near Saguache for bringing under cultivation a large acreage of new land next spring.

New Castle, Cole, coal miners and operators have adjusted their long pending disputes by the miners agreeing to accept a 25 per cent reduction. A reduction in the price of coal has not been announced.

At Las Animas, Colo., the advance agents of a colony of Swedes arrived last week to select locations for a large party on the lands of the Colorado Farm, Land and Irrigation company, north of Las Animas.

A man named David Strothers has been awarded the contract for burying the poor of Spokane, Wash., at 90 cents "a case." That price seems to indicate the scarcity of money in Spokane.

At Montrose, Colo., the weekly consumption of cigars amounts to 2,400 or 208,000 a year or about $100 a week or $5,200 annually. It is now proposed to keep this money at home by the establishment of a cigar factory in Montrose.

The recent blockade of trains, caused by the severe storm in the mountains, was not without its pleasant side. While one of the trains was delayed at Reno, Nevada, a wedding took place in the Pullman drawing-room car of the train.

T. H. Sillsbee, a cattle man of San Diego, Cal., his mother and sister and Miss Lucy Smith, have arrived at Yuma, A. T., after a trip across the desert. While in camp at Black Butte, near the Cocopah mountains, they killed sixteen deer in two days.

One John N. Sherman, who died in Los Angeles county, Cal., some months ago, left a will containing some peculiar provisions. It requires that if there is any dissatisfaction among the heirs they must settle the matter by arbitration and without appeal to the courts.

In a recent drill by the Fort Canby (Wash.) life-saving crew the time occupied in the rescue of an imaginary shipwrecked sailor from a mast 200 yards distant was only two and one-half minutes from the time the captain and his men arrived on the ground.

Bad reports come from the region at the base of Medicine Bow mountain, southeast of Laramie, Wyo. Ice on the Laramie river is thirty inches thick and range cattle and horses are dying for water. Many sheep have been lost by the severe storms.

Melbourne, the "rain-maker," can have only $2,500 or $3,000 from the Cheyenne, Wyo., people for a specified amount of rain this year. The farmers decline to subscribe and the city people will not subscribe more than the above amount. It is said he will accept.

A year ago persons traveling over the Santa Fe between Albuquerque and El Paso, looking over the country, beheld barren wastes and dead cattle strewn along the line. Now, says an exchange, the scene has changed. Fat cattle are seen on every hand and plenty of grass.

At the Sisson (Cal.) hatchery no less than 8,500,000 young fish have been hatched this season. About 8,500,000 still remain on hand, and will be kept until they are a year old. Trout hatching will soon commence, and it is intended to handle this season about 2,500,000 eggs.

Wheatland, Wyo., the newly started colony ninety miles north of Cheyenne, has now 115 families located there. It is expected to loom into importance as a grain and potato growing colony during the present year.

The land is cheap, fertile and well irrigated.

Artesian water has been struck in Cochise county, A. T., by a man named McRae. The flow is 21,000 gallons in twenty-four hours. In addition to the value of the water, McRae will get $2,000 reward offered by the supervisors for a running well not more than 500 feet deep.

Colonel J. Blanco, chief of the Boundary Line Commission survey, has returned to Yuma, A. T., from the City of Mexico authorized to make the survey from the international boundary line to the gulf for the improvement of the navigation of the Colorado river.

During the year an average of 1,000,000 feet of lumber a month has been put out by Pasadena, Cal., lumber yards for use there. This gives 12,000,000 feet for the whole year (to December 31, 1893), which at an average price of $20 per 1,000 gives $240,000,000 as the total expenditure for building material of this kind during 1892.

The Laramie (Wyo.) Boomerang, learns that a pack of three wolves and two dogs are running together east of that city. Those who have observed the animals say that the dogs are the leaders of the pack and that they are much more ferocious than the wolves. The dogs approach the ranches in a fearless manner and bring the wolves up where they can do most damage.

The wickiup of Annie, a Shoshone maiden of Mound valley, with all its contents, consisting of clothing and her winter supply of flour and pine nuts, was destroyed by fire one day last week, says the Elko (Nevada) Independent. The people of the valley took up a subscription and raised sufficient money to start her in business again.

It has been another week of snow and blizzards (says the Mercur Mercur); consequently mining operations, with the exception of the producers and a few others, have been at a standstill, and we have little to report. At the Mercur, however, there is great activity. The experts and surveyors are busy, and will be for some time to come.

The champion tramp printer struck Yuma, A. T., recently, says an exchange, having footed it across the desert. He is independent of railroads and does not ask for anything but work. A roll of blankets, canteen, coffee pot and frying pan supplying him with food and lodging. He has walked all over the coast and says he can live comfortably on $3 a week.

Arrangements have been completed for the enlargement of the Chino, Cal., sugar factory and the addition of new machinery. The capacity will be increased to about 1,000 tons of beets per day. Nearly 10,000 acres will be planted to beets this year. The output of sugar last season was 7,550 tons. This will be increased to over 10,000 tons the coming season.

Denver has secured the great annual meet of the wheelmen of the country for that city. It is expected that 25,000 wheelmen will be present. Denver has 5,000 of its own. Arrangements will be made for a relay race from Washington, D. C., to Denver during the meet, to bring a message from Presdent Cleveland to the president of the L. A. W.

A dispatch from Newcastle to the Cheyenne (Wyo.) Leader says Finn miners named Thor, Hill and three countrymen came to Newcastle from Cambria. After indulging in drinks, they started homeward through a severe storm. Hill failed to reach home and was today found two miles west of this place, having taken the wrong road and perished in the storm.

The city trustees of San Bernardino, Cal., have passed a sweeping ordinance closing all classes of business on Sundays. The only businesses allowed to be prosecuted are hotels, restaurants, bath houses, retail drug stores, stables, railroad and telegraph offices, undertakers and physicians, street car lines and railroads, the sale of milk or bread for immediate use, printing and distributing newspapers.

The Idaho supreme court will consider an application for a writ of mandate to compel Alturas county to make a settlement with Elmore, Logan and Bingham counties in accordance with the provisions of the division act of 1889. The act in question provides for an apportionment of the debt of old Alturas on the basis of the assessed valuation of 1889. This Alturas has refused to do and the other counties have taken up the case.

A man named Phil Mixell met with an unusual accident at Idaho Springs, Colo., on Wednesday evening. While reading to his family, he reached up to pull the electric light a little nearer to him, when his first and second finger and thumb came in contact with an exposed portion of the wire. There was an instant aneuous flash, the wire was burned off and Mr. Mixell's thumb and fingers were roasted to the bone. A doctor was called and dressed the wound. The pain was almost intolerable.

Ed Morrell on Tuesday had his preliminary examination at Fresno on the charge of assisting Chris Evans, the notorious outlaw, to escape from jail last December. He assumed an air of indifference and showed no disposition to set up a defense. To all questions as to when he would be ready for trial and whether he wanted an attorney his answer was that the "court might suit its own convenience, as anything would do. Whatever pleases the court and the people," said he, "will please me, as I have nothing in particular to say about what you do with me."

Five years ago G. Scranton, an employee of the Pacific Express company at Horace, Kan., absconded with $2,000 of the company's money. He immediately went to Canada, and for the past four years was in Winnipeg, where he has been constantly under the eye of a detective. Thinking the matter had blown over, he left Canada and again sought this country. He procured a position as telegraph operator at Arkansas Junction, three miles from Leadville, Col., on the Midland railroad, where he has been working for the past month. A detective spotted him and he is now behind the bars.

Petitions are being circulated to be presented to President Cleveland asking for the release of Mrs. John Gatlin, now confined in the Wyoming state penitentiary. Mrs. Gatlin was convicted of taking articles from the Myeraville mail. The Cheyenne Sun says that several ladies from that section of the country were at the trial and spread broadcast stories about the pecculations of Mrs. Gatlin, and she became a figure of much interest to citizens hereabouts. When she was sentenced to the state penitentiary the ardor of these ladies cooled. They were very anxious until she was convicted and now they feel they might have been too enthusiastic.

Among the old records in the county clerk's office at Missoula, Montana, are many curiosities, and some of the old declarations of occupancy made before the land was surveyed in the Missoula and Bitter Root valleys are quite entertaining. One of the queerest documents, says the Anaconda (Montana) Standard, is a deed from Mary Craft to Tyler Woodward, in which for a consideration of $150 she transfers to "said party of the second part all my title and interest in a house and lots situated at Missoula mills in said county and Territory, the said house being the one in which Matt Craft was killed on the 22nd day of December, 1885, and now in my possession."

H. H. Fisher, a mechanic, is experimenting upon a new device for illuminated clocks, says the Stockton (Cal.) Mail. The object is to make clearer in the dark the time of night. Both the numerals and the hands are merely slots cut in galvanized iron disks, through which the light from behind the clock face shines. A small galvanized iron disk is placed in the center of the clock face. A slot is cut in it to represent the smaller hand of the clock, and as the disk revolves this hand indicates the hours. Between this disk and the circle of numerals there is a galvanized iron ring in which a slot is cut to represent the longer hand of the clock. This ring revolves independently of the disk, making one revolution every hour. The slot in it indicates the minutes. This minute hand cannot extend to the center of the clock face, because of the hour hand disk, but it is said that one will soon get used to the unusual appearance of the minute hand.

Helena, Montana, is agog over a story printed in a local paper. It brings to light a ruse employed by a Mr. Dilbert Bedford to palm off on her confiding husband a wail as his own child. The deception was complete for three months, and would never have been discovered but for the fact that the real mother of the child concluded that Mrs. Bedford was not a proper woman to bring up a girl baby. When she demanded the return of her baby the putative mother refused to give it up as her deception would thus be exposed. Then Julia Oleson, the real mother, who is a seamstress, went to Bedford and told him that the baby was hers and not Mrs. Bedford's nor his. Bedford went to Dr. Kellogg, whom he paid $84 for attendance upon his wife while she was pretending to be ill. The doctor admitted the truthfulness of Julia Oleson's story and he is now under arrest for getting money under false pretenses. Julia got out a writ of habeas corpus to recover her baby, but Mrs. Bedford and the cherub have both disappeared, though the officers think they can find them. Mrs. Bedford and Miss Oleson occupied adjoining wards in a lying-in-hospital. When the latter's baby was born it was at once transferred to Mrs. Bedford.

The Pima-Indian is taking naturally to hats, trousers, shoes and all the things that a decade ago he despised as frivolous and useless innovations, says the Phoenix (Ariz.) Gazette. He has tasted of the white man's canned salmon and has found it good. He has tasted of the white man's fire water, and he desires closer acquaintance with a people who can evolve so much tribulation and joy combined from a single peck of grain. He has even tried the plan of working a little, instead of loolling in the wattamotte wickiup while the squaw rustled for feed. The experiment of work has proved satisfactory, for did it not bring forth large white pieces of metal, which the white man was pleased to accept in payment for tobacco, and even for the water that brought back on a gallop the blithesome days of boyhood? And another thing to be considered is that the jackrabbit is becoming scarce, and the Pima who would have meat must raise it himself. They have not quite come to the point where the cows are kept for milking purposes, but they will get there before long. Within another decade will come a time when from the Pima nation may be picked many individuals who will bear almost every qualification that is deemed essential to American citizenship.

A variant youth, decorated in all the gorgeousness of Western romance, created quite a sensation at the Commercial hotel day before yesterday, says the Phoenix (Ariz.) Gazette. He was registered as a guest awaiting the arrival of some friends who are sojourning at Camp McDowell, and must have been reading Captain King's description of early life in Arizona. He is decidedly pretty, wears creased pants, flowing curls of a raven hue, and a broad-brimmed white felt hat. Although he is the personification of the parlor cowboy, gentle to submissiveness in the presence of the fair sex, but, oh! bad amongst the bad. His neighbors in the adjoining rooms have been considerably agitated at the demeanor and antics of this erratic young gentleman. His custom has been to bedeck himself in all the accouterments of border warfare, assume the attitudes of offense and defense before his bedroom mirror, holding dialogues with imaginary Indians, the "Kid" in particular. This rehearsal came to a sudden termination yesterday by the accidental discharge of his pistol. Some of the guests, on rushing to the scene, found a badly scared tenderfoot. His friends removed him to McDowell, where he can practice his proclivities to his heart's content without danger to his immediate neighbors.

Most excellent results have recently been obtained in beet cultivation, says the Lehi Banner, by planting and subsequently plowing under a green crop, such as peas. It is found by accurate calculation that nitrogen may be thus furnished to the soil at lower cost than is possible either by the use of barnyard manure or through chemical salts, such as sodic-nitrate, etc. About 20 tons of beets, averaging 18 per cent sugar to the acre, have been obtained by this special method of cultivation.

THE SCANDINAVIAN FATHERLAND.

Prepared from Special Cablegrams.

SWEDEN.

King Oscar has made a large donation to the Stockholm sloyd school.

No city in Europe has cleaner streets than Sweden's capital, says a Berlin paper.

The combined length of the Swedish railroad lines was about 5,500 miles at the end of 1893.

A railroad will probably soon be built between Hernösand and Sundsvall. The cost is estimated at 3,800,000 kronor.

The high tariff men have distributed campaign literature with a lavish hand in Stockholm and vicinity.

The French journalist, Hugues le Roux, is writing a book about Sweden, which will soon be published.

Judge Cedercrantz, the former chief judge of the Samoa islands, arrived at Stockholm the other day.

Thousands of people are without work in Norrland. Many are willing to work only for food and lodging.

The cost of running the high colleges and public schools of Sweden is more than 17,000,000 kronor a year.

The large clothing firm Edw. Anderson & Company, of Nyköping, has been forced to make an assignment.

The government has asked for an appropriation 679,300 kronor for the purchase of new rifles for the army.

According to a telegram the Crown Prince has arrived at Rome, where she will take a steamer for Egypt.

The parish of Raada in Vermland has no less than nine railroad depots, a larger number than any other parish in Sweden.

Thirteen large guns have been added to the Swedish artillery, and ten more will probably be added before next summer.

Baron V. C. Stjernstedt has been appointed colonel and commander-in-chief of the famous Vermland hunters' regiment.

Paul Segerberg, an old soldier, died at Ratan at the age of 101 years. Segerberg participated in the war against Russia in 1809.

The government has paid 2,000 kronor for a patent on a contrivance by which a mail box may be emptied into the mail bag in such a way that the operator cannot reach the mail matter.

The revenue derived from the tariff, the whisky tax and the surplus of the railroad earnings for the month of January amounted to $1,350,000 as compared with $1,231,000 for the same month last year.

In 1891 there was formed at the initiative of Mrs. Ramsey, a society for the care of epileptic idiot children. This society has opened a home for such children at Mariehäll, near Stockholm, which is conducted entirely by women, and is supported by voluntary contributions.

Sewing meetings, where society ladies are coming together in the afternoon for sewing, are very often held in Stockholm. A great many philanthropic establishments have emanated from them, being first started and afterwards partly supported on the proceeds from sales of things, worked at these meetings.

Mrs. Mathilda Svenson, of Ingårpsberg, the parish of Barkeryd, Smoland, celebrated her 100th birthday. She lives on a farm bought and given to her by her son, the rich New York banker, Swenson, who is said to be worth at least six million dollars, and undoubtedly is the richest Swede in the United States.

No private man in Sweden has more extensive hunting grounds than Baron Oscar Dickson has. His largest tract of land is in Jemtland, near Storlien, and comprises about 40,000 acres. When to this are added half a dozen smaller tracts of land and fishing grounds, it is evident, that Baron Dickson has far better chances as a Nimrod than most of the famous landlords of England.

Some novels by Anne Charlotte Leffler, later Duchess di Cajanello will soon be translated into English. Mrs. Leffler, who died some years ago, was a sister of Arthur Leffler, the royal Swedish commissioner to the Chicago World's Fair. She was one of the best of modern realistic authors, and was also very successful as a dramatist. Her characters are sharply defined and true to life, and her diction is remarkable for excellence of style.

The art of producing tar is very old in Sweden, and has been a remunerative occupation in many remote districts, but is nowadays carried on principally in the two most northern provinces of Norrland. During the winter the resinous timber is brought to the "tar-pit" where it is burnt during the following spring and summer. The prepared tar is floated in barrels down the river to the coast places, whence it is exported to foreign countries. Half of the entire production is shipped from Umea.

The Swedish movement-cure has by degrees been acknowledged as an excellent therapeutic, both at home and abroad. The Swedish gymnasts exercise their beneficial calling all over the civilized world, and the movement-cure has everywhere been called Swedish movements "when the intention is to show that it is really of intrinsic basis. It must, however, be confessed, that the scientific development of gymnastics has not kept pace with its otherwise rapid progress. As yet gymnastics as a science has only found Swedes undertaking new departures.

The free churches are drawing heavily upon the attendance of the state churches of Stockholm. Of the different free denominations the Baptists have six churches and a number of small circles, the Methodists four, the Mission Friends seven, the Adventists one, the Mormons one, the faith cure people one, the Swedenborgians two, the Catholics four, and the Jews one. Besides these there are two mixed congregations with doctrines but little different from those of the state church. The whole number of church buildings and preaching stations is about 70, only a minority of which belong to the state church.

NORWAY.

A Unitarian church is to be built in Christiania.

The state debt of Norway amounts at present to $33,000,000.

A Moderate-Conservative club has been organized in Fjeldvik.

The cathedral of Throndhjem is being restored at a cost of 62,500 kroner.

The grand trunk line of Norway has declared a dividend of 7 per cent.

Mayor P. G. L. Lunoh, of Grimsstad, died at the age of 73 years.

Rev. Rasmus Rolfsen Arnet, of Neo, died at the age of eighty-four.

The state has a dental dispensary at Christiania, which is absolutely free to the public.

During 1893 Norway exported about 1,900,000 cubic meters of timber and 400,000 tons of ice.

Nearly all of the public schools of Christiania are now being lighted by electricity.

The large exporting firm, Tchady & Roehmer, of Christiania, has been forced to make an assignment.

Mrs. Bodit Holst, of Hlomestrand, died at the advanced age of ninety-three years.

The bark Neptunus from Skien, Captain Tobiasson, was wrecked during a storm on the Atlantic. The crew was rescued by a steamer.

Miss Hanna Onekerlony, who recently visited America, has been appointed commander-in-chief of the Salvation army in Norway.

Sophus Busch, who in such able way arranged Norway's exhibition in the Fishery Building at the World's Fair, died at Bergen.

The ministers of Christiania are in favor of opening the Sunday morning services in the churches at 10:30 instead of 10:00.

The first regular Jewish congregation in Norway was organized in Christiania a short time ago and has already several hundred members.

Dr. S. W. Odland will probably be appointed professor of theology at the Christiania university, vice Bishop F. W. Bugge.

So called smoked fish sausage is being imported to Germany in large quantities, the Germans having taken a liking to it.

At the international "ski" tournament at Muerzzuschlag, Austria the Norwegian "ski" runners captured to the five first prizes.

A monument of Henrik Wergeland, the great Norwegian poet, will probably be erected in Christianssand some time in the near future.

The expenses of the Norwegian state for 1894-95 are estimated at 54,240,000 kroner, the income at 51,750,000 kroner as compared with 59,664,000 kroner last year.

Thirty-six parties in Christiania are assessed for more than $270,000, several passing the $1,000,000. The Norwegian Credit Bank heads the list, its assessed value being $1,350,000.

It is said that King Oscar will celebrate the 17th of May in Christiania.

During the summer he proposes to make a trip along the coast of Norway with the Norwegian steamer "Heimdal."

Ladies have been engaged as assistant designers in the archives of Norwegian maps, some of them year after year and entrusted with different kinds of work. Many ladies, especially those who are married to land surveyors, occupy themselves with map drawing.

Of the insurance offices in Norway, sixty-eight per cent employ women; thirty-seven per cent of the whole staff are women. The highest salary 1,500 crowns, the lowest 825 crowns; the men's, in corresponding places, 4,700 crowns and 930 crowns. Working time six hours.

DENMARK.

Christian Svensen has been appointed postmaster-general.

The number of free churches in Denmark is increasing.

Both the king and the queen have now recovered from their late illness.

V. Hillerup, the large land-owner of Gammel Kristineberg, is dead.

Several Danish dairies were recently established on the co-operative plan.

According to the latest statistics Copenhagen has 343,000 inhabitants.

The schooner Stavtitten, Captain Claussen of Svendborg was wrecked off Fornæs. The crew was rescued.

Sollungskgaard, of Skive, widely known as an able lawyer, died at the age of seventy-five.

Herman Bang, the excentric author has written a new novel, which will soon be published.

The large country mansion Ejldov in the parish of Haarslev was burned to the ground.

Small-pox is raging epidemically in Frederiksberg. The number of small-pox cases in Copenhagen is decreasing.

Rev. Bendt Lindhardt, of Jyderup and Holmstrup, died at the advanced age of ninety years. He was widely known as an able preacher.

A servant girl of Hillerod, who killed her child and burned the body in a stove, has been sentenced to suffer the death penalty.

About 12,000 people emigrated from Denmark in 1893. Of these 10,808 emigrated to the United States; 2,074 were Swedes.

The exposition of objects from the war year 1848 at Copenhagen is far more interesting than might be expected, the changes brought about by a period of only half a century being much greater than is generally realized.

Dr. Santon, a prominent French physician, who some time ago traveled in Scandinavia, has written a book on leprosy in Norway, Finland and Lapland. The doctor says that a case of leprosy very seldom occurs in Denmark.

The following mysterious and strangely sounding advertisement has appeared in the Politiken for some time: "Dr. Ostrup and Smith-Hansen have proposed to give ladies and gentlemen an afternoon course in the classical languages and history. No examination in view."

The city council of Copenhagen has successfully carried through the system of "proportional representation" in electing committees. Those who objected to this innovation did so chiefly on the ground that the election would be too complicated and therefore take too much time; but the "proportional representation" election took up only 20 per cent more time than the usual election of the same committees.

The so-called Grangers' movement is booming. The organization claims now 100,000 members. The following program has been agreed upon: That the state shall pass laws and appropriate money to facilitate the export trade; support the bimetallic standard movement; reduce the grain tax; abolish the tariff on the necessities of life; raise the tariff on wine, silk and spirits; revise the tariff schedule in general, and introduce a general income tax.

The leading ministers of the ten parishes of Copenhagen receive an aggregate salary of 150,000 kroner ($35,100) or an average of $3,510 each year. Many of them have declared it to be a "vital question" for them to be re-inforced by a dozen new ministers. A theological candidate proposes that the old ministers try to get along with 9,000 kroner a year and donate 4,000 kroner to the support of the new ministers, since it is a "vital question" to them. The proposition is used for all it is worth by the anti-church press.

HOME INDUSTRY.

Andrew Kimball has just come from a trip through Cache Valley and Southern Idaho. He says home industry is sweeping all before it in that section, the Utah goods not only being taken to with avidity in Cache county, but all through Southern Idaho, where the people have caught the full spirit of building up this intermountain region by using the products of its manufacturers. Home-made is not only talked of, but the people are demanding it to an extent heretofore unknown.

Mr. Kimball is specially engaged in the home made soap line, and says he found a marked contrast with the condition of a year ago. Then he found eastern soap in every store, and the dealers did not care to purchase any other. In Cache county this feeling has been reversed, and now the home article is well in the lead. On going into Idaho, the first five stores he called on carried only the Utah-made soap. The eastern article wasn't wanted. Storekeepers in the whole district were all working in favor of and buying the Utah article.

WHY NOT USE THE BEST?

Today a lady, who is possessed of an extensive experience and knowledge in the dry goods business, and who fully understands the relative value in wear and use of the different varieties of material for clothing said: "It is a puzzle to me why people here buy eastern made flannel at all when they can get the home-made. Those who take the imported article lose 50 per cent on their bargain every time. It don't wear as comfortably to begin with, and that should be an important consideration; and then it don't wear over half as well or as long. Home-made flannels will preserve their appearance better and wear twice as long as eastern goods for which from 80 to 50 per cent more per yard is charged. It's pure waste for people here to buy eastern flannel, and no storekeeper could palm it off on to me at half the price of home-made, much less charge me more for it."

MANUFACTURER'S BUREAU.

The Manufacturer's Bureau will hold a meeting Monday at 4 p. m. at the Chamber of Commerce. It is expected that a full attendance will be secured as much important business is pending, and the executive committee has a number of urgent matters to present for the decision of the bureau.

FOR TAX EXEMPTION.

The sub-committee of the Manufacturer's Bureau, John C. Cutler, chairman, have appealed to each member of the Legislature to pass such legislation as will exempt from taxation for a reasonable period such manufacturing establishments as will not come into competition with existing factories.

House bill 147, presented by Sears, provides for exemption from taxes of certain industries. It is believed that this bill with probably some amendments will receive favorable consideration. If so, it will be a notice to capitalists that Utah intends to be generous to people who help build up new industries.

BUREAU NOTES.

The bureau of manufactures furnishes the following notes:

A man who had been given work by the relief committee and received a grocery store order went to the store and wanted some soap. He asked for eastern made soap, and the proprietor told him that he kept home made soap only, and that it was better than the soap he had requested. "— the Utah truck," was the reply. "Are such persons proper objects of charity?"

A lady went into a store the other day and asked for home made shoes. The gentlemanly clerk endeavored to convince the lady that the imported shoes he had on the lower shelf were much finer and were really what she wanted. After telling him she proposed to have home made shoes or none he got a ladder and took from an upper shelf some shoes made in Utah, which the lady found better in every way than the outside article. The clerk got a lesson that should last him some time. The query is, by what procedure did the outside drummer convince the clerk that the eastern shoe was certainly what the people here wanted?

A newcomer went into a grocery store and asked for eastern salt. The grocer told him he did not keep eastern salt any more. "Why?" "Oh, this talk about home goods has forced us to keep home salt!"

The Manufacturers' Bureau recently asked manufacturers for a list of articles and where they were sold. A poor fellow who had no store, but who makes an article in common use, started out to place some of his goods with a store so he could comply with the request of the Bureau. After tramping all day he gave it up and reported that no merchant cared to buy his goods. He was promised that in ninety days he wouldn't have such a time as the people were studying the question as never before, and a movement was started which meant business.

TO FRUIT GROWERS.

The time is now come when it will be necessary for our fruit growers to prune up their trees. Having been in the business of raising and caring for fruit trees for half a century, I feel that some suggestions from me may be of value.

In order to keep trees healthy and insure good, well-flavored fruit, the trees should be carefully pruned every spring. Young orchards especially should be pruned for the first six years of their life. With each pruning, one-half of the preceding year's growth should be cut away, leaving the upper bud outward.

In hundreds of orchards the failure to properly prune the trees at the proper time has resulted in debilitating the trees and destroying the flavor of the fruit. In such orchards the fruit grows smaller every year, and finally becomes worthless.

If the owners would thin out from one-half to three-fourths of the wood between the lower limbs and the top of these old trees, they would soon see an improvement in the size, abundance and quality of the fruit. The thinning out should be done regularly and with good judgment. In this way old orchards may be redeemed and made the source of much profit in returning a good flavored and an abundant yield.

If my experience would be considered worthy of consideration I will be glad to render such aid and make such suggestions to fruit growers as I can.

JOSEPH LOCK,

POPPERTON PLACE, Salt Lake City,
February, 26, 1894

NEWS FROM FILLMORE.

FILLMORE, Feb. 25, 1894.—Yesterday President I. N. Hinckley and his son, I. N. Jr., were returning from a visit to Kanosh. Brother Hinckley, who is an expert horseman, was driving a splendid team of bays attached to a buggy, and was going at a very slow gait. When a little north of Meadow one of the horses' feet suddenly slipped from under him, the fall frightened the other horse which sprang forward, breaking the wiffle-tree. The fallen horse jumped up and both bounded off, the sudden stop having thrown the riders forward from the buggy to the ground. The horses ran for about two hundred yards, then dashed into a "bull fence" and fell in a heap. When the driver got to them he found one of the horses dead with a broken neck, and the other tangled in the harness.

They returned to Meadow, got another horse and returned home somewhat shaken up, but were out to meeting today.

Mrs. McNorton, the poor woman who recently got so badly burned by falling into the fire whilst in a fit, died on the night of the 23rd, and was buried under the direction of the ward bishopric today. She was aged twenty-five years.

George Greenway was last week fined $25 for selling whisky without a license.

A suit is now pending wherein G. R. Huntsman is charged with permitting minors to remain in his saloon.

Two young Indians, "John" and "Alec," got a dollar's worth of alcohol from a "white man." Then they got drunk, and in the night both rode upon the same horse ten miles south to Dry Creek and entered the premises of Mr. Oscar Anderson, stole a horse and saddle and continued their journey south. Deputy Sheriff A. Alexander got on their trail and after a rough ride through a blizzard for these parts got the Indians near Minersville, Beaver county. They had a hearing yesterday before J. P. McBride, and the case goes to the grand jury at Provo.

A. BIRD.

DROWNED IN AN ICE POND.

OGDEN, March 2, 1894.—As some inaccuracies have occurred in the accounts published in relation to the death by drowning of William, son of Elmer Joseph Parry and his wife Susan, of this place, the father desires me to furnish a correct statement for the DESERET NEWS. I now do so, and ask for them a place in your columns.

On Wednesday morning last, Feb. 27, the deceased, who had been sick, was in consequence retained at home from school, but it was thought not to be so serious as to retain him in the afternoon. About half-past ten o'clock a. m. his father saw him getting kindling wood in the lot, and requested the boy to tell his mother to send him to school in the afternoon. The son took his wood to the house and delivered his father's request. Shortly after the boy walked out of the house, taking a little hand sled with him, and in company with two more youths went to the ice pond of Farr Brothers. His two companions and William Parry walked on the ice which they supposed to be safe. The night previous a number of young men and women were skating on the same pond in perfect safety, and without apprehension of any danger whatever. But these three boys had only gone a few steps on the ice when it broke beneath William, and he was plunged into the deep, ice-cold water. In his struggles he seized and held on to the ice, and he and his companions called loudly for help.

Messrs. Archie Bowman and Albert Baumann, hearing the cries, ran to the spot to render any assistance they could to rescue the boy from his perilous situation. Their efforts were all in vain. The youth was chilled and exhausted and fell back into the pond. In the meantime word was sent to the mother, who was horror-stricken at the news she received, as she supposed he was still on the premises, and knew of that he had left home at all. She hurried to the pond and reached there before the body was secured from the water.

All known remedies were resorted to, to restore animation, but life was extinct.

On Thursday, March 1st, the funeral services were held in the Third ward meeting house, which was filled with sympathizing friends of the parents. The exercises were conducted by Bishop Barnard White. Consoling addresses were made by Bishop Elias Morrie, Elders Joseph Hall, C. F. Middleton and Bishop White. The remains were interred in the Ogden cemetery, and not in Mountain View, as some published statements have it. Deceased was born April 30th, 1880, and therefore was nearly 14 years of age. Yours truly, JOSEPH HALL.

OBITUARY NOTES.

WILLIAM CAPENER.

Elder William Capener, whose death occurred on the 24th of January, 1894, at Centerville, Davis county, Utah, was born in London, England, July 30, 1806. He emigrated to America in 1834; was baptized in the spring of 1844 in Cleveland, Ohio; was ordained an Elder in the Kirtland Temple January 24, 1844. He came with his family to Utah in the fall of 1852 and resided in Salt Lake City from the time of his arrival until 1873, when he removed to Centerville, where he remained until his death.

His descendants number 154, divided as follows: Children 17, grandchildren 54, great-grandchildren 80, and great-great-grandchildren 3.

Although Brother Capener was a man of no particular prominence he was withal a strictly honest man, and such a one is said to be "the noblest work of God."

Funeral services were held in the Centerville meeting house January 27, 1894. Appropriate and consoling remarks were made by Elders Joseph E. Taylor and Nathan Porter. A large cortege followed the body to its last resting place; six of the sons of Father Capener were his pall bearers.—[COM.]

MATILDA ROBISON KING.

KINGSTON, Utah, Feb. 19, 1894.—At the residence of her son, Thomas E. King, Matilda Robison King, the wife of the late Thomas R. King, died at 15 minutes past 8 a. m., of heart failure, at the age of 82 years, 11 months and 7 days, leaving a numerous posterity to mourn her loss. She was the mother of eight children, seventy-two grandchildren and seventy great-grandchildren. Her husband's remains were taken from their place of burial in Circle Valley, Utah, with hers and interred in one grave in the cemetery of Coyote, Utah. She was a member of the first Relief Society organized at Nauvoo, Ill. On the first of the month she spoke one-half hour to the Relief Society, giving many interesting incidents of the Prophet Joseph. She had entertained him at her table in Montrose, Iowa, when he was hiding from the mob. Her home was always a resting place for the authorities on their trips through the settlements. She died as she had lived, a faithful Latter-day Saint.

THOMAS E. KING.

THE DEAD.

Peaceful be their Rest.

MARKS.—February 23, 1894, John R. Marks, son of Stephen R. and Olive H. Marks; aged two days.

HARRISON.—At Sandy, Utah, March 2, 1894, Isaac Harrison, born Nov. 2nd, 1815; aged 78 years, 4 months.

GARLICK.—At her residence in Kayville, Agnes Garlick, of pneumonia, on Wednesday, Feb. 23, 1894, in her 55th year. She was born at Halitown, County Antrim, Ireland. Millennial Star, please copy.

MEADS.—At his residence in the Eleventh ward, Salt Lake City, Nathan Meads, son of William and Sarah Condy Meads; born in Nottinghamshire, England, May 15, 1823; died at 6:40 a. m. March 3rd, 1894.

SHEPPARD.—In South Ottonwood, Feb. 19, 1894, of dropsy, Mary Ann Sheppard, relict of the late Charles Sheppard; aged 67 years, 1 month and 18 days. Deceased was born in Oxfordshire, England, embraced the Gospel in December 1818; emigrated to Utah in the fall of 1870 and died in full faith of the Gospel.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

Truth and Liberty.

No. 13.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, MARCH 17, 1894.

VOL. XLVIII.

THE RIGHTS OF THE PRIESTHOOD.

Discourse delivered at the Utah Stake Conference, Provo, Sunday Afternoon, January 14, 1894, by
PREST. WILFORD WOODRUFF.

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

I am pleased to meet with so many of the Saints of God. I have listened to the remarks that have been made at this conference upon the Priesthood, and have been very much interested and edified. I do not know of any subject in the Church of more importance to the inhabitants of the earth and to ourselves than the Holy Priesthood. In listening to Brother F. M. Lyman's remarks concerning the Lesser Priesthood I had many thoughts and reflections. Some of them I feel to express to the Latter-day Saints. There is one principle connected with the Priesthood that I want all Israel to understand, and that is this: it makes no difference what portion of the Priesthood a man holds, if he holds any at all, he has rights. Whether he be a Deacon or whether he be an Apostle, the Priesthood held by him has rights, on earth and in the heavens. In this connection let me read a paragraph or two from the Book of Doctrine and Covenants:

Behold, there are many called, but few are chosen. And why are they not chosen?

Because their hearts are set so much upon the things of this world, and aspire to the honors of men, that they do not learn this one lesson—

That the rights of the Priesthood are inseparably connected with the powers of heaven, and that the powers of heaven cannot be controlled nor handled only upon the principles of righteousness.

That is the principle that we should understand. Sixty years ago, the 30th of last December, I heard the first sermon I ever heard in this Church. The next day I was baptized. There were very few branches of the Church in the country at that time. I was ordained a Teacher. My mission immediately commenced. I traveled the next spring a thousand miles with the Prophet Joseph in Zion's Camp. I went through that whole mission as a Teacher. Arrived in Missouri, several of us stopped at Lyman Wight's, where we held a Teachers' meeting. I remained in that office until at the conference I was ordained a Priest. I never was ordained a Deacon. I was sorry I was not; for I had a great desire to fill that office. However, I was not blessed with it. After I was ordained a Priest I was sent by the father of Brother Partridge here on a mission to the southern country.

That was in the fall of 1834. I had a companion with me, and we started out without purse and scrip. I traveled alone a good many miles and preached the Gospel, and I baptized a number that I could not confirm in the Church, because I was only a Priest. The first time I ever met with Brother A. O. Smoot, was upon that mission. I traveled some time preaching the Gospel before I was ordained an Elder. I was ordained an Elder under the hands of Warren Parrish. Afterwards, by order of the Prophet Joseph, I was ordained a Seventy by David Patten, who was martyred in Missouri for the word of God and testimony of Jesus Christ. In 1837—the same year that Brother Kimball went to England and opened the mission there—I got permission from the Presidency in Kirtland to go to Fox Islands, being impressed by the Spirit to go there. While I was there I was called by revelation, with several others, to fill the places of those who were fallen of the Twelve Apostles. I have been some fifty-four years a member of the Twelve Apostles. I have traveled with that and other quorums now for sixty years; and I want to say to this assembly that I was just as much sustained by the power of God while holding the office of a Teacher, and especially while officiating in the vineyard as a Priest, as I ever was as an Apostle. There is no difference in this so long as we do our duty.

When a man holding any portion of that Priesthood goes before God, the heavens are bound to hear him, if he magnifies his Priesthood; and certainly it is our duty to go before the Lord and ask Him for what we want, and when we do that in faith, God hears and answers us. God has heard the prayers of the men who have borne the Priesthood from the day that Joseph Smith received the plates from the hands of Moroni, and He has fulfilled the prophecies contained in the Bible and the Book of Mormon. The Church has never fallen, notwithstanding her afflictions, her persecutions, her drivings, and her martyrdoms; but God has sustained it. When the Lord bestows gifts upon the children of men in connection with the Priesthood, those who receive those gifts are responsible for the use they make of them. We are responsible for the use we make of the Holy Priesthood which has been placed upon us. Whatever is necessary for us to receive and enjoy, it is our duty to ask the Lord for. We should go before Him in secret places and make our wants known, that our prayers may be heard and answered upon our heads. Herein lies our strength. Our trust is in God, and not in man. He has committed this work into the hands of His Son Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world, and this mission has been upon Him from the days of father Adam. He was appointed as the great sacrifice from before the foundation of the world. He came in the meridian of time and died for the redemption of man. We are engaged in the last dispensation. We are called upon to build up this Church and this Zion. And we can only do it by the power of the Holy Priesthood. No man has authority from God to administer to the children of men the ordinances of life and salvation only by the power of the Holy Priesthood. The power of that Priesthood is with the Latter-day Saints. When our brethren go out to the world—I do not care whether they are Priests, or Elders, or Seventies, or Apostles—and they offer to the Gentiles the Gospel of Christ, the power of God is with them, as long as they magnify their calling. That power bears record to every honest man and woman concerning the truth of the message which these men bear. By that power men and women have been pricked in their hearts and the Spirit of God has borne testimony to them. You have found this to be true; so have I. Without this power of the Priesthood, these effects cannot be manifested to men in the flesh. I hope that all Israel will understand this principle. You have not got to wait till you are an Elder, or a High Priest, or an Apostle, before God can hear your prayers. I know the Lord preserved my life when I held the office of a Priest. In one instance a man who sought my life, without any action on my part fell dead at my feet, as though he was struck with a thunderbolt from heaven, and I attended his funeral the next day. I had many blessings as a Priest, and had the spirit and power of God in that office.

Every man in every office ought to magnify his Priesthood. The Deacon ought to do so. I was very much pleased once in seeing a number of Deacons magnify their calling, down here at Nephi. They went through the city and chopped every piece of wood which every widow in that town had. Brother Geo. Teasdale, the President of the Stake, had three or four cords of cedar wood in his lot, and he went home one night and found that it had disappeared. He wondered what was the matter; but when he came to look around he found it all chopped up in his wood-house. They magnified their calling splendidly there.

Today we are, in some respects, in peculiar circumstances. We should trust in the Lord and do what is right. I know the Priesthood is given for the salvation of men and for the administration of ordinances both for the living and the dead. Tens of thousands have been redeemed in the spirit world by their posterity who stand in the flesh and hold the keys of the salvation of their dead. Saviors upon Mount Zion have been raised up, while the kingdom is the Lord's, as the Prophet Obadiah said they would be. This people are doing this work now. The Lord is with you, and your progenitors in the spirit world rejoice. Let us be faithful, therefore, while we are here. God has appointed us to bear this Priesthood. Out of the fourteen hundred millions of people on the earth the Lord has chosen this handful of men to bear this; to ordain, to organize, to warn the world, to preach the Gospel to them. I hope my brethren that bear this Priesthood will remember the value of it. I want to read a few more paragraphs from this same revelation, and then I will close:

For there is a time appointed for every man, according as his works shall be.

God shall give unto you (the Saints) knowledge by his Holy Spirit, yea by the unspeakable gift of the Holy Ghost, that has not been revealed since the world was until now;

Which our forefathers have waited with anxious expectation to be revealed in the last times, which their minds were pointed to, by the angels, as held in reserve for the fulness of their glory:

A time to come in the which nothing shall be withheld, whether there be one God or many Gods, they shall be manifest;

All thrones and dominions, principalities and powers, shall be revealed and set forth upon all who have endured valiantly for the gospel of Jesus Christ;

And also if there be bounds set to the heavens, or to the seas; or to the dry land, or to the sun, moon, or stars;

All the times of their revolutions; all the appointed days, months, and years, and all the days of their days, months, and years, and all their glories, laws, and set times, shall be revealed, in the days of the dispensation of the fulness of times,

According to that which was ordained in the midst of the Council of the Eternal God of all other Gods, before this world was, that should be reserved unto the finishing and the end thereof, when every man shall enter into his eternal presence, and into his immortal rest.

There are things in that revelation that are marvelous and wonderful. All thrones and dominions, principalities and powers, shall be revealed to the Saints of God in the own set time of the Lord. Today we are in this little world, surrounded with a great many planets that are at present unknown to us. We scarcely know what is on this world. We know less about Mars, or Venus, or Jupiter, or these worlds, that are neighbors to us. But here we are given to understand that all these worlds will be revealed. A man's mind must become immortal, and must stretch as wide as eternity and be filled with the glory of God, to ever comprehend these great blessings which are promised unto His people. Therefore, let us be true and faithful. Do not let us lose our hold on the Priesthood, nor upon the kingdom of God. Let us go in secret prayer before the Lord and call upon His holy name. There is where our strength lies. I pray that God's blessings may rest upon all of us. We shall all find our record in the great library of heaven; and I hope we may so live that when we come to meet that record we will be satisfied with it. I pray God to bless President Smoot, his counselors, and those who bear the Priesthood here, as well as our brethren and sisters, unto the end that we may inherit eternal life, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

Written for this Paper.

BEFORE THE CAMERA.

"Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," saith the preacher.

The prophet of the Bible could not look down from the press galleries of Congress without repeating this sentence. Half of the public men of today are packed full of self-conceit. A baker's dozen of the Senators do little more than pose for the galleries. Senator Voorhees keeps his eyes upon them while he is making his speech. Senator Gorman, looking as though he had come out of a band box, perceptibly poses a great part of each session, and Senator Matt Ransom of North Carolina would go into a fit if his cuffs did not go at least an inch below his sleeves. When Senator Ingalls was in Congress he spent much time in arranging the red handkerchief which always peeped out of his left coat pocket, and old Senator Morrill, though he has written a book on the vanity of statesmen, is proud of his position as the oldest man in the Senate. Senator Wolcott has the distinction of wearing more new clothes than any man in the chamber, and it used to make Vice President Morton angry to have it insinuated that his wig was not made of natural hair. Our public men of today are very particular as to what the newspapers say about them. The most of them keep scrap books in which they paste all clippings concerning themselves, and the volumes of this kind which belong to President Cleveland would make a library. A curious evidence of the vanity of great men is found in their photographs. The most extensively photographed man today is the Emperor of Germany. He has his pictures taken every week, and you could paper a room with his likenesses which the camera has taken from his boyhood up to the present time. Next to him, perhaps, comes Bismark, and after Bismark, Gladstone. As to American statesmen, nearly every member of Congress has his photograph on sale at one or another of the galleries here. He reaps no profits through the sales, but they are usually sold with his consent. Congressmen buy a great many photographs.

They are much like a set of college students and they exchange with one another. The result is that Washington is a city of photographers. We have some of the best artists in the United States here, and C. M. Bell, who died a short time ago, took as many photographs of the famous men of today as any photographer in the United States. He had a gallery on the road to the Capitol and for the past twenty years he has photographed the leading men of the country. His chief operator, Mr. Dodge, still presides over the gallery. He is a bright young man of forty, who is much noted for his artistic ability as a poser. His long, slender fingers have grasped the heads of the prettiest of our society women and the most famous of our statesmen for the last fifteen years, and his stories as to how these great people look and act before the camera are very interesting. I chatted with him for an hour yesterday. Said he: "The biggest men of the United States are by no means nervous when in front of the camera. They are generally plain, practical, common-sense people. They come into the gallery, pose for their pictures and leave, and we have much more trouble with the little five-cent fellows than with them. I have posed President Cleveland a number of times. If everybody acted as well as he does we could always take good pictures. He has no suggestions to make, leaves himself almost entirely in the hands of the operator and is what we call a very good subject. Some of the pictures which have been sold of him throughout the United States have been taken here. His pictures have had a great sale and there is a good demand for them still."

"What other Presidents have you taken?"

"Quite a number," was the reply. "I have made a number of pictures of President Hayes. He was a pleasant man to meet and common in his ways. He never notified us that he was coming, but would walk into the gallery and say, 'I want my photograph taken.' He was as clay in the hands of the potter and allowed us to pose him as we wished. President Hayes had a face with a full beard, and this kind of a face always gives a good likeness. He ordered many pictures and both his and Mrs. Hayes' pictures sold well. Mrs. Hayes was, next to Mrs. Cleveland, the best selling subject we have ever had."

"Tell me something about Mrs. Cleveland as a poser."

"It is not difficult to take Mrs. Cleveland's photograph. She submits herself to the photographer, and allows him to choose her poses. I remember the first time she came here was with Mrs. Vilas. It was one afternoon about 2 o'clock. She came right into the gallery, like any ordinary person, and she and Mrs. Vilas went into the dressing room, and a moment later she appeared ready to have her picture taken. I took thirty odd negatives of her that day. She wore a number of different costumes, and we got many good pictures. A number of plates were destroyed at her request, and some were reserved for her own private use. Some of the best pictures of Mrs. Cleveland have never been sold, and I don't think any one but herself and family have copies of one or two of our negatives. Shortly after she came back from her wedding tour I took a picture of her in the conservatory of the White House. One of these was a standing picture, and I think Harper's Weekly published it. Another was a three-fourths view, which was sent all over the country. Mrs. Hayes was as easy to take as Mrs. Cleveland. She had a very fine face, and she allowed us to choose her poses. She had a great many pictures taken, but the one in which she looked best was a full dress figure with the hair combed down over the ears. You may have seen it. Mrs. Hayes stands with her elbow leaning on a chair."

ARTHUR AND GARFIELD.

"How about President Arthur?"

"I took President Arthur's picture one afternoon. I remember that it was Sunday, and Secretary Folger came here with him, and I made a number of sittings. I took the last picture that was ever made of President Garfield. It was just two days before he was inaugurated. He came in because they wanted a tintype of him for the bureau of engraving and printing, in order that his face might be engraved for the bank notes. I had no arrangements for taking tintypes, and I had to send out for material. While we were waiting I took a number of photographs, and these were the last that were made of him. Mrs. Garfield was with him at the time, and I asked her to sit. She replied that she was not dressed suitably, but that she would come in again. She never came."

PEFFER AND SIMPSON.

In speaking of the many Congressmen whom he has posed Mr. Dodge says: "I took photographs of Senator Peffer and Jerry Simpson the other day. Senator Peffer looks like a quiet man, and he is. His long whiskers add a sort of picturesqueness to his face. Jerry Simpson is a jovial, whole-souled fellow before the camera. He cracked jokes all the time I was taking his picture. His face is angular and expressive, and you have to catch it at just the right time. Tom Watson is the opposite of Simpson in his manner. He is rather reserved and talks but little. John Allen of Mississippi is a daisy. He is as plain as an old chip and takes a picture as though he enjoyed it. He and Fellows of New York came in together to have their pictures taken the other day. They spent the whole of the time in joking each other and telling stories. We have a bust of P. T. Barnum which was made by Clark Mills. Fellows looks for all the world like Barnum, and John Allen pointed this bust out to his friends as that of Fellows. Buck Kilgore, though he kicked the door of the House down when Reed was speaker, is a very quiet man. I have taken his picture several times, and he is a very good subject. He is six feet high, and I photographed him with his hat on. He makes a very striking likeness, and a great many strangers ask to see his picture. I have also taken Roger Q. Mills with his hat on. He wears a slouch, and is over six feet tall. I have Senator Mahone under his sombrero. He makes, also, a very striking picture."

THE CABINET AND THE CAMERA.

"I suppose you have taken a number of the cabinet officers?"

"Yes, but it is hard to get a cabinet minister. The cabinet are public characters and as their pictures are sold they like to appear as well as possible. We have got a number of them by sending for them just as they were about to go out to entertainments, and I suppose we have in reality taken the cabinets of nearly all the Presidents within the last decade. We had a very good picture of Cleveland's first cabinet taken in the White House. We would have had one of President Arthur's cabinet, but Attorney General Brewster objected and the sitting fell through. Brewster was very sensitive about having his picture taken. You remember that he fell into the fire when a baby and burned his face out of shape. His features were horrible, and he did not like to have them photographed. He came to us, however, just before he left Washington, and we got a splendid negative of him. Secretary Carlisle has pictures taken now and then. He is as plain as an old shoe in his manners, and though he has no beard always takes a good picture. He has a fine face, and his blue eyes shine out at you as you look at it through the camera. I took Postmaster General Bissell about two months ago. He is a bigger man than Cleveland, and must weigh nearly 300 pounds. He had a dozen different sittings, and the results were very fair. It is the same with Hoke Smith. He came over from the department, and while waiting walked around the rooms and looked at our photographs of famous men from the south. He stopped for quite a time before Ben Hill's picture, and talked about him. As to Secretary Lamont, we took him while he was private secretary to Cleveland, but have made no pictures of him since then. He is a little stouter now than when we made his picture, I understand.

FAMOUS GENERALS.

"One of the hardest pictures we ever got," the photographer went on, "was that of Gen. Sherman. We asked him again and again to have a photograph taken. He promised to come in, but said that he wanted his picture made while his uniform was on, and he hated to wear his uniform when he could help it. He was a great man, you know, to go to weddings. They say he liked to kiss the brides. Well, one day, just before going to a wedding, he came down and gave us a sitting. He talked most interestingly about his battles during the sitting. His face lighted up as he described some of his wonderful war experiences, and we got a good picture. He was then at the head of the army and had an office in the War Department. I took a number of pictures of Phil Sheridan. He never said a word during the sitting and was as sober as a judge. Gen. Rosecrans acts more like a boy than an old general when he is having his picture taken. He laughed and chatted with me and seemed to enjoy the taking of the photograph. I took Gen. Logan shortly before his death. He was as plain a citizen as any one could ask for. His face was iron, and photographing him was like taking a picture of a statue. His face was very dark and I always gave him more than the usual time in taking it. Sheridan never moved a muscle during one of his sittings, and I took the picture from which the artist worked who made the Arlington monument. I was surprised at the simplicity of these generals. None of them put on airs, and it was the same with Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, the noted confederate general. He came in and had a sitting one day and I did not know who it was until he left and he said, 'My name is Joseph E. Johnston.'"

SOME OF BRADY'S PHOTOGRAPHS.

Speaking of the simplicity of these great generals recalls some talks I have had with M. B. Brady, the noted war photographer. He has a gallery at Washington, and although he is nearly eighty years old still takes pictures. He once told me that Gen. Grant once stood in his gallery when a plate of glass heavy enough to have killed a horse fell out of the skylight and was shattered in pieces at his feet. Grant did not move a muscle, but Edwin M. Stanton, who had come down with Grant to see the picture taken, grew as white as a sheet. He grabbed Brady by the arm and said: "Don't say a word about this or the newspapers will say that it was a plan to assassinate Grant." Brady took the last picture of Gen. Jackson. It was at the Hermitage. He has taken pictures of Albert Gallatin, and just before John C. Calhoun died he was photographed by Brady. Brady told me that he called upon Calhoun in his rooms near the Capitol. He was surprised to find that Calhoun knew quite as much about the science of photography as he did. He took President Lincoln just before he was elected to the presidency. Lincoln's collar was large, and his long neck looked scrappy. Brady went up to him and pulled up his shirt collar, and Abraham Lincoln said: "Ah, I see! You want to shorten my neck."

HOW FAMOUS AUTHORS ARE PHOTOGRAPHED.

Mr. Brady says that when Edgar Allen Poe had his picture taken by him he doubted whether Poe had on a shirt. His coat was buttoned up tightly about his high stock cravat, and he looked seedy and sad. There was no sign of a collar, and the necktie in the picture is a mass of wrinkles. When Poe was asked to give a sitting he shook his wild, loose locks and refused. Brady then told him that there would be no charge, and finally prevailed upon him to have his picture taken. Poe had a fine face, and Brady tells me that his large, round, black eyes had an almost insane look in them.

Another one of Brady's literary subjects was Fenimore Cooper. He was a great friend of Cooper's, and Cooper told him that he intended to make him one of the characters in a future novel, but he died before he carried out his idea. Cooper was at this time in the midst of his libel suit with the newspapers, and one sitting was spoiled by this subject coming up during it. Cooper got angry at a remark made by a visitor, and left the gallery. Brady has also taken pictures of Bryant and Washington Irving, and he had John Quincy Adams sit for his daguerreotype. He photographed Mrs. Alexander Hamilton when she was ninety-three, and at about this time Dolly Madison gave him a sitting. He has without doubt the finest collection of photographs of prominent men and women in the United States, and his gallery is one of the most interesting of places in Washington to visit.

He is the most remarkable photographer this country has ever seen, and now, when he has long passed his three score and ten, he is one of the most charming conversationalists among men. He has also photographed nearly all of the leading actors and actresses in the country, as well as the leading singers. He will tell you stories about Jenny Lind, John Wilkes Booth, Harriet Lane and hundreds of others of the famous people of the past, and he can illustrate his remarks by showing you the pictures he has taken of them.

Speaking of photographs, one of the best photographers in Washington was the late Senator Kenna. His memorial has just been published, and the picture which forms the frontispiece is made from a photograph taken by his camera. He took pictures of many of the Congressmen, and had a great deal of pleasure in so doing. All of the pictures he has taken are as finely finished as any one could wish for, and he showed a decided talent in this direction. He took thousands of pictures, and had negatives of a great many of his Senator friends, and I published not long ago a picture of Senator Beck and his large dog, which was taken by Kenna. He kept his negatives in good order, and they are now a cherished possession of his family.

FRANK G. CARPENTER,

The export of Swedish matches has increased every year during the last decade, and was larger last year than ever before.

THE ASSASSINATION.

Col. M. B. Darnell, of Sheldon, Iowa, is in the city. He has been in California for five months, and came to Salt Lake on the same train with W. H. Culmer, Esq., of this city, who has been on a visit to California. Col. Darnell is an interesting figure to the people of Utah, from the fact that he is probably the only living eye witness of the assassination of the Prophet Joseph Smith, at Carthage, Illinois, on the 27th of June, 1844.

Col. Darnell was met by a News representative Wednesday, March 7, and in response to inquiries made a statement of what he personally knew regarding that awful deed. He said:

"You know it is a long time since then. It is fifty years ago, and my memory may be faulty in some particulars, but I will relate that only which I remember distinctly. When the Mormons came to Commerce, they changed the name to Nauvoo, and built the place up rapidly until there were about 15,000 people in the city. The inhabitants of that part of the state were of the rougher element to a great extent. The county officers were profitable positions, because there was big opportunity for stealing, so there was considerable rivalry between Whigs and Democrats as to who should get in.

"The Mormons were not in it as a political party, but they held the balance of power, and of course they voted for those they considered the best men. This caused great hostility toward the Mormons on part of the anti. They wanted to get rid of the Mormons, for political reasons, so they fed the feeling against them. There was lots of stealing going on, and it was charged to the Mormons. The women and children were taught to believe the Mormons guilty, but I do not. I know that stealing was done by others, and that the Mormons as a community were not chargeable with it. Of course there may have been some Mormons who stole, but it was mostly the rough element, and the fire-eating anti-Mormons accused the Mormons so as to get them driven out. The 'law and order' men, as we called them, wanted the courts to settle all matters, and were called Jack Mormons by the anti.

"I was a student under General M. R. Deming. He got me a commission as lieutenant, from Gov. Ford. He commanded the mob that arrested the Smiths at Nauvoo, but he was there as a friend of order. I call the posse comitatus that made the arrest a mob, because that was what it really was. They went through the process of law merely for form's sake. It was called a war at that time. When the posse was called by the sheriff, John Carlin, I was in the crowd and considered myself summoned, as it were, to assist in making that arrest.

"My recollection is we were there in Carthage a week. We went just outside the town and pitched our tents. We camped there and played soldiers as well as we knew how.

"Some way or other, I do not know how, communication was had by which the Smiths agreed to give themselves up, and the officers went out and met them about half way in the prairie and brought them in. They took them to the Hamilton house, a hotel, and held them there for a couple of days, probably determining in their own mind what they were going to do.

"As an officer on Gen. Deming's staff it was my duty to take this company called the Carthage Greys, down to the hotel and form a hollow square, and they had a man with them by the name, I think, of Scribbling. He was attorney or counselor for the prisoners, I understood. They put the prisoners in the center of the square and marched them down to the general headquarters where they had their conference.

"The posse had the Smiths in their power and seemed disposed to make terms of some kind to determine what course would be pursued. At the end of about a couple of days they were placed in jail, which was a two story stone structure and overhead were very nice rooms, in one of which there was a bed. They were called the debtors' rooms.

"Very soon after the prisoners were placed in jail, it might have been the same day, the troops as we called them were all called together and Governor Ford addressed them. In his speech he stated that the object of their assembling had been accomplished; that the writ had been executed and the parties were in jail. He commanded the troops to disband and go to their several places of abode, and most of them did so.

"On the afternoon of the day of the assassination, the mob who did the killing came up. They had their faces painted a sort of brown color. I saw this crowd of men coming up from the direction of the creek at the northwest corner of the pasture. I was standing within ten or twenty steps of the pasture gate east of the jail. The crowd was coming single file, and stooping down. They had on blue hunting shirts. I knew something terrible was going to happen. I was a youth at the time and became transfixed to the spot. As the crowd turned the southwest corner of the jail, about one-half of them went right up the stairway, the other half came right against me. I got out of their way, and a moment afterwards I heard the report of a gun in the house. That was supposed to be the shot which killed Hyrum Smith. Joseph started to jump through the window, and the mob fired at him. He came out on the east side of the building. There was a large well just underneath there and he fell just outside the curb. Joseph was killed while passing out of the window.

"The Carthage Greys, it is said—and I have no doubt with truth, for I look at this thing very different now from what I did then, because I know more about men, their motives and dispositions—I say there is no doubt that the Carthage Greys were cognizant of the fact that that mob was coming. I believe every man of them knew it, and I also believe that their guns were charged with blank cartridges. When they fired a few shots at the mob no one was hurt. The faces of the mob were painted a kind of Indian color.

"The Carthage Greys were a very nicely drilled company. It would seem to me that the mob were not any larger in number than the Carthage Greys. From my recollection I think the number was very nearly equal—about thirty or forty men in each. I do not believe that the estimate of one hundred men in the mob is at all correct. Probably there were fifty to eighty in the mob; I thought there were less. It was understood there at the time that Thomas C. Sharp was the ringleader—the moving spirit in that mob. He commenced life as an attorney, but did not succeed, and became a newspaper editor. When I last saw him, several years ago, he was quite aged. I know there was such a man as William M. Daniels, but do not know what became of him. I knew Frank Worrell, commander of the guard at the jail. He was afterwards killed outside of Nauvoo, during the Mormon war in 1846. I also knew Alexander Sympon and his sons. They were at the jail. They were fiery anti-Mormons.

"I remember to have seen Joseph Smith jump from the window. It was a terribly exciting time and it all happened in an instant. I cannot describe it in any better way than by saying he came out just as though some one big and powerful had thrown him right through the window. Undoubtedly, however, he came by his own effort. He certainly did not hang to the window. It seems to me he came out head first, and he was shot while passing through the window. I do not know that I really saw any one set him up against the well. I know I partially saw it and got it from what they said at the time.

"I could not hear distinctly what Joseph said when he fell, but it seemed to me to be, 'O Lord, My God.' That was all he said. I think he raised himself to a sitting position. A young man went up and struck him either with the end of his gun or a bayonet, after he was dead, you may say. I did not notice whether they fired into him after he was set up by the well. I have the idea, however, that the young man went up to him and ran his bayonet through him, or rushed at him with his gun. I do not believe there was a gun fired after he struck the ground, and still I may be mistaken. I tell you those bullets came instantaneously.

"I did not notice any one raise a knife for the purpose of severing Joseph's head from his body, but I heard at the time that a young man did so. Those things might have been true. I was not one of the mob, but was one of the disbanded posse. I was going to the pasture after my horse, and was so close at the time that if I had been dressed like the mob I might have been considered one of their number. The young man who struck Joseph claimed to be a son of Governor Boggs. He rushed from the mob after Joseph was set up and struck him with the point of his gun or bayonet, and said, 'G—d d—n you; you are the man that had my father shot.' Of course Joseph Smith might have been alive with the bullets in his body, and have set himself up. I am satisfied he was alive then. If a gun was fired at him after he fell from the window I don't remember it. My memory is dim on some things, but I know there was great excitement just at the time.

"The firing was all done in a moment. Then there was a sort of recognition between the Carthage Greys and the mob, as they mingled together after Joseph was lying dead on the ground. I remember now that there was some talk right on the ground there within twenty minutes after the assassination about a man going up with a knife to cut off Joseph's head or disembowel him. I did not hear any reason given why he did not carry out his threat. I merely heard the young man say what I have stated as he made a lunge at him. I was away perhaps eleven or twelve feet. The guns were rattling and the men were swearing.

"In a little while the mob went back the way they came, where I understood they had animals to help them away. I could not recognize the mobbers very well, because of their disguise, but I remember Sharp, Hendricks, Davis and some of the others, who were afterwards known as having been there. It was a terrible deed, and the law and order people there have no excuse for it. We were not civilized there then as we are now, but there was nothing to justify the assassination. It was the work of fiery anti-Mormons, who wanted the Mormons driven out of the state."

Col. Darnell is 67 years of age, a little above medium height, well built, with grey hair and mustache. He has a military bearing, and served in the Union army three years during the rebellion. He followed the law business until about twelve years ago, when he entered the newspaper field, in which he now does work occasionally, but is taking life easy, as he is without the care of a family, and has means to keep him comfortably. He will remain in Salt Lake a few days, and then proceed on his journey East.

HOLY GHOST PROMISED.

STAFFORD COUNTY, Va., Feb. 23, 1894.—We are the fishers and hunters Jeremiah said should come and gather out the righteous from among the wicked and ungodly before God's judgments are poured out upon them, and we do it without charge, that we abuse not the power in the Gospel. I would like to call attention to the twelfth chapter of 1st Corinthians, and I will ask the whole world, Do we receive the same blessings as the Saints did in those days? If not, why not? Is it because we do the same works and God has failed to do His part, or is it because the laws of God have been changed and the power of the Gospel ceased, as also the organization of the Church of Christ ceased? Or have the Gospel and the power of the Priesthood been taken from the earth for a season until God saw fit to raise up a Prophet in these last days and restore the Gospel to the earth with all the gifts and blessings that the former day Saints enjoyed in and through obedience, because obedience is better than sacrifice?

Now we have men say to us: Why does God not reveal this to us as He did to Joseph Smith. We answer them like this, that God has sent us to warn you and we are His servants and it is just the same as if He had spoken Himself, because it is God that speaketh through us. Now the question is, How do we get the Spirit of God or the Holy Ghost? We find that Peter, on the day of Pentecost, taught the people to repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins and ye shall receive the Holy Ghost. (Acts ii, 38.)

Now we find that this same man, Peter, and John were sent for to go into Samaria to lay hands on those people who were baptized by Philip, and after the Apostles laid their hands upon their heads they received the Holy Ghost. (Acts viii, 17.) Also Paul in his travels found men who had been baptized but had not been taught that the Holy Ghost was to follow.

So Paul baptized them and laid hands upon their heads and they received the Holy Ghost and spoke with tongues and prophesied. Act. xix, 5, 6. Paul in writing to Timothy says: Neglect not the gift that is in thee which was given thee by prophecy with the laying on of hands of the presbytery. (Tim. iv, 4.) And many other passages show us that we receive the Holy Ghost by obedience, and that through the laying on of the hands of those who are in authority.

Now we find that men will tell us that this has been done away with. Very well, we know that it has been done away with, and the Gospel was done away with at the same time, because Paul teaches us that the Gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. (Rom. i. 16.)

But men say today that it was the power of God to Paul because he had such a hard hearted people to convert. If Paul needed it to convert the people in that day we need it today because we have some who are hard hearted, and some who are ignorant of the Gospel plan. Now, as John the Baptist was raised up as a forerunner of the Savior's first advent, so was Joseph Smith raised up in this dispensation to teach the people the Gospel and prepare the hearts and minds of the people to receive the Savior and His teachings at His second coming. There may be some who do not believe this, but I cannot help that; and so were there some who did not believe the Savior Himself, and they crucified Him as an impostor, but it did not make Him one. Do you believe in the Bible? Oh, yes. Well, read the twenty-fifth verse of the first chapter of 1 Peter: "But the word of the Lord endureth forever, and this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you." Then take the first chapter of 1 Peter, 20—21 verses: "Knowing this first that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation. For the prophecy came not in old times by the will of man, but holy men of God spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Now, "whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ hath not God." 11 John, 9th verse. The Savior says, "If ye continue in My word then are ye My disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." St. John viii: 32. Now, we are not free if we are the servants of sin.

Now let us take Malachi iii.—10: "Prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

I have traveled in many counties in Virginia and have made many friends. I am thankful for the opportunity of having the privilege of carrying the Gospel to the world. I would ask the young Elders of the West, are you prepared to go out into the world and give a reason for the hope that is within you? If you are not you should be. Bear in mind the teachings of your parents.

I want to bear my testimony to the world that the Gospel has been restored to the earth, and that the Latter-day Saints are required to carry it to the world. This work will fall upon the young men of Zion. May God bless all Israel and the whole world. It is our duty to pray for all the human family. I remain your brother in the cause of truth,
JAMES VANCE, JR.

THE EUROPEAN MISSION.

Millennial Star, Feb. 26.

ARRIVALS.—The following missionaries arrived in Liverpool from Utah, per Cunard steamer Umbria, Saturday, February 17, 1894: Joseph S. Mousley, of Bluff Dale, Salt Lake county; Geo. A. Finlayson, Payson, Utah county; Geo. Scott and Alma Johnson, Mantle, Sanpete county; Henry C. Baddley and Wm. Taylor, Salt Lake City; John W. Ford, Centerville, Davis county; Wm. C. Martell, Spanish Fork, Utah county, and John A. Clark, Farmington, Davis county. They were all for the British mission except the last named, who is appointed to labor in Turkey. With the missionaries arrived also Hon. Frank J. Cannon, who intends spending a few weeks in Europe on business.

APPOINTMENTS.—Elder Joseph S. Mousley has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Birmingham conference.

Elders Geo. A. Finlayson and Geo. Scott have been appointed to labor as traveling Elders in the Scottish conference.

Elder Alma Johnson has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Nottingham conference.

Elder Henry C. Baddley has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Sheffield conference.

Elder John W. Ford has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Newcastle conference.

Elder William C. Martell has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Welsh conference.

Elder William Taylor has been appointed to labor as traveling Elder in the Cheltenham conference.

The postoffice inspectors, secret service agents and all the detectives in Oakland, Cal., are using every effort to unravel the mystery of a missing mail pouch. Thus far they have met with very poor success, and as their investigation proceeds the mystery deepens. When the driver reached the station he discovered that one of the pouches was missing. The registered pouch was all right, and that was put on the Oregon train. The driver at once gave the alarm and went back over the route in search of it, but could find no trace. The theory of the detectives is that a plot was formed to rob the wagon of the registered pouch. The robbers, it is believed, carried out the plan to perfection, but got the wrong pouch, and when they found that they had made a mistake destroyed the whole thing.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

VARIOUS IDEAS OF HELL.

An exchange states that the learned Dr. Whiston, Sir Isaac Newton's friend, held that hell is situated on a comet. He is quoted as saying:

It seems to me that this theory, which you rightly say "must belong to me and me alone," does locate hell, the awful prison-house of the damned, in the fiery nucleus of some (perhaps yet undiscovered) comet of unthinkable size. In its wide-circling chariot of fire they will be whirled in the twinkling of an eye from the intolerable heat of the sun back into space hundred and hundreds of millions of miles from the great torch-bearer of our system. Thus instantly the wretched tenant will be given two unbearable extremes, one of cold and the other of heat. This is to continue through endless ages of eternity.

Young Stilling, whose thoughts on unearthly subjects are of the most original and unique nature, located the final place of punishment in the interior of the earth, where he supposed the passions of the damned would constantly flash from their bodies, like electric sparks, making the place a veritable lake of fire, burning and not consuming.

Emanuel Swedenborg does not clearly locate the place of torment relative to the visible universe. His theory was that, after the fall, wicked men, when dead, combined into infernal societies, each one being drawn to the companions with which his inclinations were most in harmony. In this way the various hells originated and grew in power and influence and threatened the very existence of the heavens, until God assumed humanity and conquered the evil influence, thus restoring order in heaven and facilitating the transition from earth to the place of the blessed. According to this mystic writer there are three classes of hells or infernal societies. In the lowest self-love is the dominant principle; in the next, self-derived wisdom, and in the highest, self-service. Between these hells and the heavens is an intermediate state, he thinks, into which all enter at the time of death. Here they stay long enough to decide for themselves in what company they will spend eternity. Ministering angels are ready to render any service needed, but notwithstanding this, many prefer to go to hell, their habits and thoughts and feelings on earth having created in them a desire for the impure society of wicked men and women and fallen angels, which they prefer to the pure societies of good men and angels. But even in the hells, by the mercy of God, he says, the condition of the fallen is somewhat ameliorated and they are never entirely beyond the possibility of redemption. The indescribably happy marriage relation is one of the characteristics of heavenly societies, while promiscuity is the rule in the infernal communities.

A new view of hell has recently been advanced by an American lady writer. She represents a man who in a dream talks with his ancestors. One of these says he was an inhabitant of the place of torment, though there was no such place as commonly understood. His hell consisted in the condition of his feelings. He had no interest in anything any more. He felt no enjoyment, no ambition, no pleasure, no passions, no desires. He could go to heaven, if he wanted to, but he was not interested in anything. This idea is decidedly novel and may have been suggested by the fact that overindulgence in sensual pleasures is known to lead a person to the verge of that condition already in this life. Others have suggested, and with more force of reasoning, that the main torment consists in a burning desire for the pleasures of earth without the power or opportunity of satisfying them.

The scriptural doctrine on this point may be summed up in the brief statement that a man will certainly reap according to that which he sows. Holy writ does not enter into geographical descriptions of the world of spirits, nor does it detail the conditions of the wicked. But in solemn terms and with unmistakable earnestness it announces the fact that a life completed in the violation of the laws of God will lead to a state of misery hereafter. Daniel says some shall awake to everlasting life and others to "shame" and "everlasting contempt," a statement confirming the saying of Isaiah: "Their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched; and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh." The same language is employed by the Savior, and it derived its significance from the existence in the Valley of Hinnom, south of Jerusalem, of Gehenna, the place where the garbage of the city was kept burning constantly. The doctrine is plainly taught that a man's life after this is but a continuation of his life on earth; that divine justice is meted out with rigid impartiality. The condition of the wicked is referred to as "death" and the place as "hell," over which the "devil" is the ruler. But this prince will finally have to surrender his power to the Almighty, when he himself together with both death and hell are to be cast into "the lake of fire and brimstone," the last destination of those who have not been saved on earth nor after their departure from earth, and whose names at the last judgment, consequently, are not found in the Lamb's book of life. "Whosoever was not found written in the Book of Life was cast into the lake of fire."

In the revelation on this subject given to Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon on February 16, 1832, the persons referred to as finally lost are more fully explained, but as to their fate it is plainly stated that "the end thereof, neither the place thereof, nor their torment, no man knows. Neither was it revealed, neither is, neither will be revealed unto man, except to them whose are made partakers thereof." It is therefore safe to say that all speculations and theories about the location of hell and the condition of the damned are idle. The fact that sin brings punishment is revealed. The nature thereof no man clearly comprehends.

SOCIALISM CONSIDERED.

Among the most prominent questions of the day are those bearing on social reforms in various directions. They are agitated among the laboring classes in every civilized country and discussed in the leading magazines and newspapers of the world. The discussion of theological subtleties, in which former ages were so deeply interested, has in the main been abandoned as profitless, from a material point of view, or left to the learned occupants of the pulpits. Long established forms of the social structure are losing the sanctity with which they were once regarded and people demand reforms with no uncertain sound.

As yet the difficulty is in finding something practical, some feasible plan upon which to effect the desired change. The cool fact is that society as it is organized today is the natural growth of preceding conditions. It is not the creation of some one with the view of oppressing one class and favoring others. Tyrants, it is true, the world has had, and still has, but their exploits among the nations have always been of comparatively brief duration. History teaches plainly that even the most oppressed people will some time rise in its majesty and crush the usurpers in the dust, and as far as possible right the wrongs inflicted. The existing defects, whatever they may be, can therefore not be looked upon or treated as mere incidentals, as easy to remove as a grain of sand from the eye or a splinter from a finger. They are rather constitutional, and require treatment accordingly.

The various theories of socialism, communism, anarchism and nihilism propose remedies whereby an ideal society may be formed. Socialists in general aim at what they call a just distribution of the wealth of the earth among its inhabitants. The state, they think, ought to control all the means whereby a country is supported and see that none accumulates an undue proportion thereof while others are suffering. They reason from the supposition that wealth is the product of "labor," leaving out of consideration the element of "ability," which others regard as even more essential in the development of the natural resources. They disclaim any revolutionary tendencies and insist that their social ideas are the natural consequence of the doctrines of democracy.

The anarchists find the reforms suggested by the socialists inadequate. They do not ascribe the ills of which they complain to any particular form of society, but to society itself. Their idea is to annihilate all social structures and to set each man free—free as the beasts of the field, who know of no government, no social relations. The means whereby this is to be effected is the brutal force. Many of them openly advocate the destruction of accumulated wealth and the assassination of all who attempt to guard the lives and property of their fellowmen. It takes only a moment's reflection upon what the condition of the world would be without laws, without soclety, without government of any kind, to rouse just indignation at the bare suggestion of such an idea in this age of boasted advancement. The clamor to reduce society to a level below that of the humblest savage cannot be considered anything but the ravings of maniacs, very dangerous specimens of that unfortunate class. Anarchism is the opposite of socialism.

The fundamental error in the reasoning of all these reformers is that they leave out of consideration the moral condition of man as an individual and direct all their attention to the social structure. They forget that whatever defects and ills may be found in that structure are primarily due to the moral condition of the individuals of which the society consists. Reformatory efforts not dealing with individuals in the first instance must always prove a failure. It is not possible to rear a solid arch of worthless material.

It was and is the chief aim of Christianity to form a social structure of perfect architecture. The Founder of that system, even if regarded only as a social reformer, must be admitted to be the greatest who ever lived. He struck the key note to all successful efforts to better the human existence on earth by teaching individual righteousness and brotherly love. Without these virtues reforms are of little avail. Pope Leo, on his eighty-fourth birthday, a few days ago, evidently had something like this in view when he said he would devote his life to carrying out the beneficent action of the church, and added:

"The need of this is great, for all the old conceptions of honesty, justice, authority, liberty, social rights and social duties have been overthrown. The church must seek to recall nations to the principles of modern faith and point out the true cause of existing evils."

Could this be done; could the Church recall the world to a consideration of the true principles of morals and effect a change in this regard, society would in time be rid of all the evils of which modern critics so loudly complain. That is the mission upon which the Church of Jesus Christ has entered. Its errand is to work reform, its founders and its adherents are reformers in the best and most extended sense of the term.

THE APACHE KID.

The Apache Indian known as the "Kid," whose capture by scouts is confidently expected to take place in the near future, is supposed to be the only hostile chief still living in the United States. A reward of $5,000 has been offered for his apprehension, dead or alive, by Governor Hughes of Arizona, and it goes without saying that his pursuers, spurred on by the prospect of this reward, will leave no stone unturned in their search for the high-prized outlaw. He is at present thought to be hiding in the Sierra Madre mountains suffering from a wound in his leg. The only question, if this supposition is correct, would therefore be of finding his hiding place and finishing his career.

In a recent number of the Chicago Herald appear some particulars of this noted Indian. He is about 33 years old, and commenced his career twelve years ago as a scout in the service of the military, becoming sergeant in a company of scouts. The killing of his stepfather was revenged by Kid by the murder of the slayer, after which he surrendered himself to the authorities at San Carlos. But while being taken to the guardhouse in company with other Indians, an attack was made by them on the guards and they escaped to the mountains. This was in 1897. From this time the band wandered about, plundering ranches and killing cattle. After some time, however, the leader surrendered to General Miles and was sentenced to imprisonment. He was subsequently pardoned by General Howard and brought to San Carlos where he was again arrested on the old charge and sentenced to imprisonment. While on the road to the prison he and his fellow prisoners managed to kill the sheriff and his deputy and escape, taking with them the ammunition. They now crossed the Mexican border, pursued by cavalry. His comrades were all killed by Mexican troops but Kid himself eluded the soldiers of two countries and with his squaws continued the raids on unprotected ranches.

The last murder ascribed to the Apache chieftain is that of an Indian on the White Mountain reservation. The true character of the notorious outlaw is best reflected in his own words as given to a correspondent who interviewed him shortly before the skirmish at Bunker Hill. He said:

When Geronimo laid down his arms to Crook I was willing to go back with the rest of them if I could have hoped for anything. But I am not a fool. I knew what to look for from the good government which permits the robbery of the Indian and the debauchery of his wife. Was I right? Look where those red men are today! They, to whom liberty is life, the plain and its pure fresh breezes everything, are pining away in amoras of the south, far away from all that is dear to them; they are without hope of ever seeing their old homes again. No, I would rather die here on my native earth, with my gun in my hand, fighting to the last.

It cannot be justifiable to say one word of apology for the sanguinary record made by the desperate warrior, but no one can fail to notice that his words do not resemble the ravings of a depraved criminal. Under different circumstances the sentiments expressed would be characterized as patriotism. In some respects they are too true; and they give a glint of hope that the government in dealing with him may accomplish all that is necessary for the protection of the settlers, by treating him as the desperate representative of a conquered race and a lost cause rather than a defiant villain and a cut-throat.

A REMARKABLE CRUSADE.

It seems that the managers of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union have conceived the idea of getting up a petition to the various governments of the world for the abolishment of the traffic in alcohol and opium and "vice." The petition is said to have received so far two million signatures and it is proposed to add another million before long. Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Frances Willard have charge of the business and propose to enter upon a crusade of immense proportions against the evils mentioned. The World's Fair and the world's congresses on scientific, social and religious topics are to be followed up by a world's war on sin.

The Review of Churches, whose editor, Dr. Lunn, has been requested by the before mentioned ladies to organize the campaign, contains the plan which it is proposed to follow. A party of one hundred will embark in the crusade, and afterwards in a steamship which is to be chartered. The committee will take the convention of the W. C. T. U., to be held in this country in October next, as the starting point. Washington will first be visited and the mammoth petition will be presented there to the powers that be. By October 27 the ladies will be ready for their steamship and will leave New York for London, where, after having joined the English contingent of the crusaders, they will hold a grand demonstration in the famous Exeter Hall on November 1st and 2nd. The next day the reinforced army will sail for Naples and, after having touched at that point, proceed to Rome, where it is proposed to seek an audience with the pope and King Humbert. From Rome the ladies propose to go to Athens and call on King George and then start for Jaffa and Jerusalem, where the petition is to be rolled out before the astonished eyes of the patriarch, after which the youthful khedive in Cairo is to be visited. From Egypt the party goes east and will return across the Pacific. Such is the program.

And now the question may be permitted, Do the ladies referred to suppose for one moment that such a trip round the world will benefit anybody except themselves, who may perhaps need the recreation and valuable experience to be derived from it? If they do they will return a great deal wiser than they are at present. The very idea that the traffic in opium, for instance, can receive a serious check, or indeed any restriction at all, as a result of a meeting in Exeter hall is altogether too infantile in its conception. In the past there has been no lack of meetings and speeches and protests. But they have all stranded against the fact that the traffic is profitable to those who engage in it, and gold sovereigns weigh a good deal more than a million names on a petition.

But granting for a moment the supposed efficacy of petitions as a weapon against national vices, the route of the valiant knights seems to be defectively planned in several essentials. After having disposed of Washington, London and Rome, it sends the bearers of the petition direct to Athens, forgetting, it seems, not only France with all its alleged vices, but also the ruler of Monte Carlo, who ought to be entitled to some consideration. It may be necessary for the purpose of suppressing the traffic in alcohol to reach King George of Greece as hurriedly as possible and also the patriarch of Jerusalem, who is said to be rather fond of old grape juice, but it is a pity that some time could not be spent with the sultan of Morocco and some of the Bedouin chiefs of Arabia, few of whom, if reports are true, are any too virtuous. While in Jerusalem the expedition might at least pay a visit to the old sheik who used to live north of that city in the so-called Jeremiah's cave, and secure his influence in the cause. It can be bought for less than a dollar and might not be without value in the proposed interview with the khedive. Any amount of amendments in this direction are called for to render the plan harmonious in all its details.

But without joking, it is probably proposed that the members of the W. C. T. U. all over the world foot the expenses of this remarkable campaign. If this surmise is correct, their attention should be called to the fact that the money which they contribute for temperance purposes is thrown away as far as this expedition is concerned. If they choose to pay the expenses of a tourist party that proposes to have a good time in a voyage round the world, they are at liberty to do so. But they should not be made to believe that they are contributing towards a campaign against intemperance or any other vice.

HELPING THE POOR.

The report made at the recent Salt Lake Stake conference regarding the contributions for the poor is one that is highly complimentary to the Latter-day Saints. It was stated that notwithstanding the stringency of the times the amounts donated by the Saints of the Stake for the benefit of the poor had not fallen short, but that the people had been more free than in flush times. Yet the exigencies of the case have been so great that in order to supply the needy there has been a heavy draft on Church funds that should be devoted to other purposes. It is essential therefore, that still further efforts should be put forth by the Saints to fully and properly cope with the situation. This is a matter which should receive immediate attention, that the people may discharge their whole duty in the premises, and none of their interests be unnecessarily burdened.

Salt Lake Stake has the largest share of those affected by poverty; but others have poor people also, and the accounts rendered at the various Stake conferences show the feeling of generosity exhibited in this Stake to be general throughout these valleys—the Saints are giving liberally of their means for the support of the poor among them.

In this charitable work of aiding those who are the unfortunate victims of poverty and distress, they who have charge of the distribution of funds know no distinction of class, color or creed among those whose wants are made known. Of course Church officers in the various Stakes and wards usually are better informed of the condition of Church members than of others, because the former are naturally more free to state their situation to their co-religionists than would be those not included with the congregation of Latter-day Saints; but under existing circumstances more than usual efforts have been put forth to ascertain where families are in need, so that there has been no occasion for extreme suffering for the necessities of life.

It is perhaps the case that there are people who have not been helped as much as they think they should have been. It would be strange if there were not. Some are too backward in stating their needs, and it might be that the true condition of a portion of these has not been fully realized at first, yet under the system which prevails such instances are few and far between, and cannot go long without becoming known. There are some people, however, who are not easily satisfied, and who think that when charitable work is going on they should receive the cream of all that is being distributed, and should not be required to make any effort for themselves. The reports made show that not even the latter class has been neglected.

With the Latter-day Saints it is a sacred religious duty to give proper care to the poor and the needy, the sick and the afflicted. The inspiration that leads them to hold fellowship in the Church gives them "hearts that can feel for another's deep woe," and therefore they are not slow in contributing as may be necessary for the comfort of those who are unfortunate. Whatever deficiency there may be in any section they no doubt will make up. They delight in giving to those who are worthy recipients of the gift, and would rather feed ninety and nine unworthy persons than miss one who is truly in need. Yet while it is their duty as Saints to provide for the poor, it is equally a religious obligation not to encourage idleness in their midst. When there are people who have the ability and opportunity to work and earn their living but will not do so, these cut themselves off from any claim for aid. It becomes the duty, therefore, of those who control the distribution of charities to discriminate and draw the line at this point; for while the Lord requires His people to impart of their substance "unto him that standeth in need," He also directs that "he that is idle shall not eat the bread nor wear the garments of the laborer."

We are pleased to make the record that the Saints generally have not been found wanting in their obligations to the poor. The exercise of retrenchment that has been necessary has been made to apply to themselves, and not to those who were in a position to require aid. They have in a measure denied themselves that they might mete out more liberally to the poor. Not that they have exceeded their duty an iota in this regard, for they have not. As stated, there is room for still better work. But it is gratifying to record cheerful and prompt performance of duty and thereby encourage a continuance and further development in the noble work. "The Lord loveth a cheerful giver," and the divine love is testified to in its more perfect manifestation by the recipient.

ROSEBERRY'S THREE AMBITIONS.

Anecdotes of Lord Rosebery are the fashion since his elevation to the dazzling height of the British premiership, and one that is peculiarly appropriate is a prediction concerning himself made when he left Oxford university only a comparatively few years ago. On that occasion he declared that there were three ambitions in his heart which he intended to make it his life's business to satisfy. The first was, to marry the greatest heiress in England; the second, to become prime minister; and the third, to win the Derby. By wedding the daughter of Baron Rothschild, Miss Hannah, whose individual annual income was considerably upwards of five hundred thousand, he achieved the first of these objects. The retirement of Gladstone at an unexpected moment has hastened the fulfillment of the second ambition. And as for the third, perhaps placed last because he is like some Englishmen in deeming it the greatest—his colt Ladas is deemed the most likely of all the three-year-olds that will compete for the blue ribbon honors of the English turf at Epsom Downs next June, and stands favorite with those who back their judgment of horses with their cash.

ASSAILING THE CONSTITUTION.

The proposition made by the Knights of Labor that the workmen's unions establish a strong lobby in Washington to secure laws favorable to the working classes and prevent adverse legislation, is receiving the support of the various national and international trade and labor unions in the country, of which there are about fifty, with a membership of more than three millions. The reason that such a course has not been pursued long since is because the different labor organizations have stood apart, and have exhibited no unanimity of effort in this line. Combination now seems to be the policy of the leaders in the various brotherhoods. They are recognizing the fact that there is more legislation made in the lobby than in either house of Congress, and that while capitalists keep an active lobby at work, if the labor movement would be on an equal footing in legislative halls it must be through a similar agency.

But there is one feature connected with the program of the Knights of Labor, as announced by the general master workman, which should not only not receive the support of labor unions but should awake lively antagonism in the breast of every loyal citizen, whether he be merchant, banker, mechanic or hod-carrier. This is the assault that it is proposed to make on the national Constitution, involving a vital change in the fundamental principles of the government.

Mr. Sovereign calls upon the workmen to "go out into the highways and hedges and call the weary wanderers to the sanctuary and marshall the hosts of toil for a final and triumphant struggle for everlasting freedom from the thralldom of greed," and says, "We will bring the great avenues of distribution within easy reach of the masses, elect all legislative, executive and judiciary officers of the general government, and take away the veto powers of the President. Thus we will give to the individual world a system menaced by no tramp at one end and no princely duke at the other."

There is more sound than sense to such expressions as these, and much more of socialistic enmity to the Republic than either. The framers of the Constitution worked wisely and well when they drafted that precious document. Its principles were nurtured in patriotism, and were born of an undying love of justice and human liberty. The system provided for a combination of the elective and appointive agencies that should express the popular will in safe and convenient form and yet guard against hasty and unreasoning popular clamor. The reasons for adopting the system were elaborately discussed, carefully weighed, and wisely passed upon. We shall not attempt to review them now. With the development of the nation, additions and amendments to the Constitution have been necessary, but no change has been required in the general plan, so far as the welfare of a free and patriotic people is concerned. And any such general assault on the constitutional form of government in this country as would characterize it as a system menaced by a "tramp at one end" and a "princely duke at the other" should be hotly resented by every patriotic American, whether the assault be made by the chief of an extensive labor organization or an ordinary Haymarket anarchist. Such persons should be given to understand that the great palladium of liberty and rights in this nation is in its general inception and plan suited to every one fit to enjoy the privileges of American citizenship.

That there are abuses under our laws everyone will admit; that laboring men have good cause to complain in many ways is also true. But the remedy for the wrong lies in the exercise of constitutional powers, not in the abrogation of the Constitution. We are of the opinion that any organization which makes a serious business of threatening such vital changes in the Constitution as those proposed will find that in the effort their "wanderers" will become more weary still, and that the "final and triumphant struggle" will place the victory on the other side. All citizens should work with vigor and determination for needed reforms, but individuals or organizations who seek to revolutionize constitutional government in this country must be invited to take a back seat and forced there. The nation can get along better without them.

SAINTS AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

A correspondent calls the attention of the News to the fact that persons who have membership in the Church, some of them influential in the locality where they reside, have taken upon them the obligations, oaths and agreements of certain secret societies, thus becoming members of such organizations. The inquiry is made as to whether it is consistent for a professing Latter-day Saint to unite with a secret order or society.

The position of the Church on this matter has been clearly defined in the scriptures, by revelation, both ancient and modern, and by earnest, repeated and consistent instructions from those in authority. It is almost inconceivable that there should be any uncertainty or doubt as to what the rule of the Church and the duty of the Saints is in this regard. There has been no change in the revelations, no change in the teachings of the Church, and no change that we are aware of in the secret orders and organizations themselves. And yet there appears to be necessity for fresh warning on the subject lest some be unwittingly led into transgression through following the uncondemned example of others.

Let it be understood, therefore, that those who are numbered with the Latter-day Saints have no place whatever in any of the secret orders, societies, combinations or unions of the day. The proper and safe course for each member of the Church is to leave this class of organizations severely alone.

At various times in the history of the ancient inhabitants of this continent secret societies flourished among the people, so that "they did have their signs, yea, their secret signs, and their secret words;" they had their "oaths, their covenants, and their agreements;" their works in connection with their societies were in secret, or in darkness. In every instance the existence of these organizations brought condemnation and sorrow upon the people or the nation that encouraged them, in accordance with the declaration of the Lord: "Yea, and cursed be the land for ever and ever unto those workers of darkness and secret combinations, even unto destruction, except they repent before they are fully ripe."

The historical examples referred to and the word of the Lord quoted should be sufficient warning to every Latter-day Saint; for though the nations in which these societies existed have passed away, leaving only a remnant on the land, the Lord revealed through His Prophets in ancient times that in the present age, in this nation, such organizations would again exist, "secret combinations, even as in times of old, according to the combinations of the devil, for he is the foundation of all these things; yea, the foundation of murders, and works of darkness; yea, and he leadeth them by the neck with a flaxen cord, until he bindeth them with his strong cords forever;" and of these the Lord said: "That my covenants may be fulfilled which I have made unto the children of men, that I would do unto them while they are in the flesh, I must needs destroy these secret works of darkness, and of murders, and of abominations." The reason for the divine condemnation of such organizations may be found in the reason which the Savior gave to His disciples as to why men worked in secret combinations or in darkness: "They love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil." Individuals who have membership in the Church should hold perfect communion through the appointed channels with its Head. When any of them unite with secret, oath-bound societies, they are thereby obligated to "hide their counsels from the Lord," and therefore have taken a long stride toward an apostate condition, and ought to take the first opportunity of retracing their steps.

It may be urged that these societies are formed merely for beneficent purposes. Such, we have no doubt, are their avowed objects, and these are perhaps the only ones ostensibly sought. But why, then, is there need for the secrecy and darkness of their works? The presentation of such a theory in advocating their cause among the Saints has its perfect simile in the evil one leading people "by the neck with a flaxen cord," until they can be bound more firmly with harsher and stronger thongs. There is no question that unions may be and have been formed which have accomplished much good in improving the condition of men. But the fact that they may have done and can do good does not dispose of the objection that they can also do harm. Certainly in their banding together to help one another and resist all outsiders their tendency is to create hostility between classes, to exact allegiance to one's fellows which may not be properly given, and eventually to menace society, order and government.

It is a matter of history that trades unions, originally organized for the mutual protection and benefit of members, in the main have passed out of that field. The causes which have produced the change we will not discuss now; it is sufficient to know that it has taken place. From the original position of union for defense against oppression they have in turn become oppressors. They now endeavor to exclude from employment those who do not choose to become members of the organizations; within the scope of the power which they claim and attempt to exercise is that of compelling the granting of their requests, frequently regardless of the property rights of those upon whom their demands are made. Passing from a legitimate field of unity for mutual benefit, they are ambitious to aggrandize themselves at the expense of others, and practically have become secret societies whose object is to gain means and power to control in the affairs of men. Of course, secret associations of this order are not confined to the industrial classes. Federations of capitalists and employers are entered into, one of the alleged objects being to meet and resist what are deemed the unjust demands of labor unions. These federations also engage in secret conclaves, and from the methods which they follow it is beyond question that their chief object is the acquisition of wealth by any means available, and the combination of power to retain the ascendancy over the masses and crush out anything that tends to diminish their autocracy.

Beyond these there are numerous other secret societies, in business, religious, political and social circles, all having in view a similar object, viz: to get power and gain. There are monopolies, trusts, combinations and federations almost without limit, all studying to advance their own interests and gratify their selfish desires, without regard for the welfare or the rights of others.

Were the methods employed confined to the moral forces, there might some hope that the progress of these organizations would not prove a means of convulsing society or disrupting governments. But the experience of the past dispels such hopes; modern as well as ancient history bears witness that neither life nor property is regarded by these organizations when wrought up to the pitch of determination in gaining their ends; whether it be the violence of a strike, the secret assassin or incendiary, or other invasion of human rights, the lesson taught is the same: If there would safety in governments or peace in society, every such secret combination with ambitions in the direction of power or wealth must be uprooted. They are in their very genius opposed to the independence of individuals, the freedom of the people in a governmental capacity, and the righteousness and development of men and women in the field of religion.

The very existence of "secret combinations to get power and gain" is ominous of evil. The nation which encourages them or permits them to increase under its fostering care nurtures an enemy that will encompass national dissolution. The Lord has said that "whatsoever nation shall uphold such secret combinations, to get power and gain, until they spread over the nation, behold they shall be destroyed," and His word will not return to Him unfulfilled. Centuries ago the voice of prophecy uttered a warning to the people of today to beware of these combinations because of the development in them of a tendency for evil, and to the Gentile nations of the present age the Lord sends admonition to "suffer not that these murderous combinations shall get above you, which are built up to get power and gain, and the work, yea, even the work of destruction come upon you, yea, even the sword of the justice of the eternal God shall fall upon you, to your overthrow and destruction, if ye shall suffer these things to be; wherefore the Lord commandeth you, when ye shall see these things come among you, that ye shall awake to a sense of your awful situation, because of this secret combination which shall be among you, or we be unto it, because of the blood of them who have been slain; for they cry from the dust for vengeance upon it, and also upon those who build it up."

It is a measure of self-preservation for the Saints to keep themselves apart from all these secret societies and combinations. Whosoever buildeth them up, whether he may fully realize it or not, "seeketh to overthrow the freedom of all lands, nations and countries." The mission of the Latter-day Saints is not in harmony with such a proceeding. The obligations resting upon all who retain membership in the Church are very strict in this regard; instead of overthrowing the freedom of men, their calling is to seek the blessings of liberty for every nation—to labor that oppression and evil may be done away, and "that the time may come that Satan may have no power upon the hearts of the children of men, but that they may be persuaded to do good continually, that they may come unto the fountain of all righteousness and be saved."

HIS OLD OFFICE.

The NEWS notices among the appointments of the Governor and Legislative Assembly the name of Bishop

John R. Winder as president of the Deseret Agricultural and Manufacturing Society; and it takes occasion to say that there is perfect safety in voicing the assurance that the people of the Territory will heartily endorse this appointment. As we remember it Bishop Winder was a director of the institution from its organization, and president of it for many years up to 1890. During all this time he has been one of its most prominent supporters, and his long experience in and knowledge of the country and its requirements eminently qualify him to fill the position.

In this same connection it will not be inopportune to remark that the Governor's appointments to Territorial offices and his selections of men to fill the various Territorial boards, will meet with general approval. He has shown conspicuous fairness to the different sections of the Territory, and in the fitness of his appointees he has given admirable evidence of his interest in the welfare of the institutions affected.

A DESERTED CITY IN MEXICO.

The Anglo-American, published at the City of Mexico, in its issue of the 4th of March quotes from an exchange an account of the recent discovery of a beautiful deserted city, by an English mining man, M. W. Cresworth, who had just arrived at Mapimi, Mexico, from a long overland journey through the Sierra Madre mountains. Mr. Cresworth started from Culican, near the Pacific coast, in the state of Sinaloa; and he came upon the deserted city about eighty miles west of Lake Colorado, in the very recesses of the Sierra Madre range, where it occupies a basin ten miles long by eight miles wide, the basin being surrounded by perpendicular cliffs on all sides, rising to a height of hundreds of feet. The only entrance to the city is through a deep canyon thirty feet wide. Mr. Cresworth says he stumbled into the secret entrance by accident. The buildings, he says, are constructed of blocks of red stone resembling granite. The business blocks are two and three stories in height, and are different in architectural design from the structures built by the Aztecs and Spaniards. The streets are narrow, but are laid out in regular order. In the city is a small park, which is overgrown with rare flowers and tropical vegetation. He found many strange ornaments, but little of value.

It is probable that this same discovery is the one alluded to in a late issue of the New York Sun, only that in the latter paper the traveler is described as a citizen of the United States. The Sun points out that the incident tallies curiously with a local Mexican tradition of a long-lost and long-forgotten city in that locality. Adjoining the state of Sinaloa on the south is the state of Jalisco, and of this state Guadalajara is the capital. Living in the mountains of Jalisco, part of the same great Sierra Madre or "Mother Range" that extends through Sinaloa and thence northward, are the Southern Yaquis, a brown-haired people with light eyes and almost fair complexions.

Guadalajara is the only civilized town that these Yaquis visit, and the Sun says it has long been believed there that the Yaqui fastnesses of the Sierra Madre range conceal not only rich mines of silver, but as well the lost city of the Aztec race. No one has hitherto pierced the mountain wilderness, because the naked Yaquis have an effective system of passive resistance that has hitherto successfully closed the sole line of approach. It is improbable, however, that the southern Yaquis would have the objection to an intelligent expedition undertaken for exploration and research that they would to a swaggering horde bent on conquest; and the Mexican paper partially promises a full and exact description of the interesting "find" in the near future.

THE LEGISLATURE.

While party organs laud or condemn the late Legislature, individually and collectively, the NEWS, from its non-partisan standpoint, will discharge the duty of informing the people of the Territory what kind of a body it really was, and will suggest how it may be improved upon when another general election shall come around. From first to last it was an intensely partisan Assembly. From the moment that it opened until the gavel fell for the last time, in token of final adjournment, each branch was an almost continuous scene of party wrangle. Partisanship rather than statesmanship has characterized the session to a marked degree.

There were some men in the Assembly who possess great talent, and would be valuable in such a body were their abilities directed to disinterested efforts in behalf of the public welfare. There were others whose caliber, or rather lack of it, occasioned constant surprise that they should ever have landed in the Legislature. Greatness continues to be thrust upon individuals who were not born to it, and could never have attained it but for the thrusting process.

Elsewhere in this issue appears a condensed review of the more important bills that were introduced, and failed or passed. From this record it will appear that some good work, and but little if any that is likely to prove really bad, was accomplished. Determined efforts were made, however, to secure the passage of certain measures which, had they become law, would have resulted in incalculable damage to the Territory. Reference is here made to the financial legislation that was attempted. In this connection a curious test of statesmanship was presented to the legislators, that applied to them individually, and, in our opinion, was a fair measure of their caliber. Would they vote to correct a patent injustice in the present tax laws, and at the same time increase the public revenue, or would they rise to a higher and broader view of the situation, and, for the sake of the vast benefits to be gained by a stable and conservative policy, bear with any minor injustice which that policy might involve? The concentrated influence of business men and financiers and of a territorial press that was practically united upon this question, regardless of party politics, at last prevailed upon a majority to pursue the wiser course; but at one time it appeared that the Legislature would gulp down a camel while straining at a gnat, and the highest financial interests of the commonwealth hung trembling in the balance. Happily, that danger is past.

There was one evil which exerted a marked effect upon legislation at this session, and, in fact, controlled much of it, which it is to be hoped will never be tolerated in another Utah legislative body, the caucus whip. The Republican caucus was never controlled by more than a bare majority of its members, but it dominated the entire Legislature, and in this way a minority ruled. To this condition is due the failure to unite the higher educational institutions, for which failure the late defunct Legislature will always be censured by the overwhelming majority of the people of the whole Territory. It is a fact that the Democrats of the House were practically solid in support of Nebeker's bill to unite the University and Agricultural College, and that several Republicans had promised to vote for it. But a Republican caucus, controlled by a bare majority, decided that the consolidation should not take place, and members whose duty was plain before them, and whose pledges had been given, cowered under the caucus whip, and did its wielder's bidding.

The record of Governor West, in connection with that of the Legislature, hardly comes up to the statesmanship he had an opportunity to display. His veto of the tax levy bill perpetuates a violation of the rule that prevails in nearly all the states, under which the taxes that maintain the schools are mainly local, and continues a gross injustice from which Salt Lake county has long suffered. That bill proposed to take from the Territorial school tax half a mill, and add it to the Territorial general tax. The amount produced annually by the half mill is about $25,000. This would have removed part of the burden this county is now carrying to educate the children of the outlying counties, and would have greatly relieved the Territorial treasury. The Governor pathetically and repeatedly appealed to the Legislature to appropriate public money in order to provide employment for the poor, but he killed, by the pocketing process, a bill that was specially intended to provide employment by encouraging certain manufactures. We do not refer to the various bounty bills, to which, as a Democrat, he might naturally be deemed opposed, but to the bill, which some Democrats in the Legislature and very many out of it approved, exempting from taxation for a term of years investments in certain manufacturing enterprises, chemical works, etc. This measure seemed well calculated to induce the creation of these industries without taking a dollar from the public treasury for the purpose; but it was permitted to die for lack of any action on the part of the executive; no statement of objections being made, and consequently no opportunity given for amendment that might have removed the objections.

Space will not permit at present the discussion of the various measures that have been enacted and approved into law. Some of them were necessary, some not; generally speaking, where the Governor has suggested amendments and they have been made, the respective bills have been improved, and in one or two instances his veto was certainly beneficial. We think the people will approve the economical spirit that has characterized the session, and will be disposed to charity in their criticism, through a realization that the Territory is regarded as in a transitory state verging upon early statehood. The volume of session laws will not be very bulky, and on the whole this feature will be acceptable. Finally, we are quite prepared to believe that when next it shall become the duty of the people of Utah to choose a Legislature, they will look to the manhood and capacity for statesmanship of a candidate more than to the rigidity of his party creed or his prominence as a party worker. This is not saying that voters should not maintain party fealty and integrity, for that they are expected to do, and should do, and, we doubt not, will do. But a freeman's privilege is in no way compatible with cringing subserviency; and it is the duty of patriotism, in this newly-inaugurated business of politics, to purify rather than pander to recognized evils in the modern game, to frown upon cowardice rather than stifle independence, and to cultivate courage rather than yield to the sneers of bigotry.

THE REBELLION ENDED.

At last it seems that the revolutionary movement in Brazil is about to be ended and that Peixoto has triumphed over his adversaries. Official dispatches to Washington from Minister Thompson convey the intelligence that Da Gama, the commander of the rebel fleet in Rio bay, has left his vessels and sought refuge on a Portuguese man-of-war, and that he has offered to surrender on condition that he and his officers be allowed to depart in peace and that the lives of his soldiers and sailors be spared.

This sudden collapse is apparently due to the firm stand taken by Peixoto, who within the last few days has placed his fleet in a position of attack and given notice that the bombardment would be commenced today, March 18. Rather than take chances on a defeat in battle and probable capture, the rebel commander chose to give in at the first show of force on the part of the government, demonstrating at last the all-along suspected weakness of his cause.

The rebellion commenced for the ostensible purpose of liberating the Brazilians from the alleged autocratic acts of their chief executive. But a certain manifesto issued by Da Gama gave ground for the suspicion that the movement was really in the interest of the monarchy, the intention being to restore that form of government. Da Gama, it seems, was a trusted naval officer in the employ of the government, who taking advantage of his position, seized part of the fleet and turned its guns against the country. The plan was that he should have charge of the naval operations, while Mello, who gallantly effected his escape from Rio notwithstanding the cross fire from the government forts, was to lead a force over land from the south to his support.

The great secret from the beginning was as to the source from which the rebels were supplied with the sinews of war, and many allegations were made that they subsisted mainly on English capital. Be this as it may, their plans were not successful. The rebellion in the south did not make marked progress, and Da Gama was left in Rio bay with his small fleet unable to make an attack on the capital. In the meantime Peixoto had all the time he needed to procure another fleet vastly superior to that of the rebels. The appearance of this has brought Da Gama to his knees and probably made a virtual end to the insurrection.

KIND WORDS.

An Ogden correspondent favors us with a clipping from the Holmes County Advertiser, published at Westville, Florida, which shows an unusually friendly feeling toward the Elders now laboring in that part of the Southern States mission. The editor's text was the death of a child, whose parents were his old-time friends and who are now members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. He attended the funeral, and this is what he had to say about it in the next issue of his paper:

We attended one of the most impressive burial ceremonies last Tuesday evening we ever saw, the burial of friend Stanton's little infant. The burial ceremony was conducted by Elders Henderson and Ridges of the Mormon Church. The attendance was large, and the interest in the songs of Bro. Ridges and the words of Bro. Henderson was very great. We cannot but think that the prejudices against our Mormon friends is foolish. After all, from our standpoint, our Mormon friends or visitors are entitled to as much recognition and respectability as any other sect. How silly then to persecute them! * * * We declare, that we love those of them who come to Westville, for they come up precisely in their practice to the Bible doctrine, as far as doing is concerned, and after all doing is better than promising to do.

CONFERENCE NOTICE.

The Sixty-fourth Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints will convene in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, at 10 o'clock on Friday morning, April 6th, 1894.

The officers and members of the Church generally are cordially invited to attend the meeting of the Conference.

WILFORD WOODRUFF,
GEORGE Q. CANNON,
JOSEPH F. SMITH,

First Presidency.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Written for this Paper.

SNOWFLAKE STAKES.

SNOWFLAKE, Apache Co.,
Arizona, Feb. 27, 1894.

The Snowflake Stake of Zion embraces the Saints residing in the western half of Apache county, Arizona, and also one ward now called Tuba City, but formerly known as Moan Coppy, situated in Coconino county. There are also a few Saints on Pine creek, in the so-called Tonto Basin, about 150 miles west of Snowflake. But the bulk of the Saints comprising the Stake reside in settlements situated on the Little Colorado river, and its tributaries. The Stake consists of seven wards, namely, Snowflake, Taylor, Pinedale, Showlow, Woodruff, St. Joseph and Tuba City. The total membership of the Stake in December last was as follows: two Patriarchs, fifty-four Seventies, fifty-seven High Priests, eighty-six Elders, fifteen Priests, twelve Teachers, eighty-four Deacons, 656 lay members and 516 children under 8 years of age, making a total of 1,482 souls, which represents 243 families. Jesse N. Smith, a cousin of the Prophet Joseph Smith and a man widely and favorably known from his labors in the interest of God's cause, both at home and abroad, presides over the Stake; he resides at Snowflake. Lorenzo H. Hatch, formerly Bishop of Franklin, Idaho, is first counselor in the Stake presidency; he also officiates as the senior Patriarch in the Stake and resides in Woodruff. Elder Joseph H. Richards, whose place of residence is St. Joseph and who has recently returned from a mission to Scotland, is second counselor in the Stake presidency.

The town of Snowflake, thus named in honor of the late Apostle Erastus Snow and the founder of the town, Elder Wm. J. Flake (who still resides here) is pleasantly situated in a beautiful little valley about two miles long from north to south and something over a mile wide at its widest place. Silver Creek, a tributary of the Little Colorado river, cuts through the valley from south to north and puts into the river named at a point about twenty miles north of Snowflake. This stream supplies the town with water for culinary and irrigating purposes and the settlement is on the west side of the stream. Snowflake is 45 miles west of St. Johns, the county seat of Apache county, 65 miles north of Fort Apache, 28 miles by nearest wagon road southwest of Holbrook, the nearest railway station, and 18 miles north of the main body of timber which covers the more elevated heights of the Mogollon mountains.

In conceiving of this little oasis in the desert as a valley, the Utah readers of the NEWS must not imagine that it is surrounded by mountains; there are no mountains—such as we would call mountains in Utah—in sight from Snowflake, but that which surrounds the place and suggests the idea of a valley are cedar-covered bluffs or rolling hills which perhaps nowhere in the immediate vicinity of the settlement exceeds one hundred feet in actual height. As the traveler approaches Snowflake on the Woodruff road from the north he is apt to be favorably impressed with the appearance of the settlement. Clustered around the Stake house (the spire of which, though not very lofty, points gracefully toward heaven), the stranger at once notices a number of fine brick dwellings and business houses standing in the midst of young, thrifty orchards, while the town itself is surrounded by well cultivated fields, properly fenced and systematically laid out by the respective owners for irrigation purposes. The town also is accurately laid out in blocks 24 rods square and with streets six rods wide. The dimensions of the Stake house, which is not yet completed inside, are 65x85 feet in length and breadth and 21 feet high from floor to ceiling. There is also a gallery; the stand is in the west end.

Thrift and industry is seen on every hand, and the good Saints of Snowflake are hopeful for the future, though the building up of their settlement has been fraught with many difficulties and hardships. But the worst seems now to be over; the prospect of making large reservoirs in the immediate vicinity of the town will undoubtedly greatly increase the population in the near future. John Hunt, a son of the late Captain Jefferson Hunt, of Mormon battalion fame, is the Bishop of the place; Wm. J. Flake, the founder of the settlement, and John Rartchner are his counselors; 81 families and 446 souls constitute the membership of the ward.

Woodruff, thus named in honor of President Woodruff, is desirably located in a little valley about a mile square on the right bank of the Little Colorado river, at an altitude of 5,300 feet. Twenty-six Mormon families, numbering 183 souls, and a small sprinkling of non-members constitute the population. The settlement is 21½ miles north of Snowflake, and 12 miles southeast of Holbrook. There is about 1,000 acres of good land in the vicinity of Woodruff, of which about 800 acres are carefully cultivated and irrigated by ditches which head a dam constructed across the river, at an enormous expense, just above the town. Dam after dam has been built by the settlers, all of which, save the present one, have been washed away in regular succession. The present dam, which bids fair to remain, as it is built in a very substantial manner, thirty-five feet high and about 250 feet long; it throws the river entirely out of its natural channel onto a ledge of solid rock on the east side, thus forming a beautiful cataract, and a grand one in times of high water. The chief products of Woodruff are similar to Snowflake, wheat, oats and corn are raised in small quantities, while vegetables sufficient for home consumption and considerable for exportation is raised. Eleven squashes raised in Woodruff in 1892 yielded a gross weight of 389½ pounds, while watermelons weighing fifty pounds are frequently raised. Fruits, such as currants, raspberries, gooseberries, grapes, peaches, apples and plums would do remarkably well, if water for irrigation purposes could be permanently secured. Levi H. Savage, a son of Levi Savage, of Toquerville, Utah, is the Bishop of Woodruff.

Holbrook, situated on the Atlantic and Pacific railroad and on the Little Colorado river, at an altitude of 5,072 feet, is the shipping point for most of the Mormon settlements in the Snowflake Stake. The place, which consists of a few business houses, and a limited number of private dwellings, mainly situated on one street running parallel with the railway track is 253 miles west of Albuquerque, New Mexico. The most important mercantile establishment of Holbrook is the Arizona Co-operative Mercantile Institution, owned principally by our brethren and superintended by Elder John R. Hulet, of Snowflake. This business house is and has been ever since it commenced business, a great help to our people, and on more than one occasion, when disaster has overtaken one or more of our settlements, principally through the washing away of the dams, this institution has come to the rescue of the suffering community, and has advanced food and means to the people, who perhaps otherwise would have been obliged to abandon their location and seek relief elsewhere. Holbrook being the center of a district of country largely devoted to grazing, the stock men get their supplies there, and mainly from the business house mentioned; this brings in ready means which through the many shareholders is distributed in through the several settlements. Supplies for Fort Apache, ninety-three miles distant, are freighted by teams from the railway at Holbrook to the amount of about 3,000,000 pounds annually. There are no Saints at Holbrook, except Brother Hulet, and the brethren who assist him in the store.

St. Joseph, the only one of the four original Arizona settlements planted by the Saints in 1876 on the Little Colorado river now in existence, is situated on the right or north bank of said river, twelve miles west of Holbrook. The 15 families, or 107 souls, of Latter-day Saints who constitute the population of this place sustain among their neighbors the well deserved distinction of being the leading community in point of determination and unflinching courage in battling with the elements around them. While Obed, Brigham City and Sunset succumbed successively to what seemed to be unavoidably, the people of St. Joseph have held the fort in the midst of all "odds," losses and disappointments. The losses in dams alone would perhaps foot up to nearly $50,000, but the prospects are now quite favorable. Like the people of Woodruff, the Saints of St. Joseph have succeeded in damming up the natural channel of the treacherous Colorado, and forcing the water out upon the solid rock on that side of the river where the settlement stands six miles below. But before this victory was achieved scores of former settlers got discouraged and left for other parts of the country leaving only a few of the harder and most determined pioneers to cope with the still existing difficulties. Elder John Bushman, a man of sterling worth and long experience, presides as Bishop of the St. Joseph Ward. His first counselor is Joseph O. Hansen, a son of Jens Hansen of Spanish Fork, Utah; he has charge of the work on the dam. The second counselor is Henry M. Tanner.

On the 9th inst. I visited the defunct settlement of Obed founded by our people in 1876, but vacated in 1877 because of the going out of the dam, and also, because of the unhealthy location, it being in close proximity to an extensive swamp. The old fort walls still stand and most of them are well preserved, as well as the gable ends and rock chimneys of quite a number of the houses. Some of the founders of Obed afterwards became some of the first settlers of Snowflake. Obed was situated on the south side of the Little Colorado river, opposite St. Joseph, and about three miles southeast of that place.

On the 10th inst., in company with Presidents Jesse N. Smith and Joseph H. Richards, I visited the old sites of Sunset and Brigham City, about twenty-five miles below or northwest of St. Joseph. The state of the weather was such as to initiate me quite thoroughly into the realities of a genuine Arizona desert blizzard. In the forenoon it was wind and sand, in the afternoon wind and snow. I have seldom regretted the leaving at home of a heavy overcoat more than I did that day, and had it not been for the wise forethought of the Bishop who prevailed upon me to suit my person to his overcoat, and some quilts which we brought along, it might have fallen to the lot of someone else to write the history of the settlements of Arizona. It was truly a cold day; and I have afterwards learned from the papers that the same storm the following day in its travel eastward swept over the states of Colorado and Indian Territory and that several persons perished from it in Oklahoma. Winds are very frequent in Arizona, in fact that is one of the most unpleasant features of some of our Arizona Settlements. The winds, particularly in the spring of the year will blow, and blow hard, but seldom so hard as on the day when we visited old Sunset.

Sunset was founded by Lot Smith and company in 1876; the settlement consisted of a picket fort about twelve rods square, situated on the river flat about four miles from the present town of Winslow, on the Atlantic and Pacific railway, but on the opposite side of the river. Sections of the picket inclosure and nearly all the rock walls and chimneys of the pioneer's houses are still standing, but everything is desolate, the whole landscape looks dreary and forbidding; and the lonely graveyard on the hillside only, reminds one of a population which was once but is no more. The brethren who were with me expressed their lonesome feelings; for here they had often listened to the songs of Zion as they were sung by a devout people, and here in by one years they had enjoyed the inspiration of heaven as the word of God had been dispensed to the multitude who assembled to worship before God, Sabbath after Sabbath when this place was the headquarters of the Little Colorado Stake of Zion.

The ruins of "old" Brigham City, now occupied by only one family, are seen across the river about one mile southwest of the Sunset site. We approached to within fifty rods of it, but were unable to cross the river at the old mill site, hence, after making our calculations and getting our geographical bearings, in order to write more intelligently about the place, when the history of these two defunct settlements of the Saints shall be written, we returned to our good and warmhearted friends in St. Joseph, thankful to find shelter from the fearful storm which had made our journey so disagreeable.

Taylor is a settlement presided over by Bishop Zechariah B. Decker, and situated on both sides of Silver creek, three and a half miles above Snowflake. A "modern" suspension foot bridge, 200 feet long, connects the two sections of the town. This bridge is so strongly built that even the "heaviest" lady in the settlement can cross over in safety, provided the wind don't blow too hard. It is claimed by the good people of Taylor that their bridge will compare very favorably with the great bridge which connects the two cities New York and Brooklyn, when the difference in population is duly considered. The Taylor ward consists of forty-six families (or 323 souls) of Saints. This includes also the little village of Shumway, which is situated on Silver creek, four miles above Taylor. The natural advantages of Taylor are very similar to those of Snowflake. An incorporated irrigation company controls the irrigation interests of both settlements.

Situated away up in the pine timbers near the top of the Mogollon mountains is the little settlement of Pin-dale, where the people raise grain without irrigation and obtain water for culinary purposes from wells. This is a most romantic place, and though the settlers have struggled hard to make a living in times past, the prospects ahead now seem to be better, and the people are determined to stick to it. Twenty-one families, or 115 souls, presided over by Bishop Niels Peterson, constituted the membership of the ward.

Show Low ward comprises all the scattered settlers on the Show Low creek, a tributary of Silver creek. There are five villages within the limits of this ward, namely, Juniper, Adair, Ellsworth, Fairview or Woodland and Pine Top. From Juniper, the settlement further west to Pine Top eastward the distance is 22 miles. The Bishop (Brother Hansen) resides at Woodland. Except at Ellsworth where the people irrigate their lands from the Show Low, dry farming in the heavy pine forests is the predominant feature in the Show Low ward, the strength of which is 34 families or 202 souls. Accompanied by Pres. Jesse N. Smith I have visited all the settlements in the Snowflake Stake and have preached to the Saints in their different localities. I have also gathered the historical information that is wanted. I found the Stake records in a first-class condition, Elder Joseph Fish, who until quite recently, acted as Stake clerk and historian, has done excellent work. Besides keeping the general Stake books and recording the ordinary minutes up to the date he left the Stake, he has written a general history of the Church in eastern Arizona, including historical sketches of the different wards and settlements in this region of country.

The quarterly conference has just closed in Snowflake and I am about to start for the St. Johns Stake. I shall long remember the good Saints here, whose appreciation of my labors in their midst made it a pleasure to administer to them.

ANDREW JENSON.

STAKE CONFERENCES.

PANGUITCH.

The quarterly conference of Panguitch Stake of Zion met in Panguitch Feb. 24th. Present were Elders J. W. Crosby, M. M. Steele and David Cameron, members of the high council, and Bishops Miller, Peterson and Johnson. The meeting house was filled to overflowing.

Elder Miller spoke on faith, repentance, obedience and duty to each other, of financial troubles and necessity of economy; also on the evil results of profanity. Elders I. Hatch and David Cameron spoke on faith, repentance and baptism and the necessity of inspiration in the interpretation of the ordinances of God.

President Jesse W. Crosby presented a report of receipts from various wards and thought it very favorable, considering the state of affairs, loss of crops and financial distress. He compared our faith with the religious denominations of the world and the rewards to be received by serving God, and said that our tribulations have been beneficial in making us more careful and patient with the faults of others; also of the evil effects of backbiting.

Elders G. L. Heywood, S. O. Crosby and Wm. Owens spoke on faith and good works, and Elder M. M. Steele on the development of the faculties of mind and body and the necessity of improving our talents. Elders Joq. Cameron, Albert Clark and Albert Haycock spoke on the hard times, duties of parents and children, the necessity of brotherly love, and the sin of idleness.

General and local authorities were presented and sustained and conference was adjourned to an unknown date. Prayer by Jesse W. Crosby.

GEORGE DODDS,
State Clerk.

ST. JOHN'S.

Our two day's quarterly Stake conference closed this afternoon. It commenced on Sunday morning at ten o'clock. Elder Andrew Jenson who is now traveling through this Stake for the purpose of obtaining historical data, was present at all the meetings and gave several historical sketches which were exceedingly interesting.

The speakers during the conference were, of the presidency of the Stake, David K. Uvall and Wm. H. Gibbons; Patriarch Henry J. Platt, Elders Andrew Jenson, Wm. Maxwell, one of the Mormon Battalion, and Joseph H. Frisby of the Snowflake Stake. Of the seven wards of this Stake, five were reported by their respective Bishops.

At the Stake Priesthood meeting held on Sunday evening, March 4, Joseph Udall was sustained as first counselor to Bishop George H. Crosby of the Union ward, to succeed Henry L. Marble, removed. On account of this change, Joseph Udall, who has been superintendent of the Y. M. M. I. Associations of the Stake since December 4th, 1892, was released, and Lee Roy Gibbons was sustained to fill that position, with Nofear Davis as his first and Byron Pace as his second counselors, and Warren J. Mallory as secretary for the Stake.

Elder James N. Skonsen, president of the High Priests' quorum, having been ordained a Patriarch on the 7th of January, 1894, by Apostle Brigham Young, it was thought best to release him, and Elder Niels P. Johnson of the St. Johns ward was sustained as president of that quorum with Prime T. Coleman, of Springville, as his first counselor.

Your Brother in the Gospel,
CHARLES JARVIS,
Stake Recorder.

FIRST ON RECORD.

MESA, Arizona, March 4, 1894.

Again "looking backwards" I would much like to learn whose name is on record as being the first Elder in this dispensation to die while absent in a field of mission labor. I am quite certain it was Elder James Brackenberry, who died in the winter of 1881-82, near Fredonia, N. Y., where he had previous to his death raised up quite a branch of the Church. His descendants are now numbered by thousands, not one of the original members of which, and few if any of their descendants ever became apostate.

If anything further upon this subject should be desired, a page from my "Life Review" might be interesting to some.

We have now seasonable showers with continued health and comparative prosperity, but we are in bereavement. Our beloved Stake president, C. I. Robson, has passed to the society of the more blessed in the beyond, while we remain to labor and wait.

He died on the 24 ult. from a complication growing out of heart failure and the fearful kick received from a horse. In character he was a friend to humanity and noble as a man from the ground up. He was respected by all and beloved by those who best knew him, and we mourn his loss.
B. F. JOHNSON.

[Elder Lorenzo D. Barnes, who died in England December 20, 1842, is the first on the Roll of Honor which has been published in these columns by authority of the Church historian.

ED. NEWS]

LETTERS FROM MEXICO.

COLONIA JUAREZ, Nr. Casas Grandes, Chihuahua, Mexico, Feb. 27, 1894.

If people in Utah will be more particular in writing correctly the address on their letters there will not be so much complaint about the loss of letters in Mexico. For instance, there is "Ciudad Juarez" and "Colonia Juarez." Sometimes letters are directed C. Juarez, and this causes confusion, delay and no doubt at times loss. If letters for this place were directed Colonia Juarez, near Casas Grandes, Chihuahua, Mexico, it would be an improvement on most of the addresses that come to this office. Care should be taken, as letters have come here without even the name of the person on the envelope.

MILES P. ROMNEY,
P. M. Juarez.

CHURCH THEOLOGY CLASS.

The class met in the Assembly Hall at the time appointed, the session being opened with prayer by Elder Joseph Dean. Elder Talmage then considered briefly several incidental questions, bearing upon subjects already treated, in a very satisfactory manner.

The text for the day's lesson was taken from the eighth article of faith, "We believe the Bible to be the word of God as far as it is translated correctly; we also believe the Book of Mormon to be the word of God." The Bible, an analysis of it, the many versions, and its authenticity having been considered in the last session, a brief study of the Book of Mormon was taken up.

The Book of Mormon as we have it is a translation of gold plates containing an account of the ancient civilized peoples who inhabited America. These plates contained an abridgement of more extensive records which had been kept on other plates known as the "large plates" and "smaller plates" that were prepared by Nephi. The abridgement was principally made by Mormon, under whose leadership the Nephites fought their last battle; but after his death the records were completed by his son Moroni, who delivered them to Joseph Smith in 1827.

The Book of Mormon was translated from the ancient language in which it was written by Joseph Smith through the power of God.

The class was dismissed with prayer by Elder Jedediah Taylor.

TREATMENT OF ONYX.

The onyx industry of Utah promises to become a great one. Few persons are aware of the immense amount of development work that is now being done much less do they suspect that that precious stone is being shipped to this city in car load lots.

A representative of the News was March 12th shown over and about the big stone yard of Watson Bros. on Sixth West street between North and South Temple streets, and was very much surprised and pleased at what he saw there.

The yard is connected with the Rio Grande Western by means of a private switch and has upon it one of the best if not the very best stone working plants west of Chicago. What attracted the attention of the newspaper man most was the method of sawing, rubbing and polishing the huge blocks of onyx from the beds of the Utah Mexican Onyx company. The most of this material will be used to fill the company's contract in furnishing the onyx for the joint city and county building though the owners and operators have numerous minor contracts to fill and new orders are being received in satisfactory numbers. The company has apparently got a bonanza and is not slow to appreciate that fact.

It was very interesting to note how easily a car could be unloaded by one man. By means of powerful and delicate movable cranes one man is able to lift a stone weighing ten tons from the car and convey it to any part of the yard that is desired. Twenty or thirty tons can easily be unloaded by a single man in as many minutes.

The blocks of onyx are very crude and rough as they come from the quarry, and at first glance the impression is created that tons of stone are on this account shipped at a loss. The onyx being one of the hardest of stones, considerable difficulty is encountered in sawing it into slabs, and the process is a very slow and laborious one, requiring the most patient and vigilant watchcare on the part of the workmen.

The big blocks are first swung on to an elevated platform of enormous strength, directly under a large number of saws of the finest metal which parallel each other and which are about an inch apart. These are adjustable so that the slab can be cut into any desirable thickness. They are operated by a steam engine and are kept constantly cold and wet by sprays of water which are automatically distributed over them, while the grooves that the saws slowly wear are made deeper by the combined use of the water and clean, sharp river sand. When the statement is made that these powerful saws, which are about thirteen feet in length only sink into the stone at the rate of three-quarters of an inch an hour when driven to their utmost capacity the tediousness of the work becomes apparent.

After the blocks are sawn into slabs they are conveyed to a large cylindrical rubbing machine, which is also operated by steam. This device is a very fine one, and was made in this city by Silver Bros. at a cost, said Mr. Watson, cheaper than it would have been possible to import it. The polishing is another interesting process, but this work is mostly done by hand at the present time.

The croakers who have so often said that Utah onyx cannot be found in large flawless slabs should visit Watson Bros.' yards and there see for themselves specimens ten and twelve feet in length, and five and six feet in width, without a crack or mark in any way mar their beautiful surface.

At the regular monthly meeting of the Eighteenth quorum of Elders of the Salt Lake Stake of Zion held at Union last Sunday, Brother L. Andersen was set apart as second counselor to Brother Thomas H. Walke, president of that quorum, Elders Angus M. Cannon and Joseph E. Taylor, of the presidency of the Stake, officiating. This change was occasioned by Brother C. A. Sundstrom, formerly second counselor, being now in the missionary field.

A vacancy in the presidency of the Fifth quorum of Elders having occurred some time since through the death of Brother Ranch S. Kimball, at the regular monthly meeting held in the Fifteenth ward assembly hall last (Monday) evening, Brother Griffith P. Roberts was set apart as second counselor to Brother James W. Ure, president of this quorum, by Elders Angus M. Cannon and Joseph E. Taylor, of the presidency of the Stake.

Appropriate remarks were made at these meetings by Elders Angus M. Cannon and Joseph E. Taylor.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

There is considerable talk of establishing a sugar factory in Weber county in the near future. A meeting was held at Hooper Monday to discuss the matter.

The Salt Lake Temple will be closed during the week ending April 7th, and reopen on Monday, April 9th, 1894.

LORENZO SNOW,
President.

A couple of men were Thursday afternoon seen to pass the News office with the carcasses of two young mountain lions, evidently killed in the vicinity of City Creek canyon.

Mrs. Marie Keyes, wife of Alma Keyes, died of consumption at her home in Uintah March 8th. Mrs. Keyes was 47 years of age and leaves a husband and eight children and seven grandchildren to mourn her loss.

Information is wanted of Carl Johana Malm, formerly of Lunda Socken, Sodermoland, Sweden. His age is about 45 years. Any one knowing his address would confer a favor by sending it to Mrs. Lovisa Svanson, 186 B street, Salt Lake City.

Last Wednesday while Thomas Clayson was chopping wood, says the Payson Globe, he made a misstep and split his foot open. The wound is a severe one and will lay him up for a couple of months. A gash several inches in length, ranging from the ball of the great toe back toward the heel was made, the ax penetrating to the bone.

The case of Peter F. Goss vs Salt Lake City is having a hearing. The plaintiff brings the action to recover from the city the sum of $25,000 damages which he alleges he has sustained through the sewage from what is known as the surplus canal having been discharged upon his land, greatly depreciating its value and rendering the dwelling house which stands thereon unfit for habitation.

A movement is on foot for the erection of a cheese dairy at Greenville, one of the suburbs of Logan. The capital stock is placed at $4,000, nearly all of which has been subscribed by residents of the Fifth ward, Hyde Park and Greenville. Two dairies are already in successful operation in Cache Valley; one in Wellsville and one in Hyrum. The demand for the cheese is so great that all orders cannot be filled.

Things are getting to be rather startling when monuments and grave-stones are not safe from thieves, yet such is the case, as shown by the experience of Mr. Joseph Watson. Going into his marble yard at the corner of South and West Temple streets March 10, Mr. Watson discovered that a handsome headstone for a grave had been carried away in the night. Where the valuable piece of marble was conveyed to has not been learned, but the police have been notified and are in quest of the monumental thief.

Sunday between 10 and 11 o'clock an infant was left on Mr. Levi Axtell's doorstep. The child was taken to the city hall as soon as discovered and turned over to Mrs. Gilbert, by whom it was properly cared for. It proved to be a boy, less than twenty-four hours old, and was simply wrapped in an old blanket. When the child reached Mrs. Gilbert it is said to have been numbed with cold, and it took almost all night to resuscitate it. She says she desires to keep the child and that it will be well cared for.

On Sunday, says the Vernal Express, the son of Richard Murry met with a peculiar accident which very nearly cost him his life. He went to the canal to get a bucket of water and dropped the bucket in the hole in the ice, and in trying to recover the bucket, slipped and fell into the hole head first. The ice, which was quite thick, only had a hole in it big enough to get a bucket through and he could not get out, and when rescued he was so nearly drowned that it was with some difficulty that he was brought back to life.

Information was received March 8th that George McLachlan, the oldest son of William McLachlan, of the Seventh ward of this city, died from diphtheria at Taylorville March 7th. The deceased was 19 years of age and a highly respected young man. Great sympathy is felt for the grief stricken parents who are called upon within the brief period of two weeks to part with the third child, all being victims of the same dreadful disease. Three other children are now ill, though it is believed and sincerely hoped that they have passed the danger line.

A gentleman who is prominent in this city in negotiating loans for eastern capitalist stated that a considerable amount of borrowing is now being done by sheepmen throughout the Territory. Of the loans made at present, the gentleman says that at least 70 per cent go to persons outside of the city, principally sheep owners who were so crippled financially by last season's depression that they are compelled to borrow to continue this season. Men who heretofore have been considered wealthy, and were able to carry their business without contracting debts, are now engaged heavily in the borrowing line.

A. J. Crook is in the city from Payette, says the Boise Statesman. He says work on the new ditch to be built by himself and about twenty-five other Payette valley farmers will be commenced as soon as the weather moderates. Surveyors are now in the field. The estimated cost of the ditch is $10,000.

The ditch will be taken out on the south side of the river near Falk's store, and will be thirteen miles long. Mr. Crook says he intended to build the ditch himself, but other farmers desired to become interested and it was finally decided to build it on the co-operative plan.

Matt Peterson, Geo. Schow and J. C. Jones, says the Lehi Banner, have made a number of locations in the small range known as the Black Hills west of Beck's Hot Springs. Their claims include the old mine located by Jed. Woodard and Matt Peterson about 25 years ago, and afterwards jumped by a Mr. Benson. Benson sank a shaft about 80 feet on a big vein of black quartz and abandoned it several years ago. Recent investigations have proven it to be very similar to the ore from the famed Marion mine at Mercur and about the same in value. The ore can be worked by the cyanide process, which fact was not known by Benson.

Ogden as well as Salt Lake has had the misfortune to be overrun recently by transient workmen from all parts of the country outside of the Territory. The men have been drawn there on the supposition that they would get employment or at least be taken care of of charitable organizations until something better presented itself. In order to correct and put a stop to the evil, Mayor Brough March 12 issued the following proclamation, which was sent out by the Associated Press: "I testify to all people seeking employment that Ogden has no employment for even her own citizens. Here the charitable associations have reached their limit and cannot care for more workmen. Keep away from Ogden!"

Mr. John C. Cutler states to a News representative that the Provo Woolen mills were now running to their full capacity. During the last week six new patterns in spring cassimeres of excellent quality have been produced by the mills, and within the next week it is expected that four more new patterns will be manufactured. This cloth is claimed to be superior to any that has been heretofore manufactured in Utah, and the material is all Utah wool.

Another step in the right direction is the manufacture of men's knitted underwear. The Provo mills have just produced one hundred pounds of yarn for this purpose, and the underwear also will be made up here at home. The yarn is of very fine quality, and no doubt will make excellent clothing.

The residence of F. E. Willis between Tenth and Eleventh South and Second and Third West was totally destroyed by fire Monday evening. An alarm was turned in and the West side fire department responded, but as there were no fire plugs very little could be done. Through the assistance of the neighbors the furniture was mostly saved. The building was a two story frame valued at $3000. There is an insurance on it in favor of the Salt Lake Building and Loan association, who held a mortgage on the house for $800. The fire started up stairs, but how it is not known.

Jim Fowles, a miner, went up stairs during the progress of the fire to get some of his belongings. The fire cut off his escape and he jumped from a second story window. He was severely injured.

R. Whittaker, Niels Rolfsen and Peter Larson have returned from west Tintic, says the Mount Pleasant Pyramid, where they have been for several months past developing their mining properties. They are highly pleased with the results of their labor, having struck two rich veins, of about three feet each, one of grey copper in the Pyramid mine, which if the piece of rock shown us is a fair sample, will make this property very valuable. The other piece of rock shown us is from the Mount Pleasant mine, is a fine looking piece of ore, and assays very rich. Both of these veins are widening as sinking is continued and the owners are very enthusiastic over their developments. Mr. Whitaker says that as soon as the roads get a little better they will return, and are intending to send in a couple of tons of ore to the smelter in Salt Lake and thereby get a better estimate of what the ore will yield.

Sister Mary Ann Woolley, wife of the late Bishop E. D. Woolley of the Thirtieth ward of this city, reached her seventieth birthday March 8. She is the mother of eleven children, seven of which are living, three sons and four daughters, twenty-eight grand children, two grandsons and fourteen granddaughters living, oldest eighteen and youngest nine months. Besides her own, Mother Woolley took charge of the Bishop's first family who were left without a mother, when the youngest, Bishop Marcellus Woolley, of the Twenty-first ward, was about four years old. Sister Woolley is hale and hearty, retaining all her faculties and we hope she will live to see as many more anniversaries if she wishes. All the family except that of Elder Abram Hatch, president of the Wasatch Stake, assembled at their mother's home, where they partook of a sumptuous repast prepared by herself and spent the evening in listening to songs and music, and engaging in games suitable for the entertainment of the little ones.

A very fine "production" map of Utah Territory was seen March 10th at the office of Superintendent Millsapugh. The map was executed by Miss Flora Smith, teacher of the fourth grade, Washington school of this city, and is intended to show Utah's chief resources by counties. It is represented upon cardboard, the lakes appearing in blue, the river system being indicated by tin foil, and the counties, twenty-six in number, are represented by the product which predominates. For instance: Emery county, coal; Uintah, asphaltum; San Juan, silver, gold, copper, mica and sulphur; Washington, copper and iron; Cache and Utah, wheat; Millard, silica; Box Elder, rye; Summit county, coal, silver, gold and lead and iron and so on through the list.

The design is in harmony with Dr. Millsapugh's ideas, and is one of the most efficient means of becoming acquainted with the great resources of this Territory that can be devised. Miss Smith has certainly done well, and is to be complimented upon the success attending her efforts.

The stockholders of the Brigham City Woolen Mills Co., says the Bugler, held their regular annual meeting this week, in accordance with the notice in last Saturday's Bugler. The officers of 1898 were re-elected, with one exception, John Mathias being chosen as director in place of W. L. Gardner, deceased. Manager A. A. Johnson was authorized to push ahead certain contemplated improvements. An office will be constructed in the rear of the factory and a tailor shop fitted up where the home-made goods will be converted into suits to order. The company did a very satisfactory business last year, still they have considerable good goods on hand. They anticipate a greatly increased trade for 1899. Their proposed improvements and additions will increase the capacity of the establishment. If the citizens of Brigham City alone would patronize this institution as they should, it would now be giving remunerative employment to fifty hands for every one it employs today.

A special to the Boise, Idaho, Statesman, dated Idaho City, March 8, says: James Boyle, who, with his partner, James Greenwood, has been working a mine near the half-way house, met with an accident yesterday that may cost him his life. Greenwood went away in the morning, but before he did so he told his partner not to enter the tunnel, as it was unsafe. Heedless of these words of caution Boyle went into the tunnel, and shortly afterward there was a cave-in and he was almost buried.

Greenwood stayed over night at Green Martin's and when he returned to the mine today he at once missed Boyle. A glance into the tunnel told him the story and he soon ascertained his partner was entombed.

After considerable difficulty Boyle was taken from the mine. About a ton of dirt and rocks had fallen upon him, and when Greenwood discovered him he was weighted down with a 150 pound rock.

Dr. Perrault, of Boise, was summoned, and it was found Boyle was paralyzed from the waist down. He is in a precarious condition, and the chances of his recovery are very poor. Boyle is between thirty-five and forty years of age. He is unmarried.

Elder M. F. Cowley, of the Presidency of the Onedida Stake, is in the city to be present at the funeral services of his grandmother, Sister Foss. Elder Cowley's home is at Preston, Idaho, but he has just returned from a visit to California. He was at the Midwinter Fair, and of course praises highly the great exhibition. In Sacramento he paid a visit to some of his relatives living there.

Regarding the missionary work in California, Elder Cowley says that the missionaries now there from Utah are laboring energetically for the spread of the Gospel. They meet with great indifference on the part of the people, who generally prefer pleasure seeking to any inquiry after Gospel truths. In the large cities this disregard of religious matters is especially strong. The Elders have, however, met with some who are deeply interested in their testimony, and have many warm friends. In the branch of the Church at San Francisco, Sunday school is held at 10 a.m. and Sabbath meetings at 2 and 7 p. m., at 927 Mission street. Dr. Karl G. Maeser lectures at this place each Sunday evening.

With respect to the financial and industrial situation in California, Elder Cowley says the people there complain considerably of the hard times. The Southern Pacific railway is charged with having a grasp upon all the business affairs of the state, and of applying the pressure to suit its own purposes, as it practically has no competitor. The price of clothing and many other necessities of life is higher in San Francisco than in Utah; in some instances even fruit was as high priced as it is here.

The intersection of East Temple, Center and First North streets presents an engineering problem which has stared the city government in the face for many years, but for which no solution has as yet been proposed. Probably in anticipation of action by the Legislature looking to a construction of a portion of the Capitol building, and the consequent necessity of putting in good condition the approaches to Capitol hill, City Engineer Young was out betimes Wednesday, March 7th, viewing with a critical and scientific eye the ground and streets near the head of East Temple street, with a view to solving the problem named. A News representative met him while thus engaged, and the engineer outlined the plan which seemed to him the most desirable method of reaching the required results.

A gradual increase in the present grade of East Temple street will commence at a point about half way between North Temple and First North streets, and will lead up to about the present elevation of Center street on track at the middle of First North street. North of this point, the grade of Center street will be cut down a little, which will be an improvement that no one will be likely to object to. West of this point, First North street will be given an easy grade down, not differing much from the present percent. In front of Mr. McCornick's residence a cut stone retaining wall is to be constructed, and the elevated ground enclosed by it will probably be ornamented with a fountain and observatory.

At the present time the east side of East Temple street, for some distance south of First north, is higher than the west side, but this will be corrected, and the street made level crosswise, up to the point where it intersects with Center and First North. Here will be the south end of a retaining wall which will separate East Temple and Center streets. The grade of East Temple street, leading up Capitol hill from First North, is now about 12 percent, but it will be reduced to about 9 percent and this part of it will be made considerably wider than at present.

The above changes will have the effect of leaving the property on the east side of East Temple street, just south of First North, including the Culmer residence, a little below the grade of the street, while that on the opposite side of the street, notably the Hempstead residence, will be several feet below it. The last named property, and one or two pieces just south of it, will be put to some disadvantage by the change in the grade of the street, but no other properties will be seriously injured, and the neighborhood as a whole will be much benefitted by the improvement. Engineer Young grasps the situation here fully, and is planning for "the greatest good to the greatest number."

Bad ground has again been reached in the workings of the Ontario drain tunnel, and it is proving to be more troublesome as the work progresses.

THE LEGISLATURE.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 7TH.

In connection with the general appropriation bill introduced this forenoon by Parsons, chairman of the committee on appropriations, the following was submitted:

Committee Room, March 7, 1894.

Mr. Speaker—Your committee on appropriations, to whom was referred the several claims passed upon by the committee on claims, and also the matter of presenting to this House the appropriation bill for this session, having had said matters under consideration, herewith present an appropriation bill.

And in connection with the appropriation bill we find that the following sums of money have or will be appropriated by special acts passed by this and former legislatures, as follows:

Deficit as per auditor's report, Dec. 31, 1893.....	$4,099 04
Bounty on bees, etc.....	18,900 00
World's Fair.....	60,678 39
Bounty on Canaan root.....	18,000 00
Bounty on salt manufacture.....	4,000 00
Appropriation for payment of old witnesses' and jurors' certificates.....	30,000 00
Secretary for sundry expenses.....	1,500 00
Second district for court certificates.....	300 00
Contingent expenses of the Thirty-first Legislative session.....	3,000 00
Gratuities to prisoners.....	5,000 00
Compensation of chaplains.....	800 00
Bounties on wild animals.....	3,000 00
	$181,877 44

PARSONS, Chairman.

It will be observed that many of the above amounts are still contingent on the concurrent final action of the two houses and the Governor. For instance, the Council has not yet passed the bill appropriating $30,000 for the redemption of old court scrip, and the Governor may veto the bounty bills. Hence the above total of $181,877.43, while it will not be increased, may be greatly cut down. The total of the items embraced in the general appropriation bill, which is, of course, subject to amendment, is $399,609.43. But it includes $125,000 for the wing of the Capitol building, which has not yet been agreed to by the Assembly. Provided the general appropriation bill shall go through without alteration, and the other expenditures, named in the report of the committee, shall be made, the total will be $181,877.43, plus $399,609.43, or $581,486.86. The assessed value of the property in the Territory for 1893 was about $115,000,000. A shrinkage of at least $15,000,000 is expected for 1894, and the result will be, allowing the tax rate to remain unchanged, about $400,000. These figures give a deficit of nearly $200,000 for the next Legislature to meet, provided no bonds are issued by this one. But these are all outside figures, and it is reasonably certain that they will be materially cut down, and that the showing will be proportionately more favorable.

Parsons, chairman of the House appropriations committee, insists that the financial condition of the Territory is not so bad after all.

Prior to the hour at which the House was to meet this morning, the lobby was densely packed with workmen. It was evident that the labor element had turned out in force to be present at the discussion of the appropriation of $125,000 for a wing of the Capitol building. The dense crowd observed good order during the debate, a synopsis of which is given below, except that once a burst of applause was given to a remark by Powers.

COUNCIL.

After the noon recess yesterday, Eldredge resumed his argument against H. B. 180, appropriating $30,000 for the redemption of old court scrip.

Williams moved to make the amount $15,000. Carried. The bill was then put upon its passage and lost.

H. B. 66, creating a territorial board of equalization, was amended and passed.

The Governor announced his approval of "an act abolishing the office of collector in cities of the third class;" also "an act amending section 4778, s. 2 of the Compiled Laws of Utah of 1888, of an act of the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, entitled, "an act to prevent cruelty to animals."

C. J. M. 11, relating to woman's suffrage, passed.

H. B. 149, to prevent the befouling of streams, passed.

C. B. 119, relating to barbed wire fences, was lost without being read.

The Council went into executive session and confirmed the following appointments of the Governor:

For territorial treasurer, J. W. Whitehead. For members of the territorial board of equalization, M. B. Swales, Salt Lake City; Richard T. Hume, Ogden; Joseph Judd, Mantl.

HOUSE.

Allen, from the committee on memorials, reported favorably C. J. M. 7, relating to woman's suffrage.

C. J. M. 7, asking Congress to enfranchise the women of Utah, came up. A humorous debate was had upon it, and it passed.

H. B. 28, the mechanic's lien bill, came up on Council amendments, which were concurred in, when the bill was sent to the enrolling committee.

H. B. 66, creating a territorial board of equalization, came up on Council amendments in which the House concurred, and the bill went to the enrolling committee.

Adjourned until 10 a. m. today.

H. B. 167, the appropriation bill, came up as a special order.

Hatch moved to strike out the item of $125,000 for a wing of the Capitol building and Monson seconded the motion.

Powers spoke against the motion. When God created these valleys He fixed upon the site of this city for a great metropolis. It is a city without a rival in location and resources. It is a great social, political, financial and ecclesiastical center. Its people would liberally contribute to relieve distress anywhere else in the Territory, such as exists here now. The building could be erected very cheaply now, and it would be a wise financial policy to erect it at the present time. It is the duty of the state to care for its poor and to educate its children.

Johnson said he had no quarrel as to the location of the Capitol. The question is a financial one. He referred to the large audience of idle workmen in the lobby, but said he looked beyond the walls of this building, and saw a condition among the taxpayers of the whole Territory, the like of which he never saw before. They were groaning under their burdens, and for years the Legislature had been spending vast sums in excess of their resources. The condition of the laboring element in this city was to be deplored, but it was neither good policy nor good financiering to spend $125,000 for a Capitol building now. The main necessity for it was to relieve the unemployed of this city, but there were many unemployed elsewhere in the Territory who were entitled to consideration.

Hatch spoke in favor of striking out the item. At present we did not need a Capitol building, and the Territory did not own the land on which it was proposed to spend the money. He referred to the fact that large sums had been expended by the Territory to construct buildings on lands it did not own, and he was opposed to such a policy. Laboring men throughout the Territory had claims against the Territory, in the shape of court scrip, amounting to more than $125,000 for work already performed, and honest debts should be paid before new ones are incurred.

Bears spoke against striking out the Capitol building item. He said the Legislature could pass the bill authorizing the City Council to grant the title, and that body would make the deed as soon as so authorized. Provo had a magnificent public institution, the insane asylum, that a state with a million inhabitants might be proud of. Ogden had another in the Reform school, and Logan had another in the Agricultural College, but this city, which had paid so much towards these structures, had nothing in the shape of a public building paid for by the Territory. We have passed through a terrible financial crisis with great credit, and it will strengthen our credit abroad by going ahead with our public improvements.

Ivins said he did not see that this city was the place for the Capitol, and if it were really needed he would vote to erect it now. He was ready to vote for a consolidation in this city of the University and Agricultural College, and hence could not be jealous of this city. He cited a number of appropriations to public institutions, and showed how small they were. Nothing was being given for roads and bridges, and the very existence of many district schools was threatened by the economy the Legislature was forced to practice. Under these circumstances, it was not judicious to pay $125,000 for a Capitol building we really did not need. The people of his district would willingly assume their share of any public burden that was really needed, but they were opposed to any that was not absolutely necessary.

Tolton spoke on the pending motion to strike out of the appropriation bill the item of $125,000 for the Capitol building. He opposed the item, and gave figures to show that the Territory could not at the present time afford the outlay.

Allen then proceeded to speak on the pending question to strike out the appropriation for the Capitol building. He held that the facts did not warrant Johnson's assertion that the taxpayers could not bear the burden of this expenditure. The prosperity of this city and of the whole Territory were inseparable, and a sectional view ought not to be taken of the question. The cost to the people of the Territory per year, were this building to be now erected, would be less than $7,000, or almost exactly 3 mills per capita per year. It was a business proposition which the Territory could well afford to accept now. The benefits of the expenditure would be scattered all over the Territory.

McKay spoke in favor of striking out. If the money were in the treasury he would favor spending it; but to go in debt placed the people in bondage. The people who settled this city were more destitute than those who now sought relief out of the public treasury.

Hubbard thought the present site for the Capitol building was a good one, and the question is, is the Territory in a condition to make this expenditure. It was right for the state to educate the children of the state, but the doctrine that the state must find employment for the poor is a dangerous one. He was opposed to this appropriation at the present time, and spoke of the poverty that he knew existed among the poor in the rural districts.

The roll was called and the motion to strike out prevailed by a vote of 15 to 9.

At this juncture, a very interesting incident occurred. Nebeker offered a resolution that the chief clerk take the chair until a matter concerning the speaker could be attended to.

The resolution was carried unanimously, being put by the chief clerk. Speaker Emery, very much astonished, surrendered the chair, when Ivins addressed the House.

He said, in part: There have been times in my life when I have been called upon to perform some duty that I would gladly have evaded. But I never felt this more strongly than now. I am about to discharge a duty and approach it with feelings of regret and pleasure—regret at not being better able to perform it properly, and pleasure at having been chosen for it. This body was elected as the result of the first real political battle ever fought in Utah, and the contesting elements here in this House have come to know and respect each other better. An era of good feeling has come, and towards none connected with this Assembly is this feeling stronger than towards you, Mr. Speaker. And I take great pleasure, in behalf of the members of this House, in presenting you with this gavel. It is made of mountain mahogany, a fitting symbol of the firm friendship we feel for you. It is a souvenir of the Salt Lake Temple. The golden bands with which it is bound, are symbolical of the glory of our nation, endless. The names engraved upon them will, it is hoped, recall in future pleasant remembrances of the Thirty-first Legislative Assembly of Utah.

The Speaker, with marked emotion, replied, saying that when he was chosen presiding officer of this House the proudest day of his life had come. He remembered saying, on taking the chair, that he should doubtless make mistakes. He hoped these had been few, and would be overlooked. "The first and best use to which this beautiful gavel can be put shall be to call the House of Representatives of the Thirty-first Legislative Assembly of Utah to order." So saying the Speaker resumed the chair and called the House to order, when consideration of the appropriation bill was resumed, and was in progress at the hour of going to press.

THURSDAY.

Yesterday was the 60th and last day of the legislative session, consequently the record must show no adjournment until all the business is transacted, and the adjournment sine die occurs. This makes it necessary to prolong indefinitely the last day of the session, and if the members leave their seats it is only to take an "informal recess." Both houses worked all day yesterday and until about midnight last night, very busily. But about that hour the Council took a recess to allow its appropriations committee to consider the appropriation bill which the House has passed. After this no other business worth mentioning was done in the Council until this forenoon. An hour or so after midnight the members of the House, during an "informal recess," disappeared one by one, bent on getting a little rest, but a quorum was present soon after 9 o'clock this morning. It was 10 o'clock, however, when Speaker Emery called the House to order and business was resumed. Only Council bills and Council amendments to House bills remained to be considered, as the House had kept up with its calendar for several days. The Council, however, had been behind with its work, and on the last day sent a large number of its bills to the House, too late to have them properly considered in that body.

Last evening a long and thorough discussion of the territorial tax levy was had while H. B. 155, to change the levy, was under discussion. The loss of the bill leaves the present tax levy unchanged, which means that the weaker counties will continue to draw support for their schools from this county. The Salt Lake county members contended strongly against this, with such good effect that the vote on the final passage of the bill was a tie, which killed the measure.

The fight in the House on Council amendments to the medical bill was brief but hot. A strong minority tried to kill the bill and so leave the present medical law in force, but their efforts to accomplish this were unsuccessful. The Council amendments removed or greatly modified the objectionable features of the bill, and if the Governor will sign it in its present form, the demands of the people for a correction of the evils existing under the present law will be at least partially met.

COUNCIL.

After the close of this report yesterday, consideration of the medical bill was continued, and the bill passed.

The Governor sent in a number of nominations and reported that he had signed the following bills: An act to provide for the dissolution of irrigation companies, a memorial to Congress in relation to the extension of U. S. for proving up desert land, and the memorial in relation to woman's suffrage, and in relation to Woman's Industrial Home.

C. B. 127, to provide a uniform system of free schools throughout the Territory of Utah, was considered and passed.

H. B. 167, the appropriation bill, was read and referred to the committee.

HOUSE.

The Governor approved the act locating the boundary between Tooele and Juab counties, and the act in relation to townsites.

H. B. 155, relating to revenue came up. It makes the territorial general tax three mills, the territorial school tax two, and the county school tax five mills.

Johnson argued against reducing the territorial school tax, and Parsons in favor of so doing. A debate followed in which several members participated. Hatch moved to make the territorial general tax and the territorial school tax  $2\frac{1}{2}$  mills each, and Sears moved to amendment so as to make the former  $2\frac{1}{2}$  mills and the latter  $2\frac{1}{2}$  mills, but later withdrew his motion, leaving Hatch's amendment the pending question. It was lost by a vote of 9 to 12. The bill was lost in a tie vote, 12 to 12.

Pending the vote on Hatch's amendment, the message from the Governor was read announcing that he had approved H. B. 101, the fire and police bill.

The special committee charged with investigating certain wrongs laid to the commissioners to locate University lands rendered majority and minority reports, both of which recommended the passage of H. B. 168, which aims to prevent injustice in future to settlers in those lands. The bill passed.

FRIDAY.

The House had transacted no business today up to the time of this writing, the members loitering around awaiting a call to come to order. The Council held a long night session which was almost wholly occupied in considering the appropriation bill.

At 8:15 a.m. it took a recess, and this forenoon again resumed consideration of that bill, the item of $125,000, proposed to be inserted for a wing of the Capitol building, being the main feature discussed. It will be remembered that the House struck out this item, but Williams moved to restore it. In the debate that ensued the same arguments were used which were heard in the House. Williams' motion was lost by a two-thirds majority, and it is settled that no Capitol building will be commenced before another Legislature meets.

COUNCIL.

Taylor reported the appropriation bill, stating that the total would be \$412,486.90; to the World's Fair, \$60,678.89, to the deficiency, \$40,000. Total, \$513,165.29. A  $2\frac{1}{2}$  mills tax would amount to \$584,000, so that if it was levied it would meet the whole needs.

Seaman proposed to increase the appropriation for the deaf mutes from $15,000 to $20,000. J. E. Booth opposed and Lund advocated the change. Eldredge opposed it. The motion was lost, and the bill was then passed, when the Council took an informal recess.

HOUSE.

The Governor announced his approval of the bills relating to the sale of the university lands and creating Carbon county.

Sears offered a resolution thanking Secretary Richards for favors to the Assembly, J. R. Letcher, Esq., for aiding in the opening of the session, Speaker Emery and the officers of the House.

The law supposes that the Thirty-first session of the Legislative Assembly of Utah Territory closed at midnight of Thursday, March 8th, and the record must be so manipulated as to show that no business was transacted later than that. The House clock was stopped at 11:20 and the Council clock at 11:40 of that date, an absurd subterfuge to carry out a ridiculous fiction. That is, the fiction appears ridiculous except from a legal standpoint. The record must not show any adjournment, except the final one, after March 8th, and on Friday night, when the House was sitting idle, with no business on its table, Allen suggested that the members "saunter." The word was seized upon with avidity, and ever since it was suggested, the members of both houses have spent most of their time in "sauntering." Presumably a quorum is at all times within the bar of each house, and the members have incurred much fatigue in keeping up such an appearance; but as a matter of fact, no members were in their seats during the early hours of Saturday, Sunday and today.

On Saturday evening an interesting debate was had in the House on the proposition to take half a mill from the Territorial school tax and add it to the Territorial general tax, making each 2½ mills. The bill passed and went to the Governor, but he vetoed it, leaving the present tax levy in force. One by one the Governor has acted on the large number of bills that were sent to him near the close of the Assembly. He has not vetoed many, but has been free in suggesting amendments as conditions on which his approval would be given. The only political issue raised between the Executive and the Assembly, except the bounty bills, was in the bill creating court commissioners, etc. The Governor claimed the right to appoint these officials, but they had been named in the bill, and it had to be so amended as to concede to the executive the power he claimed, or it would have failed.

COUNCIL.

It was after noon yesterday when the Council was called to order for the first time, and during the day and evening the following business was done:

A message was received from the Governor stating that he had nominated the following court commissioners:

First district—John R. Twelve.
Second district—W. H. Bates.
Third district—George D. Pyper.
Fourth district—Henry H. Rolapp.

The following nominations by the Governor for dental examiners were confirmed: J. W. Christensen, of Utah county, for two years; H. A. Whitney, of Salt Lake county, for three years; Joseph W. Thatcher, of Cache county, for three years; Stanley H. Clawson, of Salt Lake county, for three years.

E. E. German, of Utah county, was rejected.

The following appointments were also confirmed:

Members of the Territorial Board of Pharmacy—Clarence A. McCoy, of Salt Lake county, until March 8, 1896; J. B. Farlow, of Salt Lake county, until March 8, 1896; George A. Fennimore, of Beaver county, until March 8, 1897; John L. Boyden, of Summit county, until March 8, 1896; W. A. Wade, of Box Elder county, until March 8, 1896.

Directors of Territorial Insane Asylum—Albion B. Emery, of Summit county, Lewis W. Shurtliff of Weber county, Reed Smoot, of Utah county, W. W. Woodring, of Sanpete county, George C. Whitmore, of Juab county, William Creer, of Utah county.

Warren N. Dusenberry, of Utah county was rejected.

Trustees of the Agricultural College of Utah—Aaron A. Farr Jr., of Cache county, W. B. McCornick, of Salt Lake county, Alonso G. Barber, of Cache county, William P. Nebeker, of Salt Lake county, John W. McNutt, of Weber county, Achilles Perrin, of Weber county, D. C. Hubbard, of Box Elder county.

Sealer of Weights and Measures—Frits S. Ertman, of Salt Lake county.

President and Directors of the Deseret Agricultural and Manufacturing Society—President, John R. Winder; directors, Frank W. Jennings, of Salt Lake county; Fred Simon, of Salt Lake county; Herman Bamberger, of Salt Lake county; Nelson A. Empey, of Salt Lake county; Septimus W. Sears, of Salt Lake county; Amos D. Holdaway, of Utah county; Wiley G. Cragun, of Weber county; John D. Peters, of Box Elder county; James A. Melville, of Millard county; Abraham Hatch, of Wasatch county; David O. Wiley Sr., of Davis county.

Trustees of the Territorial Reform School—John Watson, of Weber county; Marshall A. Breeden, of Weber county; James H. Moyle, of Salt Lake county; Lyman R. Martineau, of Cache county; David Thorburn, of Weber county; Thomas F. Rousche, of Davis county.

John R. Milner of Utah county was not confirmed.

Board of Medical Examiners—Allen Fowler of Salt Lake County, J. M. Dart of Salt Lake county, Joseph S. Richards of Salt Lake county, C. C. Shinnick of Salt Lake county, John D. Carnahan of Weber county, McKensie N. Graves of Weber county.

Walter N. Pike of Utah county was not confirmed.

Regents of the University of Utah—Moses Thatcher of Cache county for the unexpired term of W. N. Shilling, resigned, and until July 1, 1894; Erwin A. Wilson of Utah county for the unexpired term of James Sharp, resigned, and until July 1, 1896; also Moses Thatcher for the term of six years; Robert Harkness for the term of six years; Lewis S. Hills for the term of six years.

The following nominations for militia officers were confirmed:

George M. Ottinger, adjutant-general.

E. W. Tatlock, inspector-general.

D. C. Adams, quartermaster-general.

Thomas J. Stevens, commissary-general.

Allan Fowler, surgeon-general.

A. D. Gaah, judge advocate.

Nephi W. Clayton, aid-de-camp.

Alex Loeb, aid-de-camp.

COURT COMMISSIONERS.

The nominations made by the Governor for court commissioners named above, were confirmed.

First District—John R. Twelve.

Second District—W. H. Bates.

Third District—George D. Pyper.

Fourth District—W. H. Rolapp.

The Governor announced his approval of an act to amend the charter of Logan City, changing the beginning of the fiscal year.

At 6:30 p. m. a concurrent resolution was sent to the Governor, informing him that the tables of both houses were clear.

A message was received from the Governor stating that he had vetoed C. B. 92, relating to revenue.

HOUSE.

At 8:40 on Saturday evening the Speaker called the House to order.

A communication from the Governor was read, announcing that he had approved the bills relating to estrays, and appeals from justices' courts.

He objected to the bill providing for free employment agencies for the reason that it did not appropriate to meet the expense of clerical help, blanks, stationery, etc., necessary for the Secretary's office in administering the law. If $100 per month for a clerk and $500 for blanks, stationery, etc., for the next two years, were appropriated he would sign the bill.

The report of the conference committee on the appropriation bill, a long document, was read.

All the recommendations of the conference committee were adopted, C. B. 92, in relation to revenue, was considered. It makes the Territorial tax for schools and for general purposes 2½ mills each, the county school tax 2 mills and the general county tax 3 mills.

The bill then passed by a vote of 14 to 10.

The Governor announced that he had signed the school bill, and declined to approve the bill creating court commissioners, etc., on the ground that the bill names those officers, instead of authorizing the Governor to name them. Varian moved to amend the bill so as to allow the Governor to nominate the court commissioners. Carried.

At about 8 a. m. Sunday the House was called to order and a message was read announcing that the Governor had vetoed C. F. 64, the so-called consanguinity bill. It forbade attorneys related to a judge, justice of the peace or commissioner from practicing before such court. He thought the parties to a suit had already ample means of protection against partiality by judges.

At intervals during Sunday forenoon, the following business was done:

C. B. 122, changing the fiscal year of Logan, was passed.

The Governor announced his approval of the medical bill, the fish and game bill, and the bill relating to the payment of jurors, etc., and to court commissioners.

COUNCIL.

It was nearly noon today before the Council was called to order, and then the only business transacted was the confirmation in executive session of the following:

S. H. Allen, of Provo, as a member of the medical board.

James Clark as trustee of the Territorial Reform school.

J. B. Milner as director of the insane asylum.

O. W. Snow, of Brigham City, as a member of the dental board.

HOUSE.

Shortly before two o'clock this afternoon the House was called to order for the first time today.

A message from the Council transmitted the Governor's veto of the tax levy bill.

The governor announced his approval of the general appropriation bill, but his message criticised the smallness of the sums allowed public institutions, and especially the University.

A message from the Governor was read vetoing the bills giving bounties to silk, sugar beets and canalgre roots. The veto was based on the proposition that the Legislature had not provided funds to pay the bounties, and on the further ground that bounty laws were unconstitutional and contrary to public policy.

Another message from the Governor was read, vetoing the memorials to Congress relating to sugar, lead and wool, all of which involved the tariff question. The veto message discussed this question, as related to the subjects of the memorials, at some length.

Other executive messages announced the Governor's approval of the bill making an additional appropriation for the contingent expenses of the session, his disapproval of the tuition bill, because he had not had time to consider it properly, and his veto of the bill to prevent deficits, on the ground that public institutions would have to close or deficits be made.

Varian then offered a concurrent resolution for final adjournment, and this, having been adopted by both houses, the Legislature at 3:50 on Monday, March 12, adjourned sine die.

Herewith is given a list of the more important bills that were passed, lost and vetoed during the session. Besides these there were many classed as "lawyer's law," intended to amend the procedure codes, etc., which were not of general public interest.

The following bills, originating in the Council, became laws:

Making eight hours a day's work on all public works, that is work paid for out of any public treasury, whether territorial, municipal or school district. A contractor may agree with his employees as to the number of hours they will work, but in the absence of such contract, eight hours shall be deemed a day's work.

Creating the new county of Carbon, and another designating the manner in which the seats and officers of new counties shall be chosen at first.

Regulating the practice of dentistry, providing for a board of examiners, and requiring all dentists to procure a license.

To protect the dairy interests by restricting the sale of imitation butter and cheese, and punishing the sale of those articles as the genuine.

To protect persons and firms in the use of a trade mark, or label or advertisement of peculiar design, adopted by them.

Providing for the appointment of one or more fruit tree inspectors in each county, and for the disinfection of orchards, and the destruction of such forms of insect and vegetable life as are inimical to the fruit industry.

Reducing the costs in cases of tax sales of real estate.

Validating deeds and other recorded evidences of title to real estate, notwithstanding defects in the form or execution thereof.

Punishing as larceny the surreptitious use of electricity for the purposes of lighting, power, etc.

Authorizing the World's Fair commission to dispose of the Utah exhibit.

A memorial asking Congress to give the Woman's Industrial home in this city for a woman's hospital.

A memorial asking Congress to restore the suffrage to the women of Utah.

A memorial asking Congress to grant further time in which to prove up desert lands.

A memorial to Congress asking to have land grants for the University and Agricultural College reserved out of lands in the Uintah Indian reservation.

Following are a few of the more important bills introduced in the Council, which failed:

To abolish county tax collectors, and impose their duties upon the county treasurers.

To require so-called title notes to be recorded.

To regulate voluntary assignments, and prohibit the making of preferred creditors.

Defining and prohibiting usury.

Several bills to change the present exemption law.

To provide for the maintenance of illegitimate children.

Several bills amending the present liquor law.

To tax estates of decedents.

Providing for an attorneys' lien.

To locate the seat of government at Provo.

Several bills relating to schools.

IN THE HOUSE.

The following bills originating in the House became laws, as did many others of less importance.

To provide for the disposal of stray animals, and for distress and damage.

To provide a mechanic's lien, etc.

Creating a Territorial board of equalization and providing for assessing railroad grant lands.

To prevent scab and other diseases in sheep.

Creating a board of fire and police commissioners in cities.

Creating a Territorial militia.

Requiring railroads to post notices of stock killed by trains.

To prevent the sale of unwholesome meats in cities.

For the protection of fish and game.

To regulate and inspect the sale of illuminating oils.

To regulate the practice of medicine.

Making numerous and important amendments to the school law.

The following House bills failed to become laws:

To tax debts secured by mortgages, etc.

Creating the office of precinct water-master, etc.

To regulate the use of artesian wells.

To provide free employment offices; vetoed by the Governor.

To restore the control of elections to the county courts.

To unite the University and Agricultural College.

To regulate the locating and recording of mining claims.

To change the time within which to redeem real property sold at forced sale.

To prevent attorneys nearly related to a judge from practicing before him; vetoed.

To establish free public libraries; vetoed.

General revenue bill.

To prevent public officers from creating deficits; vetoed.

To provide for tuition fees in the University and Agricultural College; vetoed.

The Governor vetoed the bills paying bounties on silk, sugar beets and canalgre roots, and the memorials to Congress asking that the bounty be retained on sugar, and the duty on lead and wool.

THE PUBLIC PURSE.

Following is the full text of the general appropriation bill as it passed the Legislature and was approved by the Governor:

Section 1. That the following sums of money are hereby appropriated out of any money in the territorial treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes hereinafter expressed:

To Territorial Insane Asylum, for maintenance for two years, 1894 and 1895, one-half to be drawn each year, and on the order of the board of directors, or so much thereof as may be necessary.....	$ 75,000 00
For the University of Utah, for the general maintenance of all departments, except the School of Deaf Mutes and Blind, for the years 1894 and 1895, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and in lieu of all special appropriations, one-half to be drawn each year.....	45,000 00
For the School of Deaf Mutes and Blind, for the years of 1894 and 1895, one-half to be drawn each year, or so much thereof as may be necessary.....	15,000 00
For Territorial Reform School, for maintenance for two years, 1894 and 1895, one-half to be drawn each year by the board of directors.....	15,042 92
For the Deseret Agricultural and Manufacturing Society, deficiency For expenses to operate Fair for 1894, and to provide for expenses for the year 1895, to be drawn on the order of the board of directors.....	2,389 75
For the Agricultural College, for maintenance for the years 1894 and 1895, to be drawn one-half each year, by the trustees of said college, or so much thereof as may be necessary.....	7,080 25
For deficiency for building College... For interest on Territorial bonds...	15,000 00 2,741 98 70,000 00
Sec. 2. For payment of witnesses and jurors and phonographic reporters in Territorial criminal cases in District courts of this Territory for the years 1894 and 1895, or so much thereof as may be necessary; provided, that the said amounts shall be drawn by the court commissioners of each district and paid out upon vouchers duly authenticated for services as jurors in Territorial civil and criminal cases, and for witnesses and phonographic reporters in criminal cases in which the territory is liable, as required by law.....	80,000 00
For outstanding jurors' and witnesses' certificates for the years 1892 and 1893, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be drawn on the order of the court commissioners, as follows:
First Judicial District.....	7,556 23
Second Judicial District.....	6,521 30
Third Judicial District.....	2,042 65
Second Judicial District, salary....	2 00
Fourth Judicial District, salary....	672 00
Witnesses' and jurors' certificates for the Second Judicial District, years 1892 and 1893.....	230 00

Sec. 3. To the territorial board of equalization, for services for said board, and for books, blanks and stationery, and all expenses for performing the duties of the board for the years 1894 and 1895, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be drawn on the order of said board..... 6,000 00
Office rent for 1894 and 1895..... 6,000 00
For deficit of said board, for the years 1894 and 1895..... 617 07
To the auditor of public accounts, for salary in full for all services, for the years 1894 and 1895, to be drawn quarterly..... 4,000 00
For salary of the territorial commissioner of district schools, for the years 1894 and 1895, to be drawn quarterly, $240 each quarter, which shall be in full for all services and compensation for said term..... 2,000 00
Rent of rooms for Territorial Auditor for 1894 and 1895..... 750 00
Incidental expenses for Auditor for 1894 and 1895..... 400 00
For salary for attorney to the auditor, for advice and services for the years 1894 and 1895, which shall be in full for all services..... 300 00
For incidental expenses, mileage, etc., of the territorial commissioner of district schools; provided, that the same shall be paid out on vouchers approved by and filed with the auditor, a statement of which shall be presented to the Legislative Assembly at the next regular session thereof..... 800 00
For the territorial library, to include all accounts..... 4,500 00
For salary of the territorial treasurer for the years 1894 and 1895, including office rent and stationery..... 2,000 00
For salary of private secretary for the Governor, for the years 1894 and 1895, to be drawn quarterly, upon the order of the Governor... 1,800 00
For judges' salaries for the four judicial districts, for the years 1894 and 1895, $1,500 each..... 6,000 00
For salary of clerk for the First district court, for the years 1894 and 1895..... 600 00
For salary of the clerk of the Second district court..... 400 00
For salary of the clerk of the Third district court..... 900 00
For salary of the clerk of the Fourth district court..... 750 00
For salary of the clerk of the Supreme court..... 500 00
Provided, that the salaries of the clerks of the district and supreme courts shall be for the years 1894 and 1895, and shall be drawn quarterly, and shall be in lieu of all fees allowed said clerks in all territorial criminal cases.
For clerk of the Supreme court, for services as territorial librarian, for the years 1894 and 1895, to be drawn quarterly..... 1,000 00
For salary of the territorial commissioner of fish and game, for 1894 and 1895, to be drawn quarterly.... 500 00
For salaries of officers of the national guard of Utah, and for other expenses connected with the militia, for the years 1894 and 1895, to be drawn upon the order of the commander-in-chief..... 3,000 00
Sec. 4. To the territorial recorder of marks and brands, for publishing at least quarterly the recorded marks and brands of Utah Territory, same to be distributed free of charge through the county clerks to the various justices of the peace and constables throughout the Territory, one-half to be drawn in the year 1894, and the balance in the year 1895, or so much thereof as may be necessary..... 400 00
To Thomas W. Eilerbeck, for work on Auditor's books, as expert accountant..... 100 00
For Legislative printing of the Thirty-first session, to be drawn on the order of James B. Bloor, public printer, or so much thereof as may be necessary..... 1,200 00
For improvement and care of capitol grounds for the years 1894 and 1895, one-half to be drawn each year, and drawn and expended under the supervision of the capitol commission..... 2,000 00
Sec. 5. To D. Alexander, for auditor's warrant, No. 3057..... 1 70
To Ambrose Shaw, for auditor's warrant, No. 3513..... 20 20
To James McKnight, for auditor's warrant, No. 2420..... 8 90
To Coray Bros. & Co., for teams and carriages furnished on order of the Fourth district court for the grand jury..... 70 00

To H. G. McMillan for freight, express paid on records, books and vault findings, and for fees in certain territorial civil cases..... 104 49
To W. W. Browning & Co., for 2000 witness certificates, register of affidavits and rebinding records for Fourth district court..... 19 00
To O. P. Bird for territorial auditor's warrants, Nos. 2982, 2981 and 2981..... 30 92
To E. A. Wedgewood, for taking testimony and railroad fare in the contest case of Douglass vs Robertson..... 23 15
Contingent expenses for Governor's office for 1894 and 1895..... 600 00
To Deseret National Bank, for exchange on coupons on territorial bonds..... 56 24
To W. L. Cook, clerk Second district court, for indexing and labor on the books and records of said court..... 861 50
Salt Lake Lithographing company, for records, blanks and supplies furnished the district courts for the years 1892 and 1893..... 380 35
To W. M. Mc Art, for fees as assistant United States attorney in certain territorial criminal cases in the Second district court..... 680 00
To John Morris & Co., for books and records for the use of the clerk Third district court..... 123 75
To H. G. McMillan, clerk Third district court, for freight and drayage upon court records from Chicago... 5 05
To Sidney Fanner, for relief for amount paid by him on the bond of Josiah Rogerson, ex-collector of Beaver county..... 740 00
To A. Milton Muser, territorial fish commissioner for express charges on 200 pounds of lake trout eggs from Michigan..... 30 00
To George D. Barnard & Co., for records, books and steel cabinets for vaults for the several District courts..... 1,400 18
To Eugene Young, for rent of typewriter paid by him for the use of the Thirtieth legislative session... 10 50
To J. Barnett, territorial treasurer, to be paid to Spencer Clawson, for storage on public documents, papers and Compiled Laws..... 100 00
To Wells, Fargo & Co., for exchange on coupons of series 8, Territorial bonds..... 28 45
To Smythe, Britton & Poore company, for balance due on printing and binding Smith's Index to Statutes, as per contract entered into by the Thirtieth Legislative Assembly..... 126 67
To Parks & Thompson, for attorneys' fees in certain school land cases before the land office..... 100 00
To John Morris & Co, for books, records and stationery furnished the clerk of the Fourth district court... 187 50
For books and records furnished the clerk of the First district court.... 146 50
For one witness certificate record, furnished the clerk of the First district court..... 9 00
To D. H. Peery, Jr., clerk First district court, for freight paid on records and books..... 57 81
To Hall & O'Donald Lithographing company, for records and books furnished the clerk of the First district court..... 132 80
Henry Cohn & Co., for storage and moving two safes, the property of the Territory..... 117 50
K. B. Boreman, clerk Fourth district court, for freight and express charges paid on records and books..... 11 75
To Harnel Pratt, for services as attorney and adviser to the territorial auditor for the two years, and to include his services to date..... 1,000 00
A. J. Hurt..... 1,000 00
To George Haverkamp, for certificate as interpreter in certain territorial cases..... 10 00
Sheriff Hawley of Millard county..... 100 00
Sec. 6. To the counties hereinafter mentioned, for one-half of the cost of maps and plats for the county assessor of the several counties, furnished during the years 1892 and 1893, to be drawn on the order of the county courts of the respective counties:
Utah county.....$ 362 00
Cache county..... 78 00
Wasatch county..... 65 00
Sanpete county..... 553 00
Box Elder county..... 413 00
Davis county..... 124 80
Weber county..... 1,239 35
Sevier county..... 600 00

Tooele county..... 97 59
Morgan county..... 192 52
Sec. 7. For relief of over-paid taxes, same to be remitted and credited upon the books of the territorial auditor, viz:
Morgan county, for amount paid on mortgages assessed.....$ 85 00
H. S. Cutler, assessor and collector of Kane county..... 84 10
Nathan Faux, ex-collector of Sanpete county..... 23 12
W. F. Wilson, assessor and collector of Garfield county..... 166 85
Thomas Williams, collector of Tooele county..... 259 85
Ferdinand Erickson, collector of Sanpete county..... 78 35
K. A. Allen, collector of Piute county..... 62 87
For deficiency in expense for surveying University land..... 2,500 00
For closing up business of surveying University land..... 4,000 00

Sec. 8. That all claims and bills for money appropriated herein, for the relief of any and all persons, shall be filed with the auditor of public accounts before warrants shall be drawn for the same.

Sec. 9. The territorial auditor is hereby required to balance upon his books all credits remaining on his books upon the passage and approval of this act, by charging said accounts and crediting appropriation account.

Sec. 10. That out of the first moneys in the territorial treasury, not otherwise appropriated for revenue and not including school moneys, shall first be paid the amounts appropriated herein for the payment of deficits reported by the various officers, trustees and institutions.

Sec. 11. Payments for salaries or other expenses included in this bill shall not be duplicated if it appear that they are covered by appropriations heretofore made by special laws.

Sec. 12. All acts or parts of acts in conflict or inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Sec. 13. This act shall take effect from and after its approval.

THE CHICKASAWS.

The work of the Lord is steadily but surely growing and spreading in fulfillment of the predictions of ancient as well as modern Prophets. An instance in mind is the missionary labors of the Elders in the Indian Territory. During the last few years their labors have been extended from one tribe into nearly all of the more important tribes in the territory. Among the latter are the Chickasaw Indians, in whose nation there seems to be a good field for missionary work. Although the Elders have at different times gone into this nation, it was not until about two years ago that any of them devoted their entire attention to it and succeeded in securing a place to establish a headquarters. Since that time there have been from two to six Elders laboring in the Chickasaw nation. These people seem to be less interested in religion than some of the other civilized tribes.

The full-blood Chickasaws were at one time very superstitious, and even at the present time witch doctors and "Pashofah" dances are popular in some localities. It is not many years since an elderly woman suffered death for the alleged crime of witchcraft, but their faith in such things is rapidly growing weaker.

The "Pashofah" dance is still kept up among them, though it is not as popular as it once was. The object of this dance is to heal the sick, and it is claimed a great many diseases are cured thereby. It is conducted about as follows: The patient is placed in a house facing the east. The medicine man is the only person admitted into the house and he performs his craft in secret. Meanwhile the guests dance with great energy in front of the patient, all present being expected to take part therein, while a young woman of the tribe jingles a few pebbles in a pair of terrapin shells suspended from her limbs. A huge pot of meat and corn boiled together is then served by means of a large wooden ladle, which is passed around until all are satisfied. They believe in this way each person carries off a portion of the disease with which the patient is afflicted. During the performance everything must be done in a certain way, as they are very particular on this point. If the first dance does not effect a cure it is repeated, in some instances as many as three times.

The Chickasaws were, like their brothers the Choctaws, located in Mississippi previous to their removal to the Indian territory, and occupied the portions of the state which at the present time bear the names of some of their most distinguished warriors, such as Pontotoc, Pickens, Tishomingo, etc. The territory they occupied had been ceded to them at an early date, but as the country became settled up by the whites, a treaty was entered into by which they were to leave their lands in Mississippi and move to the Indian territory. This was in the year 1832. Arrangements were soon made and the majority of the tribe took their departure for their new homes.

The government of the Chickasaws in early days was very much like that of the Choctaws. The former were known by their distinctive house names instead of being divided into "iksas" or clans, as the latter were. The name was always taken from the mother's side, as, for instance, the mother and grandmother of Governor Cyrus Harris were of the house of Inehus-sha-wah-ya, consequently his name, according to their old customs, would have been Cyrus of the House of Inehus-sha-wah-ya. There are about fifty of these well-known house names among the Chickasaws, but they are rapidly falling into disuse. The name of their last king was Ish-tah-to-pah, and that of their queen Puc-caunla (Hanging Grapes.)

When the Chickasaws came to the Indian territory they located among the Choctaws; but they immediately saw that they could not have a representation in the general council, as they were so few in number compared with the Choctaws. They accordingly entered into a treaty with the Choctaws in 1837 by which they were to have the privilege of forming a district of their own within the limits of the latter's domain. They were also to be entitled to all the rights and privileges of the Choctaws with the exception of receiving a share of the annuities. When the Choctaws came from the East they settled in the eastern part of their country, not daring to venture into the western part on account of the raids made in that section by the Comanches, Kiowas, and other wild tribes. As a consequence they knew very little about the western part of their territory, and sold an area of about 7,267 square miles to the Chickasaws for the sum of $530,000, to be paid by annual installments, thus placing them as a breastwork to protect themselves from their enemies. The Chickasaws had, on their arrival, visited all sections of the country, and when they were granted the western portion they were well pleased, knowing it to be the richest and most valuable land in the territory.

The Chickasaw government is conducted similar to that of the Choctaws, the principal executive officer, however, being called "governor" instead of "principal chief." The nation is divided into four counties—Panola, Pickens, Pontotoc and Tishomingo—each of which returns three senators and eight representatives. The capitol is situated at Tishomingo, and here the legislature convenes annually on the first Wednesday in September, generally remaining in session about one month. The judicial powers of the nation are vested in a supreme, district and county courts. The governor's cabinet is composed of national secretary, national agent, treasurer and attorney-general. The first named three are appointed by the governor and confirmed by the senate; the latter is elected by the people.

The Chickasaws have a very good school system. A superintendent of public instruction, appointed by the legislature, devotes his time to visiting the schools and seeing that they are properly conducted. There are five high schools in the nation, viz: The Male Academy at Tishomingo, Bloomfield Female institute, Wahnucka institute, Lebanon academy and Collins institute; also a number of neighborhood schools, containing in all about six hundred children. The sum of $50,000, interest on their money invested in United States bonds is semi-annually appropriated for the support of these schools, which are all free to the children of citizens. Having these educational advantages, the younger portion of the Chickasaws are becoming quite proficient in the English language, as that is taught exclusively in their schools. Non-citizen children are at a disadvantage, as they are not allowed to attend these schools. In localities where a sufficient number of them reside a private school is often carried on.

The first governor of the Chickasaw nation was Cyrus Harris, who was elected by a majority of one vote in 1856, at the time of the adoption of the constitution. Thrice was he re-elected, serving four terms, during which peace and harmony prevailed. At present no person can hold the office of governor for more than two consecutive terms.

There are about 6,000 citizens (including the whites adopted by intermarriage). The number of non-citizens who rent from the Indians is estimated at about 25,000 or 30,000. There are also some negroes living in this nation, but instead of being adopted citizens as they are in other nations, they are simply allowed to live there and cultivate what land they desire. Some of the citizens hold from 2,000 to 10,000 acres of land, on which they have placed improvements. The land belongs to the whole tribe, and the members thereof simply own the improvements they put upon it, but have control of all the land they have improved.

The law requires each laborer to pay to the Chickasaw government the sum of $5, for which he receives a permit to reside in the nation and either rent land and cultivate it or perform any common labor. The sum is greater for merchants and other business men, varying according to the value and importance of their business. A man desiring to become a citizen by marriage is required to pay the sum of $50 for a license. The couple may cross the line into one of the states and have the ceremony performed without paying this sum, but that would not constitute him a citizen.

The Chickasaw nation is different to the other nations in that it has more prairie land and is not so rough and mountainous. The land is principally very productive, especially that portion lying near Washita and Red rivers. Considerable wheat and other small grain is grown in this part as well as corn and cotton. Ardmore, the largest city in any of the nations, is located near the Washita river on the Santa Fe railroad.

The Chickasaws have no written language of their own, but there is such a similarity between theirs and the Choctaw language, that they use the books of the latter. This is a strong proof in favor of the tradition which exists among them to the effect that they were originally one tribe.

DESERTED CITY OF DAKOTA.

A party of archaeologists, just returned from the northeast corner of North Dakota, tell a thrilling story of the abandoned city of West Lynne. The city is desolate and going to decay; no traffic goes on in its streets; no homes are in the dwellings. The streets are graded, have sidewalks, and trees and shrubbery flourish in the yards surrounding the residences, but all is silence and loneliness.

The town is opposite Emerson, just across the Manitoba line from St. Vincent. There, on two sides of the Red river, and within an area of 4 square miles, are four towns—Emerson, West Lynne, Winston and Pembina. West Lynne is on the west bank of the river.

The history of the place is one of the romances of town building in the boom period when Winnipeg was the metropolis of the north. Some schemers, with more fertility than scruples, platted and exploited a city of Red river at a point where they claimed the Great Northern was to cross. Eastern capitalists were becoming interested and money was plenty. There was no sham about the actual construction of that town. It was not another Arizona desert farce, existing only in the minds and on the plat of its projectors, but a substantial reality.

A man named Murray of Chicago was the agent. He sold lots at auction in Chicago for $5,000 each. While he would be selling a telegram would come notifying him of the sale of a certain plat, and it would be withdrawn. Then he sold adjoining lots at advanced prices. That was the broker feature. Meantime building was progressing. No board shanties, sod walls or canvas shells, but handsome structures of brick or lumber, thoroughly finished in approved style, and today the town is a handsome but useless monument to the credulity of some and the hardness of others.

It has buildings which cost from $5,000 to $100,000, has a steel bridge which cost $200,000, is capable of holding a population of 20,000, and yet not a human being lives in it.

The San Francisco police denounce as a fraud a club-footed man 45 years old who has been soliciting alms from church people on the ground that he was robbed on a steamer coming from Los Angeles. The man has black hair and moustache, and wears a heavy fur cap and brown overcoat. He has victimized a number of charitable persons.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

ST. LOUIS, March 6.—Tonight about 9 o'clock the Mobile & Ohio train, which left here at 8:35 o'clock was held up by three robbers at Forest Lawn, Ill. This is the third time within the past six months that this road has suffered from robbers at this point. It is thought tonight's hold-up was perpetrated by members of the same gang which committed the other robberies.

WASHINGTON, March 5.—In the House, Speaker Crisp presented (by request), a petition from the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Utah, protesting against the removal of the southern Ute Indians from Colorado to Utah, and a memorial from the same source, for the allotment of Indian lands in severalty.

The House then went into committee of the whole on the pension bill.

ST. LOUIS, March 5.—The two great bodies of Methodism met in a joint love feast and communion services today. Forty or fifty ministers were present and all united in attesting joy at the burial of strife and dissension. The meeting was unique in St. Louis, where the feelings over the civil war ran high. The split in Methodism dates back to 1844, when a southern bishop did not liberate his slaves at the behest of the general conference.

WASHINGTON, March 5.—The plan to use aluminum boats in the Wellman Arctic exploration has attracted considerable attention. The navy department is considering the possibility of aluminum boats as additions to the equipments of the new men-of-war. Naval Constructor Woodward went to Baltimore today, where a thorough test of the boats will be made.

NEW YORK, March 5.—The Herald's Paris special says: Miss Ida Van Etten, an American writer who has been living for several months at the Continental hotel, this city, died at 8 o'clock this morning, amid most pitiful surroundings. It is said the unfortunate lady died of starvation. The cause of Miss Van Etten's death was officially certified as heart failure.

YOUNGSTOWN, Ohio, March 6.—The electric railway has been tied up since Sunday by a strike. At noon it ran out a car with a non-union crew. The streets were crowded with idle mill hands. They greeted the appearance of the car with hoots and epithets, and finally a rush was made for it and all the windows were smashed in a jiffy. In the midst of the turmoil there was a heavy explosion, subsequently discovered to be of a dynamite cartridge.

Nobody was hurt and it is believed it was merely intended for intimidation. A second car which was run out was treated as the first.

The company later decided to give up the attempt to run the cars.

MINNEAPOLIS, March 6.—A scene of wildest excitement and terror was enacted this afternoon in the rooms of the Commerce & Commission company when Attorney B. B. Clay, who has been operating extensively, became greatly excited and pulled a revolver on Manager Clarke. Clay's deals had not been entirely satisfactory and when sugar went up twelve points he was wild. He shoved a revolver under the nose of Manager Clarke and demanded the money due him. Clarke said no money was due, but offered to give Clay a check for $100. He went into a vault and got a check book and slammed the door after him, leaving Clay on the outside. The latter began waving his revolver and everybody on the floor made a wild break for cover. Clay, after clearing out the place, departed without offering to shoot. It was fully half an hour before anybody relieved Clarke from the vault.

JEFFERSONVILLE, Ind., March 6.—There was a wholesale chloroforming of residents by burglars in this city last night. The entire family of Frank Briggs was put under the influence and the house ransacked. A large amount of money was taken and it was several hours before the family could be revived. The home of Wm. Quirk was then visited and the family chloroformed. Next the burglars visited Frank Bayer's home and chloroformed the entire family. It is believed the burglars were the same who assassinated Stephen Geer. Lynching is among the possibilities if the burglars are caught.

WASHINGTON, March 6.—Secretary Morton has just added a new division to the organization of the weather bureau, namely a division devoted to the subject of meteorology in its relation to agricultural soils. The division is to study the climatic conditions, heat and moisture under the surface of the ground, and the relations of these conditions to crop producing. The secretary has appointed as chief of the new division Professor Milton Whitney of Maryland, late of John Hopkins University.

LONDON, March 6.—A dispatch to the Times from Paris says: An officer who has returned from Dahomey reports that when King Behanzin found escape impossible he summoned his aged mother and said: "I am going to surrender to France. My father must know it. You shall see and tell him."

The king thereupon had his mother beheaded, while he calmly looked on, smoking a pipe.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., March 7.—A war between the Catholics and Protestants has broken out in Memphis. The Protestant Pastor's association has come out in a lengthy card defending the principles of the American Protective association and attacking the Catholics, whom they charge with being engaged in a conspiracy to control all the offices. The Protestants express a determination to carry the war into the coming elections and endeavor to defeat every Catholic candidate for office. The publication of the card caused a tremendous sensation.

WASHINGTON, D. C. March 7.—There was some discussion of the admission of Utah in the Senate committee on territories this morning and Faulkner, chairman of the committee, said the bill should have early consideration and be taken up with a view to prompt and favorable action. The question was brought up by Carey, who was joined by White of California, in representations that the people of Utah were growing anxious over the delay and there were many business interests which would be affected by admission, which made it important that what was to be done by the Senate should be known.

NEW ORLEANS, March 7.—Congressman Blanchard has been appointed United States senator to succeed Judge White, whose resignation takes effect March 12. He represents the Fourth district of Louisiana in the House of Representatives.

LANDER, Wyo., March 8.—Another effort is being made to secure another commission to treat with the Indians for the purchase of a part of the Shoshone reservation. A bill has been introduced in the Senate authorizing the appointment of a commission. The people residing in this section earnestly hope that if the commission is appointed it will be more successful than the previous one. There are several thousand acres of valuable agricultural land in the southern part of the reservation which should be thrown open to settlement.

CHARLESTON, W. Va., March 8.—By request a committee of strikers held a conference today with the military and civil authorities. The miners will probably resume at a reduction. The trouble is considered settled.

PHILADELPHIA, March 8.—The new battleship Indiana arrived at the wharf this afternoon after a most successful builders' trial. The builders were highly pleased over the behavior of the big ship and feel confident that she will win a good sized premium on the official trial.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 8.—Trotting horsemen representing nearly all the country and district agricultural associations of California and several associations of other Pacific coast states, met in this city last night and formally decided to break away from the national association. The final result was the organization of the Pacific Coast Trotting and Pacing association.

TUBIN, March 8.—Louis Keesuth has suffered a relapse and is now very weak.

DENVER, Colo., March 8.—The city police are massed at the city hall tonight, under orders from Police Commissioners Orr and Martin, to prevent their successors, Dennis Mullin and S. D. Barnes, appointed today, from taking possession of the offices.

Counsel for Orr and Martin tonight secured from Judge Graham a temporary writ of injunction, restraining Governor Walte from calling out the militia, restraining Mayor Van Horn from calling a posse to assist in forcing the commissioners, Orr and Martin, out of their offices, and restraining the governor's new appointees from taking their seats. The writ was served on all the interested parties this evening. The governor was wild with rage.

BOSTON, Mass., March 8.—The contract for the raising of the wrecked United States steamship Kearsarge has been awarded to the Boston Towboat company of this city. By the agreement, the company is to receive $45,000 if successful in delivering the ship at the Norfolk navy yard, and if unsuccessful will be paid $10,000 for having made the attempt.

SAN FRANCISCO, March 9.—Dr. J. L. Leek, who with Miss Alice Addersley was found unconscious in the rooms of the latter last Monday, the woman dying afterwards, has recovered sufficiently to say that the woman was insanely jealous of a lady whom he was about to marry, and that he became unconscious soon after taking a dose of cough medicine which she gave him.

WASHINGTON, March 9.—McRae has introduced in the House a bill providing that all lands included within the limits of any Indian reservation, the disposal of which has been, or may be authorized by treaty with any Indian tribe or by any law of the United States, and not already opened, shall be opened to settlement under the provisions of the bill. The secretary of the interior is authorized to cause public surveys of all lands in the reservations referred to, where not already done. The President is authorized to attach any reservation or any part thereof to any existing, contiguous land district or may organize separate land districts. Provision is made for the disposition of all lands in the reservations not needed for allotment to the Indians.

ROME, March 8.—A terrible explosion occurred at 8 o'clock this evening, on the piazza of the Monte Citorio, very near the chamber of deputies, the sitting of which was just concluded. The police at once swarmed to the scene. The explosion shattered all the windows in the neighborhood. It is believed the bomb or infernal machine was placed by anarchists. It is rumored the police made several important arrests and have obtained information from one of the prisoners concerning a widespread conspiracy to blow up things. It is reported the intention was to blow up the chamber of deputies.

Eight persons were wounded by the explosion, including one lady. Six of the wounded are in the hospital. Three men are in a serious condition and are reported dying. A man of the name of Polidori, slightly wounded, was placed under arrest, and the police believe him to be the man who threw the explosive.

NEW YORK, March 8.—A private cablegram was received in this city today from Rome to the effect that Cardinal Ledochowski announces that Bishop Matz has been transferred from Denver, Colo., to St. Cloud, Minn., as the successor to Bishop Zardette. The bishop of Denver will be appointed later.

SAVANNAH, March 9.—A horrible murder was unearthed today. A negro named Isaiah Harden, a longshoreman, disappeared about September 3rd. He was killed in a room, presumably by Mary Washington, Sam Edwards and Richard Washington. His body was cut in pieces and buried under the floor of the house.

Washington and his wife and Edwards are under arrest. The woman admits the killing and says Edwards and her husband were accessories. The other prisoners deny knowledge of the crime. The cause of the murder is supposed to have been jealousy.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., March 9.—A special from Paris, Ark., says: News came yesterday of a terrible double murder four miles south of Boonesville, this county. Two horse traders and their cook, a man 22 years old, went into camp in an out house. That night pistol shots were heard, and next day the young man was seen and the horse traders were missing. That evening the house burned down, and the citizens found in the ashes the bones of two human beings. The young man was arrested.

BALTIMORE, March 9.—Cardinal Gibbons is in daily expectation of a decision from Rome in regard to the removal of the ban of the church from the order of Odd Fellows and Knights of Pythias, which were submitted to the pope by the last plenary council.

LITTLE ROCK, March 11.—The colored population of Little Rock was greatly exercised this afternoon over a reported ghastly discovery made by several of their color in returning from Marche today. About half way between this city and Marche they found the dead body of a young mulatto woman, probably 30 years of age, suspended from the limb of a tree. On her bosom was a placard bearing the inscription: "If anybody cuts this body down, they will share the same fate."

Several parties reported finding the body. It is supposed the woman was lynched, but when, by whom and for what reason no one has been able to state. The body appeared to have been suspended several days.

POMEROY, O., March 10.—Mrs. Thos. M. Helmer, who took a large dose of extract of colocynth to prove that she had not poisoned her daughter, died last night. Her daughter died from poison, and the mother was accused of having administered the fatal dose. She denied the charge, and to demonstrate her innocence she took two spoonfuls of colocynth, with the above result.

It was a dramatic scene. In the best of health, she called the rest of the family and several neighbors to the sitting room after the funeral of her daughter, to witness her swallow two tablespoonfuls of the stuff.

"Town gossip accuse me," said she, "of killing my daughter with this," she took one spoonful.

"I'll take two. You all witness this dose. See if it kills me." Forty-eight hours later she was in the agonies of death, and survived but a few days, dying in the greatest agony.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., March 11.—An attempt was made to blow up the office of the Ironclad, an infidel paper published in this city, Saturday night. The miscreants entered the office through the cellar, and after turning on the natural gas in two stoves, lighted a lamp. The expected explosion was prevented, however, by the arrival of the editor of the paper, who turned off the gas.

CINCINNATI, March 11.—Governor McKinley contemplates visiting the West during the next campaign. He has been urged to go to California and some of the new Western states and may conclude to do so.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11.—Walter Wellman, the Washington correspondent who organized an expedition to solve the polar problem, leaves the city tomorrow for New York, from which city he and his companions will sail on Wednesday for Europe.

NEW YORK, March 11.—To commemorate the assassination of the Czar of Russia, Alexander II, the anarchists held a meeting in the Thalia theater tonight. The gathering was an orderly one and the speeches temperate.

WASHINGTON, March 9.—The question of ratifying the contract made by the Modoc and Lamath Indian tribes and Yahoos and Band Snake Indians of Oregon and their agents, is pending for action by the interior department. The contract stipulates for services to be rendered by the latter in prosecuting the claims of Indians against the United States, arising from an alleged error in the survey of the outboundaries of Clamath reservation in Oregon. It is provided that one agent be given a commission of twelve per cent of the lands, which are valued at $200,000 to $400,000. Commissioner of Indian Affairs Browning recently recommended a reduction of the commission to five per cent. The outboundaries were established by a survey made in 1871, and as a result of the contention which once threatened to end in a serious conflict between the Indians and settlers, the land commissioner has recommended a resurvey. The case will be decided in a few days.

CHICAGO, March 11.—The sexton of Mount Olivet cemetery this afternoon found a huge bunch of flowers on the grave of Martin Burke, one of the Cronin conspirators. The flowers bore a placard with the word "vindicated" upon it. When Dan Coughlin was granted a new trial Burke's grave was found strewn with large roses, tied with green ribbons.

NEW YORK, March 10.—The World's Kingston, Jamaica, special, March 10th says: A cable dispatch from Port Au Prince, Haiti, announced that the steam yacht Natalie, whose stealthy sailing from the United States aroused suspicion, has been captured by the Haitian warship Dissalines and Capolax. The Natalie was intercepted off Fortune Island, one of the Bahamas, arms and ammunition being found on board. She was seized upon information that the munition of war were intended for Haitian revolutionists. The entire crew have been shot by order of President Hippolyte.

NEW YORK, March 12.—Early this morning a policeman on his beat in Harlem, in the neighborhood of the finest apartment houses there saw two men talking in low tones. One was carrying a bundle. He pounced on them, capturing the one with the bundle, the other getting away. At the station it was discovered that the bundle contained three eighteen-inch pieces of iron pipe, capped and primed, supposed to be charged with high explosives, and nine paper cartridges, each containing enough dynamite to blow down an ordinary house. The prisoner gave his name as John Holly. He says little. The bombs have not yet been submitted to expert examination.

WASHINGTON, March 12.—Ex-Senator White, of Louisiana, assumed his new duties as associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States today after the simple, impressive ceremonies usual on such occasions. The court room was crowded with friends and spectators to witness the induction.

The Las Cruces, Colo., Independent states that at a depth of 1,400 feet in the artesian well being bored at Big Springs the drill has passed through 420 feet of solid rock salt. It is claimed that this is the thickest bed of salt known in the United States.

Written for this Paper.

• BE IN EARNEST.

"Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might." If this were the universal rule of action, what a transformation this old earth would undergo, how many failures would turn to success, how many embryo schemes would be developed, how many warm thoughts would bloom to verdure, and how many aspirations would testify in their realization to the potency of energetic and undismayed work! But the majority are fitful in action, easily cast down and discouraged by obstacles. They would like results without much effort, and victory, whether valiant or otherwise in the fight. We are all acted upon by ideas which are presented to us, and a false one which harmonizes with our dilatoriness or laziness, if cherished, is liable to color or influence our character as a whole.

Not infrequently in years gone by did we listen to those who claimed that whenever a man was called officially to any position, that call itself was a guaranty that the requisite ability would be supplied, and the assertion was sustained by the vehement presentation of that great saying that "God hath chosen the weak things of this world to confound the mighty, and things that are not, to bring to naught things which are." Now there is nothing impossible in necessity to the Divine economy, and instances might be cited which standing alone would appear to favor such a conclusion by the indolent; and these being the great majority, reliance upon it as an ever-present truth and line of Divine action has been cherished more or less. But when a man or community becomes possessed of this idea, progress will inevitably be slow and uncertain, and it could probably be demonstrated that the application or perversion of a truth has been a very costly one to this community, and to us shall it be said, even as a Church. Many a one in the missionary field, going without study and preparation; many a one sent to a people with whose tongue he was unfamiliar; many a one sent on business, appointed to certain work, has found that experiment was costly, that knowledge had to be acquired, and that familiarity and qualification had to be begotten of determined study and application, and that failure has been beyond all query as to work proposed.

Not that we would belittle that sublime trust, that grand faith, that true heroism which has inspired men who have thus devoted themselves in obedience to call or appointment. We may not deny the sacrificing spirit, the noble motive, nor the wondrous blessing which has followed humility, and glorified unselfish effort. Spite of all undoubted results where this devotion has been supplemented by Divine aid, hosts of men would testify that a more ample preparation, a more thorough acquaintance, a more generous education, might with similar spirit and blessing have achieved vastly greater results.

As a community, this claims to be a religious one. This is the basis, the foundation, the distinguishing feature; and the conclusion is easily reached that if inspiration can supersede the exercise of the faculties in the higher call, why not trust to the same factor in the lower. And probably few can tell the subtlety of this mental conclusion upon action in all other walks of life. It is abundantly evident that thousands of our population mainly learn by individual experience. They have not learned (only in part) to appropriate the experience of others. Our agriculture testifies to this; our horticulture tells of this; our trade progress, our business attitude, our schools—all give evidence that we profit but little save from our own limited immediate surroundings. The world of commerce, art, science, mechanics, literature and life is a sealed book to the people at large. To live is the one thing needful; to read and think is considered a luxury; and in far too many instances the pride of a man in his family exhausts itself in material things, in food, clothing and a home, while the mental powers, the spiritual faculties, are unprovided for. Yet we want (in a desultory way) our children to be intelligent, to outreach and outrank ourselves in this direction; but books, newspapers, magazines are looked upon, as other luxuries, to be dispensed with in times of financial depression, or just when most absolutely needed and desirable. Men, fathers of families, tell that they have no time to read, assuming that they must do it all; and all effort, all sacrifice, all consideration is for animal wants, save in so far as the Sabbath and the Associations of all our settlements may affect the mentality of us and ours.

Even these Associations are dull and tame, lacking that fire and brilliancy which they ought to and would possess, if books, libraries and intellectual appliances were as abundant as is our supply of elements for the body. In our peregrinations to and fro, we are often accosted by inquiry as to this and that; and when the book or source of information has been given, these are not in the home or in a neighbor's home perchance, and this has enabled the writer to account for the very brief, hesitating and superficial responses given in some visited associations.

The point to be pressed is this, that the worker in any line of thought or action should strive to be as thorough as possible. If religion is the chief end and aim of life, let his aim be centered on being an intelligent religionist; understanding the tenets of the organization he is identified with, able to give reasons for accepting that one in preference to others, and recommending it by that consistency of life which is blended with progression. To be a Mormon is to be subjected to unusual criticism; and while everyone is not privileged to enjoy a missionary's education, it is the duty of every member, of both sexes, to see that they can defend themselves. In the general occupations of life, this spirit would lead a man or woman to become expert and generally qualified, not in the theory alone, but in the practical duties thereof. To know is duty, to understand is imperative; so that what is done may be done well. It used to be the fashion among agricultural associations to give premiums for the best plowing, the best-made stack, the well-cut hedge, or style of field drain. This awakened ambition, presented models of excellence, and allured men to do their very best. Women received premiums for the best butter, bread, cheese, preserves, house plants, darning, knitting and patchwork. So emulation was provoked, thoroughness was inculcated—for such work was generally done by rule; excellence could be repeated—it was not the production of accident or chance. As to boys, the apprenticeship system was favorable to this excellence. A carpenter, cabinet-maker or carver was usually a good one. He took pride in it, did what he did do, well. If he could not acquire facility in the use of tools, familiarity with material, and rapidity of execution, but remained a botch, his interest was best served by selecting some other branch on which to secure his subsistence.

So with the mechanical arts. Whatever a man professed to be, as a rule he had to be, for competent men could always be found if he failed in exhibiting a desired proficiency. Professional life was just as exacting as mechanics. Men had to be able in some branch, to make satisfactory headway, for it was a difficult thing for one to adopt a new trade or profession in that conservative country.

The western world is the antipodes of this. Men assume to occupy positions which they are in hardly any sense able to fill. Our city presents evidences of this, just as many other places do. And while there is in many men a certain adaptability, the necessity of training, of apprenticeship, is not deemed essential to success. Many a business, many an enterprise, has failed for lack of this ability. Men have been crowded, forced into positions for which they had no aptitude, to which they gave no love, no heart. Their service was automatic, mechanical, lifeless, and unproductive of anything save an unwelcome education and a sad, sad loss!

Is it worth while to urge upon the youth of Utah especially, the necessity for work, study, and continuous attention if they would make their mark? That excellence in one thing is better than a smattering in many? That life is too serious for trifling, success too desirable to be deferred for laziness, and too important to be wooed today and neglected all next week or year? The world is groaning under its load of mediocrity, it has far too many who are "Jack of all trades and master of none;" and it never was in greater need of earnest, stirring, energetic, painstaking, honest workers; men who will be thorough, loving excellence, determined to have it, and ignoring all hypocrisy, sham, veneer, and eye service; counting a well-rounded manhood, a stable character, and uncompromising workmanship, as among the grandest attributes of developed humanity.

Let the young men at least accept the anciently inspired Apostolic injunction, "Whatever thine hand findeth to do—if good—do it with thy might!"

LAID TO REST.

The funeral services over the remains of the late Isaac Harrison, who died on March 2nd, were held in the Sandy ward meeting house at 1 o'clock on Monday afternoon. The building, which was tastefully draped in black and white by the sisters of the Relief society, was crowded to overflowing by those anxious to pay their last earthly respects to one who was so universally known and liked. The Ninety-third quorum of Seventies, of which the deceased was a member, had charge of the arrangements. The remains were accompanied from the residence to the meeting house by the ward Bishopric and members of the quorum, the family and friends. The services were taken charge of by Bishop Jensen. Bishop Bills, of South Jordan, offered the opening prayer, after which well-timed and appropriate address were made by Elders Wm. Taylor, of Mill Creek; Isaac Groo, of Salt Lake; Samuel Bateman, of West Jordan; Bishop Bills, of South Jordan; John Sharp, of Union; E. Holman, Wm. D. Kuhre and Bishop Jensen of Sandy, all of whom spoke in the highest terms of praise of the honesty, integrity and general uprightness of the deceased, as known to them through long years of intimate friendship and association. They spoke of the esteem in which he was held by all the people irrespective of religious belief, owing to his ever ready willingness to assist in the alleviation of sickness and distress.

After the benediction was pronounced by Bro. A. Maybe, of South Jordan, the people were permitted to take a farewell look upon the familiar features, that looked just like life. The procession was then formed and moved to the cemetery, headed by the ward Bishopric and Seventies on foot, and the remains followed by the family and friends in carriages. A furious blizzard prevented some of the women and children from accompanying them. Arrived at the cemetery the dedicatory prayer was offered by Elder W. R. Scott of the Seventies, and the remains of one of the few remaining Battalion veterans were laid to rest to sleep until the resurrection morn.

Isaac Harrison, son of Latham and Mary Jane Harrison, was born in Columbiana county, Ohio, November 2nd, 1815. He was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, April 18th, 1837, by Micah B. Melton; was familiar with the Prophet Joseph, and with the scenes and incidents of Nauvoo. After the expulsion from Nauvoo, when the call came for the Mormon Battalion, he enlisted as a private in company E, leaving his wife and children with the body of the Saints. He never saw his wife again, death claiming her ere she could start for the valley. Two of the children, a son and daughter, now survive and live, one in Iowa, and one in Nebraska.

When the Battalion was disbanded in California, Brother Harrison remained there several years, and married Catherine Smith, who survives him, and whose devoted labors and ministrations, night and day, have done much to alleviate the distress of his last hours. He brought his family to Utah in 1858, settling at Farmington, Davis county, but in a year removed to Salt Lake county, finally locating in Sandy, where he remained until his death. He had charge of the first Sunday school in Holidayburg (now Brintons), South Jordan, West Jordan and at Sandy. He was the first justice of the peace in Sandy, which office he held, with only one short interval, until 1888. He was postmaster for many years and was always prominent in civil and ecclesiastical affairs. Though plain and unostentatious in his life, few men were better known and respected. He never wavered in his testimony for the truth of the work to which he had dedicated his life. He leaves a numerous family of children and grandchildren in Utah.

MORE OF CANAIGRE.

RAMAH, New Mexico,
March 1, 1894.

Numerous communications from Utah have reached Ramah in regard to the cultivation of the canaigre root and some of the inquiries show a misunderstanding of a statement made in the article on the subject from Ramah published in the EVENING NEWS of Feb. 18th, which if allowed to pass may lead to failure in experiments by Utah farmers and thus discourage the introduction of the plant into the Territory. I desire to correct this and to add such other information on the subject as the experience of the citizens of Ramah with the wild root enables them to furnish to their Utah friends.

It was stated in the article above referred to that the season of the plant's growth was from October to May. Also that the winters at Ramah reached from ten to fifteen degrees below zero, and the inference has been drawn that the plant grows during the winter when the earth is frozen hard and covered with snow. Perhaps it would have been more intelligible had the fact been stated that the root does not grow when the ground is frozen, instead of taking it for granted that in a climate where the thermometer registers so low this palpable fact should be understood.

The statement, however, that the plant grows from October to May was taken from the Arizona Experiment Station bulletin and refers to its habits in the warm climate of southern Arizona. At Ramah, a climate more nearly like that of Cache valley, owing to an elevation of 7,000 feet, it begins growth with the rainy season, which is from the 20th of July to the 1st of August. It flourishes until severe cold weather, which begins generally from the 1st to the 15th of November and lasts until about the 1st of March, when the plant again revives and matures from the 15th of June to the 1st of July; thus showing that its period of growth is similar to that of winter wheat, as to which all farmers are familiar.

We would therefore say in reply to all those who have made requests for the root for seed with which to experiment this spring that the time to plant in Utah will doubtless be later in the season, and would suggest about the middle of August. It will, however, grow if planted in the spring, though according to a recent publication in the Irrigation Age, it will not mature as other spring crops but will die down on the approach of hot weather and revive again at its natural season, developing to maturity no faster or sooner than if planted at the latter period, and hence, if the statement be correct, spring planting would be of no advantage.

The canaigre root has been referred to in various leading articles published in Utah and Arizona as a "tuber" which means a plant that will grow from the eyes like the potato, in consequence of which we erroneously called it a "tuber" in the former article referred to. These publications will surely mislead farmers if not corrected. It is a root, not a "tuber," and must be grown from the root or seed. It is probable that it may be split between the eyes that appear on the crown end and multiplied into three or four for planting; but this we do not know and would advise the planting of the entire root, to be certain of results.

The planting of the seed does not seem to be practice. Although the plant flowers profusely, few of the seed are said to mature, while it is believed that few of those which do mature will germinate when planted. The Arizona Experiment Station bulletin asserts that diligent search failed to disclose a single seedling growing in the fields of wild canaigre. The planting of the seed, if obtainable, would require two years to produce a crop for the market, the first year's growth resulting in but a single root, which, either replanted or left in the ground, will produce its cluster of roots the second year. Hence planting the roots from the cluster is the quickest to obtain a crop for the market. Besides, the root may be readily supplied for planting while the seed cannot; at least this is the case at Ramah.

While the plant seems to have a general accommodation for various soils, canaigre is no exception to the rule that there is everywhere in nature a special adaptation of soil to plant. Its wild growth in the vicinity of Ramah is most vigorous in sandy or sandy loam soils, requiring a loose open earth which heavy clay and clay loam soils do not have. But the Arizona Experiment Station bulletin informs us that it may be cultivated successfully in heavy soils by watering and properly loosening up the earth.

From observations made here we would say, do not plant in mineral soils; and will suggest (from the limited knowledge we have of the soils of Utah) such places as the Provo bench and the light sandy lands in the vicinity of Santaquin, Utah county, the Sandridge in Davis county, and Benson ward and Lewiston in Cache county.

As to irrigation, of which a number of inquiries have been made, we will say, that while in southern Arizona, where the great heat rapidly dries out the ground, the plant needs watering several times in a season, at Ramah it is not the case and we would judge would not be required in Utah. The late summer rains at the time the plant begins its fall growth and the melting snows at the time of its revival in the spring is all the water the wild root gets in this country. And where it would get these in Utah irrigation would not seem to be necessary. Though it may be like winter wheat which is successfully grown without irrigation, yet is better when watered.

What we know of the plant here is as to its wild state only, hence we can give no definite information in regard to planting or cultivating, but will quote what has been published in a bulletin of the Arizona Experiment Station on the subject: "The wild growth, so far as observed, is confined to the loose sandy soils at the crop of new roots on quite heavy soil at the University and moderately heavy soil at Phoenix is larger than on sandy loam soils, all planted about the same time and all irrigated. It appears necessary, however, to plant near the surface on heavy soils to secure new roots of fair size. And this holds true in deep planting on sandy loams. Of the average size roots of large growth it will require about one ton per acre for seed, planting nine by thirty inches. Unlike potatoes and most other plants grown from tubers the seed roots are not lost; for after producing a growth of new roots the mother root if but a year old retains its weight and its content of tannic acid increases." As to the depth for planting in a colder climate than southern Arizona we can only say that the crown of the wild root in this vicinity is from three to five inches below the surface.

Several parties having requested a few of the roots sent to them, as if to remove doubts as to the possibility of its growing in a country as cold as this, and hence as to whether it would grow in Utah, I took the trouble today to drive out a couple of miles from Ramah and dig a few bunches of the root and have forwarded them to the News company where they may doubtless be found for the inspection of interested parties. Some were also sent to Mr. Arthur Stayner for the purpose of aiding, if not too late, the passage of the canalgre bill now pending in the Legislature. And permit me to say, through the columns of the News, to such members of that body as may chance to see this article, that canalgre does grow and flourish in a climate from 10 to 15 degrees below zero. And from personal observation as to the habits and nature of the plant growing in such a climate, I can say that in all human probability it will thrive in most of the varied soils of Utah, whether in arid or humid regions, and anywhere, from its northern to its southern boundary.

Surely the present intelligent Legislature of Utah cannot fail to grasp the vast financial benefits certain to flow to the Territory which it has been empowered by the people to bless with wholesome industrial laws in the passage of such a bill, calculated, as it is, to foster and greatly stimulate the production of leather at home, and leading inevitably to extensive manufacture of the staple products of leather and a generous employment of home labor and home capital. The financial interest which Utah has in the re-establishment of the tanning industry, and hence in the passage of the canalgre bill, is calculated not by thousands but by millions of her hard dollars. If the members of the Legislature overlook the passage of this bill what can the people say of them any more praiseworthy than of that notable body of men who sold for a mess of pottage (a stale, flat and unprofitable party principle) the dearest interests of Utah when in an hour of overheated party zeal and forgotten home interests they struck off the sugar bounty from its statutes. If the Legislature will encourage it the farmers will reach out after the canalgre root and the tanning industry will be permanently established in Utah.

Respectfully,
H. E. BAKER.

WAYNE STAKE CONFERENCE.

Minutes of Wayne Stake quarterly conference, held at Loa, February 24 and 25, 1894. Present on the stand Stake authorities, President Willis E. Robison presiding.

After the usual opening exercises, Elder Willis E. Robison expressed regret that many of the Saints would be prevented from attending conference on account of sickness. He reported that the Stake presidency had visited and held meetings in every ward in the Stake since last conference. The Saints are rejoicing in spirit, and although these are hard times he did not know that any in this Stake were actually suffering for the necessities of this life.

Elder Geareu S. Bastian bore testimony to the good report made by Elder Robison. He knew that thus far the Stake presidency had been united in all their labors. He spoke at some length to the young men encouraging them to secure land and turn their attention to farming, for he knew if they would labor to subdue the land God would temper the elements and good crops would be raised.

Elder Franklin W. Young reported that the home missionaries were working zealously and doing much good. He spoke upon the necessity of the Latter-day Saints becoming a self-sustaining people. Encouraged the Saints to sustain home manufactories, and prosperity would come to our country by so doing.

Elder Wm. Meeks quoted some sayings of President Brigham Young made in St. George years ago upon the principle of self-sustenance and endorsed the remarks of Elder F. W. Young.

Elder George Coleman reported the Teasdale ward in a prosperous condition.

In the afternoon the following wards were reported in good condition: Fremont ward, reported by Elmer Hiett E. Maxfield, Loa by Elder Benjamin F. Brown and East Loa by Elder P. J. Christensen.

Elder Ephraim K. Hanks said the Saints should watch as well as pray. Related some of his experiences during the Johnston army visit to Utah, illustrating the necessity of being watchful. He promised the people of Rabbit Valley if they would plant trees they should raise fruit. Related a dream the Lord gave him years ago demonstrating the way the Lord makes provision for and comforts his Saints in the hour of need. Had witnessed the dead raised to life, the sick restored to health and many wonderful miracles wrought by the power of God.

Elder John A. Vance spoke very encouragingly to the young, exhorting them to "seek first the Kingdom of God, and all other things should be added." He invoked the blessings of God on all the interests of Wayne stake.

Elder Hans M. Hansen rejoiced to be able to meet with the Saints this afternoon. He discoursed at length upon the power of faith. Elder Thos.

Blackburn spoke upon the Word of Wisdom, making special reference to the evil of using tobacco. Elder John J. Ellett related some of his early experiences in Rabbit valley, and encouraged the Saints to keep the commandments of God.

At the suggestion of Elder Willis E. Robison, the Saints by unanimous vote promised to fast and pray tomorrow morning for the sick in the stake.

Sunday morning, the 25th, the general and Stake authorities were presented by Elder Geareu S. Bastian, and sustained by the people. The statistical report was read by Elder Joseph Eckersley, after which Sacrament was administered.

Elder Hans M. Hanson was pleased to learn from the report read this morning that the Wayne Stake was equipped with a good body of Priesthood, and said that God would inspire the humblest Elder to preach and edify the Saints when called upon. He encouraged the Saints to be content with their lot and labor to beautify their homes; spoke upon home industry, and exhorted the Saints to be thrifty.

Elder Willis E. Robison spoke at length upon the principles of economy, home industry, zealous obedience and liberality. The speaker gave some instructions to ward teachers and encouraged parents to visit the district schools and be interested in the education of their children.

Conference then adjourned for three months.

P. S.—A Relief society conference was held at 2 p.m. when addresses on timely subjects were delivered by the president, Jane S. Coleman, her counselor, Sarah S. Forsyth, Lucinda Brown and Elders G. W. Young and John T. Lasenby. The reports given by the presidents of the various societies, demonstrated the relief work in good condition.

A splendid feeling prevailed throughout conference and all the meetings were well attended. A Bishops' meeting was held in the afternoon, at which much valuable counsel was given by the Stake presidency, and many things pertaining to the interests of the Stake were talked over.

JOSEPH ECKERSLEY,
Stake Clerk and Recorder.

The residents of a portion of the town of Cripple Creek, Colo., were thrown into a fever of excitement on Wednesday evening. First came a loud explosion which shook up the buildings, followed by a shower of frozen dirt and rocks a few seconds later. Rocks and chunks of dirt weighing from one to twenty pounds fell in showers on the buildings and on the streets. Men who were excavating for a new building on the west side of Second street, put two sticks of giant and fourteen pounds of blasting powder in one hole and touched it off. James Baumling received a scalp wound from a falling piece of rock. One twenty-pound piece of frozen dirt crashed through the roof of a furniture store, another chunk went through the roof of Koch's theater and a small blacksmith shop was badly wrecked. A dozen other buildings were more or less damaged and a score of pedestrians on the streets had narrow escapes from death. The parties who caused the explosion were arrested.

WESTERN NEWS ITEMS.

At Douglas, Wyo., A. M. Craft last week discovered a valuable deposit of coal.

The Spokane Indians are now being located on the Cœur d'Alene reservation.

Platteville, Colo., will probably have waterworks, a flouring mill and cannery this year.

Florence, Colo., is about to add an ostrich farm and large poultry ranch to its other attractions.

A party of prospectors from Eddy, New Mexico, are searching the Organ mountains for gold.

In Central Wyoming the cattle have suffered greatly for want of water and many have died in consequence.

A butcher in a Washington town recently purchased a hog which weighed, when dressed, 755 pounds.

Arizona cattle ranges are in prime condition and stock men are rejoicing over plenty of feed and small losses.

Northern Arizona counties are rejoicing over an unusual heavy snow fall which assures an abundance of water.

Five double decked car loads of fine Cotswold sheep were shipped from the San Luis valley to Kansas City last week.

Rawlins, Wyo., will set out 3,000 shade trees this coming spring, as a result of a better water supply for irrigation.

Ruffians raided the Del Norte, (Colo.) Daily Inquirer and gutted the office during the night, scattering all the type over the office floor.

Montana's state flower has been selected. It is the gorgeous blossom of the prickly pear, and the motto, "Step Not on Me," goes with the flower.

Chinese have leased 120 acres of land adjoining the Stanford ranch at Vina, Cal., for a term of five years at a yearly rent of $3,000.

A Rifle, Colo., liveryman named James Clem has broken a pair of elk to harness and drives them out when the girls want a sleigh ride.

At Las Vegas, N. M., the Optic complains languidly at the continued fine weather and laments the absence of the usual snow storms of winter.

San Diego will soon be joined to La Mesa by a motor line. Work will be commenced at once, and in thirty days it is thought the line will be in operation.

Near Verdi, Nev., last week, five woodchoppers were buried alive beneath an avalanche of snow. Only one was saved and he was partially injured.

There were shipped from Rawlins, Wyo., in 1898 a total of 830 cars of stock containing 720 head of horses, 10,560 head of cattle and 53,380 head of sheep.

The head-gates of the Amity canal in Otero county, Colo., which takes its water from the Arkansas, are said to be equal in construction to the locks of the great Erie canal.

Bessemer, Colo., protests against the circulation of reports that work is abundant there or at Pueblo. On the contrary, there is not work enough for the people now there.

The attempt to run a bloodhound at Cripple Creek one day last week to trail a tool thief resulted in the arrest of the wrong parties and counter arrests for false imprisonment.

Fort Marcy, at Santa Fe, N. M., is the oldest established military post in America. The Spaniards used it as a fort in 1802, and General Phil Kearney built a fort on the old site in 1846.

Ten thousand head of sheep were recently attached by customs officials at Maxwell, N. M., for having evaded the tariff in crossing the sheep from Mexico into the United States.

Western Nebraska people near Gering have started a movement for the annexation of the western counties of Nebraska to Wyoming. They want annexation on account of irrigation.

Las Animas, Bent county, Colo., last week shipped seventy-eight hogs to Denver weighing 200 pounds each. These hogs had each consumed seven bushels of wheat at 40 and 45 cents a bushel.

The coal deposit in Garfield county, Colo., is said to be one of the largest in the world. The vein reaches from Cardiff to Palsades, a distance of 100 miles, and measures in many places sixty feet in thickness.

A woman in Stockton, Cal., after the recent flood, found floating in the cellar of her house a sack containing two skulls. They had been carefully cleaned and bleached, but as yet no one has claimed them.

Johnny Haley, who carries the mail from Eureka to Duckwater, Nev., got lost in the recent severe storm and was exposed to the cold for sixty hours. When found both hands and both feet were frozen and he was snowblind.

On Friday morning a large mountain lion visited the ranch of Mrs. W. B. Towle, near Laramie, Wyo., seized a yearling colt not fifty yards from the house, killed it and attempted to drag it off to its home.

Range cattle and sheep have wintered better in New Mexico than for many years past. The loss is estimated at only 8 per cent, and there are 800,000 head of cattle in the territory.

At Green River, Wyo., great interest is manifested in the placer diggings near there. Some excitement has been created by the discovery that the black sand of Green River yields as high as $23 a ton in gold.

Cochita, N. M., gold discoveries are not new. Old Spanish archives in the possession of Territorial Librarian Samuel Ellison show that the Cochita gold mines were known to the Spaniards 200 years ago.

A grizzly bear, said to be about 1,500 pounds in weight, met George Stebbins on the American trail, near Ouray, last week. The bear was so astonished that it jumped the trail and fell over a bluff, breaking its bones.

At Greeley, Col., Landlord Hoehst of the St. James hotel claims to have caught last week with his own hands, without either hook, line or net, fifty pounds of fish and three ducks in a slough near Greeley. He is said to be an expert sportsman.

Richard Gird of Chino, Cal., has received seventy-five tons of beet seed from France. It is being distributed to farmers preparatory to the season's sowing. A large force will be put to work enlarging the capacity of the sugar factory.

The Peoria canal at Gila Bend, A. T., is forty miles long and covers 50,000 acres. The dam is being completed as rapidly as possible, 160 men being employed in its construction. When finished it will be 1920 feet long, seventeen feet high and thirty-two feet wide.

The Nampa (Idaho) Producers' association has received 152 replies from 521 circulars sent to the leading fruit growers of Ada and Canyon counties. The replies gave 2,868 acres in fruit as follows: Apples, 621; peaches, 245; prunes, 1,889; pears, 89; cherries, 14.

The Indians of Wasco county, Oregon, have a novel contest at their festivals, which are now in operation. A gaudy blanket is hung up, and before this prize two braves dance. The one maintaining his performance for the greater time takes the blanket.

Ramey Brothers, near Grand Junction, have set out a model fruit farm. On ten acres they have 1,250 pear trees and 500 prune trees. During the past winter only twenty-three have died. The same parties propose setting out forty acres additional principally in prune trees.

The Las Animas Leader states that during the big storm in February about 10,000 head of cattle drifted from the northern ranges down to the Arkansas. They were driven back on the prairie and scattered, and are believed to have worked their way back to their home ranges.

At Carson, Nev., a man named Edward Reagan has invented a mercurial alarm clock which will strike when the mercury reaches any designated degree of temperature. The clock will be invaluable to those who desire to maintain a specified degree of temperature in any apartment.

Porter Williams has returned from Frodman's ferry on Snake river, says the Idaho Statesman, where the Prout gold saving machine has been placed. A trial run was made with the machine last Saturday. It worked splendidly but the water froze before a clean-up could be made.

Peach trees in San Juan county, New Mexico, just south of Durango, this state, are found to thrive best on high sandy soil with good drainage. That portion of the mountain region is said to be unsurpassed as a fruit growing region, and its orchard owners find a ready market in the southwestern mines.

Fruita, in the Grand valley, Colorado, boasts of a man who located there with 25 cents as his capital six years ago, who has just cleaned up $8,300 from the sale of ninety acres of fruit land, which he took up and planted in orchard. He supported a family while making this little start in life.

A prisoner in the Deer Lodge, Mont., jail recently tried three times in one day to take his life. He first tried hanging, but was cut down; then he sought to break his neck by falling from his bunk on his head, and, finally, cut his wrists with a sharp can lid. He was discovered before he had lost much blood.

The Owyhee dam on the Bruneau river, Idaho, has been completed and work is progressing on the great canal which is six feet deep, forty-eight feet wide, with a capacity of 26,000 inches. Steel headgates have been constructed and water will be let into the canal in time for spring placer mining and for irrigation next summer.

An Arizona man mixed morphine with his whisky, and as a result he saw hosts of snakes in his bedroom. As long as he was armed he refused to be overcome by such things as snakes, so he got out his gun and started the house about midnight with a volley fired at the imaginary wriggling intruders. He is now in the insane asylum.

The Angel Camp stage from Milton, Cal., was stood up on the Carmin Hill grade at Bear mountain, three miles from Elkhorn station, on Wednesday, by two masked men. They broke open the wooden express box and went through the passengers. From what can be learned the robbers were novices in the business, for they held up the stage on the trip when little or no treasure is carried.

Judge Lewis's three boys in Silver City, says the De Lamar (Idaho) Nugget, have found a rich little gold ledge near their home, just west of the Morning Star mine, and the school now having a vacation, they have tackled the ground just like three old miners would do, with a fair prospect of making a stake out of it big enough to pay for a college course for all of them.

A. C. Murdock, a laborer, was badly injured by the premature discharge of a stick of giant powder on Wednesday afternoon, near Gripple Creek, Colo. He was working on the grade of the Midland Terminal railroad and tamping the powder when it exploded. His face and eyes were filled with powder and particles of rock. It is probable that he will lose the sight in one and perhaps both eyes.

The usually peaceful little town of Fruita, Colo., in the lower valley, was on Friday evening the scene of what in the South would be termed another Southern outrage. A printer employed upon the Western Slope was called upon about 8 o'clock, escorted to the town limits and ordered to leave. The grievance against him was the fact that he had taken the place of a woman at lower wages. The man protested that he was only learning his trade and could not get better wages, but was compelled to go.

W. R. Dye, of Rocky Ford, gives to the Enterprise some emphatic testimony as to the value of fall irrigation. In the spring of 1898 he planted forty-five acres of corn on land which had been well irrigated in the fall but for which now no water was available in the early spring. His neighbors predicted failure. It had no irrigation until the corn was earing. The crop was not only large but of superior quality, and is in demand for seed.

Mr. Dye also had good success with alfalfa, having threshed last year sixty-six bushels of seed from six acres.

A Rawlins dispatch says an eloping party which arrived in that town the other evening caused a slight ripple of excitement. The stage followed the buggy tracks into town, where all traces of them were lost for several hours. Their names are William La Piere and Beale Barcus, the sixteen-year-old daughter of Ira Barcus, who resides about twenty-five miles above Saratoga. Mr. Barcus happened to be in town with a shipment of cattle. After a stormy interview with his daughter, he reluctantly gave his consent, and Judge Sundin tied the knot that made them one.

The large ralsin dryer warehouse, storerooms, etc., of J. B. Wilkie at Yuba City, Cal., were burned on Sunday morning. In the building were 4,000 trays and 100 cords of wood, besides the fruit graders, stemmers, dippers, tracks, trucks and other appurtenances. The dryer was built last fall and had only been used one season. It was one of the largest and best equipped establishments of the kind in the state. The total loss is $10,000; no insurance. Incendiaries are believed to have set the fire, as there had been no fire in any of the furnaces for some time.

Joseph Roberts, an ex-United States soldier, confined at Spokane, Wash., awaiting trial in the United States court for murder committed in Cœur d'Alene, appears to have a charmed life. March 1st he tried to hang himself with a rope made of bits of old sack found in his cell. He was cut down when almost dead. Then he tried to butt his brains out against the wall of his cell. Erysipelas set in as a result of the effort. On Wednesday he drank the contents of a bottle of iodine with which he was being treated. His life was saved after hard work. He declares that he will yet find some way to take his life.

Huntington-Hopkins company, which for forty years has been known from one end of the Pacific coast to the other and at least as far east as Ogden, has gone out of existence, and the names will be a memory in the hardware business world. The entire stock, good will and fixtures of the company were by the stockholders assigned over to the firm of Miller, Sloes & Scott, a young and energetic firm in the same line of business as the retiring one. What the conditions of the transfer were, beyond the mere fact that a good round sum was paid for the stock, are not made public, says the San Francisco Chronicle. The capital stock of Huntington-Hopkins company is $1,500,000.

Nick Orland, an Italian smelter laborer, was on Tuesday night the victim of the boldest robbery on record in Pueblo. Two men in a buggy called at his house, flashed a bogus officer's star in his face, read an alleged warrant to him and took him out toward the county jail, in a lonely place of the city. They stopped at a vacant house, where their pal, masked, met them. They bound and gagged Orland, took all his clothes except his hat and socks, made away with his watch and $85 in money, and drove off and left him. Orland managed to edge to the door and about 1 o'clock attracted the attention of a neighbor by his muffled shouts. He had $1,800 in cash on his person a week ago and the robbers are supposed to have made the play for this.

The second general convention of the Inter-state Irrigation association will be held at Omaha on the 21st and 22nd of this month. The association was organized at Salina, Kansas, September 28th, 1898, for the purpose of demonstrating the practicability of irrigation in that portion of the United States lying between the 97th meridian and the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, and known as the semi-arid or plains region. The states represented in the formation of the association were Nebraska, Kansas, Wyoming and Colorado. In addition the states of North Dakota, South Dakota, Oklahoma, Montana, Texas and New Mexico are equally interested in the problem which the association is endeavoring to solve.

On Sunday last the ordinance closing all classes of business on the Sabbath except drug stores, hotels and restaurants went into effect at San Bernardino, Cal. So far as known the ordinance was universally obeyed. Early in the morning a large number of people were on the streets to see whether the stores and other places of business would open. Quite a large sum of money has been raised to test the validity of the ordinance but so far the lawyers have not decided how or when to make a case. There is talk of arresting the head officers of the gas company, who have to make gas on Sundays to keep up the requisite pressure, and there was also some talk of making a case against church officers who take up collections in church as being in violation of the ordinance.

Mrs. Mary Smith, who styles herself the "trumpet medium," is about to have a hard time to get the property left her by her friend, Mrs. Marie Lemon, the old lady who died in Alameda, Cal. Rachael Neal, a sister of the deceased, has made a new move in the contest and filed an amended complaint in court wherein she makes broader charges against the medium than those originally made. Dr. William Jefferis, a nephew of the deceased, has just arrived from Indianapolis and has employed attorneys to make a contest on his behalf. He proposes to attack the will left by his aged aunt on the ground that undue influence was used by the medium. It is charged that Mrs. Smith claimed to be a spiritualist medium and represented that she was able, sometimes by herself and sometimes with the aid of various mechanical appliances and devices, to summon the dead to her presence and obtain messages and communications from them. These messages used to be sent to old Mrs. Lemon, and she firmly believed that they came from the spirit land. It is asserted in the complaint that Mrs. Smith is not only a medium, but that she is a mesmerist and hypnotist, and that at various times she used her powers on Mrs. Lemon so successfully that the latter gave Mrs. Smith her property. It is said that Mrs. Smith did many things in order to weaken the mind of the old lady so that, she could secure her estate.

THE SCANDINAVIAN FATHERLAND.

Prepared from Special Cablegrams.

SWEDEN.

The Swedenborgians will soon build a church of their own in the capital.

A railroad will be built between Eslof and Horby. Eslof has made an appropriation of 50,000 crowns for the purpose.

Prince Carl's deafness is increasing, and unless the conversation is carried on very loud, he is not able to hear anything of it.

W. W. Thomas, the former minister of the United States to Stockholm, has declared his intention to spend the summer in Sweden.

It seems now probable that the large appropriation asked for by the government for the purpose of increasing the Swedish navy, will be granted by both houses of the riksdag.

Sweden's import during 1893 may be estimated at 106 million dollars, in round numbers, and the export at 91 million dollars.

C. A. Liljefeldt, a poor actor connected with the Stromberg Opera Company, has fallen heir to an inheritance of 3 million liras, which a female relative, who died in Italy, has donated to him.

The number of passengers carried on the Swedish government railroad was 5,018,000 last year as compared with 4,872,000 in 1892. The revenue for sold tickets was 7,544,000 kronor last year as compared with 7,377,500 kronor in 1892.

Miss Selma Lagerlof is an authress who is rapidly coming to the front. Her fame was founded by her book "The Tale of Gosta Berling." A romantic spirit, with a touch of mysticism, reveals itself in the work, which will be translated into English.

No athletic club in the country counts among its members stronger men than the Stockholm Athletic Club. Besides Wahlund and Johnson, now starring in New York, there are several gentlemen of the club, who are able to lift from 3,000 to 3,500 pounds. Wahlund, as told before, lifts 4,140 pounds.

Mrs. Sigrid Arnoldson Fischhof, who is now visiting America for the first time, has made her artist career abroad, and but rarely appeared on the Swedish stage. Her debut took place at the Opera Comique in Paris. Having performed on many of the principal theaters on the continent, her celebrity has been constantly increasing.

The height of the summits in northern Sweden is not very great; but as the snow line in these northern regions lies only about 1,000 meters above the level of the sea, there is still a considerable region to be explored. The area of the glaciers in Sweden is nearly as great as in Tyrol. The beautiful phenomenon known as "red snow" is often observed, and the crimson color (due to the presence of microscopic organisms) is sometimes so vivid as to be visible at a distance of  $\frac{1}{2}$  kilometer. The mountains seldom culminate in sharp points or peaks, but ridges of abrupt slope are not uncommon.

The number of reindeer owned by a Laplander in Sweden varies to a considerable degree. The poor may have 50-200 reindeer, those better off 300-700, and the rich Laplanders will keep 1,000 and even 5,000 reindeer. There is some difficulty in collecting statistics on the number of reindeer as the Laplanders may sometimes be unwilling or unable to give any correct statements. According to the latest statistics the number of reindeer in Sweden would amount to 296,220, of which 52,550 were in the province of Jemtland, 40,500 in the province of Vesterbotten, and 203,170 in the province of Norrbotten.

NORWAY.

Thorwald Hellesen, a prominent lawyer of Christiania, is dead.

Oysters are being sold at present in Christiania at 45-52 cents per score.

New gas and water works will be built in Kalundborg at a cost of 200,000 kroner.

The Nammegard flour mill has been struck by lightning and burned to the ground.

The king will soon leave Christiania, but is expected to visit Norway again in the summer.

The new drama Ibsen has been working at for some time will be published in a couple of months.

More than half of the labor organizations of the country have joined political organizations.

J. C. C. Parnemann, the well-known ship-broker of Porsgrund, died at the advanced age of 90 years.

The steamer "Romsdal" was wrecked off Tampico. Nothing is known in regard to the fate of her crew.

The German emperor will again visit Norway next summer. Many German tourists are also expected to pay a visit to the Norwegian "fjords" and mountain regions.

Sloyd is now being introduced in most of the Norwegian schools. The Swedish sloyd system is probably the only Swedish "system" which is meeting with favor in Norway.

King Oscar and Queen Sophia seem to have enjoyed themselves very much in Christiania. Judging from appearances the Norwegian people is far from as radical as some of the news papers will make their readers believe.

The consumption of wine in Norway has considerably decreased during the last fifteen years, while the consumption of beer has constantly increased. However, less of this beverage is drunk in Norway than in most other countries under pretty similar conditions.

Dr. Carl Holtermann has been appointed teacher of botany at the university of Muenster. Dr. H. is the third Norwegian connected with a German university. Dr. Lorck is professor at the university of Bonn, and professor Lie, the famous mathematician, is in Leipzig.

DENMARK.

Live cod is being imported to Copenhagen from Iceland.

All the passenger coaches on the state railroads are now being heated by steam.

Thaulow, the artist, is painting a large-sized picture, which has been ordered from an art firm of Paris.

August Ennas new opera "Cleopatra" was given at the Royal Theater and was favorably received by an elegant and critical public.

The agitation for universal peace is going on in Denmark, and is gaining many friends. Several new peace societies have recently been established.

The Danish butter is probably the best in the world, and some of the leading hotels in Gothenburg and Malmö, Sweden, have gone so far as to import butter from Denmark.

The income of the Great Northern Telegraph Company in Copenhagen during January was 525,000 francs as compared with 520,000 francs in the same month 1893 and 500,000 francs during January 1892.

"The Blind of Denmark" is the name of a society which has undertaken a stupendous task. A petition to the government for laws compelling the state to take care of and educate every blind child, has been issued, and it will not be presented to the government until practically all who are in favor of such a law have signed their names to the petition. In order to increase the moral weight of the petition the signers will be requested to declare that they are willing to contribute 25 ore a year to the society, until such a law has been passed.

The opposition to the proposed eight new churches in Copenhagen is crystallizing into mass meetings and resolutions. At a recent meeting the resolutions against the churches were passed against a minority of 16 although the churches were supported by many able speakers. Mr. J. Jensen perhaps voiced the sentiment of the majority most adequately in the following reasoning: The only valid reason for building new churches would be a lack of room, for the attendance. But there is no lack of room. The churches are standing empty. Still the ministers want us to build new churches, and who are to build them? Not those who go to church indeed, but the state, and we, who do not go to church, are to pay. The mass of the people look upon the state church as a necessary evil. The people withdraw from the church, and the preachers become public officers and religion a matter of business. Christ said: 'Let the dead bury the dead.' We say: 'Let our saints build our churches.'

NOTES FROM STEVENSON.

WELLS, Nevada, March 6, 1894.

Our party, consisting of four, find ourselves at Wells, on the Southern Pacific railroad, 257 miles almost directly north of the Salt Lake City line and cut on the desert northwest of the Great Salt Lake. It is 8:30 a. m., Salt Lake time. The morning is clear, cold and very windy, with three or four inches of snow and some deep drifts. Some little shoveling is being done. The town is small, with some wells and wind-mills. The elevation is at this place 5,628 feet above sea level and the whole country looks like a failure excepting for sheep that could eat sage brush and lick snow.

Since the cut rate this route is largely patronized; the cars are often too crowded for comfort. There was considerable complaining with the passengers after changing cars for the West, many saying that the accommodation and class of cars did not compare with the other lines they had been riding on. My opinion is a change for the better would be creditable to the railroad company in many respects. I protest against the checking system wherein refusal was made at Ogden to recheck baggage only to the end of the journey, as for instance with tickets to Los Angeles, with stop-over privileges in California. Those desiring to stop over at San Francisco would have to lay over without their luggage or do as some have had to do, tug away and encumber themselves with their grips. I look upon this as a cruelty which should be immediately remedied. The railway also should give better accommodations to passengers.

We are following over the old California emigrant trail and soon will be going down the Humboldt river. On our way to this place and calling at Farmington to enlarge our company, our attention was called to an old relic in the form of a deed made out and dated July 27, 1837, a synopsis of which I am quite sure will interest many of your readers, as it pertains to an independence, Jackson county, Mo., inheritance deed from Edward Partridge and Lydia Partridge, his wife, of the county of Caldwell and state of Missouri, for the consideration of "one hundred and twenty-six ($126.00) dollars received to our full satisfaction of Louis Abbot, of the county and state aforesaid, do grant, bargain and sell unto the said Louis Abbot and his heirs forever the following described parcel, it being a part of the northwest quarter of section No. thirty-three (33) west, township forty-nine (49) north, range thirty-three (33), and bounded as follows: Commencing at the center of said section thirty-three (33), thence running west eighty (80) rods, thence north forty-two (42) rods, east eighty (80), south forty-two (42) rods to the place of beginning; twenty-one acres of land. EDWARD PARTRIDGE. LYDIA PARTRIDGE.

Dated 27th July, 1847, in presence of W. W. Phelps, Isaac Morley.

After the death of Brother Abbot, whom I well knew in Far West, Missouri the before mentioned deed passed into several hands and finally to the present possessor, Thomas Abbot. It was recently found among a lot of moth-eaten papers, but the deed was intact and well preserved, and may be classed as an old relic. Brother Thomas Abbot also has a tin trunk, 4 inches square and 8½ inches in length, made in 1834, for Dr. Thomas B. Marsh. Still another item interesting to me, is that when I was learning my trade in Missouri, I made the tin trunk for a medicine chest.

E. STEVENSON.

HOME KNITE.

Having canvassed this city and a large portion of the Territory during the past few weeks, I feel that I can speak advisedly regarding the sentiment towards home industry. In the soap trade, for example, the home product has over 75 per cent of the Territory's trade, local and otherwise. Where several months since it was decidedly an up-hill business to advocate home industry, today merchants and consumers alike express themselves in favor of it, not only in words, but in actions, thereby displaying good common sense.

A great deal has been said about consumers asking for home made, and if the merchants did not produce it for them, to go where it was kept. That is all very well, but I want to say in behalf of the dealers that great credit is due them for their efforts. The majority are not only willing to give preference to home products in all lines, but in many instances they lose customers, who persist in having the imported article. That some merchants do urge the home made is shown in the following incident, which is but one of many: A few days since a prominent farmer, accustomed to taking home with him a box of imported soap, believing, as many do who have not tried the home made, that none other would fill the bill, was asked by the clerk of one of our leading establishments, "Why don't you try home made?" A few words persuaded the buyer to take the home product later. The good old farmer and wife testified that it was the best soap they ever used.

"Unity is strength," we have always been taught in this western country. Let us wake up to common sense principles, and, as consumers, ask for and have none other than home made. As dealers, let us use every argument and persuasion to get our patrons to patronize and build up themselves. Competition is necessary to urge the production of worthy articles, but there is no use of home manufacturers running against each other. Would it not be wiser for the producers of Utah and this intermountain region to unite in sentiment and labor for mutual protection? There is room enough for all. Live and let live, and unite in the common cause for the interests of the West.

I have been dressed in home spun most all my life, used home made soap and worn home made shoes, have been fed on the product of this mountain soil, and will defy the world to produce better necessities than we can produce right here at home. HOME KNIT.

MEXICAN MISSION CONFERENCE.

February 24th, 1894, at 10 a. m., the quarterly conference of the Mexican mission convened in the Juarez schoolhouse. The mission presidency were present, also Elders Brigham Young and John Henry Smith, of the Council of Apostles, and Elder R. S. Watson, of Utah, High Councilors and Bishops. The largest body of people who ever here assembled at a conference in this country were present, the building being too small for them to be comfortably seated.

In addressing the conference, Elder George Teasdale of the Council of Apostles, President of the mission, said all ought to rejoice at the visit of the Apostles, and felt that all would be well repaid for their visit.

Elders W. D. Johnson, P. H. Hearst, George W. Sevey, Jesse N. Smith Jr., and Presiding President P. A. Dillman, represented the wards of Diaz, Dublin, Juarez, Pacheco and Oaxaca. The reports were all of an encouraging nature.

The balance of the time on Saturday and Sunday was occupied by Elders Brigham Young, Henry Eyring, A. F. Macdonald, George Teasdale, John Henry Smith, and Robert S. Watson, the Apostles occupying the greater portion of the time, and treating upon various subjects pertaining to our welfare, especially urging upon the people the necessity of unity in all our labors and to cease all evil; promising blessings to follow if humility and good works should follow the instructions given.

Truly the leading brethren were filled to overflowing with the spirit of love and devotion to God and the cause of truth, which communicated itself to every heart. So much so that in our Priesthood meetings brethren forgave each other and strong men were visibly affected with feelings of humility. A bond of union was established in every heart, which we pray God may always continue with the Latter-day Saints.

The labors of the Elders from Utah are much appreciated and will result in untold good to the Saints of Mexico, and every voice is heard to say this is the best conference we have ever had in Mexico.

All the usual society and other meetings were held and were attended by Elder Teasdale and the other brethren. Conference was adjourned for three months.

The brethren from Utah, accompanied by Elder Teasdale, will go to Dublin today, hold two days' meetings, and on Monday start to visit Oaxaca, Sonora. From there they go to the Gila, and thence to Utah.

MILES P. ROMNEY,
Mission Clerk.

SNOWFLAKE STAKE CONFERENCE.

The regular quarterly conference of the Snowflake Stake of Zion convened in the Stake house, at Snowflake, at 10 a. m. Sunday, February 25, 1894. There were in attendance of the Stake presidency: Jesse N. Smith, Lorenzo H. Hatch and Joseph H. Richards, Elder Andrew Jensen, of Salt Lake City, several visiting brethren from St. Johns Stake, most of the members of the local High Council, Bishops of wards and a very liberal attendance of brethren and sisters from the various settlements contiguous.

After the usual opening exercises the conference was addressed by Elder Joseph H. Richards, lately returned from a mission to Europe, followed by Elder Henry Platt of St. Johns Stake.

In the afternoon Elder Andrew Jensen occupied most of the time.

In the evening a Priesthood meeting was held, when some local business was transacted, after which Elder Jensen again instructed the Saints.

Conference was continued on Monday, the 26th, when the Bishops' reports were read, also the statistics of the Stake. The general and local authorities were presented and sustained by unanimous vote of the assembly.

The speakers on Monday were,

Elders William H. Gibbons, C. P. Anderson and C. J. Kemp, of St. Johns Stake, Andrew Jensen, of Salt Lake City, and John Hunt, John Bushman, Jesse N. Smith and Lorenzo H. Hatch, of the Snowflake Stake. Subjects treated were the necessity of greater union among the Saints, payment of tithes and offerings, sustaining Church school system and the local organizations for the young. Elder Jensen in particular strongly urged that more complete records be kept among the Saints.

Good feeling and fellowship prevailed, and this is considered one of the most interesting conferences ever held in this Stake.

L. M. SAVAGE, Clerk.

OBITUARY NOTES.

SARAH B. C. FOSS.

Sister Sarah B. Carter Foss died at East Bountiful, Davis county, at 8:45 a. m., March 4, 1894, of old age. She was the daughter of Ezra and Sarah F. Carter, and was born at Limerick, Maine, September 30, 1800, and was therefore 93 years, 5 months and 4 days old at the time of her demise. With her husband, Calvin Foss, and Sister Phebe Carter Woodruff, deceased wife of President Wilford Woodruff, she was baptized by Elder John F. Boynton, in September, 1834, and in February, 1835, Brother Foss died, leaving Sister Foss the responsibility of the care of seven children, five of whom were baptized by Elder Woodruff and came to Utah in his company in 1850. They settled in the Fourteenth ward of this city, where Sister Foss resided for 38 years. She was 34 years of age when she was left a widow. By her industry, frugality and economy she reared her seven children, who grew to manhood and womanhood. They all honored and revered her for her amiable example and devotion, and in return she shared the confidence and love of not only her own children but of her grandchildren and great grandchildren. She had 38 grand-children and 72 great-grand-children.

O. I. ROBSON.

The Latter-day Saints of the Maricopa Stake of Zion, and especially Mesa, where he lived, have been plunged in grief over the death last Saturday, February 24th, at 10 p. m., of our much beloved leader Charles Innes Robson, the president of the Maricopa of Zion. His life has been an eventful one, and since becoming a member of the Church he has labored faithfully in the interest of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. He died with the harness on, his good advice being given and respected even while in the chamber of death.

Charles Innes Robson was born of English parents on the 20th day of February, 1837, at Northumberland, England. When but 10 years old was apprenticed to a papermaker where he served for eight years, becoming quite proficient in the business, which proficiency afterwards was used to such good advantage in the starting and equipping of the paper mill in Utah.

His parents were religious people, walking four to five miles to church every Sunday. This early religious training did much toward forming the noble, honest character of the young man. He was baptized into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints on the 6th day of April, 1851, when but 14 years of age, and emigrated to Utah in the spring of 1854, with a company of Saints.

President Robson was married at the age of 23 and became the father of six children, five of whom live to mourn his loss. He settled in Sugar House Ward, Salt Lake county, and passed through the "hard times" of early Utah, being constantly placed in a position which tried his endurance and brought into play the noble, heroic traits of his character.

In 1857 he was called by President Young with others to go and relieve the Saints, who were besieged by the Indians at St. Paul, on Salmon River. During this trip he had several narrow escapes, being preserved only by the power of God. Upon relieving the Saints, he and six others were sent back with dispatches to Salt Lake City, and on the way back were attacked by Indians and two of their number slain. The others arrived at Box Elder, the then farthest place north, in an almost famished condition, having been without food for three days. They found the town deserted, the doors and windows of the dwellings nailed up, and no food to be had. This was at the time of the move south. After searching in vain for some time for food they finally heard the cackling of some chickens, which in the hasty move had been forgotten. Upon these they lived until reaching civilization. For his bravery on this expedition Brother Robson was personally commended by President Young, and when the President started the paper factory in Utah, Charles I. Robson was the man chosen to put the massive machinery in motion. Although he was but a lad when he worked at that business in England, such was his genius and ability that he not only put the complicated machinery together, but thirty minutes after starting the first wheel had the massive machinery running without a jar. President Young and Heber C. Kimball with their wives and several other ladies and gentlemen were present on the starting day and all praised his efforts. His was a leading spirit, and early in life he was called to preside. He was first ward clerk, then counselor to Bishop, and finally Bishop of the Sugar House ward from 1862 until he came to Arizona.

In 1870 he was appointed warden of the penitentiary at Salt Lake City, in which capacity he labored for several years, reducing the expenses, and in many ways showing his ability and good management.

With the permission of President Young, he started to Arizona in 1877 in company with F. M. Pomeroy and G. W. Sirrine, settling at Mesa City. In the struggles of building up a new country he was ever foremost in temporal as well as the religious work, and when the Maricopa Stake of Zion was organized he was chosen first counselor to President McDonald, whom he succeeded in that office in 1886, filling the same until the day of his death.

His life here has been one of continual toil, always taking the lead in new enterprises, and aiding his brethren by his example and good advice, in reclaiming the land and changing a desert into a fruitful field. He was president of the Zenos co-op. store from its organization, and his good advice and business tact aided much in putting the now flourishing institution on the solid basis it occupies. He was director of Mesa canal for years and was mayor of Mesa for some time. He made three trips into the interior of Mexico in the interest of the spread of truth.

During all these years of toil he was not without sorrow, losing his oldest son in 1881, and suffering a term in the Territorial prison for conscience sake in 1884; but even in the latter place his high qualifications were noted, and instead of passing the time at toil or behind the bars, he was given charge of one department of the prison, eating and sleeping with the warden. Soon after he began to be troubled with heart disease, and such was his condition seven years ago that an eminent physician, Dr. Hughes, of Phoenix, by whom he was examined, afterward stated that he would not have been surprised had he fallen dead before leaving his office. All medical men by whom he was examined join in saying that he has been a living miracle for five years past, and he testified but a few days before his death that it was nothing but the prayers of the Saints and the blessings of God that had kept him with us.

As usual each year, he went to Salt Lake City last spring; he attended the dedication of the Salt Lake Temple, and while there in the Temple in close communion with Deity, were passed the happiest moments of his life. Shortly after returning home from this trip he was kicked by a frisky horse, breaking his jaw in two places. This seemed to break his strength. Since that time he has been up and down, but mostly down, having to take morphine all the time to get much needed sleep. About two weeks before his death he was attacked with aneurism of the aorta, which with the heart disease caused his death. He passed peacefully to his rest at 10 p. m., Feb. 24, 1894, mourned and respected by all his acquaintances, whether of his religious persuasion or not.

His funeral was held at 4 p. m. Sunday, the attendance being larger by far than any other held in this place. He lived as he died, as one of the speakers said, "A scone wall against sin, kind and fatherly, ever laboring for the cause of truth and the good of humanity."

FRANK T. POMEROY.

THE DEAD.

Peaceful be their Rest.

BROWN.—At Koosharem, Utah, February 4, of brain fever, Hilten Leander, son of William and Amelia Brown, born May 15, 1893.

HEATH.—Thursday morning, at 12:30, at St. Mary's hospital, Mrs. Sarah Ann Heath, wife of Henry Heath and daughter of K. F. Bird; aged 59 years, 1 week and 5 days.

LAURENZ.—In the Thirteenth ward of this city, Thursday evening, March 8, 1894, at 9:30 o'clock, of typhoid fever, Alex. Laurenz, son of Agnes and the late John Laurenz. Born in Berlin, Germany, Oct. 15, 1878.

BROUGH.—In the Eleventh ward, this city, March 9, 1894, from Bright's disease, Fannie C. Taylor, wife of Theodore Brough and daughter of Stephen W. and Harriet C. Taylor; aged 30 years and 5 months.

MAXFIELD.—At South Cottonwood, Saturday morning, March 8th, 1894, Mrs. Elizabeth Maxfield, wife of the late John Maxfield, in the 63rd year of her age. She was a consistent Latter-day Saint and died as she lived, true and faithful.

BLEECKER.—At Staatsburgh, Dutchess Co., N. Y., March 8, 1894, Abbie Lees Bleecker, wife of the Rev P. McD. Bleecker, formerly of this city, aged 38 years, 3 months and 21 days. Interment at Scarsdale, N. Y., March 13, 1894. Ogden and Logan papers please copy.

SOBENSON.—At Koosharem, Feb. 28, 1894, Sarah Edwards Sobenson, born at Wigan, Lancashire, England, February 15, 1809. She embraced the Gospel in England, and soon after emigrated to Utah. She has done much work in the temple in St. George. She died in full faith of the Gospel. [COM.]

EDWARDS.—At Paragonah, February 15th, 1894, of pneumonia and heart failure, Ann Caroline, daughter of William and Ann Elizabeth Edwards, aged 18 years, 10 months and 19 days. The deceased was of an exemplary character; her deportment in life was very commendable. She was a chorister of the Y. L. M. I. Association, and her remains were followed to the Parowan cemetery by a large cortege of young ladies and friends. She died as she had lived, a true and faithful Latter-day Saint, with the hope of a glorious resurrection.

THE DESERET WEEKLY.

Truth and Liberty.

No. 14.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, MARCH 24, 1894.

VOL. XLVIII.

TRY THE SPIRITS.

Discourse Delivered at the General Conference of the Church, in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Sunday, October 8th. 1893, by

PRESIDENT GEORGE Q. CANNON

[REPORTED BY ARTHUR WINTER.]

I will read a few words from Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians:

Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men.

(Now that he ascended, what it is but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth?

He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things.)

And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some pastors and teachers;

For the perfecting of the saints, for the working of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ:

Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ:

That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to receive;

But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ.

In these words Paul sets forth with great plainness the reasons why there should be Apostles and Prophets in the Church of Christ. They were necessary, he says, to bring the Saints to the unity of the faith and to the knowledge of the Son of God. When this Church was organized it had in it Apostles; it had the Priesthood. It is a remarkable thing that the Prophet Joseph Smith, although gifted by the Lord with revelations and with power to translate the Book of Mormon, and though he had received the ministration of angels, and had even been permitted to behold the Father and the Son, yet he never presumed to officiate in any of the ordinances of the Gospel until he was ordained. One might think, that, having had such high privileges and blessings bestowed upon him, he would have thought he had the authority to administer the simple ordinance of baptism. But he did not. He awaited the bestowal of the authority. And he received it—not from man, because there was not a man on the face of the earth that we know of that held the authority, but from a messenger of God, endowed with the power to bestow the authority. John the Baptist came and announced himself as the servant of God who held the keys of the Aaronic Priesthood, being a literal descendant of Aaron, by virtue of which authority he had baptized the Son of God in the waters of Jordan. This heavenly messenger came qualified in every way to bestow upon the men to whom he was sent the authority to baptize. Could there be any more suitable personage thought of than the one who had baptized the immaculate Son of God himself? Concerning him Jesus said, "Among them that are born of women there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist." Yet John the Baptist never did any miracles. But what greater honor could a man have than to come in the flesh and baptize the Son of God? That holy being, I say, came and laid his hands upon Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery and ordained them to the Aaronic Priesthood, by virtue of which they had authority to baptize. Then there was something else needed. John said, "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but He that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire." Though John had the authority to baptize the Son of God, he did not have the authority to baptize with "the Holy Ghost and with fire." He did not have the authority to confirm upon men and women the Holy Ghost; but he said that one should come after him with that power—referring to Jesus. Jesus ordained men, He himself having been ordained. We do not have the full account of what Jesus received; but we know that angels administered unto Him, and He did not presume to act in the ministry, though He was the Son of God and the Redeemer of the world, until He had been ordained to that authority. You remember what took place in the transfiguration on the mount. He was there ministered to by heavenly beings, and He and they doubtless ministered to Peter, James and John. He ordained twelve Apostles, and sent them forth as witnesses with the same power and authority which He himself had received. In speaking to them on one occasion, He said, in answer to a question put by Peter: "Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel." Although they were the intimate companions of the Son of God, they did not go forth until He had ordained them to the authority which He himself had exercised. He selected these twelve out of the disciples that followed Him and gave unto them the Apostleship, by the authority of which they were able to do all that Paul said the Apostles should do—to regulate the affairs of the Church, to teach sound doctrine, to be, in fact, revelators, prophets and seers, when the occasion should demand it; to possess all the gifts that God gives to man in the flesh. They were ordained to this, and until they were they did not presume to go forth and minister in the authority among the children of men. But when they received this authority they went forth, accompanied by mighty power; and they cast out devils, healed the sick, and performed many wonderful works in the name of the Lord and through the authority which they had received from Him. While the Church was under their guidance the members thereof were not carried about by every wind of doctrine. They were not deceived by the sleight of men, nor their cunning craftiness. They knew that while they followed the guidance of these inspired and divinely-authorized men, there was no danger of division or strife; but they were led to the unity of the faith. Therefore, in the last days, God being about to restore His Church in its primitive purity and power to the earth, He deemed it necessary to bestow the Apostleship once more upon men. After the Aaronic Priesthood had been conferred, therefore, and John the Baptist had transmitted that power (which had been taken from the earth through the wickedness of men and the shedding of the blood of those who bore it) again to the earth, others came from the mansions of bliss and committed to men once more in the flesh the keys and the authority which they had held when they were in the flesh, and which keys and authority were necessary to complete the great work of God in the last days. The Lord, when He was upon the earth, said unto Peter, "I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." Peter, James and John, were the three presiding High Priests over the Church of Christ, after the Savior's departure; and these three Apostles descended from the mansions of glory and laid their hands upon the heads of these two young servants of God in this day and ordained them to the authority which they held, committing unto them all the keys and powers of Priesthood which they had received in their day, and which had not been transmitted by them to any others, because of the wickedness of the children of men. Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery were ordained to the Apostleship of the Son of God by Peter and his fellow Apostles, and thus was restored to the earth once more that great authority and glorious power which the Son of God had bestowed when in the flesh. I doubt not that the angelic hosts rejoiced and every heart that surrounded the throne of God was gladdened at the thought that once more on earth were men to be found clothed with the eternal authority of the everlasting Priesthood, by means of which men should be led from the lowest depths of ignorance and sin back into the presence of the Great Eternal! No doubt peans of joy resounded throughout the vaulted heavens when that event took place; for it was an event pregnant with more importance to the children of men than any which had taken place since the days of the Savior. When that authority was restored in its fulness, then the Church was organized. Men and women were baptized and received the Holy Ghost, and officers were ordained in the Church. The organization was not completed all at once; but the authority to complete the organization was there, and as the Saints increased in numbers, so the organization of the Church increased in perfection, each officer being appointed and ordained as the necessity arose for that office to be filled.

Now, it was a new thing in the earth. It startled Christendom. Up to that time no one had pretended to say—at least very few—that there was not all necessary authority on the earth. The religious world looked to the Bible. They asserted that it contained the entire word of God. Nothing more was necessary. God had completed the canon of scripture. There would be no more revelation from Him. Everything had been given that was necessary for man's salvation. And the inference was that God, having done this, had retired from any active participation in the affairs of the earth, and had left the whole business to men. Therefore, it was a startling declaration to have anyone say that God himself, accompanied by His Son Jesus Christ, had revealed himself to man once more; and equally startling was the statement that angels had come, and that the authority of the Priesthood had been restored again to the earth. These were astounding declarations to the great bulk of the people. Of course, there were honest souls who rejoiced at this proclamation. They had been searching for the truth. Dissatisfied with the existing order of things, they were yearning for the restoration of that power, and were anxious to find men who held and exercised it. Therefore, their hearts were gladdened by the intelligence that God had spoken. It was almost too good to believe. But they investigated it. They prayed unto the Father about it. The result was, they received testimonies concerning it, and embraced the Gospel. But at that day—sixty-four years ago—there were very few men in Christendom who dared to say that God would speak from the heavens, or who believed that such a thing was possible. Revelation from God was a thing of the past. It belonged to ages anterior to this. The ministers of religion contented themselves by making these statements.

How was this new declaration received? Let me call your attention to this. During the first persecution against the Saints of God in Jackson County, one of the main charges made by the mob was that Joseph Smith was accepted by the "Mormons" as a prophet, and that they believed in revelation from God. It was about as strong an appeal as could be made to the prejudices of the age, to arouse intense hostility against the people. This shows how the people felt at that time. But I heard Joseph Smith predict that the day would come when there would be false spirits go forth among the children of men, and that they would deceive them. I remember on one occasion his speaking about the false prophet that should call down fire from heaven, and he warned the people in the most impressive and solemn manner against being deceived by these works that should be wrought to deceive the children of men. It was only two years after his death that spirit-rapping commenced in Rochester, New York. We had been driven out here in the wilderness, and we did not know much that was transpiring in the eastern world. But I happened, while on the Sandwich Islands in 1851, to get hold of a book that had been issued by spiritualists, and I was surprised at the manner in which they presented their claims to the public. Arguments that our Elders used they had taken and revamped, so to speak, and adapted them to their ideas. A more deceptive book in the interests of falsehood and false doctrine could not, in my opinion, have been published. And from that day until the present, belief in spiritual agencies and manifestations has spread and increased, until at the present time there is scarcely a person to be found who does not believe that there is something connected with man that he can use to bring him into close and intimate relation with the spirit world. Since that day there has been a wonderful stride taken in this direction. The world has been progressing—if that can be called progress—in a most remarkable manner. Theories that prevailed when the Gospel was revealed and the Priesthood of the Son of God was restored have been discarded, and today the popular magazines are filled with communications concerning these occult powers that are being brought to light. Talk to men about dreams and visions and spiritual manifestations, and they admit that such things are possible; but they cannot explain them.

This is one of the results that followed the revelation of the Gospel and the bestowal of the authority of the Holy Priesthood. The doctrines taught by the Elders have had their effect. They have been received, to a greater or less extent, in the world, without the source from which they came being acknowledged. I hear that there are advocates of what is called Christian Science in our midst. I hear that they creep into our houses and lead silly women astray by telling them of wonderful things that can be done by means of Christian Science. A few days ago a father came to me and told me about two of his daughters, one of whom had been afflicted and had been told by some of these persons how she might be cured. Now, that is a comparatively new doctrine in the world. It was not heard of until the Church of Christ was organized. We taught this, and were persecuted for teaching it. Every kind of obloquy was thrust upon us, because we believed that there was a power, which God would give to those who obeyed His commandments, that would result in the healing of the sick, the casting out of devils, and other miraculous things.

But a great change has come over men. Satan has been busy. Men say, as the Book of Mormon says they would in the last days, that there is no hell, and no devil. Satan is whispering this into the ears of the children of men; and today there are thousands of people who do not believe that there is any hell, or any personal devil. Nevertheless, there is a personal devil, just as sure as there is a personal God. He has not a tabernacle; but he is a living entity, and he is endeavoring to destroy the work of God by producing imitations of it and showing unto the inhabitants of the earth that they can obtain power without obeying the laws of God. Wherever spiritualism has a foothold faith in God decreases. Whenever you see a Latter-day Saint begin to dabble in spiritualism, you will find that he begins to doubt the atonement of the Savior and the redemption wrought out by the shedding of His blood, and the doctrine of the resurrection of the body. These are signs that accompany spiritualism. Satan is laboring with all his might to lead men and women to these conclusions, binding them in chains of darkness and leading them down to everlasting destruction. It is the same with Christian Science, whose doctrines are being insidiously spread throughout the country. They are publishing books and circulating them gratuitously and endeavoring to undermine the faith of the people in the ordinances of the Gospel and in the words of Jesus contained in the New Testament. They tell the sick not to believe they are sick, to exercise their will power, and to consider sickness as imaginary; and we are told they are doing mighty works in healing the people. I would not be surprised at that, because I know that Satan is almost capable of deceiving the very elect. I believe that Satan can make himself appear to those who cannot discern, as an angel of light; and if he has that power, he has power also to deceive men and women in the flesh by performing mighty works. Was not this done in the days of Moses? Was not Pharaoh's heart hardened by the works of the magicians? He did not believe that Moses and Aaron were servants of God, but that they had a little more skill perhaps than his magicians had. So it is now. Satan is capable of deceiving the people.

I want in this conference, before we separate, to lift my voice in warning to the people of God against these insidious advances—against spiritualism, against Christian Science and against all such isms, however much they may profess to be of God. I hear that men who claim to be the Reorganized Church say that they have power to work miracles. Perhaps they have; but that is not evidence of the divinity of their cause, or that they are the authorized servants of God. This evidence is to be found, my brethren and sisters, in the blessings that God bestows upon His people. Read the words that I have read in your hearing. Remember them. The Apostleship has been placed in this Church to lead men to the unity of the faith. That is what Paul said in ancient days concerning the Apostleship. What have been its fruits today? What have been the fruits that have attended the restoration of the Apostleship in this Church? Has it not led all who have been guided by it to the unity of the faith? Latter-day Saints here assembled from almost every nation of Christendom, what do you say? Has not the Apostleship, restored, by the ministrations of holy angels to the earth, brought you from the ends of the earth to the unity of the faith in this land? Where will you find a people more united? Nowhere. That is one of its fruits. Another is, it is for the perfecting of the Saints. I leave it to the Latter-day Saints to say whether the teachings and the labors of the Apostles in your midst have not led to greater perfection among you. You are our witnesses and God's witnesses to this; for you know for yourselves whether these have been the results that have followed or not. If you have followed the teachings of the Apostles, you have not been carried about by every wind of doctrine; nor have you been deceived by the cunning craftiness of men. None of you have been misled in this way. But you have been guarded against this. God has placed Apostles in the Church for this express purpose. They are not self-chosen. God knows, and you know, that those who bear the Apostleship have not sought this authority. Do you think that we are presided over by a man who has sought this office of himself? We all know the man too well to suppose that Wilford Woodruff would ever, if he had lived to the age of Methuselah, have put forward his hand to guide this work of our God. God has preserved his life and spared him to this people, clothed with the Apostleship of the Son of God, to lead the people, just as He did John Taylor, just as He did Brigham Young, and the others who have been associated with them. I appeal to you, ye Latter-day Saints, in conference assembled, to know whether these are not truths that I am speaking; whether you have not had in your midst the evidences of the divine origin of this work and of the authority which presides over this Church. God has borne testimony to this by the fruits that have followed our ministrations. I include myself, although I consider myself unworthy to be in the ranks of these men. God has blessed the people in listening to the counsels of His servants. He has brought us to these mountains and built up a mighty people here. We have erected temples, and have gone into them and performed ordinances which God has revealed. Where else can you find these things upon the face of the earth? By whom are such doctrines taught? What would you do for your dead, if it were not for the light that God has revealed through the Apostleship concerning the plan of salvation for the dead? The whole world is groping in darkness regarding these matters. They cannot tell what shall be done with the heathen, or with those who have died in ignorance of the Gospel of Christ. Yet they teach that there is no other name given under heaven whereby man can be saved, excepting the name of Jesus. Already some ministers of Christendom are rejecting the doctrine that salvation is confined to those alive, thus following in the wake of the teachings of the servants of God. But how shall we know these things if the heavens are as brass over our heads, and if there is to be no communication from God to man? "Oh," says one, "we might receive it, if it came from some other source than it does." Now, it is a peculiar feature of the work of God in all ages that He chose men for this purpose. He did not send angels to minister unto all men; but He chose men to minister unto their fellow men. The prophets are men, and full of failings and frailties. Even the Son of God, perfect as He was, was not recognized among men as divine. Now, God has chosen men in this day. Although they may feel unworthy of such high honor, and that He could have chosen probably better instruments, nevertheless God has chosen them, and He will honor them in the eyes of the people, if they will be humble. He will make them His mouthpieces to declare unto the children of men His word and will. He will fill them with the Holy Ghost, and the people who listen to them will be led in the path of salvation, and be delivered from the many evils that are coming upon the inhabitants of the earth.

My brethren and sisters, these are solemn truths. I would like to arouse faith in your hearts. I say to you that the sick can be healed, and are healed, in this Church, and the prayer of faith is heard. The proper way for people to receive an answer to their prayers and to have the blessings attend that are desired, is to obey the ordinances of the Gospel. Do not go straying after false gods. Do not be looking after those who have no authority, but are false guides; for I tell you that they will lead those who follow them down to destruction. I do not care how holy they may profess to be; I do not care how many miracles they may profess to perform; I do not care though they may be the sons of the holiest men that ever trod upon the earth, if they do not keep within the lines which God has prescribed, I tell you that they will lead those who follow them to destruction. I bear testimony to this, and am responsible for it. It is not miracles that are the sole evidence of the truth of anything. We have been taught that from the beginning. But it is the spirit and power of God when it is poured out upon the people, uniting their hearts, filling them with love, prompting them to confess their sins one to another and to the Lord. These are the fruits that we see in these valleys among the people who keep the commandments of God. When you hear men begin to doubt, and say, "Well, I don't know about this, or that," it is an evidence that they are in the dark; for if they would live in the light God would bear testimony to them by the power of the Holy Ghost concerning these things. I therefore say to all who are here, if any of you have felt in your hearts that you would follow what I call false gods—false lights, false teachers; if any of you have felt to weaken in your attachment to the work of God and to entertain doubts concerning its validity—I ask you this afternoon to repent truly and sincerely of that, and turn to God with full purpose of heart and with a determination to serve Him all the rest of your days. If you ever had the love of God in your hearts, and that inexpressible joy that God gives unto those who keep His commandments, you know it is sweeter than the sweetest honeycomb. There is nothing on earth sweeter than the spirit of God when it is enjoyed by a humble Latter-day Saint. And God has placed this within our reach. He has opened a fountain to us at which we may drink until our souls are filled to overflowing. I say to you that Satan would tell you nineteen truths and would perform nineteen miracles to get you to accept one untruth and to take a wrong step. That is the kind of power he exercises. Do not be deceived, my brethren and sisters. Try the spirits, and see whether they are of God or not. Cling to the authority of the Priesthood, which God sent. His messengers to bestow upon man. If you do so, I will assure you, as a servant of God, you will be led back into the presence of God and the Lamb, there to dwell eternally and to receive that glorious reward which He has promised unto the faithful. God grant unto us that we may receive this, that we may never step a single inch from the path which He has marked out, nor do a thing that will grieve the Spirit of God, from this time henceforth and forever. Amen.

Written for this Paper.

THE GREAT AMERICAN BRAIN.

WASHINGTON, March 14, 1894.—I dropped into the National Library last week and asked Mr. Spofford, the librarian, to sell me something as to the condition of the great American brain. He informed me that it was boiling as it has never boiled before. We are turning out books by the hundreds and newspaper and magazine articles by the thousands every year, and the copyrights asked for continually increase. Said Mr. Spofford: "There are more than twice as many copyrights asked for every year now as there were ten years ago, and the United States has never been more intellectually alive than it is today. In 1892 there were more than 54,000 copyrights issued, and the publications of 1893 exceeded those of 1892. Nearly every thing of importance is copyrighted now, and we have copyrighted lectures and newspaper articles as well as books. The number of magazines is increasing, and there are now more than a thousand literary reviews, magazines and periodicals in the United States. The increase in other classes of literature has been almost as great, and there are now more than 600 scientific periodicals and a large number of professional magazines. We are making many new books and the National Library increases in size every day."

"Speaking of new books, Mr. Spofford, are there many great works produced by new writers today?"

"There are few great books produced in any age," replied Mr. Spofford. "Great geniuses are born, not made, and the generation is happy which sees more than one or two of them. I think this is an age of compilation rather than of creation. The great American prose or poetic genius is yet to be born. We have had some creative writers of the past, but the greatest of them are now dead. Longfellow, Emerson and James Russell Lowell have passed away, and the only one who can really be called great among those left is Oliver Wendell Holmes."

"How about Washington as a literary center! Is there much literary work done here?"

"Yes, there is a great deal," was the reply. This is one of the intellectual centers of the United States, and there are a number of authors who live here. Thomas Nelson Page has lately purchased a residence on Massachusetts avenue. Frances Hodgson Burnett lives a little further down the way, and this is the home of Henry Adams, the historian, Col. John Hay, Mr. Nicolay and a score of other well-known literary workers. We have a great number of scientific scholars living here, and some of the best travel works are written in Washington. The National Museum has connected with it many able writers of travel. Numbers of the Congressmen and Senators do literary work, and the library of Congress is used greatly by all classes of scholars and students. On Saturday we do not have enough seats for the readers, and the library is always full of specialists who are working up some subject."

Speaking of Washington as a literary center, it is not generally known that it was here that Mark Twain wrote his "Innocents Abroad." He was at the time in the employ of Senator Stewart of Nevada, and was doing clerical work for him. He had made the trip to Europe and the Holy Land as a correspondent of the "Alta California," getting for it $1200 in gold, and he pounded the stuff out here in an old room heated by a sheet-iron stove. After he got back he got an idea that the letters would sell if they were put into book shape, and he showed Senator Stewart his notes, and Stewart gave him a job at the Capitol which paid him $6 a day. After several weeks of hard work he completed his book and then went to a publisher. One of his friends here at Washington was Albert D. Richardson, who had been connected with several subscription books, and who had written some very good things. Richardson introduced him to his publishers, and Mark Twain finally made a deal with them by which he was to have 5 per cent of the retail price of all the books sold. Not long ago I had some thoughts of publishing a book myself, and I called upon Mr. Clemens at his home in Hartford and asked his advice. During this call he referred to "Innocents Abroad," and said that it had netted him only a few thousand dollars, but that it had made the fortune of the publishers. Said he: "I was surprised when I was told that a good sum for the work would be 5 per cent of the retail price of the books sold. I laughed at it, but Richardson, who introduced me, told me that he was glad when he got 4 per cent, and I accepted their offer. Including the editions there were something like 200,000 copies disposed of, and the publishing company made in the neighborhood of $75,000 out of it."

I asked him what he thought of books of travel as sellers?

He looked at me with a twinkle of the eye and said: "There is only one kind of a book that will sell by subscription better than a book of travel, and that is a pious book." He then referred to his own publishing ventures in a few words, and told me that the best possible method of arranging for the publication of a good subscription book was to accept nothing until the plates were paid for and then to take a low percentage on the first 5,000, increasing it on each 5,000, until it got as high as 8 or ten per cent, which would be a big remuneration and would make one a fortune if the book had a large sale.

Blaine wrote a great part of his book here. He began it when he was living just above the old Sickles house, on Lafayette square, and he wrote a great part of it in his mansion on Dupont circle. The second volume was written here and at Bar Harbor, and he completed it here in Senator Windom's big brick, just below where Bourke Cockran now lives, and facing Scott Circle. He was a very rapid writer, and he considered 1500 words a good morning's work. His book brought in, I understand, something like $200,000, and it has paid the best of any book of its class ever published. Sam Cox wrote his "Political Reminiscences" here, and before he died he told me he was to receive $12,500 on each edition sold. Mrs. Cox still lives at Washington, in the house which her husband completed just about the time that he wrote his "Divisions of a Diplomat." The work on this was done at Washington, and he turned out the manuscript composing it at the rate of several thousand words per day.

It was here that Tom Benton wrote his "Thirty Years in the United States Senate," and I have visited the old brown house on P street where he put the matter into shape and in which he died. He was working on his "Abridgment of the Debates of Congress" at the time he died, and he prayed during his last hours to be allowed to live until he had it complete. Gen. Logan wrote his volume of "War Stories" in the house in which his widow now lives, and it was here that he penned a novel which was issued under an assumed name, but which had only a meager sale. Logan left a fairly good library, and it will be a surprise to many that he was fond of religious studies. He was a great Methodist, and he had many rare editions of the Bible and famous theological works. He wrote rapidly and revised carefully, but his book, like that of Gen. Sheridan, did not have anything like the sale of the works of Grant and Blaine.

I wonder when John J. Ingalls will publish his novel. I visited him here a few days after his library was burned in Atchison, Kan. He had in this library a number of manuscripts, which were destroyed, and among them were some of the notes for this story. It was to have been a political society novel, laid in Washington, in which the true inwardness, hypocrisy and hollowness of life here would be treated of under assumed names. There is no doubt but that Ingalls could carry out this idea as well or better than any other man in the United States. He has a caustic pen and a vitriolic tongue, and though his words shine with the brightness of electricity, they burn into the souls of the people he attacks like red-hot iron. He has done considerable magazine work since he left Congress, and his lectures have taken up a great part of his time. In the meanwhile he may have had some time for fiction, and if so I predict his book will be a bright one.

I knew Bancroft quite well. His books were sold to some New Yorkers, who gave them to the Lenox Library. Congress bid within $5,000 of the amount for which they went, but a friend of the Lenox Library got them. Among them are valuable manuscripts, which I am surprised have not yet come to the public. There is a manuscript diary of James K. Polk, which he copied at Nashville just before his death, and which, I am told, is full of interest. There are lots of original letters of Alexander Hamilton, Aaron Burr and others that ought to have been included in the collection, and I doubt not that some good newspaper articles could be gotten out of the library by those who have access to it. It is generally supposed here that it is about as hard to go to Peking after rare books as to get into the closely guarded archives of that New York library, and so far I have not seen anything published from the Bancroft collection. Shortly before Bancroft's death I had an offer from one of his private secretaries, who treacherously said that he could get me copies of some rare letters in Mr. Bancroft's possession if I would pay for them. I wanted the letters, but I told him I could not think of stealing them, and nothing came of the matter. Bancroft was one of the slowest writers we have ever had here. He wrote and rewrote, first dictating his thoughts to a shorthand man and then revising them again and again as they were presented to him in typewritten form. He thought 250 words was a good day's work, but he kept grinding away until he was ninety, and his long life enabled him to accomplish much.

I saw Parson Brownlow's son here the other day. He was a colonel in the Union army and his father's private secretary while he was in the United States Senate. I asked him something about Parson Brownlow's book and he told me that about 50,000 copies of it were sold and that his father made in the neighborhood of $20,000 out of it. I doubt whether Bancroft made as much in his long life of work out of his histories. Henry Ward Beecher got $30,000 from Robert Bonner for writing the novel "Norwood," and we all know of the great fortune that came to the Grant estate from his book. I don't know just exactly what John Hay received for his life of Lincoln. One story is that the Century Company made out a contract and left the price blank and that it was finally filled in by them for $50,000. Col. Hay talked to me about the book at the time he was writing it and he showed me his workshop. He has a magnificent house here at Washington, which is furnished with all the luxuries of a millionaire. The library in it is as big as a barn and it has a great table like desk as large as the bed of a bridal chamber. The work on the book was not done here, but in a little cubby hole of a room in the attic which had a pine table and a half dozen kitchen chairs and the floor of which was bare. I asked Col. Hay at this time as to his dialect poems. You know he wrote "Little Breeches," which closes, I think, somewhat as follows, referring to the angels:

"I think that taking a little boy
And saving him for his own
Is a darn sight better business
Than loafing around the throne."

I found him not at all inclined to talk about it. He gave me to understand that he was sorry he had written it and that he hoped to do more elegant and better work. He has done since then a great deal more elegant work, but I doubt whether he has written anything which has come closer to the hearts of the American people than that poem.

Grace Greenwood is living here at the capital now. Emma D. E. N. Southworth, at eighty years of age, is writing her eightieth novel. She has been receiving, it is said, $10,000 a year from the New York Ledger for everything she writes, and the way she grinds out books makes me think of a talk I had the other day with Bob Burdette as to his lecture on "The Rise and Fall of the Moustache." I asked Burdette how many times he had delivered it. He said, "I don't know. Hundreds of times, and I think thousands of times. Why, I know that lecture so well that if I would start it and leave the stage, I believe the old thing would go on and finish up on its own hook without me." This is the way with Mrs. Southworth. Her gold pen keeps gliding on year after year, day after day, until one is forced to imagine that it will keep up its speed even after she has passed away. She lives at Georgetown, and she writes the same character of stories today as she did when her first story was published in the National Era here nearly two generations ago. Mary Halleck Foote lives here part of the time, Anna Vernon Dorsey has her home here, Mrs. Logan is keeping up her literary work in connection with her magazine, and Kate Field spends a great part of her winters at the capital.

Nearly all of our prominent men write more or less, and David A. Wells is one of the scientists who does a great deal of his literary work here.

By the way, speaking of Governor Wells, I heard a good story concerning a talk which he and Secretary J. Sterling Morton had together. The subject was the hard times, the income tax and the treasury deficit. They were wondering how the President was going to be able to make the ends meet and at the same time carry out his own ideas as to the reform of the tariff and other matters. One suggestion was made by Mr. Morton, and that was that bonds of a certain class be taxed, whereupon Mr. Wells said that an attempt had been made to tax that class of property in his state. When the tax was first laid it was made at a high rate and the results were that there were no bonds returned. The rate was then reduced to a tax of 1 per cent for every five years, or at the rate of 2 mills per year, and the provision was made that all bonds thus taxed should be free from municipal, state and county taxes. When this law was promulgated the bonds came in by the thousands and the result was that there were $29,000,000 worth of bonds returned. "The low tax," said Governor Wells, "was a sort of premium on integrity."

"Yes," said Secretary Morton. "It makes me think of what Jim Fisk said about his father's honesty. The old man's character was being discussed, and Fisk was asked if his father was an honest man. Mr. Fisk replied that he was honest as the world goes. 'What do you mean by that?' asked one of the party. 'I mean,' said Fisk, 'that he is honest according to the amount involved. For instance, I know that my father would not tell a lie for 12 1-2 cents, but I would hate to ask him to tell me eight for a dollar.'"

Secretary Morton, by the way, is one of the best story tellers of Washington. He is a man of education and culture, and he has a wide acquaintance with public men. During a conversation with him the other day I asked him how it came that farmers in England could pay high rents for land and make money off of it, when our farmers could barely get a living when they get the land for nothing. He replied that he supposed it was due to Scotch thrift, and that he had a Scotchman in his department who had made a great deal of money by farming in Nebraska, and whose brother had made a fortune out of Scotch farming. Said Secretary Morton, "During a recent visit to Scotland I visited this man. He told me he paid $9 per acre as rent, and I know that he sends money over here to be loaned, and that he has something like $25,000 out at interest in the United States. I advised him to send it here. He told me he could get only one per cent for it in Glasgow, and that he had sent it over to his brother in Nebraska, where it could be loaned out for seven or eight, and he is now getting such an income from it as delights his thrifty Scotch soul."

"As to Scotch thrift," Secretary Morton went on, "I was at the colonial exhibition at Edinburgh some years ago, and I found that every exhibitor was selling something in connection with his exhibit. During my stay I lost my spectacles, and while buying a new pair from a very pretty girl in the exhibition I fell into conversation with her. 'You are an American,' said she, 'and you have a lot of my people over there in your country.'"

"Yes," said Secretary Morton, "we have many Scotchmen among us."

"And how do they get along, sir?"

"Oh," replied the Secretary, "There are few of them in the jails and none of them in the poor house. They are very thrifty and they do very well. You Scotch are noted for your industry and saving."

"Yes," replied the girl, "they tell lots of stories of us. And have you heard the latest of one of our Sandys who went to London?"

"No," said Secretary Morton, "tell it to me."

"Well," replied the girl, "it was not much, but it indicates the Scotch character. Sandy was a stranger in London and feeling a bit tired he looked about for some restoration. He saw an eating place, and he went in and asked the waiter, 'and how much might it be for a bit of meat?'"

"'Ninepence,' said the waiter."

"'And how much for the gravy?'"

"'Oh, we charge nothing for the gravy,' was the reply."

"'And how much might it be for a bit of bread?'"

"'You can have a loaf for tuppence.'"

"'Well,' said Sandy, 'you maun give me the bread and the gravy. I dinna care about the meat.'"

FRANK G. CARPENTER.

AS TO MEXICAN MAIL.

I have perused the letter written by Miles P. Romney, of Colonia Juarez, Chihuahua, Mexico, of the 27th ult. and published in the last issue of the SEMI-WEEKLY NEWS, and for one I do not think the statement altogether correct, that "If people in Utah will be more particular in writing correctly the addresses on their letters there will not be so much complaint about the loss of letters in Mexico." There are other and more serious charges than this.

For the past three years I have endeavored to keep up a correspondence at the above mentioned place. Occasionally a letter has found its way there, but many failed to reach their destination, and not for want of being plainly directed, either. Letters containing money, sent at the time so many were in destitute circumstances, never reached those to whom they were sent, and I but express the statements of others: not letters alone, containing money, have failed, but packages of more or less value, a few sheets of note paper, valuable almanacs, calendars, flower seeds, etc., etc., have failed to reach them, and each time the usual United States postage has been paid at the mailing office. I am not alone in this matter. I know of others whose friends also had money sent them, and otherwise; their letters failed to reach Juarez; but when those friends lived in Utah's Dixie the letters reached them every time. The address was quite plain for Utah's postmasters. Now comes the question, What other causes are there that so much mail matter sent from Utah to Mexico fails to reach them? If such a leakage was practiced in Utah the postoffice department at Washington would soon find it and stop it. The following was taken from a Mexican paper, and may explain the matter a little farther:

POSTOFFICES IN MEXICO.

Speaking of postoffices, if you go into one almost anywhere in the land of "Dios of Libertad" and ask in English for a letter, the obliging postmaster or one of his deputies will toss out the whole stock addressed to foreign names, whether it be a peek or a bushel, and allow you to select for yourself, quite indifferent as to whether you confine yourself to your own or other people's mail. Although my countrymen are proverbially honest, that is allowing rather too much latitude, as has sometimes transpired, both in matters of love and lucre. I notice they never do that way with any but foreigners' letters, the Mexicans themselves being more carefully served from pigeon-holes alphabetically arranged. Whether this distinction is made because they are unwilling to take extra trouble for "outside barbarians," or because they know too well their own little peculiarities, is a matter of conjecture. The laws against opening other people's letters are even more severe in Mexico than in the United States, but they are enforced only upon those of Mexican birth, and Americans need expect no redress here for wrongs of any kind, no matter how serious.

Alas! Mr. Editor, must the oft-repeated statement still hang on, "Your cause is just but we can do nothing for you?" Yours very respectfully,

JOHN L. BENCH.

MANTI, Utah, March 15, 1894.

THE EUPOREAN MISSION.

[Millennial Star, March 5.]

RELEASES AND APPOINTMENTS.—Elder J. J. Scharrer has been honorably released from his labors as president of the Swiss and German mission, to return home March 3, 1894.

Elder Walter W. Williams has been honorably released from his labors as traveling Elder in the Norwich conference, to return home March 3, 1894.

Elder J. H. Stocker has been appointed to preside over the Swiss and German mission.

THE EDITOR'S COMMENTS.

CONFERENCE NOTICE.

The Sixty-fourth Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints will convene in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, at 10 o'clock on Friday morning, April 6th, 1894.

The officers and members of the Church generally are cordially invited to attend the meeting of the Conference.

WILFORD WOODRUFF,

GEORGE Q. CANNON,

JOSEPH F. SMITH,

First Presidency.

THE UNIVERSITY OF UTAH.

Near one of the entrances to the grounds of Harvard university is a tablet bearing an inscription in which words something like these occur: "For they feared to trust the people to unlearned teachers when the ministers who led them should slumber in the dust." The solemn pathos of this memorial is a tribute to the love of intelligence and abhorrence of ignorance that characterized the Pilgrim Fathers of New England, between whom and the founders of Utah many parallels have been drawn.

The latter are pre-eminently a temple building people; and yet before a step was taken toward erecting such a structure, and while their only form of political government was one that had been improvised for temporary needs, they, through the Provisional Government of the State of Deseret, enacted, on February 28th, 1850, an ordinance incorporating the University of Deseret, their great leader, Governor Brigham Young, not only officially approving but earnestly and staunchly advocating its establishment.

In the days of their poverty—and such poverty as was then almost universal is not now known in these valleys, even in the present time of distress—and when they were so overworked that, as a historian says of them, they scarce had time to pray, they planned a great university, intending that it should become a seat of learning, famed throughout the land.

Their poverty made progress slow; but what we now know as the University of Utah was organized and entered upon its mission. Orson Spencer, A. M., its first chancellor, took the position with faith in the great future of the institution, a faith which was held by his successors, Orson Pratt A. M., Hon. D. O. Calder, and Hon. Daniel H. Wells—to mention only those who are dead—who held the position many years. The period covered by the terms of the chancellors here named was one during which the people were too poor to build up a great university without endowment, and with no aid save taxation and tuition; but they never lost sight of the object in mind, and by their representatives they never treated it in other than a friendly spirit. From the time when Dr. John R. Park became its president, in 1869, it grew with a steady, solid growth; and as the years went by it became more and more an object of love and pride among the people. Parents strained their resources to send their sons and daughters to the University, and successive Legislatures went to the limit of prudence to furnish means for its support and growth.

It has been singularly honored as the subject of weighty, stubborn legislative consideration in days gone by—not such, however, as has been accorded it by the session just closed. Let us look back a single decade. An item of $50,000 was placed in the appropriation bill for a new building for the University. The question of the Governor's right to appoint all Territorial officers not specifically named in the Organic Act as elective, was still pending in the courts, and the Legislature determined to wait for a decision before receding from the position that such autocratic power was never designed to be conferred upon one man, himself not chosen by popular suffrage. The executive on his part was equally firm, and he refused to approve the appropriation bill containing this item, unless given power to name the men who would expend the money. A deadlock between the Assembly and the Governor ensued, and for days and nights the strain was terrible, for the Legislature had reached the limit of time and was obliged to remain in continuous session until a decision should be reached. At length both branches met in caucus to solve the question: Shall the University be crippled, or shall the general appropriation bill fall, through our insisting that the liberties of the people be not surrendered to the one man power. It is of interest to note that the University was looked upon as being of importance great enough to rank with the other two elements of the grave problem.

The conclusion reached, after one of the most pathetic and patriotic debates in all our legislative history, was that the Assembly would not betray what its members believed to be the rights of the people, nor were they willing that other Territorial needs should be unprovided for through wilful defiance of the Governor's demands in this one particular. They eliminated the University item, and, thus amended, the appropriation bill passed.

But though the Governor might veto a measure to give money to the University, he could not veto the University itself. A wave of popular sympathy swept over the Territory for the stricken institution. The legislators, the regents, the professors, the public—all felt that it called for their most disinterested and substantial support. Should it be allowed to fail? The thought was royally repelled. Regents and other prominent citizens drew from their own pockets the sum necessary to give it the building. Professors announced their willingness to serve on half salary or without pay if the institution could be saved in no other way. The result was marvelous; and at no period of its history was the University so closely in touch with the affections and feelings of the people as at that time. That a subsequent Assembly reimbursed those who had come forward with means at this crisis, does not in the least detract from the patriotism of the deed itself. Men were willing to trust a future Legislature to refund to them, but if that failed, they were content to await the reward of Providence.

Ten years have passed—and again is the University placed in a position where its needs appeal eloquently to the love and sympathy of its friends. At the session of the Legislature just closed it was betrayed. It was stabbed in the house of its pretended friends. For when it was earnestly pointed out that the sum given for its support would mean its starvation, the sneering reply was made by a legislator—referring to the normal department: "Oh, well; we can import more teachers; the Utah-taught teachers cannot compete with the Eastern article, any way!" Talk about conspiracy, and plots, and trades and treachery! What do the people of Utah think of this utterance, and of the spirit which controlled the action of other legislators who, perhaps innocently, were led into this great crime!

Again the question confronting us as a commonwealth is, Shall the University of Utah be allowed to dwindle and die? Again we hear the answer from every patriotic heart in every valley of Utah, "No! We'll heap shame upon the heads of its detractors and its foe; we'll unite in one grand rebuke of chicanery, trickery and petty or political sectionalism!"

And the News, as the representative of the Latter-day Saints, who founded this institution in their poverty, and who, with love, pride and solicitude have watched its growth during nearly half a century keep pace with theirs, now calls upon them to rally to its rescue. We are confident that we do not call in vain. Even in the present time of financial stringency we believe the necessary relief will be forthcoming, and that the conspiracy to cripple or destroy it, for this is what the action of the Legislature amounts to, will be defeated. This was the people's course when money was far less plentiful in Utah than it is now. But money is not the only necessity; surely public spirit has not waned, nor the disposition to patronize and support an institution so distinctively our own. The calls of the district schools for more and better teachers, the demands of parents for increased educational facilities, and the cry of the rising generation for instruction, are all louder and stronger than ever before, and the necessity for a response is the greatest and most peremptory which the people feel, aside from the actual necessities of life.

Hence we appeal to the people of Utah to come to the rescue of their principal seat of learning! It must be saved from the destruction, or, still worse, the starved oblivion to which its foes would consign it. This is Utah's opportunity to resent the slanderous declaration that her people delight in ignorance; to show to all the world that she can and will place within the reach of her children all the knowledge at the command of man! The existing necessity is a glorious chance for self-vindication.

THE LAST OF A GENERATION.

The Saturday Evening Post, of Burlington, Iowa, makes pleasant mention in its issue of March 10, of Catherine, the only surviving sister of the Prophet Joseph and Patriarch Hyrum Smith—the last, indeed, to remain in mortality of the ten children—seven sons and three daughters—of Joseph and Lucy Smith. The Latter-day Saints in Utah and elsewhere will be pleased to hear what the Post has to say of the martyrs' remaining sister:

Mrs. Catherine Salisbury and son Frederick, of Fountain Green, Ill., were in the city Saturday and Sunday in attendance at the district conference of the reorganized church of Latter-day Saints, they being while here the guest of Mr. and Mrs. George Esau, on Angular street. Mrs. Salisbury is now in her eighty-first year and is hale and hearty for one of her age. She is the only surviving sister of Joseph and Hyrum Smith, of Nauvoo, she now being the last member of her father's family, her brother William B. having died this winter at his home in Oosterdok, Iowa. Mrs. Salisbury's memory is good and she is an interesting and willing conversationalist, especially on matters connected with her father's family and the Church and work that has made their name famous. Mrs. Salisbury has lived to see the rise and spread of the Church that her brother founded. She was a member of her father's family when Joseph Smith was translating the Book of Mormon. She speaks of him as being an intelligent, honest and upright man. She is now and always has been a firm believer in the mission of her brother, and because of this belief she and her family have suffered much from the hands of fanatic men. When the Church was driven from Hancock county, Illinois, Mrs. Salisbury with her family and a few others remained, and by a straightforward, upright life has made for herself and the Church many friends.

ANOTHER POLAR EXPEDITION.

The present year will witness one of the most unique competitions ever held on earth—a veritable race for the north pole. Nansen, if still alive, must by this time have found his way far into the ice belt that separates the navigable water from the unknown regions beyond. Peary is somewhere on the west coast of Greenland, endeavoring to find a road to the pole, and now Mr. Walter Wellman is organizing an expedition for the purpose of exploring the Arctic regions and planting the Stars and Stripes where it has never waved before.

Mr. Wellman does not claim the distinction already earned by Nansen and Peary, but he is a typical American newspaper man, probably the first one to conceive the idea of interviewing the rough monarchs of the ice and surveying their dominions, and there is no known reason why he should not in this undertaking achieve fame equal to that of Mr. Stanley in Africa. The word impossible is practically unknown to the right kind of an American newspaper man.

Mr. Wellman's plan is simple and therefore all the more feasible. He proposes to start from Tromsø in Norway next May, well equipped for a journey over the ice. Somewhere on Spitzbergen he will deposit a sufficient supply of food, fuel, etc., for possible emergencies. From this place his steamer will take him to the edge of the pack ice, where he with his party will "land" and continue the journey northward. He calculates that in three months he will be able to reach the pole and return, thus having the benefit of the perpetual light and heat of the sun nearly all the time, and by means of the steamer, which is to make regular trips to Tromsø, the public will be kept posted as to his whereabouts and doings in the polar regions.

It is not strange that there should be a general desire to unravel the secrets of those high latitudes. There are scientific problems that can be solved only by actual observations, besides the desirable addition to our geographical knowledge concerning a part of the earth almost as large as Europe and hitherto entirely unknown. And the desire is intensified by the dangers to be encountered no less than by the wonderful reports of previous explorers. It is almost certain that this unknown part of our globe is not entirely a wilderness of snow and ice. Parry found that the ice was broken up in floes at the highest point he reached and the fall of rain was an evidence of the mildness of the temperature at that point. And Kane in 1854 saw an open sea as far as the eye could reach while a gale from the northeast, blowing for several hours, failed to bring any drift of ice. Later reports on this subject are somewhat contradictory, showing probably that those high regions are subject to changes, some winters being longer and more severe than others, just as is the case in all parts of the earth.

Probably Mr. Wellman has counted all the difficulties connected with his proposed summer outing, including heavy gales, dense fogs and white bears, and certainly the good wishes of the public will follow him in his undertaking.

A REMARKABLE PREDICTION.

In a letter to the NEWS a few days ago, reference was made to a verse in the 37th chapter of the prophetic writings of Ezekiel, a passage very familiar to the Saints, and the correspondent dwelt on the necessity of the additional testimony for Christ furnished by the Book of Mormon, "the stick of Joseph which is in the hands of Ephraim," in this time of general religious confusion and indifference.

To the Saints the prophecy of Ezekiel seems so clear that it is a matter of wonder that Bible readers in general fail to see its true meaning. The Prophet is commanded to take two books and inscribe upon one, "For Judah and for the children of Israel his companions;" and upon the other, "For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions." These two books were to be joined together and become one.

This symbolical act is explained by the Lord to mean that He at some future time would take the records of Joseph as found in the possession of Ephraim and unite them with the records of Judah. This union of records was to preceed, we are further told, the gathering of Israel "from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and," says the Lord, "I will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land." This conveys in the clearest terms the promise that two sets of sacred writings would at some time be given to the descendants of Israel, and that the union of the two in the hands of the Almighty would be followed by the gathering of the scattered people.

Commentators are inclined to the belief that this was partly accomplished at the time of the return of the Jews from Babylon. But they also admit that events in the last days must have been referred to, because there are predictions which were not fulfilled at that time. The gathering foretold is one, after which there will be no more transgression, and it will result in the foundation of a kingdom over which "David, my servant," shall rule, and they shall dwell in the country for ever, enjoying the presence of the Temple and tabernacle of God for evermore. These things have clearly not yet been accomplished. The return from Babylon, as all the world knows, did not result in the establishment of an everlasting kingdom under a representative of the house of David; nor were the people for evermore keeping the commandments of God and permitted to dwell in their land in peace with the Temple of God in their midst. Hence, clearly, the prophecy of Ezekiel must be concerning a gathering and union yet to come. All honest commentators agree on this.

But cannot the second volume of sacred writings refer to the books of the New Testament which were added to the more ancient collection? A few observations will answer that question. This book is the record of Joseph preserved by the tribe of Ephraim. It is referred to as extant already at the time of Ezekiel and yet separate from the records of Judah. It is plain enough that the writings of the New Testament are in no sense of the word the "stick of Joseph." They are not the records of Israel, nor are they, nor ever were they, in possession of Ephraim any more than of any other of the twelve tribes. They are the records of the early Church of Christ designated for the benefit of mankind and not for a particular people or part of a people. And their publication did not inaugurate the gathering of Israel from all parts of the world. On the contrary they were written, some before and some shortly after the scattering of the covenant people to the ends of the earth. For these reasons it is plain that the prediction of Ezekiel must be applied to some other sacred records other than the New Testament.

The Book of Mormon alone corresponds to the volume symbolized by the "stick of Joseph" in the hand of the Prophet. Ezekiel lived and wrote this remarkable prediction almost 800 years before our era. Shortly before his time a righteous man named Lehi, a descendant of Joseph, had obtained some records consisting, besides genealogical tables, of the five books of Moses, a history of his people from the beginning and down to the reign of the Jewish king Zedekiah and prophetic writings, particularly those of Jeremiah. With these records he left Jerusalem, as did the last-named Prophet at the same time, and was led to this continent where his descendants became numerous and a mighty people. The Book of Mormon is a synopsis of the history of that people.

It is the "stick of Ephraim" in the same sense as the Bible is the "stick of Judah." And the prediction of their union is all the more remarkable at the very time when the records of Ephraim were by Lehi carried from the holy land, and thus apparently separated forever from the archives of Judah. But the Almighty had laid His plans, and His word has been fulfilled in our own day. The second set of sacred writings has been given to the world by Joseph the Prophet, and as a result the remnant of Israel is being brought together to serve the Lord. The Book of Mormon is indeed a witness to the truth of the Holy Scriptures.

LIGHT ON ANCIENT HISTORY.

As archaeological researches on the sites of the once famous cities of Chaldæa are progressing, the mysteries of the dim past are cleared up and we obtain a better understanding of the wonderful civilization of nations buried in oblivion for thousands of years. The North American expedition under the direction of Professor Peters of the University of Pennsylvania has within the last five or six years discovered not less than ten thousand engraved tablets and other objects, most of which have been sent to this country. The work of deciphering these precious records and presenting their contents to the public has been entrusted to a German orientalist, Mr. Hilprecht, who has already spent two years on the gigantic task. When completed the work will fill ten volumes, giving fac-similes of the inscriptions, accompanied by translations and commentaries.

One of the most interesting discoveries of this distinguished archaeologist is the history of a group of kings who ruled at Babylon considerably more than three thousand years before our era, as near as can be ascertained from the present uncertain chronological data at hand. These early rulers of men were conquerors, commanding armies at the head of which they pushed their way through Syria and as far as the boundaries of Egypt; which shows that intercourse between the countries of the ancient world cannot have been so difficult as some have imagined. The records take us back to a time when the human race on the eastern hemisphere must have been in its infancy. Already at that time two distinct tendencies were at work. There was a centrifugal and a centripetal force. Man was under the necessity of finding new locations, as the great centers became crowded. New countries were discovered and settled, and a feeling of independence must have developed, as the distance from the seats of the rulers increased. At the same time, monarchs of the old countries adhered to the policy of centralization, aiming at the supremacy of the colonies as well as of the mother country. Expeditions were started for that purpose. Armies followed in the wake of the emigrants. Conflicts of various kinds ensued, and in the commotion new nations were born while others perished; the conditions were formed in which the development of human progress found a starting point. And it is exceedingly interesting and instructive to notice that ever afterwards similar conditions have brought about similar results. The history of our own country with its settlement by Europeans and successful struggle for independence with subsequent progress in every direction is but a repetition on a larger scale of the events recorded on those ancient brick tablets found in the ruins of Babylonian cities.

The history of one of those early kings derives peculiar interest from the fact that some critics have pretended to find in it the source of the Biblical narrative of a certain event in the early career of Moses. On the pedestal of a statue those critics have discovered that Shargani-shar-all, whose mother was a princess but who had no knowledge of his father, was in his infancy put in a basket and left to the tender mercies of the waves of the Euphrates, in which condition he was found by a gardener and tenderly raised until by good fortune he was placed on the throne. Mr. Hilprecht has found the name of this hitherto unknown father of Shargani, and all the circumstances indicate that the story is pure invention. The inscriptions on this subject are much mutilated, but the theory is that the historian has aimed at hiding the obscure and perhaps ignoble origin of a mighty monarch in a piece of romantic fiction. Critics have evidently been too anxious to find something detrimental to the biographer of Moses. Sound criticism defers judgment till the facts are known. And so far the facts are all in favor of the inspired records.

NABBIE YOUNG CLAWSON.

Among the daughters of Utah none was lovelier or more lovable than Nabbie Young Clawson, whose death occurred in this city March 15. Rarely have such exquisite charm of person and such sweet gentleness of mind been bestowed upon one mortal as was the case with this splendid woman. Nor has it happened to but few to enjoy a life of such unalloyed happiness. Honored not only for her own beauty and worth, but by reason of her distinguished parentage, her father having been the great leader and her mother one of the immortal three women of the band of Utah Pioneers; almost adored since childhood by her husband; beloved by all her kindred and acquaintances; with everything at command that earthly need or human wish could desire, her lines seemed of a truth to have fallen into pleasant places. In the cutting down of such a woman at so untimely an age, feeble mortals who are most sincere in accepting that God does all things wisely, must confess a startling evidence that His purposes and ways are indeed inscrutable!

RELIGIOUS REVIVAL.

Tomorrow, March 18, the great Methodist "crusade against sin" is to be inaugurated in California, beginning at the chief city, San Francisco. The opening meeting is to be held in the evening, on the postoffice site at the corner of Seventh and Mission streets, in a large tent which has been pitched there, the seating capacity of which is 4,000. From this point the campaign is to be prosecuted in all directions, until every house, lodging house, hotel and tenement in the city is reached. Such a united effort to evangelize San Francisco has never been made before.

The movement is under the leadership of Rev. Charles H. Yatman, the noted evangelist and "forward" worker of New York Methodism, who is said to rank with Moody, Mills and Sam Jones as an exhorter and pleader in the cause he represents. He is aided by the combined pastors of the local Methodist churches and a committee of laymen. All the Methodist choirs in the city are to be united for the occasion, the Rev. Yatman believing that "more people are converted by the aid of good music than by any other agency," and meetings are to be held every night in different quarters of town; besides a large amount of visiting work is to be done by the "Gideon band"—a body of workers who operate on somewhat different principles to the chiefs in the crusade, as the "Gideons" perform their labor without remuneration.

There can be no doubt that San Francisco needs religion bad enough; its requirement in that direction is probably greater than any other city in the land. With its Sabbaths devoted to games, theaters, and amusements of various kinds, its saloons and other dens of iniquity, and its generally non-religious character, no one will be inclined to dispute with Mr. Yatman that there is in the great city "a glorious opportunity to aid men to purify their lives and live like Christians"—that is, if the opportunity to render aid in this direction depended wholly on the readiness to give assistance. But in this as in other lines, the giving of help needs a willingness to receive such aid before it can be rendered perfectly operative, and this willingness does not seem to exist to any great extent among San Franciscans.

The advantages to be gained by revival meetings of the character proposed are also doubtful in their character. Reform movements, conducted in systematic manner and on a solid basis, often are productive of good results. But revival meetings, with the wild exhortations, piteous pleadings and frenzied efforts of their promoters to bring people to a condition of enthusiasm that will impel them to "confess religion," are conducive of evil rather than good. Their methods are not the methods of true Christianity; their end is not the end attained by genuine belief in Christ, whose name is more often blasphemed than honored in them by its frequent and unnecessary repetition which amounts to "taking the name of the Lord in vain." The polemic "crusade against" may create a small boom in a modern style of religion in San Francisco, but it will not enhance the cause of Christianity there. The man that needs that sort of business to make him feel an interest in his soul's welfare has not attained the standard essential to Christian life. The persons who present it as a way to salvation afford a marked contrast to the example of the Lord and His disciples, who taught people to repent and be baptized for the remission of their sins, that they might have the Holy Ghost bestowed upon them and be guided in the way of all truth.

THE COLORADO INFAMY.

The little scheme of a number of Colorado "leather-breeches" and land speculators to remove the Southern Ute Indians from their pleasant and fertile reservation in the Centennial state and drop them into San Juan county, Utah, is just now encountering many an unexpected snag. Even the Congressional committee which has had the bill in charge, is reported as being unfavorable to it; and of course if the lobbyists have not been able to win that small number of usually susceptible champions to their side, their case would seem to look indeed hopeless.

Every honest man, in Congress or out of it, ought to know that in such a trade as this, something more than the mere dictum and the specious arguments of the lobby must be considered. The proposed bargain is too important to be carried through upon the representations of one side only—and that side the beneficiaries. That Colorado people should want to get rid of their red neighbors and get possession of their good lands is easy enough to understand; but the plan proposed is not so easy to justify. It happens that Utah doesn't want any more Indians than she has already and that she is especially averse to being treated as a mere dumping-ground for Colorado's surplus. It further happens that the section which it is proposed to give the Indians in the event of their removal, has been colonized at great expense of time and means and amid great hardships; and that the settlers have made extensive and valuable improvements which money could hardly pay for, in view of the fact that should they lose their possessions they would scarcely know where to go to get other lands for homes and farms. Lastly, it happens that the Indians themselves are averse to the exchange; and this objection, we submit, is tremendously important, notwithstanding the popular Colorado notion that the Indian has no rights which the white man is bound to respect, or that the only good Indian is a dead Indian.

It may be true that a few of these Utes are willing to have the removal take place; there are always white men shrewd enough to bribe with presents and cajole with promises the untutored savage. But the great majority of the latter have remained unshaken by either threats or gifts or pledges; and far so as [the people of Utah are concerned, not only the San Juan settlers but their fellow-citizens in every county in the Territory, there is probably not one who does not regard the proposition as a rank injustice and an outrage. What all of us desire is that the present uncertainty shall be terminated; that the cloud which for months and years has been hovering over San Juan be dispelled; that the thrifty people there be given full title to their lands, and full assurance that they will be left undisturbed; so that they may go on with their reclamation of the wastes, and with their improvements upon and around their farms and hearthstones. The mission of the Colorado lobby in Washington is disgraceful, and if Congress has a spark of conscience left, that mission will fail. Kate Field, in the latest issue of Washington, ridicules their scheme, which she calls an outrage on the Indians; and her conclusion we fully and heartily endorse: "It is about time that reason entered into the solution of a problem which has only been a problem because sentimentality on one side and godless greed on the other have strangled common sense in the treatment of the Indian."

ROBBING BENJAMIN.

Ex-President Harrison, who is in California delivering a series of lectures before the classes in law, political science and history, in the Stanford university, says that he has been robbed, and accuses a San Francisco morning paper of the larceny. When the ex-President began the course of lectures, he announced that they would not be published, and the precautions deemed necessary to conform to this statement were taken. But the newspaper got a stenographer who took the first lecture and it was printed, its author not being given an opportunity to revise it, for the palpable reason that if he had been he no doubt would have endeavored to prevent the publication. If this is robbery, the boldness of the deed will be still more noticeable in the New York World, which has published at a distance of 4,000 miles each lecture thus far delivered the morning following its delivery.

At the opening of the second lecture the ex-President came out with a prelude which showed that he was far from being pleased with seeing his remarks in print. Speaking of what had appeared in the San Francisco paper he said: "Such publications, not revised by the author, are sure to be full of mistakes that are mortifying to the lecturer and misleading to those who read them." He also remarked: "Some of our newspaper friends have greatly exercised themselves over the question, 'What shall we do with our ex-President?' It is a question that has never troubled me much, and I have never felt called upon before to offer a solution, but in view of my experience yesterday, I venture to offer this solution, which will be perfect so far as I am concerned: Do not steal what belongs to them. That will answer all the requirements in my case." He added: "I have not such an estimation of these lectures myself as to think that grand larceny could be predicated on the stealing of them, but such property as there is in them is mine."

For the sake of argument, it may be admitted that the act of the papers in publishing the lecture was a piece of marked discourtesy to the lecturer, and that it might be unjustifiable except under extraordinary circumstances, which do not appear to exist in this case. But when the ex-President, experienced lawyer and politician though he be, alleges his title to individual ownership of utterances made to the students of a public institution, he sets up a rather remarkable claim, and one that will not be treated as of any virtue in this country. "Such property as is in them" may have been the lecturer's before he spoke; but when he gave his views out to the students and invited guests, among whom was the stenographer, they became the property of the listeners for any lawful use.

The rule laid down by Mr. Harrison as to exclusive ownership of expressions made by an instructor in school would be a very dangerous one in this country. He says that an unreviewed report of them is "misleading" to the readers; yet the art of stenography has reached such perfection in practice that the chances are ten to one the report was verbatim. If it is misleading to the readers, were not the same words equally so when spoken to the student-listeners? If they still are Mr. Harrison's private property, might not one who chose to disseminate in the school anarchistic or treasonable doctrines lay the same claim and demand the same protection in the ownership? When expressions, whether proper, misleading, or worse, are made in the hearing of others, they are no longer the property of the speaker exclusively, but having been given to the winds as it were, may be lawfully dealt with by others. The San Francisco paper's and the New York World's publication of the lecture may look like discourtesy to the ex-President, but certainly there was no stealing of anything from him. He had given it away before the newspaper got it.

HENRY W. BIGLER.

In another part of the NEWS is a short letter from the veteran Henry W. Bigler, of St. George, Utah. The writer presents a brief sketch of his early life to which we cheerfully give space, wishing that he had continued his account down to a recent period. The biographies of such men contain much that is of interest and value to those of the present generation, and we would that more of them felt inclined to give to the people today a recital of striking events in their long experience. This could not fail to impress lessons of usefulness upon the minds of those who are young and active, and would give to them a more thorough knowledge of the mighty labors that have been performed in the Great West by an army of noble workers whose rearguard is now passing over the silent river.

As Elder Bigler has modestly refrained from narrating the notable events with which he was connected in the prime and later years of his life, we will briefly mention two which are closely associated with each other and also with the opening up to the world of western America. One is the fact that Henry W. Bigler was a member of the Mormon Battalion, whose memorable work holds an important place in the history of the people of Utah. The other is that Elder Bigler was the first to record the great discovery of gold in California. As a member of the Mormon Battalion he was in that section of the country and with others obtained work from Sutter and Marshall at Sutter's Fort, near Sacramento. James W. Marshall and a number of others—of whom Elder Bigler and Asariah Smith, of Mantel, are the only ones now alive and residing in Utah—went to Coloma, forty-five miles distant, and built a sawmill. In January, 1848, the water was turned into the mill race to carry away some loose dirt and gravel. After it was turned off Mr. Marshall went into the race to ascertain the extent of some slight damage, when he discovered some particles of yellow metal, and picked up several which he thought to be gold. Henry W. Bigler thus records this event in his diary:

Monday, 24th. This day some kind of metal was found in the tail race that looks like gold.

The yellow particles were sent to the assayer and tested, the result being thus recorded by Mr. Bigler on Sunday, January 30, 1848, six days after the discovery was made:

Clear, and has been all the last week. Our metal has been tried and proves to be gold. It is thought to be rich. We have picked up more than a hundred dollars' worth last week.

There is no doubt that Elder Bigler's experience in connection with these two incidents only would make an interesting chapter. So also would that of scores of others, in relation to other important events, who are now numbered with a generation almost passed away. They should be written and preserved as the valuable details of history that bring the readers in touch with participants in notable events.

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING.

To Governor Waite of Colorado during his short term of official life has come more notoriety than usually falls to the lot of the ordinary executive of any of the states of this great Union. Everybody remembers the famous "blood to the bridges" speech in defense of silver, and of still more recent memory is his extra legislative session for the purpose of discussing a monetary union with Mexico. And now, following these has come the Denver police war, in which the gentleman has played the conspicuous part and which for a time has threatened to result in real and sanguinary slaughter.

The causes that led up to the latter difficulty are that the governor ousted several members of the fire and police board, it is said for political reasons. In June of last year George H. Phelps was removed because he neglected Governor Waite maintains, to prosecute an alleged gambler. This case went to the supreme court, which decided that no removals could be effected for political purposes. When a short time ago the governor removed Jackson Orr and

D. J. Martin, who were accused of protecting the gambling halls, these, having obtained an injunction from the district court restraining him from using force, remained in possession of their offices, arming the entire police force and swearing in deputies with orders to resist the militia if necessary. The national guard was called out and the governor even applied for the aid of the Federal troops. The militia planted their guns on the sidewalks near the city hall and the streets were cleared for action. The citizens gathered round the prospective battle-field and refused to be driven away. It is thought there were in the crowd enough sympathizers with the ousted commissioners to disarm the troops and take the whole outfit prisoners.

No bloodshed ensued, however; and at last reports the governor has agreed to submit the case to the supreme court and abide by its decision. He thinks his cause is just, and he expects to win in the legal arena the victory which the state troops were unable to gain for the new commissioners by a show of force. In the meantime Denver is blessed with two sets of chiefs in these departments and suffers from the confusion resulting from such a state of affairs.

It is idle to dwell upon the wisdom or the folly of the course pursued by the governor in this matter. His motives may have been the very best, but his means were those of a clown. Such high-handed interference in a purely local and trivial affair entitles him to ridicule. Even if he has not transgressed the laws of the state, he has written his own unfitness in huge and glaring phrase. His sort of men ought never to have the use or ordering or control of bayonets and gunpowder. It is bad enough when mobs resort to violence for a trifling cause. How infinitely worse when the dogs of war are let slip by those whose high oath is, and whose chief concern should be, to preserve the peace and protect human lives!

FRESH TREATMENT FOR ANARCHISTS.

Of much significance is the attitude of the socialists in the French Chamber of Deputies in opposing the bill forbidding the publication of reports of trials of anarchists. Their position, thinly disguised as a championship of the freedom of the press, lends strong emphasis to the belief that with the majority of these insane wreckers of society, the love of notoriety, the pedestal of a martyr, and the meed of a hero are important if not the chief incentives to their diabolical work. Weak minds were ever susceptible to the glamor that attaches to prominence; and morbid dreamers over real or fancied wrongs have always been willing to accept such prominence even as the reward of a conspicuously atrocious crime. When such a crime can be distorted by equally abnormal minds as an incident in the cause of reform, and its perpetrator be able to pose publicly as a sufferer in the cause of humanity, the penalty is shorn of much of its terror and even with complacency the victim is not infrequently ready to bare his neck for the headman's ax. The policy of catering to, or even permitting, the gratification of this maudlin sentiment, in either the accused or the masses, is fraught with danger—it merely offers a temptation to others of feeble or fanatical mould to tread the same path to ignominious glory. Especially would this seem to be the case among a people so thoughtless and volatile as the French; and there is little doubt that the dramatic trial and execution of Ravachol, the first of the recent assassins, has prompted or stimulated most of his later imitators. There is something hopeful, therefore, in the passage of the bill above referred to—for it did pass notwithstanding the strong and active opposition of the socialist deputies. It proposes to reduce the possibility of notoriety for such criminals to a minimum, by hurrying the arrested anarchist off to prison, and examining, trying and (if guilty) executing him in secret. We think the proposition a sound one. Let the infamous gentry once be made to understand that punishment will be swift and sure, that their fate, like their plots, will be determined in secret, and that their colleagues and sympathizers will be left, like so many vagrant rats, without opportunity to encourage, gaze upon or even hear of their captured comrade—let this course be followed, and the red demon of anarchy will have received a serious hurt, and the world will have less exhibitions of his hideous head.

WOMEN AT WAR.

The charitably inclined ladies of Alameda, California, are having a controversy that is just as interesting to them as is Governor Waite's military circus to the people of Denver, though there is not so much display of force or talk of bloodshed. The trouble all grew out of the question as to how the poor people in Alameda could be best provided for, and now the poor go cold and hungry while those who were to have given relief are in a state of incandescent wrath.

When the matter of aiding the needy in the town became a momentous question, the Alameda Woman's Relief society was organized, with Mrs. Susan Carpenter as manager. A dispute arose as to the manner of conducting business, and Mrs. Carpenter arrayed herself on one side in the row. The other side incorporated and obtained a decree for the possession of land which the organization had leased, and on which it had erected a house, but the court said nothing of the building. Then the Carpenter faction proceeded in the night time to move the house to another lot. They got the building into the street before being discovered. The society started in and arrested the workmen, who were released on bail, and in turn those who caused the arrest were taken in custody on a charge of false imprisonment, and were bailed out. Arrests and counter arrests continued, until each party had a big list of charges against them and were under a series of bail bonds amounting to thousands of dollars. The parties went into court, where the attorney for Mrs. Carpenter got into an altercation with the judge, who ordered him to leave the court room. He didn't go, and the affair grew so enlivening that the judge gave the attorney a savage blow in the eye, closing up the optic and almost knocking the lawyer out. The latter, however, maintained his equilibrium long enough to deal the judge a staggering blow on the nose. Others interfered, and now the sheriff is in charge of affairs, including the disputed house, which blocks up one of the principal streets of the town.

All this is very interesting, though not encouraging to the poor of the town, who, though not wholly forgotten are left uncared for. When a request for relief is made to either faction the women are too mad at the opposing party to pay any attention to those who are suffering, and sweet charity's mantle, which had promised an alleviation of poverty's affliction, is cast away in anger. When men quarrel there are gentler hands to supply the wants of those in need; but when the women get to fighting, charity hasn't the ghost of a show. Just now Alameda society is sadly in need of a modicum of sisterly affection.

LOUIS KOSSUTH.

With the death of Louis Kossuth at Turin last night, March 20th, one of the most prominent heroes in the struggle for Hungarian independence has passed away. He was born in the village of Monok on April 27, 1802. His father, being a patriotic lawyer and thoroughly imbued with Lutheran protestant ideas, gave his children a liberal education, and Louis—or Lajos, as his name is written in his native tongue—devoted himself to the study of law and philosophy at an institute of learning which was animated by opposition to foreign rule. At the time Kossuth reached the age of manhood three countries, Greece, Italy and Spain, were struggling for freedom. Patriotic Poles were also secretly planning for liberty. Hungary was at that time much oppressed by the rule of the aristocracy directed and upheld by the Austrian government. Under such conditions the young patriot, on leaving college, entered the assembly of his native country and soon became very popular among the people for his liberal and progressive views. His popularity was further augmented when during the ravages of cholera in 1831 he employed all his energy in alleviating the sufferings of his fellowmen. Soon afterwards he was sent to the upper house of the Diet as proxy. The deliberations of that body were closely watched by the patriots of the country, but they could obtain only scanty information owing to the censorship exercised on the press. This obstacle was overcome by Kossuth who undertook to circulate a written newspaper. The "Parliamentary Communications" were dictated by him to a large number of copyists and by this means liberal ideas were spread in wide circles. The continuation of the enterprise after the Diet led to a conflict with the government. The publication was prohibited, but Kossuth placed himself under the protection of the county of Pesth, whose representatives declared all censorship unconstitutional. The government now seized the fiery journalist and had him tried and condemned to four years' imprisonment as a traitor. This was in 1837. A general outburst of indignation followed and the liberals carried the elections for the next Diet. The government was in great need of money on account of the turbulent state of affairs of Europe, the Egyptian question being added to other complications, and consent had to be given to the liberation of Kossuth and other prisoners in order to obtain the desired appropriations. The treatment these political prisoners had received may be judged from the fact that Lovassy emerged from his confinement insane; another had lost his sight and Kossuth was enfeebled in body forever afterwards. Events of this kind gave new strength to the opposition.

In 1841 Kossuth was placed at the head of the Pesth Journal. In this capacity he led his party on the road of reform in every direction. He aimed at the complete renewal of the people, in harmony with the aristocracy if they chose to follow, or without them or even against them if necessary. He discussed every question of public interest fearlessly and skillfully. The government took alarm and even some of his friends denounced him as an agrarian and demagogue. Kossuth demanded the freedom of his country as a right, while others were begging for it as a gift. The Pesth Journal became the leader of the liberal party and the oracle of the rising generation until through the intrigues of his opponents he was removed from the editorial chair of the paper.

His energy was now applied in another direction. Hungary was at the time suffering from tariff laws calculated to keep the country in a state of colonial dependence. Kossuth conceived the idea of forming a protective union, an association whose members agreed to use exclusively home-made articles whenever possible. Other societies were formed as auxiliaries to this union. The members soon were counted by hundreds of thousands. The result of this immense agitation was to strengthen the bonds between the different parts of the country.

In 1847 Kossuth was elected member of the lower house of the Diet and soon became its recognized leader. His attitude to the government was now uncompromising. The news of the revolution in Paris in 1848 reached the Diet. Almost immediately Kossuth, taking advantage of the panic, proposed an address to Emperor Ferdinand urging the restoration of Hungary to its independence as a state and the granting of a charter of liberty to Austria. The proposition was accepted and Kossuth was sent to Vienna, where he was received with great honors. Ferdinand had to yield. A Hungarian ministry was formed and Kossuth was made minister of finance. A great revolution had been successfully carried out by constitutional means, and victory had followed the leadership of the greatest mastermind of the nation.

An internal war followed, however, which ended in the defeat of the great statesman, mainly through the interference of Russia. Kossuth fled to Turkey, and both Austria and Russia demanded that he be extradited. Through the influence, however, of the United States and England this demand was resisted and Kossuth escaped death. In 1851 he was conveyed on the U. S. S. Mississippi to this country, in accordance with a resolution of the Senate. He arrived in December 1851, and was met by a number of deputations in the various cities he visited. He was still laboring in the interests of his country when the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon put an end to the hope of the speedy liberation of Europe. But while in this country he was treated with all the hospitality and deference due to him as the most distinguished defender of an oppressed people and the honored guest of a free nation. He returned to Europe the following year.

His last years were devoted to science. In 1871 he published a work on the change of colors in the stars. Since 1872 he has been living in an unpretending residence in Turin, where his last struggle was made easier by the presence of his beloved family and a few devoted friends.

A CONGREGATIONALIST paper recently permitted a contributor to its columns to say: "I do not think that the pulpit knows what Christianity is, because that which is taught in the theological seminary is not Christianity, whatever else it may be." With a view to finding out what the critic's idea of Christianity is, he has been invited by the Princeton theological seminary to come and preach to them. It is to be hoped he will feel to accept the summons, and will be welcomed by a full house of both faculty and students; above all, that he will be able to make good his bold aspersions and point out the better way. All of which, however, may be regarded as extremely unlikely.

WHAT STRANGE things suffice, in this sensation-loving world of ours, to give obscure men notoriety! Here is a Massachusetts painter, now residing in California, getting his name in all the papers because about forty years ago, when living with his parents next door to Whittier, he accidentally shot the poet through the fence that separated the respective premises.

A NOVEL bequest is reported from Bethlehem, Conn. The late Harmon Bird, of that place, left $100 to the local Congregational church, provided they would never engage the services of a minister who wore a mustache. The church has just voted unanimously to reject the gift.

It is said that Mr. Labouchere, the editor of Truth, draws an income of eighty thousand dollars per year from that well-known English publication. It is encouraging to know that although it is frequently unpalatable, truth is not always unprofitable, even in these degenerate days.

THE WISDOM of the ground-hog or the bear, whose appearance and prompt disappearance some six weeks ago was commented upon at the time, has been fully vindicated. His critics owe him an apology.

GEOGRAPHERS AND travelers say that Mount Ararat, the resting place of Noah's ark, is in reality two mountains separated by a valley. The higher peak is 17,210 feet and the lesser 13,000 feet above the sea level.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Written for this Paper

FROM FAR OFF SAMOA.

PAGOPAGO HARBOR, Samoa, Jan. 29, 1894.—Supposing that a few words from this part of the Lord's vineyard, located in the midst of the Pacific Ocean, would be of interest to the readers of the NEWS, especially to our friends and relatives at home, we submit the following:

The above named harbor is one of the finest in the world, being a continual haven of peace, regardless of the fierce storms that may be raging without. It is here that the man-of-war, and various schooners that float in these waters, hasten for safety in times of storm. Had the ill-fated German and American war vessels that went to the bottom in the terrible hurricane that raged here a few years ago been in this harbor, they would have suffered no loss whatever.

We are now enjoying, or rather enduring, the hot season in Samoa, while you are no doubt listening to the jingle of sleigh bells there. There is very little difference here, however, between summer and winter, except that in summer we have more rain, as the moisture pours down in streams almost daily.

The Lord is ever mindful of His people in this part of His domain, and even the evil one has by no means forgotten us, for he has induced some of the chiefs of the island to forbid us holding meetings in their villages, and even threatened with banishment some of those who have embraced the truth. One notable incident of this kind took place at Sestaga, a village on the west end of this island. Upon the death of a chief belonging to our Church, the remaining chiefs met in council and decided that no Latter-day Saint should hold meetings in that place hereafter, and that the one member remaining should leave their district or the Church. Being possessed of little faith he chose the latter, declaring he could not endure the former. Elder VanCott, who was laboring in the district at the time, left with the same feeling burning within him that Paul expressed when he turned unto the Gentiles. Acts, xviii, 6.

This extra effort of the evil one has been turned for good, in that it has excited the honest in heart to investigate the principles of the Gospel. Since then they come almost daily to our quarters to converse with us upon our doctrines, and we have recently had the privilege of leading into the waters of baptism Te'o and Suega, two of the principal chiefs of Pagopago and Tufaga, one of the principal talking men. These two events have excited the adversary in this village, and some have threatened to drive the Elders out of the district. But half of those in authority are in sympathy with our cause, and we feel quite secure.

We have endeavored to explain to our people in these parts that this oppression is a characteristic feature of the true Church of Christ, and should there be no persecution, no scoffs and scorn, etc., we should certainly think that something was wrong, and should fear that we were not living as we ought; for he that liveth a godly life in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.

At present writing Elder Harding is laboring on Aunu'u. It was here that our Elders first landed, the Gospel spreading from this point to all the main islands of the group. Elders VanCott and Barton are laboring at Safata, on the east end of this island.

The Lord is continually blessing us with the spirit of our missions and giving us joy in our labors. If it were not so it would be a most difficult task for us to become accustomed to Samoan life, food, etc.

Ever praying for the spread of truth and the welfare of Zion, we are yours respectfully,

R. E. DIMOND and
O. BARRUS.

HENRY W. BIGLER.

ST. GEORGE, Utah,
March 14th, 1894.

I read with interest Brother Z. Cheney's brief sketch of his life as published in the semi-weekly of the second instant, when it occurred to me to write a short account of my own day and time, and perhaps you would give it a place in your valuable paper. My father's name was Jacob; he was the son of Jacob and Hannah Bigler, both were Pennsylvania Dutch. My mother's maiden name was Elizabeth Harvey. She was of English parentage. I was born on the 28th of August, 1815, near the village of Shinnston, Harrison county, New Virginia, as it was then called; now West Virginia. The county was new and, as it were, I was born and brought up in the woods. Game abounded and at proper seasons of the year my father's table was supplied with fat venison, turkey and wild honey. I grew fond of a gun and when about 16 or 17 was made the owner of a rifle and like young Boone spent much of my time in hunting when I should have been in school. My parents were poor but honest and religiously inclined.

Schools in those days were poorly provided for. There were no blackboards and nice benches with backs; and to learn to spell, read, write and to cipher as far as the rule of three was a finished education. I do not remember that grammar and geography were ever taught in any of the schools to which my father sent me.

In 1836 two Mormon Elders came into the neighborhood and commenced preaching and baptizing. Soon afterwards others came, among the latter our esteemed brother the late George A. Smith, then a mere youth. I well remember the first time I heard him preach. It was in Shinnston. He had a good congregation. He read the third chapter of the second Epistle of Peter, and dwelt largely on the first four verses. In a little while a large branch was built up and it I remember right it was called the Jones Run branch, and was presided over by Elder John Lyons.

My father's family joined the Church together with many of the relatives and neighbors. I was reported that I was baptized in a horse track filled with water. This was because I was small of my age and somebody wanted to say something funny. In the fall of 1838 my father, together with others of the branch, moved up to Far West, Missouri, where they arrived in time to be driven out of the state in common with the whole Church. I had gone up in advance early in the spring of that year. I was at Diahman, in Davies' county, in company with the Prophet and others and visited Adam's altar. Joseph sat on his horse and told things about it which I am sorry to say have left me. That same afternoon we went to Lyman Wight's. He lived in a little unhomed log cabin near the banks of Grand river. There I heard David Patten tell a vision he had. He said he saw Cain standing in a tent door and he was black as the ace of spades.

I was at Diahman when an army came there. They were in camp there for several days, the officers giving passes or permits to the Saints to leave the state. They gave me a paper to leave without being molested. I wish I had been smart and taken care of it to this day. The soldiers took delight in shooting chickens belonging to our people. By early spring nearly all the Saints had left the state, and had fled to Illinois, where they were kindly received.

HENRY W. BIGLER.

UP IN RICH COUNTY.

GARDEN CITY, Rich Co., Utah, March 14, 1894.—As this part of the country is very seldom heard from through the columns of the NEWS, a few items from here may be read with interest by some of the readers of your valuable journal.

The measles have broken out in our little burg and seem to be raging to quite an alarming extent. Children of half of the families in town are down with this disease, and it looks as if every child, who has not already had them, would get them before they leave us. One case has already changed into a pretty severe case of pneumonia, which now exists in the family of Chauncey L. Dustin. Day school has been discontinued for the present and perhaps our Sabbath gatherings may have to be stopped for a season. We hope, however, that the disease will soon leave our peaceful burg which this winter has been entirely free from sickness.

A male visitor, Republican in politics, came to town on Wednesday last and immediately proceeded to partake of the hospitality of our esteemed townsman James Hansen, and as the visitor seems entirely satisfied with his accommodations, has concluded to remain until called away. Mother and child doing well, and father happy.

A reward of $25 will be given to any man, woman or child, who can successfully predict the exact ushering in of spring. Here in this valley we usually have nine months hard winter and the balance three months pretty cold weather. This season caps anything that has been seen for many a year back, in the quantity of snow that adorns our streets. In many places one can walk right over the tops of fences of ordinary heights. The Bear Lake is still frozen over.

We have sometimes four changes of weather in two hours, that is to say all four seasons of the year represented in two hours of time.

The ward organizations are in a pretty fair condition all things considered. The organizations are all complete as far as I am able to judge.

The civil government class that was organized here last fall is making rapid headway, and it does one good to see how young Utah take hold in these studies of parliamentary rules and tactics as well as the study of civil government. This class has got up a mock trial which is to take place a week from next Wednesday. This will afford quite a sensation to the public, as it will be a public affair, and the young man now in the toils (?) fancies seeing himself serving the penalty of his crime, if the twelve jury men find him guilty.

The Democrats of this precinct will reorganize and commence work anew in a very few days. They will employ local speakers, and they will speak in the interest of democracy. D. S. Cook is one of the county organization's vice presidents and will take the matter of organizing the club in hand.

Times are hard here. V. EMIL.

A SHOCKING ACCIDENT.

HENNEFER, Utah, March 18th, 1894—A very sad accident occurred near this quiet little town about 5 o'clock this afternoon. Many of the people of this ward had been to Echo to attend the funeral services of Bishop Elias Asper and after the services a number of our young people concluded to walk back on the U. P. railway track. All went well with them until they were within about a mile of home, when they met a freight train and of course all stepped aside to allow the train to pass. But before the train had passed, David Beard, a son of Stephen Beard, playfully attempted to board the cars and in doing so was thrown under the wheels, three of which passed over the lower part of his body, almost severing his legs from his body, and frightfully crushing his bones; his left hand was also taken off.

His companions screamed for help, and as soon as the train men knew what had happened, they stopped and assisted to pick up the mangled form. The train was backed to the Hennefer crossing, where help was at hand, and the poor boy was conveyed home to a grief-stricken father and mother. He was made as comfortable as loving hands could make him, and Dr. Hamer, of Coalville, was immediately sent for, who, on examination, could give no hopes of his recovery. About 10 o'clock death came and relieved the victim of his pain.

David was 19 years old the 4th day of the present month. He was an active member of the ward, and beloved by all who knew him. This is the second son Brother and Sister Beard have lost in a similar way. The sad affair has cast a gloom over our entire community.

JOHN PASKETT.

The San Francisco Call advocates the wholesale expulsion from college of students who destroy property and lives in the efforts to have "a real jolly time."

MODERN AARONS.

Among the supporters of Brigham Young, first and foremost was Heber C. Kimball. He came up with the Pioneers, went back to the Missouri river again the same year with President Young. He brought a company out the following year. Heber C., was born in Vermont, where they get up in the morning to help the sun up; hence he became an early riser in youth, and followed it up all his life. He was an eccentric man, full of character, vim and determination. He was a veritable Jonathan in looks, as well as character. When he put his hands in his pocket and stood over you with those black hazel eyes centered on you, it seemed as though he was looking through you. In his speaking he could and would go from the sublime to the ridiculous oftener than any other man that I have ever seen or heard. He loved President Young and the people most dearly. To labor with his hands and heart was his delight. He was to President Young and the people an Aaron in every particular, except the building of a golden calf. Privations and dangers were a matter of course with him. He delighted in law and order, and was easily annoyed with anything approaching hypocrisy. Coming up from the States it was his rule to have prayers evening and morning. One morning breakfast was ready; a drizzling rain had just commenced; every body was in a hurry. He called on a man to lead in prayer who was noted for his long-winded prayers. The rain pelted down. The man prayed on, oblivious to all things earthly. When he did stop, Heber straightened up, and, pointing his finger at the man, he said: "You will not pray any more for us between here and Zion," neither did he.

It was his delight to see young people marrying. He would say: "Get married, you young people, and do your courting afterwards; get married, and get your homes afterwards. The money you would spend on clothing and buggy riding to please the young lady will go far towards fitting out a home." He was a true woman's rights man. He knew that it was a woman's place to be a helpmeet, and not a help-me-eat. If the human family would continue to court after marriage what misery could be averted! What happiness would there be instead!

His preaching was logical, forcible and practical. He was earnest and honest in his dealings with his fellow-man. A great counselor, and a great stay to President Young was he—they worked to the same end, the upbuilding of the Lord's work on the earth. I have traveled with them many a time through the Territory and can say with truth that I never heard an unkind word from either to the other.

When Heber C. Kimball prophesied, which he did once in a while, it was pretty sure to come true. In the first few years here the people were short of clothing and groceries. In the little bowery at one Sunday's meeting, he predicted that all these things would be plenty if the people would continue to serve the Lord. They did not have long to wait before the California gold emigrants came along, with plenty of everything to trade for vegetables. The fine horses and cattle that had got poor were traded for fat, and smaller horses or cattle to go on with. The poor horses soon getting fat were sent on to California and sold for a good price, the California small horse was purchased for $15 or $20 per head by the drove, and brought back and traded again for other stock. This was the half-way trading post for the emigrants for the west. Carding machines and looms were brought from the states and woolen goods made for use. He built a grist mill in the mouth of City Creek where one now stands. He encouraged home manufacturing in every department. In politics he was a Democrat and believed in the most good to the masses. I am proud to know that his sons and grandsons follow in his foot steps. When that monument will be built to President Young and the Pioneers, may his descendants see that he has a niche there, where his name will be engraven. May his name live, as it did, in the hearts of the people!

JEDEDIAH M. GRANT, who took Dr. Richards's place as second counselor, was a man that knew no fear—a western man in heart, manners and customs. He was elected the first mayor of Salt Lake City. Under his administration the sage and oak brush were cut out of the streets. He served many years in that office without pay or emoluments—there was nothing in the treasury. One of the first ordinances passed was that there should not be any hog pens maintained over or near any ditch. The marshal, who was J. C. Little, was authorized to notify the owners to move all such to some other place. When he notified President Young that he must move his, Brigham asked him by whose authority? Little replied: "By the Mayor's and City Council's." "Well," said President Young, "if the mayor wants mine moved let him move it." Little went to Grant's house and told him what had been said. Mayor Grant had just sat down to breakfast when he was told the reply. He arose and went up to the hog pen and kicked the logs all around, turned the hogs all out—went back and finished his meal. After breakfast he went up to President Young's office, as he was wont to do. President Young greeted him, "Are you satisfied?" "Yes, I am; you must obey the law as well as other people do." President Young had only sent him this word to try him, and he thought more of the mayor than he ever did before.

Jedediah Morgan Grant was a power in the land. He was a great preacher. He could hold his audience spellbound; a man that had clear convictions, and was never afraid to let his convictions be known.

He organized a train of one hundred wagons and followed the Pioneers. He traveled them in two companies near together, so they could protect one another against the Indians, he traveling first with one company then with the other. A little incident happened on the way which showed the man in him. There was a boy in the train by the name of George Bean, (now Col. Bean of Richfield) who had two yoke of cattle that he thought much of. He drove behind a lazy man who would go to sleep, and they would be late getting into camp at night. One day the boy left the man behind by driving around him. When the man caught up he wanted his place, which the boy was unwilling to give up. The former went to beating the oxen over the nose to make them turn out, which exasperated the boy, so much so that he laid to and gave the man a sound drubbing. A trial was had, and the boy was about to be sentenced to be tied behind the wagon, when Captain Grant happened to come over from the other camp. He decided that the boy did just right and should not be punished. The boy never has forgotten his champion, even in his old age.

Jedediah M. Grant was indeed an Aaron. Work was a pleasure to him. He was never so happy as when he was with his friends, and imparting knowledge to them. When he knew a man once, he knew him wherever he met him again. It was he who helped to organize the first militia of Utah, and to command them. His voice was heard in the first Legislature of Utah in 1851. He was a great organizer, as well as builder. To be in his presence was to be in the presence of a great man, and in the presence of a friend to the human family. His death was scarcely more a loss to his family than to this people, and no one missed him more than President Young.

WILLARD RICHARDS,

President Young's second counselor, was born in the state of Massachusetts. The first we know of him was in 1836 when he was baptized into the Church. He at once became an active member. Twelve days thereafter he met Heber C. Kimball who said to him, "I am now ready to fulfill my engagement with you. I start to England tomorrow, and you may go with me, so get ready." On the following day they started. From that time on until the Pioneers started for these valleys he knew no rest from care. Dr. Richards was an educated man and a gentleman. His death was at the time a great loss to the community.

DANIEL H. WELLS

was chosen in Jedediah M. Grant's place. He was a sound counselor, and a good man. He was a good thinker and a just man, and as brave as a lion. President Young placed great confidence in him. At Grant's death he was made commander of the militia and served all the time it existed. All through the Indian wars he had command, being ably assisted by James Ferguson, R. T. Burton and others. It must be remembered that there were no funds then to carry on war with. Men volunteered; some had part of an outfit, others had none; all were supplied by other people contributing, one a horse, others again saddles, others arms, some clothing; all the settlements contributing provision and grain. When a command was ready to move, it contained men of all sizes, horses of every kind, guns, pistols and sabers of any make and shape, and of every nationality. But good work was done by them. How well many of us can remember the blue blouse coat with brass buttons, the first uniform we had! How we used to drill "over Jordan!" This was when the Indian wars were over and it was easy to be a soldier. At that late date we had availed ourselves of the arms that the soldiers of Camp Floyd and Camp Douglas had sold to us. How well do we remember Bishop Edward Hunter, with his home guards of the old men drilling Saturday afternoon! He formed them against the Temple wall, so as to get a straight line. His first command was "right about face!" which they executed accordingly. He saw it was not what he wanted, so he ordered "right about face" again. What he wanted was "right face," so he said, "pshaw, pshaw, boys, follow me," and he struck down the side walk; they following him.

Daniel H. Wells served several times as mayor of Salt Lake: also served many times in the Legislature, and in the City Council. He survived President Young a number of years. The last conversation I ever had with him was about President Young. I said, "I wish we had four Brigham Youngs instead of one." He leaned forward and in a feeling tone said: "Just another such as he was would be a God-send."

GEORGE A. SMITH,

who was appointed counselor to Brigham in Heber C. Kimball's place, was even greater than Aaron of old—he did not want the people to club in to make him a great coat, but was ever glad to wear a home-spun one. He was one of the people before he was a counselor to President Young, and was ever useful in pushing settlements. It was he that pushed the settlements south even into Iron county. He made his home in Parowan for many years. His peaceful Indian policy was a great success and prevented much bloodshed. But it was James Andrus that finally settled the Indian question in southern Utah. The Navajos for many years would come over from Colorado and kill a few people and steal their stock. On one of these raids James Andrus was sent after them. He overtook them at the Colorado river, and killed all but one, who jumped into the river. This one he let go so that he could tell what had become of the rest. It had the desired effect—there has never been a raid since.

George A. Smith was noted for his short sermons. He seldom used more than fifteen minutes or half an hour's time, but every word seemed a sentence. He knew what to say and he said it and quit. He was a great historian, and read until his eyes got weak. Then he got his children and friends to read to him. He was fond of his friends, tender in his own feelings and of their feelings. If he knew a man once he knew him forever afterwards. He was a statesman by instinct, and became one by practice. He believed in arbitration. In traveling through the Territory with him I have known him to sit as arbitrator and settle difficulties that would have kept a court running for days, and cost hundreds of dollars for lawyers' fees. I never knew of one that was ever appealed, either. The Saints loved him, and he loved the Saints. He was like the Savior, believed in doing good every day as well as Sunday. He never blamed any man for differing with him, and in the Legislature he was a power, clear-headed ever, wanting legislation for the good of the masses. Crude and inexperienced as the legislators were at that time, they always aimed at just laws. In politics he was a Whig; but said he to me, "I hope politics will be kept out of our Church. I also know," said he, "that if a man is bitten by a political snake he seldom get over it."

George A. Smith was born in the town of Postdam, St. Lawrence county, New York, on the 26th day of June 1817. He joined the Church when a boy. He went to school part of the winter of 1832-33, and, says he, "all of the large boys combined to abuse me on account of my religion. I was large of my age; boys three or four years older than myself were my size, and had always been able to handle me with ease. I endured their abuse until I could bear it no longer; and soon convinced them by physical demonstration that my strength had very much increased; and after that I was able to master the school, after which I was treated with respect." His life was an open book and all who knew him could read it.

These men were chosen even as Aaron was chosen. To speak of such men as they deserve is not in my power, nor the power of man. They lived a righteous life, and have gone to receive their reward. May their children and all those that knew them, follow their example!
H. J. FAUST.

CHURCH THEOLOGY CLASS.

The class convened at the usual time and place, about 1,200 students being present. Leaflet No. 16 was given to each at the door. After the opening prayer by Elder T. C. Griggs, the subject of the Book of Mormon received further attention. First the genuineness or integrity of its claim and then the authenticity of the record were considered. Elder Talmage referred to ancient prophecy, explaining that the record should be shown unto three and also others, which was verified by historical facts. In accepting the Book of Mormon as a divine record, the Latter-day Saints hold to the following proofs: (1) it is in strict harmony with the Bible; (2) it exists in fulfillment of prophecy of old; (3) it is absolutely consistent with itself; (4) the evident truthfulness of its record. Each of these points received careful attention. The last proof and most important to the Saints is the assurance from within, the Spirit's testimony of what cometh from God. The instructor then proceeded to the ninth article of faith, as follows: "We believe all that God has revealed, all He does now reveal and we believe that He will yet reveal many great and important things pertaining to the Kingdom of God." This, it was stated, comprised one of the most distinguishable doctrines of the Latter-day Saints, viz., divine revelation, past, present and future. The lecturer explained in detail each division of this important subject, quoting scripture in support of every assertion, as recorded in the leaflet above referred to.

Benediction was pronounced by Elder George Goddard and the class adjourned for one week.

The general conference of the R. Society will be held in the Assembly Hall, in this city, on Thursday, April 5, commencing at 2 and 7:30 p.m.—a session very desirable that the president of each Stake organization, or one of board should attend this conference as there will be matters of import considered.

ZINA D. H. YOUNG,
President.
JANE S. RICHARDS,
BATHSHEBA W. SMITH,
Counselors.

LOCAL AND OTHER MATTERS.

The Logan Temple will close Friday evening, March 30th, and open again on Tuesday, April 10th, 1894.

M. W. MERRILL, Pres't.

PAYSON, Utah, March 15.—William Parker died today, aged 85. He was a resident of Payson for 11 years, having emigrated from Wisconsin to Utah.

The Manti Temple will close on the 30th of March, and open for ordinance work on the 10th of April, 1894.

JOHN D. MCALLISTER,
President.

If Mrs. Sarah Findlay, wife of Wm. Findlay, will write to James Nasham, 4 Church street, Spennymoor, Durham county, England, she will learn of something to her advantage.

Attorney E. W. Tatlock has filed a suit against Frank E. McGurrian, from whom he claims $10,000 for having published a libelous letter concerning him calling him a "shyster lawyer."

PROVO, Utah, March 17.—Charles Davenport, the slayer of John Woods, was this afternoon sentenced by Judge Smith to thirty years imprisonment in the penitentiary. He was not greatly affected.

Peter, Andrew and Alexander Jack, sons of Martha McKendrick, would like to hear from their uncle John McKendrick, who visited New Zealand from Utah many years ago.

Address care of Staples' Boot Factory, Wellington, New Zealand.

When the arguments in the Blyth will case closed in the Probate court late on Saturday afternoon, Judge Blair rendered his decision, revoking the former order admitting the will to probate. March 20 a petition for the appointment of a special administrator will be argued, and if granted the estate will in due time be equitably distributed.

At 9:30 March 17th Chief Justice Merritt began his charge to the jury before whom had been tried the $30,000 damage suit brought by Peter F. Goss against Salt Lake City. The jurors retired just before 10 o'clock, and at 11:25 returned into court with a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, assessing his damages at "$1,000, to date." One juror only dissented.

Another batch of pauper passengers arrived in this city from the north and west. The city is filling up with such characters and the more of them that come the more difficult will it be for the charitable societies to care for deserving residents. It is stated that an organized effort will probably be made to call a halt, that the shipping of penniless men to Salt Lake may end as quickly as possible.

The Union Pacific officials in this city are still very much disturbed over the non-arrival of trains on their line west of that part of the road in Idaho, which was washed out by the recent big flood caused by the breaking of the Indian Creek reservoir. The heavy rains and snow which fell last night and today has caused them to fear that great damage might be done to bridges over rapidly swelling streams in that region of country north and west of here.

The News received a call from Elder Robert C. Young, of Three Mile Creek, Box Elder county, who returned from a mission to the Southern States. Elder Young left on his mission August 25th, 1892, and was assigned to labor in the East Tennessee conference. He was well treated by the people, many of whom showed deep interest in the Gospel teachings. The health of Elder Young was not very good, especially during the latter part of the time he was in the field.

A human skeleton was unearthed by A. Windward, 657 Second street, R. Craven, No. 235 south Third West street, and another man, all employees on the city waterworks department, March 16, on Seventh West street, while they were excavating for the laying of a service pipe from the principal main on that thoroughfare. The remains were found only about a foot below the surface of the ground. Their nearness to the surface is accounted for by the comparatively recent cutting down of the street.

A meeting of the officers of the Young Ladies' Mutual Improvement Association will be held Friday, April 6, 1894, at 4 p. m., at the residence of Counselor M. Y. Dougall, No. 49 north West Temple street (opposite west gate of Temple block), Salt Lake City. It is earnestly desired that every stake shall be represented. Ward officers, particularly those coming from a distance, are also cordially invited to attend.

ELMINA S. TAYLOR,
President,
ANNIE M. CANNON,
Secretary.

The articles of incorporation of the Ogden & Brigham City Railway company, says the Ogden Standard, were March 16 filed with the county clerk of Weber county. The place of business of the new company will be at Ogden, and the object of the corporation will be the leasing and operation of railroads for carrying passengers, freight, etc. The motive power to be used by the company will be steam or electricity. The capital stock of the company is $1,000, divided into ten shares of the value of $100 each, one-half of which has been subscribed.

Elder Adelson Nebeker, of Richfield, Sevier county, arrived in this city on his return from a mission to the Southern States. He left this city in February, 1892, and was assigned to the Mississippi conference, where he labored the entire period of his mission. He was well treated by the people, and had good success in his labors. His health was excellent just after he received his release to return some lawlessly inclined people ordered him to leave the country where he was, but he was not molested, and took his departure after attending to the necessary business devolving on him. He left this afternoon for Richfield.

On Tuesday, April 10th, it is intended, if a sufficiently large number of correspondents be secured, to renew the publication of weekly weather-crop bulletins, which shall show each week the weather conditions that have prevailed, and their effect upon the growing crops throughout the Territory; the purpose is to trace the growth of the crops throughout the season, and only actual facts and conditions will be given, based upon the reports received. Farmers interested in this will apply to this office for government franked cards on which to make reports. It is hoped that the number of reporters secured may be greater than last season, so as to make the bulletins more comprehensive.

Shortly before midnight March 15 a most brutal assault was committed between First and Second West on North Temple street. As Mrs. W. C. Symms, who resides on the corner of North Temple and Second West, was on her way home, a man came up behind her and dealt her a terrific blow with a club. The weapon struck her on the back of the neck, whereupon she screamed and sank insensible. Immediately after striking her the man turned and ran, disappearing in the darkness. The screams quickly brought assistance, and Mrs. Symms was taken to her home and cared for. The fiend was not caught, although the police were notified and made a thorough search.

The Pocatello (Idaho) Tribune tells of a terrible accident which occurred on the Union Pacific railway on Medbury hill last Tuesday evening, in which three men were killed and a number of others more or less seriously injured. The accident was caused by the passenger train running into a landslide. The engine left the track and the mail car was piled on top of it, the engineer and fireman both being caught under the overturned engine. The passenger cars left the track but did not turn over, and none of the inmates were injured. The heavy storms in that section have caused considerable damage to the railroads. Another wreck near Piedmont, caused by a rock rolling onto the track, resulted in the death of the engineer, fireman and a brakeman.

The first step for the organization anew of the Utah militia, under the bill recently passed by the Legislature and approved by the Governor, was taken March 14th, when General George M. Ottinger received his commission as adjutant general of the Utah militia. The oath was administered by the commander-in-chief of the militia, Governor West. It will be in order now to proceed with the other staff officers, and this will be attended to at once. The formation of the Utah National Guard, as provided for in the law, will be forwarded as quickly as circumstances will permit and it is quite likely that the Guards will hold a review the coming fall, somewhere near Saltair Beach.

Adjutant-General Ottinger formerly held a commission, issued by Governor Durfee, in 1869, as Colonel of the Third Infantry regiment in the militia.

Paupers are still arriving from the West. It is believed that fully a score reached here March 19. All of them admit that they came over the Southern Pacific as far as Ogden, but they are not willing to confess they beat their way. Most of them were drawn from all parts of the country to San Francisco by the Midwinter Fair. Instead of finding a city of milk and honey they found one of suffering and destitution, and after days and weeks of want and hunger they were glad to get away from there. Salt Lake has the best reputation of any city of which they have heard and naturally they have headed this way. The rate at which this class of unfortunate though undesirable transients are coming here promises to be a problem carrying with it no easy means of solution. Already their presence has made it much more difficult for the relief committees to provide properly for deserving residents.

It has just leaked out that on Sunday afternoon another attempt to escape was made by some of the convicts at the Utah penitentiary. Here seems to have been the beginning of the plot: Guard A. J. Burt, while going his rounds of the cells on Saturday evening came across a rope made of portions of bedding material, in the compartment occupied by a prisoner named William Ryan. It lay within his slop bucket, which he had concealed inside the ventilator. This put the officers on the alert. On Sunday afternoon two of the convicts, named Frank Stewart and Andrew Mecca, were seen to make a bolt—the one for the north wall and the other for the back wall. Warden Stark, from the wall above, speedily leveled his revolver at Mecca and brought him to a halt, and both he and Stewart were instantly seized by the guards and placed in their cells.

Ryan is a desperate character and is undergoing a five years' sentence for burglary. This is the fourth time Stewart has tried to escape since his term began, in December, 1898. He is serving five years for safe blowing at Cunningham & Co's, this city. Mecca is "doing" ten years for murder. The first and last named were sent up from Provo.

Hundreds of hearts will become sad and many friends will mourn when they learn of the death of Nabbie Y., the beloved and noble wife of Spencer Clawson. The lamentable event occurred at 1:10 o'clock March 15th at the family residence on First street, in the Eighteenth ward, and as a consequence, where happiness reigned supreme a few days ago there is now the utmost gloom and sorrow.

The deceased was the daughter of Clara Decker, the last of the three Pioneer women of Utah, and the late President Young. She was born in Salt Lake City and was forty-two years of age. As a young woman she was beautiful, winsome and accomplished. As a wife and mother she was loving, tender and true. Everywhere and under all circumstances was she a superior woman. Her noble traits of character made her the object of admiration and esteem wherever she was known, and her friends were legion.

The deceased was the mother of seven children, six of whom are left with the grief-stricken husband and father to mourn her departure into the unseen world. On Friday last the youngest child died shortly after birth and from that time the mother's condition was regarded as critical. Everything that loving hands and kind hearts could do was done but without avail. Gradually she grew worse though at times she appeared to rally and shake off the sleep of death as it silently crept over her. This morning she sank rapidly and passed peacefully away at the time stated.

Elder Jesse M. Fox, of this city, arrived home March 18 from the Society Islands. He has been gone a little over a year, having left here on a mission on February 25, 1898. During his stay on the Society group, Elder Fox has not enjoyed good health, and this is the cause of his return at the present time.

About three months before his departure from home he met with an accident that injured his left leg below the knee. He seemed to recover and to have got all right, but when he had been on the island of Tahiti some time climatic influences began to affect him seriously, and the place of the injury gave him great trouble. He was laid up for about four months last summer. Then he got better for a while, and moved about, attending to his missionary labors as he could in connection with the other Elders. A portion of the time he spent on the island of Tupuai. Later in the season the injury again began to be seriously troublesome, and as there was a prospect of his being again disabled for duty for some time he was released and came home. His health has improved somewhat by the return trip, and he hopes to ultimately recover from the effects of the injury. He is, however, still lame.

The voyage homeward was made on a sailing vessel, the Tropic Bird, which left Tahiti on February 10, the time on the water being thirty days. As the islands are not on the line of steamships, and the mail is carried from San Francisco on sailing vessels, the transportation of letters and papers is very uncertain as to time. Elder Fox says that Elder Cannon, of this city, has gone to the island of Raiatea, which has connection by trading vessels with Tahiti, so that mail may be six months on the way from here to there.

Elder Fox reports the nine Elders now on the Society group, which is under French dominion, as working energetically in their missionary duties. They are hospitably treated by the natives, and the mission is prospering.

There was a strange case of suicide at the White House in this city shortly after midnight, March 15. The particulars of the case so far as obtainable are as follows:

Thursday morning a stranger, well dressed and with the outward appearance of a gentleman, called at the hotel in question and registered as Charles H. Bainbridge, Ohio. He stated that he arrived on the 9 o'clock train from the East and that he expected to leave the city last night. This, however, he failed to do and it was very close to 12 o'clock before he went upstairs to his room for the last time. As he left the office to retire he said to the night clerk, "I will leave the door of my room unlocked because I will be hard to awake in the morning. Call me at 7 o'clock."

He was assured that his wishes would be complied with and at that hour this morning the call boy went upstairs, and as he got no response to his vigorous knocks on the door ventured to step inside and was horrified to find the body of the stranger stretched out on the bed cold and lifeless. On the washstand was an empty two-ounce vial which had contained chloral and the following letter which is self-explanatory:

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah, March 15, 1894.
Dr. M. A. Hughes, Salt Lake, Utah.

Dear Doctor Hughes—I write you hoping that for "old acquaintance sake" you will comply with my wishes.

I am in this city without money and am about to shuffle off this mortal coil. I desire you to notify my wife or mother at Port Clinton, Ohio, and ship my remains to that point. I have a $5,000 policy upon my life in the New York Life and Masonic Aid of Yanktown and either my wife or mother will gladly remit the necessary expense. It is not necessary for me to relate to you all the circumstances which have led up to this act, long continued illness, the spending of my last dollar endeavoring to regain my health without success.

As I can neither beg nor steal this is the only way open for me. I should have been pleased to call upon you, but under the circumstances I could not find it in my heart to do so. I have taken an overdose of chloral—autopsy not necessary.

Very sincerely and truly,
C. H. BAINBRIDGE, M. D.

The Union Pacific train service from Washington, Oregon, and all points in Idaho west of Mountain Home and 170 miles beyond Pocatello was cut off March 15. The cause of the non-arrival of trains is due to a raging and destructive flood in the vicinity of Caldwell, Nampa, Kuna, Mora, Owyhee, Bliska, Nameko, Clef and other places west of Mountain Home. It appears that early yesterday afternoon the Orohara creek dam or Indian reservoir gave way under a mighty pressure of water and in a remarkably short time thousands of acres of land were inundated to a depth of from three to twenty feet. Ranches, farms, bridges and improvements of all kinds were ruined, many of them beyond redemption.

The Oregon Short Line was so badly damaged that it is believed trains cannot be sent over it for some time to come. As soon as the break had been discovered horsemen were dispatched in the direction the flood was taking for the purpose of warning them of the impending dangers, and many lives of farmers, their families and ranchers were thus saved.

It was an appalling and frightful scene to those who succeeded in gaining eminence sufficiently elevated to guarantee safety from the surging wall of water as it carried houses, barns, horses, cattle, sheep and everything movable before it.

As soon as citizens of Nampa were warned of the danger they were in they fled unceremoniously from the town, the lower part of which was quickly under twenty-five feet of water. It is reported that several persons were drowned, but the rumor has not been confirmed.

The cause of the breaking of the dam was due to the fast melting of snows and heavy rains. The reservoir covered a tract of land of between five and six hundred acres, and is said to have cost $50,000.

THE MEDICAL LAW.

Following is the full text of what is now the medical law of this Territory, copied from the original filed in the office of the Secretary:

An Act regulating the practice of medicine in the Territory of Utah.

Be it enacted, etc.

SECTION 1. That upon the passage of this act, the Governor of this Territory shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Council, appoint biennially a board of seven medical examiners from the various recognized schools of medicine, who shall hold office for two years, or until their successors are appointed and qualified. The examiners so appointed shall go before a district or probate judge and make oath that they are graduates of legally chartered medical colleges in good standing, and that they will faithfully perform the duties of their office. All vacancies caused by removal, death, resignation or otherwise, shall be filled by appointment by the Governor within one month from the time that the vacancy shall occur.

Sec. 2. Said board shall organize immediately after the passage of this act by selecting from its members a president, a secretary and a treasurer, and shall have a seal, and attest its official acts under seal. The president of said board shall have authority to administer oaths, and the board shall take testimony in all matters relating to its duties. Said board shall have the power to issue certificates to all who furnish satisfactory proof of having received degrees or diplomas from chartered medical colleges in good standing, and pass a satisfactory examination before said board. Said board shall prepare two forms of certificates, one for persons duly holding certificates, examined and favorably passed upon by said board; the other for persons as provided for in section 11 of this act; and shall furnish to the county recorder of the several counties a list of all persons residing in said county receiving certificates from the board. Certificates shall be signed by all the members of the board granting them.

Sec. 3. The fee for examination, as provided for in Sec. 2 of this act, shall be fifteen dollars, which shall be paid to the treasurer of the board of examiners.

Sec. 4. Graduates of respectable medical colleges, who were engaged in actual practice in this Territory prior to March 10, 1892, shall be licensed to practice medicine under this act, upon presentation of their diploma to said board, and upon producing satisfactory evidence of the identity of said applicant. The fee for such license shall be five dollars, to be paid to the treasurer of the board of examiners. All persons not graduates of medical colleges, who have practiced medicine for five years continually in this Territory, prior to the passage of this act, shall, upon producing to the board of medical examiners a proper application, accompanied by a petition signed by twenty-five legal voters living in the city or precinct where such applicant practices, on payment of a fee of five dollars, receive a (certificate) license to practice medicine in the city, county or precinct where the signers of the applicant's petition reside. No non-graduate so licensed shall, however, in any way advertise as a doctor, physician or surgeon, but shall, if he advertises at all, do so as a licensed non-graduate practitioner of medicine. The secretary of the board shall enter, without fee, upon the register to be kept by him, the names of all persons to whom licenses are issued as physicians or surgeons.

Sec. 5. Every person holding a certificate from the said board shall have it recorded in the office of the recorder of the county in which he resides, within three months from its date, and the date of record shall be endorsed thereon. Until such certificate is recorded as herein provided, the holder thereof shall not exercise any of the privileges conferred therein to practice medicine. Any person removing to another county to practice medicine shall record the certificate in like manner in the county to which he removes, and the holder of the certificate shall pay the recorder the usual fees for recording other papers.

Sec. 6. The county recorder shall keep in a book provided for that purpose a complete list of the certificates recorded by him, with the date of the issue of the certificate, and if the certificate be based upon a degree and examination, he shall record the name of the medical college conferring the degree, and the date thereof. The register of the county recorder shall be open to public inspection during business hours.

Sec. 7. Examinations shall be made wholly or partially in writing, and the board of medical examiners may refuse to issue certificates provided for in this act to individuals guilty of immoral or dishonorable conduct, the nature of which shall be stated in writing, and it may revoke such certificate for like causes. In all cases of refusal or revocation the applicant may appeal to the chief justice of the Territory, who may affirm or overrule the decision of the board.

Sec. 8. Any person shall be regarded as practicing medicine within the meaning of this act who shall treat, operate upon, or prescribe for, any physical ailment of another for a fee, or who shall hold him or herself out by means of signs, cards, advertisements or otherwise, as a physician or surgeon, but nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit services in cases of emergency, or the administration of family remedies, and this act shall not apply to commissioned surgeons of the United States army in the discharge of their official duties, or to visiting physicians in the act of consultation.

Sec. 9. Any person practicing medicine or surgery within the Territory without having first obtained a certificate as herein provided for, or contrary to the provision of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sec. 10. All persons not graduates of medical colleges, who have practiced medicine in this Territory less than five years prior to the taking effect of this act, shall, upon proper application, payment of the fee for examination as provided for in section 3 of this act, accompanied by a petition signed by twenty-five legal voters, living in the city or precinct where such applicant practices, be admitted to examination before the board of medical examiners, and, if satisfactory, shall receive a certificate. And all persons not having applied for or received such certificates within six months after the taking effect of this act, and all persons whose applications have, for cause herein named, been rejected, or certificates revoked, shall, if they practice medicine, be deemed guilty of practicing in violation of law, and shall suffer the penalties herein provided.

Sec. 11. All persons desiring to practice obstetrics in this Territory shall apply to the board of examiners for a certificate, and after passing a proper examination shall be entitled to the same upon paying to the treasurer of said board the sum of five dollars, to be applied towards defraying the expenses of said board. Any person practicing obstetrics within this Territory without first obtaining the license herein provided for, contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Provided, that all persons who shall furnish to said board satisfactory evidence, by affidavits or otherwise, of having practiced obstetrics previous to the passage of this act, shall receive a license without examination upon the payment of a fee of one dollar. Nothing in this section shall be construed to apply to physicians holding certificates in accordance with this act, or to prohibit service in case of emergency, or to persons practicing obstetrics in communities where there are no licensed practitioners, or prohibiting a fee therefor.

Sec. 12. The board of medical examiners shall meet on the first Monday in January, April, July and October of each year, at 10 o'clock a. m., and such other times as the president of the board shall deem necessary. The place of meeting shall be at the Territorial capital.

Sec. 13. Any member of said board may be removed for misconduct in office by a two-thirds vote of all the members of the board, but no member shall be removed until after he has been given a trial before said board.

Sec. 14. The term "medical college" in this act shall include colleges in good standing in the states where they exist.

Sec. 15. Nothing in this act shall be deemed to require persons now holding certificates from the territorial board of examiners to make application for license.

Sec. 16. Moneys received under this act may be applied in defraying the expenses of said examining board.

Sec. 17. All acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Sec. 18. This act shall take effect from its approval.

Approved March 8th.

THE ESTRAY LAW.

The following is a compilation of all the provisions of law now in force relative to the disposal of estray animals and trespass and damage done by them. An act upon this subject was passed in 1892, consisting of fourteen sections, and at the last Legislature another act was passed, which is entitled: "An Act to amend an act entitled An Act providing for the disposal of estray animals and for trespass and damage, approved March 10, 1892, and to repeal sections 6 to 14, inclusive, of said act." There is nothing in the text of the last named act which states that it is intended to supersede the sections of the act of 1892 which it repeals, but it is here assumed that such was the intention of the Legislature. It is too bad that this matter has been left open to doubt, as a judicial decision will be required to settle it. The NEWS called attention to the omission soon after the bill was introduced, but no heed was paid to the suggestion, and a serious ambiguity is the result.

The first five sections of the act of 1892, are, for the purposes of this compilation, assumed to be still in force, and it is further assumed that the act of 1894, which was approved March 8th, and the title of which is quoted above, was intended to take the place of the last nine sections of the act of 1892.

It will be noticed that some of the sections after section 5 have double numbers, but that this double numbering is not continued throughout. It was probably the intention that the section numbered "Section 1.—Sec. 6" was to take the place of section 6 of the act of 1892, as it is the first section of the act of 1894, and so on; but why the double numbering was not continued the present writer is not able to state, unless the failure to do so was an oversight on the part of the author of the latter bill, or of the engrossing clerk. It is also here assumed that all laws upon this subject, enacted prior to 1892, have been repealed. A short bill was passed at the session of 1894, substituting for the word "premises," in section 5 of the act of 1892, the words "improved real property;" and section 13 of the act of 1894 alters the wording of section 3 of the act of 1892, which changes are here made.

With this explanation the compilation is submitted. Pains have been taken to make it correct and reliable, because of the large number of people in the Territory who are interested in it.

FIRST FIVE SECTIONS OF THE ACT OF 1892.

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah:

SECTION 1. That any precinct of said Territory may at any general or special election, called for that purpose by the county court thereof, by a vote of a majority of all the taxpayers of said precinct, declare in favor of fencing their farms and allowing their animals to run at large; and in such cases the provisions of this act authorizing the detention and sale of animals for damage shall be inoperative.

Sec. 2. It shall be the duty of the county court of each county, at its June session, the year 1892, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, to declare what shall constitute a lawful fence for that county and the fence viewers of said county shall be governed thereby.

Sec. 3. [As amended by section 13 of the act of 1894]. All horses, mules and neat cattle, found running at large, on which there is no brand, except calves and colts running at large on the premises of any person not the owner, are hereby declared to be estrays.

Sec. 4. It is hereby made the duty of the constable of any precinct in any county in this Territory to take up any estrays in said precinct, and, after advertising them by posting notices in three of the most public places in said precinct (giving a general description thereof) for ten days, shall sell the same at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash; and after deducting costs and expenses of keeping and sale, shall deposit the balance of the proceeds of the sale with the justice of the peace in and for said precinct, to be by him disposed of as in the case of balance or sale of animals for damages as hereinafter provided. Provided, That the constable shall have the power to sell estrays at "general roundups" or drives, and shall advertise his intention to do so for a period of fourteen days previous thereto, in some paper having a general circulation in such county, and he shall receive as compensation fifteen per cent of the proceeds of such sales.

Sec. 5. If any neat cattle, horses, mules, asses, sheep, goats or hogs shall trespass or do damage upon the improved real property of any person, except in cases where said places are not enclosed by a lawful fence in counties where a fence is required by law, the party aggrieved may recover damages by an action at law against the owner of the trespassing animals, and no animals trespassing shall be exempt from execution. Provided, The fees in such cases shall be but one half the fees in civil cases.

THE WHOLE OF THE ACT OF 1894.

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah:

SECTION 1.—Sec. 6. The owner or occupant of any improved real property may detain all animals doing damage on such property and keep them in some secure place and properly care for the same, for twenty-four hours after the doing of such damage. He shall cause said damage to be appraised within twenty-four hours after the same shall have been done, by some disinterested voter of the precinct, who shall certify to the same in writing, and which certificate of appraisement may be substantially in the following form to wit:

TERRITORY OF UTAH,
County of _____ } ss.
Precinct, _____ }

This certifies that, at the request of _____, I have this day appraised certain damage upon (here describe premises upon which damage is done) to (here describe nature of damage) alleged to have been done by (here describe the animal alleged to have done the damage) owned by (here give the name of the owner of the animals if known, and if unknown state the fact) on the (here here give date of the doing of the damage) and after viewing the premises and making due examination and inquiry, I appraise the same at the sum of $ _____, and that my fees for making this appraisement are $ _____, number of miles traveled _____, number of hours employed in making this appraisement _____.

Dated at _____, this _____ day of _____, 18____,

Appraiser.

The appraisers shall deliver said certificate of appraisement to the person damaged, who shall also sign the same, and shall use due diligence to find the owner of said animals, and for this purpose shall examine the Territorial brand sheets, in the possession of the constable, and if the owner of said animals is known, and a resident of the precinct, the person damaged shall, within twenty-four hours after the detaining of said animals, deliver to the owner thereof a copy of the certificate of appraisement of damage. If the owner is known but is not a resident of the precinct where said damage is done, the persons detaining said animals shall, within twenty-four hours after said damage shall have been done, deposit in the postoffice, postage prepaid and registered, a letter containing a copy of said certificate of appraisement, addressed to the owner of said animals, at his known place of residence.

Sec. 2.—Sec. 7. If at the expiration of twenty-four hours after the detaining of the animals mentioned in the preceding section, the owner thereof cannot be found, or if found shall neglect or refuse to pay the damages and costs thereon, the party detaining the same shall forthwith deliver said animals with a copy of the certificate of appraisement, to the constable of the precinct wherein said damage is alleged to have been done, and also deliver to the justice of the peace of said precinct the certificate of appraisement.

Sec. 3.—Sec. 8. Upon receipt by the justice of the peace, of the certificate of appraisement, he shall immediately file the same in his office, and make the proper and necessary entries in his docket as in other civil cases, and the said certificate of appraisement shall constitute the complaint in said case, and the person detaining said animals shall be designated as the plaintiff in all subsequent proceedings in said case, and the owner of said animals or if the owner be unknown, then the unknown owner of the animals, briefly describing them, shall be designated as the defendant, and the justice shall immediately issue a summons, addressed to the defendant, requiring him to appear before said justice at his office, and to answer to said complaint, within five days after the service upon him of said summons, if served upon him within the precinct for which the justice is acting, and if served out of such precinct, then within said five days from the date of its service, with one day additional for every twenty-five miles or fractional part thereof of the distance that the defendant may reside from the office of the justice, by the nearest traveled route, and to which summons shall be annexed as a part thereof a certified copy of the certificate of appraisement in said case, and in other respects said summons shall be the same in form as other summonses in justices' courts in civil actions, and shall deliver said summons to the constable of the precinct for service, and said justice shall hear, try and determine said case in the same manner as other civil cases are tried and determined in justices' courts, and shall, in all other respects, proceed as in other civil cases.

Sec. 4.—Sec. 9. The constable shall receive, hold and properly care for, all animals committed to his custody under the provisions of this act, pending the determination of the case, and shall immediately, upon receipt of the summons here in before provided for, serve the same as follows: First. If the defendant is known and a resident of the precinct, by delivering to him, personally, a copy of the summons, or by leaving at his usual place of residence with some suitable person over the age of fourteen years, a copy thereof. Second. If the defendant be known and is not a resident of the precinct, then by depositing in the postoffice, postage prepaid and registered, a letter containing a copy of said summons, addressed to the defendant at his known place of residence. Third. If the defendant is unknown and after diligent search and inquiry made by the constable, he shall be unable to discover the defendant or his place of residence, he shall post up three copies of the summons in three conspicuous places in the precinct, one of which shall be at or near the office of the justice; and in addition thereto he shall mail by registered letter a copy of said summons to the county clerk of the county where such damage was done, and the county clerk shall, upon receipt of said summons, post the same in some conspicuous place at or near the court house, and in all cases he shall make his returns in accordance with the facts, and the summons shall be deemed to be served upon the delivery of a copy, the mailing of a copy by registered letter, or by the posting of copies as hereinbefore provided.

Sec. 5. The owner of animals sold under the provisions of this act, may at any time within ninety days from the date of such sale, redeem such animals from the purchaser or assignee, by paying to such purchaser, if he still holds such animals, and if not, then to the holder of such animals, the amount for which said animals were sold, with three per cent additional, besides all taxes and assessments paid upon said animals since the sale, together with a reasonable compensation for the care and keeping of said animals. If no redemption of said animals be made within ninety days after the date of such sale, then said sale shall be absolute and vest the title to such animals in the purchaser or his assignee.

Sec. 6. After six months from the date of said sale the net proceeds thereof shall be paid into the county treasury, to the credit of the county fund: Provided, however, that if the owner of said animals shall, within six months from the date of sale, satisfy, by affidavit or otherwise, the justice who heard the case, that he was the owner of such animals at the time of such sale, the justice shall, upon demand of such owner, pay such net proceeds to him, taking his receipt therefor.

Sec. 7. The justice shall, at the first session of the county court after the expiration of six months from the date of sale, report to said county court his proceedings therein and the disposition of the proceeds thereof.

Sec. 8. The constable in each precinct in this Territory is hereby made the poundkeeper of such precinct, and is entitled to, and is made the custodian of, all brand books and brand sheets pertaining thereto, which shall, at all reasonable hours, and without charge, be open to the inspection of any person; he shall keep a record of all animals impounded by him, with a full description of such animals, the cause of their being impounded, the disposition made of them, and if sold, the date and amount for and to whom sold, with such additional facts as may be necessary to a full and complete record of each animal; which said record shall also be open to the inspection of the public at all reasonable hours, and without charge.

Sec. 9. Any person who shall take any animal out of the custody of any person holding for damage under the provisions of this act, either by stealth, force or fraud, or who shall intercept or hinder any person in lawfully taking up, or attempting to take up, such animals for doing damage, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

[There is no section numbered 10.]

Sec. 11. The provisions of this act shall in no way interfere with existing legal rights of incorporated cities and towns in relation to animals running at large.

Sec. 12. The fees of appraisers, acting under the provisions of this act, shall be twenty cents per mile one way only, from his place of residence and to the place where the damage is alleged to have been done, and twenty cents per hour for the time necessarily spent in viewing and appraising the damage, to be recovered as costs in the case.

Sec. 13. That section three of an act providing for the disposal of estrays, approved March 10, 1892, is hereby amended to read as follows: "All horses, mules and neat cattle found running at large on which there is no brand, except calves and colts, running at large on the premises of any person not the owner, are hereby declared to be estrays." [Sec. 3 of the act of 1892, as given above, conforms to the amendment here made.]

Sec. 14. That section 6 to 14 of an act providing for the disposal of stray animals, and for trespass and damage, approved March 10, 1892, both inclusive, be and they are hereby repealed.

Sec. 15. This act shall take effect from and after its approval.

Approved March 8th.

WORK FOR THE POOR.

The following act, passed at the late session of the Legislature, is especially designed for the benefit of the poor. As will be seen it provides a method by which the county courts of the respective counties may furnish employment for needy laborers:

AN ACT TO PROVIDE FOR LABOR UPON THE PUBLIC ROADS IN THE SEVERAL COUNTIES OF UTAH TERRITORY.

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah.

SECTION 1. That the several counties of this Territory may, and they are hereby authorized and empowered to issue warrants to the amount of one-fourth of one mill for each dollar in value of the taxable property situated in the county, said value to be computed from the assessed value of the property within the respective county, according to the assessment roll of A. D. 1893, said warrants to bear interest at the rate of eight per cent per annum from the date of issue until called in for payment; Provided, that such warrants shall not be issued for any other purpose than in payment for labor performed upon the public roads within the county issuing them.

Sec. 2. Said warrants shall be redeemable within two years from the date of issue, at the option of the county issuing them.

Sec. 3. Any county issuing warrants as is herein provided may levy and collect a special tax, not to exceed three-eighths of one mill on each dollar of the taxable property within the county, for the purpose of redeeming said warrants, and the funds so collected shall be applied, first to the redemption of said warrants, and the surplus, if there be any, shall be covered into the general fund of the county.

Sec. 4. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Approved March 8th.

SPECIAL SCHOOL TAX.

Many school districts which did not, during the year 1893, levy a special tax, are financially in a situation to need the relief that could be obtained by that means, and the following act, passed at the late session of the Legislature, confers the necessary authority.

AN ACT FOR THE RELIEF OF SCHOOL DISTRICTS THAT HAVE FAILED TO LEVY A SPECIAL SCHOOL TAX.

Be it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah:

SECTION 1. That all school districts that failed to levy a special school tax during the year ending December 31, 1893, for the purpose of building, or for other school purposes, may levy such tax for the year 1894, in the manner provided by law, if levied before the 15th day of April 1894, and such tax shall be assessed and collected at the same time and in the same manner as if it had been levied in the year 1893.

Sec. 2. This act shall take effect from and after its approval.

Approved March 8th.

KANAB STAKE CONFERENCE.

Conference at Kanab.

The Kanab Stake quarterly conference was held in Kanab on the 3rd and 4th of March, 1894. The Kanab Stake Presidency, all the members of the High Council and representatives from the various wards were present. We had a very enjoyable time together, taking into consideration the exceedingly disagreeable weather and amount of sickness which at the time was prevalent in the town of Kanab.

The remarks by the Stake Presidency and other Elders, including several of our missionaries lately returned from their different fields of labor, were such as to awaken an interest in the minds of the people, not only to the observance of the laws of God but to the proper means of educating the youth and the starting up and sustaining of home industries. We have the elements around us to make us a prosperous community, if proper attention is paid.

The general.

and the Stake authorities were unanimously sustained.

Edward Pugh was sustained as second counselor to Bishop Joel H. Johnson, of Kanab ward, filling the vacancy caused by Elder A. W. Judd going on a mission to Germany.

The Sacramento was partaken of and a good spirit prevailed throughout our conference, including the conferences of the societies, associations and Sunday schools.

On Friday, the 2nd, at 10 o'clock a.m., there was held our teachers convention (the first ever held in the Stake), presided over by County Superintendent Edwin Cutler. A short but interesting program was carried out.

Indian George, having been chosen by the Indians as the chief or captain of the small tribe of Piedes in this Stake, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Frank, their former chief, desired to be blessed as such by our Stake president. On Monday, the 5th, Elder E. D. Woolley, having learned that George was a member of the Church, gave him the desired blessing.

The Saints here are looking after the Indians' welfare in this State.

F. L. PORTER,
Kauai State Clerk.

THE CHOIR SELF SUPPORTING.

Admirers of the Tabernacle choir, especially those outside the Church, have often been curious to know how that great body of singers supported itself; the expenses of music alone for so many singers must amount to no inconsiderable sum. It will be a matter of interest to know that the choir is practically self-sustaining, as shown by a statement of its expenses and earnings from October, 1890, till March, 1894, recently prepared by Director Stephens. The statement is as follows:

Ехрoнлс.

MUSIC.

To	99 copies Psalmody.....	$ 139 30
250	copies Praise ye the Father.....	30 00
300	copies Judge me O God.....	18 00
250	copies How beautiful upon the mountains, Gathered! Saints.....	15 00
500	copies Song of Redeemed.....	30 00
700	copies Let God arise, Praise ye the Lord.....	5 00
200	copies Look up, Song of Triumph.....	5 00
200	copies O Give Thanks.....	3 00
200	copies Vales of Deseret.....	80 00
200	copies Song of Morning Star.....	7 50
300	copies Chorister No. 1.....	60 00
300	copies " No. 2.....	60 00
300	copies " No. 3.....	60 00
300	copies " No. 4.....	60 00
250	copies Last Judg..... @ 23	62 50
50	copies..... @ 50	25 00
200	copies Comrades in Arms.....	15 00
300	copies Summer.....	15 00
200	copies Unfold ye Portals.....	16 00
800	copies Grant us Peace.....	80 00
300	copies Let the Mountains shout.....	15 00
300	copies Music Readers for Choir Classes.....	120 00
1000	copies God of Israel.....	130 00
500	copies Temple Anthem.....	40 00
300	copies Blessed are the Men.....	18 00
300	copies I Wrestle and Pray.....	24 00
300	copies Heavens are Telling.....	18 00
400	copies Bohemian Girl Choruses.....	47 50
300	copies Daughter of Regiment.....	15 00
300	copies Impetuous Torrents.....	45 00
600	copies Temple Music.....	150 00
100	copies Cambria Song of Freedom.....	12 00
100	copies Pilgrim's Chorus.....	20 00
150	copies Mormon Song of Freedom.....	15 00
300	copies The Pioneers.....	8 50
100	copies Song/Books for Class.....	10 00
40	copies Spanish Gypsy Girl (ladies) 40 copies The Lord is My Shepherd.....	4 50
200	copies O My Father.....	20 00

400 copies Columbia Chorus.....	7 00
Jerusalem, Daughter of Zion, Resur- rection, Pilgrim's Chorus, O Come Let us Sing, Christmas Anthem,	80 00
200 copies Soldier's Chorus (Faust)..	30 00
300 copies Damascus March ....	24 00
200 copies Hymn (Merrill).....	5 00
300 copies Hail Summer Morn.....	5 00
300 expressage on Gilmore books.....	38 00
Sample copies (misc).....	10 00

PLATFORM.

To cash paid towards platform and seats.....	$ 800 00
--	-----------

MISCELLANEOUS.

To Copygraph.....	$	5 00
Blank paper.....	4	00
Copying.....	6	00
Binding copies.....	6	00
Words printed.....	6	00
Cut of organ.....	5	00
Choir photos.....	10	00
Blackboard.....	15	00
Choir record and tablets.....	8	75
Loss on concert January, 1892.....	38	00
Expenses on advertisement material Mendelssohn quartette.....	7	60
Telegrams for music when in haste.....	3	00
Rent of organ.....	3	00
Boarding Manti choir Temple dedication.....	17	55
Gas, Soci.....	2	50
Hauling organ and chairs.....	4	00
Loss on 40 chairs.....	4	00
Secretary McEwan.....	15	00

HALL RENT.

To Coalter's various times in three years..... $ 98.00

MEMORY TRIBUTE OF FLOWERS

To P. S. Gilmore, Emma Abbott, J. S.
Lewis, Mrs. Allison's Baby.....$ 50 00

TRAINING CLASSES

To Reading Classes 1891-2.....	$ 400 00
Chorus and Oratorio 1893-4.....	110 00
Chorus and Voice 1891-2.....	75 00
Chorus and Harmony 1891-3.....	150 00
Organ 1893-4.....	118 00
	$ 853 00

Receipts

By Concert, March, 1891.....	$20 00
Concert, April, 1891.....	690 00
Concert, Nov., 1891.....	235 00
From Church.....	200 00
Concert, April, 1892.....	247 00
Concert, Oct., 1892.....	512 00
Concert, Oct. 25, 1892.....	80 00
Reading classes.....	68 00
Interest on funds.....	86 67
Mus. sold.....	21 80
Organ Concert.....	180 00
	$3211 07

Recapitulation.

To Music total.....	$1588	80
Miscellaneous total.....	164	40
Hall rent total.....	98	00
Memory tributes total.....	50	00
Training class total.....	843	00
P.atform.....	800	00

Total.....	$3542 20
By Credit.....	$3211 07
Deficiency.....	331 13

In addition to this showing Mr. Stephens goes on to say: We have 240 Contributors containing male voices pieces; saved about $100 on pieces used from the Gilmore collection; about $50 saved on Temple dedication pieces, and fifty psalmodes paid for by the Church, or $300 additional saved on music, not counting discounts granted whenever possible. Thus we may say that about $4,000 would cover our regular expenses for the past three years and a half.

The World's Fair item with all of our labors for the spring, summer and fall of 1893 is not accounted for in the above (excepting music bought, which was procured earlier). The labors of the choir in concerts for the whole season, including the trip and Chicago contest, netted between $7,000 and $8,000. The juvenile choir concerts, choir individual donations and other means raised the sum to about $10,000, while the Church assumed the remaining $2,500 necessary to clear the entire expenses of the trip. In order to satisfy the public at our entertainments it is impossible to furnish an evening's program at the Tabernacle for less than $300.

We have quite freely shared our receipts with other worthy organizations. Adding to all this the many important events we have had to prepare ourselves for, such as the Temple dedication, etc., the public will readily see that the period I have named has been a time of great activity with the choir, and more than all, it has been a time of constant building up and improvement for the five hundred singers who are now enrolled.

The amount we are now behind could and should be made up at the next entertainment we shall give, if the community, who receive the benefits of our labor, at all appreciate the services rendered so faithfully by their choir.

EVAN STEPHENS.

EVAN STEPHENS.

Director.

A VETERAN'S ANNIVERSARY.

TOOELE CITY, March 14.—The greatest event of the season, in this place, was a gathering of the family and friends at the home of Father Robert Melklejohn and wife to celebrate the anniversary of the former's 83rd birthday. March 12, 1894.

It was indeed a historical event. Four generations were gathered together that mixed and mingled like a scene in a fairy tale. To gather together the personal history of eighty-three years, and let it pass before you in song and story, is more like being in a dream that shifts from scene to scene, than being in the present realities of life—for so it surely seemed in this gathering.

Father Meiklejohn was a well-known member in the early history of the Church in Scotland. He has been a prominent actor and factor in this city from almost its foundation, and he has gathered around him such a host of friends that they delight to do him honor on these natal anniversaries of his.

From early afternoon to late midnight it was one continual feast of song and story. Even at the sumptuous supper banquet that was served, the story went round, and the joke was passed. Just in the midst of a historical oration by the reverend John McKellar, the sweet strains of the Sunday school martial band, under the leadership of Professor Beasley, late of your city, were heard; they had come to serenade the aged veteran, and to add another link to that day's enjoyment.

It was such a meeting where every guest vied with each other to make things pleasant for all. And when they parted it was with expressed regrets that such social gatherings are so few and so far between.

JAMES DUNN.

R. E. Hunter had his barn and contents burned at American Fork on Monday night, March 12th. About fifty tons of hay, two sets of harness and one saddle were consumed. The barn was a frame structure, a very fine one. Loss estimated at $1,500; fully insured. It is believed to have been the work of tramps.

INDUSTRIES, COMMERCE AND MINES.

Good news regarding the home industry movement is coming in from all parts of the Territory. People are talking it up in their meetings everywhere, and are accompanying their words by works in harmony therewith. The prospect is that not only will the industries now in operation here receive better patronage, but a number of new ones will be added to the list. The mercantile houses here report that there is a generally increasing demand for goods manufactured at home. While there is a great deal of talk, more perhaps than anything else, this talk is having its effect on the masses, as shown by the calls that are being made at the stores for home articles.

For instance in the grocery departments of Z. C. M. I. there has been a marked increase in the sale of such articles of home production, as meats and lards. People ask for that prepared at home and do not want the imported articles. The clerks are instructed to use their influence in this direction by putting the Utan articles to the front. In the matter of brooms, notwithstanding the dull times, there were sold at least 300 dozen more home made brooms during 1893 than during the previous year, and the prospects are that the record of the present season will surpass any of its predecessors. Z. C. M. I. stock of brooms is now made up entirely of the home article. Other home products are also receiving marked preference.

In the shoe line the institution does not carry an imported shoe in men's, youths' or boys' wear which sells for less than $3. They have not the machinery to make the finest kinds of shoes, and therefore they carry imported shoes of high price to supply the customers who call for them, but their principal stock is manufactured by the institution. For the last few months the factory has been manufacturing 160 pairs of shoes per day, but the demand from the outside makes it necessary for them to increase the output to 250. It is thought there will be a steady increase in the demand and that it will not be long until the factory will be run to its full capacity, which is 300 pairs per day. In order to assist the home industry movement a reduction of 10 per cent has been made on their home made shoes, but there has been no change in the wages paid the workmen. Mr. Romney states that the Walker Bros. & Fyler Co. has taken the lead of the stores in purchasing shoes manufactured by the Z. C. M. I. factory.

The reports from other institutions in the city are fully as encouraging as those from Z. C. M. I., while the outside districts show even a better condition.

The board of directors of the Utah Sugar works held their meeting March 15, and the session was a most interesting one. This feature is explained by the fact that the board declared a dividend of fifteen per cent—the first since the company was organized, to go to capital stock. While this is but a stock dividend, it will be considerable encouragement to the shareholders, and promises well for the future of the company's business.

Manager Cutler has arranged contracts this year for about 3,500 acres of sugar beets. If the cultivation of this area is successful, the quantity of beets produced will be all that the factory can handle in the season of 1894. Of the beet acreage, 3,400 acres are in Utah and 100 acres near Grand Junction, Colorado. The farmers at the latter place furnished a good quality of beets last year, and as they desired to plant again this season, contracts were made with them.

At the Lehi factory matters are comparatively quiet at the present time, yet all work is not stopped. There are half a dozen men engaged in making necessary repairs and preparing the factory to start up at the earliest practicable date next autumn. On the beet farm a good force of hands will be kept employed in cultivating the beets, and careful efforts will be made to improve the quality of the crop even beyond last year's excellent condition. The season thus far gives promise of favorable crops, and the general outlook for the factory is gratifying.

Park Record: After several years of hard study and harder work James Brennan has evolved a machine which he is positive will save both coarse and flour gold, and has applied for a patent for the invention. The machine is composed of three parts, the first of which is to save the coarse gold and reduce the gravel to fine sand. The second part is where every particle of fine sand and water is forced through a quicksilver bath under hydraulic pressure. The third part is a simple device for catching up and saving the amalgam that may escape from the machine. The secret is in the construction of the cylinder and discharge tank and their automatic working, and for the present is withheld from publication. The common sense of the machine is in the fact that every particle of sand and water is forced into contact with the quicksilver, and no matter how fine the gold, once it touches quicksilver fairly it will stay with it. Mr. Brennan has applied for a patent, and the invention will be known as the O'Neil hydraulic gold machine. Should the machine prove successful it will mean a fortune for its inventor, as there are millions of dollars of flour gold in the bars and floating down Snake river. Mr. Brennan spent several years on that stream and will leave in a few days with one of the machines and give it a thorough trial, and the result will undoubtedly be watched for with interest. An Idaho company has made him a fair offer, while the organization of company of Parkites is talked of if the machine pans out well.

Letters received from sheep owners who have been herding their flocks in western Wyoming the past winter, but who reside in Utah, are of a most encouraging nature. The sheep referred to being kept on Wyoming grazing lands, the taxes thereon go to that state, but as the owners are Utah men, the profits, when there are any, come this way. The reports given in the letters received are that during the past winter the losses among the sheep have been unusually light, while the flocks are in better condition this spring than they have been at this season for a series of years. One owner who has his sheep on Henry's Fork says that in that section there has been an abundance of feed, and though there has been snow for the past four months it has been so light and the weather so mild, that there have been no disasters among the various herds there. Another owner, who is among those who took their herds east of Green river to winter, makes an equally favorable report. In his flock of 2,700 sheep he has only lost ten head since snow began to fall.

Under this condition sheepowners are feeling quite hopeful. If they can realize a fair price for their wool this season, they feel that they can partially retrieve the heavy loss of last season. It is not expected that any of the spring storms will be so severe as seriously injure the sheep interests.

Payson Globe: August Peterson, a young man of Salem, met with a very serious accident over near the West Mountains last Saturday. He was thawing out some sticks of dynamite in a stove, when from some unknown cause they exploded, completely demolishing the stove and severely wounding young Peterson. His hands and face were terribly mangled and it is a wonder that he was not killed instantly. The unfortunate young man was brought to this city and Dr. Tilson was called and alleviated his sufferings as much as possible under the circumstances. The doctor thinks the wounds are not dangerous, and that the young man will soon recover.

American Fork Item: On Wednesday the pet deer, belonging to James Clark, exhibited his hilarity again and attacked the mother of Mrs. Charles Preston on the street and vigorously goaded her with its feet. Assistance soon arrived and the lady was picked up, her head bleeding from several fractures received from the deer. She was taken to Mr. Clark's house and cared for. This is the second vicious attack this "King of the Forest" has made upon ladies. The deer was sold to the butcher the same day.

Iron county Record: James Stewart is engaged at present in the manufacture of salt from the salt springs up Salt Creek canyon. At present he is making about fifty pounds daily. The capacity of the springs is about 200 pounds of salt every twenty-four hours. This salt is of superior quality, and is about 95 per cent pure. Nearly all the salt used in Cedar comes from these springs, and it is a home industry that should be encouraged.

Mount Pleasant Pyramid: Mountain lion incidents are becoming so common as to have lost their interest. Last week it was reported that one was seen prowling around in the Bottoms, and several young nimrods went out to dispatch his lionship, but so far he remains undispatched and unseen. Although one was recently killed in the immediate vicinity of Chester the presence of another is reported.

Park Record: A car load of ore from the Mercur gold mine, Camp Floyd district, is expected in the Park next week to be tested by the Russell leaching process, to determine whether or not it can be profitably reduced by that method of extraction. The test will be watched with a great deal of interest, for if it proves successful the cyanide process will have a strong rival in the field.

Messrs. Fleiner and Moore, who have been prospecting the mountains immediately east of Provo, says the Provo Dispatch, on Tuesday made a strike in Little Rock canyon, immediately in front of the city, which runs $10.53 to the ton. This is good enough and it means millions and millions for Provo. We warmly congratulate the boys on their lucky find. Location papers were taken out yesterday, and active operations commenced at once.

Mount Pleasant Pyramid: Sugar beets will be found excellent for cows at this season. The labor of growing beets has been greatly lessened during recent years, the planting of the seed, covering and making of the rows now being done by seed drills. With the appliances in use a field of beets can be grown as easily as a small patch by former methods.

Richfield Advocate: "Everybody" is starting home industry clubs; what about starting one or two in Sevier county? There is money in it, and don't forget it. A nickel saved in the county is better than a nickel imported, because it costs two to bring one back after it has departed for the East.

Manti Messenger: Reports from sheep camps are very good. The danger from bad weather is practically all over and the chances are that what sheep are alive now will get through to the summer ranges all right. Some lowners have suffered pretty heavy losses.

There is considerable prospecting for coal in the mountains east of Ephraim, says the Enterprise. Several claims have been located and some development work is being done. A number of coal mines have been located at Mayfield.

Manti Sentinel: The Wool association flourishes although many claim that the wool business is destroyed. They have been able to declare the same dividend this year they did last year.

LOST ON THE DESERT.

PINTO, Iron Co., March 9, 1894.—On the 1st of the present month two men and their wives came to our town and entertained the public in the evening. Next day they started for Milford, Beaver county, a distance of 80 miles with only a small lunch for dinner, expecting to go by way of Sulphur Springs, about 40 miles distant, where they could get accommodations for themselves and team.

On account of bad roads they had to camp when they had made a little over half the distance, and make supper from what had been left from dinner.

The next day was stormy and not being acquainted with the roads took the wrong one. They got lost and had to camp on the desert in a foot of snow without anything to eat and only an open conveyance to shelter them. Fortunately they had plenty of bedding and did not suffer from cold.

Next morning the 4th, one of the men started back to get help. He got here about 4 p.m. and soon had two young men and a team with provisions on the road to relieve the party.

The young men traveled all night and about sunrise on the 5th found the camp all well, and only about eight miles from Sulphur Springs.

The gentleman who remained with the ladies took an exploring trip and found a sheep camp where he got some bread and mutton. They were nearly two days without food. They all got back here safe on the night of the 5th with a resolve to never travel on the desert in the winter again.

The health of the people here is generally good although we have suffered some from colds.

Our district school is in good running order under the able management of Miss Mary A. Pages.

The United States mail comes in on time and has done all winter notwithstanding the cold weather, but we do not always get the Semi-weekly News regularly, on account of bad connections.

J. H. HARRISON.

NEWS ITEMS.

Pedestrians who crossed the Sevier bridge last Friday, says the Millard county Blade, published at Deseret, looked up and down the river, looked up at the mountains covered with the greatest snowfall for years, looked at the high water mark on the banks near the blacksmith shop and then shook their heads ominously. Spring had really come to stay, and there was trouble ahead in the swift current getting deeper and wider as the hours of the day rolled into the night.

Saturday the ice came down in rotten chunks and slabs, yet large enough to bear a man's weight and plentiful enough to create a gorge at the bridge. Such as escaped under the bridge sailed swiftly down to the forks in the river about a mile and a half distant, and perversely resolved to dam up that point. Then the trouble began in earnest; and between the dam at the bridge and the dam at the forks, the river had no alternative but to spread itself out and over its banks in all the conceit of the big Missouri on a rampage. It was a thrilling sight, needing only the puffing and paddling of the steamboat to make it realistic of the Father of Waters.

Every hour the gorge at the bridge threatened its destruction. The water was in easy reach of a person leaning over it and the ice was too large for speedy passage. Mr. William Barron, road superintendent, directed a gang of men to remove the flooring of the bridge and with the aid of poles push the ice under and out into the stream. But the odds were against the workers in the unequal fight with the masses of ice cakes coming down and building themselves up as far back as one could see from the bridge.

Giant powder was inserted into the mass at the bridge and every hour in the day and night explosion would follow explosion. But it had little effect on the rotten ice, though interesting to the crowds who gathered at the bridge. The ice gorge builded itself higher and the people began to seriously consider the safety of their homes. All day Sunday the work was kept up in the manner described.

About 10 o'clock Sunday night an alarm was rung from the school house and the people turned out in terror. The river had spread over the lowlands and fears were entertained that it would undermine the new meeting house. Everybody had an opinion to give, and some even advised the destruction of the bridge as the only hope of relief from the flood. But while everybody seemed handy in the giving, nobody manifested any willingness to take advice, and it is to this singular trait of our Deseret people that we have the bridge standing intact today. The best work done that night was the building of a levee on the north side of the Gibbs lot.

About 8 o'clock on Monday afternoon the dam at the forks was broken. In a short time thereafter the gorge at the bridge got a start, and once it began to move, the released waters carried the huge mass down amid the shouts of the people who lined up either side of the bridge. The crisis was passed, the people breathed easier, and when darkness set in Sevier bridge had no more attraction to a lonely traveler than the gate of a country cemetery.

On the south side of the river near the forks Chris Erickson was compelled to take a boat and remove his furniture. Between the dam and the bridge stood the Richards house and the Poulter residence. The former was carried away, the family escaping to the Poulter residence on the east. Mr. Poulter's field was surrounded by water, but his house was high and dry on an elevation.

All things considered, the damage was slight compared to the threatened danger. Had the gorge remained another day longer at the forks and the thermometer gone up 20 degrees, there is no telling the consequences. We have had big rivers right along and a long time ago a flood; but this is the first time Sevier has had an ice gorge down in this part of the country.

The carcasses of fifteen or twenty head of stock were observed to float down, wedged in the ice. Mr. John L. Allred lost a horse in this way.

Among those appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Council as directors of the territorial insane asylum, says the Mount Pleasant Pyramid, is Dr. W. W. Woodring, of this city. The doctor's many friends will be pleased to learn of this recognition, and all are confident that he will fill the position as honorably and creditably as any of the other members of the board.

Millard Progress: John Cooper is at present exhibiting himself as a living curiosity. Last week he accidentally swallowed a brass tack, which lodged in his throat, where it sticks at present. He can neither get it up nor down, but otherwise it does not inconvenience him.

The Utica Mining company at Angels, Calaveras county, has begun the erection of a private hospital for its employees. Trained nurses will be in attendance and every comfort will be provided for sick and injured miners.

AT HOME AND ABROAD.

CAMPDEN, N. Y., March 12.—Conrad Coke, John Ellis and a crowd of negro boys yesterday seized Charles Barney, a white boy eight years old, and tied him to a stake, piled brushwood about him and set it on fire. The child's cries brought a colored man, who freed him. The boy's hands are so burned that amputation will be necessary and the doctors are doubtful if his life can be saved.

NEW YORK, March 12.—The New York Presbytery held its monthly meeting today. Several young men were presented, prior to their admission to the ministry, and after the usual questions had been put and answered favorably. Dr. S. L. Shear, of the Tract society, created a commotion by suggestion that it might be well to ask these young men whether they are attending any seminary not recommended by this body and the general assembly.

This practically introduced the Briggs question into the case, and a dozen ministers were on their feet in an instant. A hot debate followed, but following this the men were admitted, with only three votes to the contrary.

BATHURST, March 13.—It is reported that the slave chief Fodislah, who has been causing the British forces so much trouble, has surrendered on French territory.

ST. JOHNS, N. F., March 13.—The steamer Virginia Lake arrived this morning towing the steamer Briccoe, to whose rescue she went last Sunday. When the latter was found she was practically dismantled, a large part of her upper works having been cut away and burned to keep up the steam, the coal having been exhausted, and she badly used by the storm. The men were out of provisions and reduced to mere skeletons for want of food and from exposure. Their wants were at once supplied by the Virginia Lake and the vessel was towed in.

LONDON, March 13.—The house of commons passed Henry Labouchere's amendment to abolish the house of lords, 147 to 145 in spite of the opposition of the government.

PITTSBURG, March 13.—The Junior Order of American Mechanics today made an application in the county court for an injunction restraining the Riverside public school board from employing members of religious orders, and wearing the garb of an order, as teachers. This action is aimed at the Catholic sisters. The hearing was fixed for March 24th. It is expected the central board of education will have the matter under consideration this evening.

SYDNEY, N. S. W., March 13.—The passengers of the steamer Arawa, which has just arrived here, give the Associated Press correspondent an interesting story of recent events in Honolulu. They assert that a subject of Japan was recently arrested in that city for a trivial offense and placed in jail. He escaped from jail and swam out to the Japanese warship. The authorities appealed to the American admiral, asking that he demand the surrender of the Japanese. The commander of the Japanese warship refused to give the man up, and threatened that if the American admiral boarded the ship he would give him a half hour to leave, or, if he refused, the American flagship would be blown out of the water. According to the story of the passengers the escaped prisoner was unmolested.

BALTIMORE, March 14.—The veteran theatrical manager, John A. Ford, proprietor of Ford's grand opera house, died this morning, of the effects of the grip. He was the oldest theatrical manager in the country, having been known in that capacity as early as 1851. He was brought into national prominence in 1865, when manager of Ford's theater, Washington, where President Lincoln was assassinated.

CLEVELAND, March 14.—The roll of the membership of one of the leading A. P. A. lodges containing 700 names, has fallen into the hands of the Catholics, and a great stir is being made by the ordering of boycott of merchants whose names are found on the roll.

WASHINGTON, March 14.—Assistant Secretary of Agriculture Dabney has sent the House committee on agriculture a report of the investigation of the matter of the Russian thistle ravages in the Northwest, with the comment that it is thorough and little remains to be done. The report gives the history of its rapid spread, and says that it now occupies 40,000 acres in adjacent territory in North and South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa and Nebraska, with isolated bodies as far east as Madison, Wis., and west to Denver. The chief agents of distribution are the wind, in flax seed and in bedding and in stock cars on railroads. The report says it is easily killed by cutting before the month of August, before the seed ripens, but, to be effective, general co-operation is necessary; or it may be kept down by pasturing. Further remedies suggested are thorough cleaning of the seed to be planted, and, to prevent the distribution by the wind, wire fences, with a double row of sunflowers as a temporary fence all around unfenced farms, to stop the rolling of the weeds.

BOSTON, Mass., 14.—Over 800 guests last night participated in the wedding festivities of Henry Feinberg, of Worcester, and Miss Ida Margolies, daughter of Rabbi Margolies of this city. Fully three hundred were victims of poisoning, caused, it is thought, by eating food that was cooked in two old copper boilers. The principal articles of food eaten were chicken, chicken gizzards and pickled tongues.

There was no intimation that anything had gone wrong during the festivities, which ended at midnight, but after a majority of the people had gone to their homes the poison began its work.

Shortly after 1 o'clock this morning Dr. Israel B. Krongberg, who keeps a drug store, was called out to attend a woman and nine-year-old child, who were in a dangerous condition and exhibiting symptoms of poisoning. This was but the commencement, for up to 4:30 a. m. over forty patients called for treatment.

The same program was being enacted in several Jewish sections of the city, every Jewish doctor having five to forty patients each, but no fatalities have been reported. The Hebrew section of the community are all excited, and a few hint that enemies of the rabbi placed emetic in the food for spite, because the rabbi was not of their way of thinking on matters pertaining to church work.

All the party from this city are now out of danger except Rabbi Baerman, who is in a critical condition.

BUENOS AYRES, March 14.—The insurgent admiral is at Grande, sixty-eight miles west of here, southwest of Rio Janeiro, with the war ships Aquidaban and Republica. It is thought he will surrender.

DENVER, Colo., March 15.—This has been a day of intense excitement in Denver, scenes unparalleled in the history of the city have been witnessed. Governor Waite, of "blood to the horses' bridles" fame, called out the first regiment and the Chaffee light artillery to attack the city hall and drive therefrom the two police commissioners who defied his power, entrenched behind barricaded doors and surrounded by hundreds of armed policemen and deputy sheriffs, ready to do their bidding.

Massed in the vicinity of the city hall were thousands, most of them drawn to the spot out of mere curiosity, and reckless of the danger that seemed imminent. Part of the policemen, armed with revolvers and clubs, were drawn up in line outside the hall, awaiting the approach of the enemy. Inside were the remainder and a large force of deputy sheriffs, armed with rifles, revolvers and shotguns, and determined to hold the fort at any sacrifice.

